> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority;—

In that committee, I am in a minority. There are two members of the New Democratic Party on that committee, four members from the Liberal Party and eight members from the governing party. The governing party then has a majority.

We have rules of the House. We have the Standing Orders of the House which apply to committees and apply to the House. We have Beauchesne's which sets out in its citations a set of precedents of prior law.

As a minority, I am bound by those laws. We are all bound by those laws, and anything that we were doing in that committee in opposing the GST was within that law. The government members, the majority, may not have liked the fact that we were waging a filibuster. They may not have liked that. But, the fact was that we were not doing anything that was outside the parameters of the law. The law of the Standing Orders of the committee provided for that. We did not violate a law. We were simply conducting ourselves within the law. Standing Order 1 states, and I quote:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by other Order of the House, procedural questions shall be decided by the Speaker or Chairman, whose decisions shall be based on the usages, forms, customs and precedents of the House of Commons of Canada and on parliamentary tradition in Canada and other jurisdictions, so far as they may be applicable to the House.

I am not concerned about what in fact took place in 1984, because it does not fall within what I would consider precedents. Last night, the majority adopted the position that might was right. I think they ought to take a line from Camelot that it ought not to be might is right, but might for right. In fact, the majority in that committee ought to be standing up for respect of the rules, because they indeed protected the minority.

It was not as if the government members on the committee were bereft of a solution to their problem. They had a solution to the problem of a filibuster in the committee. They had not exhausted every opportunity to bring that filibuster to an end. They could very well have come to the House for an order, which is provided for in the rules. They had a responsibility to respect the rules. They have a responsibility to obey the rules, just as the minority have a responsibility to obey the rules. Every time the rule is violated for minorities, down the line the rule is going to be violated for them as well.

We have a legitimate right to have our rights protected because we have always been entrusted with the highest form of legitimacy: the confidence of the citizens of this country. Our democracy is based on the rule of law. If that rule of law is removed in the committees, then what we will have is the rule of the jungle. That invites the minority to resort to doing things outside the law, outside the Standing Orders. We would never do that, so I wonder why it is that the majority of the Conservative members sought to resort to the jungle, to the rule of might, to squash the minority that were filibustering against the GST when there were legitimate alternatives at their disposal.

Another point is that within that same meeting yesterday the member for Longueuil, during the course of the proceedings in the finance committee, said that the police should be called in to end the interventions by opposition members. This is a clear indication—

Mr. Speaker: He may have said it. I do not know that that helps me very much. There may have been many things said in the committee. There is no suggestion in what I have heard so far that if that were said it amounted to a threat that the police should be called in. If that is the point of the hon. member's reference to it, that might or might not be a serious matter. I do not want it pursued if it is just a comment in argument or even in jest.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is a comment en passant. It was made to indicate the mentality which led to the frustration of the majority within the committee. That frustration led them to seek ways and means to bring discussions in the committee to an end, in my view in an unparliamentary fashion.

In conclusion, I want to say there are fundamental principles that are paramount to maintain the integrity and legitimacy of this place. These are that the tyranny of the majority cannot silence the voice of elected representatives of the citizens of this country. Members must be guaranteed that their privileges will be protected and not be violated arbitrarily so they can carry out the duties for which they were duly elected.

I want to emphasize that in fact it was not as if government members on the committee were bereft of a solution to their problem. They had a legal solution to the problem. I think that is key and crucial. It was not as if this band of six opposition members had taken away from them all other options with which they could legally bring the filibuster to an end. They chose not to end it. That is a question that bothers me. It does not frustrate me, as you said, if I am irritated. It did not irritate me. It did not inconvenience me. However it saddens me that what we have had in my view is the trampling of democracy.

The Standing Orders do not provide for the chairman of a committee to adjourn a meeting arbitrarily. An adjournment motion must be put properly before the committee. A committee chairman cannot take up his gavel and say: "I adjourn the meeting." That is not provided under the rules. These were all exhibited over the last two or three weeks within that committee.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, should you find that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would ask that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway seeks the floor, and I will certainly recognize him. He too was a member of the 1984 committee. I know that he will not mind me reminding him that both of us were there and both of us remember the events very clearly. Perhaps neither of us need to be reminded of them in too much detail this afternoon.

I would ask the member who is an experienced member and an able lawyer to deal with any points that have not yet been made or to illustrate very briefly what points he indicates to me are perhaps the most pertinent in the argument that we have had.

There is no need to go through all the facts again. I think I have those. I assure hon. members I will look very carefully at the proceedings.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly attempt to be brief and not to cover ground that has already been covered.

I do believe that we are dealing here with a very important and very fundamental question about the rights and privileges of all members of this House. I appreciate your injunction that it is only in exceptional circumstances that the Chair will intervene with respect to proceedings that have taken place in committee. I appreciate the statement of the Chair that in those rare and exceptional or, to use the words of the Chair, severe circumstances there must be some recourse for members of this House.

I would submit, with respect, that this is one of those rare circumstances in which we as members of this House must appeal to the Chair to review with care what has taken place and to find that there has been a prima facie breach or privilege in order that the ramifications of the chairman's dictatorial actions in the committee last night be considered by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I want to make two or three points on this matter. Your Honour has noted that we were both present in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on June 6, 1984. At that time the chairman brought the proceedings to a halt by making a ruling. That ruling was upheld by the committee on a divided vote with the vigorous opposition of the Conservative Party as well as the New Democratic Party. Following that the chairman resigned.

I want to emphasize the point made at the conclusion of the remarks of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. If the hon. member for Mississauga South is allowed to get away with this kind of dictatorial ruling, in effect it subverts, it utterly subverts, not only the Standing Orders of this House but the long-standing traditions and precedents of this House. There are two particular arguments on that I wish to make.

If, in the course of proceedings in committee, members on the government side believe that there is an abuse of the committee taking place, if members on the government side believe that there is a filibuster under way which has to be stopped—and we in this party readily concede that we were attempting to do what we could to lead the opposition to the goods services tax in the finance committee and to use every legal means of doing so; that is what we were doing in accordance with the laws and precedents of this House—surely it cannot be acceptable for the chairman of that committee to state arbitrarily as he did, and I quote: "I terminated it. I just went ahead and did it. The majority has the right to run the country".

If in fact the chairman of that standing committee or of any standing committee in this House is given those sweeping powers to terminate debate, legal debate, after 31 hours today, what will it be tomorrow if this precedent is allowed to stand? Will it be 20 hours in the committee on communications? Will it be 10 hours in the justice committee? Will it be 2 hours in a legislative committee? There is no limit.

If Your Honour allows this very, very dangerous ruling to stand, what is to limit a future committee chairperson from arbitrarily shutting off debate, not at 31 hours but at any earlier period of time, subject to no debate, because as was very clear last night the chairman said: "There is no debate". He was right on that ruling. "There is no debate. You can appeal my ruling to the committee and that appeal is also subject to no debate".

If Your Honour does not intervene in these circumstances to protect the privileges of all members of this House, a profoundly dangerous and destructive precedent will have been established that surely runs counter not only to the Standing Orders but to the long-standing traditions of this House.

As my colleagues have indicated, there was another mechanism. I want to quote from a very distinguished member of this House who said in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on June 8 1984: "Members will understand and appreciate that there were certain provisions and there are certain provisions under the rules whereby if the government deemed it appropriate to establish some kind of allocation or regime of allocation or limitation of the debate it was open to the minister to go to the House to obtain some authority in that regard which would, if it were obtained, of course, be binding on the procedures in this committee".

The very distinguished member of the committee who spoke those words was the hon. member for Vancouver South. Indeed that was the appropriate procedure to adopt. Standing Order 78(3) of this House states that a minister of the Crown who has made an attempt to negotiate with representatives of the other parties but has been unsuccessful in doing so can in fact propose a motion.

It is very important that when that motion is tabled in the House—and it can apply to committees under 78(3); it states under consideration that either in the House or in any committee—there is then a debate, a two-hour debate on the wisdom of shutting off debate, and at the end of that process there is a vote.

Both those fundamental elements should be in place before this Draconian mechanism of closure is invoked arbitrarily by the chairman or denied. If this precedent is allowed to stand, there is no debate; not two hours, not one hour, not five minutes. There is no debate and effectively there is no vote of the House on this very important question.

The final point I would make is that it has always been the case that the chair has recognized that we must not allow to be done indirectly what cannot be done directly. That is precisely what the ruling of the hon. member for Mississauga South would do.

Closure cannot be invoked in committee by a simple hammer by the chairman of the committee. Closure can be invoked only by using the time allocation proceedings as established in the Standing Orders.

Under citation 457 of Beauchesne's I would note that a motion for the previous question is not admitted in a Committee or the Whole or in any committee of the House. Closure cannot be invoked. A motion for the previous question cannot be invoked. What the chairman of this committee has done, subject to an appeal to the majority, is trampled not just on the rights of members of this House in the minority but also denies to those Canadians who want to voice their anger and outrage at the GST a means of having that done through opposition members of the House.

I appeal to the Chair to recognize the profoundly dangerous nature of what has occurred in this committee. I appeal to the Chair to recognize that indeed a prima facie case has been established. There may have been a very dangerous precedent which resulted in the resignation of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, but the time has come in this House for the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to look with care and in depth at the implications of this trampling of democracy.

I would certainly be prepared, should Your Honour find there to be a prima facie case, to move the necessary motion for referral to that very important committee.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear briefly the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. I want to apologize to the hon. member because I got him out of chronology. It was an error on my part. It was not intentional. I will hear the hon. member briefly.

I want to advise hon. members that I have the point. I will listen to the other side in a moment so I do want it to be brief.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I speak as a member of the finance committee and as someone who feels as a member of Parliament and a member of that finance committee that my privileges have been deeply threatened by what has taken place within the finance committee over the past two or three days.

• (1620)

I wish to deal with several additional points beside those which have been brought to your attention. I think the case has been made clearly by some of my colleagues as to how the privileges which they enjoy as members of Parliament, and in the case of my colleague from Yorkton—Melville as a member of the finance committee, have been affected by this set of decisions and actions within the committee itself. I want to deal with several other related but not directly similar points within the committee.

First, there has been brief reference made to this point by my colleague from Nickel Belt. He indicated that certain threats were in fact put before the committee by a member of the committee during yesterday's debate. Since these threats were put while I was making certain of my comments, I can certainly attest to the Speaker that I took them as threats directed toward myself.

Mr. Speaker: With a succinct and well argued case, the hon. member is now saying that apart from anything else that happened in the committee he felt that he was threatened. If he were threatened by a single comment of some irritated member, I am not too sympathetic. If, on the other hand, members were seriously considering calling in the police, that is another matter at all. I ask the hon. member to remember that I have asked him to be brief and to stick to points that help me to decide the essential point in front of me. If we are going to get off on to another point, I may have to put that point aside completely and hear it in another argument.

Mr. Langdon: I am very much in the Speaker's hands whether this is a point which should be raised in the context of this discussion of what happened in the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that I would not in any way limit his right to bring a matter to the Chair, but I have heard a number of members already this afternoon and that has not been the point that has been put before me.

First I would say to the hon. member that if he wants to raise it at another time, I will accept that I have notice of it. Unless there is a very strong indication of the part of all hon. members that this now becomes one of the major points I have to consider, I think it should be dealt with separately.

I am sure the hon. member might want to discuss the matter with other members, but I have a serious enough matter to deal with without going off on what somebody might or might not have meant because they made an irritable comment. I am in the hon. member's hands. If he wants to bring this matter back in a separate application, of course I will hear him. I would prefer that it not get mixed up with this one.

Mr. Langdon: I thank the Speaker for that sense of direction. That was certainly my sense as well. Because there was a reference to it earlier and because I was the person who was the subject of the particular issue, I felt that if the Speaker wished to hear detail on it I was prepared to provide it. I in fact would prefer to raise it separately.

However, with respect to the point which is more directly of concern in front of us this afternoon, I want to refer particularly to the nature of the declaration which was put in front of the committee by the Chair of that committee. I will quote from it. This was an order from the chairman of the committee with reference as to how we were to deal with the goods and services tax. Within that order is the following:

> —in putting any amendment to a clause on every clause for which such amendments are proposed, the mover will have two minutes to explain his amendment, and (b) there will be one minute allowed to each of the other parties represented in the committee to reply or debate the amendment, and (c) the Finance Department representative will have one minute to respond. This will permit five minutes of debate on each amendment.

Perhaps I could explain, Mr. Speaker, why this seems to me to be an important point of privilege in the context of—

Mr. Speaker: If the member would let me intervene, first I know about that and, second, I will be looking at all the material. But in fairness to other members who wish to address the Chair, I must start to insist that the points be very brief. I have listened very carefully and gone on much longer than usual in an application from a committee.

I do not think the hon. member is assisting me very much in reading out the order. The order may or may not be a good order or a bad order. What I am looking at here very precisely, because I have been asked to do it by those who have led the argument, is a process and if that process amounts to a breach of privilege. That is the question I have to decide.

Unless the hon. member can give me very much more, I would ask that he defer and allow me perhaps to hear one or more members very briefly. I think I am bound to turn now to the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, if I could at least have the chance to connect my point to the issue of privilege, I quote from citation 16 of Beauchesne's of which I am sure the Speaker is aware:

> The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members;

My point with respect to the form of this particular order is that it prevents people, including myself as a member of Parliament, from operating on that committee as a member. Instead, I am required to accept an order which forces each party to have just one minute's chance to speak or react to a particular amendment. It seems to me that that is a gross violation of my privileges as an individual member of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for co-operating and being brief. The hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill may have something to add. I will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, I—

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry. I have overlooked an hon. member and I will come to that. The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, and again I do ask him to be very brief.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to rise on this point of privilege dealing with the inexcusable actions of the chairman of the House finance committee as a result of last evening's events. We have already heard very eloquent arguments in the House regarding the fact that a motion before the House or committee can in fact not be withdrawn without unanimous consent.

As well, the Standing Orders essentially do not provide for the kind of arbitrary and indiscriminate unilateral actions that the chairman of the committee had presented last evening.

• (1630)

I would like to present argument and construct argument as to why the actions of the chair of the finance committee in fact frustrated my abilities as the member of Parliament for Okanagan—Shuswap to adequately represent the views of my constituents.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member if it is going to add anything to what has already been put. The hon. member has some knowledge of procedure and knows that there comes a point when sitting in a judicial capacity there is no need to repeat matters. I know the hon. member would want me to ask him to make the usual remarks about putting the usual motion, to be in order, but I think that at this point the hon. member could say he associates himself with the very able arguments that have been given, and not take up further time.

There is a question of fair play in these matters and I must turn to some other members.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I fully understand the need for brevity. I did want to present some evidence that is pertinent to the case, demonstrating the fact that my ability to represent my particular constituents in this matter was in fact short circuited, if you like.

I want to present to you evidence of a letter that I had written the Chair of the finance committee sometime back in February, requesting that as a result of submissions that were made to me as representative of the constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap, I appear as a witness before the finance committee on behalf of a number of organizations that had submitted to me written briefs outlining their concerns about the goods and services tax. I therefore wrote the chairman of the finance committee to appeal his consideration that I appear before the committee to provide such evidence.

In that regard I had a letter of return from the Chair of the finance committee thanking me for my letter and essentially going on record as saying that if I as the member of Parliament for Okanagan—Shuswap would provide the committee with a written summary of concerns, he as Chair of the committee would do what he could to ensure that the submittees of the concerns that were submitted to me would hopefully be allowed an opportunity to appear as witnesses.

I in fact carried out those requirements by providing the committee with a summary of those submissions. Although I have essentially honoured the request of the chairman of the finance committee, his actions as of last night essentially denied the final opportunity to allow presenters from my constituency to appear as witnesses.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the hon. member that this aspect of his complaint has been dealt with many times in this House and I have to say that that is not something on which the Chair can intervene.

There may have been other constituents that, as a consequence of this order or as a consequence of some order in the distant future, it is decided by the committee that they do not appear. But that is not a matter in which the Chair can intervene.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I would ask him to wrap up his remarks very quickly. I know he will co-operate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have not even started yet, but I am going to wrap them up quickly. You can be sure of that.

I do hope we do not create a precedent here that just because one gets a letter in to the Speaker one can speak on the question of privilege before the House, which was the original question put by the member for Burin—St. George's. Just because one sends a letter to the Speaker does not mean that he gets into the debate on that question ahead of other people who may have a valid point of privilege or discussion point to make in support of his point. I hope there is no precedent because if there are, Mr. Speaker, I think we should come back and have a debate on how we are going to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I must make a comment. Until I have heard the member who applies on privilege, I cannot decide that. However, I am much heartened by the hon. member's comment that it ought not be a precedent.

Mr. Gauthier: I come back, Mr. Speaker, to the original question we started debating about an hour and some minutes ago put by the member for Burin—St. George's, at which time he made three very good arguments. I thought the wisdom of his arguments very convincing. He made the point that no authority was given to the chairperson to deem the motion before the committee withdrawn.

Second, he said that there was no authority in the chairman's role to disallow points of order at that time. Third, he said that the chairperson had no authority to disallow debate on those points.

Now I will address three points. The first point is the chairperson's role. In my view he exceeded his authority, therefore impeding the privilege of the members.

The second point is procedure in committee where in my view, and in the view of many of us, the committee rules were not followed since they are mutatis mutandis applied by House of Commons rules in committee except for what are the exceptions in our Standing Orders and as Beauchesne's suggests in citation 569 regarding rules of the House.

Finally, I want to argue about the use of closure and time allocation. If the rules of the House apply in committee, surely only a minister or his representative, the parliamentary secretary, could use that procedure to close off debate. A minister standing in his place in the House must be the only person in the House who can move such a motion. If that applies in committee then we have to make sure that we understand the procedure.

I will speak first to the point that in our view the chairperson exceeded his authority last night. The rules of the House apply, as I said. In general we all agree that the chairperson, be it the Speaker or the chairperson of a committee, is mute. That is, he or she does not participate in debate, and if he or she cannot speak in debate in the House or in committee I ask how a member chairing a committee could introduce a time allocation motion, or a closure motion, or any motion for that matter.

As a matter of fact until I read the transcript of last night I was somewhat taken aback by that procedure. I read the comments made in committee following a comment by the member for Sudbury. She said: "I am under the impression that the reason you bring in closure is because you want to stifle debate." The chairman of the committee said: "No, it is time allocation."

So the chairperson himself validates my point by saying he is bringing in a time allocation motion. I suspect that in doing so he was trying to act for other interests, not the interests of the committee. He was trying to stifle debate by introducing something which in our view he had no business and no authority to introduce.

If one compares the motion put earlier that day by a member of the committee, it possibly indicated to the committee that there was a disposition of the government to put in a time allocation motion. The motion put by the member for Ontario was indeed copied quite closely by the chairman at that time and put to the committee, with a small exception that no witnesses be heard.

Mr. Speaker, I put it to you sincerely that chairpersons have no authority to put a time allocation or closure motion. Having said that I will pass on to my second point.

It is our point of view that the time allocation motion put by the chairperson, the member for Mississauga South, was out of order. Not only did he not entertain points of order, and rule them out of order, but he also in our opinion had no authority to put that motion.

The procedure utilized yesterday for the chairperson to entertain motions was argued intelligently and convincingly by previous members. I thought that the arguments put to you were convincing.

• (1640)

I refer you to Standing Order 117 and I will read it:

> The Chairman of a standing, special or legislative committee shall maintain order in the committee, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the House, on receiving a report thereof.

It is our opinion that the chairperson extended his authority last night, and went beyond what is normally the authority of the chair. If the principle is that any means justifies any end, then of course we are into difficult problems. And if anybody understands what happened in that committee, it is those who were there for the 30-odd-hours, debating points of order and trying to get reasonable arguments before the committee.

I will not prolong my points on the procedures before the committee, because without having to quote you, Mr. Speaker, which I know you would not appreciate, I think you made the point in 1984 that only the government can propose to a committee a time allocation or a closure motion. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to consider the arguments which have been made this afternoon, in a serious manner as usual, and report as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, having been a participant in the committee during the period in question and even longer, I would submit that in fact there is no question of privilege involved here.

There may be a point of order about procedure because, as has been mentioned by others earlier, there is no doubt that from time to time the procedure in that particular committee, and I would argue in all committees, does not exactly follow all of the established procedures. However, as has been stated before, the fact is that committees are masters of their own destiny and whether or not anything occurred in that committee to be of such a serious nature that someone's privilege has been violated.

An Hon. Member: He already ruled on that. He said he could.

Mr. Dorin: I realize that. This is the issue. I listened while you made your point.

What occurred last night in the finance committee, as has been noted by others, was based on a somewhat similar situation which occurred in the justice committee, which you, Mr. Speaker, have acknowledged you are familiar with, having been a member of the committee at that time.

The chairman of the finance committee may not be quite so eloquent as the chairman of the justice committee, Mr. Lachance, was at that time. The current finance committee chairman, the hon. member for Mississauga South, is not noted for eloquence, but he did in fact invoke a very similar procedure.

Mr. Milliken: And he had the honour to resign.

Mr. Dorin: I will deal with that shortly.

I would just like to point out that in events leading up to this particular measure, we had a number of occasions where procedures of the committee were held up for a variety of reasons. For example, the proceeding of the committee governing the holding and conduct of meetings, as adopted by the committee on April 19, 1989, simply states that the chairman be authorized to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence, when a quorum is not present. It is the chairman alone, which I acknowledge is somewhat different from many other committees of this House.

That procedure was followed in fact prior to the bill being referred to the committee when on Wednesday, January 31, finance committee MPs agreed in an in camera meeting that should the bill be referred, the chairman would be authorized to call meetings for February 12 and February 13.

When that bill was referred to the committee on Wednesday, February 7, those meetings were called. Following that, the first public meeting was called on Wednesday, February 19, at which time two members, who are not usual members of the committee, appeared and called into question the authority of the committee to conduct those meetings with the witnesses that had been organized for that day.

At that time the hon. member for Nickel Belt stated that the committee could not proceed at that time, and that the only way it could proceed was by a motion of the steering committee, laying out the procedures and the witnesses. All of these things are laid out and are passed by recorded motion. There is then a report to the full committee and the full committee determines the action. That is the proper procedure.

Following that, there was a considerable amount of debate and meetings, which I will not go through, and another filibuster which resulted in a procedural motion being adopted that provided for televised hearings of witnesses and also provided for two weeks of witnesses.

Mr. Langdon: Not true. Two weeks was not the motion.

Mr. Dorin: At the end of that time and during that final week—

Mr. Langdon: Be accurate.

Mr. Dorin: The committee members asked that any other witnesses to be heard be called and advised any members who had additional witnesses that they wanted heard to submit those names to the staff of the committee so it could be organized.

We were in the final time of completing hearing of the witnesses. We had circulated during the previous week a motion for procedure that suggested an additional 10 days to be given for consideration of the bill. We circulated the motion the previous week. We suggested we would like acknowledgement by noon on Monday this past week, or some form of response as to how we might proceed, having been told that we must have some motion officially on the floor. Because we had no response, that motion to provide for an additional 10 days was put forward by the member for Ontario. That involved 30 hours of debate, at which time the chairman invoked the procedure, as you well know.

The question at the time was whether members of the committee would be allowed to be involved and put amendments which they might have. As has been aptly noted, there is a provision whereby the government could invoke Standing Order 78(3), where that procedure is provided for. That procedure in effect takes authority away from the committee.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is legal.

Mr. Dorin: Therefore, I would argue that what is involved here is that the committee was endeavouring to retain control over its own procedure and in doing so, while there may be questions of order or procedure, there has not been any—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I would ask hon. members to my left to remember that a great deal of patience has been exercised in allowing those arguments to be put. I will hear the hon. member. I do not think he needs to go on too much longer, but I will hear him.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I have completed my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands usually makes a very good contribution, but I think I have heard enough. I will take this matter away. I will consider it very carefully and report back to the House as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Kamloops has a question of privilege. He may have had a communication from his right hon. friend who has had to leave. Under the circumstances, especially given the comments of the hon. member for Kamloops, the right hon. gentleman should be present, and I would be prepared to move this over to another time when he can be here. He did stay until just a few minutes ago. I would ask the hon. member if he would co-operate in that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, under normal circumstances, I would be more than pleased to but I have commitments in the next couple of days that will make it difficult. I think it is appropriate that this is raised at the earliest opportunity.

Before I raise the point, there is another point of privilege that ought to take precedence over mine.

Mr. Speaker: Once an application is made and it is in order, I think the Speaker has some discretion, especially when I have some indication of what it is about, as to when I will hear it. I would prefer that the right hon. gentleman was here in the Chamber. This is a practice that I have established for both sides of the House. Perhaps, the hon. member for Kamloops could consider his position.

• (1650)

There is another point of privilege and I am looking to the floor. The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

BILL C-56

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker, in hearing all the points of privilege today. I know that this is a long and trying day for you. We all have had long and trying days this past week. I rise on this point of privilege arising from debate—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member and others will be able to shorten this long and trying day. Will the hon. member please continue.

Ms. Hunter: This point of privilege arises from the debate in the House yesterday on Bill C-56, the amendment to the Small Business Loans Act. I bring this important question to your attention at this earliest opportunity as is required by the rules of the House.

My question of privilege concerns a ruling by the Acting Speaker which I believe infringed on my ability as a member of Parliament to do the job I was elected to do, that of representing my constituents. The bill being debated was of great concern to the small business community in my riding. The timing of the debate was crucial. As we have seen with the number of points of privilege that you had before you today, the mood in this place is of such a nature that cutting off debate was not the thing to do at the time.

I wanted to speak on this bill. However, I was denied that right as a result of an error by the Chair. At the conclusion of the remarks by the member for Saint-Léonard yesterday the Acting Speaker asked if the House was ready for the question without calling for further debate. I had risen a number of times previously and although Hansard did not indicate it, the Speaker indicated by her body language that she had known that I wished to speak. As you are so capable of doing, Mr. Speaker, one knows when people want to speak.

When I rose at the time to question the ruling of the Acting Speaker, she told the House that she had indeed asked for further debate. I was not convinced that was the case at the time and a review of the televised proceedings bears that out, as does Hansard.

I refer you to page 9557 of Hansard. At the conclusion of the remarks of the member for Saint-Léonard the Acting Speaker says:

> Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members say: "Question".

The Acting Speaker then says:

> The question is as follows: Mr. Hockin, seconded by Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), moved that Bill C-56, an act to amend the Small—

At that point I was on my feet and had been on my feet. I was dressed in a bright red jacket. I am not in any way, I think, unnoticeable in this House, as some of my colleagues may be, particularly the member for Mission—Coquitlam. I think I was quite visible. At that point I interjected and said: "On debate." The Acting Speaker then said:

> I did ask if there was anyone for debate and nobody rose.

At that point I was quite incensed, Mr. Speaker. I said:

> Point of order, Madam Speaker.

I leave you to read the transcript, Mr. Speaker. I believe that my ability as a member of Parliament has been infringed upon. I was elected to represent my constituents. The timing of this debate on the Small Businesses Loans Act was crucial for my constituents. It was concurrent with the filibuster that was occurring in the GST committee and the mood of this House indicated that more debate was needed on this matter. I am aware that you can correct many things, Mr. Speaker, but turning back the clock is not one of them.

I am asking on this point of privilege for some acknowledgement of the fact that my rights as a member have been infringed upon.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same point?

Mr. Whittaker: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Very brief.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I was present at that time. I just point out that at page 9557, in addition to what the hon. member has already told you, part way down the left hand column the Acting Speaker said: "There is a minute left on questions. The hon. member."

I believe there is something left out of the transcript just prior to that. In reviewing the video Your Honour will see that at that stage she did ask: "On debate?" Sitting in this corner, I did see the hon. member rise indicating at that stage that she was on debate. I think that that may assist Your Honour, if he goes back and looks, in reaching a decision.

Mr. Speaker: Ordinarily I would have to say that this does not seem, prima facie, a question of privilege. It is certainly a complaint, and the hon. member has referred to it as an error. There is of course now, under the rules, no appeal from a Speaker's ruling.

I must say to the hon. member that I regret very much that, if she wished to be heard in debate, something happened that made that impossible.

I will consider the matter. I do not think I can remedy the situation but I will, in view of the comments that have been made, consider the matter. I do not think there is any need for me to report back to the House. I know that all hon. members are concerned if someone wished to speak and, for whatever reason, an error or an oversight or something else, that did not happen.

I take the hon. member's complaint seriously, and I will consider it. I thank the hon. member for her brevity.

Could the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca indicate what his point is? Then I will turn to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, my point is separate and distinct from any other point that has been raised this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my previous discussion of what took place in the committee, I wanted to raise as a question of privilege—and I gave notice this morning with respect to this—the actions of the member for Longueuil with respect to certain calls for the police during the period that the finance committee was meeting.

If I could proceed briefly—

Mr. Speaker: As I say, I have reserved the hon. member's right to make this argument.

I wonder if the hon. member would co-operate with the Chair and let me read that transcript very carefully. There is also a tape which I can look at. As soon as I have a chance to do that, I might indicate to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor at an appropriate time, perhaps tomorrow, when that matter could be raised and argued. It may be necessary for some reply. I do not know.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to indicate that this seems quite a satisfactory procedure since it will give us time as well to find the "blues" for the committee for that particular period.

I did want to note, however, that this was not simply a gesture, an irritated shout. It was a series of comments.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly take it from the hon. member that he believes it is a serious matter. I will hear him at an appropriate time. I will contact the hon. member.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca wishes to rise, but on what?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege of which I gave you notification earlier. I think it is in your hands. It may have been confused with all the others on the earlier point.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that I have in front of me an application on a point of privilege and I take it that is what the hon. member is referring to.

DEMONSTRATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): My point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is related to a matter of privilege that I raised last Monday with regard to my conversation with a certain Mr. Kealey on the front steps. As you will know, because the matter has been brought to your attention, myself and the member for Carleton—Gloucester were in a conversation with Mr. Kealey and Mr. Kealey at that moment, while in the midst of a conversation, was taken away from our presence and escorted to jail.

He was escorted to jail in the company of Father Van Hee. Now both of these citizens are in prison which, of course, normally is a matter of the courts. But it has come to my attention that they are being housed in a 14-prisoner-capacity cell. The reason I link this to the point of privilege is that as a consequence of our actions we are morally bound with the experience of those two citizens.

It has come to my attention that there was almost an altercation in the cell this afternoon, that Father Van Hee, who is in the cell at the pleasure of some charge by the government related to my point of privilege, was under physical threat. Fortunately, no violence has taken place against Father Van Hee but when the threat to Father Van Hee was brought to the attention of the authorities in the institution, Father Van Hee was to told, and I quote, that the only option is "to play it cool or we can put him in solitary confinement for his own protection".

I am asking the Chair to consider in this case action from the Chair for habeas corpus to get these two people out of a situation that is not normal within their frame of experience, particularly the priest. Nothing has happened yet but I am concerned for the safety of the priest in the circumstances that exist and I want to bring it to the Chair's attention because of my earlier question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: While I appreciate the hon. member's point, it is not a question of privilege. The hon. member has used the occasion to inform the House of an event outside this House. It may well be that, having mentioned it, others may be able to intervene in some useful way. But I do not think we can pursue it any further at this time.

That concludes the questions of privilege.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-40—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to retable, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication.

This retabling corrects clerical errors in the version of the report tabled Tuesday, March 20, 1990. I want to assure the House that the bill as ordered reprinted by the committee is correct.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been here for some time and I have not heard of retabling a report. I am wondering if the member who just spoke wants the other report to be withdrawn and this one put on the record instead. If that is what he is doing, we agree with that.

Mr. White: Just to clarify, Mr. Speaker, when the report was originally tabled on Tuesday, March 20, I was informed afterwards that there were some mistakes in the translation of some of the amendments so I would wish the original report to be withdrawn and this to replace it.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present petitions in this House today. They have been certified correct as to form and content under Standing Order 36. They are signed by 281 residents of the city of Thunder Bay and surrounding areas.

The petitioners reject the government's proposed goods and services tax and call upon the government instead to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from all across Canada. In fact, there are a few names here from as far away as Australia and the United States. The petition is with regard to VIA Rail.

These petitioners ask Parliament to upgrade VIA with new equipment and make sure that the passenger train act is passed, which would allow VIA Rail to give the kind of service Canada needs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition to present which was signed mainly by residents of Sackville, a community in my riding. The petitioners want to voice their opposition to the new goods and services tax. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36. Whereas it has been proposed that a goods and service tax will be levied on skating lessons including instructors fees, facility rentals, equipment purchases and other related skating expenses, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider instruction in skating as an educational service and, therefore, exempt skating educational expenses from the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table five petitions today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which have been found correct as to form and content. These petitioners object strongly to the government's proposal to impose upon Canadians a tax of 7 per cent on all goods and services as of January 1, 1991.

These petitioners think this proposal of the government will be hidden from Canadians and, therefore, will impose a very unfair tax on all of them. The tax will be on all goods and services and will cause serious and unfair hardship for low and middle-income Canadians. The petitioners say that the GST of 7 per cent will create an onerous burden on small businesses and, therefore, strongly oppose the imposition of this goods and services tax which is, in their opinion, an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians which will hit them not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Gallup says that the Tories are at 17 per cent today, and they should not be doing this.

Mr. Speaker: Whatever the hon. member may have read, or whatever the polls may say, he knows that the presentation of a petition is not the place to make a speech.

Mr. Gauthier: Well at 17 per cent they should not be doing that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is smiling. He knows well— better than most of us.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from hundreds of citizens in the constituency of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in Montreal who strongly oppose the goods and services tax which they say is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and that it will hit them not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. They ask the government to withdraw this tax and to return to the drawing board.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of Canadian voters who are opposed to the GST. Your petitioners call upon the government to withdraw the GST bill it tabled in Parliament.

ADMINISTRATIVE FLIGHT SERVICES

Question No. 226—Mr. Milliken:

For each year from 1985 to 1989, did the government incur costs in operating its V.I.P. fleet of Challenger aircraft and, if so, in total, what were they?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): With respect to the Department of National Defence, the governement incurred the following incremental costs, from 1986 to 1989, (incremental aircraft operating costs, travel or temporary duty expenses of flight crew, and aircraft landing fees and related services) in operating administrative flight services:

—the Department of National Defence became the sole administrator of the Administrative Flight Services in 1986;

—for fiscal year 1986/87, the use of eight Challenger aircraft resulted in a total incremental flight cost of $10,361,000;

—for fiscal year 1987/88, the use of eight Challenger aircraft resulted in a total incremental flight cost of $12,508,000; and

—for fiscal year 1988/89, the use of eight Challenger aircraft resulted in a total incremental flight cost of $10,933,000.

Note: Administrative Flight Services (AFS) was established essentially as a national and international air transport service for the Royal Family, the Governor General and the Prime Minister. A secondary use is for Ministers ou Parliamentarians and their staffs for departmental or government purposes. Apart from such uses, the Department itself employs these aircraft for V.I.P. transport, medical evacuations and demonstrations.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLOTTED DAYS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, members of my party have been approaching the Whip's office with regard to the situation for tomorrow. I think there are rumours on all sides of the equation.

On the Order Paper members will find that there is one proposition for a possible opposition day that would carry a vote with it. It is my understanding that sometime yesterday that motion was provided to the Table. That would constitute one element of 48 hours' notice, perhaps, of the intention to have a vote on a Friday.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker—and I think you are going to have to rule hopefully fairly quickly today—and if you look at the intent of our Standing Orders, you will see that there are two elements required in order to have a confidence vote on a Friday. One, that the government give 48 hours' notice of the intention to have an opposition day on a particular day. Two, that the opposition gives notice of a specific motion which would be votable and their intention to have that vote.

Mr. Speaker: Was that not done by the opposition?

Mr. Hawkes: I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the House will have certitude about the motion to be debated tomorrow at approximately six o'clock tonight. It is possible throughout this day to have more than one motion brought forward by more than one party. We have faced those situations in the past, in which case that has to be sorted out and a decision has to be made.

Mr. Speaker: Did the opposition not move and indicate their intention to have a votable day on Friday as of last night before six o'clock, or am I in error?

Point of Order

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, one party in the chamber put forward a motion. The situation we were in yesterday was that one of the parties in the chamber put forward a motion, the essence of which was to say to the House that if there were to be an opposition day on Friday, they would like that motion to be votable, thus, in theory, constituting 48 hours' notice.

If the decision to hold a vote of confidence on a Friday, which is a very serious undertaking by this Chamber, can be determined in that kind of unilateral fashion we face the following situation: a party, or more than one party, could place on the Order Paper notice of a motion and the intention to hold a vote on a Friday and leave it there permanently, thus constituting 48 hours' or more notice for a month ahead of time, two months ahead of time or six months ahead of time.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it takes a second element, which would be 48 hours' notice of the government's intention to call that day. When the two things come together—48 hours' notice by the government, 48 hours' notice by the opposition—you can indeed face the situation of five members rising in their place and causing the Friday confidence vote to occur.

If it is a one-sided designation, entirely in the hands of the opposition, then every single Friday from now to eternity could potentially culminate in a vote of confidence at the end of the day, if we were to designate it as a supply day. It would perhaps take the choice of a Friday from the government's arsenal and its responsibility for ordering the business of the House.

It also leaves members under a different kind of threat. Members right now are having to decide whether to keep their commitments to very important public events that may take place later this day or tomorrow morning, from Vancouver Island to the Yukon to Newfoundland.

Resting in the hands of the opposition at this moment is the opportunity to come forward with a different motion. It has that opportunity right up until six o'clock today. No opposition day has yet been designated, but if we were to stand in the Chamber at this moment and designate tomorrow to be a supply day, the Official Opposition and the third party of the House have until six o'clock tonight to put forward a motion for debate tomorrow. There is one on the Order Paper that deals with the issue of a vote, but others that came forward today might not.

The wording of the current motion could be changed in some fashion and the intention to have a vote could be put forward, but if that comes forward between now and six o'clock tonight, that vote will occur on Monday. So throughout this day members are under the threat that the circumstances they are preparing for can change.

This particular change came out of the McGrath report and it was consistent with other changes. At least some of those changes were dedicated to the notion that to serve the people of the nation well, to operate in a democratic fashion in the best interests of our constituents, members needed a better sense of planning. That is why we came to a parliamentary calendar and a to variety of different rules.

We recognized, in the creation of the Standing Orders, the importance of confidence votes and the need for notice in relation to that so members could be present. But we came to a special set of rules regarding confidence votes on Fridays. We said that there should be 48 hours' or, in parliamentary terms, two days' notice because Friday is a day when members frequently have other obligations away from Ottawa. They would require two days' notice of two elements: that the confidence vote would be occurring on the Friday and that the government was designating it as a supply day.

Because of the confusion currently in members' minds, Mr. Speaker, I think we need you and your people to review the Standing Orders to take into account this argument and some arguments that others in the House may want to present, but to get back to the House as quickly as possible. The government very likely might designate tomorrow as a supply day—

Mr. Milliken: It has to. It has no choice.

Mr. Hawkes: —but the government and members need to know whether my interpretation of the Standing Order is correct, that there are two elements required to be met before a confidence vote can be forced to occur on a Friday. They are the designation 48 hours in advance that it will indeed be a supply day and the notice of the motion from the opposition also occurring with 48 hours' notice.

If we leave ourselves open to the notion that the opposition can put down a motion in perpetuity about Fridays that stops us from ever having Friday opposition days without votes, then I think we are running counter to the intent of those regulations and to the intent of the McGrath committee and its efforts to help us develop a better way of conducting the nation's business.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in a moment. I want to ask a question. Is not part of the problem that there is a time period into which two more supply days must occur between now and Monday? Am I incorrect in that?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that the parliamentary secretary to the government House Leader is prepared to rise at some point today—it could be immediately if you prefer—on another point of order related to the number of supply days that are left in this period. Some arguments can be made.

But we need certitude for the immmediate future and in the long term. Do our Standing Orders provide for the possibility that the opposition, either or both parties, can put a motion on notice requiring a Friday vote which sits there in perpetuity and can be activated on any particular Friday that the government chooses to name? If the government rises on a Thursday and designates Friday as an opposition day—which constitutes a rather regular pattern around here, that we give 24 hours' notice of the business for the next day—that faces a 48-hour notice period that is on that Order Paper in perpetuity. I think then that we have obviated the whole purpose of treating confidence votes as very important and something on which members should clearly have 48 hours' notice when they occur on a Friday.

So I am saying that if we designate tomorrow today, then the vote should occur on Monday because that would constitute the necessary notice to members.

Mr. Speaker: While we are discussing this we may as well go on to the next stage. Are we in a position where two more supply days must be allotted between now and Monday? If that is the case, the hon. member puts forth a very reasoned position. But if, on the other hand, we are caught in a situation in which two supply days must take place between now and Monday, whatever merit the hon. member's argument has does not seem to me to solve the problem. I am quite prepared to hear the whole argument now, and I think maybe we should.

I will come to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in a moment.

Mr. Gauthier: We have arguments to make too, Mr. Speaker. This is a dialogue.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) in a minute.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add perhaps the second element of the point of order raised by my colleague, the Whip for the government.

As the Speaker is aware, there was a special order passed in this House on April 4, 1989, and June 27, 1989, which provided for six allotted days to be votable in the September to December supply period. This order superseded the Standing Orders providing for a total of no more than four votable supply days in any one period. For example, September to December, January to March, or the other period of April to June.

If we go back through what has happened we will find there were votable opposition days, or allotted days, on October 2, 12, 19, 30, 31, and then again on December 5 and 6, again on February 1, and another one, the eighth, on March 15.

As a result, with the six allotted days in the September to December 1989 supply period, and assuming that a supply cycle runs from September to the end of June, then adding the two votable days in the period that we are now in of January to March, I would argue that the opposition has had the maximum allowable votable days, which is the eight. We think that that is the case. As a result of that we argue that Friday cannot therefore be a votable supply day.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in a moment and I am going to hear him completely and fully. What was the basis upon which the special order was made? What was the understanding? Am I supposed to believe that as a consequence of that understanding the opposition gave up two supply days? That is the proposition that is being put to me. Maybe they did, but I want to know.

Point of Order

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, some positions are extremely difficult to defend, but in this case, the government's position is untenable. Yesterday, the government had an opportunity to designate today as an opposition day. It did not, because it was obsessed with imposing closure on a bill. They forgot that before adjournment of the House, they could have designated Thursday, March 22, as an opposition day, and possibly next Monday, since according to the Standing Orders, March 26 shall be the last opposition day, and they knew perfectly well we had an opposition day scheduled for that date.

I may remind the government and those who are in charge that designating an opposition day is their responsibility. However, they must comply with certain provisions of the Standing Orders. Although there was a special agreement last year because of exceptional circumstances, I may remind the House that Standing Order 81(8) reads as follows:

> For the period ending not later than December 10, six sitting days shall be allotted to the business of supply.

• (1130)

Opposition days, in other words.

> Nine additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than March 26.

Mr. Speaker, we then have ten days left. The text goes on to say:

> Ten additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than June 30. These twenty-five days are to be designated as allotted days.

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of a standing order that says we must wait for the government to designate a day before it is allotted. If the government was negligent and failed to comply with the Standing Orders of the House, all I can say is that it's a lost cause. We in the Opposition knew you had to give us two opposition days by March 26. We knew yesterday was March 21. We also knew it was the New Democratic Party's turn, because we take turns taking opposition days. The two last days were coming up. Monday will be ours, because we operate two to one, on the basis of the number of members in each party. There are twice as many Liberals as New Democrats, so we have two days more than they do.

Some hon. members: Really!

Mr. Gauthier: Those are the facts. What can I say? It may be sad for some people but facts are facts..

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of a single standing order that could be used by the government whip, although I admit he put up a good defence, but just the same, it was not entirely convincing. I admit he defended his case, but not convincingly. We still have six votes. We had eight, but we only used two, so there are six left, and it is up to us to determine whether those days are votable or non-votable. I know today's Order Paper contains a motion in the name of Mr. Hovdebo, filed in the appropriate manner, which says:

> Opposition motion for the Supply period ending March 26, 1990.

—which will be next, and pursuant to Standing Orders 81(14) and 81(12), it will be votable and is not deferrable. The vote cannot be deferred. The vote must take place tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. There is nothing I or the government can do about it. The situation is quite straightforward, Mr. Speaker, and the Standing Orders are clear. I think the government will have to acknowledge they were sleeping on the job yesterday and failed to do what they notably should have done, which was to designate today as an opposition day. This morning, we thought about it, and we were saying: Maybe, considering the proviso under Projected Order of Business which reads "subject to change without notice", the government will change today's order to call Bill C-65 and decide to make this an opposition day. However, after some more thinkings we concluded it could not do that because otherwise it would have had to give notice yesterday. So I say to the government: It's just tough!, Too bad, but that's the way it is. They should have realized there is more to this game than closure and time allocation. Strategy is also part of it, but the government has been lacking in strategy, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: I rise on a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker.

I always appreciate the spirit with which my friend enters into debate. However, he seems to have forgotten that when we approached the table last evening for knowledge of whether or not notice had been given about the intention of a vote on Friday, we were informed that the motion which would appear on the Order Paper this morning was embargoed. We had no information about it.

He may have had 48 hours' notice. The hon. member for Saskatoon–Humboldt of the New Democratic Party may have notified his members; but the government was not notified. There was not 48 hours' notice available to the government about the intention to have this vote.

Therefore, I suggest on that ground, in addition, there seemed to be the element that he knew something that we did not know. We were at the table requesting information. The person who put the motion on the table obviously asked for it to be embargoed. That is a choice which he made, but he chose deliberately to withhold the notice from all the members of the Chamber. I think that may add a somewhat different element to this matter. In fact, it may help you, Sir, to rule on this particular situation.

I think we have the general case, which I raised earlier, of whether or not a member of the opposition can simply put a permanent motion on the Order Paper which constitutes 48 hours' notice, forever and ever. I suggest that breaks the whole intent with respect to arranging the parliamentary calendar.

If you want to deal with the specific choice to embargo the information from the government, Mr. Speaker, then that clearly tells the House that members on this side of the House did not have the required 48 hours' notice in this particular case.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since the question was put to me, I would like to reply.

Indeed, I think the question is important, and I did address the question in the debate in this House on the Message from the Senate concerning Bill C–21. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that I did, at that time, raise the issue. There are not very many motions of which opposition members are not given prior notice. However, there is one instance when that occurs. It is when a message comes from the Senate and a motion to address that message, either in the negative or in the affirmative, is made by the government. We, the opposition, are not told of that position or that motion until the minister has finished speaking on the message. That is totally unacceptable.

There is nothing unacceptable about a motion being put to the House and notice be given on the Order Paper. There is nothing in the books, as far as I know, that forces the opposition to give notice to the government before the Order Paper is printed.

As a matter of fact, we could do what the government does with us on the question of Messages from the Senate. We could say to the government: "Wait until the Order Paper is printed before you find out what happens".

I will tell the government more than that. We have thought of putting 15 motions on the Order Paper, so the government can keep 15 ministers in place the night before and then find out the next day which motion we are going to call. We could do that. But we are not doing it because we are trying to get co–operation from the government.

I am asking the government whip to plead with his House leader to change some of the dispositions in the Order Paper which make it impossible sometimes for us to get advance notice of motions and the government's intention to move on certain things. I think that is very important.

I do not think he has a case today. The government was given notice yesterday at a quarter to six—

Mr. Hawkes: No, we were not.

Mr. Angus: A quarter to seven.

Mr. Gauthier: A quarter to seven, I am sorry.

If you got it this morning, it is still in order; it is not a point of order. I am told you got it at 6.45. I will let the NDP talk to that point.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could hear the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, and then I will come back to the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, in the last while, the government has been in the habit of making untenable arguments. I think this is just one more example—

Mr. Speaker: I am not interested in debate. We have a difficult procedural matter which I want addressed, and I want it addressed very exactly and succinctly. I know the hon. member will help the Chair.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, all the appropriate notices have been given. Indeed, as has been mentioned, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, yesterday was informed at 6.45 that this motion would be votable. So I do not quite understand the point that is being made.

Mr. Hawkes: That is not true. We went to the table. It was embargoed. They wouldn't tell us.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): In any case, the government really is the author of its own problem.

It designated Wednesday as an opposition day, and then on Tuesday undesignated it. We knew there would be two days before March 26, as we have heard and, by deduction, that Friday would be an opposition day. It was agreed that it would be a New Democrat opposition day.

• (1140)

If we had not had the revocation of its commitment to have Wednesday as our supply day, then this problem would not have arisen. Neither would it have arisen if the government had designated today as an opposition day.

It is really a problem within the government House leader's office, rather than anywhere else.

On the point about the arrangement made last April, this was clearly a special arrangement. Mr. Speaker, you alluded to this. There was a clear understanding that once the House began again in January, we would start with a fresh slate and there would be eight votable opposition days in the 1990 year. I think if you reviewed the special order, Mr. Speaker, you would find that that in fact was the case.

As with all these matters, they are open to the normal method for negotiation and discussion. That would have been an appropriate way of addressing it.

I think the matter is quite clear. Tomorrow is a New Democrat opposition day. It is a votable day. I think we are faced with that quite clearly.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, you had asked what was the intention of the House orders that were passed. You asked if there was a willingness on the part of the opposition to give up two allotted days.

In fact what happened with those particular special orders was that the opposition was given two additional allotted votes during that time cycle. To refresh the memories of hon. members, the reason it was done was to accommodate the fact that the House came back later because of the debates that had gone on before. This was an assistance to the opposition.

I think it is very important, too, to take a look at Standing Order 81(14) which provides for four votable allotted days in any one time period.

It goes on to state: "—provided that not more than eight opposition motions in total shall be motions that shall come to a vote during the three supply periods provided—".

We believe that the supply period runs from September to June. It commenced in September. There have been six allotted days which came to a vote prior to the December timeframe, plus two more that we have had since that time, in February and in March. As a result we have come to the maximum of eight which is allowed under Standing Order 81(14).

I think it is very clear that that in fact was the intention.

The Speaker also asked me the question as to whether or not in the special order this was addressed. In fact, it was not. The issue was silent. As I understand it from our side, there was certainly no intention to put us in a position of having to face additional votes in this second timeframe. There has always been that provision for a maximum of eight. It was an intention on our part to accommodate some of the earlier days back in September to make sure that the opposition did have those allotted days.

We believe that our arguments do stand and that in fact the eight days that are allowed by the rules to come to a vote have already happened. We believe on that basis that Friday definitely could not be an allotted day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to my friend from the New Democratic Party, who may or may not be aware of this. I want it made absolutely clear that as the government whip and as a House officer I have certain responsibilities in this Chamber related to votes. As such, I approached the table last evening somewhere between 6.20 and 6.30 to make an inquiry as to whether a votable opposition motion had been presented to the table because I was aware of the notice provisions.

I was informed by the table that, yes, there was a motion but that information about it was embargoed by the people who had given it to the table. I was told that I would have to see it in the Order Paper this morning.

That decision in this specific instance makes it impossible for us without unanimous consent to have a vote tomorrow. It is a confidence motion. It requires 48 hours' notice. As the person responsible as a House officer, I was not allowed to have the 48 hours' notice that obviously the New Democratic Party seemed to have, and which I suggest perhaps the Official Opposition had.

I requested it from the table. I was told that the party that had presented the motion had embargoed that information and it could not be given to me. Therefore, there was a clear intent in this specific instance—and it does not deal with the general case—that, clearly, as the government whip, I did not have 48 hours' notice and therefore 48 hours of opportunity to inform my members of the possibility of a vote.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to come to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands in a moment. I want to hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan first.

In trying to find a way through this matter, whatever the rules may or may not require I am puzzled at why there would be this embargo under these circumstances. What was the purpose of that?

Mr. Gauthier: Political, to embarrass the government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can assist you in your deliberations on this matter. Part of the problem is that our House leader is not here today. We are having to rely on signals to the back to get some information to which we ourselves were not privy.

I have a couple of points of clarification, if I may, Mr. Speaker. The assistant to the House leader of the New Democratic Party advised the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader at approximately 6.45 last night of the fact that the motion was to be votable. In attendance at that discussion was the government House leader's assistant, Mr. MacKenzie. We clearly did what we felt was appropriate in terms of advising the government of our intention.

It would seem that the government is suggesting that there should be two sets of rules. One is for the government in terms of the amount of notice the opposition will get as to what day shall be a supply day and whether or not it is votable. The second is that we should have a longer period to advise the government that it is going to be votable. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to review that particular aspect.

I am also advised that we did indicate to the table that it be embargoed. I do not want anyone to think that the table took it upon itself to put in place the embargo. However, we did provide the government with the text of the motion on Tuesday of this week. I am advised that the government had full knowledge of the content of the motion. It knew, irrespective of the point of order raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, of the number of allotted days and whether or not there were two votable days between now and Monday and that there was a good chance we would use our right to have a votable motion.

The other point I would like to make is with regard to the special order last fall. I took part in the negotiations, having filled in for the House leader at that time. I would ask that you, Sir, check the actual wording to see whether the motion was worded in such a way that it was notwithstanding any special or standing order. I believe there was a caveat stating that this was a one-time situation and that we covered ourselves in that regard. However, I do not have a copy of it in front of me.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the help I am receiving from the hon. member. Does anyone have a copy of that special order? Could it be brought to the table?

I am fully cognizant, as your servant, that this is a procedural matter and I must deal with it as such. I want to be absolutely sure in my own mind about this. Did or did not the government know last night? There seems to be a conflict of facts here. I want it to be straightened out.

Point of Order

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, may I contribute to that? I have laid out information for the House that I went to the table between 6.20 and 6.30. I asked and was told that it was embargoed. I, as the whip, did that. I think there were witnesses to that, and the table can confirm that for you very easily.

What the whip of the New Democratic Party has said is that one of his staff people approached the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House Leader with information about the votability of the motion at 6.45. This was some 25 minutes after I went to the table, but some 45 minutes after the normal close of business at which point it would have been possible for the government to do the allotting.

We were informed through other channels that the clock had run out at six o'clock because the notice period had run out at six o'clock. Certainly, I think it is clear, and all that you need to be seized with at this point, is that at 6.20 to 6.30, some 20 to 30 minutes after the notice had to be filed, the embargo was certainly in place from the table's point of view and was communicated to me at that point.

I had an opportunity at the conclusion of the vote to provide information to my members before they started to disperse, but without having the notice, the chance to communicate was lost. The whole purpose of notice is for members to have certitude as much as possible about their world. It may have been inadvertent on the part of the New Democratic Party's caucus to put in place that embargo, but certainly the table felt at 6.20 that it could not give me as the Chief Government Whip that piece of information. I was told directly that I would have to wait to see what it said on the Order Paper this morning.

In a technical sense the government is quite frequently in the difficult position of getting a verbal communication when in fact there is a written communication which is official. You must always be careful. In the past, on opposition days, and it has been many, many months now, Mr. Speaker, we have in our possession by six o'clock or shortly thereafter a printed copy of the motion and a printed copy of the intention of whether it is votable or not. That is the normal expectation that I would have as the Chief Government Whip that at six o'clock the night before I have this information.

Last night the table would not give it to me. I just want to make that clear. The fact that at 6.45 there was a conversation between a staff person of the New Democratic Party and our parliamentary secretary may be helpful, but it is not official.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan further, and I will come to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands in a moment.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the government whip's comments. One of the questions that Your Honour will have to decide upon is whether an opposition party has the right to have the table embargo such information. We thought we were doing what was appropriate in terms of advising the government verbally. There is nothing in the rules that I know of that requires us to provide it with a written indication that a motion will be votable.

Mr. Speaker: One moment, please. I want to make it very clear I am not even raising that issue. It was a conflict in what I have been hearing and I wanted it straightened out. Sometimes the Chair has to make procedural rulings based on what the circumstances really are and some common sense. But I am not for one minute putting up for grabs the issue as to whether or not the table is required to release information under the procedure that was followed last night.

As I understand it, the procedure is exactly the same for both sides of the House. I will listen to the hon. member further.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate those comments. I only have a couple more points to make.

Just as an observation, there is a chronic problem with notice. We might want to at some point refer that for consideration. For example, the government can give notice of a motion on Friday and move it on Monday morning. The earliest that we could technically see the text is on Saturday when the Order Paper is produced. There are some problems there and this may just be another element of that.

I should point out that from our point of view this is only a notice of motion. The government has not as of yet allocated Friday as an opposition day. I think that it has no choice given the other Standing Orders. However, this motion or the votability issue could in fact be withdrawn. If the government had wished to concern itself with that aspect, as opposed to raising the point here, we would have been more than happy to discuss it.

As a final comment, Mr. Speaker, I hope that you uphold our right to decide when we should have a votable motion. It is up to the government to allocate the days. It waited until the last minute, assuming that it is going to do it later, after you rule, for tomorrow. It is important for the opposition to have the right to say that it is going to be votable when it so deems it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there are two principal issues that I think Your Honour needs to deal with here. One is the argument advanced by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader concerning the number of supply days remaining in the period and, in particular, the number of votable days remaining in the period.

I know he has referred to the special order adopted in this House on April 4 last year which was subsequently modified, but I do not think in a matter that is relevant for our purposes.

What that motion did quite explicitly was change the number of votable days in one of the periods.

If Your Honour recalls the reasons why this motion was passed, you will recall that the House did not sit last January, February or March until April 3. Thus the entire supply proceedings got out of whack.

The government, in an effort to salvage something from the confusion which existed at that time, got the House to agree to a motion, which we agreed to on April 4, just after Parliament reconvened. I believe it started on April 3, which was the second day of the new session. We agreed to changes in the number of supply days. There were 12 days allotted before Friday, June 16, six of which were to be votable, and then a further 13 for the period ending December 10, six of which were to be votable. Therefore it was a change in the number of votables and that was a sop to the opposition because we were losing days in the normal supply period in that the government had failed to come into this House and present its Estimates in a timely way and allow the usual debate on supply to proceed in January, February and March. That was the reason for this change. It did not say anything about changes beyond those periods specified in this order.

• (1200)

On December 20 of last year, the House adopted another special order regarding supply. It was on the adjournment of the House for Christmas. Again, Your Honour will recall that part of the reason for this was that the Christmas holiday was extended by an additional week at the government's request and the opposition apparently, from the terms of this, gave up one of its supply days in the period.

In other words, the number was reduced from nine to eight. I can only assume it was because a week was taken off the normal sitting time. The order adopted on December 20 said in part: "That the number of allotted days in the period ending not later than March 26, 1990 be reduced from nine to eight". The seventh and eighth days are still to take place. One can only go to the normal rules of the House relating to the number of votable days in a supply period to determine the number of votable days, and not go back and start counting up all the special days that were created by virtue of the order made last April.

The parliamentary secretary is going back and counting up those extra votes in that period and saying those do not apply. The Standing Orders are quite clear. The parliamentary secretary is shaking his head.

Mr. Gauthier: He has a headache.

Mr. Milliken: He may well have a headache. I can understand that. I expect that is why the government House leader is unable to be here. He probably has a splitting headache.

There are to be up to four votable days in the period, and the parliamentary secretary knows that. They have not taken place and another votable day is available. Accordingly, in my submission it is quite clear that there is a votable day available. It can be designated as votable. We can only proceed from there.

Let us go back to the other argument about the 48 hours' notice. Perhaps the government whip has forgotten that the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader raised this issue on Monday, October 30. Your Honour had made a ruling on Thursday, December 7, concerning this very issue. I would like to quote from Your Honour's ruling, because I would have thought this would have made it perfectly clear to the hon. gentleman on the other side exactly what the rules are. As reported at page 6583 of Hansard, Your Honour stated:

> The first question asked by the parliamentary secretary was whether it was necessary for the government to designate a supply day before the opposition can give notice of a motion they want debated.

Exactly on point. In fact, I thought I heard the chief Whip on the government side raising this point.

You went on, sir:

> The parliamentary secretary maintained that it was a necessary precondition. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands suggested that in this specific case it was not necessary and that, in any case, it had been done in anticipation of Friday being a votable supply day.

What could be more on point. Your Honour further stated:

> According to our rules and practice, the purpose of notice is to give warning to the House of an item of business that might be raised for debate. The notice does not necessarily mean that the item will actually be debated or that it will be debated any time soon.
> The Order Paper contains numerous items for which notice has been given but which have not yet been debated. The parliamentary secretary suggested that proceedings on supply days are different.
> While I agree that certain aspects of supply have a character distinct from other proceedings, it seems to me that unless the rules on supply are explicit, the usual practices should be followed. This is the case with notice.

Your Honour further stated, and these words are most instructive:

> It is competent for any opposition member to file a motion that might be debated on a supply day. Normally what happens is that members file supply day motions at the latest possible moment after a day has been designated by the government, but this does not preclude the right to give notice of the supply motion well in advance of a supply day. Indeed this has happened.

Your Honour cited a precedent in 1982 where a notice similar to this sat on the Order Paper for six weeks, through three other supply days, before it was finally called on a special date, on the last day of the period in March. If Your Honour will look at the date in 1982, I am sure the parliamentary secretary will be able to get the government House leader to recall that perhaps it was one of their motions that sat on the Order Paper all this time. To hear the government Whip arguing now that somehow this motion is defective because it was given in advance is not accurate.

I suggest that the rest of Your Honour's ruling on December 7 was the epitome of light and reason. It applies to the situation with which we are faced now. I know the parliamentary secretary was here and he heard the ruling. It was an excellent ruling and I commend it to him for his earnest study before he tries another one of these stunts.

The other question is the 48 hours' notice rule. If I heard the Whip correctly, and I must say his arguments here were not precise, the suggestion seems to be that because he was not told before three o'clock yesterday afternoon he did not get 48 hours' notice. He has been around Parliament long enough to know—

Mr. Hawkes: They would not tell me at 6.20 p.m.

Mr. Milliken: They would not tell him until a quarter to seven. Whether it happened at five o'clock or whether it happened at a quarter to seven or whether it happened at three o'clock in my submission is irrelevant. The standard practice in this place is that 48 hours in the rules has been construed to mean the notice must be handed in at the Table before five o'clock, two days before the day it is to come up. If Friday is to be the day, it must be handed in on Wednesday by five o'clock. If it is received at the Table by that time, as I understand it, that constitutes 48 hours' notice in this place.

Government bills are frequently handed in at the Table. We do not see them and we do not know anything about the notice concerning those bills or government motions until they are printed in the Projected Order of Business the next day and on the Notice Paper, and then they are debated the following day. That is our notice. In some ways it constitutes about 24 hours' notice, but that is the way the rules have been construed for years and years.

The government Whip is trying to suggest that if one of the parties on this side gives a notice, until the government gives its notice of designation that somehow the notice period does not start to run. I say that is just nonsense. It is nonsense because in looking at the Standing Order itself it clearly contemplates the possibility of 48 hours' notice being given, particularly for a Friday vote. I refer Your Honour to Standing Order 81(12) which states:

> (12)(a) Forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of motions to concur in interim supply, main estimates, supplementary or final estimates, to restore or reinstate any item of the estimates. Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates, provided that for the supply period ending not later than June 30, forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates;

(b) if an opposition motion pursuant to section (14) of this Standing Order is to be proposed on a Friday, forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given that the recorded division on the motion, if demanded, is not to be deferred;

I understand that that is the situation. The government says that the 48-hour period does not start to run somehow until it designates Friday. Based on Your Honour's ruling of December 7, that is not a reasonable interpretation of this Standing Order. It is completely twisting the words of the Standing Order.

The purpose of the Standing Order was to ensure that the government had 48 hours' notice that there was going to be a vote on a Friday, and I submit that the government got that notice in accordance with our practice. Having got the notice, now it is trying to squirm out of it by saying that its members are not around on Friday. They are off doing other duties. They are leaving early for the weekend. It is in a difficult situation and is trying to get out of it by a strained interpretation of these Standing Orders, which is at variance with Your Honour's ruling on December 7, at variance with the rules themselves, and at variance with the practice of the House established since these rules came into effect I believe in 1968.

Mr. Speaker: Of course I will hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, but I want to indicate to hon. members that I understand the situation. Very shortly, I am going to reserve and consider the matter. I will report back to the House as quickly as possible, which means almost immediately, but I will hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. There are two points I wish to add.

It dawned on me while listening to the arguments of my colleague in the Liberal Party that if the New Democratic Party were forced to wait until the government gave formal notice of tomorrow being an opposition day, we would clearly not have the opportunity to give 48 hours' notice of the fact it would be votable. Therefore we would lost our right to have a votable motion.

My second point is that according to the reform of this House it is up to the government to decide if the vote is a matter of confidence. Having looked at the wording of the motion, which in no way condemns the government of the day but seeks to move forward, they could choose either to vote for it or to say that if it passes it is not a matter of confidence. That is clearly within their purview. I would ask that Your Honour take that into consideration in your deliberations, and all members of the House look forward to hearing your response.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, nothing in my arguments—and I am sorry if they were misconstrued—would relate to the opposition losing its power to designate a day as votable. That is clearly in there and if the designation today is for tomorrow the motion can indeed be votable.

The question at issue is the degree of notice required for members as to when the vote will occur. If you put in another motion later today and you want it votable, clearly the Standing Orders would say that vote occurs on Monday because of the normal relationship of Friday.

I am suggesting that the reason for the rule that 48 hours' notice of when that vote is to occur must be given is so that all members can at least have that much time to rearrange their plans. In this specific case, the government did not have that required 48 hours' notice. I suggest that this is a general case you may wish to reserve judgment on for somewhat longer. We have both an immediate problem and a long-range problem. There must be two elements on notice: that a Friday will be a supply day and that has to be there 48 hours in advance, and that a vote will take place and that has to be there 48 hours in advance. When both elements are present, then you will actually have a confidence vote on the Friday. When one of those elements is missing, I suggest in the general case that the vote is automatically deferred. That was the intent of the McGrath commission and the response of this House to that was the certitude about when votes would take place, when indeed they were supply day type votes. That is the reason for the special rule.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for the manner in which this debate was conducted.

There are a number of issues here as hon. members know. If I were allowed to act unilaterally, I might very well immediately change the rules, but I am afraid I do not have that luxury nor do hon. members. I must go away and decide this on the basis of the rules as they are and as the practice has been. I will report back to the House as soon as possible.

I may be able to report back by one o'clock, but I will certainly be able to report back immediately after Question Period. I thank hon. members.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as hon. members are aware—

[English]

The Financial Administration Act requires that statutory borrowing authority be obtained from Parliament in order for the government to increase its outstanding debt.

Specifically, Part IV, section 36 of the act requires that "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament". This refers to new money only rather than the refinancing of existing debt since section 46 of the act provides continuing authority to borrow funds to repay maturing debt.

While section 47 provides for temporary short-term borrowings, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament to permit the government to implement a regular debt program to meet its financial requirements.

This bill should be viewed in the context of the government's continuing efforts to deal with Canada's deficit and debt problem.

The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance on February 20 reaffirms the government's commitment to reduce the deficit. Through a wide-ranging expenditure control plan and with no increase in taxes, the budget keeps the deficit on a downward path that will see it cut in half in four years.

The budget is part of the government's consistent, comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians benefit from a strong and prosperous Canada.

That plan, first set out in 1984, has two main thrusts: to foster a dynamic, innovative and competitive private sector; and to put the government's fiscal house in order.

Our economic plan and the firm actions we have taken in the budget as part of that plan have brought us a clear prospect of lower inflation and a steadily declining deficit. They help ensure that the government's fiscal position in the 1990s can support the programs Canadians value most. By persevering, we will attain great control over our destiny and greater ability to devote our resources to investments in a rising standard of living and a better quality of life for all Canadians.

I would now like to outline for the House the terms of the borrowing authority bill for 1990–91. Paragraph 2(1) of the bill requests borrowing authority in the amount of $25.5 billion for fiscal 1990–91. This amount is equal to $22.5 billion of borrowing requirements, of which $21 billion is the government's estimated net financial requirements from the budget, $1.5 billion is the estimated exchange fund account earnings, and a $3 billion reserve to manage foreign exchange transactions.

As was the case last year, the request for borrowing authority to cover exchange fund earnings reflects the fact that although these earnings are reported in the public accounts as budgetary revenues, they give rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. This is because they are retained in the exchange fund account and are not available to finance ongoing operations of the government.

The $3 billion reserve requested in the borrowing bill is the same as granted in the previous three years.

Paragraph 2(2) states that all unused borrowing authority granted by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1990–91, to the extent that the unused authority exceeds $3 billion, will be cancelled on March 31, 1991. Thus, this paragraph preserves the government's non-lapsing reserve into the next year to accommodate the possibility that new statutory borrowing authority is not provided before the 1991-92 fiscal year begins.

Paragraph 3 ensures that the $3 billion reserve granted last fiscal year by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1989-90 will be cancelled on March 31, 1990 or on the date the new bill comes into force, whichever is later. Thus, this paragraph prevents non-lapsing reserves granted for earlier years from accumulating but ensures that cancellation will take place at a time that is not disruptive.

Paragraph 4 ensures that if the new bill passes after March 31, 1990 and part of the $3 billion reserve granted for 1989-90 has been used, this does not increase the total amount of borrowing authority available for 1990-91.

For the information of hon. members, I would like to briefly review the government's debt operations to the end of February 1989-90.

So far the domestic debt program has increased the unmatured domestic debt outstanding by approximately $19.6 billion. At the same time the outstanding debt in foreign currencies has been reduced by $2.9 billion. The combined effect has been an increase in the outstanding unmatured debt to around $294 billion.

Of the total net debt issued so far in 1989-1990, $10 billion was in the form of marketable bonds. As well, the government increased the emphasis on selling bonds by auction, which it has found to be a cost effective form of issuing debt. Auctions now account for about 65 per cent of all marketable bonds issued, up from about 60 per cent in 1988-89.

Treasury bills were used to raise $15.5 billion of new funds to the end of February 1989-90.

This fall the 1989 Canada Savings Bond campaign with a coupon of 10.5 per cent generated total sales of $9.3 billion. The net amount raised in the campaign, after taking account of CSBs which matured in 1989 and other maturities which were redeemed during the campaign, was $3.1 billion.

In closing, I would like to remind hon. members that they have all the necessary information before them to deal with this bill. The bill is related to the borrowing requirements set out in the budget and the Estimates which have been tabled in the House.

[Translation]

Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I hope that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken) and other members of the opposition will help expedite the passage of this bill through the House.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I listened to the minister with great care. As he mentioned, every item of expenditure of the Government of Canada falls under the public accounts of this country. I also noticed that he made some more projections, as the finance minister often has a habit of doing. We will talk about that later.

As he said, Bill C-65 would give the government the authority to borrow up to $25.5 billion during the coming fiscal year to cover its budgetary deficit. Projected financial requirements look as if they are about $21 billion.

In its role as the supreme authority in Canada—that is this government—in matters relating to the raising and dispersing of funds on behalf of the Crown, Parliament is regularly requested to grant authority to the Minister of Finance to raise money under the Financial Administration Act by way of loan or by the issue and sale of securities of Canada in the words of each bill forming such a request.

Having stated that, it is very important to put on the record today in this borrowing bill debate just what kind of financial management this government has had since taking office. We know that at the end of March 1984 the national debt of this country stood at $160 billion. Today, after five years plus with this government, the national debt of this country stands at $351 billion. This is financial management from a government that stated it was going to cut the deficit and get the finances of this country under control. The fact is that they have sky-rocketed every year that this government has been in office.

Let us take a look at this. I do not like to say things like that without being able to back them up.

This government borrowed $7.3 billion during the period 1984-85 to the end of the fiscal year of March 1985. Let us go to 1985-86 when this government borrowed $12 billion. If we go back to 1984 and 1985, the government borrowed $24.55 billion. Some of that money belonged to the previous administration and some was overlapping into the next administration. In 1985–86 this government borrowed another $18.2 billion.

I want to remind you, Madam Speaker, that this comes from a government that said it was going to cut the deficit of this country and get the finances under control. The Minister of Finance said in August 1984 that he was not going to raise taxes to do this. He was simply going to cut government programs. That shows how much he understood about government then and he obviously has not learned a great deal since.

In 1986–87 this government borrowed $22.6 billion. Then again in 1986–87 it borrowed $3.6 billion and in addition to that in 1987–88 it borrowed $24.3 billion. In 1988–89 it borrowed $25.3 billion. In 1989–90 it borrowed $750 million. Today the government is asking for another $25.5 billion. All this totals approximately $190 billion. This from a government that was going to show a great example of financial management. That is what the government said to Canadians in 1984. The Minister of Finance is still in dream–land. He has still not learned what is going on around him, because he still says he is going to do it. I will have a little more to say about those figures later on.

The government is passing its debt. The government has learned one thing, and that is how to pass its debt. It has learned how to pass its responsibilities for government. It has learned how to pass the buck to provincial and municipal governments. That is the one thing it has learned.

In 1982 the Minister of Finance thought that the federal government should not reduce its deficit on the backs of the provinces. That was in 1982, when he was sitting over here in the opposition. He said this, and I quote: "Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments". He also said that consultations were imperative before there were any budget cuts. We know what has happened to consultation under this government.

In August 1989 the Prime Minister said—and this is rather ironic because this was a statement of the Prime Minister of Canada—and I quote:

> This government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first–class education as they confront a world–class challenge.

Instead the Prime Minister has confronted young people of this country with a first–class challenge, because we all know that in the recent budget the Minister of Finance has cut drastically funds to the provinces for post–secondary education and medicare.

The cuts or the freezing of federal spending in transfer payments or Established Programs Financing indicate that it is only a matter of time before Ottawa will no longer pay a single cent for medicare or higher education in any of the provinces. That is what we have under this government. That, Madam Speaker, is why this government must be changed. This would result in Ottawa losing its ability to enforce minimum standards of accessibility and equity in two of Canada's most vital social policy areas, namely, education and medicare.

This government is famous for passing costs back to the provinces, and in effect putting the onus right down to the individual taxpayers who will end up with the expense. Provincial taxes will increase to make up for the cuts in the transfer payments to the provinces. I know you will not believe this, Madam Speaker, because you are a lady with a very fine and kind heart, but the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces equal $576 per taxpayer over the next five years.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission was originally transferred to the federal government in order to ease the financial burdens of the provinces and the municipalities, many of which went broke during the Depression years of the early thirties. The Rowell–Sirois commission report that followed stated that its financial proposals were designed to enable every province of Canada to rely on having sufficient revenue at its command to carry out the functions entrusted to it.

When they transferred the burden of the unemployed from the provincial and the municipal governments over to the federal Government of Canada they made the stipulation that "the assumption of responsibility by the Dominion for the relief of aid of unemployed employables would entail complete financial responsibility".

That is the recommendation that was made and accepted by the Mackenzie King government in August when Royal Assent was given to the bill amending the Constitution to transfer the unemployment insurance programs to the federal government. That was the commitment that was made by the then Liberal government and today we have a Tory government here in Ottawa that is reneging on the entire deal and reneging on the very Constitution of this country. It is transferring all those expenditures for the UIC fund over to the individuals and private enterprise. The Tories are the great promoters of private enterprise.

Let us talk about broken promises. I do not want to spend too much time on that because I would be here all day. The Prime Minister is on record as saying he would not pay off the deficit by attacking social programs. The Prime Minister and the former Minister of National Health and Welfare promised to maintain over-all social spending by not using social program funds to reduce the deficit, and promised they would maintain the universality of programs for seniors and families. Such promises are now a thing of the past. Universality, as a key principle of government, is dead.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister called the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the leader of the Liberal party, a liar during the last election campaign for saying that Canada's social and regional development programs would be eroded after the election. Since the election the government has done the following: clawed back seniors old age pensions and family allowances, cut VIA Rail which is a regional development tool, withdrawn from the unemployment insurance program and cut benefits, and scrapped its promised child care program. Do you remember how carefully it fine tuned that child care program that it was going to bring forward in this Parliament? It fine tuned it until the election was over and then dropped it like a hot potato. The government cut transfer payments to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education by $7.464 billion over the next five years.

We all know that famous quote of the Prime Minister: "Pensions are a sacred trust never to be tampered with". Since then he has attempted to deindex old age pensions and he is now trying to claw back senior citizens' pensions.

I want this quote to be very carefully attributed: "We would cut spending. We would not raise taxes. Tax levels in Canada are already too high". Now, who do you suppose said that? That was stated by the Minister of Finance on March 6, 1984. What a transition. Since 1984 taxes have been increased 31 times. That is not counting the pending GST.

Federal tax revenues have increased by $48 billion since 1984. But the Minister of Finance said he was not going to raise taxes. He was going to cut the deficit by cutting government programs. It was simple back then in 1984. After all these measures the deficit is still out of control. You know that song, where has all the money gone?

I think this is a fine tribute to the judgment of the present Minister of Finance. On May 23, 1985, he stated the following: "Our actions will directly reduce the annual deficit at the end of the decade by more than $20 billion, down to $18 billion". We are now at the end of the decade and his own finance department has informed us that the deficit stands at $30.5 billion. Not bad for the Minister of Finance. He only missed his target by $12.5 billion.

He went on to say: "Our challenge in 1984 was to restore fiscal stability and rebuild credibility in the management of government finances. The only way to do that was to set out a medium term fiscal plan with sustained deficit reduction and then hold to that plan". This is exactly what he did. I suppose Ronald Reagan or Margaret Thatcher could easily deliver the same statement. But the fact is he has held to this great plan. What are the results? His deficit has grown larger in the last three years alone.

Let me cite the following: "It took over one hundred years; from Sir John A. Macdonald to Lester B. Pearson, to accumulate a federal debt of $18 billion," including two world wars that had to be paid for. "By next April that debt will have reached $180 billion. Despite a decade of rhetoric about fiscal responsibility, this government now borrows over $20 billion a year just to meet its interest payments".

That is what the Prime Minister said on March 22, 1984. He said it took over one hundred years, from Sir John A. Macdonald to Lester B. Pearson, to accumulate a federal debt of $18 billion. He has outdone all of them. In the last five years he can boast that he has raised the national debt of Canada by $190 billion. He deserves an Oscar award, Madam Speaker.

This is the kind of rhetoric we have been listening to in the House of Commons every day. When our present leader of the Liberal party delivered a speech in this House on March 6, he really focused on one of the key issues.

He said: "We should focus more and more of our attention and resources on long-term investment in people, education, literacy and the upgrading of skills". That means the federal government would maintain its credibility with the provinces, its respectability with the people of Canada and invest in those people by putting money into post-secondary education and training programs. The budget we have just had does exactly the opposite.

I will quote one more statement then move to another very important issue that I think will deal very heavily with the public accounts of this country in the next decade. This quote comes from none other than the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in its 1990 pre-budget submission. The Chamber of Commerce is a very good friend of the government front benches. The Chamber of Commerce said at that time:

> The staggering federal debt figures prove that the government, despite protestations to the contrary, has failed miserably to address the problem. Virtually every measure it considered unacceptable in 1984 has been surpassed.

The government has even surpassed its own worst predictions. Our poor Minister for International Trade is under great pressure these days. He still has not done anything about the softwood lumber 15 per cent export tax, or small business and industry across this country, to say nothing of the labour in one-industry towns we have in this country.

The Minister for International Trade said: "There will be no changes to the unemployment insurance program". He had been assured of that by the Prime Minister of Canada. Today, those changes are floating back and forth between the Senate and the House of Commons. The bill is somewhere up in the air and it still has to be dealt with. The only way it is going to be dealt with is through a possible conference between the government and the Senate. It is up to the Senate to protect the regions of this country and to protect the people whom this government sees as dispensable because it does not worry about the social programs of this country.

We have all received letters from Canadians about the intolerable statistics in the Public Accounts of Canada. We know how discouraged Canadians are about the actions of the government.

During the election campaign, the leader of the Liberal party told Canadians that the finances of this country were in a far greater mess than the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance were letting on.

ALLOTTED DAYS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I very much hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I know he will co-operate with the Chair. I know that he will have no difficulty enlarging on the point he just made in subsequent debate. The interruption, of course, will not take any time from the hon. member.

We heard extensive argument this morning on some difficult matters. I felt that in the interest of members on both sides of the House, with respect to what their obligations might have to be tomorrow in this Chamber, I would make a ruling now which will be very short. I will follow it up as soon as I can, in the next day or so, with a very detailed ruling which may assist hon. members on both sides of the House.

My ruling then is this: Friday and Monday must be allotted days. The New Democratic Party has fulfilled the requirements of the Standing Orders to have a vote tomorrow on the motion on notice. As I say, I will return to the House with detailed reasons for this decision so that the reasons will be of assistance to all hon. members.

Having said that, in the interests of the public who is watching, this ruling does not, of course, detract in any way from the capacity of hon. members on both sides of the House to work out some arrangement between themselves which may be satisfactory with respect to tomorrow.

On the narrow procedural point which I have had to decide, and it is a very important one and not particularly easy, that is the decision. Again, perhaps hon. members knowing this decision will be able to make adjustments for tomorrow, but that is not in my hands.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I just want to point out for those who were watching the Speaker's ruling that it shows the government manages the House of Commons about as effectively as it manages the nation. It is into more serious trouble today. It cannot even get its act straight here.

When I sat down, I had been talking about the leader of the Liberal party who, during the election campaign, told the Canadian public that the finances of Canada were in far worse shape than the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Finance were actually telling them. They called him a liar over that, over what he said about regional programs and other things.

After the election campaign was over, the government spent $3 million to tell the Canadian public the same thing that the leader of the Liberal party told them during the election campaign for free. What kind of financial management is that? We have to focus on the deficit but the government is so intent on winning elections at any cost that it does not care what happens. It will change things to its own way after it is all over.

The House will recall the Press Gallery article about the little room for the Prime Minister's make–up closet that had to be fixed up across the street. It was very important for his image.

There was the trip to Costa Rica. Two limousines were flown down for the protection of the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was very provoked with me when I asked questions in the House about it because he thought I was interfering with the safety of the Prime Minister. I was not. Over here, we are very concerned with the safety of the Prime Minister. We thought that if the government was going to send down two limousines for him to ride around in, the least it could do was to put gasoline in them. What were they going do? Park them out in the parking lot and send him out there to hide until some crisis was over? These are just some of the blunders which turn the Canadian people off.

The National Gallery has committed itself to spend $1.8 million for an 18–foot canvas of red and blue stripes by an American artist. This equals roughly what the government will save by cancelling the funding of women's and natives' groups.

Recently, on International Women's Day, we saw the glossy poster that went across the country. The cost of producing that would have kept one women's centre open for a year.

These are just some examples. I know the Canadian public is sick and tired of the government. It has no credibility left in its finances. They are beginning to wonder whether there is in fact any planning at all in the government.

We all know here that tourism in the 1990s and up to the year 2000 is going to be the biggest industry, not only in Canada but in the world. With eastern Europe opening up the way it is, it will be even greater than the predictions of the last five years.

What great plans is the government making to promote the country and get it ready for that great onslaught of tourists by the year 2000? People should be coming to Canada from all over the world because they have heard so much about Canada.

We are great friends of many countries around this world and we have done many things for them. Our Canadian Forces who have served around the world have been tremendous images of the Canadian personality. They know us through them as well.

We are really laying the groundwork for Tourism 2000 in this country which will mean a lot of earning for many Canadians. The government is planning to bring in the GST for one thing, and the tourist organizations not only in Canada but outside Canada are warning the government about what a disastrous effect this is going to have on tourism in Canada during the nineties and indeed on into the 2000s.

The government cut VIA Rail. If you are going to take visitors across Canada and show them the country and indeed if you are going to show Canadians our country the best thing to do is not cut VIA Rail, break the line, but have a national rail service in this country so people might see something. They might get from one place to another in a way that would appeal to them.

There is another way that this government is really helping to lay the groundwork for the tourist industry of the coming decade. Tourism Canada is one of the greatest little sections of government that we have. It is not very well known to the Canadian public because they do not get the attention they deserve.

Tourism Canada is a group of people working to promote tourism for Canada. Because of their efforts five years ago they had 400 people on staff. With the onslaught coming for tourism and because of the attitude of this government, two years ago Tourism Canada, in preparation for the next decade in this country, was cut down to 150 personnel. In 1990 the government cut them back to 110. They just recently let 17 people go.

In 1991, just to continue this very constructive program to destroy tourism in this country, a further reduction by 8 per cent will take place. In 1992 the government is going to further reduce them by 5 per cent. That is what we are doing to promote one of the greatest developing industries for this country.

While the finances of this country are being mismanaged today by this government, we are hearing all these statements about the fantastic financial management skills of the government and the fantastic results it is achieving. Yet it is hanging up there at $30.5 billion deficit.

I want to reinforce what I said a while ago about the extent of the growth of tourism in the world and in Canada. Whenever we travel abroad or even in Canada, even in business, it is tourism because we do a certain amount of visiting while we are there. We have become part of the 1,500 million people who travel away from their place of residence every year. That number equals almost one-third of the world's population.

We have also contributed to the world-wide spending on tourism which, in 1988, was over $2,000 billion U.S. dollars or $2 trillion, as North Americans would say, if we include spending on transport. If that sounds like a lot of money, it is. It comes to 12 per cent of the world Gross National Product and more than the GNP of any country but the United States. Tourism has become the world's largest industry. As a source of foreign earnings it accounts for 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the world trade in services. That is a fantastic statistic.

That is what we should be planning for today, yet this government in its foresight is cutting Tourism Canada. As of the end of this year it will be down to less than 25 per cent of the personnel of what it was five years ago. Is that management? Is that saving?

People who come to Canada want to do many things. We have tremendous outdoors in this country for people to enjoy. One of the services to many small communities and tourist areas across this country comes from small craft harbours, a small section of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

This government has been neglecting small craft harbours ever since it took office. Facilities that were good are deteriorating because they are not being maintained. Some are still non-existent because there is no money to build anything, which means that development is not taking place to pave the way for Tourism 2000. Adding costs of maintenance to facilities just simply wastes money because it costs more in the long run.

As the hon. member for Algoma said when he spoke in this House a few days ago on behalf of his region of Canada, northern Ontario, very few Canadians realize that in Ontario alone, the Ontario and federal governments collect some $300 million annually from fishing tackle, sale of boats, sale of oars, sale of motors, sale of gasoline and other marine supplies that relate to small craft harbours, just to that industry alone.

What do they put back into it? They put $3 million, 1 per cent, back in as an investment for this country. The remainder of that revenue probably helped to buy that $1.8 million article over at the museum. It probably helped to fix the Prime Minister's make-up room behind the National Press Gallery. All these things are very important. It is more important for the Prime Minister to have a make-up room around Parliament Hill and across Wellington Street than it is to build another harbour facility to promote tourism in this country.

The government has all its priorities wrong. Talking about developing tourism and small business, this government has talked incessantly about high interest rates and has always talked about the previous government. It blames everything on the previous government, but it will run out of those stories one of these days. It is beginning to sound like a worn record.

Just to put the record straight once again, I want to state very clearly that when this government took power in September 1984, interest rates in this country stood at exactly 13 per cent. Today, they stand at 14.25 per cent, the largest real interest rate that we have had in this country for years.

The development and environmental protection of tourist sites is very important. Environment itself is another area where we will have to prepare for Tourism 2000. We will have to protect the natural sites so they are not damaged by tourism.

The environment and the protection of our tourist sites is going to be very important. Environment is going to be a big issue in the 1990s. We hope it is. We do not know what this government is going to do, but we hear all kinds of rumours.

I see my hon. friend over here who has done a lot of work on the environment. He has held conferences and has contributed greatly. I am sure that if the government would only ask him what to do, he could give some very good advice.

The government must pay more attention to the environmental issues of this country. It must pay more attention to tourism and less attention to the silly things that it considers to be important. It must manage the finances of this country in such a way that Canadians are going to have something to look up to, instead of levying 31 tax increases and another massive tax increase pending with the GST as of January 1 of next year, if this goes on—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): We will have to interrupt the hon. member. He may want to conclude his remarks after Question Period.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the presence in our country of Reverend Lazlo Tokes. Mr. Tokes, an ethnic Hungarian Romanian clergyman, is credited with having sparked the downfall of the Ceausescu regime in Romania last December by his defiant stand against ruthless persecution.

We Canadians have followed the events in Romania and have been hopeful that the dramatic changes would have brought about new freedom, hope for justice and peace to the region. The hope persists, but unfortunately we have seen increased persecution of the Hungarian minority in Romania. It is with great sadness and concern that yesterday we watched the clashes between some Romanians and the Hungarian minority, leaving at least six dead and about 300 injured. Such violence threatens the growth of democracy.

I am concerned that while Romania has finally achieved freedom from an inhumane dictator and has set up a provisional government, a truly free and democratic society cannot be achieved without support for human rights. The international community must help to protect the rights of the Hungarians and all citizens in Romania, and I call upon the Canadian government and parliamentarians to use their influence in all ways.

Official Canadian election observers have been requested by both the Romanian and Hungarian governments for the May elections in Romania. I further call on our government to consider Canadian food aid to Romania. Our wish and goal is to see Romania accept a clear and consistent standard of human rights, protection of minority rights, and democracy. Only then will a truly free and just society be achieved.

GLOBE 90 CONFERENCE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the topics being discussed and major initiatives being taken by the Canadian Council of Environment Ministers meeting this week in Vancouver during the Globe 90 conference.

A national protocol on packaging aimed at a volume reduction of 50 per cent by the year 2000 is one measure that should be welcome to all Canadians.

Subjects such as global warming, intergovernmental co-operation on the environment, a strategy for regulating pulp and paper mills, a national program for cleaning up contaminated areas, management of used tire stockpiles, PCBs and environmental assessments are an indication that Canada is emerging as a real leader in environmental matters, for which all the credit goes to the federal environmental minister and his provincial counterparts.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

RACIAL EQUALITY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have a world-wide reputation of being a tolerant and understanding people. Yet that reputation is being challenged by a social problem in Canada today. Racism has the potential to cast a dark shadow upon that reputation. We can no longer rest in our easy chairs and watch television reports about racism, confident that it occurs only in far off lands. It has hit much closer to home and has done so for longer than we care to admit.

Yesterday marked the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. I would encourage the people of Canada not to observe just one day, but to continue to work all year to ensure that there are no racial barriers to equality in Canada.

RED CROSS MONTH

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the month of March has been designated as Red Cross Month in Prince Edward Island and across the country. The Red Cross is an organization which has aided communities in water safety, blood donor clinics and disaster assistance.

Prince Edward Island has greatly benefitted from the Red Cross. We can boast of committed individuals like Dr. Iphigenie Arsenault who has devoted over 63 years of service the Red Cross. In 1945, Dr. Evelyn Cudmore began the Water Safety Instruction Program in Prince Edward Island, representing the first program of its kind to take place in Canada outside Toronto. Arthur Love, with the assistance of Dr. Cudmore, began the Small Craft Safety Program in 1971. It was a pilot project which is now a national activity.

I know that all sides of the House join with me in recognizing the Red Cross and commending this organization on the contribution it makes to our communities.

FORESTRY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, it took a United Nations official to tell Canadians what the government is afraid to say—that Canada is contributing to global warming because of the rapid rate at which we are cutting down our forests.

Gro Brundtland and others have warned that climate change is the biggest single threat facing humanity today. This government endorsed the Brundtland report and likes to talk about sustainable development. Absence of responsible forest management is not sustainable development.

While this government brags about its achievements on the environment and accepts prizes from international organizations with questionable allegiances, we are losing our forests at a rate of 7.5 million acres a year.

The federal government must bring forward a comprehensive strategy on global warming which will include a commitment to careful management of our forests. Such a strategy should include a law banning clear-cutting in favour of more careful techniques, a national forest inventory and preservation of old growth forests.

The facts are clear. The time is now for the government to listen to Canadians and move swiftly toward a sustainable future.

MR. JAMES NICHOLAS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my colleagues in this House to join me in acclaiming Mr. James Nicholas of Welland, Ontario, who has brought honour to Canada by being elected as the International Secretary of the World Council for Global Co–operation. He was the principal founder of this organization that was established in Toronto in November, 1988.

Some of the world's greatest minds have lent their support to Mr. Nicholas. Eleven Nobel prize winners from ten countries now serve as directors and patrons of the World Council.

The World Council is a follow–up to An Appeal For Peace which was written by Mr. James Nicholas and addressed to the youth of the developed world in 1984. The appeal was endorsed by 66 Nobel Laureates from 20 countries. Mr. Nicholson presented the appeal to Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, the Secretary–General of the United Nations. Inspired by his words of commendation, the World Council was formally established. Among those present at the founding convention were members of the diplomatic corps from 17 different countries. They represented more than half of humanity.

The Prime Minister of Canada was represented by Senator Richard Doyle. To date 17 international organizations from 15 countries have affiliated themselves with the World Council.

Internationally, Mr. Nicholas' efforts have been successful because his labours have been interpreted as an important Canadian initiative for peace.

CHALLENGE 90

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State (Youth) and member for Verchères just announced that students will be able to take out interest–free loans of up to $3,000 to set up a business this summer.

This program is part of a federal initiative called "Challenge 90", sponsored jointly by the Federal Business Development Bank.

Students who are interested can obtain an application form and a copy of the guide at Canada Employment Centres, Canada Employment Centres for Students, the Federal Business Development Bank, the National Bank of Canada, in Quebec, and the Royal Bank.

Mr. Speaker, this is a popular program in this country. The number of loans and the amounts involved have increased annually since the program was set up in 1985 by Canada's Conservative members of Parliament.

GLOBE 90 CONFERENCE

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Globe 90 environmental trade conference being held this week in Vancouver.

This is the first time that a conference of this nature has been held. Over 600 exhibitors, leading scientists and parliamentarians are attending this conference which demonstrates the commitment that both the Canadian government and the private sector have towards the protection of the environment.

The elimination of acid rain, stricter pollution controls, cleaning up toxic wastes, tighter auto emission controls, soil conservation, recycling, as well as programs for sustaining agricultural development clearly demonstrate this government's continuing commitment to preserving this great country for generations of Canadians to come.

• (1410)

Initiatives such as these by the government and private industry are putting Canada at the forefront of the environmental protection stage. Globe 90 will be of benefit to all Canadians.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, several years ago, Canadians worried about how Quebecers would vote in the referendum, and rightly so. They realized at the time that without Quebec, Canada would be much weaker. Those who were in government at the time, the Trudeaus, Chrétiens and Lalondes, committed themselves, put their seats on the line, and got together with various leading figures to save this country, as they said. Today, somehow, they don't sound the same.

It is now March 22, 1990, and although it doesn't seem that long ago, I have the distinct impression that the situation has changed dramatically.

Would hon. members and the people of Canada please explain what is going on? It looks like a referendum is now being held in Canada, against Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, where is this marvelous country we were going to save? I would urge all Canadians to turn on their television sets this evening at 8:30 and listen to and record the message of the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, the architect of the Meech Lake Accord.

TIMMINS AIRPORT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 a much needed expansion project for the Timmins airport was announced by the federal government. The former Transport Minister justified the cost of the expansion because of the size of the city and the amount of airport traffic.

Tenders were opened in April of 1989, but no action has been taken yet. Recently I received a copy of a study commissioned by Transport Canada on the economic impact the Timmins airport has on the local economy. I hope the new Minister of Transport will take the time to read the study and consider the number of jobs created by the Timmins airport, not only in Timmins but also in other regions of Ontario.

The study underlines the pressing need for this expansion to go ahead. It is imperative that this project get approval.

MICMAC NEWS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure today to meet with native leaders from Nova Scotia, the editor and the publisher of the Micmac News, and Mr. Donald Marshall, who are in town to meet with the Secretary of State to try to convince the Secretary of State to re–establish funding for the Micmac News and other publications across this country.

The Micmac News has been published for over 20 years. It has a circulation of over 4,800. It has done a tremendous amount of good and has been a source of communication and pride to the Micmac community in Atlantic Canada. It is the only major native newspaper in Atlantic Canada.

This government decided that it wanted to silence the Micmac people. This is just part of the plot of this government that includes doing away with protesters. Protesters are even afraid to hold up signs now in case the National Gallery wants to buy them.

It has to change. We need human rights in this country. This government has to re–establish funding for the Micmac News.

NATIVE COMMUNICATIONS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, over the last couple of years Canadians have repeatedly been shocked to learn that the justice system has failed the aboriginal peoples. I, too, have had the opportunity to meet Donald Marshall. It is difficult, as a proud Canadian, to look at a man who spent that many years in jail without fault.

How can the government now take away the voice of the aboriginal peoples, shut down our newspapers and take our money for communications? That is the unkindest cut. That is something that should not be tolerated in Canada.

I say, on behalf of our native communications people, that we must not continue to target the aboriginal peoples and further victimize them. We do not need any more J. J. Harpers and we do not need any more Donald Marshalls as victims for Canada.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, tonight the Prime Minister will go on national television to talk to Canadians about the Meech Lake Accord. Like most Canadians, I am anxious to hear what the Prime Minister has to say.

In recent weeks the fate of the Meech Lake Accord has been uncertain. Some have insisted it is doomed. I prefer a more optimistic view of our search for a Constitution that brings Canada together.

As a western Canadian I support the Meech Lake Accord and its commitment to the process of Senate reform. The conditions set out in the accord stipulate that the federal and provincial governments must address the issue of Senate reform. Without a Meech Lake Accord, that commitment is lost.

I support the efforts of the Prime Minister and the premiers to end the current impasse, and hope that all Canadians will be encouraged by the Prime Minister's remarks tonight.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is time once again to choose the corporate welfare bum of the week.

The three nominees which have benefitted from the generous tax breaks provided by Liberal and Conservative governments are Maritime Life, Ocelot Industries and Tridel. Not one of these worthy nominees paid a penny of federal income tax in 1988. Maritime Life had profits of $34 million; Ocelot Industries had a net income of $432 million and Tridel netted $72 million. The three combined had profits of over $500 million but not a single sou in federal income taxes were paid. The GST will not touch these major corporations.

Now for the winner. The envelope please.

The winner is Tridel Corporation. This major real estate developer did not pay income taxes but it did find it in its heart to contribute $29,000 to the Conservative party and $25,000 to the Liberal party as political contributions in 1988.

For remaining loyal to the old adage: "Never bite the hand that feeds you", Tridel is the corporate welfare bum of the week.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians are all concerned about the deadlock involving the 1987 constitutional amendments and our uncertain constitutional future. We know that this evening, the Prime Minister will be heard on our national televison network.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether in his speech this evening, the Prime Minister of Canada will announce any new initiatives to break this constitutional deadlock.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that the initiative that was taken by Premier McKenna of New Brunswick has been a very positive development in this whole exercise.

It is fair to say that generally there has been a positive response because it really, in effect, provides an opportunity for the passage of Meech Lake without taking anything away while, at the same time, providing an opportunity for additions to be made.

With that in mind, and the fact that the premier has indicated that he in no way felt that this was a complete solution to the impasse, it does provide the opportunity for the other dissenting premiers to look at the proposal in a very serious vein and, hopefully, to examine it in such a way that it can add to the constructive position that has been put forth and result, hopefully, in a ratification of the accord together with any refinements that may be achieved through a parallel structure.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians welcome proposals to solve the ongoing constitutional impasse.

The first obligation, in our view, of the Prime Minister is to share with the House of Commons any new initiative he may take to assist in solving this crisis.

How does the government intend to live up to the longstanding British parliamentary system tradition of coming to the House of Commons and presenting to the elected members of the House the proposals that are to be put to solve such an important constitutional crisis?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is suggesting that the Prime Minister should not engage in a discussion of this importance with the people of Canada.

I think that the precedent for a Prime Minister speaking to Canadians at large has been well established by previous Prime Ministers. I know a previous Prime Minister spoke on television to the Canadian people on many occasions of national importance. The Prime Minister, in no way, has evaded the House of Commons on this very important issue and he has no intention of evading the House of Commons on this issue today.

Clearly, if there any initiatives that will be taken, they will be brought before the House of Commons and members of the House of Commons will have a full opportunity to respond and debate the issue as we think it should be.

It is fair to say that the Prime Minister has been here in the House of Commons debating the Meech Lake issue and responding to questions whenever the opposition wanted to ask questions about it. I am sure that what will take place today will add to the constructive progress that has been initiated. I am sure there will be lots of opportunity for debating this very important issue in the days to come in the House of Commons.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to remind the Deputy Prime Minister that we live in a parliamentary democracy, not a presidential system. We would appreciate it very much if some mechanism were put in place for members of Parliament to be consulted on this question.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister told us he would respond to the McKenna proposal on televison. He has had time to analyse the proposal made by the Premier of New Brunswick and any proposals made by other provincial Premiers. Could the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House whether the Prime Minister intends to call a meeting of provincial Premiers, to invite them to sit around the table and discuss this issue, with a view to finding a solution to our constitutional dilemma?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I really regret that the hon. member, for whom I have a lot of respect, would want to engage in a partisan debate about whether or not the Prime Minister should speak on national television.

A former Prime Minister of this country, as I recall, spoke on national television on probably six or seven occasions. He spoke on the 6 and 5 proposal, on the constitutional proposal and the War Measures Act.

I find it rather strange for the hon. member to suggest that the Prime Minister should not take the opportunity to communicate directly with Canadians. He has discussed this issue, defended it and debated it on the floor of the House of Commons on numerous occasions.

As to what he will do, I am sure the hon. member will be delighted that what he probably intends to do tonight is advance the progress based upon the initiative of Mr. McKenna. Hopefully that can help us move toward unlocking the log-jam, at which time we will also call upon the support and co-operation of all hon. members, including the hon. member who posed the question.

BROADCASTING ACT

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked why building national unity for this diverse, bilingual, multicultural, multiracial country was not a worthy goal. In particular, I asked why national unity is now to be excluded from the new Broadcasting Act.

In response, the government said that "national unity mandates for broadcasters exist only in totalitarian regimes like South Africa and are not appropriate for democracies like Canada."

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As national unity has been part of the CBC mandate since 1968, is it this government's view that we have not had democracy in the last 22 years, and in particular in the last six years of the Tory government? Is that what the government means by removing the national unity clause?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I reminded the hon. member yesterday that she had voted for this particular change. The change was made in the original bill, Bill C–136, which was before this House in 1988. I have not had the opportunity to check the voting record, but I believe the hon. member supported the change at that time.

There has been a tremendous amount of criticism of the presence of such a clause in the bill. Among those who have criticized it have been many civil libertarians across this country who regard it as appropriate to a regime that controls its media. We have an arm's length relationship with the publicly owned broadcasting corporation and that will be maintained.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, freedom of expression has never been interfered with. It is guaranteed under the Charter of Rights of this country. I did call for change. Change has taken place in this country. When there is a mood change in the country I think the role of the government is to respond to that mood change.

Will the government tell Canadians why, in its new broadcasting bill, it establishes two separate standing committees at the CBC, one on English language broadcasting and the other on French language broadcasting, creating two Canadas within the CBC? Why is the government undermining a vision of a united Canada? What is wrong with Canada? Why can't government help it grow?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the proposal to have standing committees of the CBC board to deal with the problems of French and English broadcasting is a very constructive move toward national unity.

I would draw to the hon. member's attention the wonderful program that appeared just a few nights ago. There was a combined broadcast of Le Point and The Journal on which national unity issues were discussed.

It is to try to find the devices to bridge the two solitudes in this country that the proposal to establish the two standing committees of the one board of the CBC under CBC by-laws is in the legislation.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture knows that there have been serious design flaws in the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program, flaws which resulted in prairie producers getting bills of $1,200 to $2,000 and demands for immediate payment. The minister knows that the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds recently signed a letter to producers in Saskatchewan explaining that they have no course but to pay up and thank the government for the good job that it has been doing.

How can the Minister of Agriculture justify sending bills to prairie producers when what they really need is assistance? Will he immediately withdraw this demand for payment and ask his government to properly address the immediate financial concerns of prairie producers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has any specific cases in mind I would be pleased to look into them.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the Legislature in Saskatchewan unanimously supported an emergency resolution calling on this government to provide up to $900 million for cash starved Saskatchewan producers.

Is the Minister of Agriculture prepared today to stand in this House and accept this cry for help that he has now received from every single elected MLA in the province of Saskatchewan? When will the minister accept the fact that there is a serious agricultural crisis on the prairies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House a couple of days ago and again last week, the deputy ministers of agriculture have been meeting this week and working on the design of a program that hopefully would go some distance in meeting some of the problems of the grain and oilseeds sector and agriculture in general, particularly with respect to the province of Saskatchewan.

That work is ongoing in close co-operation with the provinces and we hope that in the near future we will be able to make some positive announcements.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government's unprecedented attacks against students and education have had the desired effect.

After cutbacks totalling $7 billion in transfer payments to Quebec for health and education over a period of nine years, after the other attacks against students in Quebec, the province is now facing tuition fees that are twice as high. Today, Quebec students are demonstrating against these attacks.

How can the minister afford to threaten the future of our country by destroying our system of postsecondary education? What justification is there for this policy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will probably be disappointed to learn that we are increasing our transfer payments to Quebec, not decreasing them.

Next year, under our programs, our transfer payments to Quebec will exceed over $10.3 billion. Of course, in the global management of our budget, we have to consider our expenditures as a whole. We find that, as a Government, we have kept our increase in expenditures at 3.5 per cent over the past five years, while several provinces have increased theirs by as much as 10, 14 or even 17 per cent. We must therefore make sure that everybody share in the effort to reduce the deficit.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I would personally like to thank all the government members who called the anti-GST Liberal line last week, including the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fontana: The government has spent millions of taxpayers' dollars to advertise the GST. It has gone to the expense of setting up a 1-800 information line.

But what do Canadians get when they call that line? The Toronto Homebuilders' Association called for information 20 times. The answers were incomplete and incorrect 75 per cent of the time. The government line gave correct information only five out of 20 times.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. If the 1-800 GST number is not an information line, what is it, a Tory advertising line paid for by taxpayers?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member and his colleagues on that side of the House make use of that number more often.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: When I listen to their interpretation of the GST, I am also tempted to be against it, but when I look at the real project I am all in favour of it.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are using the lines, but the people who are answering the lines are giving out wrong information.

Canadians who are thinking of buying a new home today are calling the 1–800 number for information that will affect their decision to buy. The information that is being given out is incomplete and could cost a homeowner thousands of dollars.

Will the minister be honest with the people of Canada? Will he ensure that this 1–800 propaganda line will accurately tell Canadians of the thousands of dollars that they will pay for new homes because of this anti–housing tax called the GST?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that the people who are answering the calls to this line are thoroughly professional civil servants. They have studied the technical papers available, something that hon. members on that side of the House have not done.

Of course we look at their answers. We receive reports every day of the questions asked. We are sure they are professional answers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the last session of Parliament, veterinary drug manufacturers were literally forced into complying with the Patent Act under which the whole pharmaceutical industry is regulated and under which no differentiation is made between human and veterinary pharmaceuticals. Nor has any differentiation been made between the two under the Excise Tax Act or under the Food and Drugs Act.

Now, under the proposed GST, human pharmaceuticals are zero rated while veterinary ones will be taxed. How can the minister possibly justify these contradictions?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to apologize to the hon. lady. The way she started her question, I failed to listen to the end of it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can extend the minister's apologies. The hon. member could put her question again.

Mrs. Gaffney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It just goes to show you that the members of the government are not listening to the people.

Mr. Andre: They should get to their questions. Stop giving preambles and ask the questions.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Meet the new surrogate Speaker right here.

Mr. Speaker: I am always prepared to co–operate with hon. members if they want to change the rules, but the hon. member for Nepean has the floor.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to go through the preamble because otherwise he is going to miss the question.

In the last parliamentary session veterinary drug manufacturers were literally forced into complying with the Patent Act under which the whole pharmaceutical industry is regulated and under which no differentiation is made between human and veterinary pharmaceuticals. Nor has any differentiation been made between the two under the Excise Tax Act or under the Food and Drugs Act.

The question is—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Gaffney: —under the proposed GST human pharmaceuticals are zero rated while veterinary ones are taxed. How can the minister possibly justify these contradictions?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, our decision is consistent with the decisions we have taken throughout, to make sure that our reform is very attentive to the needs of the population of Canada. Obviously, we have had to make some choices. I think the hon. member will understand why we made them.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, that was a non answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put her question.

Mrs. Gaffney: The Canadian Veterinary Medical Association estimates small animal health care costs will increase as high as 12 per cent because of the GST.

Given that animal control programs will face a dramatic setback, and given that we will see a decrease in health care provided to small animals, how can the minister possibly justify jeopardizing not only the care of animals, but ultimately humans, just because he wants to grab more money for the government kitty?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will resist the temptation to tell the hon. member that I am very caring about her particular problem because I happen to be the owner of a very nice animal. But that is not the point.

What she fails to take into account is the fact that all the inputs presently paid by the veterinarians will no longer be paid after the GST is implemented. This will constitute a considerable diminution of the prices.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the growing tension in Lithuania and concern over the demand by Mr. Gorbachev that Lithuanians surrender their arms within a given period of time.

It seems to me that this image which is being portrayed of the Lithuanian people is as a violent people who need to be disarmed by the Soviet Union. The Lithuanians have come a long way in their struggle for independence in a remarkably non-violent way through free and fair elections, through the declaration of a freely and fairly elected parliament, et cetera, and with absolutely no violence whatsoever.

I would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on behalf of the Government of Canada, would be able to reject this view of the Lithuanian people as a people who are seeking to exert some sort of violence over their own destiny, rather than pursuing it in the democratic way that they have up until now and in which they intend to proceed doing so.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the House would agree with two things. The first is, as the hon. member has said, there has been a remarkable demonstration of a dedication to a peaceful and democratic means on the part of the people of Lithuania.

Second, the House would believe that the Soviet Union should recognize that and reflect that realization in its actions.

We are concerned about the pressures that the Soviet Union is placing upon Lithuania. We have called in the Ambassador of the Soviet Union on various occasions. I welcome the opportunity the member has provided me to convey that view publicly to the Soviet Union. I think I speak the views of the whole House. I will follow it up in correspondence to Mr. Shevardnadze with whom I have already been in touch respecting this matter.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, part of the problem, it seems to me, is that the Lithuanian Parliament feels that in order to gain the international recognition that it seeks, it has to put in place not only these de jure declarations of independence, but also de facto signs of independence, like border patrols and customs, et cetera. It seems to me that these are part of the problem in terms of the negotiations with the Soviet Union about how to realize independence.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs, either within the Government of Canada itself or in consultation with other members of the international community, looking at ways to convey the recognition of the independence process in Lithuania in a way that does not have to wait entirely for all these de facto signs of independence to be displayed? It seems to me that those things are part of the problem in reaching that very independence.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting suggestion and one that I would follow.

Given the non-partisan nature of these discussions on this matter in the House, it might be useful if I could have the benefit of the views of members of the three-party committee who travelled to Lithuania, as well as the members of the standing committee with whom I would consult informally with regard to practical initiatives that Canada might follow to this end.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Small businesses and Tourism). In the brief sent to the Quebec MPs in Ottawa by the Conseil du patronat du Québec they expresses great concern about the economic impact of the GST, its administrative complexity and its high costs for small businesses. Will the Minister of State (Small Businesses) ask his colleague the Minister of Finance to increase the assistance to small businesses, as requested by the Conseil du patronat du Québec?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that the small business community is now starting to understand the tremendous advantages of the GST for cash flow. On the question of cash flow, the input tax credits will mean that service businesses, as well as manufacturing businesses, will have sources of cash flow more instantly than they have under the present manufacturers' sales tax.

More important, we are going to have a streamlined accounting system, special deductions under the capital cost allowance to put in new equipment, and Revenue Canada task forces helping the small business community take advantage of the GST. This is all good news. The small business community of Canada is starting to recognize this and support it.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, it proves that the minister is not talking to small business people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Conseil du patronat du Québec also stated in their brief that the one-time $1,000 credit is quite inadequate to compensate small businesses for the administrative costs they will incur while applying the GST. Once and for all, will the Minister listen to small businesses and provide them with the necessary assistance to face the administrative nightmare resulting from the GST?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been careful to listen to the small business community on this. In fact, when he made his changes to the GST, they reflected further the listening that he and the government have done.

We have the $1,000 administration fee. We have the changes in the capital cost allowance. We have the streamlined accounting. We have the rebate for the accommodation industry. We have change after change.

Some of them seem small but they are very important to the small business community. As a result of that we have been listening and we will continue to listen.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who has been saying, along with the offshore fish companies, that the crisis in the Atlantic fishery is one of too many fishermen chasing too few fish.

The trawlermen who work the offshore vessels have a different story. When the minister met recently in Canso with the trawlermen on National Seas' offshore vessels, they provided him with evidence, including photographs, of large quantities of fish being dumped at sea.

Can the minister tell the House what he has done since that meeting to investigate this potentially devastating information?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I was provided with that information by the trawlermen, I asked officials in the department about the situation of the fish stock. What the member has to acknowledge here is that the issue is whether there is a lot of fish or not enough.

There are divergent views on the stock. I invite the hon. member to talk with the fishermen in South West Nova and in all of Atlantic Canada to check their catch rate. I think the hon. member will have his answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the minister understood my question. It concerned Canso trawler fishermen who said that huge quantities of fish are unloaded on the high seas.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries what he intends to do to look into this potentially devastating situation.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): What I intend to do, Mr. Speaker, is to set up mechanisms to make sure that neither along the coasts nor on the high seas will people be allowed to unload fish into the ocean, as some people claim this is being done. This is why we have introduced the observers program to prevent such situations. I am prepared to work closely with the fishermen to make sure that this kind of activities will not happen again in the future.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the finance committee my question is for the government House Leader.

I am not sure if the government House Leader is aware that on Monday and Tuesday of this week many people requested to be heard on the GST before the committee. The chairman's fax machine was working overtime.

I want to ask the government House leader this. In light of the offer by the chairman of the finance committee, and I quote: "I would be delighted to resign as chairman if that is necessary", can the government House leader now assure the House that the finance committee will be reactivated under a new chairman so that all of these Canadians and many thousands of others can be heard on this very important piece of tax legislation, the GST? Will the committee chairman resign?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, for many weeks and months efforts were made to get the New Democratic Party to co-operate with a reasonable procedure that would allow these people to be heard, allow the bill to be discussed in detail and allow the committee to reach a decision. The New Democrats refused to co-operate with any such effort. Indeed, they are on record as saying they will do everything possible to prevent a decision ever being made by the committee.

Those people were not heard because the New Democratic Party engaged in a 31-hour filibuster which was very entertaining but not too illuminating.

If the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville is suggesting that perhaps we start behaving rationally like mature adults and discuss a procedure for reaching a satisfactory and proper conclusion, I welcome that change. Let us discuss it.

• (1450)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the person who was irresponsible, bullheaded and stubborn was the chairman of the finance committee, and the minister knows that.

We have had requests coming in from dozens and dozens and dozens—in fact hundreds—of people across the country to be heard. If he will not reconstitute the committee under a new chairman, whoever that may be, then just how does he propose to let the Canadian people to be heard on the GST?

They want to be heard. They are against the tax. The provinces are against the tax. Small businesses are against the tax. They do not want it. Why not reconstitute the committee? Why not select a new chairman and let the people be heard? Why are you so anti-democratic in this House?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, under parliamentary reform brought in by this government, the committees are masters of their own fate. The chairman is elected by the committee.

Mr. Rodriguez: You used jackboots.

Mr. Andre: In fact, were I to issue the kinds of instructions he is asking me to issue, I would undoubtedly be found in contempt. The hon. member would be the first to raise a point of privilege.

Mr. Peterson: It never stopped you before.

Mr. Andre: There is one way in which things can be done in a mature, adult fashion, and that is for the New Democrats to start behaving like mature adults.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

FORESTRY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. The Canada-Quebec forest development subsidiary agreement is due to expire on March 31, 1990.

Can the minister tell us whether he intends to renew this agreement and whether he will promote private woodlots, keeping in mind that there are 120,000 private woodlot owners in Quebec and that they supply 21 per cent of lumber used in processing plants?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the agreement on forest renewal is expiring at the end of this fiscal year, and we can point to very impressive results. Naturally, we would be inclined to renew the agreement as expeditiously as possible.

The federal government has always emphasized the restoration and the promotion of private woodlots, and support for the owners of private woodlots as a means of improving and enlarging the wood inventory, not only in the Province of Quebec but throughout Canada. That would be the emphasis we would place on a new agreement as well.

ETHIOPIA

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I would like to ask the minister what is the role for Canada regarding the war in Ethiopia. There are millions of people who are suffering as a result of the war. Are there any initiatives being taken by Canada to speak to each of the sides in the war to bring a resolution to problems that have existed there for decades?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada, along with other countries, has been seeking any means open to us to try to influence that situation, so far without success. We are continuing those efforts.

One initiative that has been undertaken as a result of an informal meeting of members of all parties of this House interested in the proposal, is that we are exploring the possibility of putting together a delegation of parliamentarians from the Parliaments of Canada, the United States, the Soviet Union and Italy to see if they might be able to have some impact on the situation.

The informal committee of parliamentarians that met here suggested that I ask the hon. member for Rosedale, who was a former ambassador to Ethiopia, to undertake that action on behalf of Canada. He has been in touch with the chairman of the United States congressional committee on hunger and is in touch with representatives of both the Soviet Union and Italy.

We hope that group can be formed and that it might have some success in an area where governments so far have been unable to achieve a breakthrough.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question either for the Deputy Prime Minister or maybe the minister from Newfoundland.

I wrote their colleague, the Minister of Energy, a few days ago to alert him to the environmental and economic time bomb which is ticking away off the Newfoundland coast where PetroCan is doing wildcat exploration without the benefit of a back-up rig to drill a relief well in the event of a blow out, and without any capability to clean up the mess if it does occur.

An oil industry report today confirms the worst fears that I stated in that letter. I want to ask the minister this. What guarantee can the government give us that the richest fishing grounds in the north Atlantic will not be wiped out, will not be at undue risk by the current situation as I have described it?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me to answer on behalf of the Minister of the Environment on this particular issue, the licences and the approvals for drilling offshore Newfoundland and off the east coast are managed by the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board.

Any contingency plans, safety measures, or requirement on the company to provide guarantees that the best possible technology is used and the best possible plans are in place to mitigate against such disasters are part of the licensing and the approval arrangement. Every possible precaution is being taken.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the acting minister, the Minister of Forestry.

That is the answer in front of him. He read it well, but the reality is something different. The reality is that a report today by the Canadian Independent Petroleum Association says that we are at risk out there.

There is a rig out there doing wildcat exploration and nothing out there to drill a relief well in the event of a blow out.

I am asking the minister not to hide behind the licensing regulations. I am asking him what he is going to do if the worse comes to worse today, and our fishing grounds are at risk and we have a wholesale, environmental and economic mess on our hands. What then? That letter he just read from? What action will the government take in that case? What action is it taking now to prevent that from happening?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I did not read from any letter. I just read from a document that is a press release from which I assume the hon. member got his information.

Mr. Simmons: No. I wrote the minister a week ago.

Mr. Oberle: My information stems from the regulations, the guidelines and the procedures that are in place, agreed to by the industry to mitigate against such potential disaster.

What the hon. member wants to take into consideration is that we still consider offshore development as one of the major initiatives of this government, in co-operation with the Atlantic provinces, one that has the potential to significantly improve the economy of that area. If the hon. member would suggest that we shut down all of these developments in that area to eliminate absolutely all the risks that are always associated with situations like that, then let him say so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Willowdale. Keeping in mind the time I would ask that the questions be direct.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State told the House, "We follow the guidelines." But, Mr. Speaker, he followed only four of the nine guidelines. My question is: How many other foreign banking companies will you license and give the special treatment you gave to American Express?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that we have not given American Express special treatment. For three years we discussed with them how to bring them under the rules governing banks in Canada. We are dealing here with a company that is already in Canada, is 90 per cent in the financial sector and competes with our banks but is completely unregulated. We thought that if there were a way to bring them under our rules, we could do so. And we had discussions with them for three years. We set guidelines. We asked them to withdraw from some sectors and we have now solved this problem under the Bank Act.

Mr. Speaker: A very, very short supplementary question.

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we have this problem for American Express, but let us get specific. There are other companies doing business in Canada that are in the same position as American Express, major financial institutions such as GMAC, General Electric, Sears-Roebuck and Ford Credit.

• (1500)

What is the minister going to say when these companies come knocking on his door and ask for the same treatment that American Express got? Is he going to say: "Welcome, you don't meet our guidelines but neither did American Express"? Or, is he going to say: "I am sorry, the door is closed. We admit now that we made a one-time sweetheart deal for American Express, the special friend of the Mulroney government"?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, since they have not asked us anything I do not know what I would say.

I would be tempted to tell them that they are not primarily a financial institution, but a commercial organization that has grown into some financial activity. I would be tempted to tell them that they are not widely owned like American Express, that they are not publicly traded in some instances and therefore that in my view at this time they would not be acceptable.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader what business he has in mind for the new few days, possibly leading up to next Thursday.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I will try to answer that question, but it becomes increasingly difficult. In trying to project the business for the week it is based on certain assumptions as to what members of the opposition tell us and what the Standing Orders say. I found out that words can be changed rather quickly in the Standing Orders with respect to notice or notice for the bureaucrats at the table and not notice for the House.

With those caveats, let me say that it appears that tomorrow and Monday will be opposition days, with Monday being the last allotted day. On Tuesday, we may return to second reading of Bill C-65, if it is not passed today. Alternatively, we could call Bill C-69, which is the bill dealing with restraint, for second reading.

My priorities for the rest of this month are Bill C-51, the Income Tax Act amendments and Bill C-26, the Railway Act amendments from the budget of last year. We will have to get together and send another message to those ladies and gentlemen in the other place who will not accept the will of the majority of elected representatives. That is the best I can do at this point in time.

Mr. Gauthier: That is more than I bargained for or expected. Basically we have a program for possibly a month here. The House leader and I know that in this period there are two remaining opposition days. It is not his fault or mine, but that is the way the cookie crumbles in terms of opposition days. Whether or not he likes it, that is the way it is going to be tomorrow and Monday.

On Tuesday, I take it that Bill C-65 will be the order of the day. The hon. minister said he hoped or was not sure, but I would like to have some kind of assurance from him. Indeed he cannot say that we have not kept our word. When I have given my word to him, I have kept it.

For the sake of good planning and because of the necessity of getting our people ready for good debate, I would like to ask him to confirm that on Tuesday we will be debating Bill C-65.

Mr. Andre: Let me say very clearly and absolutely that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has never gone back on his word and has recognized that the proper way to conduct business is for us to discuss these matters and for people to keep their word. I apologize, without reservation, if I left that impression.

The fundamental problem is that I had assumed that 48 hours' notice meant 48 hours' notice to me, but apparently it only means 48 hours to the bureaucrats. That caused our plans to be disrupted. We will have to find some way of having the Standing Orders reflect information to the House.

In any event I would like to assure that it is my intention. The reason for the word "may" is so that I am not accused of breaking my word; there are other matters which may cause me to be pushed off my schedule. I am not trying to be devious. I just do not want to say it "shall" occur and then go back on my word to the hon. member.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I know the Clerk of the House and his staff bristle when they are called "bureaucrats". I just wanted to make sure that that word could be struck from the minister's vocabulary, because we consider the Clerk and his staff as servants of the House of Commons, not bureaucrats.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, would the government House leader not think it wise to hold off calling Bill C-26, to amend the Railway Act, until the Speaker has rendered a ruling on the rightness or wrongness of the legislation and how it is being dealt with by the government? Depending on the Speaker's ruling, the government may find that it has either to withdraw or make substantial changes to the proposed legislation. Does the hon. minister not think it would be wise to hold off calling that bill until after the Speaker has ruled?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would certainly not call the bill if there was some doubt as to it being in order, but I am not aware that that is a serious obstacle. I merely think it is appropriate to have the legislation dealt with since it came from the budget of April 1989. Since April 1989 whole borders have disappeared in parts of the world. Perhaps this House can deal with a piece of legislation after so many months.

Mr. Benjamin: You didn't call it for 10 months.

Mr. Andre: It will be in order. I hope I can get the hon. member's co-operation in dealing with any questions outstanding and finding some way of finally getting it off the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I want to reiterate what I said this morning. Because of the ongoing confusion on the part of the government in managing affairs here in the House of Commons, it should not surprise the Canadian people that to is equally confused about managing the finances of this country.

When I left off at one o'clock I was talking about the small crafts harbour program under the public accounts of Canada. In Ontario alone the boats, the fishermen and all the equipment purchased for a boat in use out of a small crafts harbour bring in $300 million annually in tax revenue to the province and the federal government. It is equally distributed, $150 million to the province and $150 million to Ottawa, but the government only puts $3 million back into the small craft harbours program in Canada, which is 1 per cent.

I was also talking about tourism this morning and commending the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on the excellent work that he has done on the environment. Environment and tourism must go hand in hand, and we have a lot of development and promotion to do throughout the 1990s. It must be remembered that tourism also improves international understanding and peace in the world.

Sometime ago we talked in the House about ministerial travel. That is still an outstanding matter on the public accounts of Canada. This government is the only one left in Canada now that does not submit receipts for ministerial travel. In every province and territory in Canada ministers submit ministerial travel expenses for viewing by their auditor general. Our Auditor General of Canada has yet to see a receipt from any cabinet minister in this government. We will be looking for that statement in the next few days and, if it is not forthcoming, we will certainly want to know why this government is not accountable in that way.

What we are witnessing today is a government that has no shame. This government talks about financial management but does not practise it. The government says it will not increase taxes and then smothers the people in an economic grave of high taxation. This government not only fails to speak for Canadians but ignores their wishes. It is ripping apart the fabric of this country that has taken over a century to put together. It does does not realize that this country is widespread and predominately rural. It fails miserably to respect these established areas and address the problems that they are encountering. Atlantic Canada today is one great example of that. This government has attacked and sold out our once prosperous softwood lumber industry. This government is underhandedly harmonizing the business community and social policies with those of the United States.

This government's policies are the reasons why we have more food banks. I want to repeat this, Madam Speaker: this government's policies are the reasons why we have more food banks in existence in Canada today than we have had since the depression of the 1930s, and then it talks about the great management of public affairs. Such policies are also the reason why we have homeless people sleeping in the doorways of buildings in our larger cities. By wiping out and attacking small town Canada, rural Canada, this government is forcing people into the larger urban areas where the cost of living is out of reach and where they become lonely in the crowd and worse off than they were before.

Only when we have a government that addresses the problems of the people, giving them encouragement to improve themselves in order to meet daily challenges, only then will we have a situation where the people handling the public accounts of Canada can honestly say that the money has been well spent and well invested.

This government must go. From the poll that is out this morning, more than three out of four Canadians agree with that statement. All the rhetoric of this government, all the rhetoric of the Minister of Finance, all the rhetoric of the Prime Minister and the broken promises must be replaced with a Liberal government with integrity and an agenda to bring Canada and Canadians back together again, so that they can live in harmony and with confidence in the future and so that we can also get on with creating additional harmony in the world today and manage the peace that is taking place in eastern Europe.

Canada has always played a major role in world affairs and that is probably the biggest public account we can discuss today, because if we as a nation can add greatly to promoting peace and retaining this peaceful development and transition that is taking place in eastern Europe, we will probably save the world the expense of another world war. That can be the biggest public account one could ever think of.

Madam Speaker, you have been very patient. I thank you very much for that and also for your consideration, when I have had about six interruptions along the way since I started this speech this morning.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, let me start out by saying that I look forward to hearing exactly how we will find somewhere in this country a Liberal Party with integrity. It is something for which I have searched for many years in the history of our country, and I cannot myself say that I have found it, which is not to say that I support this borrowing bill by this government.

We have the remarkable sight of a government with 17 per cent popularity across this country coming to the House of Commons and saying to us: "All we want to borrow is $25.5 billion". With 17 per cent support, "give us $25.5 billion".

I am certain that there have been outrageous demands made by governments throughout the history of the world. There have been outrageous demands made by governments throughout the history of this country. I doubt if we have ever heard anything more outrageous than a government which has just 17 per cent of the people of this country behind it saying to this House of Commons: "Give us the right to borrow $25.5 billion".

For us in the Parliament of Canada to give this incompetent group of ministers, this incompetent group of committee chairs, this incompetent group of members of Parliament, the carte blanche to go out and borrow $25.5 billion would assume that we had some confidence in their ability to manage this economy; that we had some confidence in their competence. I ask you, Madam Speaker: How could we possibly in light of what has taken place over the last few years? Let us be even more precise: in light of what has taken place over the last week, how could we have anything but a sense of complete disregard, complete disrespect, and complete lack of confidence in this government in front of us?

I must give my congratulations to the new minister who introduced this legislation. He is a worthy and honourable addition to this government. That is not something I would say about a great many ministers within this government, but I certainly say it about him. I want to put the point very clearly. In starting his discussion about this borrowing bill, he made the case that this was somehow justified because the budget record of this government was a budget record of success, a budget record which could be believed in by the people of Canada, and a budget record which somehow was doing something positive for people across this country. If we take the most recent budget we see absolutely clearly that it has been a set of attacks on the weakest and most vulnerable groups and people within our government's line of fire.

The Conservatives have attacked the poor with cut-backs to social assistance programs to various provinces. They have attacked aboriginal Canadians with cut-backs in support to groups such as the Assembly of First Nations which has spoken out critically against this government on behalf of aboriginal people. They have cut back support for women's groups which again have been critical of this government. They have also cut back support for the future of our country. For example, they have cut back support for science and technology.

This is a government which says in all its rhetoric that it wants to improve science and technology support and, yet when it comes to the test, when it comes to a budget, science and technology becomes a target for cut-backs, just as has been the case in the past. It is not the first time that science and technology has been attacked.

I see a former prime minister, the right hon. member for Yellowhead in the Chamber. I know that his government gave much more support to science and technology than this government has been prepared to do. Instead, it seems that this government has seen as its goal to talk with fervour and passion about the importance of science and technology to the country and then to turn around and slice and chop and cut so that in fact science and technology did not get the support it needs for the future.

We had a brief this morning in the Standing Committee on Science and Technology which talked about some of the important developments in Newfoundland associated with the attempt to take science and technology and tie it to regional development for that part of Canada. Some very important ideas came forth. The key point that brief made was the importance of seeing to it that there was support for education throughout this country and especially for those people in poorer parts of Canada.

Yet, what do we find along with this budget that the government brought down and about which the minister boasted to proudly this morning? We find that this government has also cut back its transfer payments to the provinces, its Established Programs Financing which is destined to go to education. Education too, so important for our future, has been a target of this government.

Health care has been a target of this government. It comes to us to ask for $25.5 million, and yet it has indicated in its budget no understanding of the sense of fairness which people in this country feel, as shown by its attacks on the poorest and most vulnerable groups.

They have no sense of the importance to the future of this country of science and technology, of education and of health care. How could we possibly feel confident in supporting $25.5 billion of borrowing by this government with such misguided and dinosaur-like views of what is important to our economic future?

We might say that at least the government is being responsible financially. The gold dust twins of the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, have thrown money about like there was no tomorrow right from the start of their period in power.

I looked at The Budget Documents which came out with the budget speech this year. They indicate very clearly—and the people of the country should be aware of it—that when this Conservative government took office the national debt of Canada as at the end of the fiscal year in 1984 was $160 billion. As of the end of this financial year in 1990 the national debt is $351 billion.

These great managers and tremendous business geniuses, these gold dust twins, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, have succeeded in driving the country into a position where our national debt is twice what it was when they took power. Yet, they come to us and talk about fiscal responsibility. Their sense of fiscal responsibility has been to give massive breaks to the wealthy. For instance, they have put into effect a $100,000 exemption for any capital gains tax. How much has that cost in terms of that huge increase in the public debt of the country?

I would like to tell you, Madam Speaker, about one of the most interesting cases I have come across that the government has put into effect. There was a small tire recycling company in Brantford, Ontario which received something in the order of $500,000 in 1983 to get its operations going. It was a disaster. By 1989 the company had gone bankrupt and had not paid back most of the $500,000 it had received.

What did the government do? Three days before the 1988 election the government gave to that same company $2.2 million, not $500,000 but $2.2 million, for a tire factory and also to recycle tires by the same company in Cape Breton. This was despite the fact that the Department of Transport two years before had tested the tires of this company and found that 30 per cent of them were defective. Yet, in order to try to save a seat in Cape Breton, which it lost anyway, the government gave $2.2 million to the same company.

• (1530)

That may seem like a small concern, but to the taxpayers across this country, $2.2 million wasted and $2.2 million given to an incompetent company which had not paid back the money it had received previously strikes me as something which is highly questionable to those Canadians.

I admit that it is a small matter compared to some of the other items of ridiculous waste which this government has put into effect.

I was part of a committee which looked carefully at the sale of the de Havilland Corporation to the Boeing Corporation of the United States. The government in its ideological blindness decided to privatize de Havilland. It sold a company which was worth at least $1 billion, possibly $2 billion—it was never quite clear—for the total price of $90 million. That itself might seem to be enough of an example of incompetence and stupidity on the part of this government.

Let me tell you, this government did not stop there. A few years later the Boeing corporation came back for more. Despite the fact that Boeing had a chance to go through every inch of factory at de Havilland before making that purchase, before signing that deal, Boeing stated, as a naive company, that it just did not realize or understand the problems that it was getting into. That poor Boeing corporation with annual sales of $5 billion per year simply had to ask the government to help it put this de Havilland corporation into a situation where safety measures are up to scratch throughout this factory.

We in our party believe very strongly in such safety measures. We believe they are the responsibility of the owners of companies. Boeing had complete access to every inch of that factory, every document and every piece of material with respect to the financial state of that company, because Boeing testified to that effect in committee. We believe that it was responsible for establishing those safe conditions. Did the Government of Canada show a little bit of backbone to this American company which had already managed to purchase an important Canadian national asset at $90 million, when it was probably worth $1 billion?

No, Madam Speaker. Instead another $160 million was given to Boeing.

It is unbelievable that Canada actually paid the Boeing Corporation of the United States $70 million to take off our hands this $1 billion asset. That is responsibility, Conservative style. That is economic management, Conservative style.

Mr. Parker: That is incompetence.

Mr. Langdon: My colleague says that is incompetence. I think he is too kind. He offers just mild condemnation when absolute abject stupidity is what should be identified with this government for these and other sets of actions which it has undertaken.

When I first spoke in the House back in 1984, I suggested that the government's plans to try to cut back, to slice important social programs, employment programs, programs that helped science and technology would mean that by 1990 we would still have a deficit in this country of over $30 billion. The Conservatives laughed. They said there was no chance of that happening.

Well, Madam Speaker, let me quote from the budget documents for the fiscal year ending 1990 which state that the level of deficit which this government is running on a year-to-year basis is $30.5 billion. Its approach has been, right from the start, prophesized as bankrupt. It is now seen to have been totally bankrupt. Instead of giving this country the economic base to build for the future, it has given us a debt of $351 billion, a year-by-year deficit of over $30 billion, interest rates which are higher than they have been since before this government took power; levels of unemployment which, once more, on a quarterly basis are rising; taxes which have gone up 31 times in the last six years.

All of that is combined with tremendous breaks for the wealthy, such as the exemptions on capital gains tax. Let me give an example of another tax break. Madam Speaker, I know that you would not be somebody who would be likely to do this, but let us say that your are in business and take a group of associates out for a magnificent meal.

If you were to go out after the meal to a private box at a Montreal Expos game or a Toronto Blue Jays game or an Edmonton Oilers game or a Vancouver Canucks game, do you know that you would be able to write off 80 per cent of those entertainment costs against the taxes that your company would owe to the Government of Canada? Those are the kinds of benefits which have been given out by governments in our country.

One of the most important corporations in the City of Windsor is Hiram Walker Distilleries, a corporation which has employed people in Windsor for years. It was subject to a massive takeover bid by Olympia & York, the Reichmann corporation in Toronto which wanted to spend over $2 billion to purchase Hiram Walker.

As it turned out they were not successful in taking over Hiram Walker. If they had succeeded in purchasing Hiram Walker at a cost of $2 billion, they would have had to pay interest on the $2 billion which they borrowed. The interest on that $2 billion would have been deducted from the taxes that Olympia & York would have had otherwise to pay to the Government of Canada. A takeover that would not have created a single job and would in fact have eliminated jobs, would have ended up being paid for by the people of Canada through tax breaks that are built into our system. That is the kind of reality which exists in this country.

It is an approach which has many problems associated with it. Perhaps the biggest problem is the tremendous unfairness which it creates in our country.

Let me say that the average person in my constituency, if he or she goes out to a Tigers baseball game, if he or she goes out for a meal, that person cannot take 80 per cent of the cost off the taxes that they pay. Let me make it very clear, if some of my constituents are watching, please do not let me be seen as suggesting that they try to deduct from their income taxes 80 per cent of the cost of their entertainment.

Of course, they do not get tax breaks. The average person in this country does not get a tax break. The ordinary family in this country does not receive tax breaks. The large corporations do, and that is what we have to change.

That is why we cannot support anything that would demonstrate any confidence in this bunch of incompetents, as my colleague has called them charitably, on the other side of the Chamber. They are a bunch of incompetents who, during the election campaign in 1988, told the people of Canada that if free trade was accepted there would be no problem for social programs. The Prime Minister said social programs would be enhanced.

I did not bring my dictionary, but we have clearly here got a new meaning for the word "enhanced". My dictionary has always said that enhanced means improved, made better. Is that not right?

Now it seems to mean destroyed, cut back, chopped, reduced, because that is what has happened to the unemployment insurance program and pensions. There have been clawbacks on pensions. That has happened to family allowances and transfers to provinces for health care. It has happened in the case of day care and regional development programs. We could go through a massive list of social benefits which have been attacked by a party that at the same time has given out benefits for the rich and for the corporate sector. Yet there are cut-backs for the poor, cut-backs for social programs, cut-backs for the future.

The minister stated at the beginning of his speech today that we had a great budget in front of us. Of course it is the budget that implements the goods and services tax.

I have to say that I am proud to have started a filibuster in the finance committee this week to try to stop this committee and this party from seeing to it that no further witness could be heard on that issue.

Mr. Nicholson: Shame on you. It is an abuse of the parliamentary process.

Mr. Langdon: This government decided that it has heard enough witnesses. It could not take the hundreds of sheets of requests which have come in from groups like the Nelson and District Chamber of Commerce, wanting to be able to speak; the Association of Canadian Publishers saying that these committee hearings should not be shut down; or the Okanagan Mainland Real Estate Board. I point out that these are not exactly the usual groups that communicate with the New Democratic Party. But on this issue they saw that we were fighting, standing up for the rights of small business, for the rights of people to have some democratic chance to speak out.

Mr. Heap: They did not ask the Liberals to speak for them?

Mr. Langdon: No, I am sorry. I have to tell my colleague from Spadina they did not send copies to the Liberal party. For instance, the Wetaskiwin Chamber of Commerce from Alberta wrote to us saying: "The chamber feels that more groups should be heard, as not sufficient people have been given the opportunity to express their dissatisfaction and opposition to the proposed GST." That one is signed by Ron Noel, president of the Wetaskiwin and District Chamber of Commerce.

• (1550)

I could quote from another letter which I received from the Sherwood Park and District Chamber of Commerce, which is also in Alberta. The last time I checked, all of these constituencies from which these various pieces of material have come are all held by Conservative members of Parliament. I quote to you from the Sherwood Park and District Chamber of Commerce which said after the government attempted to shut down the hearings on the GST:

> On March 20, 1990, the Board of Directors unanimously voted to request your committee to continue with the GST hearings for groups that wish to be heard. Closure on the GST hearings is not appropriate for such an important issue.

I could go through sheet after sheet from business groups, trade union groups, hospital groups, teachers groups, groups across this country that communicated absolutely clearly that they did not want these goods and services tax hearings to be stopped. Yet, despite that there was an act which I have to say as a member of Parliament I have never seen an equivalent to in terms of the completely arbitrary, illegal and totalitarian methods employed.

It was an action that ran completely against anything in Beauchesne's, anything in the Standing Orders of this House or the Standing Orders which affect committees of this House, an action completely anti-democratic and completely totalitarian.

These kinds of letters were pouring in to the chair and the clerk of the committee and to myself as a member of the committee. These communications were coming in from across this country, not just from trade union groups, not just from groups in Alberta, but from groups from every province in this country, including solidarité populaire in the province of Quebec, from chamber of commerce groups in the province of Ontario, from small businesses in Saskatchewan, from small business professional groups in the province of Manitoba and the province of British Columbia. There were hundreds of communications telling us that we must not stop these GST hearings before the people of Canada have a complete chance to speak out as they wished to. When people across the country people saw what was taking place, they saw to it to communicate as effectively and as quickly as they could to ensure that their positions were put forward in front of this committee. Because this wave of communication was coming in, the chairman of this committee cut it off. He cut it off in a way that was totally unparliamentary, totally undemocratic, and totally totalitarian.

To conclude, this is a government of incompetence and a government that has acted stupidly. It is a that government continues to act without a sense of strategy or purpose in its economic policy. It is a government which has moved this week to take totalitarian and undemocratic actions which I certainly cannot accept and my party cannot accept. For this reason, we will proudly stand up and vote against giving authority to this bunch of spendthrifts and incompetents to borrow yet another $25.5 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mackenzie—The economy; the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park—Food Banks; the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

There is no period for questions and comments after the first three speeches. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today in this debate.

What is the government asking us to do in Bill C-65? These Tories across the way want us to let them borrow $25.5 billion for public works and general purposes, so they say. I ask you, Madam Speaker, you being the non-partisan person that you are, if you had $25.5 billion, would you give it to those folks across the way? Surely not after the incompetent management that they have provided to the people of Canada and to the public treasury during recent years.

The government across the way has so mismanaged our country that it has succeeded in convincing just about everyone in Canada to vote for someone else. Today a public opinion poll by Gallup came out. I will say this so that the members can understand very clearly.

I see a few members of Parliament from Ontario and they will know that the Conservative Party in Ontario enjoys the support—and I use the word "enjoy"—of some 13 per cent of the Canadian population. That tells us what a good job the government has done. There are probably 13 per cent of Canadians who still believe that Elvis Presley is alive. Those people across the way think that we, the representatives of the people, are going to give them $25.5 billion while only 13 per cent of Canadians think that they can actually run the show. The short answer is, no—nyet.

• (1600)

—not one cent to the Conservatives opposite.

Madam Speaker, not long ago, the government brought down its Budget. In that Budget, the government claimed—the government, how shall I say it, was stretching the truth. I wouldn't go so far as to say it was lying, although I suppose I could, as long as I don't say an individual member is lying, of course. The government was stretching the truth, and I would even say it has an almost morbid tendency to try to embellish the truth for Canadians. They even tried to make Canadians believe the present Budget does not raise taxes. That, Madam Speaker, is not really true. Look, I have some evidence might here of tax increases in the Budget.

[English]

The Minister of Finance in his budget has frozen for two years transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care. Consequently, that is going to cause the provinces to increase taxes. So there is an indirect tax in that measure right there.

In the budget there is also reference to the goods and services tax and the intention of the government to proceed with this item.

On page 135 of the budget it indicates very clearly that the government will end up with a surplus of over $1 billion by replacing the existing manufacturers' sales tax with the goods and services tax. In other words, there is $1 billion tax increase right in the budget on the goods and services tax alone.

We will have to remember that there is deindexation of personal income taxes, which is the same as a 3 per cent increase in taxes, or close to it, every year. There is the clawback of family pensions. I see the Minister for International Trade across the way who will know about the clawback of pensions. That will generate an extra $2 billion. That is $2 billion of tax increases. The government across the way is not telling Canadians the whole truth and nothing but the truth in regard to taxes.

The government tells us we should give it more money, $25.5 billion, because it needs it to run the affairs of state. What did the Tories do with the money we gave them last time? What did they spend it on? Let me give you a few examples.

An hon. member: Give us some examples.

Mr. Boudria: The members across the way are insisting that I give them some details on those expenditures. I can tell that they want us to elaborate on what the government across the way did with the funds.

The government did use funds for things other than building strip joints and locking priests in jail. But it has done both of those things as well. That is just some of the expenditures. And, yes, that does cost money. Incarcerating priests and building strip joints is very expensive. But those are two activities that the government has decided to undertake over recent days and months.

I have an article from The Ottawa Citizen of March 9, 1990, entitled "$111M tax tab well spent, Wilson says". It reads:

> The $111-million tab this year for the proposed goods and services tax was money properly spent, Finance Minister Michael Wilson said Thursday.

"A government has the responsibility to make preparations for legislation it is considering," Wilson told the Commons.

So you see we have $111 million spent by the government toward the administration of a tax that has not yet been approved by the House of Commons and hopefully, of course, it will not be approved at all. Hopefully, after I conclude my remarks today, the members across the way will understand that they have to change their minds and withdraw this offensive provision.

I have another article from The Toronto Star, so obviously it has to be the truth. This article is from July 15, 1989. It talks about the use of government jets by cabinet ministers. I know the Tories are very sensitive about the jets. The former Minister of Transport used to be known affectionately as "Benny and his jets". He no longer is the Minister of Transport. He has been sent off to bigger and better things.

This is the kind of money spent and the usefulness of those expenditures. Keep in mind as I read these expenditures that the government wants us to allow it to borrow $25.5 billion more after it did what I am going to read right now. An article in The Toronto Star of July 15, 1989, which is obviously very accurate and very true, of course, states:

Deputy Prime Minister—took the jet back to Ottawa from the west twice in June,—$84,500.

Defence Minister Bill McKnight took the jet to Saskatoon—$35,000.

On May 30, Grains and Oilseeds Minister—flew to Winnipeg—

—as though there were not flights from Ottawa to Winnipeg—

—$27,000.

In May, External Affairs Minister—used a Challenger to shuttle between Paris, Madrid and Brussels—

Again, there are so many airports in some of those European countries that you have a hard time driving 50 miles without seeing one. Here is the cost of this one:

—$112,500.

An hon. member: Imagine!

An hon. member: Repeat that.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague wants me to repeat this. I will have to do that. "In May of 1989, the Minister of External Affairs used a Challenger to shuttle between Paris, Madrid and Brussels. That cost $112,500". The minister also sent his wife back here on a separate trip which cost $79,000, to add to the amount that I have just stated. Once all that was over, the minister himself decided to fly to Calgary on the jet and that cost another $48,000.

In March, 1989, since the last election, and we are talking about all the reasons why this government should not get any more money because it is not using it right, the Minister of Sport at the time—he has since lost his job—flew from Ottawa to Sherbrooke. That cost $8,000.

As you know, the quickest way to get to Sherbrooke from here is to drive because by the time you go to the airport, warm up the plane, land it and take your car into town, it is just as quick to drive. That would not cost $8,000.

The Associate Minister of Defence went to Vienna to the opening of the arms talks and that cost $96,000 on a government jet. That is all for that particular article in The Toronto Star.

Mr. Crosbie: You must be disappointed.

Mr. Boudria: Let me continue. I have lots more. I want the minister to know that there are a lot more.

Mr. Crosbie: How about Herb and Otto Lang?

An hon. member: What about Pierre?

Mr. Boudria: I am glad the member across the way said: "What about Pierre?" I am so glad to hear that, because in the days when Mr. Trudeau was the Prime Minister, he used to go to China to speak. He would bring eight people with him. Do you remember the last trip that the Prime Minister took to southeast Asia? There were 75 people on the plane. Can you imagine that?

Mr. Crosbie: How much did that cost?

Mr. Boudria: As a matter of fact, he could not use a 10-seater plane. He had to charter a plane from Air Canada in order to put everyone on board.

An hon. member: Is that the one with the video equipment?

An hon. member: That's the one with the champagne dispenser unit.

Mr. Boudria: That tells you just what kind of spendthrifts these governments are.

• (1610)

We all remember when the Prime Minister used to fly with two jets. Do you remember that? The Prime Minister would fly in one jet with a back-up jet that could be seen in the mirror. Just so he would have something to look at in the rearview mirror. That is a backup. You can understand how useful that is. If the plane runs out of gas in mid-air at 35,000 feet he could presumably jump from one jet to the other.

An hon. member: That's tricky.

Mr. Boudria: I know it is tricky, but when you are the great one there are many things you can do. Presumably, the great one figured a way to do that.

I have a few more little goodies here. This is from The Toronto Star of December 6, 1989.

An hon. member: It's a great newspaper.

Mr. Boudria: I know it is a great newspaper, as my colleagues say, and I agree.

The Minister for External Relations used more than $222,000 worth of flying time for trips to Barbados and Africa. The Secretary of State for External Affairs spent $165,000. This is for the period between August 8 and November 7. The Minister of National Defence—remember him, I talked about him in the previous article. He went to Cyprus in a government jet, stopped in Portugal on the way. That cost $179,000.

An hon. member: That is a bad one.

Mr. Boudria: I know it is not much when you are the government and you want the House of Commons to give you $25.5 billion. What is a billion to the government across the way?

I have quite a few examples of this kind of expenditure. The worst offender has to be the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance thinks that he can advertise the GST to such an extent that people will actually like it. That sounds naive, but have you noticed the more he advertises the GST, the lower the popularity becomes of the present government? So, in a way I like the ads because right now the government's popularity is at 13 per cent in Ontario. If it advertises more the government will soon reach a minus factor in terms of popularity. Unfortunately, the taxpayers of Canada just cannot put up with more government advertising and other such useless expenditures.

I have a story from The Globe and Mail of August 22, 1989. It states in this particular ad that the Canadian government will spend a lot of money on ads but this time the ads have been given to a U.S. firm.

It was bad enough that the government was spending money on its Tory friends in Canada. Now it is giving these ads to their friends in the United States. There has been a union of various companies, a marriage of convenience between Foster and McCann-Erickson. This new conglomerate is now going to partake in some of the government largesse in the way of advertising.

I have a list of expenditures for government advertising. Do you know who the top 10 ad spenders are in Canada? Do you think it is General Motors? No. Do you think it is Proctor & Gamble? No. Do you think it is the Tories across the way using taxpayers' dollars?

An hon. member: Yes, probably.

Mr. Boudria: Yes, you guessed right. That is exactly what it is. In 1989, the government across the way spent $76 million of the taxpayers' money to advertise such lovely measures as the goods and services tax.

Quite apart from everything else, I think it is about time the government changed its advertising company if that is the kind of result it receives from all of this. The yield has not exactly been great. If you had invested $76 million of your money, Madam Speaker, and the end result of it was that only 13 per cent of the people thought you had any credibility at all, you would start thinking that you have been doing something wrong.

An hon. member: That's why the Tories went to the U.S.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague across the way wonders if that is why they went to the U.S.

It is interesting to note that the government spent $76 million. Proctor and Gamble, which shows us all its soap and all those other fine things that they do, spends $61 million in a year. That is their business, selling us and trying to convince us that their products are good. At least in their case, people have not stopped buying their products. But people have stopped buying the line of the Government of Canada. General Motors spent $56 million in advertising; Molson, $55 million; Unilever, $46 million; and McDonald's Restaurants spent less than half what the Tories across the way spent in advertising in one year, and all I see everywhere is McDonald's advertising.

So, you can see, Madam Speaker, that the government has not been using the money that we gave it last time very usefully and you can understand the reluctance that my colleagues and I having of giving any new money to those Tories. We are, of course, trying to look at this objectively, as we always do on this side of the House. But, Madam Speaker, you can understand that giving $25.5 billion or allowing these Tories to borrow, even worse, $25.5 billion after they spent our money this way—

Mr. Robichaud: They have more travelling to do.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague from Beauséjour says that perhaps they have a bit more travelling to do. That could be. Maybe they have a bit more advertising in their plans. I know some say that they could use a bit more advertising. Their popularity is not all that great right now. However, I only wish they would use their own money to prop up the Tory fortunes instead of ours, instead of the money that belongs to the Canadian public.

Madam Speaker, I am sorry to have to cut short my speech, because I would have liked to say more, especially about the cutbacks at our post offices and other offensive measures taken by the Conservative Government in its last Budget.

In any case, the short answer to the government's request for permission to borrow $25.5 billion is no, nyet!

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would also like to comment on what was said by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria). In concluding, he said that he was sorry because he could have gone on down the list.

I will be glad to do it for him. If we go back to the year 1983–84, perhaps I may comment on Marc Lalonde's scientific research. A program was supposed—

An hon. member: Time!

Mr. Saint-Julien: I heard an hon. member say "time", because he is in a hurry for me to finish, not because he wants to rise in the House to speak to my comments. I wish he would. I wish he would move that the Government of Canada request a royal inquiry into the theft of the century perpetrated by the Liberals from 1983 to 1984.

He doesn't seem to appreciate that, but he won't be able to yell "time" later on—

Madam Speaker, as part of my questions and comments, I would like to ask the hon. member for Glengarry–Prescott—Russell what he thinks about the theft of the century. It was a scientific program that was supposed to cost $200 million, but officials told Marc Lalonde to stop the program because it was a drain on the budget. This was early in 1984, but Lalonde said: No, we are going to have an election. The program cost exactly $3.9 billion! After months of investigation the Auditor General complained according to the newspapers that it was a disgrace, a waste of money, the $1.9 billion theft of the century perpetrated by the Liberals.

Madam Speaker, my colleague said a while ago that the Challenger aircraft took off from Portugal, made a few stops and flew on to Canada. Of course they have to make a few stops to refuel, otherwise they would never make it to this country.

I would remind the hon. member that they never rose in the House to urge that a royal commission be appointed to look into the $1.9 billion fraud in this $3.9 billion project. To think that some people in Canada—even in Victoria a mechanic got $5 million. He was supposed to prepare a program and do some research on data processing. He got $5 million from the Liberals and today this Victoria mechanic is in Hong Kong writing a book on break dancing. Not bad at all!

Closer to the riding of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, when the Liberals were in office a group of foreign businessmen got $6 million to do research on wartime mini-submarines. After months of investigation the government officials found out that these were old plans of World War II–vintage mini-submarines. They got $6 million for that and then vanished.

But to get back to my story, on February 19, 1990 I said "the worst tax fraud of the century is again the topic of a Globe and Mail article". A moment ago the hon. member referred to several newspaper articles. I will tell him about a recent one, February 7, 1990, reminding Canadians that the Liberals in 1983–84 wasted billions, not millions, but billions of dollars. Using Marc Lalonde's Scientific Research Tax Credits, one Kenneth Ford in 1983–84 was able to cheat the Canadian government of several million dollars, which he invested with impunity in Costa Rica. The former Liberal government had estimated that the program would cost only $200 million, but it ended up costing $3.9 billion.

Madam Speaker, when the hon. member says some things about this government, like members or ministers who travel the world in Challengers, I think that they may just be following the policy of the Liberal government whose members travelled around for 20 years. I am about to put a question on the Order Paper asking for all—I will do it, take note. What did the Liberals do with the Challenger aircraft for 20 years? We will have some little surprises!

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I want to say about this disaster, this theft of the century by the Liberals, the government of the day, that we could have built 50 hospitals in Canada with that $1.9 billion. Think about it! It's serious! $1.9 billion, Madam Speaker. That is what we today call the theft of the century and the Liberals were responsible.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am always delighted to reply to a Member of the Party which asked Giovanni Mowinckel to build at 24 Sussex Drive a wardrobe large enough to accommodate 90 pair of shoes for the Prime Minister. I am always pleased to reply to these people.

I am always pleased to reply to these people who awarded contracts without tender for the construction of Place Vincent-Massey, in Hull, and who renewed leases which have not yet expired to benefit their Tory friends. I am always pleased to reply to these people who pratically gave away Mirabel lands in certain cases to some other conservative friends Madam Speaker and to answer any question they might want to ask.

Mr. Saint-Julien: We kept them for ourselves! Tell us about the fraud of the century!

Mr. Boudria: If I understand correctly, the Hon. Member is seeking information about the area of research and development. I am glad to note this renewed interest in the area, because before the election campaign in 1984, the leader of the Tory Party, in his madness to promise the moon, had committed himself in his very first mandate, to doubling the amount earmarked for research and development.

Well, the amounts which this Governement invested in 1989 in research and development hardly reached that level. The percentage of the gross domestic product spent in research and development when down from 1.37 in 1984 to 1.32 in 1989. Therefore, this Government is showing no interest in research and development, because it is anxious to see this activity carried out in the United States by his Tory friends instead of the Canadian people, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Tell us about the $3.9 billion project. Tell us about the fraud of the century. Tell us about those crooks!

Mr. Boudria: That is the sad record of our Tory friends opposite in the area of research and technology. As a matter of fact, we will deal again with this issue in the House in a few days, because my Liberal Party friends want Canadians to know more about the lack of commitment to research and development of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Saint-Julien: It is a $1.9 billion fraud!

[English]

Mr. Harvey: Madam Speaker, it is always an amusing and edifying experience to listen to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I listened with special attention to the tales he told of cabinet ministers in the current government travelling about the country with astonishingly large entourages and generally wasting the taxpayers' money in such fashion. The member mentioned the more frugal times during the Liberal tenure of the last several years. I would like his comment on one time in particular that I recall. It was an extremely light entourage. I remember there was a time when the Prime Minister travelled to western Canada with nothing but a middle finger.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I am always pleased to respond to my colleague from Alberta. I am pleased to speak to him about government travel. He gave me an excellent opportunity to remind Canadians of a new article which I have just found. This is about the Commonwealth Conference in Malaysia and Costa Rica.

The Prime Minister's entourage, in their brilliance, decided that they wanted to have the Prime Minister's own personal limousine in Costa Rica. What did they do? They took a government plane, I believe a Hercules, loaded two Cadillacs into the Hercules, and flew it down to Costa Rica. Little did they know that the cars here work with unleaded gas while those in Costa Rica do not. Guess what happened. They drove the cars out of the plane and the tanks were empty. They had to load them back on the plane and fly them back here because there was no gas. That is the kind of stupidity that we see from the government people across the way. Then they dare to ask us for $25.5 billion. I repeat what I said before, no, nyet, not one cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Wait until I ask you my question about the 20 years of Liberal administration and the Challengers.

An hon. member: Please, ask other questions!

Mr. Saint-Julien: I know your tricks!

An hon. member: We are telling you a few things, my boy!

An hon. member: Watch out, let us keep a curl tongue!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, order. Thank you. We will all listen to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Langdon: I rise on a point of order. I just wanted to check with you, Madam Speaker, to see that the disturbance which took place at the start of my colleague's speech would not be deducted from his time or anything like that. Could I have your assurance on that?

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I can assure the hon. member that I will not even deduct his intervention.

Mr. Langdon: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to join in the debate on Bill C-65 through which the government is asking us to vote $25.5 billion borrowing authority. This is an amount almost as large as the annual deficit that this government runs, and it is remarkable that it would ask us to vote for it. Of course, it has ways of getting its results without letting us debate very much but I am glad that at least it has allowed us a little time to debate this because there is a serious point that I want to raise, and that is, as has been made clear by the finance minister, the extent to which Canada is losing its sovereignty through being indebted to foreign lenders.

This government started out in September, 1984, by saying that Canada needs foreign capital. It has turned handsprings to reduce all the defences that Canada had to prevent takeovers by foreign capital and reduction of our own capital, but now this government is admitting that in a sense we have too much control by foreign capital.

It is very interesting, in the light of the euphoria in our country and the joy of some people over what is happening in eastern Europe with forums of democracy being brought into eastern Europe that are more familiar to Canada, that our own democracy, with the forums that we like, is finding itself less and less able to do the democratic thing because of our subordination to foreign capital.

It is all the more remarkable because this was apparently never thought of by this government before November 21, 1988. In the months preceding November 21, 1988, this government was promising to spend billions and billions of dollars on every program you could think of. There was no problem. There was no worry about external debt, no worry about the annual deficit. You would like more day care? Certainly, more day care. More of this? Certainly, more of that, and so on.

After November 21, 1988, when this government got elected, partly on the basis of those inflationary promises, the finance minister suddenly discovered that we have a big external debt and a big deficit. So he not only had to wipe out most of the promises he had made, he had also to undo many of the gains that this country had made over the last half century in unemployment insurance and other social programs.

This government wants us to believe that it is the federal debt itself that is the source of all these problems, that if it were not for the federal debt our country would be free. To a small extent that is true because the program spending, the money we spend on the necessary work of government, including social programs, is not what is breaking our budget. It is not what is putting us in the red. In fact, we are collecting more revenue than we are spending on programs.

In fact it is the debt that is putting us further into debt, it is the debt and the interest payments on it that is making it impossible or us to balance our budget, since the government refuses to collect the adequate taxes from the companies and individuals who can pay them. As a result, today we have the weekly corporate welfare bum award presented by the member for Nickel Belt.

The program as a percentage of our gross national product is really quite small. It has dropped from 19.5 per cent of our gross national product to 16 per cent in six years. So it is not that we are living beyond our means. The revenues cover more than our program spending. The hook is this debt which this government has allowed to double in the last six years.

As is well known, we have interest rates that are five points higher than the U.S. interest rates. That is by this government's choice. This government has refused to take action to lower Canadian interest rates. They are also far higher in the real sense than they were during most of our history. During most of our history, real interest rates, the difference between the nominal interest rate and the inflation rate, was about 1 or 2 per cent. Now it is more like 6 and even 8 per cent.

That is what is killing small business. That is what is causing a record rate of bankruptcy in small business. That is why this government claims it has to cut back on the social programs which the Prime Minister used to call a sacred trust. Obviously, he considers them a trust, not in the sense of a sacred trust, but in the sense of a financial trust. But he called them a sacred trust.

Why do we have these high interest rates? It might be just because Mr. Crow and the finance minister are pathologically afraid of inflation. However, more seriously, I think it is because they want a policy that they believe will keep on attracting international capital into Canada and subordinating Canada to an international global interest system.

We had a confirmation of that in January when the interest rate was allowed to drop by a few decimal points. Foreign capital immediately began withdrawing their short term money and chased the interest rate back up again.

The international money markets now have Canada by the throat much more firmly than they did when this government took power in 1984. The finance minister is afraid to confront international capital. In fact, he has decided that since we cannot lick them we will join them which, of course, is good for some people. It is good for the people who are in the business of capital. It is bad for the large majority of Canadian people; men, women and children.

The finance minister claims to be realistic, but in fact what he is doing, according to his own figures, is reducing the standard of living of Canadians. By his own budget figures, it will actually be reduced by over 1 per cent over the next several years. Instead of increasing as a real rate of income, real buying power, it is going to be reduced.

I want to point out what happens to countries which allow themselves to be pushed into this cycle of reducing their standard of living so that they can feed the banks, especially the foreign banks. There is a great deal of experience about this in the countries to the south of North America, that is, in the southern hemisphere mainly. These are countries that used to be the colonies of western Europe, some of which then became colonies of the United States and are now under a sort of neo-colonialist rule by the banks, mainly of western Europe and the United States.

Recently I had the privilege of attending for my party at the subcommittee on external debt of the Standing Committee on External Affairs. I heard the Reverend Jaime Wright, a Presbyterian minister from Brazil and a close associate of Cardinal Arns there in social justice matters. Jaime Wright was brought to Canada to speak for the Canadian Council of Churches during its Ten Days for World Development tour. It was our good fortune that he also spoke to the parliamentary subcommittee on external debt.

He pointed out what has happened to Brazil. This is a warning to Canadians, because Canada has a debt of several hundred billion dollars, as does Brazil. Canada has a smaller population so our per capita debt is even higher than Brazil's.

Jaime Wright pointed out that between 1972 and 1988 Brazil paid $176 billion U.S. of interest on its debt. Yet today its total debt is only $113 billion. In other words, it is paying far more on interest than on capital. He pointed out that between 1980 and 1987, Brazil lost $50 billion in capital. It was transferred to other countries, that is, capital flight, the sort of thing that we notice going on with some of our big real estate operators like Campeau. That $50 billion, he reckons, would be enough to build up all the slums of Rio de Janeiro 50 times. In 1988, the servicing of Brazil's external debt cost $17 billion, which would be enough to build two tunnels under the English Channel.

He particularly attacks floating interest rates, and this is something that advocates of borrowing abroad ought to take account of. He points out that in Brazil and other Latin American and Third World countries there have been enormous losses in the 1980s on account of the floating interest rates. Contracts were signed in 1976 to pay 6.5 per cent interest but they were unilaterally raised in 1981 to 21.5 per cent interest.

He points out further how the Brazilian government, following Brazilian law and using Brazilian courts, could have resisted and withstood that unjust, unilateral robbery of the Brazilian people through the unilateral raising of the interest rates, but it simply did not use the means at its disposal nationally and internationally.

The result of that is that between 1973 and 1985 prices rose for the products that were imported from the more industrialized countries. Since Canada is losing its industry to places like Mexico through the free trade agreement and other agreements with the Maquiladora areas, we are going to be in the same position of paying extortionate prices for imported industrial products.

I have already referred to the capital flight which is certainly a danger to Canada, but I want to quote what he quoted from John Kenneth Galbraith who said: "Senseless governments riding senseless projects obtain senseless loans furnished by bankers no less senseless. This festival of senselessness, which in no way honours the capitalist system and offends the democratic regime, led dozens of Third World countries into bankruptcy in the most astounding process of impoverishment of the poor for the sake of further enrichment of the rich."

There is one way in which that does not quite apply to Canada in that he is talking of Brazil borrowing from foreign banks. In Canada, of course, we have strong banks of our own, or we did until the government began to let in American Express. We will see what American Express does to our strong banking system.

Our banks are among those senseless ones that made foolish loans to countries like Brazil. The banks are now asking the Canadian taxpayers to foot the bill by taking interest rate reductions in return for the money they set aside against those bad loans.

He lists briefly what the external debt has generated, along with this cycle of reducing the standard of living to pay for the external debt, for Brazil: internal debt, economic stagnation, increase in unemployment and underemployment. The Minister of Finance predicts that we will have an increase in unemployment in Canada. He also includes decrease of salaries and decrease of food intake. There are a growing number of people, especially children, in our major cities in Canada who have to depend on charity at the food banks for their daily bread.

When I grew up I understood that Canada was an agricultural country, that we produced food, we even produced enough food to sell. But it turns out that we are becoming more and more dependent on imported food for the actual eating business in our cities, and that there are more and more people who cannot afford to eat, who can only eat if somebody, in charity, gives them some of the food that is surplus to the great multinational corporations that control our food distribution industries. So there is a decrease of food intake. There is a decrease of health conditions in Brazil.

We see this government willing to decrease the money that is available for the public health insurance system in Canada. As surely as the night follows the day, there will be a decrease in health conditions. In the rich province of Ontario there is more money for a few people's heart surgery and less money for battered women's shelters. One doctor pointed out in The Globe and Mail that far more women die for lack of shelter in those battered women's shelters than there are people who die for lack of facilities to do heart surgery.

Of course, there is inflation. I will not compare the Brazil inflation figures with ours, because Brazil is much farther down this unhappy road than is Canada. I am very concerned, though, that Canada has already taken several steps down this road. This slogan of short term pain for long term gain is just a little bit wrong. This policy really amounts to short term pain for long term more pain. Canadians ought to be warned against what this government is doing.

In closing, I want to call on the government and the Canadian people to stand up to the banks of this world, whether they are the banks of Canada, the banks of the United States, the banks of Japan or the banks of western Europe, and to put first things first.

An economy is not primarily intended to produce figures in what is called the gross national product. That is an abstraction. It is not primarily intended to produce this or that interest rate. It is not primarily intended to produce any index of wealth. It is primarily intended to feed people, to clothe people, to provide shelter for people, to provide education, to provide medical care, to provide all the necessities of life. That is how an economy should be measured.

Our economy is called successful because of our gross national product and indices like that, but there are more and more people begging for food in our cities and more and more people sleeping on the streets in our cities. In the wealthy city of Toronto, the estimate is closer to 20,000 than to 10,000 people who are without homes. You can sometimes see them sleeping in the streetcar shelters. You can sometimes see them sleeping in the stairwells of parking garages.

This is a sick way of approaching the economy of a country that is so wealthy and in which more and more of the people are plainly poor. I want us to begin to construct an economy by saying, "What do the people need? How shall we produce it, and how shall we finance the means of doing that?", instead of starting at the other end and saying, "What would the bankers like to take from us and will there be anything left over for our children to eat?"

If this government does not do it, or if it is not thrown out of office by somebody who does do it, we are going to follow the same path as Brazil has taken.

As a beginning, I am satisfied that with my party I shall be voting against this bill to borrow $25.5 billion because this government is thinking only in terms of its relationship to the banks and not in terms of the well-being of the Canadian people.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Spadina has made a very thoughtful speech, largely about the issue of external debt of countries. I think he has done well to place before us the serious dilemma that is faced by countries which have that amount of debt and the cost of it, particularly in human terms.

We are aware that now the net flow is to the developed countries, paying interest to service the debt, which is just the contrary of what it was in 1970. There was a $40 billion net flow to the developing countries then and now it is an annual net flow of some $40 billion from the developing countries to the developed countries, just in payments to service the debt.

It is a serious global problem. The costs of the debt are being paid particularly by the weaker and younger children in poorer countries who are not able to continue in school. The teachers are no longer there because they are not paid. There is no money to pay the capital expenditures for education. I am not talking only about buildings, but even about books and school supplies.

We also see those same weaker and younger people paying the cost of this indebtedness in health care with the closing of clinics, and the inability of a number of fairly major countries to buy vaccines and supplies which they need because the money just is not available any more. I think that all Canadians lament seeing medical clinics and projects that we have taken pride in seeing developed through CUSO, CIDA and many non-governmental organizations, being closed.

I think the hon. member did well to raise the subject of that debt in the context of the borrowing bill which is before us. I do not share all of his conclusions as we are of different political persuasions, but I certainly appreciate that he has raised this issue.

I would like to ask him a question relating to his reference to Brazil and the position of the banks. Anything which is before us now, of course, relates to loans and grants being made by the government, not through the banking system. A component of the amount of money that the government is seeking to borrow through this bill relates to our external aid.

I want to invite the hon. member to comment on the change in Canada's policy in respect of loans. This government, under the leadership of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, changed the policy just a few years ago from making loans to countries from which we knew there would be no hope whatsoever of repayment, to making grants to them. We have accepted the fact that we are a wealthy and prosperous country. We do have a global responsibility and if we are going to be sharing financial assistance with others, we should do it, not in the form of a loan when we know there is no hope of getting that back and allowing interest to accrue, but by putting all of our assistance on a grant basis.

In furtherance of that, we have forgiven indebtedness. That was done first with the African Commonwealth countries and then with the francophone African countries. In just the past few days the Prime Minister announced the forgiveness of indebtedness to Commonwealth countries in the Caribbean as fulfilment of this Canadian policy.

All of that cannot be separated from the current issue of the government's financial position and I would invite the hon. member to share any further thoughts as to whether he supports this new policy of our government. Does he see it as a helpful and positive step to the serious problem of external debt which he has properly raised before us?

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for his very helpful extension of the point I was making. I did and do welcome the Canadian government's decision to forgive loans of some of the sub-Saharan countries and to some of the Caribbean countries.

I understand that in the case of the sub-Saharan countries the actual commercial value of the loans had sunk so far that the loans were almost entirely unrecoverable. What was being given at that point was not nearly the face value. What was originally given, of course, had been the face value, but what was forgiven was really only the shell of what the loan had formerly been. I assume that it is more or less the same in the case of the Caribbean loans.

Nevertheless, to lift that moral burden off the backs of some of the very poorest people in the world is an excellent thing to do. I believe it is a small start in the right direction.

We have several times as large an amount of loans under the Canada Export Corporation, at least in the case of the sub-Saharan countries, which nominally are loans to those countries but functionally are loans to our exporters. That is going to be a more difficult matter to resolve but I hope the government will take it up in the same spirit that it has acted so far.

Basically, Canada must talk with the other nations of the world that have creditor banks. Nations with creditor banks are also debtors, and the biggest case of that is the United States of course. We must talk with the nations of the world that have creditor banks to get those interest rates down. If the Government of Canada considers it is impossible for Canada to act alone in its own interest rates, and I do not know whether I agree with that or not, but if it does, then its obligation is to take it up with the G-7 and with any other countries that have creditor banks lending at extortionate rates, immoral and economically foolish rates, and have the world interest rates brought down to the point where they no longer destroy the economy of Brazil and threaten the economy of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The House resumed from Monday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse:

Private Members' Business

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their livestock; and on the amendment of Mr. Funk (p.4792).

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate. Stabilization for farm-fed grain is an important issue for farmers in many regions of this country.

Farmers who market their grain through recognized purchasing establishments receive income protection through the Western Grain Stabilization Program and the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Farmers who grow grain to feed to livestock receive assistance and specific consideration related to the value of feed grain indirectly through livestock stabilization programs.

In addition, Canadian grain farmers have received considerable support from the federal government in recent years to help them through particularly difficult periods of depressed grain prices.

The last decade was not an easy one for Canadian grain and oilseed farmers. During the mid-1980s, grain prices hit lows that could not be foreseen during the boom times of the previous decade.

The international trading arena became a nightmare for Canadian farmers. The largest grain exporters, the United States and the European Community, battled to get a larger piece of the grain market pie. They drove world prices down through the use of export subsidies.

At the same time, widespread drought in 1988 plagued both the prairies and regions of eastern Canada. Farmers had to cope with shrivelling crops and low prices all at once.

Throughout these difficult times, the federal government rallied to the aid of Canadian farmers to the greatest extent possible. The government's record in support of agriculture in recent years speaks for itself.

In 1986 and again in 1987, the federal government provided financial support to grain farmers through the Special Canadian Grains Program. A total of $2.1 billion in direct assistance to farmers was provided over those two years.

Assistance through the special grains program was provided for a number of crops. Individualized payments were made on the basis of how much—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please. Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member.

The hon. member spoke on this motion for one minute at one point but was not in the House when it resumed. Hence, she has lost the possibility to speak on it again. I made a mistake in recognizing her today.

Unfortunately I cannot recognize the hon. member again, as she has already spoken on this bill although but for one minute.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

When we run into problems such as this often unanimous consent will resolve them. I would be prepared to give my consent to forgo the rules to allow the hon. member to complete her speech. I presume that that same privilege would be granted by the other party.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If I can have unanimous consent, I would be delighted.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I ask the hon. member to forgive me for having interrupted, but I really had no choice.

Mrs. Feltham: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I also thank my colleagues.

The 1987 program also included coverage for summer fallow acreage in western Canada.

The federal government also came to the aid of farmers with the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program. This program was developed in response to the drought of 1988 which caused heavy crop damage in many regions of Canada.

In western Canada the 1988 crop totalled just over 31 million tonnes in comparison to a slightly below average 40.7 million in 1989. Farmers who suffered the most severe drought losses in 1988 were assisted through the $850 million federal drought program, which was applicable to all parts of Canada.

In addition, the federal government improved crop insurance programs to strengthen protection for farmers from similar catastrophes. In 1989, as a result of the severe drought losses of the previous year, the federal government reviewed the crop insurance program. As a result the program is more responsive and coverage is more extensive.

For example, before the changes to crop insurance in 1989 the payment for wheat on stubble in Saskatchewan would have ranged between $32.23 and $52.91 per acre, depending on the risk area. In 1989 the payment for wheat on stubble in the same risk area would range from $49.81 to $85.17 per acre. That is considerably higher coverage.

These changes to crop insurance demonstrate how the federal government is responding to the need for farm income stability. A bill is currently before the House which will result in further improvements to the crop insurance program. The special assistance programs I have mentioned helped farmers with assistance when it was most needed.

But as we know, providing ad hoc assistance is not the most desirable away to produce a sensitive, responsive safety net for Canadian grain and oilseed farmers. Farmers from all regions agree that they need a comprehensive regional safety net program which is fair to all grain and oilseed producers.

Efforts to achieve that are under way. As part of the federal government's agricultural policy review, a special committee of industry and government is working now to develop proposals for a new national grain safety net program.

The Grains Safety Net Committee was formed following a national agri-food conference in Ottawa last December. At that conference it was agreed that we had to move urgently on the development of a better safety net for grain farmers. Our Minister of Agriculture gave this issue a high priority and put it on the fast track.

This committee is looking at a number of different safety net options for grain and oilseed farmers. It is expected the committee will be ready to present its proposals to federal and provincial agriculture ministers in late spring.

The Grains Safety Net Committee is just one of many similar groups now working on agricultural issues as part of a comprehensive agricultural policy review.

Defining the problems facing farmers was the first step in this review. Now the job at hand is to develop options, consult with the industry on these options and, finally, take decisions. This applies in all areas under review: marketing, trade development and value added, financial management, safety nets, supply management, transportation, food safety and quality, and sustainable agriculture.

• (1710)

Grain and oilseed farmers are among those most in need of income stabilization at this time. The federal government is responding to that need, as it has done in the past.

The federal government is clearly committed to ensuring, to the greatest extent possible, that our grain and oilseed industry remains viable and productive. Our producers have not and will not be left at the mercy of international trading practices or extraordinary weather conditions over which they have no control. The government's record is proof of its concern.

The policy review is added proof. This wide-ranging review is designed to address concerns with a view to building a healthy, prosperous future for the Canadian agri-food industry. It is the most comprehensive review of Canadian agriculture ever undertaken.

At this time it makes sense to look at the issues such as stabilization for farm-fed grain in the context of the over-all policy review. Now is not the time for piecemeal changes. Now is the time for dealing with issues in a comprehensive way. It is a way that will bring lasting benefits to all Canadian farmers.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to speak on this motion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

The motion only asks the government to consider doing something about the effect of paying stabilization on grain that is sold commercially but not paying stabilization on farm-fed grain.

I have to commend my colleague for bringing in a motion like this one because it is time well spent.

When you stop and look at the rationale behind the motion, you have to realize that those producers who grow their own grain are always in the same cycle. When the prices of grain are low, the livestock prices are low as well.

I hope hon. members opposite vote in the true spirit of this motion and not oppose it simply because it comes from this side of the House.

I can tell you from past experience that the way the stabilization act works now is not fair. A farmer who produces his own grain for consumption by his own herd of cattle or hogs cannot be part of the program since he has to subtract what he purchased from what he sold. There is no net benefit.

However, if a farmer is the sole producer of grain, he can be involved in the stabilization program. If he is the purchaser of feeds, he cannot benefit from that.

I believe that a sale should be a sale, no matter which way it goes. As my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings mentioned last month, whether he sells as a primary producer, whether he sells to the local grain elevator his own grain enterprise in a farming operation, a hog enterprise or a beef producing enterprise, a sale should be a sale.

The current Western Grain Stabilization Act is not fair. The agricultural industry has been waiting and asking for changes to this legislation for a long time.

I remind the House that the following organizations support this kind of move: the three prairie wheat pools, turkey producers, the Sheep Marketing Agency, the Pork Producers Marketing Board, the Milk Marketing Board, the Egg Producers Marketing Board, the chicken producers, the Canadian Pork Council, the Ontario Cattlemen's Association, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the UPA of Quebec which is probably the largest farm organization in Canada, as well as many other groups and individuals.

Farmers who chose to use all the grain on their farm were in effect told by the signals of the stabilization act that their type of production was no longer needed and was not appreciated. The end result was that they received less money for their grain production than their neighbour down the road. It sounds like the drought assistance program, and we all know what happened with the drought assistance program.

The mandate that the government gave the review committee referred to boundaries. The Lord knows no boundaries. Mother nature knows no boundaries.

A lot of people in my riding averaged seven bushels of beans to the acre and 48 bushels of corn to the acre when the five-year average for beans was 50 bushels and for corn 142 bushels. These people received nothing. This year for their start-up they have no funding. The program was a disaster.

The administration of the proposal in the motion will not be as difficult as members opposite will say. It has been tried in Alberta, and it is now being copied in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The formula is there.

It could be applied under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and under the Western Grain Stabilization Act, to provide a payment for farm-fed grains.

There would no longer be discrimination against those producers who chose to feed dairy cattle, poultry or livestock on the farm.

In this House we must all be vigilant to protect our agricultural industry. It is certainly important in my riding and we wonder about the government's priorities. Kent County grows 11 per cent of Ontario's corn production. Agriculture is the strength and an attribute for my riding. In Canada agriculture is the third largest industry. As we enter a period of transition and uncertainty, we must build our strength while coping with mother nature and government cut-backs.

I believe that now our farmers not only have to worry about mother nature and the big banks, but a federal government that has abandoned them. I was pleased to host some of my colleagues last week as we met with southern Ontario marketing boards and individual farmers. Joining me were the hon. members for Lambton—Middlesex, Algoma, Prince Edward—Hastings, and Essex—Kent. We listened, and we learned. There were over 47 briefs presented that afternoon by the different organizations.

All the farm groups appreciated the opportunity to discuss the future of agriculture in Ontario and in Canada. They say that the current government is not prepared to listen to our concerns. They were quite shocked that we were there to hear their concerns, to compile their problems, and to come up with solutions for them.

A $401 million cut to the agricultural budget is not a good sign for an industry in transition and facing uncertainty. It is why I am hopeful that government members will support this motion, to show their commitment to fairness in agriculture.

As we all know, the government has introduced what it calls a discussion paper on the future of agriculture, while it is cutting program after program. It has drastically altered crop insurance, changed the At and East Program and eliminated the interest free provisions in the advance payments programs, and others, while the Minister of Agriculture says it is difficult for farmers to make long-term plans. Perhaps the minister could better spend his time defending farmers and agriculture from a finance minister who has no idea of the programs he is cutting.

The current stabilization act is not fair. This motion from the hon. member for Mackenzie requests that the government consider changes. Rather than take something away from producers, the government should make an improvement to it.

Everyone involved, producers and farm organizations, are more than willing to sit down and make some positive suggestions. In a spirit of good will and in support of our farmers, I hope the government and all the members of this House vote in support of this motion.

Too often, perhaps, agriculture is overlooked as a priority in Canada. This motion goes some way to improving the lot of our farmers and making the Western Grain Stabilization Act more fair.

I will be supporting the motion.

• (1720)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to say a few words on the issue of including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Program and the Agricultural Stabilization Program.

As my colleagues have pointed out in the course of this debate, the issue of farm-fed grain cannot be considered in isolation from other agricultural policies.

Adding farm-fed grain to these stabilization programs seems like the easiest way to acknowledge the contribution which farm-fed grain makes to our agricultural economy. But changing the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act to include farm-fed grain would create a new set of inequities, so we must discuss the issue of farm-fed grain in the over-all context of farm safety net programs.

Right now the federal government is undertaking an extensive review of all agricultural policies and programs. This is certainly one that I welcome. Quite apart from the subject of grain which we are discussing, I know it will be of considerable interest to the fruit farmers of my area.

This government recognizes the urgent need for a safety net program for all farmers, so the Minister of Agriculture has asked, among others, the National Grains Bureau to establish a committee on grain safety nets. The committee includes representatives of both industry and the provinces.

The issue of how farm-fed grain is included in grain safety net programs is likely to be discussed as part of the committee's work.

The agricultural policy review is one of the most comprehensive ever undertaken. It began with the release of the discussion paper Growing Together to which the last speaker alluded. The paper outlines the major principles for building agricultural programs and policies to meet the challenges of the future. Those principles are market responsiveness, self-reliance, regional sensitivity and environmental sustainability.

Market responsiveness means aggressively going after markets both at home and abroad. It means concentrating on producing what the market wants and needs.

Self-reliance means getting reasonable returns from the market-place. We will continue to play an important role in supporting that sector and in ensuring that that takes place, but the policies and programs which we have in place should not at the same time distort market signals.

Regional sensitivity means putting programs in place which will reflect regional strengths and advantages, but at the same time these programs should take regional diversity and aspirations into account.

Finally, environmental sustainability means preserving the soil and water resources for future generations. It also means ensuring a wholesome, safe and nutritious food supply. That is in everyone's best interest.

Based on these principles, the paper discusses the issues and the need for change in seven key areas. They are marketing, trade development and value-added processing, financing and managing the family farm, safety net programs, supply management, agriculture transportation, food safety and quality, and sustainable agriculture.

These were the topics for sessions during the National Agri-food Policy Conference in Ottawa last December. Over 1,800 people were at the conference. All sectors of the agriculture economy were represented, from farmers to processors to consumers.

The federal government put the discussion paper and the conference together as a starting point. We wanted to find out if industry and the provinces were willing to work with us in developing policies for the future. Most of the delegates agreed that we should pursue a policy review, and that is what we are doing. Committees with representation from both levels of government and from industry have been set up to deal with the seven main areas that I just identified.

Let us talk about market development and value added. A government-industry committee has been established to look at how competitive we are and how we can become more competitive in a changing market-place.

Another committee will look at how Canada can lead in value-added production. The National Grains Bureau has been working on encouraging value-added production in the grains and oilseeds sector, and the bureau will continue its work.

Looking for value-added opportunities in the international market-place is important as well, but there are things we can do here at home to promote that kind of activity. First, governments have to ensure that their programs and policies do not discourage value-added activity. The Federal-Provincial Market Development Council will be suggesting ways to do this as well.

It may not be well known, but it is a fact that there are 169 barriers to trade between the provinces right now. We are taking steps at our level to eliminate those barriers. Agriculture ministers have signed a memorandum of understanding on the issue. Establishing a binding dispute settlement mechanism to deal with interprovincial trade barriers on an ongoing basis is another important initiative in this area.

A government-industry task force has also been established to look at the management needs of farmers. Over the next six months the federal government will be consulting with industry to develop options for helping farmers improve their management skills.

In the area of supply management, two task forces are already in place: the dairy task force and the poultry task force.

A government-industry steering group has been established to deal with three key issues in the area of transportation policy: the Western Grain Transportation Act, feed freight assistance and minimum compensatory rates. We hope that decisions on these issues will be possible by the end of this year.

Food safety is another area of concern in the agri-food industry. More consultation and communication is needed so that consumers and industry understand the system better and are more involved in the policy-making process. A number of mechanisms are already in place for these consultations. They include the the National Food Safety Advisory Group, the Salmonella Review Board and the Pesticide Registration Review Board, to name just a few.

Another important step is the Conference on Food Safety being organized. It will take place in just a few days in Toronto.

Finally, a federal-provincial committee on sustainable agriculture is in place. A discussion paper outlining the federal position and provincial perspectives should be ready by the end of June. Extensive consultations will be held on the paper and options will be tabled with the agriculture ministers at their annual meeting.

I have outlined the steps being taken in the policy review very briefly. We are facing a number of tough issues. For the purposes of this debate, how we include farm-fed grain in income stabilization programs is just one. We have to look at issues surrounding the Western Grain Transportation Act and the whole area of agriculture in particular.

As I said, in my area we have grain farmers, dairy producers and fruit farmers. They are very interested in this discussion. This is a debate in an area I have followed very closely because I, along with other members of this House, would like to see one comprehensive policy that will ensure not only their survival but promote their prosperity. We believe that would be not only good for the farmers of this country; it would be good for all Canadians.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion presented by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party, that in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act, so that producers will be eligible for certain programs, even if they do not sell the grain they harvest.

Madam Speaker, I read the motion only a few minutes ago, but I decided to take a few moments to support this motion because the subject has been raised by farm producers in my riding. In fact, in my riding, producers are not covered by the Western Grain Stabilization Act but by the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I am told there was an amendment to the motion, to include the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I therefore welcome this opportunity to support the amendment, as well since if the legislation is amended as proposed in the motion and in the amendment, farm producers in my riding will be eligible for coverage when they use their crops to feed their own livestock.

The problem is as follows, Madam Speaker. A farmer can raise certain crops, sell them and, of course, be eligible for the stabilization programs I just mentioned. If a producer has his own livestock, the crops used to feed his livestock are not eligible for the same coverage. This puts farm producers who raise crops and livestock at a disadvantage, compared with producers who specialize in only one of these areas. That is why I felt I had to take a few minutes to show my support for this initiative, and I hope this debate will not take too long and that we will have a positive vote on this motion. Of course, I hope the amendment will be passed so that areas in Eastern and Central Canada will also benefit. And then, of course, the motion as amended can enjoy the support of more members of the House and help more Canadian farmers.

I just heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice say in his speech—and I hope that I am summarizing faithfully what he told us—that we could not consider this bill apart from all kinds of other government initiatives. It may be true that some other government initiatives help some other agricultural sectors, but I must still point out that the livestock industry, for example, is very cyclical, with ups and downs. In view of this, I think that the House should adopt this motion and encourage the government to make the desired changes to the program. So, Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me too to join those who want this motion and the amendment passed.

[English]

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today on this motion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie which states in part: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing". That is a typical motion that is usually put by opposition members. It does not give any direction to the government. If the motion had stated that the government "should introduce measures", rather than just "consider the advisability" that would have been more appropriate.

Mr. Boudria: It would have been out of order.

Mr. Soetens: What I have is a more appropriate response to the issue that the member is trying to raise. It is not just the matter of the issue of the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

The federal government is currently undertaking a very comprehensive review of all of the agriculture policies in Canada. The goal of the review is to work with industry, the provinces, and with producers, in particular, to map out a national policy for Canadian agriculture.

The review includes all farm safety-net programs. The issue of how farm-fed grain should be dealt with under grain income stabilization programs is under discussion.

I am sure, as you can hear, Madam Speaker, there are many members who are already cheering the very wise statements that I am making in this particular presentation about the good things the government is doing.

This issue cannot be looked at in isolation, as is suggested by the motion in front of us. Including farm-fed grain in stabilization programs is an important issue, but one which must be looked at in the context of all agricultural support programs. The agricultural stabilization program and the western grain stabilization program provides regional support to producers when grain prices drop below a five-year average.

Concern has been expressed that the two programs discourage the use of grain as feed on the farm and promote off-farm sales instead. Livestock producers in both eastern and western Canada have asked that farm-fed grain be included under these two programs, and I can certainly understand the reasons for the request.

However, to do this would mean fundamental changes to the structure of both programs. The programs would have to change from being marketing-based to production-based. This in turn raises additional issues.

Yield data would be essential to any new production based formula, and since individual yield histories may be unavailable or difficult to obtain administration would have to be based on regional yield averages. Just a little while back a member from the Windsor area talked about some of the yields that some of the farmers in his area were gaining on beans and corn, so there really would be a problem in arriving at those yield numbers. Payments based on regional averages could mean overpayments to producers with yields below the regional average while those with higher yields would in fact be penalized.

In addition, a production-based ASA or western grain stabilization assistance could result in stabilization payments at times when livestock returns are adequate or higher than average. Other stabilization programs such as the dairy program already include consideration of the costs of farm-fed grain. Some producers could be compensated twice for the same grain.

The Standing Committee on Agriculture which examined the issue of farm-fed grain in its January 1986 report on the Western Grain Stabilization Act agreed that livestock producers could be paid twice if farm-fed grain was included under either of the programs. Their report stated that it should be only for the final products marketed that the producers receive market-risk protection under the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the other act. In the case of livestock producers, they face the livestock market but not the grain market risk. Treating livestock producers as grain producers means the grain may be covered in a raw form and again it goes into the final product.

While including farm-fed grain under either program may give livestock producers more protection, it may also remove protection provided to grain producers when delivery opportunities are reduced. For example, the Western Grain Stabilization Act is designed to trigger payments when reduced deliveries result in reduced sales. That type of protection would not be provided under a production-based program.

The final point is that including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the other act would make both programs more expensive.

Currently, livestock support programs include the price of grain in the formula for triggering payments. When grain prices rise, support prices for livestock also increase. Although the cost of producing farm-fed grain may not be accounted for under existing livestock support programs, actual expenditures for input items are part of the Western Grain Stabilization Act payment calculation.

As an alternative, the cost formula for red meat stabilization programs could be amended to incorporate the cost of producing grain rather than the price of grain itself. This would give better protection to producers who produce their own livestock feed.

The Road Not Taken, a study done by producers through the National Grains Bureau's Grains 2000 program, emphasizes that the livestock sector represents a major opportunity for value-added and diversification in the agricultural sector. However, producers who must buy feed for the livestock might not receive adequate protection under a formula which incorporated the cost of growing feed, not its market price.

These are some of the options under discussion in the farm-fed grain issue. Clearly, this government recognizes the significant role farm-fed grain plays in the Canadian agricultural economy. Excluding wheat, approximately half of all cereal crops produced in this country are fed to livestock. The proportion is even higher in the maritimes. Even when wheat is included, close to 30 per cent of cereal crops are fed on farms.

That is one of the reasons this government—a government I am a member of—is conducting a review of grain safety nets as part of the over-all agricultural policy review.

• (1740)

The process of reviewing grain safety-nets began with a series of regional meetings between the farm leaders and government in 1988. Meetings were led by the hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. Farm-fed grain was an important issue at every one of those meetings.

A grains safety-net committee was established soon after the agricultural policy conference in December, and the committee has met three times in Winnipeg since then to discuss options for a national stabilization program. Recommendations are to be made to government this spring, followed by further discussions with industry. The committee is made up of farm leaders and government representatives from all regions and provinces in Canada. Farm-fed grain is an issue which has been raised at each and every one of these meetings.

Options being considered by the committee include an program in which federal and provincial governments, as well as producers, would share program costs. Other options include a program of individual price guarantee contracts; a full cost of production guarantee; an individual farm gross revenue guarantee; and an individual net revenue stabilization plan.

These and other options are being carefully examined and fine-tuned by the grain safety-net committee and the National Grains Bureau. Committee recommendations are to be included in a report for release this spring.

The government's goal is to develop fair, realistic and acceptable solutions to the problems and issues facing the agricultural sector. A vital part of the review process is discussion at the farm organization level. Farm leaders from all major producer organizations have been involved with a view to developing a grain stabilization plan which could be adapted to suit all agricultural sectors.

It was my pleasure just two weeks ago to mail to many of my constituent farmers the request for them to participate in this whole discussion process. It was not only to participate but to give them some basis of how they might submit their personal concerns and issues to the department. I know the government is consulting very closely and working with farmers to try to solve their agricultural problems.

In conclusion, simply tinkering with the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the ASA will not be enough. Instead, let us continue to look at stabilization of farm-fed grain in the context of all agricultural stabilization programs and work to developing a new, comprehensive approach which will better suit all sectors of the industry.

It has been my pleasure to present this view in this debate today and I hope that members will keep that in mind as we go forward to deal with this particular resolution.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to the motion that the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act, most especially to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their own livestock.

When we consider the inclusion of farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act, we have to bear in mind that such a move is not as simple as it may sound. To add farm-fed grain to the WGSA and ASA framework certainly would require fundamental changes to these programs.

However, cost is really only one of the number of factors we must consider as a government. A basic change would have to occur in the structure of the WGSA and ASA themselves if we were to do this. That is, the programs would have to be changed from marketing-based to production-based programs. It is a major change that would in itself present another set of issues.

The programs, as they were designed, are based on commercial grain sales. If we were to add farm-fed grain, for which data is difficult to obtain, we would have to base payments on production. In that case, yield data would be essential to this kind of formula.

Individual yield histories may be difficult to obtain, we think, and that would leave regional yield averages as the base for the program. Using that kind of data would create inequities because the producers with high yield could be penalized and those with low yields could very well be over-compensated.

There are other problems with a production-based WGSA or ASA. First, a production-based program could result in stabilization payments at times when livestock returns are adequate or higher than average.

It would also remove some of the protection that producers now have from low marketings when export opportunities are reduced. For instance, the WGSA is designed to trigger payments when farmers' delivery opportunities are reduced and they cannot market very much of their grain. A production-based program would not provide that kind of protection.

We could look at other ways to include farm-fed grain in the stabilization framework. One of those would be to include the cost of grain production in livestock support programs. Currently, the market price of grain is usually included in the calculations to determine support.

Dairy programs, at least to some degree, include the cost of producing grain in support calculations. Including the cost of producing grain in the livestock support calculations would cause livestock support prices to rise when the cost of producing grain increases. The positive note in this option is it would provide an incentive for some producers to produce both grain and livestock in order to be eligible for grain stabilization payments. The downside is that it would work against producers who buy feed for the livestock that they are raising.

Another option that has been discussed is to stabilize revenues from grain and livestock operations jointly. This type of program would be targeted at over-all situations instead of looking at grain and livestock separately. It would have to be operated at the farm level to take into account differences in the importance of each enterprise.

These are some of the options that have been discussed in the past. Farm-fed grain is clearly an issue that should be addressed. But this government is examining grain stabilization in the context of a review of all agriculture stabilization programs.

Over a year ago, representatives of this government, led by the hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, held a series of regional meetings with farm leaders to discuss grain safety nets. A subsequent meeting was held in Winnipeg in January, 1989. At that time, farm leaders from all regions of Canada gathered to discuss five options for a national stabilization program which were developed by Agriculture Canada's National Grains Bureau in Winnipeg.

These five options included an ASA type of program in which federal and provincial governments, as well as producers, would share program costs. Other options include a program of individual price guarantee contracts, a full cost of production guarantee, an individual farm gross revenue guarantee, and an individual net revenue stabilization plan.

The individual net revenue stabilization plan was designed under the Grains 2000 program, so it is commonly referred to as the Grains 2000 option.

Grains 2000 is a federal program designed to bring industry and government together to work on policy options for agriculture. The first Grains 2000 task force produced a report on opportunities for value-added production in Canada. It included the net revenue stabilization option as part of this report. That option, along with several others, is now being examined by the grains safety net committee. This group comprised of federal and provincial government representatives and farmers was formed as a result of the agriculture policy review conference that was held last December.

The committee is led by Dennis Stephens, the assistant deputy minister responsible for the National Grains Bureau. This group has met and begun the process of reviewing the options. Their goal is to identify a couple of options, to look at how they may determine the most workable options, and to then present these to the Minister of Agriculture later this spring.

The establishment of the National Grains Bureau was a major step by the government in drawing industry into the discussions on policy development options for agriculture. The bureau, which is part of the Grains and Oilseeds Branch of Agriculture Canada, was opened in Winnipeg in April 1988. It is situated in the heart of the grain industry, and is positioned to forge those closer ties between government and industry which are essential, we believe, to the future of agriculture in this country.

Indeed, consultation with the industry is an important component in the agriculture policy review initiated by this government. By working together with industry and considering producers in all the areas of the country, we feel that we can develop fair solutions to the problems and issues facing the Canadian agriculture sector.

Instead, let's look at farm-fed grain stabilization as an issue in the broad context of all agricultural stabilization programs, carry on with this discussion and bring forth the options and suggestions noted in this speech earlier.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate regarding the inclusion of farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agriculture Stabilization Act.

Producers in different regions have raised the issue and questioned why grain fed on farms is not covered under these programs. They have cited this as a perceived inequity between grain farmers who market their grain and those who feed it.

Raising livestock is one of the best examples of value-added production. There is a need in the ever changing global market-place in which we find ourselves to look more at value-added processing, particularly in western Canada.

Agriculture in the west has been traditionally an industry built on the export of raw products. As the industry moves into the next century, the changing world market-place makes it necessary to diversify our agricultural base and export more processed products.

I bring this issue into the debate because it is one of the areas now under review by the federal government. Just as the whole area of safety nets for farmers is being examined by the government and industry, our approach to value-added and market development is also under review, as is food safety, supply management and other key areas.

In other words, we are in the midst of a comprehensive agricultural policy review. We are looking at programs and policies in a broad context. Now is not the time to be making fundamental changes to one particular program in isolation of the review work.

Just a few short months ago, 1,800 industry and government representatives met in Ottawa. They met to begin the task of reviewing the agricultural policies in this country.

Plans to establish a number of task forces in several areas were announced as a result of this national conference. One of those plans, as I mentioned, was farm safety nets.

The current federal-provincial working group on farm safety nets was in place before the conference and will continue its work. The group's key objective is to develop a long term, comprehensive safety net policy for all commodities and for all farmers. The group will prepare an interim report to the agricultural ministers at their annual meeting. Further consultations with farm groups and other interested parties will take place in the fall.

In the meantime, there is an immediate need to develop proposals to assist the grains and oilseeds sector with a national program framework for safety nets. That review is being led by the National Grains Bureau in Winnipeg and work is beginning immediately. It will involve extensive consultation with industry to develop proposals as quickly as possible for this new safety net program. In addition, action is being taken in the area of value-added. The National Grains Bureau again is playing a major role. Much work has already been done, but it will become part of an over-all strategy and policy review system on the part of this government.

A task force is being established to examine the competitiveness of Canada's productive capacity, and the challenges and opportunities in the global market-place. The task force will look at the respective roles of governments, producers, processors, retailers and, most important, the consumer, who is affected by any government proposal. This will allow it to set priorities and encourage consensus for future development and future programs.

At the same time, action will continue on ways to remove rules and practices which prevent the free flow of agri-food products within Canada.

This is a result of a memorandum of understanding signed by agriculture ministers on the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers. As you know, Madam Speaker, the premier of my province, Premier McKenna, was one of the leading forces in that elimination of interprovincial trade barriers, and we hope that we are successful in that. There are now about 170 such barriers to interprovincial trade. We talk of free trade and we talk of global trade but we are restricted within our own borders. Priority will be given to establishing a permanent process, including a binding dispute settlement mechanism to address trade barriers on an ongoing basis.

There are many opportunities for Canadian agriculture to diversify. In these times of low grain prices, it is critical that we look at value-added processing for the future prosperity of the agriculture industry. In my province, this is something which we have achieved. Value-added in the province of New Brunswick is in the order now of close to 50 per cent. In some of the western provinces, that figure is presently in the single-digit numbers, and in some provinces it is less than 5 per cent. The problem is quite obvious, it is staring us right in the face. That is why this whole area of value-added and market development is part of the agricultural review policy.

This government is taking a look at the industry and the policies that shape it. Besides marketing and safety net issues, we are looking at transportation, farm finance, management, food safety, supply management and, of course, sustainable agriculture.

Action on each of these programs will proceed at different rates of speed. Results of consultations and analyses will be forthcoming in the year ahead.

What I want to emphasize here is the context to which this motion to amend the WGSA and the ASA is being made. It is clearly not the time to tinker with safety net programs when a major review of them is under way.

The ad hoc performances of previous governments will not be tolerated and we are not going to be part of that. Through the review process, solutions to some of the problems or inequities said to exist in Canadian agriculture policy can hopefully be found. Through this process we can develop the kinds of agricultural programs and policies that will be fair to all producers.

By making fundamental changes to individual programs, we run the risk of creating more problems. Governments will always face problems and they will always face challenges, but when the Canadian people begin to understand what we are attempting to do, I think that will solve some of the difficulties, because farmers and all support people in that industry will support what we are trying to do. That will mean producers, people in the agri-food business, and most of all, as I mentioned before—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, on February 15, I asked the Minister of Finance in this House why it was that he on behalf of his government which was always advising farmers to face up to the market realities, refused to follow his own advice when it came to the value of the Canadian dollar or the interest rates in Canada.

I asked that question because it had just been announced through the press that the Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance had just spent more than $3 billion U.S. of our foreign exchange reserves trying to prop up the Canadian dollar. The result was that an attempt at reducing interest rates fizzled out. The Canadian dollar dropped more than 2 cents in very short order. The market analysts tell us that apparently the market was afraid of both the lower returns that foreign investors could make in Canadian dollars because of the drop of .5 per cent in interest rates, as well as some trepidation about the upcoming budget.

The Minister of Finance in his response ignored the basis of the question and gave a little gratuitous speech about not being able to bring down interest rates in an unnatural way. The implication of my question was that maybe if he just let the Canadian dollar find its level interest rates would fall along with it and if he would stop trying to prop up the dollar to an unnatural level both the value of the dollar and the amount of interest we would have to pay foreigners to be attracted to Canada would be lower, to the benefit of those of us in the country who try to make our living exporting product.

I represent an area that sells the products of our mines, our forests, our farms and sells a little fish and some fur. All those industries are being devastated by this government's interest rate policy.

High interest rates increase our costs. Every time we have to borrow money to carry on operating expenditures or to add to our capital equipment load, it costs us money as the interest rates go up. However the high dollar is hurting us almost as much, if not more, because we sell on an international market and we usually sell in American funds.

When our Canadian dollar starts to rise, particularly when it is being pushed up by our own government, it hurts. It hurts because the amount of money coming to our pocket is less.

Let me illustrate. The world-wide grain stocks are falling. They are expected to be their lowest in 35 or 36 years at the end of this crop year. The income from the sale of that grain this year versus last year is actually going down because the value of the dollar has shifted. The amount of funds left over when we convert our sale out of American funds back into Canadian means that we have less money actually than we had before.

Let me give an idea of how little my part of the country and my industry is contributing to inflation. I want to point out that when I was first nominated to go into politics I bought a new full size car. It cost me just under $6,000. I had two ways of paying for it. I could either sell seven 900-pound feeder steers and pay for the car, or I could sell just under 2,000 bushels of No. 2 wheat and I could pay for that car.

Right now my neighbours and I have those same options to go out and buy a new car of the same size, but instead of it costing seven of those 900-pound feeder steers it will cost us 25 of those feeder steers to buy the current new car which is virtually the same model it was back when. Or, it will cost us not under 2,000 bushels of No. 2 wheat which it did back when I was a new entrant to politics, but about 7,000 bushels of No. 2 wheat.

I say that because I want to make it very clear to the House, and especially to the Minister of Finance, that if there is somebody contributing to inflation in this country it is not the farmers of Saskatchewan or of rural Canada. It is not the people who work in the mines. It is not the people who work in the forests. The people who are contributing to inflation reside in his Bank of Canada and in his ministry. He should start reacting a little more realistically and come up with some policies that will lower the interest rate. If it it hurts the dollar, fine. It will only help those of us who make our living exporting.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the government is aware of the difficulties that high interest rates can cause for Canadian farmers.

At the same time, it must be recognized that while interest rates can temporarily be brought down through a more expansionary monetary policy, they can only be sustainably lowered by addressing the fundamental cause of high interest rates: inflationary conditions and large government deficits that presently exist. That is why over the last few years monetary and fiscal policies have been directed toward containing inflationary pressures and reducing the government's demand on available savings.

It is important to recognize that there is no room for complacency about inflation. Inflation is everyone's problem. Complacency in the 1970s led to the recession of the early 1980s. For instance, in November 1976 the inflation rate was 5.5 per cent across this country or roughly what it is today. By the summer of 1981 it had climbed to 13 per cent and the economy was in a mess. Inflation cripples the efficiency of the economy. It impedes productivity growth and it harms Canadian farmers. The price for many of our agricultural exports is set in world markets and domestic prices must remain stable to allow us to compete effectively internationally.

Interest rate increases over the past few years have occurred in the context of very strong growth in demand in relation to the economy's productive capacity to produce goods and services, with resulting inflationary pressures. More recently there have been some signs that demand is slowing down, but inflation has remained high. Meaningful interest rate reductions will occur as the risk of inflation recedes. To take on additional risks on inflation at this time would be counterproductive.

The rise of the Canadian dollar over the last two years has been a reflection of many factors, not just interest rates. The strength of our economy and investor confidence in Canada's prospects have been major factors. The experience of the 1970s and early 1980s clearly shows that one of the biggest threats to the competitiveness of Canadian producers is higher inflation.

The government will remain committed to lowering inflation in order to lay the foundation for sustained economic growth in all sectors of the economy. I think Canadian farmers will benefit from durably lower interest rates and stable prices.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, on February 14, I rose in this House and addressed an important issue that is of growing concern to many of us. The issue is the overwhelming increase in the number of Canadians who use food banks regularly for their daily sustenance.

I had received a letter and two documents from the Daily Bread Food Bank, a food bank in my riding, describing on a national level and on a local level the scope of this phenomenon. One of the documents entitled Canadian Hunger Count 1989 was based on special surveys carried out by food bank organizations in 65 Canadian cities and towns, which represents over half the population of the country, covering 907 emergency grocery and meal programs in the month of March 1989.

The findings indicated that nearly 400,000 people in Canada resort to food and charitable food programs. Of these 400,000 Canadians, 87 per cent get groceries to prepare at home but 13 per cent or over 50,000 Canadians are served communal meals at soup kitchens, children's breakfast programs, drop-ins and shelters. These figures are based on any given month. Applied nationally on an annual basis, the findings indicate that Canadians who use food banks run in the order of 1.4 million, that is, every year 1.4 million Canadians are compelled to rely on the kindness of strangers to feed themselves and their families.

The most alarming of these findings is that although 26 per cent of the population of Canada is under 18, children and youth make up 40 per cent of those using food banks. Hungercount warns, and I quote: "children are twice as likely to be fed by food from a charitable food program as adults".

Although there are some among us who feel that the situation in which these Canadians find themselves is self-fulfilled, a survey of public attitudes taken by Gallup in April 1989 found that 67 per cent of Canadians feel that this crisis is a serious problem in Canada, and close to 70 per cent of Canadians feel that government has a responsibility to solve this problem.

The 87 per cent of Canadians who depend on food banks depend on social assistance, unemployment insurance, old age pensions and disability allowances. Yet, instead of increasing aid either directly or indirectly through improved access to education and training, what has the government done? It has cut back. It has cut back on benefits and education as we saw in the last budget.

This is not a partisan issue. What I have presented in the House are facts. Poverty and hunger know no politics. We in the House should stop playing politics with the very lives of our fellow Canadians. Although there was a motion presented in the House in November 1989, supported by all three parties, there are as many without food and shelter today as there were before the introduction of that motion. Motions do not put food on the table.

The Daily Bread Food Bank distributes 650,000 pounds of food to 11 different food banks in my riding alone. These food banks serve approximately 2,500 people a month. In January and February of this year, they have already distributed 58,000 pounds of food compared to 43,000 pounds during the same period in 1989.

I also have in my riding a unique food service. St. Francis Table offers a full meal consisting of soup, meat, potatoes, salad, dessert, coffee and tea for which it charges only $1 to help defray the costs. With volunteer help, they serve 4,000 to 5,000 meals a month within a five-day week. Half its clientele is made up of people on some type of social assistance. One-quarter are ordinary, average senior citizens and the others are transients and refugees. Very recently, St. Francis Table had to move to a larger facility to accommodate the growing number of Canadians accepting its charity.

When I visit St. Francis Table I ask what is the main reason that forces users to live under these conditions. Nine times out of ten I am told that it is a choice between shelter and food: once they have paid for their shelter, they have no money left for food.

This may not be the case in other towns or cities, but in Toronto where there is so little affordable housing people are literally being forced to trade off one essential for another. The number of people using food banks in metro Toronto is over 84,000, a number equal to the population of Kingston. Over the period of a year, one-quarter of a million people have had to utilize a food bank of one type or another at least once.

These people have an average of $23 a week left over once their shelter has been paid. There are not many of us who can conceive paying for food, transportation, clothing, medicine, et cetera, for $23 a week. One in eight food bank households earns less or brings home less money than its shelter costs. The inevitable reality for these people is homelessness.

This cannot be allowed to go on. We have to get together on a federal level working with the provinces and municipalities to see how best this crisis can be addressed. In a country as rich as ours, we all have to have the political will to work toward a common goal, a goal to eliminate poverty in Canada. We can start with step one: eliminate the need for food banks.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak today on a subject of primary concern to us as Canadians. I would like to remind the member for Parkdale—High Park that all Canadians, regardless of their political affiliation, cannot rest and be satisfied as long as even one family is suffering from poverty in this country. I commend him for his keen interest in this problem.

Canadians generally enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world and one of this government's priorities will be to maintain and improve the standard of living for Canadians and their children in the future in Canada.

The sound basis to assure a better future for Canadians and to protect our social safety net is a very healthy and prosperous economy, and in order for it to be a truly caring society, Canada's wealth and prosperity must be shared with those who are less fortunate and are in the greatest need.

Let us first address the issue of growth and prosperity. There is no question that the policies of this government have contributed to the economic growth in Canada. Since 1984 this government has embarked on a program of revitalizing the country. In just five years, as a result of the economic policies, more than 1.6 million new jobs have been created, the majority of them full time jobs. That is important to people who can now make money and take care of themselves.

Canadians in need have been able to benefit from this growth. Since 1984, some 760,000 persons have escaped poverty and average income has risen in that period of time by about 8 per cent. This government has taken the necessary steps to help those most in need and to ensure economic growth can continue.

Despite these important achievements, most Canadians are aware that the country is facing a serious debt problem and last year more money was spent on interest payments to service our national debt than all the programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare put together, more than the cost of national health care programs, welfare programs, old age security and family allowances. We end up spending more money on our debt problem than on all those important programs.

Clearly these public debt charges have been putting a lot of pressure on spending priorities and expanding into the social safety net. The survival of these programs depends on the prosperity of this country and we mean to continue that important job.

This government strongly believes in directing resources to programs which help those most in need. One important example is a refundable child tax credit program which is designed to help low and middle income families. The maximum level of the child credit has gone up by more than 50 per cent since 1984, from $367 to $565 in 1989. Close to 5 million children benefitted from this measure in 1989. Also, families with preschool-aged children benefit from a supplement of $200 per child. In total, the child tax credit is worth about $2 billion annually out of the government coffers.

The government has also introduced major tax reforms. About 850,000 lower income Canadians were removed from the tax rolls. In 1986, a refundable sales tax credit was introduced to support low-income families. Effective in 1991, this credit is to be superseded by a new enhanced goods and services tax credit targeted to low-income and middle-income families.

I would like to remind the House of the recent adoption of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This convention is intended to protect and promote the physical, spiritual, moral, social and cultural development of children. Clearly, actions pertaining to the conditions and rights of Canadian children will have to be taken in co-operation with the provinces.

In addition, recently the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced that the federal government would be pledging $1.3 million toward the establishment of a 24-hour national hotline to assist children in trouble.

Certainly the government has taken heed of low-income families, of families in need. The most serious is young children who are in need in low-income situations. The government concentrated on all those things and as our economy becomes more buoyant we can more to help alleviate the problems that the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has mentioned.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on February 14 of this year I rose in the House to ask a series of questions of the Minister of Transport, who has now gone on to other duties.

The questions related to the announcement the day before by Bombardier of Montreal that it was prepared to invest in a high speed rail passenger system in this country. Bombardier indicated that the only way it was possible to develop such a system from the financial side was if the federal government participated to the tune of $1.7 billion.

The proposal by Bombardier is being paralleled by a study being done by the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They just held hearings in this city this week and will be holding hearings throughout the area along the corridor.

A number of people have expressed interest, including obviously provincial jurisdictions, and the Bombardier Company. Lavelin, through its subsidiary UTDC, is indicating its interest and willingness to work in co-operation with Bombardier for the maintenance of facilities at their plant in Kingston, which is along the corridor.

The Standing Committee on Transport has long held interest in the concept of high speed rail. The New Democratic Party has proposed that high speed rail is the way to go, particularly in the corridor.

We just heard in the transport committee from the new Minister of Transport about the update on the study of south central Ontario vis-à-vis air services. We know there is massive construction at Pearson International Airport right now for Terminal III. We have an environmental assessment review process under way to give consideration to the addition of one or two more runways at Pearson International to handle the ever increasing air traffic. We heard from the Deputy Minister that Pickering is not dead, but is still on the table as a possibility for a second major airport in Toronto.

The whole concept of high speed rail connecting Windsor to Quebec City, but more important, Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal, even at a high cost of $3.5 billion or $3.4 billion is quite competitive, both in financial terms whether it be private sector dollars or public dollars and in terms of the time factor. High speed rail can compete head to head with air, downtown to downtown, getting people from Toronto to Ottawa by rail faster than by air. People can arrive at the city, not harassed because they had to drive to the airport through the congestion of Toronto, go through security, wait on the tarmac, fly through rough weather to Ottawa, and go through the process of getting out and driving to their destination. City to city, downtown to downtown rail is economical and feasible. The Government of Canada has a responsibility because in addition to the economics and the speed and service, there is the environmental question as well. There is no question that high speed electric rail is extremely more environmentally friendly than air is today or will be in the next 20 or 30 years.

I suggest that the answer that the minister gave me, that the Government of Canada could not afford to participate, was wrong. We cannot afford not to participate.

We are spending billions of dollars on air. If we spent the same billions of dollars on rail, we would be able to move more people faster, safer and with much less an impact on the environment. I will wait with interest to hear the response from the government to find out the elaboration of its refusal to once again participate in something that is environmentally logical and financially sound.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan for his long-standing interest in transportation. I also appreciate his interest in the corridor because that is the area where I come from and it is an issue that we should be talking about.

The government is aware of the arguments that have been put forward in favour of the development of a high speed rail service in the corridor. However, the federal finances available for rail passenger services are fully committed at this point in time to the network that has been established for VIA Rail, an argument we have gone through recently.

The current climate of fiscal restraint necessarily limits the federal interest in proposed high speed rail projects only to the extent of not having adequate resources. We are interested in a privately and commercially financed and viable venture.

As the hon. Minister of Transport has assured the House, he is willing of course to consider all proposals for a transfer of any rail passenger service to third parties, as well as proposals concerning new technology that the hon. member is interested in.

VIA has been asked to pursue all such opportunities and report to the government on a case by case basis. The high speed train proposal being advanced by Bombardier is precisely the kind of initiative that the government had hoped would take place in the private sector. The government encourages those kinds of efforts.

The royal commission that has been set up is examining the role of all inter-city passenger transportation modes in the 21st century. The potential of the high speed rail will undoubtedly, as the hon. member probably knows, be part of that examination.

As I have mentioned we are willing to consider any proposal Bombardier may wish to put forward. However, the government is not in a position, at this point in time, to make a commitment as to its participation in such a project. But we are very interested in seeing the proposals when they come forward and we thank him for his interest.

ALLOTTED DAYS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday I rose in my position as the Whip of the government party with a special House responsibility for notifying my members of the time of votes. We had quite an extended discussion in the Chamber about the kind of notice members are required to have for those votes.

There is another issue I would like to raise this morning, along the same vein. For some considerable period of time, and operating with the general consent of the House, shortly after the bells began to ring a clock would appear on our television screens indicating the maximum amount of time that was available for members to arrive in the Chamber prior to the commencement of the vote. This is a very important principle.

All members will know that according to the Standing Orders of the House, it is possible for the Whip of the Official Opposition and the Whip of the government to walk down the aisle and indicate to the Chair that they are ready for the vote, at some point between the commencement of the bells and the maximum amount of time for the bells ring. In this way we can take the vote more quickly.

We did that for particular reasons on two or three occasions. Some members rose subsequently in the Chamber to indicate that they were not happy with us moving more quickly than the clock indicated. In other words, the clock was providing them with information that in their minds was not correct. We have had these arguments expressed in the House.

Later this day, according to the ruling made by the Speaker yesterday, it is very likely that we are going to have a vote. The Speaker has ruled that members have been given adequate notice of a confidence vote on a Friday, a very unusual circumstance. I cannot remember the last time it has happened in my parliamentary career, and I have been here about 11 years. Nevertheless, that is the situation we face today.

What members need to know when those bells begin to ring is whether or not the time remaining before the commencement of the vote will be displayed on the television screen. To overcome some of the problems caused to some of the members, and I may suggest it was a tiny minority which led to a kind of administrative decision to take the clock away, I think we can resolve this matter.

There are two people in this Chamber who have the responsibility to walk down the aisle and indicate to the Chair that we are ready for the vote. One is the Whip of the government party, or the Whip's designate, the other is the Whip of the Official Opposition, or that Whip's designate.

When bells begin to ring, if either one of us approach the Chair and indicate that we are not going to walk down that aisle until the maximum time has expired, then the clock could commence on the television screen and members, with a sense of soreness, would know exactly when the time had expired and when the vote was to occur. I think that operates in the best interests of the whole House.

If the clock does not appear, then members have to be alert to the fact the vote might occur at any moment and that they should move quickly. But if either Whip goes to the Table and says: "It is not my intention to walk down until the maximum time has come," then I suggest the clock could come back up on the screen and members would have the certitude of the time of the vote.

Surely, in a democracy, the most important responsibility we bear in the final analysis on behalf of our constituents is to be present in the Chamber to cast a vote on their behalf. It is the reason why notice provisions exist. It is the reason why we have standing orders which give notice of certain kinds of intentions so that members can have a degree of certitude.

We think that the clock added to that certitude. Many members on this side of the House were very unhappy when the clock disappeared, others felt clotheslined.

To avoid some kind of administrative problem in the future, perhaps we should pass a motion in this Chamber, by unanimous consent, that might incorporate the notion that when bells begin to ring, if either the Whip of the Official Opposition or the government Whip approaches the Table and indicates that they intend to use the maximum amount of time, then the clock appear on our television screens.

I would like to hear from other members in the Chamber, independent members, or from the Whips' offices of the New Democratic Party or the Official Opposition. I think now is a good time to resolve that issue so members will have certitude about votes in the future. Nothing is more important for us than the maximum amount of certitude about when votes are required and in particular a non-confidence vote.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, this is all very interesting. I too liked the clock that was available for members of Parliament on the television screen for those of us who are in our offices, at committee meetings or elsewhere on Parliament Hill.

I do think that perhaps this issue should be discussed at the House leaders' meeting. Essentially, what the Chief Government Whip is proposing sounds eminently reasonable. But the floor of the House of Commons is a rather unusual place to have a House leaders' meeting.

Probably more fundamental than anything raised by the Chief Government Whip is the fact that the supply convention of this House is such that before granting supply to the government, this House has a right to air its grievances. This is a supply day today, as is Monday. Surely, our time should be spent airing the grievances of the people before the Government of Canada before deciding whether or not we shall grant this government supply. That would probably be a better use of our time at this point than the issue we are discussing right now.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I find it interesting that on an opposition day the Chief Government Whip has chosen to raise this particular motion. There has been ample opportunity all week to raise it privately with representatives of the other two parties.

I, for one, like the compromise that has been suggested. I would prefer if members of the Liberal party had not always caved in to work with the government to short circuit our delaying of the House, but so be it. That is their right.

I would suggest that we move on to Orders of the Day and that we leave matter this for the House leaders to work out.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I believe that this issue, according to our patterns of behaviour, is really a Whips' issue. It is the Whips who have the defined responsibility. There have been some consultations. I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House for the clock to appear when the bells begin today.

We have an important confidence vote on a Friday, a very unusual circumstance, and I would like you, Madam Speaker, to ask the House whether there is unanimous consent for the clock to appear on the television screen today when the bells begin to ring. I would give my assurance that I will not walk down the aisle until the maximum amount of time has elapsed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, if I may respond on behalf of my colleagues, I am prepared to agree with that for today only and for discussions to continue in the normal way outside the House of Commons in order to resolve what does not seem to be a disagreement anyway.

Meanwhile, let us agree for today so that we can deal with the issue of supply which is fundamental to our parliamentary institution.

May I suggest, Madam Speaker, that we move to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I concur with the suggestion made by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that we agree for today only.

The easy solution would be for the government Whip to have his people in place at 2.45 when the bells start to ring.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Obviously, there is unanimous consent for this to be so for today. We will move to Orders of the Day.

VOTING PROCEDURE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): I, too, rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, that is somewhat in the same subject area, but which is a very different point. That is the question concerning what I believe has become a habit in the last while of members explaining their votes or rising after votes to make comments.

It is my understanding that once the House has divided, that ends the question. I have just taken the liberty of going through the last three months' of Hansard to look randomly at votes. Very often, people say things such as, and I quote from page 7436 of Hansard:

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I missed the vote. Had I been here, I would have voted nay.

At page 7659 of Hansard, there is another explanation:

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I was inadvertently delayed, but for the record I want to indicate that had I been here for the vote I certainly would have voted against government—

For that particular day, there is almost a page and a half of interventions recorded in Hansard making various explanations about the votes that happened on that day.

Here is another really interesting one. At page 8724 of Hansard, there is Division No. 195 which was eventually defeated. What I find interesting is that Miss Grey rose in her place and said:

> Mr. Speaker, I would just like it to be on the record that I am in the Chamber at present and am choosing to abstain on this motion.

Then it goes on with various comments from there. There are all sorts of comments. Mr. Benjamin said:

> Mr. Speaker, I also rise on this point of order. There is no such thing as an abstention in the House of Commons.

It continues on for a page and a half.

Point of Order

What is clearly happening is that our tradition of having the vote and that being the end of it is being eroded. Now, on a regular basis, we have members rising in the House to say: "Madam Speaker, I was late coming in. Had I been here I would have done this, I would have done that or I should have done this". It is prompting a whole round of points of order.

Our rules are very clear. If we look at at Citation 223 on page 75 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, we see that it states the following:

> (1) A Member must be within the House and hear the question put in its entirety, in one of the official languages, or his—

—and one would "her"—

> —vote cannot be recorded. It is not sufficient for him—

—and I add "her"—

> —to hear it while he is in a gallery or behind the curtains.

Beauchesne's is very clear. If a member wishes to vote on a item, he or she must be in their place in the House. To stand up later and say: "I'm sorry, I wasn't here," and then try to explain to their constituents that they would have done such and such, I believe is an abuse of the rules, an abuse of members' time, and an abuse of House time. It is something that is clearly unacceptable.

The book entitled Précis of Procedure is a helpful book. On page 53, under Recorded Divisions, it states:

> Recorded divisions are conducted formally according to various rules and practices. Standing Orders permit no further debate when Members have been called in to a division, and specify that when the Speaker is putting a question——and this is the important part—

> —no Member may enter, leave or cross the House, or make any disturbance. Members must be in their seats to vote, and must remain seated until the result of the vote is announced. A Member may abstain from voting simply by remaining seated during a vote. Such abstention is not, however, recorded.

• (1020)

I just read an example a few moments ago of a member who abstained but then stood up and drew the attention of the House to the fact that she had abstained. It is that kind of thing that has been developing lately that I think is wrong. I think it needs to be corrected because the rules on voting are very clear—a member is to be in his or her seat to hear the motion put. They are to vote if they choose. If they choose to abstain, then they are to remain seated.

What I think has been going on is something that needs to be arrested. I want to bring it to the attention of the Chair and ask that the Chair give it very serious consideration and bring back to this House the tradition and practices that we have followed in the past.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, again all of this is very interesting. I have had an opportunity to discuss the issue with my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands who is the opposition spokesman on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am pleased to announce to my colleague across the way that we are willing to provide unanimous consent to refer this issue to that committee if that is the wish of the government.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I note with interest that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader did not indicate very clearly that it was government members as well as opposition and independent members in this House who have taken the opportunity to advise the House of their intentions had they been in their seats at the appropriate time.

I would like to concur again—and this is getting dangerous on a Friday morning—with my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be made to examine this matter. It would be more than appropriate. We would give our consent as well.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, the sole point that I wanted to raise in response to the comments by the hon. member for Peace River is that there are occasions in the House where, by unanimous consent, a subsequent recorded vote is not taken in order to save everyone time and trouble in recording that vote. It is occasionally the case, and I have had the experience myself, where I wished to abstain on one of a series of votes but not on the others. In that event I suggest that the Chair ought to recognize that the procedure ought to accommodate the need for members not to delay the entire House by demanding full recorded votes but to distinguish perhaps between motions on report stage where votes may want to differ.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, to respond to my friend for Ottawa South there are indeed certain circumstances where our rules provide for members to stand and declare a concern they may have with a particular vote, i.e. if they have a pecuniary interest, or if they were paired. Members have from time to time indicated: "Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was in my place. I would have voted but I was paired". It is part of the relationships that have developed over the years in the House.

When I rise on this point of order it is not simply to say it is the opposition members who are guilty of that. I think that we on this side have also done the same thing. That proves my case rather than refutes it because in fact what is happening is that we are keeping this practice going.

As it relates to the question of reference to a committee, I do not agree with that. I do not think we need to make a reference to the committee. Our rules are clear. Beauchesne's lays it out very nicely. We do not at this point need another reference to a committee. We simply need to go by the practices, traditions and longstanding habits we have in this House of Commons which I think on this particular subject have served us very well.

We do not need a royal commission. We do need a study. We just simply need to act on what we have to guide us in our present rules.

PROCEEDINGS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise what I think is a very serious and important point of order arising from the discussion that took place, in particular the remarks of the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan when he was making his presentation to the House. I do not want to prejudge this matter. Madam Speaker, you will have the opportunity to look at the official records of the House to determine exactly what was said.

My hearing indicated to me that what the member for Thunder Day—Atikokan said—and I think he was responding to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell in the exchange—went along these lines, Madam Speaker, and I want you to carefully note what I am saying. The member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, as I heard his remarks, accused the member for Glengarry—

Prescott—Russell of not co-operating in the delay of the House. I think he said: "Cave in to the government", in not co-operating in the measures to delay the House.

If I read the rules of the House and authorities such as Erskine May, I see it is a very serious matter to delay improperly the process and proceedings in this House of Commons.

It is also very clear under our rules that the Speaker of this Chamber has the authority to remedy any attempts by members of this House to obstruct and delay the proceedings of the House.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that you would call the attention of the Chair to those remarks which evidence what we all know has been going on in this House of Commons day after day, week after week—an intentional delay of the processes and procedures of this House in order to obstruct government business.

Normally, one could not make that charge because you would be imputing motives to the opposition members. You are saying that they are showing contempt for the rules, processes and procedures of this House. I am not making that charge myself. I am simply saying, examine the words spoken by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, recorded in the official records of this House and determine whether that does not evidence an intention to improperly delay the processes and procedures of this House; and not only do they have this intention, as evidenced in these remarks, but they are even accusing other members of not co-operating in this improper, unfair action, an action that could never be said to be in the interest of Canada, and never could be said to be in the interest of parliamentary process or procedure.

We have rules in this House, rules that are fairly made, made with the consensus of all members of this House. If there is a deliberate attempt to defy and obstruct those rules by causing unnecessary delay, then I think the Chair should take some action.

In summary, what I am saying is examine the words, they are on the official record. I believe the Chair will find, by reason of the accusation to cave in to the government made by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and not co-operate in delaying the work of this House, there is sufficient evidence upon which a conviction can be based.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, this must be Friday. Things are getting a bit bizarre.

I would encourage you to examine the words I used. I would also encourage you to examine all of the events of the last three or four months as they relate to the operation of this House. You will find that in no way has the New Democratic caucus broken any rules of this Chamber. We have used the rules in order to point out our objections to a specific piece of government legislation, the goods and services tax. We have been thwarted in some ways in our attempts to frustrate the government by lack of assistance from the Official Opposition.

But, Madam Speaker, we have not broken any rules. At no time did the Chair find that we had broken any rules. I urge you to get on with the business of this House so that we can hear from the member of our caucus speaking on a very important issue which the government has decided is a matter of confidence. Obviously the government does not even want the Deputy Prime Minister, assuming he is going to speak for them, to get a chance to speak.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague from Halifax has raised one of the most serious issues which has been on the table since the commencement of this particular Parliament.

When we come to this Chamber as new members, we get our first copy of Beauchesne's and have a chance to look at our purpose in being here. The words that stuck in my mind right from the beginning were that this was the highest court in the land. It should be a place of dignity, decorum, and process, process which is fair to all members.

In the final analysis, while the people on the street might think that the Prime Minister is my boss or that the hon. member for Windsor West is the boss of the Liberals or the Leader of the New Democratic Party is the boss of the NDP, that is not true. All of us are subject to the same conditions in being here. Our bosses are the people of our riding. They send us here expecting us to conduct ourselves in a manner that will lead to thoughtful decision making and to legislation that operates in the best interests of Canadians.

You have to ask yourself, Madam Speaker, whether or not that has been happening in the last year and a half as often as it should and as well as it should. This week we saw pictures on television of members of Parliament with blankets and pillows because a committee had to meet for 31 straight hours, the equivalent of 20 sitting days of normal meetings, simply to listen to a filibuster. Canadians had an opportunity to watch that on television and they saw the childish behaviour.

Another example perhaps underlines in clear-cut House of Commons terms that we have a problem, and it is a problem that perhaps in the final analysis only the Chair can resolve. One day this week, we were debating a very simple motion in our Standing Orders, that the debate shall not be further adjourned. That is a motion which sits there so that the House, in a specific instance on a specific day with a specific piece of legislation, can break the tyranny of the minority. The majority shall, in the final analysis, rule when and if it is necessary.

In previous Parliaments and in the history of this country that was necessary from time to time but infrequently. If we look at the precedents in the British Parliament or Parliaments around the world, this occurs when necessary but infrequently. In my time in this Chamber I can remember a filibuster around the Constitution which went on for several days. I can remember the ringing of the bells which blocked the House for several days and led to some different rulings from the Chair.

Mr. Boudria: Did you charge the Chair, too?

Mr. Hawkes: I suggest the member across the way—and if I could say it once again for the House—go back to the television tape on the night that the Chair was charged. He will not see me charging the Chair.

Mr. Boudria: Only your House leader did.

Mr. Hawkes: There was an instinct to charge and it was very difficult to remain seated in the circumstances, but I want it clearly understood that anybody who stands in this Chamber from now on and says that I charged the Chair is lying to the House. Because this is about the fourth time I have said this, I suggest that they are lying to the House deliberately, because it did not happen and parliamentary immunity does not entitle members of this House to stand in this place and charge a member with behaviour without putting their own seats on the line. If you think I charged the Chair, charge me in here; do it formally. Let's go to committee, and if I am right and you are wrong, resign. That is what a charge is all about. At a later time today I want to get back to that on a question of privilege. I have another one about a charge. I made a charge in this Chamber, and I think charges are very serious.

However let me deal with the point at issue before us now. In a democracy, the majority cannot be the captive of the tyranny of the minority, yet there must be a process that allows free and fair participation by minorities. It is a balancing act which is largely in the hands of the Speaker and the House, if necessary, in the final analysis.

During the division earlier this week when we were debating the motion that the House shall not further adjourn, members of the NDP were shouting "34". They were counting. What does 34 mean? It means that on 34 separate occasions in the life of this Parliament, which is a relatively short life span, this House has had to take time and money to overcome obstruction by a majority vote in this Chamber.

We met for two weeks in December 1988. We came back in April, 1989 and we have met on a regular timetable since, but we have not really had even one year of normal sittings. Normal sittings are about 175 days and, according to the NDP, we have had to use the time of this House, the $1 million a day that this House costs, on 34 occasions to overcome obstructionism.

That is childish. In the junior high schools or the elementary schools of this nation, in any fraternal organization, in any church group or anywhere else in society, that kind of obstructionism would not be tolerated.

Is this obstructionism on matters of great principle? Do you know what we were debating in this Chamber this week when we had to move that motion? Minor changes in crop insurance affecting the farmers of this country, and in particular western farmers. Members of the New Democratic Party by and large come from western Canada. They did not even vote against the legislation in the final analysis; they simply blocked. At $1 million a day they block, they block, they block.

This week they read in the rules of this House that they had to give 48 hours' notice for a vote today and they embargoed the Table from telling members of the House. That is blockage. It was never intended. It was never contemplated.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The Speaker ruled that we were right.

Mr. Hawkes: The Speaker has ruled that procedurally in some kind of legal way correct, but it is a brand new sense of obstruction of causing a vote. We will watch, Madam Speaker. There are 40–some members of that party who are supposed to be here to vote this afternoon, and how many will there be?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, just for clarification, is the hon. member saying that the Chair yesterday was incorrect in its ruling?

Mr. Hawkes: I am talking about the New Democratic Party being incorrect in asking and putting the Table under the gun, in using a notice provision in the rules and then asking the Table not to tell. That is being legally correct, but there is nothing in that initiative that speaks of any concern for the taxpayers of this country.

Madam Speaker, do you know how many dollars this vote this afternoon is going to cost? We have members flying in from thousands of miles away because it is a confidence vote. Canadians understand the cost of an airline ticket. They read the newspaper ads for the bargains on airline travel. They may live in Calgary and have relatives in Nova Scotia. They find the bargain $350 to $400 ticket, plan ahead and go.

But they embargoed that information, and our members are having to fly in to this city today for a vote this afternoon. They may have had to cancel engagements that other people were paying for. They are also having to travel without the bargain tickets, paying full fare because it came at the last minute. How many hundreds of thousands of dollars are the NDP costing the taxpayers of this nation today, when in fact this vote could have occurred on Monday? There will be another vote on Monday and we will contrast how many members of that party are here for the vote today and the vote on Monday.

If they were really interested in representing their constituents in this Chamber, the people who pay their salaries and send them to this place, wouldn't they like to have a vote on a day they could be here? I predict that they will probably have twice as many people here on Monday as they have today in support of their own motion, and yet they will have caused $50,000, $75,000 or $100,000 worth of taxpayer's money to be spent on extra travel because they would not tell us on Wednesday night that they had given notice.

Members left and went to Vancouver, Yellowknife, Newfoundland, and Boston to do the work that the taxpayers are paying them to do. Today, they cannot do that work because they are on airplanes and the taxpayers are paying for it. Maybe some of them can leave in time to get back to their ridings to work on the weekend and maybe some of them cannot even make it so they are missing two days' work. That is a waste of taxpayer's money that they are causing through some of kind of childish view that this place should be obstructed, hour after hour, day after day, on things they do not even oppose.

This week this Chamber sat late on Wednesday night under the conditions of the motion that the debate should not be further adjourned to finish a crop insurance bill that they did not even have the guts to vote against. They rose in this House and took a lot of time this week, after 31 hours of obstruction in committee, lots of television pictures with pillows and blankets, and then into the House with another $1 million worth of obstruction today on that. They stood in this House and obstructed and obstructed and obstructed.

The toll of 34 occasions is not my number. I sat here and listened to the music. They are bragging that in less than one full year of sittings in this Parliament they have obstructed this Chamber on an absolute minimum of 34 days, which is an absolute minimum of $34 million.

We do not move the motion of time allocation or that the debate shall not be further adjourned on the day things commence. For each of those occasions which they count and said what we have had to do to overcome their obstruction, there is at least one day that precedes it and the doubling of 34 is 68. In reality in this Chamber alone, let alone committees, they have obstructed to the tune of a minimum of $68 million in less than one year.

They stand in this Chamber and they talk about program money for women, for native people and for many good causes. Something like $100,000 worth of travel money today will be going primarily to airlines and to taxi companies that we would like to have for women's groups, for natives, and for the health care system. But no, the New Democratic Party in its childish behaviour has decided that it prefers the money goes to CP Air, Air Canada, Blue Line Taxi, bus companies and car rental companies. That is what it would prefer, that we go to the taxpayers, take the money out of their pockets and give it to the travel companies.

Why? So we can stand in this Chamber this afternoon at three o'clock and count how many out of those 43 are here. No more than half, probably a quarter. Then we will do a count on Monday when there is already a scheduled vote. We could be voting on today's motion on Monday, saving taxpayers $75,000 or $100,000. Members would have been able to do two days of hard work instead of two days of travelling to the far corners of this country. That would have been sane, sensible and practical.

Surely it is time for members of the New Democratic Party to have a seminar. Maybe the seminar should begin with Beauchesne's. Maybe it is time for them to go back to the beginning and read the books that guide our behaviour in this Chamber, read the books that tell them what the place is for as the highest court in the land, that we are to move—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, surely it is time that the hon. member came to his point of order. He has been all over the map, whining and snivelling about what might happen this afternoon. I wonder whether it is not time for either the member himself, or at your request, Madam Speaker, to come to his point of order and make it possible for you to make a judgment and make it possible for the House to get on with the business of the House, which is apparently what the member himself would like the House to do but which he is now preventing.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair is being quite patient in listening to the points made by members of all sides. It would be quite helpful to the Chair if the hon. member for Calgary West would confine himself to the point of order he is trying to make and help the Chair in coming to a decision.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I would hate to be accused of filibustering the Chamber and wasting time, especially given the arguments I am making. I cannot help responding to my friend who interrupted me. The last time he did that was just three or four weeks ago. I brought to the Chamber's attention that one of the obstruction tactics employed by two members of his party was to vote twice. I put my seat on the line and I made the charge. He had not been present in the Chamber, but he stood up and said I was a liar; that was the impact of his words. He was not present, he did not see, but he said that I was a liar. Today he is trying to imply that I am a snivelling something or other.

Mr. Blaikie: Whining and snivelling.

Mr. Hawkes: He speaks about himself, about the thoughts that must be in his heart and his mind and not in mine.

Mr. Kristiansen: What is your point of order?

Mr. Hawkes: Does he have the courage to stand in this Chamber today and say: "I took your advice and I looked at the tape and you were right. My members voted twice"? Did he look at the tape? I suggest that he might. Did he look? Did he see? Is he willing to apologize to the House, or does he want to engage in character assassination?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I asked the hon. member and so did you to get to the point of order he is making today. He is trying to recall some previous debate that he and I had. I stand by everything I said in that previous debate, but that is not what we are debating here today. If the member has a point of order to make, let him make it.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, my friend from Halifax raised the issue of obstruction in the Chamber. We have had a previous debate in another circumstance this week about the role of the Speaker in relationship to obstruction. The debate in a procedural sense is engaged. At what point does the Speaker act in the face of obstruction? At what point does the Speaker protect the democratic institution called the Parliament of Canada from the tyranny of the minority?

Surely any objective reader of parliamentary history, going back for decades and centuries, knows clearly that there is a role and a place for the Speaker of a Chamber to act, to seek the concurrence of the House that the actions are justified, that they are warranted in the individual case. He does that when the whole democratic process as expressed through its institutions is captive of a minority whose sole purpose, aim or objective is to be obstructive.

I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that some other colleagues would like to give you a few examples of that obstruction. There is such a large menu that this debate could probably go on forever. The piece of evidence I bring to your attention is the behaviour of members of the New Democratic Party on Wednesday of this week during the vote that was caused by the acceptance of the motion that the House shall be no longer adjourned. They were using "34" and bragging that they had obstructed this Chamber, in less than one normal year of sittings, on 34 separate days. That is not evidence that comes to the Chair from members on this side of the House or from the Official Opposition. That is evidence which members of the NDP provided to the Chair themselves this week during the course of a vote.

The issue is: Shall it continue? Is the norm going to be that the House has to address itself to obstructionism 34 times every year? Remember, the House will not address itself to obstruction on the first occasion or the second; quite often it is the third or the fourth. Those 34 occasions represent an absolute minimum of 68 days of House sitting time and realistically probably about 102 times, which represents half the budget of this place. That is well over $100 million of taxpayers' money that is being spent on nothing constructive, nothing positive and nothing useful for the nation; simply on obstruction.

I suggest, Madam Speaker, that we have to think it through. Perhaps the Speaker would like to deal with the parties informally to try to resolve it in that fashion. It cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely. This place is too important. Democracy is too important. We must have a process which is fair and a process which ultimately acts in the best interests of the taxpayers of this country and of the voters of this country. That is the importance of this particular point of order.

Point of Order

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I rise on the so-called point of order. I have two points to make.

First, I want to remind the hon. gentleman to remind himself of who rang the bells in this place for 15 days, and an agreement was reached on exactly the same proposal at the beginning of the 15 days in order to end the bell ringing, so he is in no position to talk.

Second, the hon. gentleman is asking the Chair to intervene in the proceedings of the House when there has been no violation of the rules. The Chair will intervene when members of the House conduct themselves in violation of the rules. That has not occurred, and whenever it has the Chair intervenes. For the hon. gentleman to ask the Chair to intervene when no rules have been violated shows a great deal of ignorance and lack of respect for this House.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I want to take a couple of moments to speak to the question of obstruction. I think it goes to the fundamental roots of Parliament. If we look at what Parliament is all about, it was to give people an opportunity to debate the way in which taxes are spent and collected and the governing of our country.

Mr. Hovdebo: Sixteen days of bell ringing gives lots of opportunity.

Mr. Cooper: There are two elements to that debate. There is a question of whether or not the minority has the right to be heard and whether or not the majority has the right to govern. It has been a fundamental principle that in the end the government must have the right to govern.

One thing I find very significant is that closure was not used often by the previous government. Why was it not? The reason was very simple. It was because we as an opposition believed that at the end of the day the government had the right to govern. We never had to and never did behave in such a way that the government of the day would have had to use closure 34 times.

It is fundamental that Parliament has to be able to function. The government has to be able to govern. Equally, the opposition has to be able to debate. We have seen example after example in this House where time after time, through the filibustering obstructive tactics of the NDP, members of all parties including the opposition and the government have had to sit in their places and not be able to debate. After three or four days of listening to the tactics that these members from this particular party have used, we have ended up being in a position that we have had no choice but to move ahead with closure and, as a net result, members have not had an opportunity to debate the substantive issues.

This party is making it a habit of not debating issues but engaging in childish tactics. The best example of that is contained in an article in today's edition of The Ottawa Citizen that clearly outlines the particular concern with which the House has been living with for some months now. The headline is: "Mr. Barrett goes to Ottawa" and it states:

> The NDP is full of moral outrage because Don Blenkarn, Chairman of the Finance Committee, had the gall this week to cut off its GST filibuster after a mere 31 hours.
> So indignant are NDP members that they are not only gunning for Blenkarn but they have also asked the Commons Speaker to decide if their parliamentary privileges were breached.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, with all due respect, the member is engaging in political debate. He is not engaging in any kind of procedural debate whatsoever. He is not speaking to his point of order or anybody else's point of order. He is engaging in political debate. It is incumbent upon the Chair to say so and force the matter with respect to a point of order, not a matter of political debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. parliamentary secretary may want to confine himself to making whatever point of order he is trying to make.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am speaking to Standing Order 10. It starts at Standing Order 9 and goes all the way through to Standing Order 14 where it talks about the question of order and decorum. What we have been living with is obstruction, and that is what I am speaking to.

Forgive me if my remarks are somewhat political. I know that the House of Commons should never be political. The reality is that we are living with a situation where members of that particular party has continued to tie up this House, to tie up the committees of this House, to prevent members from having an opportunity to debate the very serious and fundamental issues of the day.

What have they been doing? They have been doing things like voting on introduction of their own bills, not because anybody here is going to stop them but because they would rather waste time than debate the issues of the day. I think what happens is that when one runs out of substance in an argument one replaces it with rhetoric and filibuster and all sorts of delaying tactics, and that is what we have seen.

I think I have made my point. I have done my best to aid and assist the able argument of the Whip on the government side. I hope that those members in particular will consider very seriously how fundamental and important is Parliament and how we need to be able to proceed with the business of the day, and that means debate, not filibuster.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—RURAL CANADA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved:

That this House call upon the government to commit itself, on the week of the second annual Rural Revitalization Day and the anniversary of the birth of Agnes MacPhail, the first woman elected to this House and an untiring champion of the rights of rural Canadians, to provide for a vital economic, social and environmentally sustainable future for rural Canada and the millions of Canadians who live in our vast rural areas, by implementing a program to:

1) stabilize family farm incomes and ease the crippling debt load which at present threatens the very survival of tens of thousands of family farms;

2) assist fishing communities to survive the current crisis in the fishery and take steps to ensure the proper management of the fishery in the future;

3) modify existing transportation and other infrastructure policies to assure all primary producers, co-operative and rural small businesses that they can be competitive in both the domestic and the international market-place;

4) provide a full range of education, health and other social policies to enable young families, the elderly and others to live comfortably in rural and isolated parts of Canada; and

5) provide a full range of services, including shelters, child care services and skills training to support the crucial role played by women in all rural communities.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 35 the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, on March 14, the Canadian government tabled in Geneva a proposal it intends to defend in the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations involving GATT article XI.

The proposal, which came after numerous consultations held across the country in recent months with various members of the agri-food sector, reflects this government's firm commitment to maintaining efficient supply management programs.

We will be able to safeguard our interests and work towards controlling imports of dairy products, including yogurt and ice cream, and chicken, all of which are vital to Quebec's agricultural industry.

This policy is aimed at clarifying and strengthening the provisions of GATT article XI in a balanced and realistic way.

Madam Speaker, this represents a major step forward and a substantial gain which may help boost development of our agricultural potential in this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I could not believe what I saw yesterday, an advertisement by the New Democratic Party inviting people to participate in a rally against the goods and services tax.

When we in the Liberal party called the NDP to participate in this rally we were bluntly told we were not welcome at this event. Yesterday the NDP member for Yorkton—Melville stood in this House complaining that Canadians want to be heard, that they were against the goods and services tax, and he accused the government of being undemocratic.

The hon. member spoke without blushing. Democracy to my friends in the NDP is a word they use at their convenience. Here in the national capital region the NDP is using the name "Coalition Against the Goods and Services Tax", an organization which we formed last fall. They used this name without our knowledge or permission. Well, that is misleading.

My friends in the NDP are obviously busy fighting for the spotlight. They are busy fighting for the spotlight rather than fighting for the real issues. What a pity.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, March 21 was the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

This is the second year that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship has emphasized the occasion with a public awareness campaign.

Madam Speaker, we cannot hide the fact that despite the tolerance and openness of this country and its people, Canada is not immune to racism and racial discrimination, especially when we consider that the population of Canada will become increasingly diversified in the years to come.

It is therefore important to get to the roots of the problem so that our society will continue to prosper in peace and harmony.

We have good reason to believe that these awareness campaigns will be successful in the long run, considering the enthusiastic response from young people last year, which will probably be the case this year as well.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, as change sweeps eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, Canadians are witness to growing respect for basic human rights, including the open gate of emigration. Unfortunately, glasnost has also given rise to some hate groups and open demonstrations of anti-Semitism in the streets of Moscow.

While the freedom to exit is to be applauded, safe passage for all peoples wishing to reach a new domicile is also essential. Unfortunately for Soviet Jewish emigrants, the other side of the open gate may become as daunting as the closed gate used to be, for we are getting increased reports each day of extremist elements threatening to attack airlines carrying Soviet Jewish immigrants to Israel. Unfortunately, two days ago, Hungarian National Airlines was forced to withdraw its assistance in the transport of these emigrants because of these threats.

This must stop. Canada's strong objections must be heard. The challenge is ours and the time is now. I ask the Government of Canada to reaffirm on behalf of all Canadians the basic human right which Canadians have long cherished and enjoyed, the freedom to move safely from one country to another without fear of terrorism or hostile threats.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on behalf of the many Canadians who find it increasingly offensive that the government continues to support the testing by the U.S. of air-launched cruise missiles over Canadian territory, particularly given the changes which have taken place in the Soviet Union and in eastern Europe.

Those of us who opposed the testing even before these changes took place find it increasingly strange that the government, given its previous rhetoric about the Soviet Union, refuses to recognize the changes that have taken place there and implement that change by calling an end to cruise missile testing in Canada and also calling an end to low-level flight testing and all the other ways in which Canada is being used as a free-fire zone for testing of U.S. weapons. The time has come for the government to change its policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member's time has now expired. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, before this historic week draws to a close, I want to compliment Premier Frank McKenna and his government for the encouraging initiative introduced in the New Brunswick legislature on Wednesday concerning the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. McKenna's text stated the issue extremely well, and I quote:

> National reconciliation was the original goal of Meech Lake and it must be even more so today. Conflict and resentment are threatening our integrity as a nation. Reconciliation is never easy and almost always involves putting generosity before pride. That kind of generosity of spirit is what we are seeking today.

It has long been my view, shared I know by most hon. members, that whatever it takes by all concerned, a way must be found to complete and adopt the Meech Lake Accord in the critical days which remain to do so. What will it take? As the Prime Minister said so clearly last evening, it will take a national will by every province and by the federal government together representing all Canadians.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada addressed the nation in the following terms:

> Generations of Canadians have accomplished things they would never have dreamt were possible: in an untamed environment, they built a civilization; in their isolation, they found a love for this country; in their communities they developed the spiritual and family values that enrich our nation. It is these simple and strong values that made Canada. Today I want to ask all Canadians to look into their hearts and discover that magnificent country we have built together.
> We are all privileged, francophones and anglophones, old and new Canadians, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, all without exception, to have made our homes in such a magnificent country. The problem we are facing today is not merely a constitutional deadlock or a debate among politicians. We, as heirs to one of the most beautiful countries in the world, are struck by the example of those who built in North America the home of tolerance and generosity. I urge all Canadians to close ranks and build together, with pride and determination, this beautiful, vast country we want to leave to our children.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, since March 7, Mr. Bill Ripley of the Action for Social Change organization in Kingston, has been protesting Canada's complicity in Indonesian acts of genocide in East Timor by a hunger strike. The strike is now in its seventeenth day and will end only when the Canadian government meets his organization's demands.

Action for Social Change wants the Canadian government to condemn Indonesian crimes against humanity in East Timor and calls for that country's right of self-determination. Since 1975, over 200,000 lives have been lost through war and starvation in East Timor. As a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, Canada has failed to complain on behalf of the people in East Timor.

I call upon the government, today, to press the government of Indonesia to work toward an equitable resolution of this situation. The suffering of these people must be noted, condemned and ended immediately, and the Canadian government must show some leadership.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, tomorrow marks the tenth anniversary of the murder of Archbishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador. Canadians will be marking the day with memorial services across the country.

The martyrdom of Archbishop Romero has become a symbol for all who walk the courageous path toward peace and justice in Central America.

Romero understood that true peace in Central America could only come from the people. He advocated liberation theology and the empowerment of those who were disenfranchised. Archbishop Romero died trying to realize the goal of justice for all.

Since the murder of Romero, there have been minimal attempts to investigate or punish those responsible. Instead, there has been a recurring pattern of death and repression of church and humanitarian workers. The recent brutal slaying of six Jesuits at the University of Central America prompted an initial investigation, but it has stalled and those implicated are being promoted or sent abroad.

As we mark the anniversary of this tragic event, we are encouraged by news that the FMLN and the ARENA government have agreed to renew negotiations. In memory of Oscar Romero and for the sake of all Salvadorans, we hope and pray that these talks will lead to peace in El Salvador.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House an ongoing Community Futures project in my riding. For the third time in a year, Cumberland Development Authority has played a key role in organizing a small business development day, involving all levels of government agencies such as, FBDB, ACOA, the Nova Scotia Department of Small Business, the development officials from Amherst, Springhill, Oxford, and Parrsboro, the Nova Scotia Research Foundation, Canada Employment Centre, as well as banks, accountants, consultants, and business leaders.

The point of these seminars is to provide assistance and encouragement to those who want to start their own small business. They have proven very successful and all those involved should be congratulated for their contribution to this excellent project.

UNIVERSITY OF MANITOBA

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House and to Canadians that the University of Manitoba has announced its third annual conference on terrorism and security.

The title of the conference is Islamic Terrorism in the 1990s and the Threat to North America. Needless to say, it is deeply offensive to the more than 160,000 adherents of Islam in Canada. Surely, a serious academic look at terrorism would spend some time on definition. Other than the session entitled "The Revelation Between Internal Iranian Politics and External Revolution", there is no indication in this program of any in-depth look at terrorism causes.

To hold a conference focusing on Islam terrorism does not make any more sense than a conference on Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism and terrorism. The conference and panel titles link Islam to terrorism so unabashedly that it could be considered to be bordering on hate-mongering.

I would call upon every decent Canadian to denounce any measure of this type of discrimination, and I hope that the University of Manitoba will reconsider this intended conference.

GLOBE 90

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, experts from across the world gathered this week in Vancouver for Globe 90. Canada's policies came under the spotlight and rated poorly on almost every count. The head of the United Nations Environment Program, Dr. Mostafa Tolba, slammed Canadian forestry policy for contributing to the greenhouse effect by cutting down four trees for every one that we plant.

Forty per cent of the marine pollution in Canada comes from pulp mills and despite being the largest industry in Canada and providing the largest source of balance of trade, there is no inventory. There is not even a plan for protecting old growth forests and some provinces like Alberta are planning to cut over one third of the entire province.

Three out of four Canadians consider our forests to be a national treasure held in trust. Three out of four think forest management is poor and that the industry is a threat. Nine out of ten believe spraying is a hazard according to the Environics poll released at Globe 90.

The federal government provides less than 10 cents out of every tax dollar raised from the forest sector back to that sector; the same level as the Liberals under Pierre Trudeau.

Globe 90 and the head of UNEP have set the record straight. There is not sustainable development going on in Canada's forests. We are cutting four times as many trees as we plant. Forest companies and government should stop lying about the facts. That is the message of Globe 90.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last night, the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "I have therefore decided to submit Premier McKenna's companion resolution to Parliament next week and then refer it immediately to a special committee of the House of Commons for public hearings".

Mr. Speaker, I don't think there has been any consultation with the opposition House leaders on the mandate of this special committee. I therefore want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister the following question: Will the government start these consultations as soon as possible so that we can have a very constructive analysis of the McKenna proposal? More specifically, will the Prime Minister ensure that this committee will be able to examine other proposals that are made for breaking the present constitutional deadlock?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, indeed I would think that it would be the intention of the House leader to meet with the House leaders of the two opposition parties.

I understand that there is a meeting scheduled for this afternoon to talk about that very thing. I think that these kinds of things, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition would know, would be perhaps most appropriately discussed within the context of the House leaders meeting, but clearly within the spirit of the speech that was made by the Prime Minister last night to the people of Canada, and indeed to the opposition parties.

I might say that we appreciate very much the support and the pledged co-operation from the two opposition leaders, and we will bear that in mind as we sit down to work out the appropriate terms of reference, and other reference guidelines for the conduct of the committee.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to learn that the government House leader intends to have a meeting with the House leaders of the opposition parties this afternoon.

At the same time, I think Canadians have a right to know as soon as possible the process the Prime Minister has in mind in asking the House to study and vote on the McKenna proposal with, as I recall the Prime Minister saying, whatever suggestions may emerge from the committee hearings.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in making this proposal is the government intending to start a new round of amendments to the Constitution of 1982, the existing Constitution? If so, is the government asking the provincial premiers to table the McKenna resolution in their legislatures for consideration at the same time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought it rather strange that the Prime Minister or the House leader would have outlined or advanced proposed terms of reference or proposed criteria for the conduct of the committee without first discussing it with the opposition parties.

That is precisely what he intends to do today and I think that what the Prime Minister said yesterday was in keeping totally with the spirit with which the premier of the province of New Brunswick came forth with the parallel resolution, not to take away from the Meech Lake Accord but indeed to complement the Meech Lake Accord and to cover some of those issues which have become of concern to many Canadians and indeed to the Premier of the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): I appreciate the spirit in which the Deputy Prime Minister is approaching this matter but I think some public clarification would be useful in responding favourably to the view of the premier of New Brunswick that there are matters that need to be dealt with that were not covered in the constitutional amendment of 1987.

Does the Prime Minister and his government intend that they be dealt with through amending the existing Constitution and if not, exactly what does the government have in mind through carrying out the exercise that was proposed by the Prime Minister in his speech last night? Furthermore, is not what the Deputy Prime Minister has said so far on this a reason why it would be extremely useful if, as soon as possible, there was a meeting of the Prime Minister and all the premiers of the provinces to go into this matter further?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition would agree that what we had the day before yesterday was an initiative taken by Premier McKenna of New Brunswick to break the log-jam. What the Prime Minister provided in his speech yesterday is indeed a vehicle for everyone to come together. I would hope that Premier McKenna would want to be one of the first witnesses to appear before that committee so he can appropriately lay out before the members of the special committee his views and his objectives that he would hope to be achieved in the course of the strategy that he has outlined.

With respect to the other part of the question, I can only repeat what I have said before and what the Prime Minister has said before and what has been concurred in by the premier of New Brunswick. At an appropriate time it may very well be useful to convene a meeting of First Ministers. As Premier McKenna indicated in a television interview last night, he thought at the present time it would probably not be appropriate.

We now have the vehicle and mechanism for bringing together all the parties to discuss his particular proposal. Furthermore, as I said earlier, he does not intend that this be the be all and the end all but that there is flexibility in that and in so doing, I think bringing all the parties together before that committee can be a very useful exercise.

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. As the Leader of the Opposition mentioned earlier, we believe that the initiative taken by the Prime Minister yesterday and the action taken by Mr. McKenna were very important as part of an attempt to break the constitutional deadlock, and we support these initiatives. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is as follows: Could the Minister inform the House whether the mandate of the Special Committee on the Constitution will be limited to Mr. McKenna's proposals or will the committee be able to consider other, related proposals it believes are essential to the advancement of this issue?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the House yesterday, I think what is unique about the proposal that Mr. McKenna has advanced is that he is proposing the adoption of Meech Lake without any subtractions but he is providing for a mechanism to add to it. That is, to add things that many Canadians and other premiers have felt should be considered within the context of constitutional reform.

I think it is within that spirit that the hearings would proceed. I repeat again, we now have a vehicle to explore that in a very formal way. I would expect that Premier McKenna would be one of the first witnesses to appear before that committee to lay out clearly, for the benefit of members and the benefit of all Canadians, just what he has in mind.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as the Deputy Prime Minister knows, Senate reform is a key constitutional issue, especially in western Canada and to a certain extent in Atlantic Canada. Will the government be ready to make its views known on Senate reform and refer these to the committee in order to assist and advance agreement on this constitutional issue? This is very important to several provinces in the west and it might assist in bringing the whole thing together and getting agreement. Will the government do that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. Senate reform is indeed a very important issue in western Canada as it is Atlantic Canada, as it is in all parts of the country quite frankly. But it is of major importance to western Canadians.

As he knows, the object of the exercise of Meech Lake was to have it ratified and to deal with the issues of Senate reform as one of the very first priorities. I can assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada takes Senate reform as a very major priority. At an appropriate time the Government of Canada will outline its position with respect to Senate reform.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday the U.S. Agricultural Secretary, Clayton Yeutter, announced an agreement to sell another 10 million tonnes of grain, oilseeds and meal annually to the U.S.S.R. Under the free trade agreement, the United States agreed that it would not invade our traditional markets. Here the U.S. is obviously moving into what has been our market, with the $900 million export enhancement program. This proves that we were sold down the river in this free trade deal as far as the farm grains area was concerned. What is Canada doing to protect and win back some of these traditional markets?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the member raises that question. We had meetings with the Canadian Wheat Board a week or so ago. The Wheat Board indicated to us that while the export enhancement program has the effect of depressing prices, as do the subsidies that are paid by the European Community, which the hon. member knows are considerably higher than those being paid by the United States, this has not affected Canadian market share. We are still maintaining our share and maintaining our traditional customers.

The hon. member asks what we are doing. We have certainly filed our notices through the appropriate diplomatic channels and I have spoken personally with Secretary Yeutter, reminding him of the commitment that has been made under the free trade agreement.

I should say as well that while we hear a lot about the amount of money that is being spent under the export enhancement program, in the range from $560 million to $900 million, in the period June 1989 to January 26, 1990 some $178 million Canadian was provided under the export enhancement program. So, I think it has to be put into perspective.

In the meantime, the Europeans are subsidizing exports of grain and oilseeds to the tune of $5 billion to $6 billion annually. What we have here is a situation of the United States responding to the actions of the European Community and Canada being caught in the cross-fire.

• (1130)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the minister's defence of the U.S. is very obvious, but we are being forced out of traditional markets. Our major sales last year were not to the U.S.S.R., not to China, not to the EEC but to Iran, which usually was about twelfth or thirteenth on our list of sales.

Export enhancement was used six times in January to boost our sales to the U.S.S.R. So it is affecting our markets. If the Americans are giving more money it is going to escalate the trade war. That is going to affect the whole grain structure to the extent that it eliminates the psychological feeling that grain is the basis for the western Canadian economy.

When is the government going to assure the farmers that it is backing them by giving them enough money to seed the crop this year since seeding time is coming very quickly?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to defend the United States. I am simply trying to respond to the hon. member's question in a factual way.

He says that we have lost traditional markets. He is right in some areas. In the case of the European Community, in 1979 and 1980 they were net importers of grains and oilseeds to the tune of about 12 million tonnes. Today,—

Mr. Hovdebo: They still buy our grain though.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would just listen, I would enlighten him a little bit. In this current year they are projected to be exporting some 25.8 million metric tons of grain. That is almost a 37 million tonne turnaround in a period of ten years.

At one time the European Community was one of our best customers. Not only have we lost them because of their huge subsidies and internal production, but they have become a major exporter of grain. They are today the world's second largest exporter of grain.

Those are the kinds of changes taking place and those are the kinds of changes of which the hon. member should take cognizance. Those are the kinds of issues we have to wrestle with as members of Parliament and as a government.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about maintaining our place in the market. The minister knows it is because of the Canadian Wheat Board that we are holding our place in the market. We support the Canadian Wheat Board and we have to do everything we can to strengthen its powers at every opportunity.

The minister also talks about the Export Enhancement Program depressing prices. Yesterday, in answer to my question, the minister said the deputy ministers are discussing the agriculture crisis in Canada.

Can the minister confirm that the deputy ministers are discussing a specific pay-out of at least $500 million as well as a restructuring of the farm debt? Will he confirm that he will be making an announcement on this when the ministers of agriculture of the provinces meet with him in British Columbia later this month?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon.

member, the ministers of agriculture are not meeting in British Columbia later this month.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Despite the public relations exercise at Globe 90 in Vancouver, the government is not acting to protect the environment. It has now been ten days since the Federal Court quashed approval for the Oldman dam and ordered the Ministers of Transport and Fisheries to conduct an environmental assessment of this project.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister explain why work on the Oldman dam continues and why the government is ignoring the Federal Court order?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the Federal Court order is not being ignored. Obviously it is being reviewed intensively. It adds to previous decisions by the courts. It is of serious concern to the Government of Canada, as it is to the provincial governments. As soon as the review is complete and the law officers have made their recommendations, there will be a response.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty weak answer to such an important issue, which the minister knows very well requires substantial movement on the part of the government if the public is to believe the promises the government is making.

My supplementary question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister, who seems to know the file better. In view of the fact that yesterday the Friends of the Oldman River, exasperated by the inaction of this government, sought a court order to enforce the Federal Court ruling, will the Minister of Transport halt the work on the Oldman dam today or will he wait to be embarrassed in court next week when the citizens will once again seek to do the job this government has the power to do but refuses to do?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because of the seriousness and the implications of this decision by the court, and the seriousness of the impact of such decisions on any future development, that we want to have a very thorough review. Such a review would obviously have to include the proponents of the project. This is not a federal project. It is a project for which, at least in the opinion of the court, there is some additional federal responsibility. We will exercise that responsibility as soon as we have reviewed the decision.

ENERGY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Energy. Last week the National Energy Board dropped its cost-benefit test on gas exports. Leading industry experts have indicated this week that that test should be kept because it protects the national interest.

What does the minister or the government intend to do about the board's decision to drop the test? Will the minister reassure Canadians that our natural gas will not be sold to foreigners at a loss to Canada?

Mr. Thacker: You guys really hate the west.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that that will be the case, of course. The board is going to continue to examine export contracts, including contract flexibility, but would only intervene in exceptional circumstances.

Certainly the export of gas is very important to the economy of this country. It assures further exploration throughout the western provinces. It is a very important part of our economy. Why would we not export that gas?

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, that certainly does not answer my question. My supplementary question is for the same minister.

This week the National Energy Board said that it would re-examine the 10 deals which previously flunked the test. If approved, these deals could cost Canada anywhere from $130 million to $500 million, depending on the National Energy Board figures.

How can the government do nothing while the Americans buy our gas at fire sale prices?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, we are seeing a very fine display today of why the Liberals cannot elect anybody in Alberta. They do not care about the west, they do not understand the west, and the ignorance is being shown very broadly today in the House.

PANAMA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could stop the debate about the national energy program for a minute so that I could ask my question.

My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In a recent report on the U.S. invasion of Panama, the Central American Human Rights Commission discloses that the invasion was not the surgical strike that the U.S. would have us believe.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware of this report? Is he aware of the claims in that report that the U.S. army used highly sophisticated and, in some cases, newly developed weapons against unarmed civilians; that the actual number of civilian fatalities was at least 10 times greater than the U.S. figure of 220, that death tolls were obscured by the burning of bodies, the use of common graves without identification, and the U.S. military control of hospital administration offices; that human rights were abused by the occupying U.S. military; and that a well planned propaganda campaign has ensued since the invasion to cover up the brutality of U.S. actions?

These are very serious charges made by a reputable human rights commission. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs undertake to study these claims? If he finds that he is not in a position to deny these claims, would he review the government's support of the U.S. invasion of Panama?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been in the House for some time and usually observes very closely the courtesies of the House. I know he wanted to put his views on record with regard to this report. If he had wanted an answer from me he could have brought it to my attention earlier. In fact, we spoke just before the Question Period began and he did not raise it with me.

Naturally I will look at the report to which he refers and after I have had a chance to consider it I will respond. He knows that if I am given notice on matters I try regularly to provide a response to the House.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, this report has been circulated. It has been around for a few days. I assumed that if, with the meagre resources of an opposition critic, I had the opportunity to see the report, the Department of External Affairs might also have come across it. I know that the minister is a busy person and I take him at his word that he is not aware of the report. I have brought it to his attention.

I am asking him now whether he will have a look at that report. If he finds himself in a position where he is not able to deny these claims, or if he finds that there is some truth in them, will he review the Canadian government's support of that invasion and will he pursue these revelations through the Organization of American States, which also expressed concern about U.S. actions in Panama?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must enjoy a higher place on the CIA mailing lists than I do. I certainly will take a look at the report and take whatever action is appropriate.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. The former fisheries minister promised to make experimental fisheries permanent once fishermen had secured markets and stocks were determined to be adequate to support the fishery. This is the case now with the rock crab fishery in the maritimes. Markets were established and fish stocks were determined to be adequate.

Therefore, will the minister tell us when he will take action to make this fishery permanent?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do intend to look at all the issues affecting the Atlantic fishery. The issue of the permanence of this fishery is one in which a lot of people have a big stake. I intend to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that whatever is reasonable can be done.

I will not take any steps to jeopardize anything that is already in place there. Also, I will not do like certain members, and create false hope in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Would the minister commit some research money to the rock crab fishery to ensure that the stocks remain healthy and are not overfished to near extinction, like the snow crab fishery?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): I am not offended at all, Mr. Speaker, by the idea that we should have research to ensure conservation of our stocks. As we are in the process of looking at the scientific effort in Atlantic Canada to conserve those stocks, we will surely give consideration to the suggestion of the member.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The 880 Tracker Squadron, which is responsible for doing the mid-range fisheries and sovereignty surveillance on the Atlantic coast ceases operations in eight days. Tomorrow the squadron hands in its colours and will be disbanded. This is a black day for Summerside and a black day for Prince Edward Island.

Can the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans tell the House who will be doing the mid-range fisheries and sovereignty surveillance patrols on April 1?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague the Secretary of State of External Affairs indicated, had I been given notice of this question I could give an exact answer.

All I can say is that recently the government funded aerial research in Atlantic Canada by an additional $28 million. That is a serious effort, but I am unable today to give a specific answer to that specific question.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the 880 Squadron, as I have just stated, is going out of business tomorrow. Their last flying day will actually be in eight days' time. One would think that a year after making the announcement the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would know who was going to be doing the fisheries and sovereignty patrols.

The minister has stated that the government is spending $28 million a year now. How much does he anticipate it is going to cost when it takes over total control?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I do undertake to provide the hon. member with a detailed account of everything that is done to ensure surveillance in Atlantic Canada.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. The aboriginal communication network was established not out of greed, but rather out of need. Trail radio system has been proven to save lives and it is thanks only to The Micmac News that Donald Marshall is a free man today.

The mainstream media are not serving the needs of aboriginal people. The Prime Minister said last night that Canada had not arrived at a just and equitable arrangement with its first people. Will the Secretary of State not now reinstate funding for the native communication programs in his department?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware how effective the communication societies have been and how important a role they have been playing in Canadian society.

I personally have been meeting with some of the communication societies. I had the opportunity to meet with Roy Gould of The Micmac News when I was recently in Nova Scotia. This afternoon I will be meeting with the executive and board members of the National Aboriginal Communication Society and I look forward to very fruitful meetings.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the meeting that is taking place this afternoon with the Secretary of State. I understand that he has already said to the native communication network that he is going to be looking to other departments for some assistance in funding this program. We know, with the cuts that are taking place, that is just not feasible.

They want from the Secretary of State a concrete answer as to what exactly he is going to do about their needs, not wishy-washy stories. They need the funding. The Secretary of State has a responsibility to meet those needs and I think that is the message that he has to convey to the committee this afternoon. I encourage him to do so and ask him if that is what he is intending to do this afternoon.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, my departments have undergone expenditure reduction and we have handled that in a very fair and consistent manner. Indeed, if we examine the aboriginal program that the government has for this year, it encompasses some $4 billion. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs itself has seen its funding grow from the 1984–85 period from $1.4 billion to some $2.3 billion today.

When I was in Nova Scotia I reminded Roy Gould of The Micmac News that in Nova Scotia alone the funding went from some $26 million in 1984–85 to about $49 million last year. That is almost double.

• (1150)

We instituted a task force and that force is already in place. We are bringing together elements from the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, from Industry, Science and Technology, from Health and Welfare, from every government department that has an interest in being helpful. We are examining the situation that each of the communication societies has been left in and seeing how we can help them to carry on.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory affairs) and concerns the textile industry which must cope with the challenge of adjustment as a result of the Free Trade Agreement, the multilateral GATT negotiations and the Uruguay Round, the Multifiber Agreement which ends next year and the tariff reduction proposed by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, whose report will be tabled today.

Could the minister give the House and workers in the textile industry the assurance that the government's decision on implementing these policies will have the consequence of continuing to attract investment in Canada and will not involve any loss of jobs?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, later today I will be tabling in the House the Canadian Import Trade Tribunal textile tariff report. This report was requested by the Minister of Finance to take a look at the textile industry and the tariffs we have in Canada which, I might say, are much higher than those of any other industrialized country in the world. The report will be making certain recommendations to the government which we will consider.

I can assure the workers in the industry and the industry itself that every consideration will be taken by the government to assure that we maintain a viable industry in Canada.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Science. Last Friday his parliamentary secretary told this House, and I quote: "The NRC has been Canada's foremost research institute and it continues to be the cornerstone of Canada's science and technology strategy."

We know that the National Research Council draft five-year plan provides for 500 NRC jobs to be cut. Is the minister trying to tell Canadians that 500 more lay-offs and the cancellation of programs and divisions at the National Research Council constitute the cornerstone of his science and technology strategy? Is this what the Prime Minister means when he says that R and D is the lifeblood of the nation?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the National Research Council has considered and is still considering the many options available to it for its long-range plan.

My understanding is that consultations are still going on with all of its client groups, with its partners in many of its operations, and that they will be taking some decisions. They will actually be finalizing their long-term plan sometime in the next few months and we will take decisions at that time. I am not ready to take any decisions now as I do not have the plan.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister is right, consultations have been carried on. They have consulted with the Science Council, they have consulted with universities, they have consulted with industry, but the researchers at NRC and their representatives have been told that their input would be redundant. This process is absolutely devastating morale at the National Research Council.

Will the minister today insist that the president of the NRC hold meaningful consultations with the scientists and researchers at the NRC? Will the Minister for Science for Canada himself take an active role in these consultations to ensure that the people are cared for?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the National Research Council itself is going to have to make some recommendations about the long-term future of NRC. At the appropriate time, I have no doubt that the management of NRC will be discussing their plans with the scientists of the council.

At the moment the charge to the National Research Council is to produce a long range plan which will ensure that NRC remains a viable, vigorous and relevant institution for this country over the next several years. That is the charge to them.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court has ruled that telecommunications falls under federal jurisdiction.

Today in Le Devoir, it is reported that Quebec has claimed this area as its own.

Has the government received a copy of the document entitled: "Proposals for sharing responsibility for telecommunications between the federal government and the provincial governments", filed last week by Quebec in Ottawa? If the government received the document, is it prepared to release it and let us know what its position is in this respect?

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that any document which will or has been received will be given careful study.

I cannot confirm that the document in question has been received at this time.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the government responded "will have received", "did receive" or "is receiving".

Irrespective of the language, present, past, future, I sincerely hope that the government will undertake to honour its commitment which it demonstrated when it deposited a bill in this House.

I would like the assurance of this government that it is prepared to respect the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the AGT case of last August and reaffirm its acceptance of telecommunication as a national, federal jurisdiction which is in the interests of the business and the people of this land from coast to coast.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, my answer to the hon. member was that this government favours a single, federal system for regulating telecommunications.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you recall that back in 1984 the Conservative party promised to have as a priority the simplification of the income tax forms. I have here a copy of the 1984 throne speech, the first throne speech of the government across the way. It says: "The taxation system will remain simpler and fairer."

I would like to ask the minister to explain a study that was commissioned by the Department of National Revenue last year on the income tax form which found that of the taxpayers surveyed, some 46 per cent had to pay for help to fill out the income tax form last year, which was the first year of tax reform, compared to 30 per cent the year before, which was before tax reform.

Why this increase from 30 per cent to 45 per cent when the government promised to make the income tax form simpler? Why has it gone back on its word?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as you know, there are numerous studies on any subject, including the one to which the hon. member refers.

The only study that counts is the actual counting of the income tax returns that come into Revenue Canada. Over 18 million such returns came in last year and our observations of those returns showed that approximately the same amount of people last year used outside tax consultants and assistance as had in previous years.

We have worked very diligently with the Plain Language Centre and other outside organizations to simplify not only the language but the context of the forms. In fact, Lyman MacInnis, senior partner with the Toronto based accounting firm of Deloitte & Touche recently said: "Given the complexity of the act, Revenue Canada has done a hell of a great job with the forms this year".

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am referring to a study commissioned by Revenue Canada which said that the number of people who needed help went up from 30 per cent to 46 per cent after tax reform. Maybe the problem is one that was identified in the PC task force report on April 8, 1984. It states at page 5: "One of the problems in national revenue is that there has been a tradition of weak and junior ministers of national revenue", a tradition that continues today.

Another study done by the University of Montreal showed that the average taxpayer who requires outside help spends $349 a year for that help or a total of $5.5 billion in 1986 before tax reform. I assume it is much higher after tax reform.

In light of those facts, why has the Conservative government gone back on a promise it made in 1984 and 1985 to simplify the tax form and save the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money? Why has it not fulfilled that promise?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I note that the New Democratic Party has junior opposition critics of finance and revenue. That tradition has not changed in that party for many years.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): But it has in ours.

An hon. member: They can't count.

Mr. Jelinek: Second, I can only repeat that when the member talks about outside assistance to taxpayers, the figure based on the 18 million people who filed income tax returns shows that last year there was roughly the same number of Canadians using outside assistance as in previous years.

We have kept our promises from 1984 by working toward simplification of the tax system, including the forms. However, I admit that the status quo of making the language simpler and less complex for Canadians is still not accepted by the majority of Canadians as totally simple. That is why I have moved toward electronic filing, a pilot project which is taking place in Winnipeg this filing season. That will be expanded to include all of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta next year. By the middle of this decade, that is to say within the next four or five years, all Canadians will have the option to file electronically which will eliminate paper work, eliminate errors, speed up the process and make it cheaper, simpler and more efficient for all Canadians.

TABLING OF TEXTILE TARIFF REFERENCE REPORT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I rise today to table on behalf of the Minister of Finance, pursuant to subsection 21(2) of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal Act, the tribunal's report on the textile tariff reference, in both official languages.

I wish to thank the tribunal for its extensive research in studying the issues and for the openness of its inquiry process. The government will be responding to the report after carefully reviewing and assessing the tribunal's research and recommendations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, March 26, 1990, the House meet at one o'clock p.m. and proceed to the Business of Supply

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. minister have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I think there will be recognition by members of this House that as a result of deliberations from ten o'clock to eleven o'clock this morning and the point at which we are in the Routine Proceedings it would be possible, by relatively elementary use of the rules, in fact to deny any opportunity for any debate whatsoever by the New Democratic Party on its motion. This would be a use of the rules of the House in an inappropriate fashion, and we do not intend to do that.

I raise the point to make one simple point. The rules and procedures are there to facilitate the operations of the House. From time to time they are used to make a point, and that is part of the procedure, but to use the rules to deny anybody in the House the right to do what they were elected to do, namely for opposition parties to debate on opposition days and for governments to bring their legislative programs to a vote in an appropriate fashion and time, I think is misuse of the rules.

I hope we can deal with items in the future by our past practices of discussing them and making arrangements to make life comfortable for all and to fulfil our responsibilities to the people of Canada, rather than the kind of guerrilla warfare which I maintain merely wastes taxpayers' money and is not fulfilling our duty.

I say to the New Democratic Party, not in anger or anything, that we do not intend to destroy their day. The power would be here. It would accomplish nothing except another tit for tat operation which only leads to frustration and the government not doing the duty it has to the people of Canada who elected it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, at the last meeting of House leaders unanimous consent was given for the following motion:

> That Standing Order 129 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "129.(1) At the beginning of a session, the Clerk of the House shall publish in The Canada Gazette the Standing Order respecting notices of intended applications for private bills and the Standing Orders respecting the time limit for receiving petitions for private bills. Thereafter, the Clerk of the House shall publish weekly in The Canada Gazette a notice referring to the previous publication of the aforementioned Standing Orders.
> (2) By the first day of every session, the Clerk of the House shall announce by notice affixed in the lobbies of the House the time limit for receiving petitions for private bills."

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I only want to state that there was such consultation a few days ago. Indeed we are prepared to give unanimous consent on our side of the House.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am advised that there have been appropriate consultations. Of course we will give our unanimous consent, but I would just like to suggest that in the same manner in which we were consulted on the motion by the government House leader in the last 45 minutes dealing with Monday, I was not advised that the parliamentary assistant to the government House leader was to move the motion at this time, so I did not have a chance to consult directly with those in the know. I appreciate the government Whip coming over, but if we could follow that kind of procedure it would prevent accidents from occurring.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have petitions with about 480 names from many different parts of Canada urging the government to bring an end to the low-level flight training for NATO operations at Goose Bay and to redirect the funding used in that toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and for promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present 19 petitions containing about 662 names of residents of the Okanagan—Shuswap area.

• (1210)

I might add that this is my next instalment of petitions concerning opposition to the goods and services tax, for a total of about 330 petitions and 15,400 names which actually represent over 28 per cent of the registered voters in the riding of Okanagan—Shuswap.

These signatures come from areas such as Blind Bay, Vernon, Lumby, Cherryville, Armstrong, Enderby, Sicamous, Salmon Arm, Sorrento, Anglemont, Celista, Canoe, Malakwa, Mabel Lake, Mara and Grindrod. I might add that I even have a few from Regina and Saskatoon.

The petitioners who have signed these petitions against the GST ask the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. They ask that there be reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Last, they ask the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): This is not quite the time for debate.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to stand to present petitions of many people from the city of Nepean who continue to be opposed to the goods and services tax. I have presented many signatures to the House of Commons in this regard.

They ask that the Government of Canada please consider rescinding this very regressive bill.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present this petition from the residents of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island who oppose the goods and services tax and feel that it would create higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

They call upon this Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from Chibougamau, Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Chibougamau is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient as it concerns the Northern Tax Benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—RURAL CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hovdebo:

That this House call upon the government to commit itself, on the week of the second annual Rural Revitalization Day and the anniversary of the birth of Agnes MacPhail, the first woman elected to this House and an untiring champion of the rights of rural Canadians, to provide for a vital economic, social and environmentally sustainable future for rural Canada and the millions of Canadians who live in our vast rural areas, by implementing a program to:

1) stabilize family farm incomes and ease the crippling debt load which at present threatens the very survival of tens of thousands of family farms;

2) assist fishing communities to survive the current crisis in the fishery and take steps to ensure the proper management of the fishery in the future;

3) modify existing transportation and other infrastructure policies to assure all primary producers, co-operative and rural small businesses that they can be competitive in both the domestic and the international market-place;

4) provide a full range of education, health and other social policies to enable young families, the elderly and others to live comfortably in rural and isolated parts of Canada; and

5) provide a full range of services, including shelters, child care services and skills training to support the crucial role played by women in all rural communities.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, Wednesday, March 21, marked the second annual Rural Revitalization Day.

Rural Revitalization Day is the day proclaimed and set aside by Rural Dignity of Canada and observed by Canadians who understand the proud rural roots of this great country. It is a day to honour Canadian rural communities and to draw public attention to the extremely serious problems currently faced by too many rural communities.

As can be seen clearly, the purpose of this motion today is not to condemn the government. Rather, it calls for continued efforts on the part of government to develop policy and modify existing policy with the aim of strengthening the economic and social base on which communities can grow.

What is rural Canada? More than 90 per cent of Canada is rural. There are 9,000 small communities, cities, towns and villages, as well as several hundred thousand farmers, fishers and other rural dwellers in various occupations.

The industries of rural Canada are farming, fishing, forestry, mining, tourism, transportation and dozens of other locally suitable occupations which supply services to other rural Canadians.

Almost every raw product that cities demand and need come from rural communities. Be it cereals, oil, power, lumber, gravel or even drinking water, they all come from outside city limits. The people who produce, mine or just care for these products are residents of rural Canada.

Almost all of Canada's natural resources and a good part of our human resources are found in that vast area we call rural Canada. Despite having all these rich resources, rural Canadians face a bleak and unpromising future. Farming and fisheries particularly are going through a catastrophic economic time so severe that the future of thousands of Canadians and thousands of farm and fishing families are in immediate and at serious risk.

If urgent government action is not taken, these people will be forced out of business. They will follow their sisters and brothers, sons and daughters to the cities. Their rural communities will wither and die, which deaths will be to the detriment of not only rural Canada but all the rest of Canada as well.

Saskatchewan has been losing 20 residents per day throughout the winter. That is one every hour or so. That means that since the last federal election two towns the size of Humboldt which is my constituency have disappeared from Saskatchewan, or five towns the size of Rosthern, also in my constituency, have disappeared from rural Saskatchewan.

It has been obvious for some time that social, economic and technological changes are aspects of rural life that are resulting in major dislocation and stress in families and individuals in rural Canada. The main concern of farms on the prairies these days, and to a lesser extent across Canada, is the farm debt which is debilitating and causing a considerable amount of concern. Also, the amount of return the farmers are getting from crops and livestock that they raise is so little that they are unable to finance those debts and maintain a fair level of living.

In Saskatchewan alone, out of 61,000 or so farmers, 20,000 are in some kind of financial distress. They are either being foreclosed on or finding themselves in difficulty as far as continuing farming is concerned. All farmers in Saskatchewan, except those who are able to finance themselves, are having difficulty borrowing funds to plant this year's crop. This lack of operating funds is forcing more people off the farms. The impact of having to change one's vocation is much greater than someone who is just changing a job.

The farmer who loses his or her land is forced out of farming. The stress is much greater than would ordinarily be the case in losing a job. It means losing a way of life. It means losing a heritage which may have been built over many generations. In many cases the grandfathers or great-grandfathers homesteaded those farms. They are losing the land that their great-grandfather built, cleared and made into a farm. They are losing the farm. They feel that they are betraying that heritage, the trust of their ancestors, and their children who might follow them on that particular land.

Farmers' sons or daughters do not just decide to start farming at the age of 18 years. They do not just suddenly say: "I am going to take up agriculture and become a farmer". Most people who go into farming have lived on the farm and grew into farming. It is part of their life from their first days after birth. Losing it is like losing that life.

Fishing families have had much the same heritage. Taking them out of the vocation has the same devastating impact as it does on farmers. The stress and loss of confidence to which this leads causes a considerable amount of dislocation and things happen which would not ordinarily happen in those structures.

In my home province we are seeing a tremendous increase in family break-ups in the rural areas. We are seeing a tremendous amount of illness among farmers and farmers' wives, and young farms in many cases. We are also seeing physical illness, psychological illness and nervous breakdowns. The suicide rate has substantially increased, to the point where some psychologists are suggesting that in rural areas more than 50 per cent of the suicides are caused by the economic disintegration of the family farm.

Alcoholism has increased considerably. As in much of the rest of Canada and the rest of society, in bad times women and children suffer the most. When farming, fishing and forestry can no longer provide the requirements of a good life for the family, women and children are hurt the most.

The motion I have put before the House at this time recognizes the crucial role played by women in rural communities. On the farm they are often required to carry three jobs. Not only do they play a substantial role in the operation of the farm; they also raise the family, take care of the house and make sure the meals are cooked. Today, a large percentage of farm women, nearing 50 per cent, work off the farm to bring in some needed cash so the farm can survive. The motion pays special attention to the role of women and the need for support of women in these circumstances.

The impact in rural areas is one of depopulation, not only in farming communities but in fishing communities and in a large part of the rest of rural Canada.

Most city folk consider living in rural Canada sort of idyllic, but it is only idyllic as long as the necessary services to raise a family are in place. They will tell me how lucky I am to live on a farm where it is quiet and serene. It is, and I appreciate it. It is getting more and more difficult to raise a family in those circumstances because the services that are necessary to raise a family, such as education, health services and recreation, are becoming less and less available in rural communities. Rural hospitals, post offices, schools and other service centres are being shut down without any regard for the needs of the people who remain in those communities.

It is time to recognize the immense benefits we derive from these rural and their resources and return to rural Canadians a fair share of the benefits they supply to Canada.

When an industry in a particular area becomes less viable the families start to move out. This depopulation leads to removal of services because the community cannot afford to pay them, or as happened in many cases lately because the government is trying to save some money and is no longer willing to provide those services. When the service people move out they reduce the population further so that more services are jeopardized, which leads to further depopulation. It is like a snowball rolling downhill which picks up snow and becomes larger as it moves down the hill. Or, it is like dominoes set up in a row; when you knock down one eventually all of them fall. We all know the solution if you want to simplify it enough: it is economic stability.

In the case of farming the debt would have to be dealt with as well and first. Most farmers have learned to deal with the variables of raising a crop, fluctuating prices and intransigent weather. On a day to day basis the threat of losing the farm eats into the hope and eventually causes such tremendous stress that psychologically it is difficult for those people to continue. On the farms we must first deal with the debt and, second, we must deal with stable economic income.

Fishing communities are in much the same situation. They face the same kind of extinction in many cases. Again there is a need for the community to survive during a crisis. In the case of fisheries, it is necessary that the available fish provide income to communities and to develop the fisheries to the point where they can expect to continue in those areas. I could go on to talk about forestry and other industries relative to rural Canada which are being affected these days in much the same way.

• (1230)

In closing, I want to take a moment to pay special tribute to Rural Dignity of Canada. Rural Dignity is a network of Canadians working together to develop public awareness of the problems facing rural communities. Rural Dignity is more than that, however. It is a committed group of people who work to find realistic solutions to the problems faced by rural communities throughout Canada. Rural Dignity is to be commended for efforts to strengthen the economic and social base of rural Canada.

I want to quote two excerpts from press releases and news items which have come out of write-ups of the Rural Dignity:

> Towns and villages are ecosystems as fragile as any marshland or northern shore. The social and economic well-being of our small communities, their relation to one another and with the entire country rests on a delicate web of interdependent threads: post offices, trains, local fish plants and grain elevators, family farms.

That is the kind of concern that Rural Dignity has been showing for what is happening to rural Canada.

It is my fervent hope that all members of this House, on both sides of the Chamber, will reflect on the difficulties experienced today by thousands of farming and fishing families, dwellers of rural Canada.

This motion was intended to be, and is, a very positive motion. It does not condemn the government. It does not look into the past to say anything about who should accept the blame. It talks only about sustaining rural Canada. It does not blame anyone. This motion points out the need of action if rural Canada is going to survive. It attempts to tell all of us how important and valuable rural Canada is, and how it is important, not only to those rural Canadians, but to the rest of the nation. This motion, as far as possible, is intended to be a vehicle. It is an attempt to draw attention to the way of life that is important to Canada and the basis for the heritage of many people in the country.

This motion points out the devastation of rural Canada does not have to happen and that we should make a commitment now to provide the economic, social and environmental atmosphere to have a sustainable rural Canada. Consequently, I hope that all members here today can find it in their hearts to say, yes, even if we cannot do it today or tomorrow, we will make a commitment to make sure that rural Canada can survive in the next few years. We need rural Canada as much or more than we need the strengthened economy of the cities.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak about a subject that is very near and dear to my heart. I want to associate myself with many of the comments that the hon. member outlined when talking about the amenities of rural life and the very special life-style that it provides to so many people, particularly those who are involved in farming, fishing, mining, forestry and the tourism industry.

His motion does zero in on a number of items such as stabilizing the family farm income and the debt situation. I would want to seize the opportunity to place on the record some of the initiatives that our government has taken in that regard.

The hon. member talked about the fishing communities and the fact that we all recognize that there are some difficulties in the fishing industry and in the Atlantic region particularly. We are addressing those problems, first, with a commitment of $130 million that was provided as an interim measure of support. As well, as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries have indicated in the House, we are working on a package which, hopefully, can be announced fairly soon to help resolve some of the difficulties that result when the stocks of fish are declined to the extent that it does affect the rural communities in a very devastating way.

He talked as well about transportation, the need to have an adequate transportation infrastructure, and to ensure that that transportation system is efficient, effective, and does provide the necessary links for commodities and people to travel. In the course of my experience as a cabinet minister, particularly as Minister of Transport, we embarked upon a program of regulatory reform which freed up the system enormously. I must say that I get a tremendous amount of satisfaction when I land in Halifax, for example, and I see all the commuter aircraft parked at the Halifax air terminal. They provide service to many of the smaller communities that never had service before.

The same applies in Edmonton and Calgary and perhaps even more so in Vancouver where the smaller communities are linking up with the major carriers, providing regular service and greater frequency of service. Maybe they are not flying jets, but what they are indeed flying are products built here in Canada, such as the de Havilland Dash–7 and Dash–8. That really demonstrates how one can integrate the policies of transportation with economic policy not only to improve the transportation system for all Canadians but indeed to create jobs in those very important industries.

Rural life is very special. I certainly associate myself with the words of the hon. member. There is a sense of hardiness and a sense of community. There is a sense of community discipline and a pioneering spirit that is evident in smaller communities. There is a sense of self–reliance. There is a sense of co–operation and support in smaller communities. One of the great gifts of a small community is that if you are ever in trouble as a citizen there, you are never alone. Your neighbours and friends are the first ones there to help you. As a result of that attitude, there has been a tradition developed in these communities. It is as alive today as it was when the rural areas were first settled. There is that clear gift of helping each other and co–operating. I am sure the hon. member would agree that it was in that spirit that many of the co–operative movements sprang up in western Canada, movements which are still in effect today.

I know that there are many problems in the rural communities. But even today what is most satisfying is to go to a community and see the citizens roll up their sleeves to build a community hall, a curling rink, an arena or a cultural facility. I am sure the hon. member, as I do, has opportunities of opening these facilities. With a certain amount of government assistance provided at both the federal and provincial levels, we provide that kind of additional stimulus to ensure that spirit of co–operation and reaching out to help each other is nurtured.

Clearly, from my perspective, rural life and agriculture are really synonymous. As agriculture changes, so does the environment within our rural communities. It is true that the agriculture industry, particularly in western Canada, has gone through turbulent times in the past few years. Many people overlook this but we had a drought situation that was worse than what was experienced in the Dirty Thirties. The fact that farming and farmers have survived is a tribute to their resilience and a tribute to the fact that governments have in fact responded to this particular challenge.

We have trade wars resulting in low commodity prices. We have had other weather related disasters. In some areas, we have had excessive rain and flood situations. We have had grasshoppers. We have had the problem of increasing input costs. We have had the problem of changes in the market–place.

In Question Period earlier today, I outlined the fact that today the European Economic Community is no longer one of our major customers. It is one of our major competitors. As a matter of fact, it is the second largest exporter of grains and oilseeds in the world. That has an impact on us within our own agricultural industry and it also has an impact upon the rural communities relying upon it for their sustenance.

There have been changes in consumer demands. People are eating different things and placing priorities on different articles of produce. That has to be taken into consideration. Above all, there have been changes in technology.

All these elements have made it necessary for agriculture to adjust and to change and that has had an impact upon our rural communities as well. There is, particularly, the devastating reduction in incomes as a result of drought and other weather related disasters. Bear in mind that we had programs such as stabilization and crop insurance in place hopefully to respond to these. But, the experience of the past number of years demonstrates to us that these programs have not been adequate or sufficient. The result of this has had a major impact upon market receipts, particularly in western Canada.

I would like to read into the record the market receipts over a five–year period. These are market receipts in western Canada because that is what the hon. member was referring to primarily. In 1984, the market receipts were $6.5 billion; in 1987, the market receipts dropped to $4.6 billion, a drop of almost $1.9 billion in the market–place; in 1988, they strengthened to $5.1 billion; in 1989, they strengthened more to $5.6 billion; and in 1990, the year about which everybody is very concerned, market receipts have gone down slightly but not nearly as dramatically as they did between 1984 and 1987. At $5.3 billion, obviously there have been other factors that have been taken into consideration. What I am saying here is that with that decline in revenue from the market-place, clearly farmers would not have been able to survive without massive government support. I would like to put that into perspective.

In the period of 1981–84, the average realized net income in the agricultural community in Canada averaged $3.1 billion. In the period 1985–89, it averaged $4 billion, an increase of about 30 per cent. Direct assistance provided by the federal government in 1981–84 averaged about $600 million. Direct government assistance provided by the federal government in the period 1985–89 amounted to $2.5 billion on average. That is over a fourfold increase. It does not matter how you slice it, there has been massive government support.

In terms of federal support for all of agriculture, in the period 1981–84 it averaged at $2.3 billion and between 1985–89 it averaged $4.6 billion per year. That is a twofold increase. I think that is very important to keep in mind because we certainly have to give credit where credit is due.

What is more important, and I want to point this out, is that there has been a dramatic increase in support at the federal level over what the provinces have been providing. In terms of the total government support package, federal government support rose from 60 per cent in the early 1980s to over 75 per cent in the latter part of the decade. In the prairies, it has risen. For example, in the period 1981–84, Manitoba provided about 20 per cent of the assistance support and the federal government provided 80 per cent. In Saskatchewan, in that same period of 1981–84, the federal government provided about 85 per cent of the support and the province, 15 per cent. In Alberta, in that same period of 1981–84, the federal share was 45 per cent and the provincial share was 55 per cent.

To illustrate what I am saying, in the next five-year period, 1985–89, in Manitoba the federal share went up to 90 per cent and the provincial share dropped to 10 per cent. In Saskatchewan, in that same period, the federal share was at 87 per cent and the provincial share was at 13 per cent. And in Alberta, the federal share went up to about 65 per cent and the provincial share was at 35 per cent. I think that clearly demonstrates the fact that the federal government has been there, as we have said we would be there, and we are there today.

A few other things have happened and I would like to put them on the record because it ties in to the first element of the hon. member's motion. That is the whole issue of providing income stability and dealing with the debt load. Let us just review the record.

I should say that federal assistance to the grains and oilseeds industry from 1981–84 amounted to $350 million annually. That is an average. From 1985–90, it amounted to $2.5 billion per year, a sevenfold increase to the grains and oilseeds sector.

Here are some of the other things that we did during the period of 1985–90. We placed a moratorium on foreclosures while addressing the serious financial difficulties being experienced by the farm community. That was from December 1984 to May 1987.

We brought in an $80 million, 4 per cent interest rate reduction program, reducing all Farm Credit Corporation loans at 16.75 per cent down to 12.75 per cent. It was at 16.75 per cent because, remember, we were coming out of that period of high interest that the Liberals were responsible for. It drove interest rates up to 24 per cent. That is what happened.

We introduced the shared FCC risk mortgage. We established the Farm Debt Review Board program. Some 9,000 applications have been handled by this program. There were 6,500 arrangements identified, meaning that 77 per cent of those using the board have reached an agreement. We committed $360 million to the Farm Debt Review Board to cover concessions, interest rate write-downs and write-downs on the value of the land. We have injected some $600 million into the Farm Credit Corporation, to cover loan losses. There is about $1.4 billion that needs to be written down.

As a result of the government assistance, a new band-aid, and considerable effort by the FCC, arrears have declined from almost 15,000 loans in fiscal year 1987 to 9,000 loans in February 1990. Of the 5,700 Farm Debt Review Board cases referred to by the FCC, 5,200 have been resolved. We established a $30 million Canadian rural transition program. We announced commodity-based loans. We passed a new farm improvement loan act. We brought in the two Special Canadian Grains Programs. We covered $300 million worth of losses in the Canadian Wheat Board pool accounts. We covered $750 million in losses in the Western Grains Stabilization Act.

We contribute about $200 million annually for crop insurance and that is going to go up to $300 million. We paid out some $4 billion under the WGSA between 1985 and 1989, and I think that ratio was about $10 or $11 federal money for every $1 put in by the producer. We incurred a deficit in the federal crop insurance fund of some $500 million over the last four years as a result of payouts of $2.4 billion. We have improved the crop insurance program to include the multi-year disaster benefit relief program of which over $100 million has been paid out this year. We provided fuel price rebate relief of $200 million per year. We provided a total of $1.17 billion in emergency drought assistance between 1984 and 1988 and we brought in stabilization programs for the red meat industry, expending some $650 million to date. From 1984–85 to the present, we expended some $483 million for horticulture and eastern grain products through stabilization programs.

That in itself is quite a litany of achievements and I could go on. After 1984–85, we presented the five-year dairy program and provided $1.2 billion. We provided tobacco growers with $62 million, and grape growers with $128 million in transition assistance. What is encouraging is that both the grape and the wine industries are moving along very nicely, thank you very much, both in Ontario and in British Columbia. The fact of the matter is they recognize that adjustments had to be made. The federal government was there, and the provincial governments as well, to help in that adjustment process.

So, total government initiatives during the period 1984–90 have well exceeded some $22 billion. I could go on and talk about the improvements in the crop insurance program and the plant breeders' rights.

Today, I am announcing that the farmers living in the designated areas of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are eligible for a one-year tax deferral on income derived from the drought-induced sale of breeding livestock in 1989. This is something that has been done before with regard to the serious drought problems in that particular region. There are other areas and we will be writing to the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Ontario which has some pockets of drought. Wherever there are pockets of drought based on forage yields of less of 50 per cent of the normal yield, this will trigger that same initiative. But that again outlines the sensitivity that we show toward agriculture and how we put our money where our mouth is.

I said as well that there are changes in the marketplace. The European Economic Community is engaged in a massive subsidy program. It is enormous. As I said earlier, in the case of Canada we have a situation where it has switched from being a net importer of about 12 million tonnes of grain per year to being the world's second largest exporter of grains and oilseeds, roughly 25 million to 26 million tonnes projected for this year. It got there by huge subsidies.

I noted the OECD has estimated that total support for agriculture in OECD countries was over $250 billion U.S. in 1989. Of that, some $100 billion U.S. was provided for by the European Economic Community; $67 billion U.S. by the United States; and $60 billion by Japan. The bulk of it is being provided by those countries. We have talked about the levels of export subsidy support through the EEP. It is roughly in the range of $17 per tonne at the present time and the European Economic Community is at $80 per tonne.

Let us just look at what they are spending in terms of their export programs, intervention costs and production refunds. In 1986—and this is in Canadian dollars—the European Economic Community spent $4.5 billion in direct assistance which is geared essentially toward getting its market share. In 1987, it was $6.3 billion; in 1988, it was $6.4 billion; and, in 1989, it was $5.2 billion. Those are enormous amounts of money.

The United States, in terms of the export enhancement program, in 1986–87 spent $842 million; in 1987–88, $1.446 billion; in 1988–89, $545 million; and from June 1989 to January 26, 1990, $178 million U.S. One can see there why the Americans are responding to the Europeans because of the huge subsidies that are engaged in. That is a fact of life. We have to recognize that.

We have to find new customers for the grain that we marketed to the European Economic Community and the displacements which have resulted from their very generous export program. That is why we are committed through the MTN to the progressive reduction in trade-distorting subsidies. We are committed to achieving greater market access and to reducing the level of export subsidies. We are committed to reducing the level of internal support and to developing a more harmonized application of the rules as they apply to health and sanitary measures.

The bottom line is that we want a rule book that applies equally to all. We want a rule book with no waivers and no variable import levies. We want a clear set of rules and that is why we are attempting to change Article 11 and bring it up to date to where it should be.

Changes in technology have also contributed very much to the impact upon rural life. Twenty years ago in western Canada, we had 5,000 elevators in operation. Today we have a little over 1,000. We have 1,600 to be exact.

The number of delivery points has gone down. In 1969 and 1970, we had roughly 1,800 delivery points. We are down to 1,000. Those changes have taken place. Those changes have impact upon rural communities. It is the changes in technology, in consumer attitudes, and in world trading patterns, and it is the impact that all of these things have upon the rural life-style and rural living. This government recognizes that. This government has responded to it in the past. This government will respond to that challenge with the farmers in the future.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for participating in this very important debate and for giving us an opportunity to hear the contribution the federal government has made to farm life, particularly in western Canada. I would like to use a little broader approach than the one he has used to outline why the Canadian western economy is in such great trouble.

He took pain to point out that the contribution of the government of Manitoba—and far be it from me to fight for the government of Manitoba these days—has dropped down to 10 per cent, while the federal government's contribution has increased to 90 per cent.

In his answer, could the minister put that into the context of the cancellation of ERDA agreements, the decline in the amount of moneys available to the Western Development Fund, and the fact that, as the federal government has pulled out of other funding mechanisms, it has been necessary for the provincial governments across western Canada, in fact, to protect their budgets from declining revenues and declining transfer payments.

Although I am not inclined to share many of the priorities of the provincial government in Manitoba, I think it is only fair for the record to indicate that it has had an increasingly difficult time for them, because the federal government has decided to change their funding strategy.

Second, would the minister perhaps address a question that the premier of Saskatchewan considers to be paramount in saving rural life in western Canada. That is approaching banks for relief on questions of interest rates? Could he indicate the extent to which the government is willing to get involved in seeing that the banks do everything they can to alleviate the pressures of western Canadian farmers?

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, there are about four questions there. I hope I can cover them all. They are very important questions and I appreciate them very much.

On the issue of the ERDAs, we have not cancelled ERDAs. ERDAs will be negotiated. They may have a somewhat different criteria, but the fact of the matter is that the hon. member talked about reducing regional development spending in western Canada and I would not want to leave the House with the impression that he has just suggested.

Quite frankly, compared to the period between 1980 and 1984, as compared to the current five-year period, western Canada's share of the national regional development funding pie has risen from 21 per cent to 32 per cent. I ask him to check that record. It is in the budget papers of April. I forget the page number, but I can give it to him if he would be interested.

The amount of money that has been provided for western Canada in the regional development fund has increased from a level of $500 million in the period 1980–84, when there was literally nothing going out to the four western provinces. The fund for the current five-year period is $1.8 billion.

Mr. Walker: Are all those agreements signed?

Mr. Mazankowski: No, they are not all signed. That is wrong.

Then there is the western diversification initiative which the Liberals try to take issue with. I can say that some $715 million has been expended, covering 1,500 and some-odd different projects.

Mr. Walker: Expended or allocated?

Mr. Mazankowski: Allocated. Talk to the people who get the consideration of the western diversification. The proof of the pudding lies right there. They are jealous because they did not do anything. They had a $4 billion vanishing fund that never saw the light of day. They spent $60 million out of it. It never occurred. The fact of the matter is that this is a very, very important initiative.

Right in his own area, and this again speaks to diversification and to the free trade agreement, Versatile Manufacturing was a basket case. The government worked out a recovery package with Ford-New Holland. At that time there were 300 people employed by Versatile. Today, there are over 1,100 employed by Versatile, thanks to free trade. If you heard what they are saying now about the GST, you would know that the combination of the GST and the free trade agreement will tilt more of the manufacturing into Winnipeg. That is the kind of regional development and the kind of broadening of the scope of the economic fortunes of western Canada at which we need to be working. That is what we are doing.

With regard to the question of the banks, I can tell the hon. member that I did attend a meeting with the premier to talk to representatives of the banks about the farm debt and the farm credit situation. It was a very good and a very constructive meeting. I think there are some things that can and will be done.

For our part, as it relates to the Farm Credit Corporation, we are looking at a number of options that we might be able to engage in with respect to extension of leases and with respect to modifying the farm debt review board process. This would provide greater latitude and greater flexibility to farmers who are really trying to maintain a good credit rating and who have some obvious chance of success and viability. We are going to be adjusting that so that they can be accommodated in a more compassionate and beneficial fashion.

I appreciate the hon. member's question. I can assure him that we are looking at these things.

I should also say that the banks are only one component. They charge interest for the services they provide. We know interest rates are somewhat high. That is an input cost component. We also have to recognize that there are other cost components such as fuel, fertilizer and chemicals. We are also looking in those areas to see what we can do to bring down the prices.

There, again, the GST will bring down the cost of inputs by $240 million to $250 million across the country.

Mr. Walker: Don't push your luck, you were doing fine.

Mr. Mazankowski: He should not laugh at that, because $250 million to farmers is a lot of money.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for attending this important debate today. His concern for rural Canada is certainly noted by this side of the House.

He cited a lot of statistics and figures about the effort the government has made over the last couple of years concerning its support for agriculture and the rural economy. The people on the farms and in the small communities are looking for only one statistic—a statistic that shows they have a healthy economy in agriculture and in rural communities.

The minister is aware, since he alluded to it in his speech, that the health of the agricultural economy has a significant impact on the health of our rural community. If there is no money in agriculture, there is certainly no money in the rural community. If there is no money in agriculture, there are fewer farmers on the land. That means there are fewer people in the small town churches, in the school system, and fewer people who support the curling rinks and the community arenas. Obviously, there are fewer people who support the rural businesses that are the mainstay of keeping other people inside that small community.

If we have a strong rural community, a quality of life that is acceptable to the seniors and the young people in those smaller communities, then we need a strong commitment to increasing the value of agriculture.

In light of all of that, my question to the minister relates to the premier of the province of Saskatchewan, who earlier this week in a throne speech suggested that he had received a specific commitment from the federal Minister of Agriculture about the agricultural financial crisis. The premier of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and members of Parliament in this House from Saskatchewan have asked for a $500 million payment at the very least to help secure the health of the farm economy this year.

I am wondering what commitment the Minister of Agriculture made to the province of Saskatchewan which the premier of Saskatchewan spelled out. When will he deliver on that commitment?

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I want to repeat again that the commitment of this government as provided in terms of extending money and resources to the farmers of Canada is unprecedented in the history of this country. There is no question about that.

There are still problems. That suggests that money alone will not solve all the problems. I am glad the hon. member agrees with that because there are certain things that happen beyond our control such as changes in market trends, such as the actions of other countries and their various priorities. There are changes with regard to consumer attitudes and tastes, changes with respect to greater emphasis on environmental matters and in particular changes with respect to technology.

The hon. member would agree with me that change in agriculture is a constant. It has always been with us and our ability to adapt to change is perhaps one of the reasons why we have been successful over the years.

I repeat again to the hon. member, recognizing that the period we have gone through in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba from a precipitation and heat point of view—in other words, summed up as a drought—is far worse than it was in the dirty thirties. We all know what the dirty thirties did to that region of the country. We have gone through some difficult times, but we have been able to survive, thanks to the resilience and ingenuity of the farmers and thanks to the support of both the federal and provincial levels of government. I do not think you can deny that.

I also say that the changes that have occurred in the rural community are in large part technological change. We are producing more with fewer farmers. We are producing more grain and we have fewer elevators. We are producing more grain and we have fewer delivery points. As I said, 20 years ago there were 5,000 elevators in western Canada. Today, there are roughly 1,500 to 1,600.

An hon. member: That's nothing.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says that is nothing. I think it is something. Twenty years ago we had 1,800 delivery points. Today, we have just a little over 1,000. Is he telling me that that does not have an impact upon rural life? You bet it does. You can't blame that on the Tories. You blame that on the ingenuity of the grain handling companies, the farmer-owned co-operatives because they know that they have to be competitive to survive.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I am certainly pleased to have the opportunity today to stand and speak for a few moments on the motion before the House which in part is calling upon the government to provide for a vital economic, social and environmentally sustainable future for rural Canada.

As has been discussed by previous speakers this afternoon, rural Canada is certainly a very important sector of our society. I think that we need to do more to explain to Canadians the importance of rural Canada in the society in which we live. It is a society that is changing for many reasons. I will touch on those reasons.

I would like to point this out to members of the House today and ask them to reflect on it for a moment. There are four creators of wealth in the world. One is forestry. One is fishing. One is mining. One is farming. There is nothing on the face of the earth that we use or see or need that does not come from one of those sectors. All of those are part of rural Canada. All of those make up rural Canada. Some of them are a more populated sector of the rural area than others.

I also want to state that I have always and will always firmly believe that as goes agriculture, so goes the economy of any country. If we look around the world it does not matter how a country is trying to survive, if it does not have a strong, viable, economically strengthened agricultural industry, then the economy and the future of that country is certainly in question. I can give examples of that but I think as we stop and think about it they will come to the minds of all of us.

I said a few minutes ago that the rural community is changing. We all know that we are losing small towns in the prairies for different reasons. The industry is changing. We all know that in the more heavily populated parts of the country, urbanites are moving into rural areas in order to live the way of life that is there. As this takes place, I hope the government keeps in mind that we must still maintain what rural Canada is all about. In order to do that we must maintain the management tools. We must maintain and assist the abilities of the people in those communities—the farm people, the primary producers and the processors—in order to keep that economy going.

We also must keep in mind that we have a debt not only to ourselves but to our children, our grandchildren and those who will come afterwards. That debt is to rural stewardship, to the stewardship of the resources that we have. We spent a lot of time about 18 or 24 months ago on one of the greatest debates that this country ever had. I refer to the free trade debate. We spent a lot of time talking about oil and gas and water. We also spent time talking about agriculture. But I do not think we took the right tack. I do not think we recognized the importance of agriculture to this country.

We are all concerned about food safety and food quality. I call upon the government to recognize to a greater extent than it is at the present time that, yes, there may be a few added costs to producing food in Canada, but I think that Canadians are prepared to pay that cost, if necessary, if it is explained to them. We have the safest food in the world right now. I believe that if it is explained to Canadians, they do not want to get things cheaper in the short run and then realize that it may cost in the long run. They are prepared to pay in order to produce that food at home so that we can have it produced under our own guidelines and under our own regulations so that we can continue to have that safe food supply.

Another aspect I want to touch upon is one that is in the motion today. The motion states in part:

> 5) provide a full range of services, including shelters, child care services and skills training to support the crucial role played by women in all rural communities.

A few years ago I served as a member of the Ontario Task Force on Health and Safety in Agriculture which went across the province of Ontario for a great number of hearings. It was probably brought out to me at that time more than ever the importance of women in agriculture and the role they play. We know that there are fewer and fewer farmers in Canada. We also know that a higher percentage of those farms are spearheaded by women. A higher percentage are owned, operated and controlled by women.

We also know that the role that ladies play in the operation of those farms is very, very crucial. Because of the economic times, on many farms in Canada farm women may very well have an off-farm job. As well as having the off-farm job, they have the household to maintain, the family to look after, and in many cases they also play a major role in the management and bookkeeping of that farm.

I can name many farms where, when it is payroll day or bookkeeping day, the farm women may very well be up at 4.30 or 5 in the morning in order to get the payroll ready for the staff if there is a number of them, or they work late at night in order to do it. We have to recognize that.

I call upon the government not to withdraw from any more programs. There have been a lot of programs withdrawn in the last two or three years by this government. The Nielsen report of a number of years ago pointed out several things in the agricultural field that should be addressed. I am certainly disheartened by the way the government has addressed the changes that have been made to the farm improvement loans which now makes them virtually non-existent. The fuel tax rebate has been taken away for the most part. The assistance programs for fruit and vegetables storage construction, which the federal government shared in, has expired.

The At and East program for assistance in freight rates for grains has been taken away.

As we have been discussing lately, there is disappointment in much of the farm community concerning the contribution that the federal government is going to be making to the crop insurance program to the extent of 25 per cent rather than to the 33 and one-third per cent as was requested.

I would like to touch for a few moments again on the role of the government in our request for it to pay attention, give assistance and provide the management tools to the whole rural community. As I say, the rural community is changing. The percentage of family farms or farm families that are there now compared to 10, 15 or 20 years ago is different. The urbanites are moving into the country. The agricultural people are realizing that they have to change some of the ways in which they do some things. They need support for that. They need the assistance of governments in order to explain their way of life, explain to urban people what they are and that they have come into a new community. There may be noises, sounds and odours that they are not used to, but they need to be there.

Madam Speaker, I thank the House for the opportunity this afternoon to make a few comments on this motion. Again, I plead with the government to recognize these requirements of the rural community and not do anything more to take away from the rural community.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There are five minutes of questions and comments. The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings.

Rural Dignity is a very important player in the whole picture of the rural crisis that is occurring right now. I am just wondering if the hon. member is aware of the activities of Rural Dignity in his riding and throughout other parts of the rural community. In particular, is he aware of the work that it is doing on behalf of rural residents who are fighting to maintain their post offices in rural communities right across the country.

• (1320)

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member, I will have to say that, to my knowledge, in my area of Ontario there is not an active Rural Dignity group. However, I am somewhat familiar with the work that it is doing and attempting to do, which is excellent work. But in my particular riding there is not such a group.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would just like to pose the second part of my question again which concerns rural post offices. I am wondering if the member could tell me what is happening in his area with rural post offices, the closure of post offices, and what the rural residents in communities in his area might be doing about it.

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, we have had one or two rural post offices in our riding "consolidated", which was the word that was used. I do not think my rural area is any different from any other, in that the people are not at all pleased with what is taking place. I am pleased to say, in the last few years they have had some success in keeping some post offices open, when there were attempts to have them closed.

Quite honestly, within four weeks of being elected to the House, I was approached by Canada Post, which informed me that the post office in my own village was being closed. However, in working with Canada Post, we were successful in getting it to move it to another facility in the very same village.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to a motion that calls upon the Conservative Government, in the week of the second annual Rural Revitalization Day, to take steps to provide for a vital economic and social future for rural Canada.

Madam Speaker, we must not forget that since the Conservatives came to power, this government made savage cuts in VIA Rail and caved in to GATT decisions when it should have protected Canadian farmers, especially Canada's dairy producers. Farmers in general are suffering as a result of the negligence of the government across the way, and when we look at our rural communities, a number of institutions such as post offices are disappearing.

In 1986, there were 5,221 rural post offices in Canada. Today, 400 of these post offices have disappeared, and according to the Canada Post corporate plan, they will all be gone ten years from now.

[English]

Madam Speaker, 10,000 people work in rural post offices in Canada, and 83 per cent of them are women. Once this project of shutting down rural post offices is complete, the government will have been responsible for the largest firing of women in the history of Canada—8,300 of them will have lost their jobs. That is the sad reality.

Last night, I attended a meeting in my constituency in the small village of Dalkeith. Dalkeith is a community in Glengarry county and, Madam Speaker, as you probably guessed from the name, it is a very Scottish name, indeed. In that village, Canada Post is now proposing to shut down the post office and replace it with a franchise.

Canada Post has what it calls a natural opportunity. It defines a "natural opportunity" as being that occasion in which a postmaster or postmistress resigns or dies. Therefore Canada Post then has the privilege of shutting down rural post offices.

Canada Post cheats every now and then. What it did in this case is it went to see the postmistress and offered her early retirement. In other words, the person was not even scheduled to retire. The person was not scheduled to have a "natural opportunity". When Canada Post does not have a natural opportunity, it simply creates one.

What did it do? It asked the postmistress to take an early retirement for a certain undisclosed sum of money. I am not blaming the postmistress. After all, if one has worked for a long time and one is given a financial opportunity to retire early, perhaps she is correct in taking that opportunity.

However, Canada Post did this without attempting to secure alternative space for the post office, or even alternative space for its privatized so-called retail postal outlet. Now we have a situation whereby we are losing the service in that village. We do not know whether anything at all will replace it.

There has been a post office in Dalkeith for 123 years. It serves 81 residences in the village and 283 residences on rural routes for a grand total of 364. Assuming that there are three people per household, it means that this post office serves 1,000 people.

Last night at the public meeting 289 people signed a petition that was presented to me. That was 289 people who signed a petition right in that room. I know it was not signed in advance because I brought the form with me. They all signed the petition in that room. In other words, one-third of the whole population—man, woman and child in that community—was in the recreation centre last night in order to voice their concern about that rural institution we call the post office.

People do not drive for miles or take whole evenings of their time—one-third of the population does not mobilize itself—for no reason. It does so because it feels in its heart that retaining that post office is something important to the rural way of life.

I say to the minister responsible for the post office, who interestingly enough is the same minister responsible for building strip joints, that the people of Canada want to keep our postal institutions in this country. That has never been demonstrated any better than by what the people of Dalkeith did last night. I hope that the minister responsible for the post office listens to what the people of that community say.

Madam Speaker, in the last Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), we saw that the consumer watchdog for Canada Post had disappeared.

The Postal Services Review Committee was eliminated by the Minister of Finance in the Budget speech. Interestingly, the minister responsible for Canada Post said in 1988 that:

> —considering that Canada Post had become a viable operation and that its revenues came from postal service users, customers therefore had a say in a national and local issues.

This means that in 1988, the government's position was that consumers had the right to be heard to be protected if Canada Post made decisions that went against their interests.

• (1330)

We now see a situation where the Minister of Finance has eliminated this consumer spokesperson, this watchdog, as I said earlier. We could say the watchdog was muzzled by the Minister of Finance when he slashed the Budget, a Budget that would otherwise have provided funding for the Postal Services Review Board.

So we have the following situation: Canada Post has a monopoly on postal services, a monopoly it needs, I must admit. It has a monopoly, and of course the Gouvernment is taking a hands-off position on Canada Post, ostensibly because it is a Corwn corporation and the government has no right to intervene. So we have a regulated monopoly that is accountable to no one. Perhaps we should say we have a deregulated monopoly, because there seem to be no regulations to prevent Canada Post from doing what it did, for instance, in the case of the Dalkeith Post Office or in other cases.

My point is, Madam Speaker, that in order to maintain the quality of life in rural areas, the government must reinstate this Postal Services Review Committee or Board.

[English]

Canada Post spends $17 million annually on advertising to tell us that it delivers the mail. Most of us, I would suspect, already knew that Canada Post delivered the mail. Most of my constituents know that already. Perhaps there are occasions on which it does not deliver the mail and it tries to tell us that it does, using these advertising methods.

However, the Postal Services Review Committee which was there to watch over Canada Post on behalf of consumers was eliminated because it cost the taxpayers of Canada $3.6 million to operate. If the government across the way really cared about the people of rural Canada or about the people of Dalkeith or of any other similar small community which sees itself in a dispute with Canada Post of the type that I previously described, then why did it not cancel the useless $17 million advertizing budget of Canada Post instead of cancelling the $3.6 million to keep the post office watch dog that was there for consumers?

I am pleased to have had this opportunity to speak on this debate today and to offer my support to my constituents living in rural areas, in the hope that the Government of Canada will finally recognize that rural Canadians deserve better than what they have received since 1984.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I have shared some opportunities to talk about the post office in the last six months, having sat on the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. We are very much aware of the devastation caused to rural communities when a post office pulls out.

I want to ask the member who has just spoken so well about the need for government co-operation in maintaining post offices in rural Canada if he is aware of Rural Dignity's comments about post offices, that the post office is the heart of a community. Can he tell us whether he believes that the Government of Canada has a responsibility to maintain a federal presence and a post office in those rural communities?

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I am grateful to my colleague for his pertinent question.

Rural Dignity has done great work in being an advocate for rural Canadians and for speaking to the importance of retaining the rural post office. As my colleague from The Battlefords—Meadowlake will know, in many rural communities the only federal government presence there is Canada Post. The only time you see a flag of our country, the kind which is right beside Madam Speaker's chair, is on the post office. The only place in many communities where you see the word "Canada" is on the post office. Now we are shutting down the rural post office, eliminating that federal presence and eliminating that important community point of rendezvous. To make matters even worse, Canada Post has now developed a new corporate logo wherein it calls itself "Mail-Poste". It has removed the word "Canada" from Canada Post.

At this juncture in which it is so important for us to use all instruments of national unity that we can muster, I feel it is absolutely unacceptable for Canada Post to be behaving in that manner.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to speak today in support of this motion from my colleague. At the outset I would like to focus my comments on the preamble of his motion because March 21 was the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Agnes MacPhail, the first woman elected to this House and an untiring champion of the rights of rural Canadians.

To begin my remarks I would like to quote from Hansard of February 28, 1928. Although that was 1928, it says a lot about what is occurring here now in 1990. During the debate on the budget of that year Agnes MacPhail stated:

> We have, for a young and rich country, a depleted and impoverished agricultural industry. In this young country agriculture has not held its own people, nor its power of place and influence. I regret it, but it is true.

It is still true. Many of the things that Agnes MacPhail struggled for in her years in Parliament we are still struggling for now. Agnes MacPhail was in this place for almost 20 years from 1921 to 1940 and then continued in the Ontario legislature.

To win her first nomination in 1921, she had to defeat 10 men and then overcome the shock in the community that a woman had won. She then won the first of five federal elections with a campaign that cost $600, all in $1 contributions. There were no special favours from Agnes. At 31 she entered a House that was hardly ready for her. She was patronized by the Mackenzie King government which offered her a suite of offices when other MPs had only one room. Agnes took one room. It was then room 605 which became Agnes' office for her career, and it is now redesignated as room 629–C. This week my leader unveiled a plaque to be placed on the door of that room to commemorate Agnes' time there.

Agnes also met outright hostility in this House but learned to deal with it. To the heckler who taunted: "Doesn't the hon. member wish she were a man?" she replied: "No. Doesn't the hon. member wish he were?"

These quotes are very in keeping with some of the debate that goes on in this Chamber even now, Madam Speaker, and as you are well aware, women do have an uphill struggle even now in this Chamber.

My remarks on this motion speak to the legacy that Agnes MacPhail has left for us as women to carry on. In the most recent budget, there have been radical cuts to women's programs. I was the volunteer chair of a women's centre in my community when the parliamentary committee travelled to Vancouver to talk about women's programs a number of years ago.

• (1340)

At that time the women's centres from all the rural communities came to Vancouver to plead their case as to why women's programs should not be cut, particularly for the rural areas. In this last budget they have been cut and the devastation that will wreak in rural communities is enormous. These women's programs are essential, especially in the north and in the rural areas. They are often the only resource for women who are battered by their husbands and are a release or safety net for women to go to. Yet, in the latest budget, the federal government has seen fit to cut them.

Another issue that Agnes MacPhail championed during her time here in the House was the commitment to social programs, particularly a commitment to child care. As a champion of rural issues, she knew the role that women played in their rural communities and the importance of child care in supporting that task.

Women had a very hard choice then. They either had to leave their children to go to work, or they had to take their children with them to go to work. Even now in Canada, in 1990, such is the case particularly for rural women. There is no national child care scheme. It was promised in 1984 and in 1988 it was promised, and here once again we have no commitment to a national child care scheme. This hurts rural women particularly. Their options are limited. Even in urban areas the people who are paying the price are the children of Canada. Agnes MacPhail knew that.

The comments of many members in this House speak of the destruction of rural Canada. This government is overseeing that destruction. Our party caucus has met with the mayors of the Canso communities, the rural fishing communities of Atlantic Canada, and the same sort of thing is happening on the west coast from where I come. This destruction of those rural communities and the fishing villages is because there is no commitment to understanding that communities want to control their own destiny and want to keep the jobs in their own communities. The government should be giving support in its programs for that kind of initiative.

There has also been much talk about the destruction of rural Canada through Canada Post regulations and lack of commitment. I know in part of my riding on the Gulf Islands the post office had been a community resource, and now that that has been taken away. This is something that is happening increasingly in Canada with this whole centralization of jobs and the increasing dependency on the market as the determining factor. This is something that is very negative and is well addressed within the motion.

This government should be supporting programs to provide a full range of education, health and other social policies for young families to stay in their communities. We in this House know the kind of social problems that result from the urbanization of the population with people having no resource but to move into the cities, the abandonment of those small towns and the consequent destruction of the social life.

Agnes MacPhail in her time in this House was a champion of rural Canada because she was from rural Canada but also because she had that wonderful sense of community and of knowing that if we do not feel connected to where we come from then we have lost a great deal.

There are a number of other things that we can talk about on the anniversary of Agnes MacPhail's birth, 100 years tomorrow. She was also a champion of prison reform being a founding member of the Elizabeth Fry Society, and as a consequence she was the first woman to go into the Kingston Penitentiary. In another quote from that time she said she was told there were no ladies allowed in Kingston Penitentiary. She assured the people that she was no lady, she as a member of the Parliament. That is something that we as members of Parliament who are women have to realize too. Sometimes you have to become a member of Parliament to make sure that the dignity of women is assured, but you are a member of Parliament first and a woman second. I hope that that dynamic changes as more and more women become members of Parliament.

Agnes MacPhail was a champion, realizing that as the first woman member of Parliament she became an automatic voice for the women of Canada. The women members in this House should remember that they are the voice for the women of Canada; they provide a role model for the women of Canada.

Agnes MacPhail also worked for prison reform and equal pay for work of equal value. That is something that she championed, along with her colleague, Andrew Brewin. I have the privilege of having as my neighbouring constituency member of Parliament the son of Andrew Brewin. It is a nice little coincidence that the member for Victoria is now the critic for our party for the Solicitor General and is also still working on prison reform in the Kingston Penitentiary. The history of parliamentary action in our party is something of which we are very proud.

What we in British Columbia are facing with the destruction of rural communities coincides with Agnes MacPhail's concern for women in fishing communities and women in rural Canada. With the latest devastation brought about by the trade deal and the destruction of jobs which is occurring in the fishing communities in British Columbia, Agnes MacPhail would be turning in her grave, because women's jobs, usually immigrant women's jobs, are at risk. They are the ones who are going to be losing those jobs which are moving down south of the border. This is just an additional indignity that these women have to suffer.

In closing, I just want to say in support of this motion that the government should be supporting rural Canada through the post office, through support for community development, through support for child care programs, through support for women's programs, and by providing a full range of services and skills training to support the crucial role played by women in all rural communities.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I know how committed my hon. friend is to women's issues. I noticed she mentioned on a couple of occasions the social problems which society is witnessing now. They are almost foreboding when you sit down and list them all and wonder if there will ever be solutions. She also spoke about the lack of commitment that we find with the current government in reference to child care services. It seems to go in cycles. I am sure that we will hear from the government again just prior to the next election.

I wonder if my hon. friend sees any correlation, as I do, between the lack of child care services and what constitutes some of our major social problems. We all know that those early years are the years in which some kind of service offered to children has a tremendous impact on their later lives. Does she see a correlation there between the lack of child care services, which are begging, and the social deprivation and social problems which follow from that dearth of services?

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has put it very well. Child care services are an investment in our future. If we do not have those child care services provided, women who are the primarily child care givers in our country have the terrible option of leaving their children at home in order to find the means to support them.

• (1350)

If there is not a national child care scheme, then it is our future that we are jeopardizing. We can either invest in children when they are small or in increasing the number of prisons and mental institutions, for those children who are neglected in their youth are disproportionately the ones who are in our prisons and mental institutions.

That is not overdramatizing the need for a national child care program. The ones who are being neglected are the children of Canada. I would urge the government not to wait for the next election but to act now to institute a national child care program.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague, the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, for speaking so eloquently of one of our predecessors in the House, Agnes MacPhail, and the work that Agnes did over the years not only for the women throughout Canada but for citizens throughout this country who live in our smaller rural communities.

In passing, my colleague made specific mention of some of the concerns that we have about the direction that Canada Post is taking in eliminating a very needed and necessary service with the post offices in our smaller communities.

My area in the Okanagan—Shuswap has a number of these small communities. I know that the citizens in those areas are most concerned with what they see as an erosion of not only the quality of service that is given by Canada Post but an erosion of the very dynamics and the social fabric of those small communities. Those members who have smaller communities in their ridings would agree with me that the post office is very often a centre of social activity where people come to meet on a regular basis and chit-chat as they pick up their mail.

The arguments we have been hearing in those communities where the post offices have been closed is that whole nature changes when the post office service has been privatized to a retail outlet. I know in one particular area of my community up in the north Shuswap there is considerable concern now that that has been privatized. Even though the individual is doing the best job that he can in providing a retail service, it has to come secondary to what he is really there for, and that is a retail grocery outlet. For much of the service that this individual provides, there is no payment provided in the contract. Much of the work he is doing on behalf of the community, I might add, is being done without adequate remuneration.

There are a number of other smaller communities in my area such as Lumby, Armstrong and Enderby where notice has been served that retail outlets will also be established. I think it is step one in what will be a phasing out of Canada Post in those communities.

On behalf of those citizens who have spoken to me very clearly, they see it as a real erosion in the quality of life in rural Canada, and particularly in the Okanagan—Shuswap area. Those individuals want to go on record as saying that this erosion of service and the erosion of the lifestyle that they are used must be stopped. We must continue to provide the kind of service that Canada Post has provided to those communities throughout Canada. We want to see that kind of service continued.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, the comments of my colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap echo a number of other comments regarding Canada Post and the destruction of rural Canada through the government's initiatives. We stand as part of this motion in condemning that action. I know in my riding it is the same story: the ongoing rural post office privatization initiatives are really hurting the rural communities.

The destruction of rural communities is the destruction of the whole history of Canada and the way we want to live. Those people choose to live in small communities for very good reasons. When the services are withdrawn from them they sometimes have no option but to move into the bigger cities and bring with them a whole bunch of social problems. It is a negative dynamic that should be reversed by the Canadian government giving the kind of resources to Canada Post so it can support rural post offices.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, thank you for recognizing me, because I really want to ask my colleague a question. When the special committee formed by the government and chaired by our colleague, the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, travelled across Canada, obviously the matter of child care in rural areas came up. Among other things, rural women have very special needs for child care. At various hearings, for example, farm women told us they have to wait until the children come home from school to go to the barn. They need more flexibility and want the government to provide appropriate measures. They asked for bigger tax credits and larger child care expense deductions.

So I would like to ask the hon. member if she agrees that in the first part of the child care strategy, the government has recognized these needs, especially for farm women. For example, deductible child care expenses were increased by $4,000. We will agree that it is never enough because we would like to do more for farm women. Does the hon. member agree with the government which raised child care expense deductions so that farm women could have services, because farm women do not need public services; they need private services in the community, where children are kept by neighbours, but for that they need receipts and higher child care expense deductions. So does she agree with the government on that?

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. That is an important initiative of the government, but it certainly falls far short of a national child care scheme. The hon. member is quite right that they need flexibility. We are not talking about large day care centres. We are talking about flexible arrangements so that women who mainly have to make the arrangements for child care have the ability to make them. However, if there are no child care spaces available, there is very little to arrange. When we are seeing the destruction of rural communities there are no neighbours for the women to leave their children with. A kind of danger that exists where children are left alone or left near farm equipment, and every year at harvest time we hear sad stories where children are injured by farm equipment.

The government should be taking an initiative for a national child care scheme, to provide the dignity of the workplace for the child care workers and the safe environment for children to be cared for.

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, this is an important motion before the House this afternoon. I would like to make sure the House understands that we consider it so important that I am going to share this time slot with my colleague for Argenteuil—Papineau.

First of all I want to compliment my friend from Prince Albert on the way he has put this motion together, particularly the second clause which refers to the fishery. Quite clearly, he has captured the essence of the problem that we face in the fishery.

He has captured the essence of the process that we as a country must pursue to deal with the problem if we are going to come to terms not only with the economy of Atlantic Canada in particular but also with the very nature of the rural part of this country that has been there so much longer than the rest. He has said that we must assist fishing communities to survive the current crisis and we must ensure proper management of the fishery in the future.

Those are exactly the two principles that are guiding and have guided this government in dealing with this very clear and very obvious crisis that we face. We know, as I think all Canadians know, that there are less fish to be caught and less fish going to be produced. As a result there will be less people there to produce the fish.

The first thing that we must do that is tantamount to any action that we take in dealing with the fishery is to deal with the conservation question. We must make sure that we have fish there that will sustain Atlantic Canadians for as long as Atlantic Canadians want to pursue the fishery.

We must take whatever action is necessary to make sure that the fish stocks, wherever they grow, can be enhanced so that there are fish there to be taken and produced. That must be our concern.

In recognition that clearly we do not have enough knowledge to make those decisions properly all the time, in recognition of the scientific advice particularly as it was applied to the northern cod stock in the area we know as 2J3KL, we appointed a group of eminent people, including scientists from around the world and Canadians who understood the fishery. It was headed by Dr. Les Harris, president of Memorial University. We have asked them to tell us what we must know and do to be able to make better and sounder decisions.

He tells us that the model is right. He tells us that things are not bad but obviously we must do more. We know that from his first report. His second report is coming and the government will be in a position to carry out many of his recommendations. The government will be able to talk to Canadians about what Dr. Harris and his panel will suggest that we do. Those who have a stake in the industry and depend on the fishery primarily in rural Atlantic Canada can say what must be done for the future.

There is no question that those who depend on the fishery the most are those who are telling us in the strongest terms that we must take action to protect the fishery and ensure through conservation measures that there is a cod stock in the future. We know that the effects reach far beyond the fish stock itself. Clearly, we have seen fish plants closing and trawlers tied up. In some areas of my province of Newfoundland we have seen inshore fishermen catch virtually no fish where they and their fathers and their grandfathers have fished for years without any problem.

As always, it is the people and the communities to whom we have to respond, because they are the most important. We can come to terms with the problem of the fish stocks. But we must be able to tell Canadians who depend on the fishery that we will help them.

What we did with the Harris report in Newfoundland and Labrador, we did with Jean-Eudes Hache in Nova Scotia. He looked at the capacity problem and has given us some advice on what we must do.

But how have we dealt with the people to assist them and the communities to survive? We established a cabinet committee under the chairmanship of the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs to bring together all the resources of the government to determine what we must do as a government and as a country to deal with these problems and what we must have in place for people.

We have approached this in two ways. In the short term, we immediately ensured that a $130 million package was available to those people in those communities that needed it most. Of course, there is unemployment insurance. Community Futures and the Industrial Adjustment Strategy are the two most important components not only of what we need to do to survive but also in terms of what this resolution is demanding of the government. Quite clearly, we are well on the way to achieving what is stated in the resolution.

The IAS is implemented the minute the plant is closed, and is complemented by Community Futures and a number of other programs. The essence of these programs is to respond as a government to the people who know their community and its resources in a way that will provide alternatives, that will create new economic opportunities, that will create different job opportunities, that will give a future perhaps in a whole different industry, perhaps in the same industry but in a different way, to the people of the community, particularly the young people.

We recognize that there are other requirements. We have a special problem in dealing with older workers who have less mobility opportunities and less training opportunities. We have said we are going to enter into a program to help older workers, and that is being undertaken with the provinces. The mobility and the training functions are there. They are important as components to an over-all package as we assist communities to survive the current crisis in the fishery.

Very clearly, we are saying to the people of Atlantic Canada that we will bring together the resources that we have in the federal government, which is about $130 million. As well, the cabinet committee, particularly as a result of a lot of the work that Ken Stein's committee has done, is looking at other ways to help people deal with their future inside the fishery and outside the fishery. We must be able to provide people with new resources as we consider underutilized species, new markets and new technologies. These are matters on which, particularly with the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, a great deal of work has been done to ensure that a package is in place and is ready.

About two hours after the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was sworn in he said to me that the first thing he wanted to do was consult with the people who could best tell him as the minister what the real problems were and what the real solutions were. Less than 48 hours later, the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans left for Shippagan in northern New Brunswick to meet the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces, into Prince Edward Island, down to Gaultois, meeting with the workers and the people of Trepassey and Grand Bank and the people of St. John's who have been affected by the close down, as well as the small producers and the unions. Off we went the next day to Lockeport and Canso, in less than 24 hours. That is the sign of a government that is concerned first and foremost about how to assist communities survive this crisis. We recognize there is a crisis and we recognize that action has to be taken.

I congratulate my friend across the way for endorsing the actions that the government has taken to deal with the problems of rural Canada, particularly in the part of the country that means so much to me, frankly, if I can be a little parochial. I am delighted that he has endorsed the two fundamental tenets here; that we have proper management which ensures conservation, and that we assist communities to survive this crisis. That is exactly what we have been doing. That is what we are doing now and that is what we will do in the future.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, this government has been in power now for five years. If I were going to be cynical about this, I would suggest that if we leave the problem long enough those rural communities are going to disappear and the government will not have to deal with them. That is one way of solving the problem. Just make sure you do not do anything for five or six years and eventually there will be no rural communities and you have no problem.

I say this out of a certain amount of experience. In 1985 the government, both in agriculture and in the fisheries, indicated it was going to put in place a program which would kick in automatically to help these communities survive. It was supposed to help the farmers, fishermen and foresters survive so that they would have in place an insurance structure, if you wish, which would kick in. That was back in 1985. They were still talking about it in the 1988 election.

The government claims proudly that is acted within 48 hours after the crisis. This motion suggests that we need to put in place a program which is ready to be implemented when the crisis starts. That is the basis under which the planning should have been done. Six years later is too late.

The Minister of Agriculture took a similar approach to the problem as the hon. member. Why does the government not put more of a human face on its decisions on the economy? Why does it not make sure, first of all, that these communities survive before doing a study which is going to find out whether the fish are going to survive, or in the case of agriculture, whether it is going to be worth while to grow more of a particular type of grain? Why does this government not put a more human face on the problems out there?

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, the 25 or 30 or 50 farmers in my riding are probably very unhappy with me because I have never spoken on agriculture. I have never spoken on agriculture for one very good reason. I do not know a hill of beans about agriculture, but I do know a couple of things about the fishery.

We talk about waiting five years to deal with the problem. From 1986 to 1988, we had the best three years in the fishery that we ever had in this country. The total allowable catch for northern cod was recommended at 295,000 tons two years ago, and we chose in the interest of conservation to set it at 265,000 tons. The problem we faced is that all of a sudden we were told that instead of being 265,000, when they wanted it at 295,000, it should be set at 125,000 tons. As a result we have a problem. That is where the problem is.

I think there is an understanding that provinces have allowed, for instance, virtually doubling the expansion of capacity to respond to rural situations in Canada. We have seen far too many people go into the fishery as an employment option of last resort.

Fishermen are the only self-employed people in this country who can qualify for unemployment insurance. Community Futures which spreads right across Newfoundland is designed specifically to deal with rural problems like this on a regional basis. It has been hugely successful. We are trying to ensure that young Newfoundlanders and Labradorians can get from school to a workplace in a sensible and organized fashion. We are spending $56 million to find out why it does not happen. For the last four years we have had emergency response.

We have had an emergency response which has kicked in every year. We did not have to find the money because we budgeted for it. We knew these problems were going to happen. We had been there ready to deal with them.

Let me say one thing, Madam Speaker. The future of the rural communities in Atlantic Canada is fish and if we want to keep a human face on the coastlines of Newfoundland and Labrador we better have fish looking up at those faces, and as a result we must take fish decisions to protect those people and ensure that they have the future that they so badly want.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, as you know, it is always stimulating to rise in the House after an eloquent speech like the one we just heard by our colleague from Newfoundland. In fact, whenever people from this province speak in the House, I don't know what it is but they have a way with them that is probably typical of Eastern Canada.

An hon. member: It's the electricity!

Mrs. Bourgault: The electricity! Again, Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the House today, first of all, to pay tribute to the first woman elected to the House of Commons, Agnes MacPhail. Mrs. MacPhail started her career as a teacher in a country school, and she did not forget her rural roots when she came to Parliament in 1921. She went into politics to represent the farmers in her riding, but it was not long before she expanded her activities to include an interest in women's issues. She was energetic in her defence of women's civil rights. Subsequently, as a member of the Ontario Legislature, she helped bring about the first wage parity legislation in Ontario, passed in 1951.

Many of these and other issues have made enormous progress since Agnes MacPhail sat in the House of Commons. I think she would be proud, Madam Speaker, of the number of women sitting in Parliament today and to see you sitting in the Speaker's chair, as she would be proud of the many Canadian women in positions of power and responsibility in all areas of our society.

I believe Agnes MacPhail would be especially happy to see the tremendous progress made by farm women in promoting their legal, social and economic rights.

With their spouses, these women now operate the vast majority, fact 99 per cent, of Canadian farms. Since 1975, the number of women operating farms independently almost tripled in Canada, increasing from 13,000 to 35,000. Furthermore, 23,000 women are sole owners of their farms in this country.

Officially, women represent 30 per cent of Canada's labour force in the agricultural industry, but this of course does not includes the thousands of Canadian women who combine work on the farm with another job to help support their families.

Women shoulder their share of financing, production and administration on Canada's family farm operations. In other words, they do their share of the work. In 1987, the National Farm Women's Conference found that in this country, women carried out 49 per cent of the farm chores and 97 per cent of the home making chores. We should not overlook that these same women are often involved in a career away from the farm. These women have guts.

In 1986, the Census of agriculture revealed that in this country, one third of all women farmers have a university or college education and currently use their special training and knowledge in the management of the farm or in the profession they are engaged in away from the farm. Madam Speaker, a great many of them use them in both.

Today, the Federal Government is more aware than ever of the enormous contribution women make to agriculture in this country. We know their contribution as farm managers, homemakers and family providers. We support women in their efforts to ensure a certain quality of life in the farm community and I know that it is not always easy.

One of the major areas in which our Government is striving to help women farmers is through the development of strategies with a view to harmonizing professional and family responsibilities.

The Government's policies in this area should clearly recognize the unique character of the work and family obligations which is particular to family farms. They should take it into account.

During the First Ministers' Conference which was held last November, the Federal, Provincial and Territorial ministers responsible for the status of women tabled a report describing the strategies which each government intends to implement in an effort to promote the integration of professional and family responsibilities.

Our purpose is to support women and men in their work environment, while helping them to assume their responsibilities as parents and as breadwinners.

At that First Ministers' Conference the Canadian ministers responsible for the status of women tabled various reports describing some of the major government projects undertaken in recent years to ensure that, in education and training, women throughout Canada would be considered equal and have access to all facilities.

Not unlike Canadians in other economic sectors, women involved in farming know that training is essential if they are to keep up with the ever increasing pace of technological changes. These women never miss an opportunity to express their views on this issue.

After all, it was back in 1985 at the second national conference of women in agriculture that for the first time somebody suggested that women ought to have readier access to training.

At the present time, representatives of the Canadian Council of Education for Women Farmers and Employment and Immigration Canada officials are working together to develop strategies designed to encourage more women farmers to enrol in training programs.

I think the government, women farmers and their organizations must contuinue to communicate and exchange views on issues such as training, working conditions and family life.

Mr. Speaker, women farmers in my riding are very well organized and I meet with them on a regular basis. Not so long ago the issue of child care in rural areas came up. As I pointed out in a question to an NDP colleague, women farmers have special needs concerning child care, and they want the government to show some flexibility in the implementation of national programs so that they will be able to have someone to look after their children when it becomes necessary. Farm women have to go to the barn when the children come home from school. They often live in outlying areas and their particular needs cannot be compared with those of city women. It is therefore imperative that the government take their needs into account in its national child care strategy. We have listened carefully to what these women told us during hearings of the Special Committee on Child Care. The government has responded, in the first phase of its national child care strategy, by, among other things, doubling the amount of eligible expenses to $4,000 and by increasing the child tax credit by $200 per child for youngsters.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the farmers of my constituency of Argenteuil—Papineau, a very agricultural and prosperous riding, that I am following with interest the development of agriculture and that I do not hesitate to defend their interests whenever the opportunity arises and that I will continue to do so as long as I am sitting in this House.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, given the time of day, I would like to address two issues in the last minutes of this very interesting debate on rural life in Canada.

In particular, I would like to deal with issues which concern western Canadians. One issue deals with the role of the western diversification fund in our economy. We heard earlier today an eloquent defence of government activities by the Minister of Agriculture, and he spoke in some detail about what the government says it is doing to help western farmers.

The reality is that the western Canadian economy needs much more than this government can provide and the fact that it is cash-short is as much a result of the government's own strategy and its own programming as it is with anything else. The fact that the government is not able to contribute sufficiently to the western economy is a product of the government's own reasoning and its own lack of imagination in helping westerners.

In particular, one of the most controversial aspects of its program has been the western diversification fund. Since its inception, the Progressive Conservative government has long trumpeted the Department of Western Economic Diversification as the answer to western Canada's economic woes. The program was announced previous to the 1988 general election with a great deal of fanfare. It would consolidate two programs; the western diversification fund which was announced in August 1987, and the ERDA program which was started by the Liberals earlier in the 1980s.

The total value of these programs was to exceed $2.8 billion. At that time, the Prime Minister stated that the ERDA program would remain intact and the western diversification fund would be created out of new money. There was a great deal of promise from 1987 through 1988, coincidentally just before the election, as to what the government would do to help out western Canadians. The reality is that the western diversification programming has failed to live up to its promises. Instead of pumping much needed capital into western Canada, it continued to fall short of its publicly stated goals.

For example, in the eight months before the 1988 election western diversification approved over $400 million in projects. In the fiscal year following the election, the government forecast that it would only spend $136.8 million to fulfil these commitments. Last year, the minister responsible for western diversification assured us that everything was on track and that $253 million would be spent. Today, we find that he is only able to fulfil 54 per cent of his commitment.

In Part III of the estimates for the fiscal year we find that he has promised another $252 million. What will be in the budget next year?

Because these statistics are so important, I want to read them into the record as the Minister of Agriculture was so fond of doing during his presentation, so that the Canadian people begin to appreciate what the government has been doing in each year.

In 1987–88, it estimated that it would spend $98.87 million. It actually spent $47.057 million, or 47 per cent of what it estimated. The importance of this is to understand the accumulation of the lack of funds actually being put in western Canada as a result of the decisions being made by the federal government.

The next year, 1988–89, the election year, the government promised $293,427,000. After the election it spent $75,300,000, or 25 per cent of the estimated amount. In 1989–90, the minister said in the House: "This year, I am going to spend $252,999,000." We find out now he spent $136 million, or 54 per cent of his target.

This year he says he is going to spend $251 million and we do not know when he is going to do it. The point is that the accumulated estimated amount is about $850 million. The real figure is about $250 million.

We find that the government is shortchanging western Canada. It then has the nerve to turn around and parade all these statistics about how it is helping the farmer. It is failing to help the farmer. It is failing to help diversify the economy in western Canada, and the two ministers responsible for that are the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for Western Diversification.

I would also like to address very briefly a second issue that is hitting home in western Canada, and that is the changes in the postal rates. The Union of Manitoba Municipalities has kindly brought it to the attention of the government and to members of the opposition that the hike in postal fees is going to have a serious negative effect on daily newspapers.

In Manitoba, for example, The Brandon Sun has been adversely affected by this increase. That paper will have to increase its fees for subscribers who receive their paper via Canada Post from $114 to $220. The paper is trying to make alternative arrangements for trucking the papers to drop-off points. There will be a certain number which must be mailed out of province, for example.

The circulation manager points out that Canada Post only gave him two days' notice for this change. This is a blow against newspapers, an important communication link for rural areas and it comes at a very bad time. It seemed like another blow against rural areas by Canada Post.

• (1430)

We have heard a lot of discussion in the House in the last few months about the decline in the quality of life in western Canada. There are two components of that, I think. One is a diversification of the economy and the second is a communications strategy involving Canada Post.

Without the ability to communicate, without the ability to finance interesting projects, western Canada is doomed for a bleak future. I think that that can be directly attributed to the lack of understanding of this government which is a great irony because it spent years in opposition saying that it was the only party that understood western Canada. Yet, when given the opportunity to govern fairly for western Canadians, it has failed miserably.

The only route left for western Canadians to regain their future is to defeat this government and to put in others who understand them, namely, this party.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my Liberal colleague from Winnipeg North Centre brings forth some very interesting arguments regarding the problems with western diversification funding and other regional development funding programs for western Canada. His point is well taken that the funding that was supposed to have been funnelled through such kinds of regional development programs has in fact fallen drastically short of its mark.

Both the western diversification program and the ERDA programs were developed in order to funnel economic development priorities into provinces in the west. For example, we now see in British Columbia, at the end of this month, only a matter of a few days away, the cancellation of a $300 million five-year Forestry Resource Development Agreement that has gone on since 1985. That agreement is now to be terminated with no guarantees that there will be any other funding. The only hint of funding that we see at this point is about $30 million to $40 million to be funnelled in for forestry through western diversification.

We have seen a significant cut in the federal commitment to reforestation initiatives in British Columbia. There is no question that with that reduction in funding for forestry in British Columbia alone, as well as the many other provinces where those agreements are now coming to a close or have already been terminated, we see a significant loss of jobs in the forestry industry in the silviculture programs and replanting. An entire industry infrastructure has been built up around the FRDA agreements. Now that infrastructure will begin to fall apart with the government essentially knee-capping the funds that are required for forestry development.

In one of the other economic sectors, the Tourism Industry Development Subsidiary Agreements are now also being terminated. The word we get from the Minister of State for Tourism is that those will not be renewed. We are seeing a retraction of the government's commitment to regional development through the knee-capping of funding in these programs.

I certainly concur with my colleague from the Winnipeg area that these programs are conceptually of great value. Yet, politically speaking, there simply has not been the kind of political or economic initiative supplied to these programs by this government to really make them work.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member from British Columbia for reminding me about the forestry industry which I should have addressed more directly in my comments. It is impossible to understand the failure to renew an adequate agreement in forestry. Those who know the industry will know that it is the biggest employer in Canada when you include direct and indirect employment figures. It is the economic backbone of British Columbia. Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba are all trying to develop more aggressive forestry programs. At the very moment that the west is finding a way to broaden its economic base, the federal government walks out on it. That is totally indefensible and totally incomprehensible.

The list of ERDA agreements that are valuable to the west is endless. It would be easier for the government to tell us what it is continuing than for me to list what it is discontinuing.

The fact that the communications agreement is ending in Manitoba in 10 days and putting the motion picture industry there in total disarray is another example of the callousness of this government.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, to conclude the debate before us today, I would like to spend the remaining few minutes speaking about the other major initiative in this motion, and that is the fishery.

There is a crisis in the fishing industry, there are communities closing down, and there is a call by members of Parliament to put money into these communities to help them readjust. I contend that perhaps the greatest crisis facing the industry in eastern Canada is the crisis of having a government that is afraid to stop the cause of the problem in the fishery today.

I would like to refer to the facts concerning the fishery. We have, all along the coast of Canada, a 200-mile zone. It is 200 nautical miles, really, that is about 240 or 250 land miles. Within that zone Canada manages our fishing resource and has since 1977 when we declared the 200-mile zone like every other country in the world.

Let us look at the allocations for this year, at who is allowed to catch the fish inside of our 200-mile zone. Under the NAFO agreements, that is an international organization which manages fish stocks that come within the 200-mile zone and outside the 200-mile zone, the allocations are 310,500 metric tons to countries like Bulgaria, Cuba, the EEC, East Germany, Japan, Norway, Poland, U.S.S.R., and others. Then we have Canada's managed fish stocks. Under that we see that the total foreign allocations are 182,962 for 1990. Add both of them up and you get a figure of 493,462 metric tons.

What is the Canadian allocation? The Canadian allocation is, and I quote from the same document, 612,265 metric tons. So Canada is able to fish 600,000 metric tons, foreign nations are able to fish 500,000 metric tons, and the seals eating about two million metric tons. So between the foreigners and the seals we have a problem in the fishery in eastern Canada.

Here we are wondering what to do about the communities that are closing. Today MPs in their offices are taking calls from around the coastline. A gentleman called my office this morning from another person's riding and said: "Look, I cannot fish capelin this year. I am not allowed". He is not allowed to fish capelin this year because of a restricted entry regulation which was passed last year which said that you must be the skipper of a crew of at least three people and your boat has to be a certain size. These gentlemen, who have been full-time fishermen all their lives, are not allowed to fish capelin this year.

Yet we see increases in capelin allocations to Cuba, increases to Japan, increases to Norway, increases to Poland, increases to the U.S.S.R., and restrictions on Canadians.

What is the problem in the east coast fishery today? Ask a fisherman, Mr. Speaker, and he will say: "We don't want money from the Government of Canada, we want the right to be able to fish".

• (1440)

In regard to all of this that is going on, I will read something into the record. For all of the fishermen of eastern Canada, here it is. Listen now, because you are going to hear it straight from the Government of Canada, the Government of the Soviet Union and all of those foreign nations. This is a letter to the Canadian government dated just four weeks ago.

Mr. Reid: Table it.

Mr. Baker: I will table it, indeed I will. Just listen to this. I quote the Soviet side:

> —taking into account the desire of both sides to preserve stability, considers that the total U.S.S.R. allocations for 1990 in the Canadian zone should not be less than the allocation for 1989.

"To preserve stability". What does that threat mean from the Soviet Union? Not only from them, but from Cuba, Poland, Norway, East Germany, Bulgaria. What do they mean?

Then we get the response. This was written four weeks ago to the Government of Canada. The answer sent back from the Government of Canada says, pursuant to our agreement on mutual fisheries relations, the following initial quotas are given.

And then we see it: cod, redfish, Greenland halibut, grenadier, silver hake, Argentine, squid. Here they are, all in the allocations. Both sides agree.

The letter continues:

> The Canadian side confirms its intention to cooperate further with the Soviet side.

So there it is. While Canadian fishermen cannot fish, while Canadian fishermen are being cut back, foreign nations write to this government and say in order to "preserve stability". What are they going to do; invade us? In order to preserve stability we want the same quotas we had last year, while Canadians have been cut back, while our fish plants are closing, while our fishermen cannot fish what they fished last year and the year before.

Here we have it. I am tabling it so all of these Tories can read it so they will know what is going on behind the scenes. Or perhaps they do know what is going on behind the scenes.

As if that was not enough, in this letter it says, and I quote again this letter that I would like the government members to read. It states here:

> The Soviet side undertakes to finalize an exchange with the Canadian side—(involving) 2+3K capelin—

Now that may not mean very much to some people sitting in their fancy offices, but if you were to tell a fisherman that you are about to negotiate again with the Soviet Union, Cuba, East Germany and Bulgaria to give them more capelin, which is what codfish eat—

Mr. Reid: Male capelin.

Mr. Baker: The hon. gentleman says "male capelin". A codfish does not ask whether it is male or female. He will eat it no matter what it is.

Here we are today in the concluding moments of debate on a resolution asking the Government of Canada to properly manage the fisheries of our nation. We are asking for money. And here is the Canadian Government giving just as much to the foreigners as it gives to Canadians. It is afraid to take the initial steps to guarantee our fishermen their same quotas.

The Department of External Affairs runs the Department of Fisheries in this nation. The fishermen of Canada are saying to the Government of Canada: "All we want is the chance to fish. We do not want to be retrained with these great agreements that the Government of Canada is about to announce. We want to fish. That is what we have done all of our lives. You are today preventing us from fishing. You are today assigning to foreign nations exactly the same fish that we want."

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 2.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 81(14).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion lost.

A point of order, the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, Mr. Merrithew voted and had to leave the Chamber in the middle of the vote. I think it would be in keeping with our records if we have his name removed from the roll call before the count is announced.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 3.10 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before putting the motion in the name of the Hon. Leader of the Opposition, since today is the final allotted day for the supply period ending March 26, 1990, the House will go through the usual procedure to consider and dispose of supply bills.

In view of recent practices, do hon. members agree that the bills be distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLOTTED DAYS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt my honourable colleague, as I am looking forward to his remarks.

The Speaker will know, and the House will know, Madam Speaker, that last Friday at three o'clock in this Chamber a confidence vote took place. It was called for by the New Democratic Party. Members will also know that only 14 members of that party were present.

In normal circumstances Friday votes, and especially confidence votes, would be deferred until Monday. We are facing confidence votes today at seven o'clock. It would have been for the convenience of members of all parties and everyone in this chamber.

There were additional costs incurred for members of all parties but certainly the government party and I suspect the Official Opposition where members came back. They spent money on airline tickets, helping the bottom line for Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International perhaps and taxi firms, but at some cost in a direct sense to the taxpayers of this country. There would be some additional cost in the withdrawal of services of members who spent many hours returning from Vancouver and elsewhere. They cannot be in touch with their constituents. They cannot be doing the kind of work that they planned on doing and would like to do.

Because of the useless nature of the demonstration of that exercise and its lack of utility, its cost and lack of purpose, I wonder, Madam Speaker, if you might get unanimous consent in the spirit of hard work which generally characterizes this place, before we begin our work, to simply eliminate Standing Order 81(12)(b) which puts all of us under the gun for any opposition day on a Friday from now until doomsday when, in fact, the New Democratic Party has told this Chamber that through their desire to be obstructive rather than constructive, that they are going to hassle members on a Friday into the foreseeable future.

I wonder if you could put that question to the whole Chamber. I would seek unanimous consent for the elimination of Standing Order 81(12)(b).

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Hawkes: If members are shouting "no", I would like to hear their reason, why they think it is sane to waste taxpayers' money, to waste the time of members of this Chamber, to be present on a Friday, when those who caused that activity to occur have no intention of showing up.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the government will go to no ends to try to prevent a good, solid debate from occurring on research and development. Knowing my friend from Calgary, I know that he would not be one of those who would want to waste the time of the House.

If the hon. member wants to give notice to the House that the government is proposing an amendment to the Standing Order 81(12)(b), we will take that under advisement. Right now we cannot give an answer to that because we have an important debate today concerning research and development and we would like to proceed with that as soon as possible.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in view of the important debate that the Liberals have before us today and because we would like to have the opportunity to see just what the government Whip is planning to put forward, we too would like to see the House move forward with the opposition motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Obviously, the hon. member does not have unanimous consent to move his motion at this time.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 82—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

> That this House recognize that research and development, and the resulting innovation, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country and that Canada must increase its level of research and development in order to ensure economic growth in an increasingly competitive and technologically literate global community.

• (1310)

He said: Madam Speaker, the words of the motion we have put before the House today with regard to the level of commitment by the government to research and development in the country have been chosen very carefully.

The objective of our motion is to elicit support from members on all sides of the House to enlarge Canada's commitment to the goal of increasing, rather than decreasing, the level of research and development carried out in the country.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the House will note that the motion has taken some terms from the Prime Minister's vocabulary. Liberal Members agree with the goal the Prime Minister set himself before he became Prime Minister, and that was to increase substantially the budget for research and development. The reason why we present this motion is that the goal set by the Prime Minister did not materialize.

[English]

Before he became Prime Minister, the right hon. member made several very positive commitments. In 1983 he said with regard to research and development, and I quote:

> Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league or we become a nation that will, during our entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit.

In 1984 the Prime Minister said the following:

> We have to double our research and development commitment and triple our resolve to reach it.

In the same year he said:

> The production, application, and diffusion of modern technology is not going to help us if Canadians are not trained and educated in its use.

Also in 1984 he said, and I quote again:

> We are going to double our collective national commitment to research and development within the life of our first government mandate.

What has happened since those commitments were made? Did we double our spending on research and development?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): No, we did not. In 1983 Canada spent 1.35 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product on research and development. In 1988 that figure was 1.32 per cent. In other words, far from double. In fact, it was slightly less when expressed as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, a percentage of our economy.

Have we moved up in comparison to our major competitors? No, we have not. Japan, the United States, West Germany and France are at roughly double in spending on research and development as a per cent of Gross Domestic Product. To use the Prime Minister's term, we are in the Junior B league when it comes to research and development, despite his commitment that his government would put us in the major leagues before his first mandate expired.

Another commitment made by the Prime Minister was, and I quote:

> We are going to close that gap by making biotechnology and genetic research a top priority.

Did we close the gap on biotechnology and genetic research?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): No, the government and the Prime Minister did not close the gap on research. They closed the research laboratories.

[Translation]

After claiming loudly how important research and development was and after some eloquent campaign speeches on the subject, the day after the government was sworn in it aimed its guns at the National Research Council. In November 1984, the Conservative government slashed 60 million from the NRC's budget. Some of the sections and projects that were eliminated were the energy section, the Environment Secretariat, the Manufacturing Technology Institute, the Institute for Electrochemistry and the cold Regions Research Institute. It also fired 80 scientists and officers. This was only the beginning, however.

[English]

In 1986 it cut another $29 million from the National Research Council budget, closing down electromagnetic and mechanical engineering programs, closing down environmental toxicology programs, closing down aeronautics construction and physics programs, announcing the elimination of another 200 NRC jobs and shutting down the photochemistry and kinetics section. This was the section of the National Research Council where Canada's Nobel prize winning scientist, Dr. John Polanyi, began his research career.

It is no small wonder that when Dr. Polanyi was asked after learning of this shutdown what advice he would give to young scientists in Canada, he replied: "I think I would go to the United States."

My predecessor, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, at the time Dr. Polanyi said this, asked the Prime Minister if he could "conceive of a more damning indictment of his governmental policy than to have one of the leading scientists of our country recommend to the young people of Canada who are interested in scientific research that their only recourse is to go south of the border to the United States". That is what the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra asked at the time and at that time, in 1986, the Prime Minister had no answer.

In the latest budget his government continued to reduce its commitment to research and development with a further cut of $39 million from its research and technology programs.

Now that situation is becoming even more critical because while the Canadian government is firing scientists and reducing budgets for research and development, the United States government is doing exactly the opposite. President Bush of the United States has just announced a 14.4 per cent increase in the budget of the National Science Foundation, their equivalent to our National Research Council.

[Translation]

Meanwhile, Madam Speaker, the President of the National Research Council has announced that because of budgetary constraints, the NRC will have to reduce research on High Energy Physics; eliminate the Prairie research station, in Saskatchewan; do away with the avalanche research centre in British Columbia; lease out the Algonquin Park Radio Observatory; eventually close down the wind tunnel at Uplands; and possibly move the Herzberg Institute of Astrophysics.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I do not think it could be argued that these are the actions of a government committed to tripling its resolve to double research and development output. Far from it!

What about the need to educate and train more young Canadians to take up the challenge of scientific research? Since 1984 the government opposite has moved deliberately to reduce its commitment to the funding of education in this country. In its last budget the government slashed another $2.1 billion in post-secondary education transfer payments to the provinces.

How is that going to help fill our research laboratories with bright young scientists, scientists who will carry out the innovative research which is necessary to make Canada competitive? It will not do that at all. We already have a shortage of individuals with the necessary skills, and the government's attitude toward spending on education is short-sighted, to say the least. It is more than short-sighted, it is dangerous for the future of this country.

In one of the most research and development intensive sectors in our economy, the high technology sector in Canada is lagging behind. According to an innovation consultant in that sector, the federal government "does not know how to spell high technology, let alone develop policies to encourage it". The president of the Canadian Advanced Technology Association, Mr. Roy Woodbridge, has stated that the problem is becoming more and more critical and that:

> There is a growing sense that the window of opportunity for Canada to become a substantive player in research and development is closing. There is a growing malaise within the technology community in this country.

Mr. Woodbridge went on to say that unique among industrialized nations Canada now has a negative balance and a growing trade deficit in every single sector of the advanced technology industry.

• (1320)

Members should also consider the fact that this country, which invented the telephone, which has led the world in telecommunications technology, which in fact devotes nearly 40 per cent of all its R and D to telecommunications, and which for years has had a healthy trade surplus in telecommunications equipment, last year for the first time imported more telecommunications equipment than it exported.

Combine that with the impact of the trade deal signed by this government with the United States, a trade deal which will encourage more and more takeovers of Canadian business and the transfer of research and development to head offices outside Canada.

What is also happening is that the government is just standing by and letting our high tech sector become more and more of a branch plant economy. Yet, as the government House leader said a year ago when he was Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: "Branch plants just don't do research".

However the trade deal and this government's laissez–faire attitude to foreign takeovers are only two of the many impediments this government has thrown in the way of increasing our ability to perform the levels of research and development necessary for economic growth and prosperity.

The imposition of the new goods and services tax will also have a negative impact. The government has imposed this new tax on all books—essential tools of knowledge and education. Equally important, the new tax will also be applied to university expenditures. This means that even though rebates are to be given of this goods and services tax, and these rebates are supposed to leave them no worse off than under the old manufacturers' sales tax, this has not yet been proven. It is not yet clear that universities will be in the same position as they were and as they are under the present tax regime. Many fear, and I think for good reason, that universities will be worse off.

Furthermore, there will be a heavier administrative burden for universities in applying for these rebates. This means that less money will actually be available for research and development because a portion of it will have to be used for the extra administrative burden imposed on our universities as a result of the government's proposed goods and services tax.

Also, our research granting bodies are facing the possibility that the government will cancel the university–industry matching grants programs under which the councils' budgets were increased by $1 for every $1 contributed by industry to university research. This single change in policy could mean a reduction of 20 per cent of the entire operating budget of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, a cut of 26 per cent of the operating budget of the Medical Research Council, and a $13.1 million cut in the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

I am sure members will agree that such a change in policy would not help encourage more research and development. It would do exactly the opposite.

The decisions we make on research and development today will have an enormous impact on our economy tomorrow.

We in Canada cannot rely on our present resource based economy alone to provide the level of growth and development we need to be a leading industrial power into the next century.

If we look around the world at other industrialized countries, it is not difficult to understand why they have greatly increased their competitive position compared to Canada. Two good examples are West Germany and Japan in which governments have taken a leadership role, in partnership with industry and educational institutions, in devoting money and resources for research and development.

If we compare our efforts to seven other leading industrialized countries, using ten different tests for R and D performance, we find that Canada ranks lowest on five of those tests, second lowest on three, and is about average on the remaining two. That is not a very good record.

These comparisons show that in the Prime Minister's own words we are still very much at the junior b level despite all the claims by the Prime Minister and the government to the contrary.

All of us in this place know or should know that research and development are crucial not only to our economic well-being but also to the development of solutions to some of our most pressing environmental problems. Canada and indeed the world are in desperate need of new technologies to combat the despoiling of our planet. Governments should be looking for ways to stimulate and encourage the development of these new technologies, not retreating in the face of a global challenge.

I believe we must reverse this disturbing trend. I believe if members on all sides of this House offer their support for the motion we have put forward, we will have accomplished a very positive step in that direction.

We have to do what all students in this country know is necessary in order to graduate and move ahead. We have again to start doing our homework. We have again to start putting our efforts into producing more and better technologies which will put us in the forefront of global development, and not allow ourselves to become a technological backwater.

That is why we are urging every member of this House to support this motion. After all, it includes the Prime Minister's own words as he said and as our motion says:

> Research and Development and the resulting innovation are the life blood of a successful economy and country.

That is why I say in concluding my remarks and opening the debate on this motion: let us join together in support of it. Let us help Canada succeed. Let us help Canada graduate and move ahead to become a more innovative and competitive economy. We need this for ourselves. We need this for our children. We need this for the future of our country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are discussing today the Business of Supply, the principal financial business of the Government of Canada. The government is responsible to this House of Commons. It has an obligation to maintain the confidence of this House. It is introducing two bills later today, based on the debate in part that will take place today.

I find it frankly appalling, a complete indication of Tory arrogance, and an abuse of the practices of this House that during the speech of the Leader of the Opposition at the opening of this debate there was not a single member of the cabinet present in this House. There are 39 members of cabinet who sit in this House and one of them walked in one minute before the end of that speech. I object vigorously to this disgraceful contempt of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is quite aware of the rules of this House. Making a point of order to say precisely whether a person is or is not in the House is not the way things are done here, and he knows it quite well.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I would want my hon. colleagues on the other side of the House to know that I sat enthralled in the lobby listening to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. I saw once again the difficulty we continue to have in terms of this subject and certainly some members of the opposition. It is easy to raise these spectres about things that probably will never happen.

I heard the Leader of the Opposition talk about the matching grants policy and what a dreadful thing this was going to be, that millions and millions of dollars would be lopped off the budget for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the other things. That makes a big assumption that the matching grant policy will not be continued or, what may be even more likely, would be replaced by a policy that was even more beneficial to the universities than the one we have now.

It is not a plea for a different kind of policy. It is not a plea for continuation of the thrust. It is a comment that this is going to disappear. Therefore all the scientists and the universities in Canada should be quite upset because this government has made decisions.

I could say that same with respect to the comments about the National Research Council. This government has every intention of ensuring that the National Research Council is a major contributor to science and technology in the years ahead. We have every intention of ensuring that the National Research Council will be one of the main thrusts in terms of promoting that liaison between industry, universities and government laboratories which is so important.

I heard them talk about high quality manpower and how this government was doing nothing about that. It was this government that brought in the Canada Scholarships Program whereby 10,000 young men and women, at least 50 per cent of whom will be women, will be involved in promoting science and technology and getting young men and women into science and technology so that we can begin to resolve the high quality person power requirements that will be down the road. We know that.

However that is done by taking the resources we have and putting them in the right directions. That is exactly what we are trying to do. We are trying to do it without frightening Canadians that all is going to the dogs. We are going to do these things and we are going to place our money in the right directions; not just throw money at every conceivable program there could be.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. minister whose words on the surface are very encouraging, but we have to listen as well to a repetition of the words of the Prime Minister who stated in 1984: "We are going to double our collective national commitment to research and development within the life of our first government mandate."

What actually happened, even if we give the Prime Minister a few extra years to achieve his objective and even if we do not look at simply the period between 1984 and the election itself in 1988? But if we look at the period from 1983 to 1988 we see that in the year 1983 Canada spent 1.35 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product on research and development. I ask you, Madam Speaker, and members of the House: Did the figure increase over the ensuing five years? Did it at least stay the same? It did not even stay the same. It dropped from 1.35 per cent to 1.32 per cent.

I do not see why the Prime Minister, with all the levers of government at his command, could not at least keep the level of expenditure in research and development as a percentage of our Gross Domestic Product equal to what it was in 1983. He could not even do that; it fell.

Furthermore, if we look further at the action of the government with respect to the National Research Council and the research and development programs of the government, what we saw was cut, cut, cut; slash, slash, slash: laboratories, programs, scientists and technicians. What is the point of maintaining a better liaison through the National Research Council with the private sector and government laboratories if the government is closing down its laboratories?

This is very serious in any country. It is very serious, however, in Canada because so little research and development is being done in the private sector in spite of the words of the government about having more done there. Our research laboratories in government are especially important in this country to maintain our high technology base.

If we look at what this government actually did and if we look at what has actually happened since this government came into office, we cannot have the confidence the hon. minister would like us to have in what he just said about the future intentions of this government.

I wish it were otherwise, because the motion we have offered is one built on the words of the Prime Minister himself. Our purpose is to try and get the whole House, including the supporters of the government, to join with us in sending not just to the government but to the country the sense of Parliament in support of more activity in research and development. Yet, instead of a supportive comment by the minister—and I hope it will come later in the debate—we see simply an attempt to justify what until now has been a record that this government should not be proud of in any way, shape or form.

We are giving members of this House including the minister a chance to begin doing better by supporting our motion later today. I hope they will do it. As my colleague has said, it will also give them a chance to support and show that they agree with the words of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I really quite enjoyed and doubtless will support the position that has been the subject of the discourse by the hon. member for Windsor West. I note that members of the Official Opposition has chosen to use the words of the Prime Minister at a time before he was Prime Minister. I am truly curious why they did not choose to use the words of the previous Prime Minister and whether the fact that they did not reflects the absence of any real policy for research and development during the time the party of the Official Opposition held office.

The Leader of the Official Opposition has chosen to select the words of his motion from the book Where I Stand by the Prime Minister and related utterances by the Prime Minister. I would have suggested that he might have looked a little further from the source and he would have found this: "In 1968, however, when Pierre Elliott Trudeau became Prime Minister, we were spending 1.4 per cent of the Gross National Product in this vital job productive area of research and development. For a decade we spent only .9 per cent. In the last two years we have spent 1.13 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product for research and development".

My question is why was Pierre Elliott Trudeau not quoted on the subject of research and development? Given the record of the investment of the previous governments between 1968 and 1984, leaving out that brief period of Conservative government, would he tell us whether what we have heard now is a policy change as compared to the previous occasion in which the Official Opposition had the opportunity really to do something about research and development?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): We chose the words of the present Prime Minister on which to build our motion because it is that Prime Minister and his party who are presently in office, who hold the levers of government in their hands, and who are today in a position to do something about the problem which I sense is one on which there is a consensus in this House and in this country.

I think it very important that we deal with the situation as it is today, and equally or more important, as we want it to be tomorrow. We want to call upon all members of this House to send a message, not just to the government but to the private sector, to the entire country and to the world that we have to do better and that we are going to do better.

Let us be frank about it. This motion will not carry unless we have the support of, if not all, a substantial number of members on the government side of the House. We thought that we would draft the motion in a way designed to put the supporters of the government to the test and give them a chance to support their own Prime Minister.

I see, Madam Speaker, you are giving me a signal that the time for comment is ending. We recognize who happens to be the Prime Minister of the country for the time being and who has the responsibility of government. We want to give him and his colleagues a chance to join with us in sending the right message in support of research and development to this entire country and to the world as to what Canada needs in order for us to achieve our objectives for it now and in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I did not want to interrupt the hon. Leader of the Opposition but time for questions and comments has expired. Resuming debate with the hon. minister.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I do enjoy the opportunity today to speak to the motion of the hon. Leader of the Opposition concerning research development and innovation.

At the outset, I would like to say that I agree with the hon. member in terms of the importance of research and development to a nation's economy. It is unfortunate, however, that the opposition has chosen to trivialize this subject by making it a confidence motion which they know that, in accordance with all the rules and traditions of this House, the government will vote against.

As well, I would like to comment about how incomplete I believe this motion is in terms of what makes a country, particularly this one, competitive. In the race to stay competitive in this world market, Canada's advantage in natural resources and our geographic position next to the great trading markets will no longer be enough. In today's world, innovation has become the key to economic strength.

What gives a country a particular edge in innovation that is necessary to make that country internationally competitive? Certainly the level of research and development is important. There are other factors equally important, and sometimes in the growth of a country the economy rests more on other matters than on R and D.

What we are trying to do, I regret with little help from the opposition, is to make Canada competitive across the board. That is why when we looked at the free trade agreement with the United States we said here is another way in which we will make Canada competitive in the world. That is why we are going ahead with the goods and services tax to ensure that our exporters and manufacturers have their prices decreased so that we cannot only buy Canadian made goods cheaper here in Canada, but we can export those same goods.

Those are factors equally as important as the amount of R and D that we are likely to do. The technology inflow that is so desperately required in this country is another very important factor, to which the motion that is placed before this House pays absolutely no attention. We are dealing with a motion that touches one part of the issue and completely ignores the rest, and that is not a motion that most of us can accept.

This government, in terms of R and D, science and technology and its relationship with industry, created the Department of Industry, Science and Technology so that we would have a continuum between the basic science that is done in this country and the necessary ability to have our industries competitive at the other end. That continuum and all the inputs to it are what are going to make Canada a competitive nation. Not only does the new department place a very heavy emphasis on research and development, but it places those R and D efforts in a proper context which, until now, has been lacking in this country.

In the course of our deliberations today, I hope members from both sides of the House will take the opportunity to examine this in a larger perspective than the motion that we have in front of us. R and D, while important, is not enough in terms of making this country competitive. It is simply not enough for the Government of Canada to assume responsibility for all of Canada's R and D efforts. The government cannot do it alone.

I believe that the eminent Canadian scientist, Dr. Fraser Mustard, captured what I am referring to in a recent interview. Dr. Mustard spoke about Canada's "ingrained business philosophy", noting that it focuses on "short-term, quick profits", and that it views government as having the sole responsibility for funding scientific innovation.

What is required is a major emphasis on science and technology throughout the whole economy in industry, in universities, in the provincial governments, as well as in the Government of Canada.

Certainly, the federal government has a major responsibility. However, in tabling this motion today, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is already aware of the high level of funding that the Government of Canada now provides for science and technology.

Federal government expenditures take many forms. They include support for the university research granting councils, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Medical Research Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Hon. members will recall that in May, 1988 this government announced a $200 million increase in funding for those granting councils. Members will also recall that in the recent budget of the Minister of Finance the granting councils received special treatment. Their increases in this coming year will be something like 8.6 per cent. That shows a commitment to the development of high quality manpower and to the promotion of research and development in our universities.

This House also knows, because we have spoken about it many times, about the National Networks of Excellence Program, $240 million to promote the networks that are so required in Canada in terms of the pre-competitive research that Canada has not done very well in the past and that no government until this one has been able to tackle, trying to bring the universities and industry together to promote the networks so that we can have a critical size in terms of research and development that the country needs.

We have also spoken in this House about the Strategic Technologies Program, where in this instance we have asked industry to come and take the lead, to join forces one with another, join up with universities and with government laboratories to try to promote the technologies which we have chosen to be critical in terms of this country's future; namely, information technologies, the biotechnologies and the advanced industrial materials technologies. We have done those things and the money is set aside.

The federal government spent $5.1 billion on science and technology in 1989 and 1990. That is 4.9 per cent of the government's total program expenditures. That is a lot of money. The federal government's expenditures, in research and development alone, are estimated at $3 billion. That is an increase of 6 per cent over the previous year.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition who proposed this motion may not be aware that the Government of Canada spends more on civilian research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product than the United States and the United Kingdom. We spend about the same on civilian research and development as does the Japanese government. We spend somewhat less than France and West Germany. In other words, compared to the government investment in civilian R and D of our principal trading partners, we are in the middle of the pack.

The fact remains, and no one knows this better than members of the government side, that industry has been slow to respond to the R and D challenge. Canadian industry invests far less than our major trading partners in research and development. It invests about 0.75 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product in R and D, while the private sector in Germany, the United States, Japan and Sweden spends close to 2 per cent. Therein lies the problem about what we have to do in Canada.

It is quite illogical for the opposition to suggest that the Government of Canada should shoulder this whole weight. What we have to do is devise programs to ensure that our industrial partners come in with us and try to promote the appropriate research and development.

The role of government should be to co-ordinate, to facilitate and, where appropriate, to lead. It should not be the function of the federal government to replace private sector research with research paid for by the taxpayer. That is too easy. We know that does not work. We know that the research that is going to count in terms of promoting economic growth, in terms of promoting wealth in Canada, must be industry-driven, industry-lead, and industry-financed. We can help, but we know after 20 some odd years of throwing money at it that that is not going to be the answer.

That is why we have tried in our new programs to have so much of our R and D thrust as a co-operative effort between the Government of Canada and our industrial partners. I mentioned earlier the Strategic Technologies Program and the National Networks of Excellence Program, specifically designed to bring those partners together to promote the kind of industry R and D that we need. One of our problems, as I said, is the lack in Canada of directed basic research or the pre-competitive research which is so prominent in other countries. That we are going to tackle through some of these programs.

I think the House would agree that by implementing generous tax incentives, by fostering these networks, by fostering these alliances, that we are investing in the R and D climate of Canada, and that is what has to be done.

Of course, Madam Speaker, there is much we would all like to do. One has to ask the question: What is it appropriate for the Government of Canada to do as opposed to others? That question cannot be answered today. Perhaps some can, but I cannot. I cannot answer that question today without looking at the over-all financial picture of the Government of Canada.

When we spend 35 cents of every dollar to pay the interest on our national debt, our ability to spend on science and technology is curtailed like everything else. There is no question that we all would like to do more.

Let me come back to some of the things I talked about earlier. The question is not only the amount of research and development that this country has to do. The question is, what do we do to make the country competitive? There are many in the country now who believe that R and D is one component, but technology in-flow will be equally important. That is why we have to promote these alliances and Canadian companies looking out to see what other countries are doing and bringing that technology back. That is one of the things we are trying to do. We think it is critical that we bring the industry with us in these areas. Otherwise, we will not reach the kind of R and D that we need.

When talking about Gross Domestic Product and the amount of R and D that is being done, if one is low on that scale I do not think that is the disease, contrary to my colleagues on the other side, I believe that is a symptom of a disease and we had better go to the root of the disease, not just look at some number which in itself does not help us in terms of looking at how to make the country competitive. Those are the issues.

In developing a national agenda—and let me stress the word "national"—it is up to all of us, all levels of government and industry in Canada, to look at the national agenda. It is not just a Government of Canada responsibility. It is everyone's responsibility to look at what we can do to make our various sectors more competitive. In many instances, that is promotion of R and D. But we are a country with a particular set of industries and a good deal of natural resource industries. For years, those industries have not been terribly prominent in terms of the amount of research and development they do, except to promote their extraction techniques. In fact, in that area they have been extraordinarily good.

What we need are more industries to look at value-added products. They need to look at adding value to the raw resources so that we can move up the scale. That may require R and D. It may also require a good deal of looking at what happens elsewhere.

Let me talk a little about the Prime Minister's National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. That is one of the most important instruments that the Prime Minister has established in his discussions. It is comprised of eminent Canadians from university, labour and business communities and represents both pure and applied research. The board has submitted a series of reports to the Prime Minister dealing with how science and technology can be expanded and exploited more effectively in Canada.

For example, it was the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology and the report of the university committee of that Board that recommended a national merit scholarship program for undergraduate students entering science and engineering. The Canada Scholarship Program, the $80 million program, is a direct result of the Prime Minister's advisory body. We responded to that.

The public awareness committee of NABS, as we call it, recommended a campaign to make Canadians aware of the need to be informed of the latest developments in science and technology and to understand the ways science affects us in our homes, in our schools, and on our jobs. The government responded with a $10 million program to increase public awareness, including a Science Culture Canada Program to develop a better understanding. Under that program, we sponsor science fairs and educational programs right across the country and the provinces are with us on that. The provinces like that program so much that they have joined with us to extend the time limit within which some of the programs are operating. It is a national program in that sense.

All of these are excellent examples of the manner in which the government has built its science and technology policy through collaboration and consultation. We will continue to consult.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member may continue his intervention after Question Period.

It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal has recommended that Canadian tariffs on textile imports be gradually reduced so they will be comparable to, although slightly higher than, those in other industrialized countries.

The government will have to take a very close look at the tribunal's recommendations before making a prudent and considered decision.

This decision must be integrated with the Free Trade Agreement which provides for eliminating customs tariffs on 50 per cent of textile imports within seven years. The future decision on tariff reductions in the Uruguay Round the results of these negotiations will not be known until the end of the year. I am referring to a future decision concerning the Multi-Fibre Arrangement which, under GATT article XIX, expires on July 31, 1991, and subsequent transition mechanisms.

It is absolutely vital for the Canadian textile industry to be in a position to attract investors interested in this sector.

It is also vital for the government to avoid any hasty decisions that might cause investors to turn to the United States.

WOMEN'S WORLD ICE HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIPS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I join my colleagues in the House today in extending very warm congratulations to members of Team Canada for becoming the first women's world hockey champions.

In winning the title our national women's team has made history. I congratulate the women on the team for their hard work, excellence and fair play and their dedication. The team played brilliantly throughout the series and has demonstrated to all of us that women's ice hockey deserves to be a full medal sport in the Olympics.

There is also a place for women in the sport of politics. I hope more young women will become involved so we may gain another first—gender parity in Parliament by the year 2000. I am sure you agree with me, Madam Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, on November 28, 1989, Canadian citizen Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo travelled to the country of his origin, Taiwan. Even though he carried his Canadian passport, upon his entry was arrested without warrant, jailed and violently beaten.

In December, 1989, the guilty verdict of illegal entry was handed down. On January 12, 1990, he was charged with preparing or conspiring to commit sedition which is punishable by a minimum term of ten years imprisonment.

One would assume that the Canadian government would take swift measures to protest the violations against and to secure the freedom of Mr. Leo, a Canadian citizen. To date, the only request to the trade office by the Department of External Affairs is to monitor the case. Those close to Mr. Leo believe that the low key approach of the Canadian government has been seen by the KMT government as a green light to further prosecute Mr. Leo.

The new charge is more serious; it is a case of freedom of speech and of a Canadian citizen and taxpayer's rights being seriously violated. It is more than time for this government to take action and to stick up for one of our fellow Canadian citizens.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, residents in six communities on the Lower North Shore, in the riding of Manicouagan, voted in municipal elections for the first time in their history.

The residents of Blanc-Sablon, Lourdes-de-Blanc-Sablon and Bradore, communities that have now been amalgamated to form the new municipality of Blanc-Sablon, elected Rémi Beaudoin from Lourdes-de-Blanc-Sablon as mayor, and Vincent Joncas and Odette Beaudoin-Dobbin from Lourdes-de-Blanc-Sablon, Paul Lavallée and Normand Letemplier from Blanc-Sablon, and Russell Hobbs and Charles Hart of Bradore, as municipal councillors.

[English]

The residents of Middle Bay, St. Paul's River and Old Fort have elected Mr. Scott Buckle as the first mayor of the new municipality of Bonne Espérance and Mr. Andrew Fequet and Mrs. Florance Poland from Old Fort, Mrs. Alvina Leblanc-Lavallée and Mrs. Gladys Buckle from Middle Bay, Mrs. Mary Spingle and Mrs. Karen Nadeau-Thomas from St. Paul's River, to the position of municipal counsellors.

I wish to invite members of the House of Commons to join me in wishing them success and satisfaction in their new municipal functions.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, the environment committee has passed an all-party unanimous resolution calling for a moratorium on the development of the Carmanah Valley in British Columbia. The committee seems to believe that it has some interest in what is entirely a provincial matter.

Sustainable development has become the catch phrase of the day. Nowhere is sustainable development more appropriate than in the Carmanah Valley in British Columbia. Despite the cries of pending doom, Carmanah is being managed in a responsible manner, consistent with sustainable development. An initial reserve 25 per cent larger than Stanley Park has been established to preserve the unique old growth Sitka spruce. The balance of the timber will be harvested over a 70 year period. Reforestation plays an important role in the management of this renewable resource.

British Columbia and MacMillan Bloedel are developing a management plan that shares the Carmanah Valley. This agreement has been reached without federal help. As such, I would suggest that the House of Commons environment committee not interfere in provincial jurisdiction, mind its own business and kindly butt out.

NATIVE PROGRAMS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the federal government has chosen to slash nearly $10 million from native programs which will have a detrimental effect for natives in my riding and across Canada.

In the last five years the native population has swelled as a result of federal legislation which allowed many native people to regain their rightful native status and return to the reserves. However, the government has now cut the funding necessary to deal with increased growth and has cut the ability of native people to lobby the government.

This year's budget has put a 5 per cent limit on expenditure growth in the areas of housing, public works, band management and economic development. The impact is felt on Alderville Reserve in my riding which has 60 families now on a waiting list for homes on the reserve, forced in the interim to pay exorbitant rents off reserve, some living with two families per unit. The 5 per cent cap on growth in funding will not keep pace with the population growth on reserves.

As well, Secretary of State funding cutbacks have attacked the core funding of such native groups as the Assembly of First Nations and the Union of Ontario Indians, organizations which are the communication links between the native people and Ottawa.

The government must live up to its commitments and reinstate communications and social funding for native programs.

GOVERNMENT OF QUÉBEC

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, on March 24, Le Journal de Montréal printed the following, and I quote:

> "Decision made before Wilson Budget—"
> On November 6, 1989, well before the Wilson Budget, the Bourassa government had decided to transfer part of its obligations and its deficit to the municipalities.
> Furthermore, the Bourassa government decided that in 1990-91, it would reduce spending in all departments and agencies by 10 per cent and cut spending on education, postsecondary education, health and social services, and income security (housing assistance).
> This was revealed in an order in council, adopted on that date by the Bourassa cabinet and now released.

Madam Speaker, I hope the Liberals, and especially the NDP, read this article in Le Journal de Montréal.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, the Hamilton, Ontario chapter of Science for Peace, along with many other Canadians, oppose the continued support by the Conservative government for cruise missile testing over Canadian soil. The over 300 scientists and other members of Science for Peace say to the government that cruise missile testing completely negates any efforts Canada may be making in the cause for global peace and security.

While other countries in the world are sheathing their swords, Canada is keeping remnants of the cold war alive by participating in the testing of these destructive weapons.

As Science for Peace members correctly pointed out in their second letter of protest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, there are many ways in which Canada can honour commitments to NATO, instead of participating in cruise missile testing. Canada can start by distancing itself from such destabilizing activities and by promoting its traditional role as the honest broker in peacekeeping.

Science for Peace and all Canadians, including the Liberal party, call upon the Conservative government to discontinue testing of the cruise missile over Canadian soil.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, recently a documentary film was made in the United States that attacked the president of General Motors. The name of the film was Roger and Me. Canadians who saw the satirical documentary felt chagrin and anger with American workers who suffered under Roger Smith's arbitrary closure of Flint, Michigan.

Now we discover that the same Roger Smith is pulling the same stunt here in Canada with the Boisbriand closure and 1,700 jobs down the tube. In the film we saw the slogan: "What's good for General Motors is good for the U.S. government". We are getting the supplementary here in Canada: "What's good for General Motors is good for the Mulroney administration.".

The government loaned $220 million to General Motors and now it is closing down this plant. If it is a bunch of what you say it is, why does the government not do something about it? It is caving in to General Motors again.

GLOBE 90

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, from March 19 to March 23, I had the honour and privilege of attending Globe 90 in Vancouver, British Columbia. The Globe 90 conference and trade fair provided a forum and focus for global opportunities for business and the environment.

Close to 4,000 persons were in attendance, and some 60 countries exhibited in the trade fair. There were many outstanding presentations made by experts from every conceivable field of the environment.

All levels of government were represented with about 20 members of Parliament and senators in attendance. Premier Vander Zalm of British Columbia and his Minister of the Environment, the Hon. John Reynolds, were keynote speakers at the opening, together with Maurice Strong, an outstanding environmentalist.

I also wish to acknowledge His Honour, the Speaker of the House, the Hon. John Fraser, who was also a keynote speaker and honorary chairman of Globe 90.

Madam Speaker, I left Globe 90 with a great feeling of optimism about the future of the environment. Between the creative approaches of the private sector and the commitment by all levels of government to make the environment a high priority, we may all yet look forward to a brighter future.

WOMEN'S WORLD ICE HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, a historic event took place in the nation's capital last week, demonstrating once again that Canada can welcome the world with flair and style, that Canadian women can compete with the best in the world and, further, that Canadian women are ready to take their place in any job, any profession, any role the world has to offer.

I want to congratulate Team Canada on winning the gold medal yesterday at the first ever International Women's World Championships in hockey.

With strength, speed and style, our hockey players skated to a five to two victory and came out of their five game tournament undefeated while competing against the best from around the world.

Organizers and sponsors of this world class event, held right in this city, can be commended for their excellent efforts. We are well-known around the world for our love of hockey, and this landmark victory for our women's team proves that Canada is determined to make hockey history. If we ever needed proof we have it now that women's hockey is ready for the Olympics.

THE FRENCH FACT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, today I would like to draw the attention of the House to what Troy Davidson, a young anglophone 16 year-old from Toronto, Ontario, Troy Davidson, from Toronto, did to promote the French fact in Canada. He got 140 students at his school to sign a petition defending the French fact in this country.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Desjardins: Troy explained that he was concerned about the unity of this country and that he sincerely believes French culture is an asset to Canada.

In the midst of the current language controversy, I think it is edifying and encouraging to see young Canadians stand up and speak out to defend this country's identity. It is unfortunate that certain leaders and individuals have abdicated their responsibility to work to support the unity of this country, but it is also both comforting and stimulating to see and hear young people who are prepared to stand up for the rights of minorities.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Three cheers for Canada's youth!

Mr. Desjardins: Bravo, Troy, for this show of leadership!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my concern is with the Sydney Tar Ponds clean-up project in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. The Ministry of the Environment initiated the formation of a citizens' monitoring committee, following widely expressed concerns by both Sysco workers and the community that the preliminary environmental screening report was not detailed enough to be accurate.

These concerns grew out of the deep familiarity of the workers for the substances to be uncovered in the Muggah Creek site and the inexplicably high incidence of cancer mortality rates in the area. In fact, the committee has presented a recommendation to the minister that the survey was not sufficiently detailed and has requested a full panel review under the EARP guidelines.

The over-riding concern is that the dredging plans remain vague and do not allow for the hazard of the exposure of emissions of carcinogenic gasses like naphthalene. The committee report recognizes that "excavation will allow for the release of such gasses into the air".

A second major concern is that proposals for the dispersal of contaminated waste are inadequate and will result in the leaching of toxic substances such as lead, mercury, and zinc into the groundwater and into Sydney harbour.

The urgent nature of the committee's recommendations deserve a prompt response by the minister. The health and environment of the Sydney are at stake. Act now!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Many Canadians got the impression from listening to the Prime Minister's speech on television last week that he agreed with the concerns Premier McKenna had expressed, concerns which Premier McKenna felt should be contained in a companion resolution to the 1987 constitutional amendment.

Speaking in Toronto on Friday, the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "I didn't endorse McKenna's proposals. I've been trying to tell you that. The reference to a committee does not mean the acceptance of each of the items in the resolution".

Can the Prime Minister clarify for Canadians just what his views are on the items contained in Premier McKenna's proposal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my hon. friend needs any clarification because I had sent him, prior to delivering the speech on television, a copy of my remarks in which I said:

> Accordingly, I have decided to introduce Premier McKenna's companion resolution in the House of Commons next week and immediately refer it to a special committee of the House.

Had I wanted to say "endorse", or "support", I would have said that, but I said introduce in the House for consideration by a committee, which committee would then hear from Canadians across the country and report back to the House for a vote. That strikes me as being an appropriate and democratic procedure.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister does not support the items in Premier McKenna's proposal, could he tell the House and Canadians where he expects the exercise reflected by the motion on today's Order Paper to lead?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask the Prime Minister whether the McKenna proposal, attached to the government motion appearing in today's Order Paper, will change the Constitution if the provisions it contains are adopted. In that case we will need the consent of the Senate and the provincial legislatures. Has the government asked the provinces to table the same resolutions before their respective legislatures?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Premier McKenna introduced into his legislature a companion accord, in response to which I, on behalf of the government, said:

> Last Friday Premier McKenna wrote to inform me of his intention to improve on Meech Lake through a companion resolution that would add to, but not subtract from the Accord, and would address a number of concerns that have been raised.

I went on to say:

> This is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposition—but a number of amendments that all Canadians should examine seriously—without undermining the Accord and the consensus it represents.

This was because Premier McKenna, in introducing his resolution into the New Brunswick Legislature, concluded by saying: "Now, therefore, the legislative assembly resolves that amendments to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation—", et cetera, "—but only after the Constitution Amendment, 1987 comes into force".

Premier McKenna was saying in this resolution what he has said publicly many times since, that he has put this forward for consideration by Canadian legislatures in the hope that it can lead to further discussion among all provinces which, in turn, can lead to a resolution of the Meech Lake impasse.

It was in that spirit that I undertook to introduce it into the House of Commons.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am asking these questions because I think Canadians want to have a greater understanding of the process that the Prime Minister wants to follow and where the Prime Minister expects it to lead, especially in connection with the specific items raised by Premier McKenna.

I again repeat the point of my second question, which is whether or not the Prime Minister would like to see each of the provincial legislatures consider the same annex that is attached to the resolution to set up the special committee which is before the House. In particular, what role does the Prime Minister see for the Senate in consideration of the McKenna proposals and other proposals to break the constitutional impasse?

I ask this because if the Senate and provincial legislatures are not involved in dealing with the companion resolution, how does the Prime Minister ever expect the contents of that resolution to become part of the Constitution of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other legislatures can speak for themselves and make up their own minds as to how they want to entertain what has been a positive approach by Premier McKenna, which is designed to try to break a log jam.

I speak for my government and we have introduced it into the House of Commons for consideration by a special committee of the House. It has been agreed that at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon the three party leaders will speak in respect of the procedures that they hope to have followed. At that time I will spell out, as will my hon. friend no doubt, my views in respect of the most expeditious and appropriate manner in which a committee of the House of Commons might proceed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The question to be referred for consideration to the Special Committee of the House concerns the companion resolution, better known as the McKenna proposal. This proposal is aimed at amending the 1987 Constitutional Accord or Meech Lake Accord. Does the Prime Minister think the mandate of this committee could be expanded to include any other amendment concerning Canada's Constitution?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered this question in my speech Thursday evening, when I said this was not a final offer, take it or leave it, but a number of changes that all Canadians should examine very seriously. I think there is a way to reach out to Canadians who feel left out by Meech Lake—aboriginal people, northern residents, certain women's groups—without compromising the Accord itself and the consensus it creates. I think that answers the hon. member's question.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Premier McKenna has said, and I quote from his own document: "The companion resolution would require public hearings be held by Parliament and all effective provincial legislatures before the adoption of any constitutional amendments."

How does the Prime Minister of this country intend to involve all of Parliament, that is the House of Commons and the Senate, in this process to make it really a constitutional process?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has already been agreed that the leader of the Liberals and the NDP and myself will speak to this issue tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock, precisely on that point.

As my hon. friend knows, it is up to each legislature to be seized of a constitutional motion that initiates the process.

Mr. Gauthier: The Senate.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is asking about the Senate. He may want to ask his Liberal caucus colleagues in the Senate in order to have a better idea as to what the Liberals in the Senate are planning.

We will act on behalf of the House of Commons. Other legislators will act on behalf of their legislatures. We will act on behalf of the House of Commons, and I hope that my hon. friend will continue to maintain the supremacy of the elected House of Commons over an appointed Senate.

TRADE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. During the 1988 election campaign, Canadians heard time and time again how many jobs were going to be created by the trade deal. The Prime Minister himself, during the 1988 campaign, said that the trade deal was going to create 250,000 new jobs in Canada.

Over the weekend, former deputy chief negotiator Gordon Ritchie told a conference attended by the Prime Minister and the deal's co-signer Ronald Reagan: "The free trade agreement will not be a major creator of jobs. This is a specious claim made in the heat of an election campaign."

Thousands of jobs are being lost as a result of the trade deal. I ask the Prime Minister to admit today that in fact he was wrong when he said that the trade deal would create jobs in Canada.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the claim to which my hon. friend apparently refers is a claim that was made by the Economic Council of Canada through its distinguished chairperson Judith Maxwell who said that the free trade agreement would create 250,000 new jobs. I believed Ms. Maxwell then and I believe her guilty today only of having underestimated her case.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend refers to a comment made by an individual at a conference. The popularity of free trade is such that there are conferences going on all over the place.

May I refer her to a report in The Gazette of another conference that took place at Bishop's University in Lennoxville over the weekend at which the conclusions were the following:

> Several of the country's leading economic researchers believe free trade has paid a surprisingly strong and early dividend in the form of robust business investment, made up partly of Canadian companies modernizing or expanding and partly of foreign firms investing in Canada. That helps explain why Canada has avoided a recession and why unemployment, contrary to expectations, has not gone up much at all despite the high interest rates said economists Ronald Wonnacott of the University of Western Ontario and Douglas Purvis of Queen's University.

These are two outstanding people who are saying that the free trade agreement has brought great benefits to Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister is so convinced of his facts I ask that today he table a list of those jobs that have been created in Canada since the trade deal has been signed.

He might also want to speak to the 60 head office employees and the 280 plant workers at Catelli Limited who are being asked to take wage cuts and accept a wage freeze until the end of 1993 if they want to keep their jobs from being shifted to the U.S. plants. The U.S. president of the Catelli firm said that the decision was part of the company's North American strategy under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Can the Prime Minister still maintain that the trade deal will bring more jobs and a higher standard of living when the trade deal is being used to intimidate workers into lower wages and to accept poorer standards of living?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned on doing this but I would be happy to table a document which indicates that since the free trade agreement came into effect on January 1, 1989, 257,000 new jobs have been created.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: List them.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, in regard to an important component of them—

Mr. Allmand: Selling hamburgers.

Mr. Mulroney: The member for NDG says selling hamburgers. Of the 257,000 jobs, 231,000 or 90 per cent have been full–time jobs, reversing the trend under the Liberals completely.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The question for the people of Sainte–Thérèse, Quebec, might be: "Where are the jobs?" We learned this weekend that 1,700 jobs would be lost in Sainte–Thérèse, Quebec. The General Motors plant is shutting down half its production line. Now this plant is more competitive than the General Motors plant in the United States: its production cost per employee is between $8 and $9 an hour less than in the United States.

The Prime Minister said that with the Free Trade Agreement, all decisions would be based on competitiveness. Is the Prime Minister prepared to admit that this decision is political, not economic, that jobs are at stake and that free trade does not protect our people?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the layoffs in Sainte–Thérèse are temporary. They are due to short–term market conditions. The Sainte–Thérèse plant is very modern and very competitive; General Motors has already invested $450 million in it. The facilities at Sainte–Thérèse, like the new paint department, are high quality. We are confident that the plant is in a good position to make the new products successful, which will make it viable in the long run.

[English]

We should boost this plant, not disparage it. It has a very strong success rate and a good future.

I should also tell the hon. member that when she talks about food processing, in the past year this industry has seen 21 new plants, 23 expansions and 18 improvements to plants. This was in the last 12 months.

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As was already mentioned on Friday, General Motors announced that 1,700 workers at its plant in Sainte–Thérèse would be laid off. Since the government has subsidized this company in Sainte–Thérèse in the past and, with the Free Trade Agreement, the government promised to maintain and even increase the number of jobs in that province, what is the government prepared to do to protect these industrial jobs that are very important for the province of Quebec?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, we are confident that the plant is in a good position to make its new products successful, which will make it viable in the long run. We have a problem with the market in the short term, not the long term.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the government is great at giving general statistics with respect to job creation, but when it comes to answering about a loss of jobs or plant closures, it has nothing to say.

The workers at Ste. Therese want to know exactly what the government is going to do to protect those 1,700 jobs. Tell us directly what you are going to do.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I should tell the House that the Minister for External Relations, who is at St. Therese in her riding, has been in constant touch with management and the unions in the past three days. She is hopeful that they will see that the intelligent course is a long term course of new products. They have one of the best operating environments in the world. Some of the most modern technical improvements in the world are in that plant. They have a good long term future. We should be optimistic, not pessimistic.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It pertains to the increased Soviet Union military presence in Lithuania. The forced intervention and the intimidation observed in Lithuania over the weekend is clearly counter-productive.

Has the minister made further representations to Mr. Shevardnadze, urging the two sides to come together in dialogue and negotiate a peaceful acceptable resolution? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, to negotiate a peaceful and acceptable resolution. Is he still receiving consistent messages from the Soviet Union that there will be no crackdown?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am in regular touch with Mr. Shevardnadze, although I have not been in touch with him since the events of the weekend. As the hon. member will know, there have in fact been some developments in Lithuania that may give some cause for encouragement. There was a meeting earlier today between Lithuanian officials and Soviet military officers and it appears that the Soviet army has now agreed to notify Vilnius of any troop movements on Lithuanian territory. That may indicate that there is now a movement toward some of the kinds of discussions and negotiations that both sides had been signalling would come to pass and certainly that members of this House unanimously hope will be the means by which this situation is resolved.

I am keeping it under very close review. I had the opportunity to consult on Friday with other members of the House who have been in Lithuania. I look forward to the opportunity to consult directly with the hon. member and will keep the House advised.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the minister for the non-partisan way in which he is handling this very important situation.

My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. On March 19 the Canadian Lithuanian community asked for an emergency meeting with the Prime Minister to discuss the Lithuanian crisis. This weekend the Lithuanian Canadians have open a crisis centre in my riding to monitor the events in Lithuania and to see if they can provide humanitarian aid. Members from the Canadian Lithuanian Youth Federation are on their way to Parliament Hill to hold a peaceful vigil urging Canada's support for Lithuania's independence.

As of 2 p.m. today neither the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State nor his parliamentary secretary have had time to meet with the Canadian Lithuanian community. I say that with no criticism. Mr. Speaker, you know how busy we are in this House. Will the Prime Minister agree to meet with the Canadian Lithuanian leaders today or, at the latest, tomorrow?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House and the member will know that on the date mentioned the Prime Minister was on an official visit to Mexico and was therefore out of the country. The Prime Minister and I have kept in regular touch on developments in Lithuania and he is being kept up to date on a daily basis as to developments there.

I know that the group is coming to town. Before coming to Question Period this afternoon, I instructed my officials to be sure that they took the opportunity of their presence in Ottawa to meet with them, and that certainly will be done.

The hon. member will know that I have also been in touch by telephone with some of the leaders of the Lithuanian Canadian community, particularly from Toronto, to discuss particular matters that were of concern to them. We discussed one matter with regard to a visa problem that had been encountered in Moscow and some other particular matters. We will continue to respond in that precise way. The Prime Minister will continue to maintain his active personal interest in the developments in Lithuania.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women.

What is the minister doing to restore the $1.6 million that has been cut from the operation of some 75 women's centres across Canada, on top of $2 million that was cut last year? She knows very well, of course, that this is forcing the closure of essential support services for women.

In particular, has she been in touch with Newfoundland women who today are occupying the Secretary of State offices in St. John's, Newfoundland, and who, along with many allies from all political parties and all walks of life, are determined to stay there night and day until funding for women's centres is restored?

Will the minister meet with these women and will she take along the senior member from Newfoundland and the Secretary of State? Also, will she discuss their concerns and find ways to restore funding?

• (1440)

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the member for St. John's East have been meeting very actively with me on a daily basis. We have established a plan and there is a process in place to bring more funding and more help to Newfoundland. We are encouraging the groups to complete applications for the project funding we have made available. We are waiting for those applications to come in. We have indicated that we will even help them fill in their applications and will fast-track them as quickly as possible.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I am sure the women of Canada love to be patronized in that way.

Why is the minister only meeting with his colleagues? Will he meet directly with the women of Newfoundland? Will he, along with the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, meet with the women in British Columbia, where 28 centres have had funding cut and 23 are having to cut their funding. Will he persuade the Minister of Finance that instead of increasing the defence budget by $665 million and increasing funding to CSIS by 20 per cent, some of that money should go to restore funding for women's centres right across Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we have had budget cuts in our ministry. We have tried to apply them in a very fair and consistent manner. We know the difficulties this may create for some groups. I have been meeting as actively as I can since the budget came out with the Native Aboriginal Communications Society and with groups involved with heritage cultures and languages. I am prepared to meet with as many groups as I can and as quickly as possible.

I might add that senior officials of my department will be in Newfoundland in the next few days. We are hopeful they will have a chance to meet with the group. I know there is an indication they want to meet with me and the two other ministers who were named. We will look at every proposal and meet with as many groups as possible.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Two years ago, the government started cutting funding for women' programs while subsidizing the reactionary group REAL Women. Today, all women's groups are barely surviving as a result of these budget cuts. Can the minister give the House the assurance that this anti-equality group which still calls itself REAL

Women will have no further grants from this government?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, this year we will support at least 600 projects or programs totalling at least $6 million. All programs will be subject to the same criteria which include promoting equality and social justice for all women in this country. I realize there are areas where far more should be done, including Native women, women who belong to visible minorities, immigrant women and, of course, women living in isolated rural areas. We will keep on doing as much as we can. As the hon. member is no doubt aware, during the Liberal government's last term, $12 million was earmarked for women's programs. During this term, we quadrupled that amount, bringing it up to a total of $48 million.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): The minister never answers questions when they concern women. I wonder what he thinks of REAL Women.

My supplementary question is addressed to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. The minister recently promised to convince her colleagues of the importance of funding for women's programs. The women's centre in Antigonish is facing probable closure because of this year's budget cuts. Has the minister really discussed the problem with all of her colleagues, and does she have good news for the women of northern Nova Scotia and similar groups nation-wide?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm to the hon. member that indeed I have been discussing this issue with my colleagues on a continuing basis, as well as with a number of representatives of women's organizations and a number of the provinces to see how we can deal with these situations.

I believe we are working out a solution, as the Secretary of State has indicated. He is prepared to make project funding available on an emergency basis and to assist those organizations in applying for project funding. I know that we are going to be able to assist a number of the groups that I have met with in continuing their work of advocacy and education in compliance with the Secretary of State women's programs.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. The minister says he is meeting with women and women's groups across Canada, but of the $1.6 million cut in the last budget, women's groups in Newfoundland are losing $250,000 in funding.

Will the Minister restore funding so that women across Canada will not be denied the help they need and the means to be heard?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that a process is under way; a process to bring more program funding to Newfoundland pro rata than they had before. The core funding does not exist for the women's centres because that program has been cut in keeping with the announcement made in this year's budget.

What I have said is that we have programmed funding. I am going to be as flexible as I can. My officials have already been indicating the kind of flexibility that can be shown to make sure that we are of help in those areas where we can be helpful.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, millions of dollars have been loaned to strip bars where women are exploited and demeaned while organizations which work to improve the status of women are being stifled in a stranglehold by the government.

How can the minister justify cuts that will shut down women's counselling centres, rape crisis centres and centres that help battered women and their children? Will the minister admit that this heartless move against Canadian women is a mistake and restore full funding immediately?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, that claim is outrageous. The government brought forward a $40 million program to help women in that difficult situation which I described as a crime against humanity. There are specific programs and those programs are not affected by this budget.

Let us not forget that there are a lot of other program areas that particularly help women. Almost $1 million of the new funding for multiculturalism has been applied to immigrant women and visible minority women. Funding for the disabled persons program has been increased this year again. Sixty-two per cent of the disabled people in the country are women. It is another way in which we are helping. The Aboriginal Women's Program will receive the same amount of money as last year, a very important amount of money, over $2 million. Within the existing program of the Department of the Secretary of State, there are significant funds still available which will be helpful in promoting equality and social justice.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Eurasian milfoil, an aquatic weed species, has infested many of the lakes in the interior of British Columbia. This rapidly-growing weed has choked off many of the recreational areas. It is also seriously affecting the tourism potential throughout the Okanagan and Shuswap lakes basins.

Is the minister prepared at this time to initiate a federal program to help eradicate this nuisance weed which now threatens to invade many of our salmon-bearing streams and rivers?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned with this specific situation. I am awaiting a report to learn more about the solutions that can be found and who would be responsible for those solutions.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that both the provincial and regional governments have in fact been fighting this battle—a losing battle, I might add—for some time. Does the minister know that his ministry's 1988 federal water policy actually commits the government to promote co-operative federal-provincial endeavours to protect and enhance the quality of our water resources on issues such as this?

Can he explain in light of this policy why the government has not at this point provided financial assistance in British Columbia's fight against Eurasian milfoil infestation?

• (1450)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, everyone in Canada knows that we are in the process of setting up an environmental plan for the next five years for Canada.

This week I will have the pleasure and honour to release the consultation documents wherein the main parameters of the plan will be unveiled. There will be a very intensive consultative process in the next few weeks, during which all of Canada will be visited by ministers and people from all levels of government.

In the fall there will be a set of solutions in the plan which will address the main issues of environment. I trust my colleague will be satisfied with what we have proposed.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The textile industry, the clothing industry and the Quebec government spokesman condemned the conclusions of the report of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal on textile tariffs, which advise reducing customs tariffs and overlook the fact that the industry is governed by the regulations of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement under Article XIX of GATT and also by a free trade agreement with the United States. Could the minister give them the assurance that he will give them enough time to present their views and recommendations before the government decides whether to implement these proposals?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the tribunal has already met 500 companies and several associations representing the textile and clothing industry. It has also visited about 40 companies to try and understand the problems facing these two industries. The tribunal's report was sent to me only a few days ago, so that the government will respond to this report in a few weeks' time.

[English]

I want to say that we have listened very carefully to the industry through the CITT. I would expect that representatives of both the clothing and textile industries, which in fact take two quite different points of view on this particular proposal, will be making their views known to us during the course of the next few weeks.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday's edition of the Winnipeg Free Press carried the headline: "Hospitals Fear Wilson's GST: A Nightmare to Administer".

The Manitoba Health Organization estimates that four Manitoba hospitals will spend close to half a million more in sales tax under the GST and more due to increased administrative costs than they would under the present tax system.

Would the minister now agree that it would be best to cancel the proposed GST or, if he insists on imposing it, at least to exempt health care institutions? Or, does the government want to bleed the hospitals for revenue?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member did not do it intentionally, but does distort in a very substantial way the commitment this government has made to hospitals, as well as to universities, schools and municipalities, that we will not increase the tax burden of these organizations.

An hon. member: Yes, you are.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says: "Yes, you are". If he would read the paper he would understand quite clearly that what he has just said is quite untrue.

The facts are that we are meeting with the provinces. We have had extensive discussions with hospitals, universities, schools and municipalities to see whether there is a simpler way of meeting the commitment we have made. Those meetings have been taking place quite recently. In fact there was a meeting with the provinces as recently as last Friday.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the figures are not mine. The figures come from a financial institution that prepared the report for the Manitoba Health Organization.

Labour unions in health care institutions will likely demand GST related wage increases, which will further aggravate hospital expenditures, and cut-backs in health care services will then become inevitable unless the province is able to step in.

Since this government has already cut transfer payments to the provinces for health, how can the minister insist on imposing onerous financial burdens on hospitals and still expect them to provide excellent health care to all Canadians?

Would he admit that it would be silly to force hospitals to absorb the heavy administrative costs that the GST would impose if in fact no revenue is intended to be obtained from the hospitals?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member does acknowledge that we do not intend to collect additional revenues from those organizations.

As I indicated in my first answer we have had discussions with the provinces, the schools, the universities and the hospitals to find a means whereby we can simplify the administration of this. Those discussions are ongoing. If we can get agreement from the provinces to do so, then we should be able to meet the needs of the hospitals I should underscore the point that there will be no need for them to increase their wage rates along the line the hon. member has just suggested.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. His department is now carrying out a review of defence policy.

In view of the fact we have heard today that other ministers including the Prime Minister are having the people of Canada participate in the public policy review process, is he now prepared to open up his review of defence policy to the people of Canada, to consult them and let them have their say on future defence policy, before his departmental review is finalized?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, through the committee that the hon. member serves on, there is opportunity for the Canadian public to express its views and concern on the security of its own nation.

However if a suggestion were made that the security of Canada would be emphasized by a Gallup poll and directed that way, I suggest to the hon. member that that is not adequate security for any country.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Let me build on the minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, ask him now, specifically, if he would be prepared to go so far as to make a reference to the standing committee of the House of Commons to engage it in the review of defence policy and to allow Parliament, which speaks for all Canadians, to participate in his review of defence policy. Would he go that far as to make a reference to the standing committee?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member being a long serving member of the House knows that if the standing committee wishes to take this action it would take it on its own initiative. I would fully support that action taken by the standing committee if that were its wish.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Senior citizens in my riding who are now filling in their 1989 income tax returns are asking me why they are required to pay the clawback on their old age security when there is no law requiring them to do so.

Can the minister explain why any senior should pay a tax that is not the law of this land?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this legislation has passed the House of Commons. It is in the Senate now.

The effective date of the taxback to which the hon. member refers is the last fiscal year. If someone does not want to pay it right now, it is perfectly within their right not to pay it, but once the law is passed it will be effective for last year and they will have to pay it at that time.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the minister's answer. I challenge him to rise in his place and give any authority for a tax that has not been passed by all parts of this Parliament.

Since seniors are not required to pay it, will he stand and assure them that they are at liberty to fill in their tax this year without paying the clawback on their income tax, and that there will be no penalty or interest added if and when it is passed?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe I responded to that part of his question in my first answer.

The practice that is affecting this particular aspect of the Income Tax Act is something the country has been following for many, many years now. Taxes become effective on certain days as long as there is a Ways and Means motion that initiates the legislative process. That Ways and Means motion was put in place last April, and it is on that basis that the tax is liable to be paid.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the plight of the refusnik family, Leonid and Natalia Stonov.

As the minister knows, they first applied to leave the Soviet Union in 1979. They were last turned down in 1988 and told not to reapply for four more years.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs intervene in this case?

I met the wife, Natalia, yesterday in Toronto. She is in Canada on a visitor's visa. We phoned Leonid in Moscow and I promised him that the government would try to intervene to get special cases like his rectified just as soon as possible so that they can start a new life in Israel.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

As a result of his intervention, Natalia Stonov is meeting now with a senior official of the Department of External Affairs. We will see what action we can take. We will naturally pursue this case vigorously, as we have pursued other cases vigorously and with success.

PRIVILEGE

FINANCE COMMITTEE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On March 21, 1990 the Chair received several notices of questions of privilege relating to an action of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance on March 20, 1990.

The hon. members complained that the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Mississauga South, had exceeded his authority by putting an end to a debate on a motion declaring the said motion withdrawn and introducing a new order for allocation of time for the consideration in committee of the goods and services tax bill. The chairman also declared that this action on his part was in essence a ruling that there was to be no debate or points of order. The action of the chairman was formally challenged by a member and the chairman was subsequently sustained on a recorded vote of 7 yeas and 4 nays. The chairman then declared the meeting adjourned without question put until March 26, 1990 at 3.30 p.m.

The Speaker has often informed the House that matters and procedural issues that arise in committee ought to be settled in committee unless the committee reports them first to the House. I have, however, said to the House that this practice was not an absolute one and that in very serious and special circumstances the Speaker may have to pronounce on a committee matter without the committee having reported to the House.

[Translation]

The matter that has been raised with the Chair is a serious one. Evidence of that is that eight hon. members filed notices of questions of privilege and the Chair heard submissions for almost two hours on Wednesday last.

[English]

Because the matter is serious the Chair will respond in some detail. For clarity's sake, I will begin by listing the points that I will cover.

First, there are the points raised by the hon. member for Burin—St. George's who was supported in argument by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, and the hon. member for Edmonton East:

Did the chairman exceed his authority in (a) declaring a motion withdrawn, (b) disallowing points of order, or (c) adjourning the committee arbitrarily?

Second, there is the point raised by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville which relates to a similar case that occurred on June 6, 1984 in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Is that a valid precedent which should be followed?

Third, the hon. member for Nickel Belt invoked the principle of English parliamentary law that the minority must be protected from the tyranny of the majority. He asked that I review Standing Order 1 and seek guidance and other jurisdictions. The question is therefore: should the Speaker overrule a majority decision made in committee?

Fourth, finally the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway referred the Chair to Standing Order 78(3) relating to time allocation. The question is: Does this Standing Order apply in committees?

Let me now address each point.

First, did the chairman of the finance committee exceed his authority? A committee chairman is elected by the committee. Like the Speaker, he is the servant of the body that elected him or her. The chairman is accountable to the committee, and that committee should be the usual venue where his or her conduct is pronounced upon, unless and until the committee chooses to report to the House, which this committee has not yet opted to do.

That is the tradition of the Canadian House of Commons. If I am to respect that tradition, I should therefore avoid comment on the conduct of the hon. member for Mississauga South and let the committee deal further with the matter if it so desires. There are also other means by which the members may bring such an issue forward for debate on the floor of the House. In this case, as Speaker, I have decided to resist both the urgings of members and my own temptation to comment at this time on the conduct of the chairman.

Next, does the 1984 incident in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs constitute a valid precedent?

Let me summarize that particular event. The bill was before the committee and no progress was being made. The chairman took it upon himself to break the impasse. The committee, by majority vote, supported his decision with the opposition voting against it. The chairman acknowledged the parliamentary significance of his action by resigning immediately after the bill was reported back to the House. The matter was raised in the House on June 8, 1984, and Madam Speaker Sauvé refused to hear a question of privilege citing citation 76 of Beauchesne's fifth edition.

The story does not end there however and what subsequently occurred is very interesting. At the next meeting of the committee the same individual was re-elected to the chair of the committee on a motion made by a member of the Official Opposition, seconded by a New Democrat. All this can be found in the minutes of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of June 6 and June 19, 1984. The outcome of that particular case was determined by the committee, as it should be, and not by the Speaker. I would caution members, however, in referring to this as a precedent. What occurred was merely a series of events and decisions made by the majority in a committee. Neither this House nor the Speaker gave the incidents any value whatsoever in procedural terms. One must exercise caution in attaching guiding procedural flags to such incidents and happenings.

Let me next deal with the points of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway relating to time allocation. Standing Order 78(3) reads as follows:

[Translation]

> A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of sections (1) or (2) of this Standing Order in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration either in the House or in any committee, and has given notice of his or her intention so to do, may propose a motion during proceedings under Government Orders, for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage; provided that the time allotted for any stage is not to be less than one sitting day and provided that for the purposes of this section of this Standing Order an allocation may be proposed in one motion to cover the proceedings at both the report and the third reading stages on a bill if that motion is consistent with the provisions of Standing Order 76(10). During the consideration of any such motion, no member may speak more than once or longer than ten minutes. Not more than two hours after the commencement of proceedings thereon, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion. Any proceedings interrupted pursuant to this section of this Standing Order shall be deemed adjourned.

[English]

That standing order can be made to apply to the committee stage, but it must be moved in the House by a minister. Once such a motion is adopted, it becomes a mandatory instruction to a committee considering a bill to deal with the legislation according to the wish expressed by the whole House.

Finally, the point raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt is the one that gives the Chair the most concern for it is an extremely valid one. The question is: When does the Speaker step in and judge that there has been an abuse by the majority?

I should like to remind hon. members of comments I made in the House on April 14, 1987, at page 5119 of Hansard. I said:

> It is essential to our democratic system. The controversial issue should be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con and the reasonable delaying tactics should be permissible to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view. Sooner or later every issue must be decided and the decision will be taken by a majority. Rules of procedure protect both the minority and the majority. They are designed to allow the full expression of views on both sides of an issue. They provide the Opposition with a means to delay a decision. They also provide the majority with a means of limiting debate in order to arrive at a decision. This is the kind of balance essential to the procedure of a democratic assembly. Our rules were certainly never designed to permit the total frustration of one side or the other, the total stagnation of debate, or the total paralysis of the system.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt suggested I look to other jurisdictions but I have found a comment of Speaker Lamoureux which is on point. On July 24, 1969, he said:

> What hon. members would like the Chair to do under the provisions of Standing Order 51 is to substitute his judgment for the judgment of certain hon. members. Can I do this in accordance with the traditions of Canada, of Britain, and in all parliamentary systems where the Speaker is not the master of the House in spite of what Standing Order 51 says. The Speaker is the servant of the House. Hon. members may want me to be the master of the House today but tomorrow, when, perhaps in other circumstances I might claim this privilege, they might have a different opinion. It would make me a hero, I suppose, if I were to adopt the attitude that I could judge political situations such as this and substitute my judgment for that of certain hon. members, either a majority or, perhaps, sometimes a minority. I do not believe that this is the role of a Speaker under our system. I am not prepared at this time to take this responsibility on my shoulders. I think it is my duty to rule on such matters in accordance with the rules, regulations and standing orders which hon. members themselves have turned over to the Speaker to administer.

That is the end of Speaker Lamoureux' quote.

[Translation]

In the light of our long-standing practice and the wisdom of Speaker Lamoureux, I have chosen not to substitute my judgment for that expressed by a majority on the Finance Committee, unless that majority decides to report its dilemma to the House.

[English]

The Chair has been unable to find the basis upon which to act at this time. That is not to say that under different circumstances the Speaker would not intervene. If I am cautious in not acting now it is simply because the Chair does not supervise the standing committee chairmen. That function belongs to the members of each committee and they have obvious avenues to pursue other than invoking privilege in the House.

At the same time, chairmen ought to be mindful of their responsibilities and make their decisions and rulings within the bounds of the fine balance provided by our rules.

I am grateful for the patience of the House and grateful to members for their submissions.

I would urge all chairmen and members of committees to try and strive mightily to ensure that the general rules of this place are followed as far as is sensible and helpful in those committees. I remind hon. members that endless points of privilege on what goes on in committee, when they fall short of that extreme situation where a Speaker might have to intervene, take up a great deal of time in this House. I would ask all hon. members to consider carefully what I have said in this ruling and also, perhaps, some of the things I have not said.

ALLOTTED DAYS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Last Thursday, March 22, the House heard extensive arguments bought forward by various members relating to the complex and sometimes perplexing subject of supply, specifically the allotment of days for opposition motions, the notice required for these motions and the calculation of the number of these motions that can be votable.

Other questions raised touched not so much on our rules but rather on our general practice regarding the embargo of any motion by the member who submits it to the Table or to the Journals branch, whether that member is from the government or the opposition side.

I wish to thank all members who made contributions to the debate on these points. Such discussions help us to clarify the meaning of our rules which can sometimes appear somewhat ambiguous.

Shortly after I heard members' arguments, I stated to the House my decision that last Friday and today would be opposition days and that the opposition had fulfilled the requirements of the Standing Orders in designating a vote on Friday's motion to be non-deferrable. At the same time, I indicated my intention to return with a more detailed ruling. I am now prepared to offer members my assessment of the contending points raised last Thursday.

[English]

In his presentation, the government whip maintained that two elements were required in order to have a non-deferrable votable opposition supply motion on a Friday. The obvious element was that the opposition had to give 48 hours' notice of its intention to demand such as vote.

Equally necessary he contended was the designation of an allotted day on a Friday by the government before the opposition can give notice that a vote on a supply motion be non-deferrable.

With respect to the first element I certainly agree. The rules clearly spell out this requirement. Standing Order 81(12)(b) states:

If an opposition motion pursuant to section (14) of this Standing Order is to be proposed on a Friday, forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given that the recorded division on the motion, if demanded, is not to be deferred;

As I ruled on Friday last, it was my view that the opposition had fulfilled the requirements of the Standing Orders in relation to this, and could demand a vote on the Friday.

About the second element raised by the chief government whip, the Chair has serious doubts that the government has any direct role in determining when an opposition motion should be votable. The normal procedure is for the government to designate the day as being an allotted day, and the opposition then decides what the motion to be debated on that day will be and decides also whether or not that motion is one that will come to a vote.

The Standing Orders list the number of allotted days there will be in each Supply period and where the government has failed to designate sufficient days to meet the requirements of the Standing Orders, by attrition those days left in the period must become allotted days, when no other alternative is possible in order to comply with the Standing Orders. That is what happened in this instance. When the House was discussing this matter on Thursday, only two sitting days remained in the period ending March 26, and two days remained in the total to be allotted to the opposition, hence Friday and today had to become opposition days, whether specifically designated by the government or not.

The NDP, anticipating that Friday might be an allotted day, submitted a motion, on notice, on Wednesday before the 6 p.m. close of the Notice Paper, and indicated it wished such motion to be designated a votable motion. This was what subsequently transpired. Friday was an allotted day with an NDP motion debated and voted upon.

In normal circumstances, the government, if it did not wish to vote on a Friday, could undesignate an allotted day and proceed to other business. That was not possible because the calendar ran out and Friday and today became automatically Supply days.

In the arguments presented last Thursday, the government whip raised another interesting point, one that has to do with our embargo practices. The government whip stated that, as a consequence of the embargo placed on the notice of the opposition motion filed last Wednesday by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt and on the votable status of that motion, the government was deprived on the 48 hours' notice.

In light of the seriousness of this allegation, I think it is useful to review our long-standing practice with regard to embargoes. An embargo is a well established practice which entitles anyone who is giving notice of a motion to instruct the Table to withhold explicit information about the content of a motion until the actual release of the parliamentary documents containing the notice, that is, the Order Paper and Notice Paper and the Projected Order of Business paper, documents normally available early the next morning. In the case of an opposition Supply motion, the embargo can include information on whether the motion is votable or not. The embargo is placed exclusively at the request of the sponsor of the motion.

It is completely beyond the authority of the Table to determine whether the notice of a motion should be embargoed. Indeed, the Table makes every effort to follow any instructions given by a member filing a motion. Whether information about a filed motion is to be made public immediately or at the hour when the filing of motions closes, this would be seven o'clock on Monday, five o'clock on Friday and six o'clock on other days of the week, or in a full embargo when the published parliamentary documents become available early the next morning, is entirely in the hands of the sponsoring member. This is true, whether the member is from the opposition or from the government. As I have said, this is a practice of long standing and is adhered to scrupulously by the Table and the Journals office in all cases, for obvious reasons of fairness and impartiality. In view of this fact, I could not find that the complaint of the government whip was of sufficient merit to have forestalled or affected my decision of last Friday to allow the opposition their non-deferrable, votable motion.

That being said, however, the consequences which might arise from such a full embargo are serious and the House may wish to consider whether this practice should be modified. In the meantime, the Chair and the Table are bound to abide by the normal practice which I have just outlined.

Notices printed in the Notice Paper which is attached to the Order Paper, are intended to give the members prior knowledge of future matters to be raised in the House. Some matters require 24 hours' notice, others require 48 hours'. If some members feel that more notice is necessary than is provided in the Standing Orders, then I suggest the matter be raised in the proper committee. As the Notice Paper is published under the authority of the House, only the whole House could alter our rules and give the Speaker new direction.

[Translation]

The second part of last Thursday's discussion concerned issues raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader with respect to the counting of allotted days and those that can be votable. Under normal circumstances, as the Standing Orders explain, the supply cycle is divided into three periods ending on December 10, March 26 and June 30. Within each period, a specified number of allotted days are assigned to the opposition. The total throughout the three periods is 25, of which a maximum of eight are to be designated votable and, of these, no more than four motions can be votable within any one period of the cycle.

• (1520)

A special order of last spring took into account the short session in the fall of 1988 and the commencement of the spring sitting only in April of 1989, which was later than usual. This special order provided a different arrangement for the allotment of supply days, and the number of them which would be votable. That special order extended into December, 1989, and took precedence over the Standing Orders and the usual calculation of the supply days for that period. I take the point of the parliamentary secretary that the supply cycle is normally calculated in the way he suggested, that is, that the period which ends December 10, is the first period of the cycle. Normally in the period ending December 10, Standing Order 81(8) stipulates that six days be allotted to supply of which a maximum of four could be votable. As it happened, the special order provided for 11 allotted days and of these, six came to a vote, two more than is usually permissible under the Standing Orders but which were allowed by the special order.

From this, I believe it is logical and fair to calculate from the period that ended December 10, the opposition would normally be allowed four motions to come to a vote and therefore has exercised its option fully by designating four votable supply motions. Therefore, within the two periods that remain in the supply cycle ending June 30, four more motions can come to a vote. As it has happened, the opposition in the period ending March 26 has designated four of the motions allotted to them as votable. In consequence, there remains no more votable motions in the supply cycle which ends on June 30, 1990. As of today, the opposition will have used all of the eight votable motions available to them in the annual supply calendar.

I fully understand and appreciate how difficult the issue of supply can be. I also want the House to understand that my decision last Friday was not made lightly. The Chair is also very much aware of the consequences of a vote on Friday. My only guide however is fair play. The rules apply to both sides of the House in all circumstances. I want to thank the hon. members who contributed to the discussions of these matters last week and I hope this ruling has clarified the circumstances that now pertain to the final supply period which begins tomorrow.

The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, just for clarification in light of your very last comment, "both sides of the House in all circumstances". We are now left in the position as a House that any notice can be embargoed by any member, whoever gives notice, whether it is a government member or an opposition member. Anything in our rules requiring notice, we can indeed embargo it. I think that is what I heard.

I would really like clarification on that point, that members on both sides of the House wherever notice is required can embargo it and wait till the notice paper comes out, whether we are talking about closure, or whatever.

Mr. Speaker: It may not be satisfactory to members to have this rule, but I tried to set out in quite a long judgment the fact that that has been the practice. It has been done again and again. It happens on both sides of the House. Hon. members on both sides of the House know that that is so. That is the situation.

The hon. member will also know, as other hon. member will that I made a specific reference to the fact that if this is creating hardship or seems to be an abuse, then it is up to the House to make a change in the rules.

But I point out, that what was done the other night is not something that has not done before by both sides. At the same time, it is not for the Chair to tell the House what to do. Perhaps under the circumstances it is for the Chair to observe that a notice embargoed—it may be a notice procedurally—is not much information to the other side.

REQUEST FOR ROYAL PARDON FOR MADAM ANNETTE PROULX

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by 8,000 people calling for the release of Mrs. Annette Proulx who has requested the royal clemency. Other petitions will follow soon.

I remind you that Mrs. Proulx, who will soon turn 75, has been in prison for 11 years. Without a royal pardon, she won't be released until the year 2004 when she will be 89.

The judge, the police, the Crown attorney and even our new archbishop, Monsignor Couture, all support her request for royal clemency and feel she is not a threat to society.

I, too, support this humanitarian process initiated by Mr. Simon Bédard and humbly call up on Parliament to urge the Privy Council to grant the royal pardon to Mrs. Annette Proulx, who is currently in the Gomin jail.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure in presenting a couple of petitions. First, one from 388 people in the community of Gaultois which has a total population of about 600. So I submit that just about every adult in that community has signed his or her name, and with good reason, because it addresses the situation with respect to the fish plant which is slated to close, the one employer in that community.

The prayer of the petition is that Parliament takes steps to prevent the plant from being closed by Fishery Products International. It is a matter that I have raised on a number of occasions both private and in this House with the Minister of Fisheries and his predecessor. I would hope it would be referred to him for the appropriate action.

My second item is a number of other petitions on a related subject which has to to again with the fisheries and it is signed by 3,150 people in many, many communities, many in my riding of Grand Banks, Marystown, English Harbour, and many others, but also some in the riding of the gentleman from St. John's West, particularly the community of Trepassey where a fish plant is being closed by FPI.

The prayer of the petition is twofold. First, that Parliament would take steps to see that the fishermen and plant workers who were adversely affected by those plant closures be provided for in terms of an emergency relief program. Second, that the Parliament would urge the Government of Canada to take more energetic steps to put an end to the overfishing by Spain and Portugal and by other countries.

These two petitions I have much pleasure in supporting. They are issues that I have talked about on many occasions in this House and I would ask the government to give heed to what the petitioners here in their thousands have said.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Lebel-sur-Quevillon, in Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Lebel-sur-Quevillon is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient with regard to the purpose of the Northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

SAFE DRINKING WATER ACT

Question No. 239—Mr. Harvard:

Is it the intention of the government to introduce a Safe Drinking Water Act into the House and, if so (a) what is the probable date of introduction (b) will this Act ensure that there is zero discharge of known carcinogens into pristine drinking water supplies?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes.

(a) There is, as yet, no projected date for its introduction to the House of Commons.

(b) It is intended that the proposed "Drinking Water Safety Act" will establish standards for the provision of drinking water under federal jurisdiction, and will provide leadership for the enactment of similar laws by other jurisdictions. The Act will not regulate the discharge of carcinogens, which would come under the scrutiny of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Mr. Andre: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question as enumerated by the Hon. Minister has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (Windsor West):

That this House recognize that Research and Development, and the resulting innovation, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country and that Canada must increase its level of Research and Development in order to ensure economic growth in an increasingly competitive and technologically literate global community.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I would just like to conclude the discussion I began earlier in the day by saying that we know from the figures available to us that public sector spending in terms of research and development is comparable to that of our other OECD partners. What is lacking is a comparable degree of spending with respect to the private sector. The question then is; what do we do about it?

We have been trying to meet with the various sectors. We have been talking to them about exactly where they are in terms of competition with their sectors in other countries, what they need and what we can do to help them in promoting R and D and being competitive. We are looking at what they need. That is the kind of solution and the kind of program we need; an understanding of the whole problem facing the country in terms of being competitive and a plan to address it. That is exactly what we are doing.

I do not think we need a series of simple resolutions, important in themselves as they are. I think those resolutions do not tackle the real and important issues in a thoughtful and deliberate way. That is what we have to do in this House, ask the right questions and seek the right answers.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am a little bit discouraged by the minister's comments about the motion today. He said we had trivialized the subject of research and development in the motion.

Mr. Milliken: Those are the Prime Minister's own words.

Mr. Manley: He also said the government will vote against the motion in accordance with the rules and traditions of the House.

There are two things I would like to note about that. First, the words in the motion are words taken from the Prime Minister himself. Contrary to trivializing it, the hope today is that we will be able to raise multi-partisan debate on issues on which we are all in fundamental agreement.

The importance of research and development, in the Prime Minister's words, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country, and saying that Canada—and I am quoting from the motion now—> —must increase its level of Research and Development in order to ensure economic growth in an increasingly competitive and technologically literate global community.

The motion is not meant to solve all of the problems of the nation. But it is meant to afford an opportunity to the House to raise, not only for the benefit of our colleagues but for the benefit of the people of Canada, this very important issue.

I would like to call the minister's attention to the supply proceedings of November 24, 1989 in the House where a motion was put under supply by the then hon. member for Oshawa on which the government gave its unanimous support.

I am astonished that the minister would come today and criticize an opportunity to put forward such important matters and that his government would not avail itself of the occasion to indicate that it too agrees with how important these matters are, much as it did last November. The government did not fall nor did the words of the Leader of the Opposition in introducing his motion indicate that the government would fall.

The minister in his substantive remarks made much of the government's contribution to research and development and suggested the problem really lies with the private sector.

I think there have been a number of analyses done which show that industry-funded research and development in Canada is lower than that of our competitors. According to OECD statistics in 1987 we were right down there in industry funded R and D behind Japan, Germany, Sweden, United States, the Netherlands, United Kingdom and France.

I would like to call to the attention of the minister that from the same source 1987 government funded R and D was well below the U.S., France, the Netherlands, Sweden, Germany and the U.K. Even government funded R and D does not make Canada look terrific.

I would like to conclude my observations by asking the minister that since he has been critical of a motion containing the Prime Minister's own words, would he now indicate to the House and to the scientific community if the government has abandoned the criterion of gross expenditures on research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product? Has the government abandoned that indicator of R and D performance in Canada and, in doing so, has the government abandoned the target of 2.5 per cent set by the Prime Minister in favour of other criteria? If so, what are they?

Mr. Winegard: Madam Speaker, I think the Gross Domestic Product ratio is only one thing at which any country must look. I think the government would make a great mistake if that was the only figure it was going to use to answer the real question of whether this country is competitive and if not, how to make it competitive.

The government is looking at a broad range of figures that it hopes will give a good picture of what needs to be done in the industrial sector particularly, in order to make Canada more competitive.

My hon. colleague talked about the OECD figures in terms of government expenditures. If defence is included, then one should not be surprised if Canada does not rate very high on that list because we do not have a major defence industry in terms of R and D. If defence expenditures are taken out, then Canada's spending on its government supported R and D is in the middle of the pack of all the OECD countries. That is the figure that I gave earlier in my address. With respect to trivializing the motion and trivializing R and D, the difficulty is with the motion itself. It does not place this in a context in which the people of Canada will understand what we are trying to do. Second, the opposition moved a votable motion on a day that my hon. colleague knows that in the traditions of the House it means the government will vote against that motion even if it was a motion within the complete context about which we are speaking.

The hon. member spoke about November 24, 1989. I think I should remind him that that was a non-votable motion. Also that there was agreement between all three parties beforehand as to what exactly was going to happen with that particular motion. We have had no such agreement. It is a votable motion that my hon. colleagues have placed before the House and tradition demands that we vote against that and we will. Let me reiterate once again that what bothers me as much as anything is that the opposition will not place this motion, as significant as it may be, in a total context so that Canadians can really understand where we have to go.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, I believe the general idea behind the motion is valid, but consideration must also be given to the size of this country and the importance, as recognized by the Prime Minister, to link our research and development commitment to industry. If we are to do that, it is my understanding that we have to make some choices. We must enter into alliances with industry and reach agreements on strategic choices for Canada.

Can Canada be competitive in every area of research and development? Is it not self-evident that a country the size of Canada must choose areas and technologies, in co-operation with industry to ensure that based on our size we can make a significant contribution to that area? Now if I remember correctly, the programs this Government made a fiscal decision to do without were programs that allowed all-round, across-the-board activities that were more or less R & D-oriented, including a lot of management consultation, to put it more specifically. Now, if we are to be competitive some years down the road, I think that choices have to be made as a country, in partnership with industry of course, and this in my view is what this Government is trying to do through strategic alliances and the choice of strategic technologies. I suggest that nobody has all the answers, and I do not think this Government claims to have all the answers in every area of research and development. Indeed, as I understand the programs, they are open to government and industry in partnership identifying areas for research, choices that this country must make in order to allot available resources to areas where we believe Canadians have the best chance of success. For this reason I think it is important to make people aware of our strategy. Of course we should do more, but how should we go about doing that based on our size as a country, based on our existing strengths, based on our industries' willingness to co-operate with universities and government? This is a very important aspect in my view.

It seems to me that this motion could be acceptable if it is specifically recognized that attempt to make strategic choices we have been making for some years in co-operation with industry.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, allocating funds for strategic technologies calls for planning, but it is impossible to plan to allocate funds for all strategic technologies. We have opted for three technologies.

[English]

—advanced industrial materials, biotechnology and information technology. As my colleague has said, the government has spread funds from one end of the spectrum to the other without regard to the most critical things. It has made the choices. I hope they are the right choices. The government has made them and that is where the funding will be going.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, this debate has been rather interesting until now. I do not know whether—

An hon. member: Do your best, Howard.

Mr. McCurdy: It has been interesting in the absence of any new light being shed on the issue of research and development and technology and its importance to Canadians.

I do not know how we could have any significant difference of opinion on what is not trivial but certainly beginning to be trite. The motion states:

> That this House recognize that Research and Development, the resulting innovation, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country and that Canada must increase its level of Research and Development in order to ensure economic growth in an increasingly competitive and technologically literate global community.

My God, we all must have heard this a thousand times in a thousand speeches given by a thousand politicians right across the land, not one of whom contributed one thing to the advancement of research and development or science in the country, including the Prime Minister.

I was tremendously enthralled by the speech by my hon. colleague for Windsor West, the Leader of the Official Opposition. He quoted and elaborated upon the quote from the present Prime Minister. As you will recall, Madam Speaker, in questioning him I wondered why the hon. member did not reflect on other contents of the 1983 book entitled Where I Stand. The Prime Minister said the following, and I did not hear the Leader of the Official Opposition dispute this: "In 1968, when Pierre Elliott Trudeau became Prime Minister, we were spending 1.4 per cent of the Gross National Product in this vital job-productive area of research and development."

It turns out that in 1985, the first full year of this government's existence, it was 1.4 per cent as well. Subsequently, for a decade we spent only 0.9 per cent. That is 0.9 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product on research. In the last two years, we have spent 1.13 per cent.

I raise that because, until I came into this place, I was a scientist who struggled as other scientists in the country did to keep together our laboratories and to pursue research that could be by any measure considered significant or world class, at a time when we were constantly faced with the prospect that next year would mean there would be no funding. At no stage were we given the opportunity to know that five years down the pike we would still have money to fund the research in the universities. I understand that that is a restricted area. The fact is that we have had something like three decades of the most horrifically stupid absence of any kind of research and development science support policy in the country, on the part of the previous government as well as the present. But I am prepared to concede more to this government than to the previous government in terms of the directions it has chosen to enhance science and research and development in the country.

The Leader of the Official Opposition said: "We are not interested in all that history. We are interested in the here and now." One of the most significant problems in enhancing research and development and science in the country is that we have developed a culture which has not been improved by politicians. It says that science and research and development are not nearly as important as a whole lot of other things in our society and that somehow we are always going to manage to survive on the basis of exploitation of our resources and so on.

Maybe it would be useful, rather than reiterating the usual stuff, to begin by describing in just a little detail what it is we are talking about and what is at stake, not in terms of what may appear to be some kind of arcane debate on an arcane subject, but relating this to the ordinary people out there who are presumably listening to this debate.

The reality is that our economy must undergo a substantial change, a very significant change, and a historic change. This country has been proud of its forests, its fisheries, its minerals, and all of the resources which we have been able to sell, and sell at a good price. Through those sales we have sustained a good economy and a country in which social democracy and social justice have been funded by the earnings of that exchange of goods, based on resources.

• (1550)

The reality now is that with respect to energy resources we are going to have to find some other alternatives besides those products, for example, that are going to contribute to the greenhouse effect and global warming.

First, we know that mined materials face competition from Third World nations that can produce them more cheaply. We also know that new materials are being invented day by day that are going to replace those minerals and metals. Soon, we are going to be talking about ceramic motors in our cars and we are going to be driving cars which have ceramic engines. That is symbolic of the kind of future we face with respect to a dependency on resources. What has surely become evident is that no nation can continue to be a resource based economy, produce decent jobs for its people and maintain the kind of social structures that Canada has become proudly used to.

The minister talked about the free trade agreement as being one of those very significant contributors to competitiveness, even more important than research and development. That is one of the silliest things I have heard for a long time. Free trade is about markets and markets are not going to mean a damned thing if we do not have something to sell. We are not going to be able to make enough money to sustain the nation on the basis of the sale of our resources, as I have already indicated.

It is very interesting to see what underlies this free trade agreement, as seen from another perspective and that is a perspective of the President of Mexico. He had it right. We should have a North American trading block in which Mexico would provide cheap labour, the United States would provide the technology, and Canada would provide the resources. If ever there was a prescription for the kind of competitiveness that we would have to pursue in order to sustain our nation in that context, it is one which would have to be devoted to a low wage economy. The trouble with the free trade agreement is that it will prohibit us from doing those things we will need to do in order to produce what others have been trying to produce and that is a high wage economy. Enter research and development and what that means.

It is very simple. The minister mentioned it in passing. We are going to have to produce more value-added and higher value-added goods and services. Those high value-added goods and services are going to have to be saleable outside our nation, that is to say, tradeable outside our nation, so that our nation can be a net earner in international trade, or at least have a balance between what we buy and what we sell.

What is value-added? Quite simply, value-added is investment of knowledge and skill that one puts into that which one is going to sell and which really adds its worth and creates wealth. If that is true, then it is clear, and it will be clear to every voter out there listening to me now, that we are not going to succeed unless we prepare our people with the skills, knowledge, and the new knowledge that will create that value-added and which will result in products and services that we can sell.

It is not just research and development in industry or the universities or any other place that is important. If the minister and I are talking about the same things with respect to those things involved in competitiveness, besides scientific research and developmental research, then it is okay. But he did not mention it specifically. We need as well, as the innovators at the upper level, the skilled workers who are given the opportunity to gain that technological knowledge and those skills that will enable them to be, not just cogs in a factory or assembly line, but themselves capable of making of investment in new knowledge. New knowledge does not come just from high faluting scientists. It comes from every level of an educated people. And what is happening?

In that context, what has the government done? Well, it is inevitable, as it is appropriate, to look at the record, not only with respect to research and development, but with respect to those other components of a value-added economy, to show where the government has failed in spite of its promises.

I would pause to say this with respect to certain aspects of the leadership that the government has provided, in contrast to the efforts of the previous Liberal government. I will give a couple of examples. In 1979, when the government of the Secretary of State for External Affairs came in, the granting councils had five-year plans for the first time in years. A five-year plan meant that a scientist in a university research laboratory had the assurance that at least for five years there would be money to do the research.

It is very interesting to look at the trend line of funding of the granting councils during that period. It goes up until the Liberals come in and then it drops. As a former president of the CAUT and an officer in one or two scientific societies in the country, I had adequate opportunity to know the importance of research and development manifested by the last prime minister: virtually none.

If I was among those out there looking for some promise for the future, by God I would hesitate before I would look to the Liberals to fulfil a promise of greater contributions to research and development as it is necessary to increase our economic growth.

I will concede to it that this government did form the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. It did form the national Networks of Excellence. It has provided scholarships for students in science. It has introduced the new strategic arrangements. But, when it comes down to the core of it and the Prime Minister said we must double our rate of expenditures in research and development, my God, what a failure.

In 1985, 1.4 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product was spent on research and development and in 1989, 1.32 per cent. As a matter of fact, it frightens me to note that that is exactly the kind of trend that began in 1968 with Mr. Trudeau. Will it be the same? We have been told that there is new moneys being spent here in and there on some of those new programs that I just mentioned. I have also indicated that we must understand that no strategy of increased scientific or developmental research will go anywhere in the absence of the people who are necessary to pursue that research and the people who are necessary to produce the products that will develop out of that research. What has happened?

I want to take note of this in the context of what the Prime Minister said in this oft-quoted article. You have to understand that the Established Program Financing funds not only health but post-secondary education. That program has been victimized by the Liberals and the Conservatives. In 1983 the government attacked it by cutting the revenue guarantee. Also, in 1983, 1984, and 1985, it limited funding through the 6 and 5 per cent caps that were introduced at that time. This is what the Prime Minister said. This is what the Prime Minister, the then leader of the party to become the government, had to say: "It is important that the federal restraint program of six and five not be applied to research and development. The National Research Council—". What did the government do? It made its own cut in 1985. In three consecutive budgets, up to and including this budget, it has attacked the EPF to an extent of almost $9 billion in accumulated cuts between 1984 and 1995.

The minister has complained, as well he might he might complain, about the lack of adequate expenditures by industry for research and development in comparison to other nations. But the fact of the matter is, since 1985 industry has increased its rate of expenditures for research and development by 5 per cent, while the government has cut its share by 4 per cent.

Let's examine the record to see what substantial change has occurred in the situation. Gross research and development expenditures as a percentage of GDP among eight comparable countries in the OECD comparison—lowest; industry-funded R and D as a percentage of GDP—lowest; government-funded R and D as a percentage of GDP—second lowest; government performed R and D as a percentage of GDP—middle. In every other area, we are the lowest or the near lowest, and this government has done nothing to change that very substantially.

It has not only failed to enhance the amount of research it has done, it has failed to give adequate support to our universities.

One thing it did do with respect to research and development in the universities is the matching program, but now that is at risk. I only hope that it will finally listen to the recommendations of the Lortie report from the National Advisory Board in Science and Technology which said that over a three-year period, the amount provided to the granting councils should be doubled, and that thereafter the amount provided should be increased by 1.5 times the increase in the GDP. But you are not going to sustain this R and D, whether it is basic research or industrial research, if you do not have the troops.

Right now we have the silly situation of our high tech industry getting permission from immigration to bring in more highly trained people, while we fail to train them in Canada, while we cut the amount of expenditures available to the universities.

While we talk about training, we have 20 per cent illiteracy in this country. You cannot sustain a high R and D, high-valued national economy on the basis of a 20 per cent illiteracy rate. The government's solution is to make those people who are unemployed pay for the training of those who are working, instead of having a sustainable, productive, retraining and literacy program that is national and will underpin an appropriate R and D economy.

We have heard resolutions like this many times. We have heard it from all sides of the House. There is not a person in this place who has not given a speech that we must do more in R and D or our future is at stake.

If we do not stop "b.s." ing the Canadian people and really do something to enhance that, then it will not be a question of the future of the nation at stake. I suspect that politicians will be burned at the stake.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do not think the hon. member is at a loss for words. He might choose them a little more carefully. Question and comments. The hon. minister.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I hope my hon. colleague will forgive a somewhat personal remark. I think I liked his comments better when he was a professor of biology. I have a feeling that my hon. colleague implies in his comments that the Government of Canada should be the one to spend all the extra money we need to bring this up to some figure like 2.5 GERD over GNP.

My colleague knows that that is neither feasible nor responsible. I thought he was quite good when he talked about industrial research and how we needed to upgrade our resource industries. He is correct. There is no question that we need them to be more value-added than they are now, and that is why we are laying the plans to try and tackle some of the issues that my hon. colleague spoke about. We must consult with the various sectors, and that is what we are trying to do.

It is simply not good enough to say that it is up to the Government of Canada to respond to some national target when all the actors have to try and reach that particular target. We have done quite well. In terms of the granting councils, we have maintained the matching grant policy. Their funding for next year in terms of per cent increase is probably larger than any other program in the Government of Canada. It is 8.6 per cent.

I do wish they would not continue to kind of raise the flag of despair. We are making progress. We are at last beginning to understand what the problems are, and my hon. colleague referred to some of those. After hearing how he understands where we have to go as a country, I am somewhat distressed that he would then come back on the sort of GERD-GNP ratio as having a particular significance. I do not think it does and I think he knows in his heart that that is not the issue as such. It is much broader than that.

We have heard again about the matching grant policy. We said over and over again, Madam Speaker, that we know the matching grant policy finishes in the following year and we will make sure that we take care of that issue when the time is correct.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, did I sense that you were disturbed by the use of the term "b.s."? You have just heard an example of it. It is called basic simplicities. We heard this from the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As I said, the hon. member is really never at a loss for words.

Mr. McCurdy: As I said, it is always a pleasure to engage in debate with the Minister for Science but I did not mean to nor do I imply or support the thesis that government is the only one responsible for funding research. Industry must do better. But the government must take some responsibility for those things that it has done which, in my view, do not enhance industry's contribution to research and development.

One of the things the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology notes is the fact that part of our problem in terms of industrial research and development is that we have a branch plant economy in which foreign owned companies just simply do not do research and development.

We have entered into a free trade deal that limits our efforts with respect to foreign acquisitions of those industries that do become research and development intensive, often as a result of government investment. That was the case with Connaught and with Lumonics. There is a leadership role that the government can undertake which can enhance industrial R and D without itself being directly responsible for funding that research."

While it is true that we must find ways of making industry do its job better, it is not helpful to find that the government is getting ready to cut 500 people from NRC. How is it helpful to our scientific and research and development effort to place under attack the National Research Council and to demoralize hundreds of scientists without revealing clearly what directions are to be pursued?

How does it enhance our research and development effort if our university sector, our basic research sector, still suffers substantially because money is being taken out of the university EPF area, and for all intents and purposes being transferred to other areas, such as scholarships and so on, about which the government is prepared to brag. Those are good programs, but for the over-all envelope those things which constitute a research and development area remain unchanged.

By the way, he says I put too much stock in doubling GERD. It was not I who promised back in 1983 to double GERD, it was the Prime Minister. It was not I or provincial branches of the NDP, it was the federal government, in consultation with the ministers of the provinces, who said they would aim at doubling the GERD, the percentage of GDP spent on research and development. If that 2.5 per cent is not this government's goal, tell us what it is and let us hitch up our bootstraps and get there. Let us have a goal.

The National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which the Prime Minister himself formed and for which we congratulate him says that we should have a specific commitment. If it is not 2.5 per cent, what is it and by when? We cannot keep on going as we are now.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, in light of the large number of members who wish to speak, I want to advise the Chair that, on this side of the House when we next have an opportunity to speak, members will have 10 minutes to speak and five minutes for questions and comments at the end of each speech, if that is satisfactory to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There are three minutes left in the questions and comments period.

Mr. Winegard: It may be that we will want to have another 20-minute speech and use up double our time, if necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I thank the hon. member and the hon. minister for their comments. What the Chair would appreciate very much is if, at the start of a 20-minute block, the person involved would advise the Chair. It is easier to keep time and easier for the Chair to advise the hon. member that there is a minute left and he or she might want to come to the conclusion of his or her speech.

Resuming debate.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I hope you might give me one moment to respond to my hon. colleague, under questions and comments.

My hon. colleague said that government spending on R and D was cut. I would just like to give him the figure. In 1984-85, it was $2.45 billion and in 1989-90, it was $2.9 billion. In terms of government funding of industrial R and D, Japan funds 1.7 per cent of industrial R and D, Canada funds 11.8 per cent and Germany funds roughly around 12 per cent. So, we do our fair share of funding the industrial R and D, wherever industry is prepared to undertake it.

One other comment. I know there are many multinational corporations in Canada which do not do a significant amount of research, but I think it would be unwise for us to simply lump them all together. If one looks at Pratt & Whitney, IBM Canada, or some of the others such as Imperial Oil, they are among the leaders of R and D in the country. You cannot make that kind of blanket statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I see that the hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair would like to respond but the time for questions and comments has expired. Do I have unanimous consent of the House to allow the member to answer?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. McCurdy: The figures are clear. The percentage contribution by government has dropped by 4 per cent since this government has been in office. The part paid for by universities or contributed by universities has dropped 1 per cent. The percentage carried out by industry has gone up by 5 per cent. By God, over-all in the global estimate of who spends what, the government's share has gone down since this government has been in office.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair was able to keep his reply so brief. I will be taking 10 minutes because of the number of members on our side who wish to participate in this debate that we consider important, and I will therefore try to focus my comments fairly quickly.

As I have already said, we believe that the motion is one that should be supported by members from all sides, including the government side, on a vote because the wording of the motion very carefully acknowledges the contribution by the Prime Minister to this debate.

Notwithstanding the comments that the hon. minister made a few minutes ago, I would suggest to him that it is time to consider whether the state of our effort in science and technology and research and development in Canada has not gone beyond the point of partisan bickering and reached the point where we need to strive to find common ground where we can work together and where we can encourage our young Canadians, as well as all of the players in science and technology to work together to solve the problems, which are very significant problems indeed.

In very simple terms, I guess our problem in Canada is that we are buying more than we produce and we are doing it regularly, consistently and we are doing it in products that contain technology. Our wealth, which is considerable, has been based throughout our history on our very substantial natural resources. What we cut down and what we dig out of the ground and what we harvest from our soil and from our waters is what has made us one of the richest nations on earth.

But as the world changes, as the global economy becomes more increasingly based upon science-based innovation, upon value-added goods and services, we find that we are going to be facing a decrease in our wealth and in our standard of living, and we are going to have more and more difficulty meeting the expectations of our population.

We have not succeeded in being as adept as many other countries have been at adding value to the products that they produce and at innovating in ways that ensure their continued wealth.

I think the statistics, some of which have been referred to earlier today, are a very good indication of just exactly where we stand in terms of the performance of research and development in Canada and, therefore, our ability to produce science based innovation at all levels in the future.

I am citing a report of the Premier's Council of Ontario in which the performance of France, Germany, Japan, The Netherlands, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada is considered. In terms of gross expenditure on R and D as a percentage of GDP we are the lowest.

• (1620)

Industry funded R and D as a percentage of GDP, again we are the lowest. Government funded R and D as a percentage of GDP, we are the second lowest. Government performed R and D as a percentage of GDP, we are in the middle. Higher education R and D as a percentage of GDP, we are the second lowest.

Domestic patents per 100,000 inhabitants, we are the second lowest. International patents granted by population, we are the lowest. Scientists and engineers in the labour force by population, we are the lowest. Number of technology intensive industries with positive trade balance, we are the lowest.

I think a very great indicator of how we are lagging behind on these important issues is the very substantial trade deficit we have in advanced technology goods in Canada. Where do we go from here? What happens? I know the minister raised the question about the government's role. The implication was that we on this side are suggesting that the government alone should spend enough money in order to increase the GERD ratio, the Gross Expenditures on Research and Development ratio, to a higher number, perhaps 2.5 per cent. I do not think that is what we are saying at all. What we are looking to the government for is leadership on this issue.

What we have in Canada is a bad state of affairs that has been getting worse. I hasten to say there has been a lot of consultation, a lot of talk, a lot of rhetoric, rhetoric such as we have included in the motion. I agree that the establishment of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, chaired by the Prime Minister, is a good thing. The recommendations, many of them made by that board, have been very positive and useful. Most of them have not been applied.

The Science Council has been producing very worthwhile reports. Many of their recommendations have been ignored.

We have had a lot of consultation, a lot of conferences, and those are good. We need to begin seeing some action. We are distressed by things like the announcement of an additional $1.3 billion for science and technology, announced by the Prime Minister about two years ago, and we are still trying to figure out where that $1.3 billion is supposed to go.

We are distressed that $240 million would be put into the networks of Centres of Excellence Program, which is a good program, only to realize that what is being done with it is nothing more than a public relations exercise to expand the mandate of the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council. All of that money could have been allocated by NSERC without the glossy brochures and all of the trumpet blowing that occurred. We need to see money spent in a useful and practical way, not just public relations exercises in science and technology.

The same is true with respect to the debate about the granting councils. The minister has repeated the numbers a couple of times about how much is being increased in the budget of the granting councils this year. Yet, never once in his remarks today has he made reference to his own comment that he does not believe in the matching grants policy, which he made in the House a couple of weeks ago.

When the president of NSERC comes before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, as he did very recently, and says that he really needs to know by September what is happening to the matching grants policy in order to be able to initiate the process for spending the next year's money, we are left in the dark. What does the government think about funding for the granting councils? Is the matching grants policy abandoned? Apparently so. If so, what is replacing it? How much money is there going to be there? We have all of these unanswered questions in the context of a lot of rhetoric, a lot of conferences and a lot of boards to discuss things.

Then we have the National Research Council. What a sad few weeks it has been for the National Research Council, where for many months now, in fact several years, morale has been low. People have been worried about their jobs. This jewel in the crown of Canada's scientific establishment has been under attack by a government that professes belief in science and technology and yet does not do a thing to address the concerns of people who have devoted their lives as Canadians to serving this country in endeavours related to science and technology, and who wonder where their future lies. They will not be consulted.

Then we have the funding of industrial research and development. Again, what we have had with the performance of the government has fallen short of its rhetoric. We have the continuing spectre of Revenue Canada going into the premises of small and medium size high technology firms in this country, sending in hired guns to rip through the research projects and try to decide whether the money that is being claimed is actual research and development or not.

Again and again we get the complaints of people going in to examine projects without the slightest idea of the nature of the science that is being performed. Reassessments cost tens of thousands of dollars to challenge and take years to resolve. That is simply in the administration of the income tax rules.

We also had the cut-back in the percentage of R and D that could be claimed by large companies. So we have this inconsistency. We have lots of fine rhetoric about the need for industrial and government and university partnerships, but we continue to have difficult income tax rules with respect to industrial consortia and how they are to be taxed. Those changes, in spite of the fact that they were promised in the finance committee a year ago now, when the Minister of Finance appeared there, have not yet appeared in the Income Tax Act of Canada.

I am afraid in spite of the importance to this issue that I believe all of us prescribe in this House, we have had a continual failure in terms of activity on the part of the government in meeting the needs of Canada both now and for the future.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to make a few observations on the comments of the hon. member for Ottawa South, the opposition critic. He is a fairly new member in the House and is liked by us all, but I think we should just reflect on some of the history in the House over the last number of years that he may not be familiar with.

I was a little surprised when I saw the motion on the table for today, that it came from the Liberal Party, of all people. Their tradition made me think that probably they had their tongue in their cheek when they presented this as an opposition day motion today. I was also surprised when the member for Ottawa South, who is the critic, took umbrage when the minister made reference to the trivialization of this issue of research and development, science and technology.

I would like to refer to some of the trivial attitudes and approaches that were taken by his government in the last 15 years. There were four people sitting in the front benches of the Liberal Party today in Question Period who were colleagues of the Minister of State for Science and Technology at the time I was first elected to the House. The position of that minister in the government at that time was that we should not spend excessive amounts of money on research and development because we could buy what we needed to buy from other countries like the U.S.A., Germany, Great Britain, and so on. I suggest that type of attitude for a political party is trivializing the whole issue of science and technology.

My second point is that during those years after 1974 we tried desperately to have the then Liberal government establish a standing committee on science and technology. The estimates for spending on science and technology were passed through the standing committee on miscellaneous estimates. With all the other trivial matters that we spend money on, the issue of science and technology was included under that umbrella of miscellaneous estimates.

We tried and tried to get a standing committee and we were turned down regularly. It was not until this present government came in during its first mandate that we got a standing committee on science and technology. It met for the first time four years ago today, and that was under the aegis of the Conservative government.

Finally, the third point is that the Liberals were in power for about 20 years then and they never once made any effort to produce an advisory board such as the one we now have with the present government: the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which the Prime Minister chairs. The attitude of the former Liberals is indeed very trivial as it applies to science and technology. I cannot for the life of me see any evidence to suggest they have changed that. Perhaps the opposition critic would like to indicate why there has been a sudden change of heart on the part of the opposition.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, I must say I am disappointed that a debate on such an important issue would raise the kind of response I have just heard from the hon. member for Oxford.

We are here to talk about science and technology being an essential part of our economic development as a nation, especially in the context of a changing global situation. Instead, the hon. member seems to prefer a debate on history. I would like to refer him to the standing committee on history, if there is one, where that debate can be carried on with some usefulness.

At the moment we have before us a very critical situation in Canada that is gaining in its significance virtually daily. When the government came into office in 1984, I was practising law in this city. We had an accounting computer in our office and that was about it. Now, as I stand here, in that law office a few blocks from here there are approximately 100 computers.

The change that has happened since 1984 alone is drastic. We need to be looking at that changing situation and asking what are the policies that we need for the 1990s? Where do we go from here? If we go back to a situation that existed in a previous decade and try to compare apples and oranges, we are not exactly on a continuum in that respect. Many other problems have become more critical, for example, environmental ones.

In 1984 we were beginning to know about the significance of acid rain. At the time the President of the United States thought it was caused by trees, but on this side of the border we were concerned about it. Since that time, in these last few years we have become acutely aware of problems of environmental degradation which are global in nature. This has presented among other things an opportunity for Canada, by making its commitment to research and development a real one, to move forward on the world stage of environmental technologies. That is an opportunity which lies before us. Why do we not talk about those opportunities that are out there in the future rather than argue about the past?

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the motion being debated today and introduced by the Official Opposition reads:

> That this House recognize that Research and Development, and the resulting innovation, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country and that Canada must increase its level of Research and Development in order to ensure economic growth in an increasingly competitive and technologically literate global community.

It reflects the commitment of this side of the House to research and development. It also reflects the importance to every Canadian of science and technology and how we look at it for our economic prosperity and the well-being of Canadians of the future depend on adequate research and development to prepare our country for the high tech era that is upon us.

I would first like to address briefly the need for a comprehensive national science policy. It has been obvious from the illogical actions of this government with regard to science and technology, including its cuts to funding for research and development, that it lacks a coherent plan of action in this area.

The failure of this government to develop a clear and comprehensive long-term science and technology policy has been a recurrent theme mentioned by several witnesses who have now appeared before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development.

Because of the complexity of science and technology issues, because of the increasing importance of research and development to our economic ability to compete on a global scale, and because of the need for more money to be devoted to research and development at both the academic and industry levels, the need for a focused, well researched, sophisticated plan to guide government action in this area is vital. Yet, this government has failed to come up with such a plan, and this is evidence of the short-sighted, inefficient nature of this government.

How do we know that? One only need look at the record of this government. I would just like to cite some figures. Canada, compared to the United States, Germany, France, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Japan, ranks lowest in the number of technology intensive industries with a positive trade balance, lowest in the number of scientists and engineers in the labour force, lowest in international patents granted, lowest in industry funded research and development, and lowest in the gross research and development expenditures as a per cent of Gross Domestic Product. Canada cannot be proud if we allow ourselves to remain lowest in these areas.

My leader, earlier this morning when he spoke, spoke of the breach of commitment of this government. He also spoke of allowing our country to remain in the junior league. Instead of closing the gap between promises and action, this government has closed scientific laboratories. Instead of firing the enthusiasm of our scientists and engineers, this government has fired them from their jobs. Instead of allowing for education and training, this government has cut funding for post-secondary education. It is not a record that our country can be proud of.

I would like to speak of science and technology as a tool for regional development. As the member for Winnipeg North and from that great part of the country west of Ontario, it is often thought that in the high tech economy which is rapidly developing, only the large urban areas and centres have the necessary skilled labour, management and infrastructures to sustain growth. The rest of the country will be limited to playing minor roles such as providing raw materials or serving as consumer outlets to a few high tech production centres.

While it is true that activities such as genetic engineering, telecommunications and computer science will fare better in large urban centres, there are other good components that are more suited to small and medium sized centres located in the periphery.

We must make a concerted effort to understand the processes of technological change that are occurring because such change has an impact on the labour force, the growth of the outlying regions, and the urban system in our country.

In the last decade the agents of change that have had the most impact have been innovations in telecommunications and computer technologies.

Because some regions are unable to keep abreast of economic change, we have the problem of regional development. Outlying areas are becoming progressively more isolated in terms of information networks and are also becoming more dependent on central Canada. Measures must be taken to propel outlying areas into the information age, but this government has not made efforts to do this.

The importance of preparing every region for the new information age becomes clear when one considers that new information services will lead to increased productivity and market competitiveness.

With the massive amounts of information being generated world-wide each day and with increasing global integration, it is essential for all business services, traditional and innovative, to adopt telematic management processes. Once the business sector has been served, firms will extend their services to households which is still a major untapped market as a group.

• (1640)

The peripheral regions of our country, the provinces east of Quebec and west of Ontario, will benefit greatly from an integration of telecommunications firms in the regional planning process. The number of jobs created will help to alleviate unemployment, and these jobs will be more creative and more justified than the make work jobs of many existing programs.

Further, effective information systems will increase the over-all productivity of society and decrease the cost of services. For example, consumer information services will promote productivity gains in health care and educational sectors.

What is necessary now is for the government to provide leadership to help regions develop local science and technology bases, which will then lead to a much needed diversification of local economies. The regions will then be relieved of their overdependence on cyclical research based industries.

Applied research should be focused on development and the application of technology which is appropriate to economic development in each of the regions. The government could encourage private sector research through grant programs, contract based support and investment incentive programs. There would thus be an alleviation of the current imbalance caused by the emphasis on central Canadian models which are sometimes inappropriate to other regions.

This government proved its lack of concern for regional development when it cancelled the Unsolicited Proposals Program. I would like the Minister for Science to comment on that and to defend his position on why he cancelled it.

Witnesses before the Standing Committee on Science and Technology have told us that that program was very important because it provided a kind of contract based funding bridge that is vitally important to many early stage technology companies.

This government must provide flexible support for science and technology and customize its funding programs so that developing needs of a given sector in a given region can be met. The focus on central Canada is unsuitable. It will lead to the perpetuation of the tailoring of support programs to that part of the country. As I have pointed out previously, programs which are good for central Canada are often not appropriate for the regions.

This government must ensure that the regions will be able to play vital roles in the high tech era so that all regions of Canada will become more productive, as this is necessary to keep Canada competitive on the international scene.

In summary, I would like to challenge the government to come forward soon with a coherent and comprehensive science policy, which is still lacking; a policy that will define clearly the commitment and the action that it will take for basic and applied research and a policy that will take into account and have the sensitivity to consider all regions of our country. Last but never least, that policy must include a policy on education and training, for without the intellect that we need in science and technology we cannot progress.

I challenge the government to come forward soon with a coherent and comprehensive science policy if we are to compete in the global economy.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to some of the comments that my colleague has made, particularly with respect to information and the information technologies.

There is no question that he is absolutely right when he talks about how information and information transmittal are going to be so critical to the country. That is why I would like to tell him about the National Research Council network, an across Canada network that is now in the works. It will provide high speed transmission, the availability to transmit from one research unit to another right across the country, and it will ensure that those networks or those university research institutions which are not in central Canada will co–operate the same way as anyone else.

With respect to the networks of excellence, my colleague will be aware that those are spread across the country, not because of any action that we took but because the peer review committee found excellence across the country. The networks are a way to bring groups together wherever they are. They do not have to be in central Canada. There was certainly no bias toward central Canada in the way that was done. In fact it was probably just the opposite.

We are working on a major high speed network, a major study to see if it is feasible to put in Canada a significant network of very high speed that would transmit photographs and hook all of the research institutions together. That feasibility study is now going on.

My hon. colleague says we need to do more about education. Of course we need the people if we are to have a science and technology based country. I agree with him.

It is significant that last summer the Prime Minister said that we had to look at this problem as a national problem and not just as a provincial problem. So for the first time the Prime Minister took the lead in setting up a national task force on education which could look at the educational issue from the point of view of what we need to make this country competitive. That has never been done before.

With respect to science and technology policy, there is no question what the science and technology policy of this government is. It is very clear. My hon. colleague may not like what it is, but it has always been very clear. We are going to maintain and enhance where we possibly can the amount of curiosity driven research that we do in Canada. We are going to try to enhance the pre–competitive research that is done in co–operation with industry. We are going to try to promote industrial research and the alliances that are so necessary. Those are all on the record.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the comments of the minister. The absence of clarity is not so much that we cannot understand, but because this government has said something and done just the opposite.

In terms of the centres of excellence which we have welcomed, the government laboratories have been asked to be involved, yet funding for the government laboratories has been decreased. Where is the beef, if I may say, as to the commitment of this government?

A task force on education to identify the needs for the country is excellent. However, the National Science Advisory Board, directly reporting to the Prime Minister, recommended doubling the funding for research and development, and the Prime Minister has ignored that recommendation. What guarantee do we have that after the task force has done its job, has made a series of recommendations, this government will not again ignore recommendations? Will the minister now commit to the House that the recommendations of the task force when it reports will be implemented and implemented promptly?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair is in a difficult situation. I realize that the minister would like to answer the hon. member. There is a minute left in the period of questions and comments, yet it is turning into a conversation between whoever has the floor and the minister. I am quite prepared, if the House agrees, to have the hon. minister answer.

Some hon. members: No.

Mrs. Maheu: On a point of Order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Obviously, I understand that I do not have the consent of the member to have the minister answer the question posed by her colleague. We will resume debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, first I want to thank the Liberal opposition for this opportunity to talk about what the department and the government have been doing to promote research and development. For openers I might say that I find the subject of the motion rather puzzling because I fail to see why the government should be criticized after having done so much for research and development.

One of our outstanding achievements has to be the trend towards unprecedented co–operation between the public and private sectors. I would suggest that this new approach is here to stay and, thanks to a few measures I intend to mention in the course of my remarks, the private sector finally has the support and tools it needs to show leadership in research and development.

The whole government strategy is anchored in the newly established and full-fledged Department of Industry, Science and Technology which took over from the old Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. As the name indicates, the latter's main mandate was to deal with regional disparities. Although it did have something to do with scientific endeavours, DRIE could not really combine industrial policies with scientific and technological programs.

• (1650)

We, which includes the vast majority of experts and observers on the economic scene, are convinced that from now on, our country's progress will depend on its ability to compete successfully on the international scene. By creating the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, we simply reflected the almost unanimous position of the many individuals, interest groups, associations and companies we consulted constantly throughout the country. The message was clear, science and technology should be central to the government's activities. Hence, our commitment to urging all sectors to aim for excellence in scientific and technological development and to working with the sectors on a partnership basis.

We soon realized that market globalization and crumbling economic borders were a threat to our country. If Canada failed to plug into the major international currents of innovation, it ran the risk of becoming isolated, sooner or later. Furthermore, our expertise in certain areas was, in many ways, no longer up to contemporary standards.

It is something I truly deplore. The previous government failed to understand this. It preferred to intervene without a definite plan, mostly through grants allocated at random, in the hope that things would take a turn for the better.

To recover our status as one of the great industrialized nations, but we had to rethink our economic programs, get rid of those which had outlived their usefulness, expand those that could be effective—in a word, we had to seek a consensus and do some housecleaning in cases where policy had often been non-existent.

Instead of endless hesitation without a specific policy, we regrouped about 75 important programs under the aegis of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. Those in charge of these programs were given a mandate to strengthen links between basic research, applied research, product development, and production and marketing, both in this country and abroad.

The government has also made a consistent effort to persuade business and academics that major research and development initiatives should, as much as possible, be funded from their own resources, because asking for hand-outs is no longer an acceptable way of doing things in an industrialized world. Our department will be primarily responsible for co-ordinating activities by interested parties, more specifically by eliminating barriers to productivity and by encouraging companies to take the initiative, either by upgrading their research and development or taking risks to innovate.

Madam Speaker, some figures are self-explanatory but I think they bear repeating so that everyone understands the situation we are facing today.

Up until very recently, our statistics showed unequivocally that our private sector was lagging far behind in the area of research and development. Let us not forget that out of every 100 manufacturing companies, only three invest in research in this country. Our competitors, who became aware of this situation before we did, are spending twice as much as our own private sector in research and development.

In term of gross domestic product, Canada ranks twelfth among all OECD members involved in research and development.

Let us not delude ourselves: the least we can say about our competitors, which include West Germany, the United States, Japan and Sweden, is that they have very strong backs.

Why did the private sector in Canada wait so long before following suit? Of course, we cannot claim we have all the answers. Our intense consultations have shown that the various partners involved have a feeling of working in isolation and being unable to share as they would the experience acquired by the others, resulting for more than one in a certain feeling of discouragement and disillusion.

That is what convinced the Government to set up his strategic technology programs the purpose of which is to promote networks and alliances between researchers, the Government and the industry. This program is oriented towards three of the most promising technologies, namely biotechnology, information technology, and high-tech industrial material. But the Government is not satisfied with facilitating the liaison between competent scientists for research and development purposes.

Under the Strategic Technology Program, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology is prepared to foot up to 50 per cent of the eligible costs of a project. For instance, we help corporations pay the salaries of their specialized research staff and buy specialized materials and equipments. The Government has allocated $ 200 million to this program alone to encourage the setting up of networks which might include foreign corporations, universities and research centers. Preliminary R & D in which various players are involved are essential before projects with possible technological application can be marketed; their chances of success are therefore considerably enhanced.

On the other hand, as we can never lose sight of the competitive factor, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology is involved in promotional efforts dealing with initiatives and sectorial competitiveness in close co-operation with the businesses concerned. One of the purposes of this program is to improve the international competitiveness of certain Canadian industries by identifying new markets or facilitating the application of technical innovations.

So far, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology has launched sectoral competitiveness campaigns in auto parts, environmental industries, advanced manufacturing technology, medical equipment, manufactured wood products and the fashion industry.

Madam Speaker, that is what I call practical initiatives that take the concept of research and development itself much farther, in a highly concrete way.

The same goes for the government's approach which led to setting up a package of business services to help Canada's private sector develop new markets or, if necessary, acquire and apply new technologies. Our philosophy is supported by initiatives that can lead our business people to lasting prosperity, because we act on the specific sources of the problems of growth or survival that they may encounter.

The government was equally logical, Madam Speaker, when it announced last year subsidies totaling $8.5 million to carry out the program to implement high technology in the manufacturing sector. Basically, this is a program under which eligible companies can hire consultants to modernize their facilities, with the help of our department.

• (1700)

During the fiscal year which is drawing to a close the federal government has spent over $4 billion in science and technology. Contrary to what official opposition spokesmen would have us believe, this is hardly a sure indication that research and development are not one of our priorities.

Better still, Madam Speaker, our contribution is in excess of the $4 billion-plus I just mentioned since this amount does not cover our government's science and technology tax incentives.

I would have a lot to say about that because in recent years we have been trying to make up for the neglect and injustices of previous administrations.

Among other things, the 1985 federal budget included measures under which Canadian small businesses involved in research and development could claim a full refund of the 35 per cent investment tax credit applicable to the first $2 million spent on research and development.

In addition, Income Tax section 37 enables taxpayers to deduct all allowable current expenses and capital expenditures for experimental research and development projects. I might add that in 1988 Revenue Canada set up a special task force to examine tax credit applications and, without undue delay, reimburse companies doing research and development work. Madam Speaker, I am on solid ground when I say that, compared with other industrialized nations, Canadians have a fiscal climate which is particularly conducive to research and development.

I would like to take this opportunity to talk about the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, established in 1986 and chaired by the Prime Minister himself. This board advises the government on the best way to co-ordinate initiatives by governments, universities and the private sector in order to compete at the international level.

It is made up of Canadians who have distinguished themselves in the business, university and labour sectors among others.

It has made many recommendations to the Prime Minister on how best to exploit science and technology in Canada. A good number of its suggestions have been followed. For instance, following an intervention by the Board; the government established the Canada Scholarship Program which gives up to $80 million to the best students to encourage them to pursue their studies in natural science, engineering and related fields.

As a woman, I am proud to point out that almost half of the 3,400 young people who received scholarships this year were women. It is time for everybody to recognize the enormous potential of women in scientific studies. The thousands of scholarship recipients for the current school year are in addition to the 1,600 already in the program. Its success is encouraging but it is not the only valid program.

Another recommendation from the National Science Advisory Board gave good results, Madam Speaker. The Board thought of launching a $10 million public awareness campaign to explain to the public in general the latest scientific and technological achievements. The aim of such a campaign is to show how science affects the life of Canadians, be it their personnal life, their academic life or their professional life.

Many Canadians had already come to realize the growing importance of science and its many applications during the sometimes stormy debate that has taken place before the Free Trade Agreement was ratified. Considering Canada is dwarfed by the scale of research and technology transfers in the United States, there was no need to be a specialist to understand that we had every advantage to have closer ties with our neighbours to the South and benefit from their expertise.

Madam Speaker, that is how many of our companies have formed new types of partnership with the Americans.

The government for its part has taken another step to help us better position ourselves on the world markets of today by adopting the "Horizon: World" Strategy. This combines market development with technological growth and is based on the opportunities provided by the United States, the Pacific Rim and the European countries that will form an economic unit in 1992. The government is first of all trying to increase our exports and encourage investments and partnerships, but on an even larger scale. This strategy thus gives us a rational way to stimulate economic activity and thereby create jobs.

For that, the department is counting on the co–operation of External Affairs and Investment Canada to extend its commercial reach internationally and to promote its investments abroad.

As you see, Madam Speaker, the opposition's motion which deals exclusively with research and development in Canada is quite lacking in perspective. We simply cannot spew out some figures taken out of context to show what we have done in science and technology and hope to convince whoever wants to listen to me that we have done a wonderful job.

Madam Speaker, research and development is only one element of the ambitious and complex mosaic that is the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

To concentrate on research and development alone would be to ignore the government's innovative efforts with respect to technology tranfers and promoting this type of activity in Canada's industrial community. With a policy that includes technology centres that manage major federal laboratories and the Technology Outreach Program, the government wishes to ensure that the assistance it gives to industry is responsive to the needs of its customers. It also wants to increase the effectiveness of these technology centres and attract greater participation by industry.

However, we must not overlook the equally crucial component of human resources. It is the human dimension that is part and parcel of some very exciting but also very practical questions, such as acquiring advanced technology. If Canada is unable to train a labour force that is versatile and capable of responding to the needs of technology, science and engineering, our scientific structure will collapse because it does not have a sufficiently sound foundation.

Without wishing to be alarmist, I would like to point out that last year, 14 per cent of Canadian manufacturers complained about shortages of skilled workers. Whether for social or political reasons, the fact remains that many young people choose to go into law or business administration instead of considering a career in science and opting for research and development. Society, over the years, may have judged those professions to be more acceptable and more attractive, but it is not the kind of attitude that will encourage Canada's talented young people to opt for disciplines that are conducive to innovation, for instance.

What is needed, Madam Speaker, is a national science culture, despite the fact that education is a provincial responsibility. I agree it will not be easy, because we have a lot of catching up to do and we already have to go the extra mile to make Canadian industry both productive and competitive on international and domestic markets. The main thing is, however, that all parties concerned agree to discuss the problem and acknowledge that the need for training a labour force that can meet the scientific and technological challenges of the future requires a common strategy.

As was pointed out in the Grandpré report on manpower adjustment, the government showed an awareness of those challenges by providing adequate manpower training and adjustment program.

Considering our financial resources, the ball is now in the court of the industrial community. It is up to industry to do its share and help us on the road to prosperity.

Madam Speaker, so this is where a seemingly straightforward Liberal motion has brought us! I must admit this is not an exhaustive overview of achievements and challenges in the field of industry, science and technology.

These issues go well beyond the purview of today's debate. However, I hope I have convinced at least some of the members of this House that our government has for a number of years been committed to helping those concerned understand what is at stake. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

• (1710)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): In his remarks, Madam Speaker, the Minister mentioned the private sector to which he had asked for more funding in research and development. I shall, therefore, ask the Hon. Member whether she agrees with the Minister, when the President of Northern Telecom made a statement to the effect that the Government should not ask the private sector to invest in research and development without showing some leadership. He said that the private sector needed a good economic environment. He explained that here, in Canada, to set up a company with assets of one billion dollar, one needed to borrow $ 275 million. This amount is equivalent to nearly $ 400 million when compared with the United States and $ 675 million when compared with Japan, which implies that it would be much more easy to set up a company in Japan than here.

It is also easier to set up a company in the United States than in Canada. Therfore with much higher interest rates much higher here in Canada than they are in both the United States and Japan, the so–called level playing field just does not exist, for Japanese are in a much better position to invest in research and development than Americans and Canadians are. How could we ask the private sector to invest more when we, as the Government, are responsible for interest rates which increase every day? That is not the right environment for the private sector. I should like to ask the Hon. Member whether she agrees with the Minister when he says that the private sector should do all these things on its own without the assistance or leadership of the Federal Government.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking me whether I agree with the minister when he says that the private sector should do more. Yes I do. He mentioned the benefits an industry might gain if it were to move to the United States and deal with Japan. He referred to interest rates and pointed out that they are lower in the United States. Our situation is different. Our country carries a heavy debt load and we have been trying very hard to check inflation to prevent Canadian products from losing most of their value. It is very difficult to trace all our woes back to rising interest rates. We are now attempting to introduce a goods and services tax which will be a big plus for all industries. At long last they will no longer have to cope with the famous 13.5 per cent hidden tax which made it that much more difficult for them to sell competitive products on world markets.

Madam Speaker, we have every reason to say that the Canadian industrial sector should get directly involved because, as I pointed out earlier in my remarks, only 3 per cent of Canadian companies are doing research.

I think that more companies should do their share. I would suggest that the hon. member is wrong when he claims that our government has failed to implement measures designed to help companies get involved. I can only repeat what I said on the Friday ten days ago when we were debating another opposition motion, that no other government has done so much to bring prosperity to Canadians. This is not necessarily expressed in dollars and cents, but we did establish new guidelines and new measures to make Canadians change their approach. Perhaps I should go over them briefly since the hon. member was not there at the time. I will start with the policy on science and technology we put in place to ensure that throughout Canada, students in every province are trained to meet the needs of industry and have adequate training to meet the needs. Under that policy—as you know, there were differences in Canada and some provinces were much more aware of the need for adequate training—under that policy, this is what we have asked from each province.

We also ensured industry awareness. We organized that famous Conference on Innovation that was held in Toronto in 1988, if I remember correctly, where industry was asked to increase productivity. We also urged them to enhance their products, and asked them how high technology firms could be encouraged.

Madam Speaker, we then introduced the Strategic Technologies Program, to which a number of my colleagues refered in their speeches. Under that important program we identified the areas where Canada could be a leader, even internationnaly. As there already was good expertise in the area of information techniques, information technologies were identified. Then there is bio-technology. We also mentioned state-of-the-art industrial materials.

As far as helping universities is concerned, we put forward the matching funding program because it also allows industries to use that fantastic resource, researchers working in universities while training students. The effect of this is to train an increasing number of young engineers and researchers who really meet the needs of industry. At the same time, it enables industries to look at what is going on in our universities and realize how important that expertise is. Of course we also encourage industry to use the services of industrial research centres, Canadian research centres. We introduce the Canada Scholarship Program to which a number of my colleagues referred, because our goal is to have by 2000 all the researchers needed to meet Canadian needs.

Therefore, that scholarship program that recognizes our best students in Canada, Madam Speaker, will allow us to have the best minds, people in a position to meet our needs.

We also introduced the network of centres of excellence in which from now on researchers no longer working in isolation in their respective labs. We must not forget that there used to be duplication of the research effort. Now, there is networking. Scientists work together; they immediately share the results of their research. Giant strides will be made, and those centres of excellence are absolutely fantastic for our country because we will be at the forefront in the fields that have been identified.

I would like to tell my honorable colleague that this government is providing its continued support and encouraging major projects. I could mention, for instance, the RADARSAT Program which has for a side effect to allow high technology small businesses to emerge, Madam Speaker.

I think very few governments have put in place so many measures. It may not be obvious at this time, but I know that in the long run we will see deep changes occur in Canada and that, eventually, the industry will certainly be happy with what the government has done.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, "The National Research Council intends to restrict its work on basic research during the next few years, reducing permanent staff and handing over some of its centres to the private sector", as we read in La Presse on March 13.

Is this how Canada intends to be competitive on international markets? Isn't it time to invest? To invest in our richest and often most neglected resource, our own people? It is high time Canada realized how important science, engineering and postsecondary education are and seriously reconsidered many of its objectives concerning education. If it wants to provide scientific and technical companies with the resources they need to be competitive in the twenty-first century, it must act now.

The government must make our young people understand the importance of jobs that require specialized training, both scientific and technical. It has a duty to support community colleges, in order to provide training early on instead of providing retraining later through skills upgrading when people are unemployed. Perhaps the government should actually launch an advertising campaign across Canada to correct people's perception of blue collar workers.

If the government was able to reverse cigarette and tobacco acceptance through advertising, it should be able to sell technical and professional training! If we do not train a skilled labour force now, and there are already shortages in some areas, it will be our own fault if we are unable to keep up with the rest of the world.

The government will have a lot of breast-beating to do, and it will only have itself to blame. The percentage of the federal budget earmarked for education has dropped from 7.3 in 1985 to 6.7 in 1988-89. Is this what the government calls preparing for the future?

[English]

Many years ago the Prime Minister told this nation he believed that research and development are the basis of a successful country, and I quote him: "The starting line for me is the technological dimension. Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league, or we become a nation that will, during its entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit. Research and development and the resulting innovation are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country".

That is beautiful, isn't it? I did say that was many years ago—in 1983 to be exact. What has really been happening since?

I think we should look closely at the government's commitment since 1984. Let us take the National Research Council for instance. In 1984, approximately $60 million was cut from NRC's budget. The following are some of the major divisions or projects that were closed or cancelled: the energy division, the Environment Secretariat, the Manufacturing Technology Institute, the Institute for Electro-Chemistry, the Cold Regions Research Institute and, as of February, 1985, 80 lay-off notices were issued as a result of the cutback.

In 1986, an additional $29 million was cut from the NRC budget. The following projects or divisions were cut: photochemistry and kinetics, electromagnetic and mechanical engineering programs, environmental toxicology programs, aeronautics, construction and physics.

At this point it was announced that over 200 jobs would be eliminated. In February, 1990, NRC President Pierre Perron told The Citizen that the following programs and projects would be cut: high-energy physics research to be gone by 1995; the prairie research station; the avalanche research group in B.C.; the Algonquin Park radio observatory to be leased out; tentatively, the low-speed wind tunnel at CFB Uplands; and the move of the Herzberg Institute of Astrophysics to Victoria.

With this kind of support, Mr. Speaker, how can we expect a high level of performance? It is time to wake up before it is too late. We have allocated 1.23 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product to research and development. That is half as much as what Japan and Sweden are investing. We can really be proud of our performance! At this rate, Canada's chances to keep up with the pack seem rather slim.

Just now, Canada's record is rather bad. It invests half as much as its main competitors. It has half as many scientists and engineers as the average industrialized nation. Few Canadian businessman know what science and technology could do for their respective businesses.

Science teaching in our schools is mediocre, which explains Canada's poor performance in international competitions. And as the straw which broke the camel's back, we prefer to hire foreign specialists instead of investing in Canadians by offering them adequate professional and scientific training. In your opinion is this enough for the Government to get a passmark?

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent to correct this situation and stop looking for instant results. As Professor John Polanyi, the Canadian Nobel Prize winner, so perfectly put it, and I quote: "Considering that technology needs science, the temptation is to demand that the people who initiate projects justify them in terms of their technological applications. By constantly seeking short-term benefits, we dismiss scientific effort whose purpose is to answer fundamental questions which later on might lead to brand new applications."

Mr. Speaker, if Canada wants to remain at the forefront of technological changes, it just cannot afford to ignore basic research.

[English]

It is interesting that the Prime Minister has received the Weizmann Institute prestigious international award for scientific achievement after so many cuts since 1984. One wonders what prize he would have received had he increased the budget instead. The facts are, to give but a few examples, that there have been serious cuts in many departments. Let us look at a few changes from 1984 to 1985 and 1989 to 1990 in terms of millions of dollars.

Agriculture went from $347.9 million to $250.6 million. Atomic Energy went from $131.7 million to $112.3 million. Energy research and resources went from $144.9 million to $124.7 million. Communications went from $85.7 million to $48.3 million. Fisheries went from $138.8 million to $107.7 million. Transport went from $32.6 million to $27.6 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when someone like Professor Polanyi who was awarded the 1986 Nobel Prize feels compelled to tell a young scientist who was seeking his advice about the planning of his own career, and I quote: "The best advice I could give a young Canadian scientist, full of talent and ambition, would be to leave Canada", I suggest we should ask ourselves some questions. If Canada allows its most talented brains to leave this country, it will never be able to bring them back.

I urge the Government to seriously consider the negative effects of its cut-backs. Does it really want to face another crisis namely, the Canadian scientific brain drain?

• (1730)

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member thinks it important to have technological jobs, which would answer the needs of the industry, I would ask her to put pressure on senators blocking Bill C-21. I would also like to tell her that Canada ranks amongst the countries spending the most on education, we will spend an "active" amount of 29 per cent of $20 billion on education alone.

The hon. member said earlier that the government has cut transfer payments, but the situation there is completely different. Transfer payments have been frozen. For education, the growth rate per capita stays the same, but it is frozen for two years. So you see, there are no cuts, the situation is totally different. They will resume at the same rate as the Gross National Product, at 3 per cent. I also want to tell the hon. member that since the federal government does not control transfer payments—I certainly do not want this to come somewhat as a shock to the provinces, but many of these do not make an appropriate use of the funds since they do not use them for post-secondary education. And since education comes under provincial jurisdiction, the federal governement simply cannot interfere. The hon. member shoud remember that we are dealing with an enormous federal debt while the provinces are able to stay in the black. So we do what has to be done to ensure that young Canadians receive appropriate training and education.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I thank my colleague for her statement. First, I would like to point out with respect to transfers to the provinces and Bill C-21, which is being held up by the Senate, that New Brunswick, to take only one province, will lose $166 million a year because of C-21.

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, that is terrible!

Mrs. Maheu: If the amounts for education are not being cut but increased, how come all the provinces are screaming that they are being cut?

People like to talk about the debt with which the country is burdened. Is it not true that the United States probably has a larger per capita debt than ours?

Mr. Duhamel: At the federal level, yes.

Mrs. Maheu: At the federal level, they do not shout about it! I have nothing more to add, except that it is easy to play with words. We should look at the actual figures.

[English]

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments with reference to the hon. member's position and remind her of something for her response. It is pretty obvious from the amount of money that has been spent on science and technology, that the government considers it to be a cornerstone of Canada's economic policy, as has been pointed out by the minister.

In referring to New Brunswick, specifically, I think it is important to recognize that we all have a responsibility to research and development. Despite the tremendous effort of the federal government, we have to ensure that others are involved in the process. The federal government cannot do this alone. We must rely on industry, provincial governments, and the universities to do their part.

I want to remind the hon. member that, indeed, the federal government has devoted a substantial amount of money to research and development. In comparison to other countries, it is estimated that more than $500 million, or about 18 per cent of our total federal research and development expenditures, will be spent by the country, as compared with 17 per cent for France; 17 per cent for the Netherlands; and right down to the United States where it is a miserly 4 per cent. I think it is important that the hon. member understand that. Perhaps she might like to reassess the situation in view of these very significant figures that are available to us.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): I will allow the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville (Mrs. Maheu) to give a short answer, because her time is not up.

[English]

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer as quickly as possible.

I am not quite sure where the hon. member obtained his figures. Gross research and development expenditures as percentage of GDP is 1.32 per cent. We are the lowest ranking of countries like the U.S., Germany, France, Sweden, the U.K., the Netherlands, and Japan. For government funded R and D for gross national product, we are the second lowest of all of these countries. For government performed R and D, we are in the middle. For industry funded, we are the lowest again. For higher education, we are the second lowest. I cannot understand from where the hon. member is getting his figures, but I think perhaps they should be modified.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): I am sorry, but the period for questions and comments is now over. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

[English]

Mr. Hopkins: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order to put some balance into this debate, I wonder if the Speaker would arrange to recognize people from both sides of the House, instead of just those on the government benches, for questions and comments.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): Sorry. I think the time is fairly well divided between both sides of the House. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, we are debating an extremely important issue. I hope the Opposition members present in this House are discussing with rather than insulting each other. I also hope that the Canadian people, particularly parents of young and not so young university and college students, are listening to this debate. My colleagues opposite could perhaps let me explain my ideas.

As you know, the Royal Society of Canada is having a conference today in Ottawa, which is dedicated to the growing interest in science in Canada.

[English]

Society is alarmed because public opinion surveys show that many Canadians do not appreciate sufficiently the importance of science to our nation. They do not understand as well as they might, what it might contribute to the well-being of our country. Their meeting is to promote scientific awareness by the media and to get scientists to go to the schools to explain to our youth, those young men and women who are in universities, what it is that science does for our country and what it does, in fact, for humankind.

The greatest concern that we should have today is asking the following question and attempting to answer it. How can research and development, science and technology contribute to the furthering of the economic, social, and cultural well-being of Canada, taking into consideration problems of intolerance, conflict, war, and pollution? What can research and development do to make us respond more meaningfully, more sensitively, and more sensibly to those particular issues? How bad is the situation right now with respect to research and development, science and technology and all of those other related fields?

In today's issue of Le Devoir we read the following:

[Translation]

> Last year local firms were authorized to import 473 experts to hold high technology jobs and perform related duties.

It goes on to say:

> At the same time enrolment in science, engineering and information programs have fallen dramatically.

• (1740)

What is the government doing to change this course of action? Let us look at the record. This record, by the way, is taken from the Prime Minister's National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. I want to make that point clear.

In looking at gross research and development expenditures as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, we find that Canada is the lowest among Canada, the U.S., Germany, France, Sweden, the United Kingdom, Netherlands and Japan. In industry funded research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, it is the lowest. In government funded research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, it is second lowest. In government performed research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, it is in the middle. What is higher education research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product? Second lowest. What are the number of domestic patents granted per 100,000 inhabitants? Second lowest. What are the international patents granted by population? The lowest. What about advanced degrees awarded by population? We are in the middle. When it comes to scientists and engineers in labour force by population, we are the lowest among those countries. What about the number of technology intensive industries with the positive trade balance? We are the lowest. I stress that this was taken from the Prime Minister's National Advisory Board on Science and Technology.

There has been a lot of reference already to the rhetoric of the government on research and development, but one of the things I need to repeat is this:

> To keep abreast of technological change, Mulroney says Canada must double its spending on research and development by 1985—from the current 1.13 percent of GNP to at least 2.5 percent.

This was taken from The Gazette of March 19, 1983.

Here is another from Where I Stand by Brian Mulroney:

> The Trudeau government has the nerve to announce a new objective: 1.5 percent. This illustrates how our national government is illogical and how it lacks an earnest commitment toward this cornerstone of our economy.

Do remember that spending slipped from 1.4 down to 1.32. I could go on and I shall just by sharing this final quotation:

> The starting line for me is the technological dimension. Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league, or we become a nation that will, during its entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit.

That was Brian Mulroney in 1983. We are no longer in the Junior B circuit, we have slipped. We have slipped and we have slipped badly.

What has the Prime Minister and his government done to worsen the situation? You will all know, and I have quoted several times, that if we take the reductions that he had committed not to change—the minus 2 per cent in 1986, the minus 1 per cent in 1989-90, followed by the freeze—we are talking about a reduction for health and education of $39 billion fewer dollars. That is quite apart from the $39 million reduction for science and technology, and I have not talked about the reductions of the National Research Council and those that are anticipated. In looking at those dollars that are going to be reduced, one must remember that it is not only for health and education, but that there are large components of those that were in fact directed to research and development. It is not just research and development per se.

The government is proud in saying that research and development should be part of a societal initiative and that government should be involved and so should the provinces and the private sector. Yes, so let us look at the negative impact that those reductions and transfer payments will have on research and development specifically.

The government has also cut training and retraining. Of course, the Prime Minister and his minister said that we would have the best training programs of the world. They are now on the shoulders of the worker and the employer. How has it helped the poor students? This is the logic of the Conservative government. It has tacked on a 3 per cent administrative fee to student aid.

[Translation]

Only poor people borrow money. You do not need to borrow if you already have money. What did the government do? It said: "Since you are poor and need to borrow money, we will ask you to pay an extra 3 per cent", even though it knew that the students' already heavy debt load is growing, that their tuition fees are going up every year.

[English]

That is quite apart from the goods and services tax's negative impact on education. We will talk about that in the next few weeks. It is quite apart from the postal subsidies that were supposed to have been absorbed. That was a promise made by a former government in the last administration that was not honoured. These have to be absorbed.

This is how the government goes about helping education, science and technology, and research and development. Well, it often brags about $240 million for the centres of excellence. We have acknowledged that it is a noble program. However, when almost $10 billion is cut, or when it is slated between 1985 and 1986, it is not very difficult to give $250 million or $500 million. I have got to tell you, it is really, really quite easy.

The government is never really willing to say that in the $240 million for centres of excellence—quite apart from the $10 billion that it will cut unless it changes its ways—that there is not one humanities or social science project. There is no project that seeks to look at Canadian society and how you and I and the workers out there will change as a result of a changing technological society. I find that deplorable and I think it says a whole lot about the government's orientation in this area.

—if we want to become more competitive, to be leaders instead of followers, we have no choice but to review what the government is doing. We must make sure that our policy is very strong and sensitive to Canadian needs.

I am asking you to urge the government to examine its conscience and see what it can change to respond with honesty and accuracy to the needs of Canadians from all parts of the country.

[English]

Mr. Winegard: Madam Speaker, I have just a couple of comments about the transfers from the government of Canada to the provinces.

As my hon. colleague knows, the transfers that he is talking about represent, in this year, about one-half of 1 per cent of the provincial budgets, and next year, something like 1 per cent of the provincial budgets. We are asking the provinces to spend at the same rate that we are. I would think that is a pretty responsible thing to do.

Let me take it further in terms of Established Program Financing. My colleague knows very well that these are unconditional transfers to the provinces and that there is no guarantee whatsoever that they are going to go, nor have they gone, to health care and particularly to post-secondary education. That has been one of the troubles. It is one of the difficulties with simple transfer without any strings attached.

It was not our government that did that. It was 1977 when the Liberal government made those transfers absolutely unconditional. Now the Liberals want to come back to try somehow to say: "Well, we would like to have those transfers hooked in in some way". One cannot do that. Once it is made unconditional, then that is the way it is going to stay. There is no way now of turning the clock back.

My hon. colleague should put this funding in perspective, one-half of 1 per cent for this coming year and 1 per cent of their budgets for the following year. That is somehow going to destroy the educational and the post-secondary systems of the provinces? That is a bit far-fetched, Madam Speaker.

Let me also take the issue in terms of government spending. What my hon. colleague wants to do is to include all of the defence research spending of the other countries. There is a party that is so proud of the fact that Canada does not do anything in defence. If they are pleased with that, then at least they should take the defence expenditures out. When one does that, one finds that Canada fares very well indeed in terms of the amount of government support of R and D. The other countries stand very well, and they are on the list because they spend an enormous amount on R and D in the defence industries. We do not do that, nor do we wish to do that.

• (1750)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I appreciate enormously the Minister's comments and questions.

[English]

The issue is not one of fairness. Admit the fact that the government has doubled the debt during the last five years and it has mismanaged the economy, then I will feel much less sensitive about some of the points that have been made.

The issue is that the Prime Minister said before he became Prime Minister that he would not touch that transfer formula. He said that he was going to double spending on research and development. He touched the formula. He cut it by 2 per cent in 1986. He cut it by another per cent in 1989-90 and he has frozen it for the next two years. That represents $39 billion fewer from 1986 to 1995. That is what is wrong. It is misleading. He said he would double R and D. What happened? It was 1.40 and now it is 1.32.

With regard to this red herring about factoring out the defence research, if one asks the universities whether or not they would agree with him or with me, I bet 99 out of 100 will agree with me. In fact, the figures will agree with me. I resent that we should try to play those kinds of games because it is misleading. It is totally misleading.

If anyone doubts what I have said, let us have this debate that I challenged him to on October 13, 1989. I would love to discuss those questions across Canada, in every single province, in each of the two territories, in the small towns, in the big towns, and in the cities, anywhere, anytime, with this minister or any other minister. Then we will see whether or not Canadians agree with me or with him.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I am certainly pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate today. Clearly, we are dealing with some issues of vital importance to the future of the country, issues which will determine the competitiveness of our industries in the new global economy, and which are obviously going to impact upon the social well-being and the lives of many Canadians.

However, it has become apparent that the Opposition has missed the point with the introduction of this particular motion. It is a motion which clearly does not go far enough in addressing the concerns and the challenges of Canada and, indeed, all nations of the world, as we face the twilight years of the 20th century.

In previous comments, I had mentioned that the government takes very seriously its concerns about research and development. I want to remind the House that the federal expenditures in this field take many different forms. The minister responsible has already stated that Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada, the Medical Research Council of Canada, and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council have taken a priority, as well as many other forms. Something that we have perhaps not touched upon enough at this particular juncture in the debate of the motion is the grants to university research councils. That is where I want to emphasize my comments today.

When we speak of research and development, of science and technology, we cannot afford to lose sight of the very vital ingredient that we must introduce into the equation. Of course, that ingredient is people, the highly qualified women and men we need to drive the remarkable technological revolution forward.

It is the people who invent, innovate, produce, market, manage, and generate the wealth to sustain our standard of living and improve upon our quality of life. Research and development just does not happen. You have got to have people to make it happen.

We recognize, as a government, the training of our researchers, scientists, and engineers will underpin everything we do in science and technology. This is obviously where our greatest challenge exists.

Recent studies, including those done by our Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, indicate that Canada faces a crisis situation with a shortage of highly skilled and qualified scientists and engineers. We must recognize that to a great extent it is a problem of demographics. Both universities and industries have to replace their highly qualified personnel who are nearing the age of retirement. Unfortunately, the numbers needed to replace the researchers, engineers and professors, just simply are not there. At least that is the case in this country.

Many people would not recognize that we are second only to the United States in the number of post-secondary graduates as a percentage of the workforce. However, notwithstanding that, we do have a low rate of scientists and engineers. The proportion of students entering science and engineering has remained relatively constant at 20 per cent over the past decade. The Economic Council of Canada, among others, has indicated that the technological content of all jobs will increase. We are going to need a higher percentage of scientists and engineers in the workforce.

As the minister has indicated, as a government we do not want to waste our time pointing a finger at who is responsible. We are committed to resolving the problem. We want to build a world class supply of highly qualified personnel. That is what this is all about. We are committed to valuing scientific and engineering achievements and to providing appropriate rewards and recognitions to contributions in these fields.

It is a fact, a sad fact, perhaps, but nonetheless a fact, that the remuneration or rewards for science and technology and the engineering professions have never been on a par with of the other professions such as, the legal or medical professions. As a society, we must bear a responsibility for that and we must act now to change it. The key is to reach our young people, the young women and men in our elementary and high schools whom we will search out. We will do what we can to encourage them to become aware of how science and technology affects their lives. We need to get them excited about science and technology and we need to encourage them to pursue the wide range of career opportunities in these fields.

I am proud to say today that the government is playing a leadership role in that fashion. It is a leadership role witnessed through a number of initiatives and the Canada Scholarships Program is just one excellent example. It is about recognizing, rewarding and encouraging some of the finest young women and men—the brightest minds—we have in Canada.

I remind the House of when the Prime Minister launched the Canada Scholarships Program two years ago. He spoke about these bright minds and the commitment of our government to ensuring that the talents of these young Canadians would be appropriately rewarded and recognized.

Our objectives for the program were twofold. Not only did we want to encourage more of our top students, particularly women to pursue their studies in these critical fields of sciences and engineering, but we wanted to promote further the development of a highly qualified work force—our most important natural resource which is so necessary for strengthening Canada's future economic competitiveness.

Two years later, I am pleased to advise that the success of the program has far exceeded the government's greatest expectations. Those responsible for promoting and maintaining the program, including the many groups and institutions that have contributed so much time to its administration, should be justifiably proud. Clearly, those most responsible for the success of the program have been the scholars themselves, the talented and dedicated women and men from across the country. I believe these young people deserve our congratulations.

Last October the Minister for Science, in conjunction with the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, launched National Universities Week with the announcement of 3,400 Canada Scholarship winners for this current academic year. Since that time, the federal government has collaborated with individual universities and colleges to recognize and celebrate these top students in over 70 events from coast to coast.

Anyone who has had an opportunity to participate in these ceremonies will know that it is much more than just a flashy opportunity for photo ops and other such frivolous things. They are a real occasion to celebrate the excellence and the achievements of these young students and to pay due recognition to them, their parents and to the people who have contributed so much to their education. The educators themselves and the contribution that they have made cannot be overstated. It all goes back to the recognition and reward factor.

It is interesting to note at this point that over the past two years we have awarded almost 5,000 scholarships worth $8,000 each over four years to Canada scholars in support of their studies. The vital aspect of these awards is that they strongly emphasize excellence and maintenance of a first class academic standing. We should all be proud of the 1988–89 scholarship holders who maintained their first class standing and qualified for the second year of the program. Our congratulations go out to them.

I want to remind you that this year there will be a significant addition to those scholarships. It is apparent now that at least one–half of the scholarships awarded are going to be awarded to women as part of our ongoing effort to address their traditional under–representation in the sciences and engineering. The Canada Scholarships Program stands as a glowing example of our government's ongoing commitment to foster excellence in science and education in Canada. Combined with initiatives such as increased support for the university research granting councils, the science and technology of public awareness campaign and the national network of centres of excellence it represents an unprecedented federal commitment. It is a commitment that I am proud to talk about, one that will ensure a competitive Canada and a prosperous and rewarding future for our young people.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on his excellent presentation.

I keep hearing over and over again from the government side that we need to see more being done by the private sector. Is it not fair to say that the federal government has to do at least its fair share in what is happening out there by providing the proper environment for the private sector?

If you look at all the increases since 1984–85, taking inflation into consideration, the government commitment to research and development has only increased by 1 per cent. When you compare this to the private sector, even though the private sector has contributed over 10 per cent due to inflation and other factors in our society, it seems to be that the private sector is playing catch up. It does not matter what they are doing, it is an increase of 1 per cent in interest rates which has given a devastating blow to whatever they are planning.

Does the hon. member support the government's monetary policy when it comes to high interest rates in light of what has taken place in the high tech industry at this point in time?

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member. I think it is a fair question and one in which I know business across the country has a great deal of interest.

I want to assure the hon. member that without the direction the present government is taking, without its determination to bring inflation under control, reduce and eventually eliminate the debt and bring down the deficit that we inherited from a previous administration, business will be more hampered because there will be less business coming to the country and less opportunity for the businesses of this nation to make the necessary profits to reinvest in such things as research and development.

I just want to remind the House, as I have done on past occasions, in fact just this afternoon, that we do not want to lose sight of the position we maintain, which is simply that we must all become involved in research and development and as a federal government we have a responsibility. We feel it is necessary for the provinces, universities and business to become involved. It is important for businesses to understand the importance of the returns of research and development on their part because without their participation the business community will be on the outside looking in.

If they are not in a position to reap the rewards of this, then what good is it from our aspect as a country to encourage and promote research and development, to put into place technological innovations and development to sell to other nations in the future? This is vital to the country and falls very nicely into the program that we have embarked upon to this date.

The federal government spent $5.1 billion in science and technology in 1989 and 1990. I think it is important that we recognize in that figure that it is 4.9 per cent of the government's total 1989–90 expenditure.

The government has increased the percentage of expenditure directed toward science and technology since 1984–85 when it amounted to 4.7 per cent. That certainly underscores our determination and commitment to encourage others to participate at the same level and to ensure that the business climate is such that the profit factor will be significant and substantial. Business will recognize that it has a responsibility to invest, not only in its own future but in the future of the country that has made, particularly within the last few years, all of these opportunities open to them.

That is why we are involved in such programs as the Canada Student Program and the Canada Scholarships Program where we are encouraging thousands of students each year to come into the program.

Over the past two years alone we have awarded almost 5,000 scholarships worth $8,000 a piece. That is a significant amount of money to Canadian scholars. These are the people to whom we leave the future of this nation and these are the people we must support.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I am very honoured today to participate in this debate.

I find it extraordinary that hon. members opposite can stand in their places and complain about the level of research and development in this country.

Today they ring the clarion for more R and D spending. This House will recall that when it came time to implement measures to assist the research and development community in Canada, the obstructionist tactics of the NDP were exceeded only by the obstruction of Liberal members in the other place. I find it the height of hypocrisy to hear hon. members opposite criticize the level of research and development funding in this country when only a few years ago they worked so diligently against measures to promote R and D.

A world class industrial base and a world class competitive economy requires world class intellectual property protection. Intellectual property protection is essential to encourage innovation, international competitiveness and a stronger R and D component in our economy.

Systematically and thoroughly, this government has set about to amend the intellectual property statutes of Canada in order to keep them abreast of contemporary needs. One example is Bill C–57, the Integrated Circuits Topography Act, tabled in this House last December and now awaits second reading. Another example is the amendments to the Copyright Act implemented by this government in the last session of Parliament as a result of Bill C–60.

The House will recall the lively debates which took place in this House and in the other place over changes in the copyright legislation that had long ago been overtaken by the demands of new technology. Perhaps the most notorious struggle for intellectual property rights arose in the last Parliament as a result of the efforts of this government to amend the Patent Act through Bill C–22.

• (1810)

Hon. members will recall that in exchange for this improved patent protection under Bill C–22, the Canadian pharmaceutical industry undertook to increase R and D from 4.9 per cent of sales revenue in 1987 to 8 per cent of sales by 1991 and 10 per cent by 1996. The government received commitments from the patented medicine industry to invest directly in research and development $1.4 billion and to create 3,000 jobs between now and 1995.

That is the kind of solid commitment to R and D spending this country needs in order to remain competitive in the global market-place.

Judging from what we have heard today, I would have expected that hon. members opposite would be overjoyed at the prospect of such an infusion into research and development. We know that is not the case. The Liberals and the New Democrats did everything in their power to stall and undermine Bill C–22. The Liberals even resorted to using their majority in the Senate, an appointed body, in an attempt to counteract the will of the democratically elected members of this House.

In order to relieve opposition fears, the government created the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board. This board ensures that patentees do not charge excessive prices for their patented medicines. It reports to Parliament on the price trends of medicines in general and on the manner in which the pharmaceutical industry responds to its commitment to increase R and D.

The board tabled its first annual report last winter. We have an opportunity now to compare the dire predictions of the opposition parties to what has actually happened since the passage of Bill C–22.

The House will recall how hon. members opposite argued that amendments to the Patent Act would result in higher drug prices. They maintained the bill would encourage research by multinational drug companies at the expense of disadvantaged Canadians who would have to pay higher drug prices. That was the conjecture.

The first annual report of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board tells us that between last January when the board's guidelines for reviewing drugs currently on the market took effect and last August, price increases dropped 1.7 per cent below the change in the Consumer Price Index. Not only did the passage of Bill C–22 not lead to the explosion in the price of patented medicines as predicted by the Liberals and the NDP, but all medicines, both patented and non–patented, experienced a decrease in price relative to the Consumer Price Index.

The Liberals and the NDP argued that the pharmaceutical industry would never live up to the promises of R and D. Many members opposite had dire predictions that drug manufacturers would not double research and development as a proportion of sales. What does the report of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board tell us? It tells us that industry research and development to sales ratio was raised to 6.1 per cent in 1988 from its level of 4.9 per cent just one year earlier. A total of 57 companies reported a total investment of $164.5 million in R and D. That is a substantial investment. That is the kind of R and D investment which will keep our country on the leading edge of technology and innovation.

According to the report, member companies of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada increased their R and D to sales ratio to 6.4 per cent. The pharmaceutical industry is well on target to meet its commitments. The amendments to the Patent Act have initiated a new era for the Canadian pharmaceutical industry. It is clear from the first report of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board that this era has not been at the expense of Canadian consumers.

We have seen encouraging signs that pharmaceutical companies in Canada are indeed rising to the challenge of securing both North American and world product mandates in research. For example, Merck–Frosst's new facility in Kirkland will be the centre of the company's research into pulmonary diseases. This arrangement guarantees both a promising future for the Canadian operation and helps the international company avoid duplication in its research efforts. This is the kind of solid commitment to R and D on the part of the private sector that will be essential if Canada is to maintain its global competitiveness. The opposition should bear this in mind when debating measures to increase R and D in this country. We have heard many times that to foster research and development we need more than just money. We need an educated and science literate workforce, technology transfer, a climate where foreign investment is welcome and we need networks, alliances and partnerships between business and research communities. We certainly need intellectual property rights that will assure innovators that they will be able to profit from their research and development.

This government knows the value of R and D to our economy. It knows the importance of intellectual property in fostering a climate for R and D. It has worked diligently to modernize and streamline Canada's intellectual property statutes. This House should recognize that work and support the government in its endeavours.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to make one observation to perhaps get a reaction. It seems to me as I have listened to a number of presentations that there is one particular approach prevailing. We are taking a large number and trying to suggest it does a whole lot, perhaps a lot more than it really does. We are taking one particular part of a program that perhaps has worked quite well and we are trying to suggest that is the whole effort. Let me give a couple of examples. My hon. colleague previous to this speaker, and I want to link it to this one, pointed out the $5.1 billion expenditure. Compared to what? Of course, $5.1 billion is a lot of money.

When you look at the Prime Minister's advisory committee on science and technology, on 10 measures Canada is lowest on five. It is second-lowest on three and on two, it is in the middle. So, I ask $5.1 billion compared to what? If my hon. colleague who has just spoken really thinks that they have done particularly well, I would suggest that he does what I do. Talk to the universities, talk to the granting councils and ask them one simple question; do you prefer the generosity of the Liberals over the generosity of the Progressive Conservatives? Do you or don't you?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Duhamel: While my New Democratic colleagues are laughing—be careful because I will trot out some statistics about your generosity in research and development if you like. If you like, I would be delighted.

I would like to make one final comment with respect to the successes on pharmaceuticals. You could ask the elderly and the sick if the prices have gone up. Ask them what they think. Just in case you have not spoken to them recently I will tell you what they have told me. It has gone out of sight. That is what they told me. Are they wrong? Are the elderly and the sick wrong?

Mr. Thorkelson: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question. He talks about $5.1 billion which we spent compared to what? I would say that that is the amount of money this government spends on R D. We are comparing ourselves with other countries. We spend money on R D and industrial competitiveness in our universities to educate young students coming up. The figure is very good when you compare it with other countries and consider that a lot of other countries spend a lot of money on R D in defence. Where does it go? We spend our money where it counts the most.

With respect to his questions and comments about granting councils, the granting councils have done a very good job. I would agree that they can do more. That is not the whole picture. The whole picture or a number of things we have talked about today is fostering industrial competitiveness. It is the private sector being involved. It is education and universities and so on.

• (1820)

The Patented Medicines Prices Review Board has done a comprehensive study which shows that drug prices have not increased as much as the Consumer Price Index. I think that is significant by any measure. The pharmaceutical industry has been responsive in its endeavours to balance R and D and its need for profits to further invest. It has not gouged the consumer.

In terms of R and D there is always more that can be done and we will do more. We all want to do more and in the future that will come about.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I want to support the motion. The motion is that we have to recognize research and development in this country as being the lifeblood of a successful and prosperous economy. The motion also calls for Canada to increase its level of research and development in order to ensure economic growth.

I have listened to the debate today ad nauseam and I have to admit that we really have a pass-the-buck government here. It wants to pass the buck on research and development over to the private sector to the corporate agenda. It wants to pass the buck on funding for post-secondary education to the provinces.

The federal government is trying to withdraw from its statutory commitment to advance these kinds of programs in terms of a consistent and national presence in our scientific communities and our research and development. Instead, they want to pass the buck. Well, it will not work. It will not work for a number of reasons and I will get to those reasons very shortly. Before I do that, I want to say that we are living in a very complex society, an information-based society, a technology based society. We have seen the government in its attempts to deal with what it calls the global market-place by merging Canada into a free trade agreement with the United States.

An hon. member: What a joke.

Mr. MacWilliam: While it does that and states that we must be competitive in the global market, we must be competitive in terms of economic development initiatives and technological initiatives. At the same time it kneecaps our post-secondary education institutions across Canada by withdrawing the EPF funding and stating that the provinces have to bear responsibility for it. It pulls back on Canada's commitment to research and development by stating that the corporate sector has to bear the burden. Well, you cannot have it both ways. If we are going to compete in a global economy and in a technological market out there and advance in terms of research and development, then we need a consistent federal presence and the funding up front and centre in order to do that.

In the recent budget the Minister of Finance cut science and technology support by about $40 million. The Conference Board of Canada found in its survey of businesses that in terms of research and development, corporations plan below inflation growth in spending for R and D right through until 1994. While the government is stating that the private sector has to pick up the slack, the private sector is at the same time stating that it will cut back on research and development. One of the reasons it will cut back on research and development is because it cannot find enough trained people to take on the technologically sophisticated jobs and the tasks at hand. The private sector cannot find enough educated and professional people. One of the reasons it cannot find them is because they are moving south of the border and elsewhere, where job opportunities are better. I have worked in research out west in the universities. I spent some time in the scientific community. I will tell you very clearly as someone who has trained as a scientist before I got into education, the feeling out west in the scientific community is that if you want to go anywhere you have to either move to the States or back to Ontario, because there is not the funding and the commitment there in order to build a solid presence.

I would suggest that that feeling exists in other areas of our land such as the Atlantic provinces. That is why we need a federal commitment, so we can apply funding across the country, province by province, region by region, and develop the kinds of research and development initiatives on a consistent basis that cannot be there if the federal government pulls back from its funding and allows a kind of educational balkanization of our scientific community.

We have ourselves in a catch-22 situation. The federal government wants to pull back and leave it to the private sector. The private sector wants to cut back on its commitment to research and development because it cannot find enough trained people. We do not have enough trained people because the government is cutting back more and more on educational funding.

The minister recognizes the fact that a recent study demonstrates that Canada is a scientifically illiterate country. That is amazing. The result of that study demonstrates illiteracy in terms of scientific awareness in this land. We have a long way to go. We have a lot to do to catch up in terms of Canada's position in the global scientific community and in terms of the appropriate funding mechanisms that we need in place to make sure we can become competitive and stay competitive.

If the government believes in building a bright future for Canada, it cannot do so by progressively reducing its support of our colleges and post-secondary institutions which provide the highly trained individuals that are necessary for increasing our competitiveness in a knowledge based economy. It is as simple as that.

A recent news release showed that up to 500 jobs at the National Research Council could be cut by 1995. Five hundred jobs, 500 highly trained individuals will be put out of work and looking elsewhere for work. I suggest there will be a migration of those trained individuals to our neighbour to the south, as well as other countries, that will welcome them and their expertise. Is that a commitment to research and development in this country? I suggest that it is not.

It will initiate an acceleration of the exodus of scientific talent from this land, an exodus that in my experience I have seen happen for 20 years in the scientific community.

When we look back to 1984 when the government first came to power, 486 jobs have disappeared since that time in the National Research Council. Now we find another 500 jobs are on the chopping block. That is not a commitment to research and development. There is no future for our young scientists in Canada.

The withdrawal of the Established Programs Financing to the provinces and the regions is only going to exacerbate the regionalization and the disparities we see in research taking place in Canada.

Before the 1984 election, the Prime Minister promised—I always run for cover when the Prime Minister promises—

An hon. member: That is right. You should.

Mr. MacWilliam: I know what is going to come next. The Prime Minister promised to increase research and development spending to 2.5 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product from the 1984 level of 1.38 per cent. In essence, he would double it. Where are we since that 1984 promise of almost doubling the commitment to research and development?

We are below where we were in 1984. We are now down to 1.3 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product in terms of Canada's commitment to research and development. Canada is the lowest of eight of the industrialized nations.

Sweden, for example, is at 2.76 per cent of the GDP. France is at 2.5 per cent. United States is at 2.6 per cent. Germany at 2.79 per cent, while Japan is at 2.87 per cent. But Canada, 1.3 per cent. It is appalling. It is inexcusable. I submit that it is internationally embarrassing what is happening to science and scientific research in Canada. We have come through a decade of reasonably good economic growth and yet when we look at our global science and tech indicators in terms of where we have gone from there, we have not improved in any of them.

The government blames the industry for not picking up its share of the load. The Minister for Science says that Canadian industry invests only about .75 per cent of the GDP on research and development. He is right. It does.

In Japan, West Germany, the United States and Sweden, spending by the industry in terms of its share of the commitment is about 2 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product. But the problem here is very simple. It is that 37 per cent of our economy is foreign-owned. I want to say that when you are in a branch plant economy, you do not get the research and development commitment from those industries, the head offices of which are thousands of miles away. They are not located in our own country.

As we become more and more foreign-dominated, and as the free trade agreement opens up this country to foreign investment, we are going to witness a decline in the percentage of investment that the corporate sector provides for research and development in this country, simply because the branch plants here in Canada will not do the research. That will take place in other areas.

Mr. Duhamel: That is what Harvie Andre said.

Mr. MacWilliam: You are absolutely right, he did. I cannot remember exactly when he did, but I do recall the quotation. I am sure that my hon. friend, as time permits, will provide more details on it.

Mr. Harb: March 9, 1989. It is in the Computer Dealer News.

Mr. MacWilliam: Absolutely. Thank you for that clarification.

Here is another reason why we cannot rely on industry-based research and development. That has to do with the type of research that industry is involved with. Industry is concerned with commercial development of a scientific product. That is known as applied research. There is nothing wrong with it. There is reason for it and there is space for it in terms of the over-all commitment to research.

But applied research is conducted particularly for commercial purposes. If Canada is to become a leader in innovation and in research and development, it also requires a commitment to pure research which really is a commitment to extend and expand our frontiers of knowledge, not for commercial purposes necessarily, but that kind of frontiersman research that takes place in the laboratories and in the academic institutions of our country. It does not necessarily have a commercial application, but it is from that research that acts as a springboard for further technological, and I might add, commercial development, that the real essence of science is found.

Pure research is the essence of discovery. It is the vehicle that can provide for Canada a place on the world stage of technological advancement. It is that type of research, I submit, that is being severely hampered by a rather myopic approach to R and D in this country, which is to leave it up to the private sector.

The National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Society has written a very cogent brief. It is entitled "Towards a Coherent Education in Scientific Research Policy for Canada". They are extremely concerned with the direction they see the government has been taking. They have made some very excellent recommendations.

First, they say that even in times of fiscal restraint spending on education and research is an investment. University and research funding must be assured, as well as student aid. If not, Canada will fall far behind its competitors. We have already seen that happening. Canada is losing ground in terms of its placement in the global scientific community.

The report makes four recommendations. One, there should be no further reductions to EPF transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education until First Ministers agree on alternate arrangements to adequately and reliably fund universities. The fact is that cutting back on those EPF transfers, cutting back on that funding to the provinces and regions leaves it to the provinces themselves to take up the slack.

In British Columbia we have a particular problem with that because for many years the provincial government has been using a lot of that funding and quite frankly, putting it into other areas of the economy. That should not be happening but the truth of the matter is that it has which will leave us dreadfully short unless they reorganize some of their priorities.

The second recommendation in the report states that funds of matching grants policy for 1990-91 should be incorporated into the base budgets and that those budgets be doubled. They make the point that the purpose of the matching grants policy which was established in 1986 was to foster university and industrial research collaboration and to increase funds for university research. They argue that the policy has been successful but it terminates in 1991. They are suggesting that that be continued.

The third recommendation is that the government increase investment in research done in federal labs. It should increase the commitment, rather than lay off 500 workers in the National Research Council. Research and development has to be encouraged and it has to be funded both publicly and privately.

The fourth recommendation is that the federal government should ensure that barriers to higher education be eliminated. The student loans program should be re-evaluated and a national system of grants should be established.

The point they make here is that the current program for student loans is simply not meeting the needs of post-secondary students. The main problem, according to their argument, is that it is in fact a loan and brings about as a result of the loan structure a very heavy student debt load. Some of our students by the time they get out of university are burdened with debts of up to $20,000. It makes it exceedingly difficult for somebody who does not have the financial ability to do so, to in fact complete an education.

In conclusion, expenditures in post-secondary education, expenditures in scientific research are an essential investment and they have to be looked upon as an investment, not only in our future but in our children's future in Canada. It is absolutely imperative that this funding level be assured so that long-term research projects can continue.

Research does not happen in four-year cycles. When a scientist develops a project and requests funding after doing all the background research necessary to get something up and rolling, he does not look at whether there is an election four years down the line. We need long-term funding that does not pay attention to electoral priorities of a government in power. We need to give our scientific community the reassurance that that funding will be there in future years.

Until they have that reassurance we are going to have a piecemeal approach to research and development in this country that will simply leave us wallowing in the mud as other nations proceed beyond us. We need adequate funding and that funding has to be ensured even during times of fiscal restraint.

Finally, I submit that the direction taken by this government in passing the buck to the provinces, in passing the buck to the corporate sector, is leading to a false economy, an economy that will jeopardize Canada's future in the scientific market-place.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make some comments upon the speech that I have just heard and remind my hon. colleague that in terms of educational spending, Canada is second only to Sweden in the world. An amount of 6.76 per cent of the GDP goes into educational spending in this country. That is not a bad record.

In terms of funding university research, I think the hon. member need have no fear. It is our intention to continue to fund the research in universities. There is not going to be any sudden drop in the way we handle the granting councils. We are going to continue to put that money in there.

We will also ensure that there is more basic directed research and that we have more pre-competitive research in this country. That will and must involve the alliances between government and industry and the universities. I have used, on other occasions, the pretty simple example that apparently my colleague does not recognize. When it came to all of the fundamental research that needed to be done to develop the compact disc, Sony and Phillips did all of that pre-competitive research together. When they thought they were at the applied research level and they could actually see a product down the line they split and went about their own ways.

So pre-competitive research is basic directed research. A lot of that can be done in the universities. A lot of it can be done in industry. It is quite wrong to think that industry is not a place where you can do basic research. It certainly is. The General Electric laboratories and the Bell Telephone laboratories have always done directed basic research and some of the most fundamental developments over the last several years have been from those laboratories and from the research that they have done.

What this country has to do and what we are trying to do is to involve industry by asking it to join us in some of these things so we can try and form the alliances that are so critical. It is our intention to make this country competitive. We can do that by support in the right places and that is exactly what we are going to try and do.

As I said at the beginning of this debate, there is more to this than just spending money in terms of government R and D. We have our partners. They have to help us and that is what we are asking them to do.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, the minister reflects upon Canada's commitment to educational spending and he floats some figures around. I believe he said 6.7 per cent, the highest level of commitment to education. But I think what the minister is referring to is over-all spending.

What we are talking about specifically here in terms of the research and development is the kind of commitment that is required for just that particular educational sector, the spending in terms of R and D in this country. The figures that he has given, I believe, will be verified as being misleading because they are referring to global spending.

I have no argument with the minister in terms of certain commercial or corporate interests carrying on basic research. I think he called it pre-competitive research. The fact is that the focus of research in terms of the corporate sector is on applied research, on the commercial application. I think the minister will agree with me.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member.

It being 6.45 o'clock, p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply.

The question is on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

WILDERNESS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-292, an act to provide for the protection of wilderness areas and to amend the National Parks Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, the intent of this bill is to recognize the particular ecological value of wilderness. Current criteria is too demanding and cumbersome and further legislation needs to be developed to give full protection and preservation to smaller unique wilderness ecological treasures, treasures like the giant Sitka spruce of the Carmanah Valley or smaller wilderness areas in proximity to and accessible to major population where such wilderness areas, particularly old growth forests, have almost become extinct.

The bill will accommodate the concept of smaller wilderness pocket parks and is modelled after legislation in Australia and the United States.

• (1110)

The legislation would allow the federal government to move quickly to establish low maintenance, wilderness parks that would be left largely undeveloped.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am today tabling a petition from Chibougamau, in the riding of Roberval, Quebec, further to the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Chibougamau is undoubtedly an isolated community and for this reason, the petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inappropriate for the purpose of the northern tax benefits plan. It does not encourage settlement in the North and resource development there.

[English]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition under Standing Order 36 in which the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. The petitioners are residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, mainly from the town of Manitouwadge in Ontario.

Manitouwadge is situated 75 kilometres north of Highway 17, over 350 kilometres from the town of Thunder Bay. Along with Hornepayne, it is the most isolated community in my riding below the 51st parallel. On average, food and gasoline prices are 25 per cent higher than any heavily populated area. This tax benefit is the only compensation that they have. It should not be taken away.

On behalf of the 402 petitioners who rely on this tax benefit, I must reiterate the importance of this deduction to northern communities. The government is presently studying the report and it is imperative that it reject the recommendation presented in this report.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by students at the University of Ottawa in my riding who, as debate on Bill C-69 begins today, want to express their disagreement with the proposal to reduce federal transfer payments for education and to urge the government to stop eroding the quality and accessibility of our universities, colleges and post-secondary educational institutions in Canada.

These students say that tuition fees and other costs, which are already high, will continue to increase because the federal government will no longer contribute its fair share to the financing of post-secondary education.

For these reasons, the students ask the government to hold a federal-provincial conference at the highest level to establish the financial responsibilities of both levels of government for post-secondary education and to end the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour this morning to rise to present two different sets of petitions on the goods and services tax, one from a group of citizens from the great province of Saskatchewan and another petition from the great community of Kamloops, British Columbia.

Both groups are pointing out their concerns for the government's goods and services tax and by and large make a case that this is probably one of the most unfair forms of taxation in that it takes in no consideration as to the taxpayers' ability to pay a national sales tax, and they ask that the Parliament of Canada reconsider its earlier decision and rescind the legislation.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition on another topic. A number of citizens from British Columbia point out that since one-sixth of all of Canada's children live in poverty and the numbers in many respects appear to be increasing, they ask members of Parliament to support the private member's motion No. M-254, calling upon the government to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

This is very topical because, as you know, Mr. Speaker, that vote comes up later today asking members of the House of Commons to support a comprehensive bill of rights for children. I assume that that will be done unanimously. I cannot imagine members of Parliament saying that they do not want a bill of rights for children. However, there are surprises in this institution and we will see later today if there are any. I hope not.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with over 1,000 signatures of people, not only from my constituency of Mission-Coquitlam but from across the country, who have written and signed this petition in support of the children's bill of rights which is coming before the House today under Private Members' Business for a vote.

These people point out that although the over-all child population fell by almost 4 per cent between 1980 and 1986, the number of children living in poverty has increased by 13.4 per cent. The petitioners are calling upon the government and urging the government to support this bill which is supporting the United Nations bill and are calling on the government and the opposition to support it.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a number of petitions with many hundreds of signatures from people around the country who are also supporting the private member's motion No. M-254 which we will vote on later today.

They too are concerned with the rising incidence of child poverty which shows that one-sixth of all children in this country live in poverty and the rate is rising. It is a national disgrace. The petitioners also feel that it would be a disgrace if all members of Parliament did not support this motion later today.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the duty to present a petition on behalf of people from all across my province of Newfoundland and Labrador calling upon this House to enact legislation that will make deliberate abortion, at any time during pregnancy for any reason whatever, an offence.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was introduced at first reading, I gave notice of my intention to rise on a point of order before the bill was called again to argue with Your Honour concerning the procedural admissibility of the royal recommendation that is contained in this particular bill. I would like to do that now, before Your Honour puts the question on second reading of the bill.

I am concerned, Sir, that this bill contains a royal recommendation and that such is not required and should be struck out of the bill as being unnecessary. I suggest to Your Honour that we perhaps ought to use the opportunity to take a look at the propriety of using these royal recommendations because in my submission, they are included in these bills in an attempt by the government to stifle amendment by members of the opposition, amendments which members, in my respectful submission, are entitled to put.

The basis for the principles which apply to royal recommendations is to be found on page 183 of Beauchesne's, Sixth Edition, citation 596, which states:

> 596. The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the Royal Recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of the charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown not only if it increases the amount but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge. This standard is binding not only on private Members but also on Ministers whose only advantage is that, as advisors of the Crown, they can present new or supplementary estimates or secure the Royal Recommendation to new or supplementary resolutions.

• (1120)

The requirement for royal recommendations for bills that involve a charge on the public revenue is not in question. It is included in Section 54 of the Constitution Act, and I am not disputing that.

I am disputing the requirement for a royal recommendation to Bill C-69, and I believe there is good reason to doubt that a royal recommendation was in fact required on this bill.

I am not going to take Your Honour through each of the clauses. Not only are they tedious reading, but I suggest that they are very difficult reading. There appear to be all kinds of formulae that I do not understand in these clauses, and I have had some legal training. I do not know how a non-lawyer is supposed to understand these either. I suppose some economists might.

As my colleague from Gloucester says, the provisions of this bill are not meant for comprehension, they are meant to confuse and I am inclined to agree with him. In any event, we can glean something of the meaning of these clauses if we look at the budget presented by the Minister of Finance. Page 77 of "the Budget" states:

> Based on projections, this measure—

That is the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, > —is expected to contribute $155 million to expenditure restraint over the next two fiscal years. The actual savings will, of course, depend on actual growth rates in the provinces affected by the 5 per cent ceiling.

That is one statement and on page 78, he states:

> For 1990–91 and 1991–92, the per capita EPF transfer will be held to the 1989–90 level. This means it will grow with the population increase of each province, or about 1 per cent nationally. Federal cash expenditures will be reduced by about $870 million in 1990–91 and $1,540 million in 1991–92. In 1992–93, EPF growth will resume at the rate of growth of GNP less 3 percentage points, consistent with the announcement in the April 1989 budget. The growth of the total EPF transfer, beginning 1992–93, will not fall below the rate of inflation.

I realize that even reading this budget is a lot of economic gobbledegook, but we have said that in respect of the minister's statements before. We realize that the budget documents are an attempt to cover up the slashing and cutting that this government has indulged in with this budget, but even reading that it is possible to glean from this that these provisions in the budget, and contained now in Bill C–69 which is before us, which is the budget implementation bill in part, are reductions in the charges on the public revenue of Canada, not increases.

The minister has trumpeted in this document his savings to Canadian taxpayers by reason of the wonderful changes he is proposing in this bill. And yet this bill has attached to it, in spite of those savings and reductions, a royal recommendation. It is that that I object to. I have some authority in my submission for suggesting that this royal recommendation is, in fact, unnecessary.

I would like to turn to May's twenty-first edition at page 716 where it reads as follows, and this of course is the English authority on this point. The learned author writes:

> No special form of procedure applies to proposals to reduce existing charges, and they may be moved in the House or in Committee without the royal recommendation.
> A proposed reduction of a charge may consist in reducing its amount, or restricting its objects, or inserting limiting conditions, or shortening the period of its operation. The transference of a charge from the Consolidated Fund to 'moneys to be provided by Parliament', ie its transformation from an indefinitely continuing to an annually renewable charge—may be regarded as an instance of reducing the duration of a charge.
> The same principle applies in the case of amendments moved to a bill which abolishes or reduces a charge authorized by existing law. Amendments to such a bill, which are designed to restore a portion or the whole of the charge which the bill proposes to reduce or abolish, are in order without the need of a preliminary financial resolution.

That last paragraph was illustrated in the debate on Bill C–21 on the Senate amendments to Bill C–21 which simply reinstituted a charge on an existing bill. I do not need to go into that one again but the fact is that May supports the proposition that a royal recommendation is not required for bills that propose a reduction in the charge. In other words, a private member in this House could have introduced this bill quite properly in this House without a royal recommendation. I suggest that if it was in order for a private member to introduce such a bill then a royal recommendation is not required on that bill simply because a minister of the Crown has chosen to introduce it in this House.

Further, Beauchesne's sixth edition at page 185 confirms May's statements and states:

Again we have the support for this proposition in all of the authorities. Indeed, Beauchesne's refers to a decision cited in the Journals in 1908 and I have before me the ruling of the Speaker of the day on a question concerning the amendment of certain acts and clauses in a bill which reduced charges on the public expenditure. Page 608 of the Journals for July 8, 1908 states:

> A question has arisen as to whether, in view of certain clauses in the Bill, a previous sanction of the Governor General should not have been obtained and announced to the House, before its introduction, and such introduction preceded by a resolution.
> Having regard to the precedents in the House, I find that this has not been considered necessary. In the year 1883 a similar Bill was passed, and which now appears in the statutes for that year as Chapter 17, intituled: 'An Act further to amend and consolidate, as so amended, the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion therein mentioned.' This Bill was introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald. No consent of the Governor General was announced at any stage nor was any resolution passed previously to the introduction of the Bill. This seems to be a precedent exactly in point.

The Bill is a consolidating and amending Bill, and, in the case of such Bills, it is only when there are clauses imposing new burdens that it is necessary to consider those first in a Committee of the Whole. The object aimed at in such Bills is to give the old law a new and more convenient form.

Therefore, this is not a new proposition that I am putting forward. I suggest that it is one that is well rooted in our parliamentary practice and tradition. The fact is that the procedure has changed over the years and perhaps I can turn briefly to that procedure to mention certain of the changes that have taken place.

I am assisted in this by an excellent study done by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which I have referred the Chair previously, and certainly I have referred to it for my friend, the hon. government House Leader who could do some reading on this, I think, to advantage.

This ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance presented on February 13 of this year to the Senate outlines in some detail the history of the royal recommendation as it applies to government bills in this House.

Your Honour will recall that in the years prior to 1968 the normal practice in dealing with the royal recommendation was to have a resolution introduced in Committee of the Whole that was recommended to the House by the Governor General. The debate proceeded on the resolution and Committee of the Whole and only after adoption of that resolution was a bill allowed to be introduced in this House. Indeed, just last evening Your Honour will recall we followed a very similar procedure in that prior to the introduction of the supply bills, the two of them that were introduced and passed through all stages last evening, there was a resolution first adopted by the House prior to the introduction of those bills.

Those resolutions had been recommended to the House by virtue of the messages which His Excellency had sent to this House recommending the Estimates to the House. We have the case of the royal recommendation and resolution followed in respect of those appropriation acts.

In 1968 the procedure in respect of public bills was changed. Instead of having a resolution, the royal recommendation was attached to the bill itself and the bill was introduced at first reading with the royal recommendation attached. The resolution stage and the preceding debate in Committee of the Whole was abolished as being unnecessary and a duplication of effort.

In this case, as now is the practice with royal recommendations, the recommendation is attached but it does not say which clauses if any of the bill impose a new tax or impose or a new charge on the public revenue. In the absence of a statement of that, I suppose it is fair game to stand and ask the minister to explain where the new charge is. But we have had all these denials of new charges; indeed, Your Honour will recall that the Minister of Finance had the nerve to stand in this House and tell us there were no new taxes in the budget. It is safe to say that in the course of that silly statement he got all kinds of applause from the other side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milliken: I am glad to see they are still applauding, Mr. Speaker, but the people of Canada did not believe him; neither did we.

Since he made the statement that there were no new taxes, why is there a royal recommendation in this bill? If this bill is reducing the charge on the public revenue, as the minister said in the budget that it is, why has he attached a royal recommendation to it? Either it is because there are new taxes or charges included in this bill, or it should not be there.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It is because there are new taxes.

Mr. Milliken: My friend from Gloucester says that it is new taxes. I have no doubt there were new taxes in the budget. The question is whether there are any new taxes in this bill. I have examined the bill, Your Honour, and I have tried to understand it. It is clear that it reduces the increase in the charges that are already authorized by an existing law.

The Minister of Finance stated that repeatedly in his budget. I am not a gullible person and I do not swallow everything the Minister of Finance says, but it is in print in the budget that this is intended to reduce the payments by the Government of Canada.

The minister says this bill does that and it is intended to implement the provisions of the budget. If that is the case, and I invite Your Honour to read it with that in view, then I would ask Your Honour to strike the royal recommendation from this bill as being irregular, or, alternatively, have the minister stand in the House and explain to the House that if this is to remain on the bill why it is there. If it does represent an increase in taxes the Canadian people have a right to know. Indeed they should have been told about the taxes that they are having imposed on them through this budget, which the minister covered up when he presented the budget a few weeks ago.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands point out once again an inconsistency in terms of what the government is doing with the royal recommendations.

The hon. member has raised some interesting questions. Why do you have royal recommendations attached to legislation? It is primarily because you are going to increase taxes. We see that there is a royal recommendation attached, and that is why you attach royal recommendations, so one assumes there must be a tax increase in this legislation some place although we have not found it yet. Or, the government has simply erred and has proceeded in using the royal recommendation in an inappropriate fashion.

I would be curious to listen to the government explain why it has done this. Although the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has been persistent in raising this question in the House, the government either fails to listen or fails to understand the point that he is making.

I wonder if it would not be appropriate to stay deliberations on Bill C-69 until the Speaker makes a ruling. That will settle it because again the point is that it is inconsistent with practices of this House. It does not make sense in terms of the traditions that we have followed over the years.

I notice the minister plans to intervene in this discussion. May I offer the suggestion that if the minister is unable to explain why this unusual use of the rules has been pursued, Your Honour in fact stay deliberations on Bill C-69 until a ruling has been made by yourself.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in your wisdom and knowledge you have already realized that both the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Kamloops are totally wrong. They are imputing to us very dark motives. No minister on this side of the House would even think of such dark actions.

Not being hindered by any legal knowledge, maybe I can explain in very simple and clear terms why there is a royal recommendation in Bill C-69. There is indeed a royal recommendation on Page 1a of Bill C-69. It is there not because of the desire or request of the government or ministers but on the advice of the Office of the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel because it felt that Bill C-69 and some provisions in it widen existing conditions.

According to Beauchesne's sixth edition to which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has referred, when such things occur a royal recommendation is necessary. These changes in the bill take place among other areas in article 2.5 (1) where conditions of previous bills are being changed. This is the very simple, clear reason why there is a royal recommendation in Bill C-69.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): I rise on just a very brief point of order, Mr. Speaker. In listening to my friend I was surprised that the government did not explain why there was a royal recommendation on the basis of increased taxation and increased revenues.

I am sure when there is a review done of the interventions made by my friend from Kingston and the Islands and the NDP House leader, the member for Kamloops, it will become clear to the Chair that not having a royal recommendation on this bill, because we all know what the government's motives are here, would be like asking a pickpocket to walk around with mittens on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I want to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for his well researched intervention, the hon. member for Kamloops, the Minister of State for Finance and the hon. member for Gloucester.

I will reserve my decision, but until I rule I will allow the debate to proceed.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (minister of State Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move second reading of Bill C-69, the Government Expenditures Restraint Act. In opening debate on this Bill, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is important that Parliamentarians have a clear understanding of the broader perspective within this initiave must be considered.

We are taking hard but unavoidable decisions to get our financial house in order. We are dealing squarely with the closely-linked problems of the deficit and inflation—the two problems we must resolve if we are to build a secure and rewarding future for ourselves and our country.

As Canadians, we have every reason to regard our future with confidence. But we cannot expect to secure our future if we carry into it an increasing burden of debt, and increasingly heavy interest payments on that debt.

Since November 1984 the government has pursued a coherent and comprehensive plan to build a solid foundation for Canada's economic future. That plan was designed to put Canada and Canadians in a position to meet the challenge of a changing world in a stronger and more flexible way. The plan has two main thrusts. The first is to put the government's financial affairs in order, so that we can reduce and ultimately eliminate the federal deficit. The second is to put policies in place that free the creative energies of the private sector, so that it can meet the competitive challenges and opportunities of the new world economy.

• (1140)

[English]

Today I will be speaking about the first of these thrusts. In 1984 when we came to office—and the hon. member for Gloucester will remember—the federal government's spending was out of control. After 15 years of living beyond its means, the government had accumulated a national debt of $200 billion.

Mr. Milliken: What is it now?

Mr. Loiselle: I will explain to you in a minute.

As a result, in a very real sense Canada was saddled not with one deeply ingrained federal deficit, but two. The government was spending $16 billion more on programs and services than it collected in revenues and had to borrow the difference. That was the first deficit, the operating deficit.

The government was also spending—and that was before our time—another $22 billion in interest charges on its mountain of debt and had to borrow that amount too. That was the second deficit. Together they added up to a crushing over-all deficit of more than $38 billion.

Hon. members will be aware and will recognize that before we could begin to do anything about the second deficit we had to tackle the operating deficit and its root causes—overspending and eroding government revenues.

On the spending front, we looked first at the overhead cost of running the government itself—salaries, travel, equipment and the like—to see where we could make do with less. We looked carefully and we took action. We have reduced the number of public servants by more than 12,000. Today the Public Service is the same size as in 1973 and carrying a larger workload. The cost of running the government is less than in 1984. We have reduced the number of Crown corporation employees by 75,000, partly through privatization and partly through rationalization and by the elimination of waste and inefficiency, repairing the damage done by the hon. gentlemen on the other side. We have paid their debts.

We have brought the same discipline to spending on government programs and services. By 1987-88, through rigorous management and realignment of programs, we turned the first of the two deficits, the government's operating deficit, into a surplus. Today, instead of spending $16 billion more on programs than we take in, we are spending $9 billion less, a $25 billion turnaround in just five years. This is the work of an excellent government. If it were not for the interest we pay on the public debt left by the former administration, we would not be talking about deficits at all. We would be in the black.

About 70 per cent of this progress results from expenditure restraint and to achieve it we have reduced program spending as a share of the economy to its lowest level in almost 20 years.

Since 1984, as a result, we have slowed the annual growth of the public debt from 24 per cent to less than 10 per cent this year. Yet, for all this progress, the debt is still growing faster than the economy, faster than our ability to pay the rising interest charges on it.

The reason for this is compound interest: the interest paid on interest. If you are a saver, compound interest has a touch of magic to it. Money invested and left to grow at the rate of 10 per cent doubles in about seven years. But, if you are a debtor, the gold turns to dust and you have to keep borrowing to pay interest on interest.

This is precisely what is happening in the case of our public debt. It has grown from $200 billion to $350 billion in five years. Fully $120 billion, or more than 80 per cent, of this increase consists of the compounding interest on the original $200 billion.

These stark figures help to explain why the government's deficit for this year is still $30.5 billion despite the spending cuts and the tax increases we have brought in. They also explain the urgency of breaking the vicious circle of growing debt and debt service costs.

[Translation]

There are those who say we shouldn't worry about getting our deficit down any further. I say to hon. members that I don't accept this position, for several reasons. This year alone, interest payments will cost us $40 billion—equal to $1,500 for each and every Canadian. This amounts to 35 cents for every dollar the government collects in revenue—money we could otherwise use to get taxes down, maintain existing programs and meet new priorities such as environmental protection, research and development and skills training. By reducing the deficit, we can get that 35 cents down and gain much greater control over our destiny.

Another reason is that, having turned the corner with our operating surplus, we are already a good part of the way there. Now is not the time to back off. We have done well. We need to keep on. Let's look at our record compared to other major industrial countries. In 1984 Canada's deficit on a national accounts basis was 6.8 per cent of GDP. That was 2.4 percentage points above the Group of Seven average. This country was definitely in trouble.

Mr. Milliken: That's nonsense.

Mr. Loiselle: Now it is down to 2.8 per cent of GDP, or seven-tenths of a percentage point above the G-7 average. So we dropped from 2.4 above to seven-tenths. On the expenditure side, our performance in reducing program expenditures is better than that of both the U.S. and the United Kingdom. Achieving an operating surplus is a considerable milestone. It marks a fundamental structural change in the balance of spending and revenues.

In 1991-92, we will reach another milestone when we stabilize our debt-to-GDP ratio—our debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy. We're doing well. We know we must go further.

The government's new expenditure control plan will ensure that our operating surplus continues to grow. It must, to offset the growth of the debt. And to ease the burden that interest payments impose on our freedom of action, we must continue to deal firmly with the greatest single threat to our continued fiscal and economic progress. That is the threat of inflation.

• (1150)

As Canada's strong economic expansion of the last seven years has matured, demand has increasingly outstripped the economy's productive capacity. This has fuelled inflation. A slowing economy is helping to ease the strain, but underlying inflationary pressures remain too high. Only by lowering inflation can we get interest rates down, keep them down and put the economy back on the path of sustainable expansion.

The prospects for lower inflation and interest rates depend crucially on responsible price and wage behaviour. Prices have consistently been inching upward. The consumer price index, or CPI, rose from 4 per cent in 1988 to 5 per cent last year to 5.5 per cent in January. The appreciation of the Canadian dollar in 1989 restrained inflation. Without it, the CPI would have been above 6 per cent.

On the wage side, federal government wage increases have been below the inflation rate and below the pace of wage increases in the private sector since 1984. In 1989, federal wage settlements averaged 4.2 per cent. However, the combined settlements of other levels of the public sector averaged 5.6 per cent.

[English]

Hon. members will be aware that provincial finance ministers have been asked to join in a commitment to responsible restraint. I urge leaders of the business community to recognize this need as well in both price and wage policies. I urge labour to do the same. Quite simply, if we try to take more out of the economy than it is capable of producing, we will all pay the price of higher inflation.

Hard experience makes clear what the inevitable cost of premature easing of interest rates would be. It would lead to an increase in borrowing and new demand pressures, leading in turn to more inflation and still higher interest rates. None of us wants to relive the nightmare of the early 1980s, the loss of confidence and the personal tragedies brought on by soaring interest rates and soaring inflation.

The budget will help—and I see that the hon. member is inclined to agree with me—

Mr. Young (Gloucester): That the budget will help? No, I don't agree.

Mr. Loiselle: —get inflation down. Our expenditure control plan, when combined with the cost cutting measures announced last December, will produce savings of $3 billion in the first year of application and almost $4 billion the following year. Over the next five years, the total savings will come to well over $19 billion.

We recognize that this restraint will require the patience and understanding of Canadians. This is why in the budget we have asked Canadians to join in a broadly based program over the next two years to reinforce our efforts to control government spending. We are doing so without raising taxes. We are putting a cap on the growth of spending for a number of major programs and freezing spending on others.

We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and sell investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet public policy objectives. We have decided that the time has come to sell the government's shares in Petro-Canada and Telesat Canada, which will enable them to strengthen their roles in their two key sectors of the economy. The sale of these corporations will reduce the government's borrowing requirements. This in turn will reduce interest charges on the debt.

We are also continuing to move on business subsidies. Since we came to office a government priority has been to get out of the subsidy business, especially for business. We have reduced or eliminated a wide range of business subsidies. The Shipbuilding Industry Assistance Program, the Canadian Home Improvement Program, the Petroleum Incentives Program and VIA Rail subsidies all have been cut out or cut back. In the February budget we cut some more, including the OSLO oil sands project.

As well, we have substantially reduced business subsidies conferred through the tax system, including reducing capital cost allowance rates, eliminating non-regional investment tax credits, eliminating the inventory allowance, and phasing out the earned depletion allowance, to name only a few.

There are still subsidies we do provide—subsidies for social housing, agriculture and transportation. But in this budget we have firmly committed ourselves to a more businesslike approach to business assistance. With limited exceptions, federal assistance will now take the form of repayable loans rather than straight grants or subsidies.

[Translation]

The restraint measures, Mr. Speaker, are tough but essential to restore the deficit to its downward path and hold the line against a resurgence of inflation. Taken together, they will hold the growth of federal program spending to 3 per cent next year, well below the expected rate of inflation. By 1994-95, program spending will fall to 14.2 per cent of national income, its lowest level since the late 1960s.

For this to happen, everyone must participate in restraint. The deficit is a national problem. It demands a national solution, and transfers to provinces must play their part. But that part should be kept in perspective.

Federal cash transfers to the provinces account for nearly one-quarter of all federal program spending. Over the past five years, while we have been holding the annual growth of federal program spending to 3.6 per cent, total transfers to the provinces have been growing at over 6 per cent.

They will continue to grow next year—but, under our expenditure control plan, no faster on average than our own program spending. Bear in mind, as well, that this means a reduction in federal transfers amounting to less than one per cent of provincial revenues. We have been sensitive to the financial circumstances of the provinces. Transfers to the low-income Atlantic provinces are expected to increase about 4 per cent annually over the next two years. Transfers to the wealthier provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia should grow just over 2 per cent. I believe the people will agree that the provinces which are less well off should bear a lighter part of the national debt-reduction burden. What we are doing may not be welcome, but it is fair, necessary and reasonable.

And what, precisely, are we doing with the legislation under consideration today? Well, Mr. Speaker, we are giving force of law to four measures announced in the February budget. For 1990–91 and 1991–92, per capita Established Programs Financing, or EPF transfers will be held to the 1989–90 level. This means it will grow with the population increase of each province, or about 1 per cent nationally.

Federal cash transfers will be reduced by about $870 million in 1990–91 and $1.54 million in 1991–92. In 1992–93 EPF growth will resume at the rate of growth of GNP less three percentage points, consistent with the announcement in the April 1989 budget. This change to EPF represents less than 1.0 per cent of total provincial revenues in 1990–91 and just over 1.0 per cent in 1991–92.

In addition to EPF, the federal government also provides substantial additional assistance to the lower-income provinces to help them provide public services, including health care and post-secondary education, through the equalization program. Equalization transfers have grown strongly in recent years, from over $5 billion in 1984–85 to close to $8 billion in 1989–90. They exceed EPF as the largest form of federal support in the Atlantic provinces. Equalization transfers to the lower-income provinces are not affected by the Budget. They are expected to increase about 6 to 7 per cent annually over the next two years, roughly in line with the nominal growth of the economy. EPF and equalization transfers together are expected to amount to more than $27 billion in 1990–91.

For the next two years, growth in transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan, or CAP, will be limited to five per cent a year in the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Other provinces—those receiving federal equalization payments—will be exempt from this ceiling on growth. They will continue to have open-ended access to federal dollars to meet any growth in expenditures eligible for cost-sharing under CAP. This measure will have a relatively small impact on the over-all support of $5.5 billion offered to provinces, and will affect only the fiscally stronger provinces. The $3 billion flowing to those provinces will be allowed to grow by some $150 million per year. As you know, Mr. Speaker, these amounts continue to represent a major federal commitment, and a major federal expenditure by any standard. Implementation of this measure provides for resumption of the present regime on April 1, 1992.

The Canadian Exploration Incentives Program, or CEIP was cancelled effective midnight, February 19, 1990. The termination and grandfathering rules are being implemented through amendments to the CEIP Act and Regulations. Termination of this program, the last remaining federal subsidy to business that was demand-driven and open-ended, is expected to result in savings of $50 million in 1990–91 and $125 million in 1991–92.

Transfers under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act for 1990–91 and 1991–92 will not exceed the 1989–90 level. This is expected to reduce projected expenditures under the Act by $16 million in 1990–91 and $34 million in 1991–92.

[English]

These are all moderate and necessary actions. The expenditure control plan affects a wide range of programs.

Transfers to provinces are too large not to be included. This plan will help get us over the hurdle and keep us on track to reduce the deficit from $30.5 billion this year to $28.5 billion next year, or $26.7 billion if you exclude the start-up costs of the goods and services tax.

We will cut the deficit in half to $14 billion in three more years and reduce it to $10 billion in the year after that. This will mean that within five years the government will begin to buy back its bonds and treasury bills. The country will be on a clear path of substantially reducing its debt. The challenge we face in the current testing period for the Canadian economy is not to falter in dealing with the problems of debt and inflation.

Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, if we maintain our resolve, the prospect of lower inflation is within sight and we will have the deficit under control. By persevering we will attain greater control over our destiny and greater freedom to build the Canada we want for ourselves and future generations. Let us get on with it.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's speech, and I must say we can always count on Tory policy to be consistently inconsistent. The minister says that inflation will be kept under control if the government pursues its policies, but yesterday, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said he lost the battle against inflation with his high interest rate policy. The Minister of State (Finance) says we can expect hard times and tough decisions, which is really incredible when we consider what they said in the fall of 1988, when the deficit and the debt were very high. At the time, the Minister of Finance told us there was no problem, that all the programs being promoted by the Conservative party would be implemented and would not cost taxpayers a cent, or should I say a nickel, Mr. Speaker.

I find it very hard to understand how the government can expect us to believe what is being said today about Canada's economy and the way to deal with the deficit and the debt, when all this is being said by the same people who, five or six years ago, told us they had the answer, the solution to these problems.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today is a devastating indictment of this government, because instead of shouldering their responsibilities, they decided to pass their problems on to the provinces. Of course, this means that in the final instance, the burden will fall on those Canadians who are most vulnerable in every single province in this country. The bill before the House today implements four austerity measures announced in the February Budget. These include a two-year freeze on federal transfers to the provinces for Established Programs Financing, including postsecondary education and health care; capping federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta at 5 per cent for the next two years; eliminating the Canadian Exploration Inxentives Program; and finally, a two-year freeze on public utilities income tax transfers to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the budgetary restrictions mentioned by the minister in his speech and included in the Budget and in this bill total $ 1 billion for 1990-91, $ 1.8 billion for 1991-92 and $ 8.4 billion over the next five fiscal years. This loss of revenue is unacceptable to the provinces and to Canadians. Perhaps I should explain these figures. We are talking about billions of dollars, and it is rather hard for the average person to understand.

But if we start with $1,000, usually people can easily understand what a thousand dollars is. It may be a little harder to talk about a million dollars because it is a fairly big number, one that most Canadians do not handle every day. But if, for example, Mr. Speaker, we talk about a thousand million dollars; in other words, if we break a billion into a million chunks of one thousand, that makes a billion. It is almost unthinkable to talk about removing that kind of support from the most disadvantaged in all provinces through this expenditure reduction bill.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party is opposed to Bill C-69 and I hope that the reasons will be clear when we have finished discussing this negative measure of the government. I know that my colleagues have several particular points to raise, but today I would like to take the time to give an overview, to discuss some points and also to summarize the Liberal Party's position.

Reduced transfers to the provinces for higher education and health care and reduced transfers to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia for the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP) will no doubt force the provinces to raise their taxes, since the programs concerned are priorities. If all these cuts are made up for by taxes, Mr. Speaker, each citizen's provincial tax load will increase by $576 on average over the next five years, which means that the provinces will have to get the money to meet their citizens' needs, Mr. Speaker. And I would like to point out that this is happening at the same time as the federal government is getting into an area of provincial jurisdiction, namely retail sales taxes, which are traditionally provincial. The famous GST being brought in by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister will further restrict the provinces' ability to meet their operating requirements and especially the needs of their citizens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we must understand that this is the third time that the Conservative government has attacked established program financing, EPF, since 1986. The Conservative government came to power in 1984 and since then, on three occasions we have seen the Conservative approach in action. Total cuts in the EPF between 1986–87 and 1994–95, according to the projections quoted by the Minister, amount to an astronomical $ 31.1 billion, including $ 22.2 billion which should have been allocated to health care and $ 8.9 billion to higher education. It is still an incredible amount.

Mr. Speaker, should the provinces decide not to raise their taxes, they will have to make hospitals and the health care system absorb these cuts. They will have to close beds, reduce services or ask students to pay higher tuition fees and put up with overcrowded classrooms. The government does not seem to realize that it will cause all sorts of problems for the provinces. Even though the government may not be aware of these problems at the present time, such was not the case in the past. On March 24, 1982, the current Minister of Finance said in this House, and I quote: "Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems outside of that arena." What happened in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, that would urge the Minister of Finance, who in 1982 was so concerned with the needs of students and the ill, to ask his Minister of State (Finance) to come and defend his budget cuts today?

As for the Canada Assistance Plan, Mr. Speaker, reductions in transfers to provinces such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, the richer Canadian provinces as you know, in a sense reneges on this government's commitment to helping those who are most in need, as I will explain this. The poor in those three provinces are just as poor, they are as much in need, they are hurting as much as the poor in other provinces. Moreover, and this should be emphasized, British Columbia and Ontario, supported by Alberta, are attacking before the Courts the legality of those cuts, even though they are the richer Canadian provinces because they realize what the implications are for their needs.

Let me now turn to the mining incentives program. The outright cancellation of that program less than two years after it was introduced reneged on another Government promise as the Minister of State (Forestry and Mining) stated on May 3, 1988, and I quote:

"That rate, 30 per cent, will be in force for two years, till the end of 1990. Mining areas in Canada, Northern mining areas of course will be the hardest hit by the cancellation of that program, as will small mining operations."

I know some of my colleagues intend to refer in greater detail to that program that is very important for them.

If we now look at the budget proposals, the Canadian Government put a two-year freeze on transfers to provinces under the Established Programs Funding. As we know, EPF helps provinces discharge their obligations concerning health and post-secondary education. If the Canadian Government pays an equal amount of per capita assistance to each and every province, as we know is the case, the freeze means that the funding will only increase in relation to the provinces' population growth, which is 1 per cent nationally, as the Minister of State mentioned.

Will Canadians who have personal health problems or who know people who must use health services in their provinces accept those cuts? I doubt it, Mr. Speaker. Again, my point is that the federal government has simply transferred the problems caused by its poor management to the provinces.

I said earlier it was the third time since 1986 that the federal government was reducing its contribution to financing for postsecondary education and health care. Before 1986, the value of these transfers was increased in direct proportion to per capita GDP growth, in other words, the economy's real growth plus the inflation rate times the population of each province. In 1986, the Tory government decided to deindex this formula by reducing the transfer growth rate by two percentage points. This is one of the deindexations they managed to get away with. There were others that failed.

In last year's Budget, the government announced it was reducing the transfer growth rate by another percentage point. This year's freeze means a further reduction of about three percentage points in federal transfers. This is intolerable, Mr. Speaker.

The freeze announced in the Budget will cause the provinces to lose about $7.4 billion in payments over the next five years. With the two cutbacks announced previously by the Tory government, the reduction in federal payments over the period from 1986–87 to 1994–95 will total, as I said earlier, an incredible $31 billion.

Mr. Speaker, one wonders what happened to the Minister of Finance, because in 1982, he objected strenuously to cutbacks in EPF transfers, saying that the federal government should not reduce the deficit at the expense of the provinces. On March 24, 1982 he said in this House that cuts in EPF transfers "could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on the hospital funding and on the operations of the hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments."

• (1220)

How can the Minister of Finance show up in the House to defend this bill which clearly contradicts what he said not so long ago? Cuts undermine the Canadian health care system just the demand for these services is growing because of our aging population and the high cost of high technology medical equipment.

Once again, the Prime Minister will go back on what he said on post-secondary education. He promised high quality education for young Canadians. His about-turn makes a mockery of the national education task force he set up. As you probably remember, Mr. Speaker, at the Conservatives' general council meeting held on August 25, 1989 in Ottawa, the Prime Minister said this: "Our government will support its fair share of the burden to make sure Canadians get a high quality education enabling them to face international challenges."

Mr. Speaker, we wonder whether the government seriously intends to honour not only the commitments it made in 1982 when it talked about cutbacks and their effects on provinces, students and sick people but also the promises made by the Prime Minister as recently as August 1989.

The Canada Assistance Plan will also suffer drastic cuts under this budget. Established in 1966, it is the cornerstone of the Canadian social assistance program. Under this Plan, the federal and provincial governments each pay half the costs of social assistance and essential goods and services such as food, housing, clothing, public utilities and household items. Social assistance also includes dental care for the poor, aid for the disabled, help for abused children in foster homes and help for children in low-income families. These are areas that will be cut by the government, which tells us that these cuts are essential to balance our country's economic affairs.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians will have to decide whether this is a fair way to deal with the federal government's problem.

The 1989 budget speech defended the clawback of family allowances and old age pensions on the pretext that the primary purpose of social assistance is to help those who need it and not those with high incomes. Now the measures taken in the 1990 Budget attack the poorest Canadians, because the poor live in all provinces of Canada. We know that figures for 1987, the latest available, show that 49 per cent of poor families and 54.9 per cent of poor individuals live in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. We must also remember that welfare payments are not always enough to enable families to escape poverty. They are just enough to survive on. And that is no doubt why British Columbia and Ontario announced after the Budget was tabled that they would challenge the CAP cuts in court. Alberta supports the action taken by these two provinces.

We know that the government wanted to try to give the impression that it was continuing to help the most disadvantaged provinces by attacking the poor in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. But I think that Canadians can easily understand that it is the beginning. In the same way that the government last year in the 1989 Budget wanted to claw back family allowances and old age pension benefits for some high-income individuals, it is the beginning of the end of the commitment the federal government has had for years to help the needy throughout Canada.

[English]

I listened, with a lot of interest, to my colleague the Minister of State for Finance, especially when he talked about the coherent and global plan that the government had to deal with the problems it encountered when it came to office in 1984. I can only say that it takes a great deal of courage to stand in this House and to talk about what has gone on over the last six years as being part of any coherent activity.

For the record, when the Conservative government came to power in 1984, at the end of that fiscal year, in the spring of 1985, the public debt was at $200 billion. The public debt at the end of this fiscal year will be at nearly $400 billion. That is what a coherent policy has achieved, nearly a doubling of the debt.

Now, we hear talk about compound interest and about a lot of problems which the government has not been able to deal with because of this inherited problem. That was not the language we were hearing when this government spoke about its hopes for the country in 1984. But even had it encountered a situation that it could not possibly have foreseen, how can we justify what has gone on last year and this year in the light of what was said in the fall of 1988?

In the fall of 1988, the total deficit was approximately $28 billion. The deficit this year will be $28 billion. So what has happened? In 1988, the government told us that it had a plan, that it was providing good management, that we were on the right track and the economy was booming. It said it was addressing the problems of the country, yet in the year 1987–88 the actual figure for the deficit was $28.1 billion. For 1990–91, according to the Minister of Finance's figures, the deficit will be $28.5 billion. We are heading in the wrong direction.

The Department of Finance is asking Canadians to bite the bullet with this particular proposal to deal with the budget restrictions, while at the same time, it is saying that things will be better down the road. This is the same Minister of Finance and the same government who, last year during the budget, told us that interest rates over the year 1989–90 would be around 10 per cent. This year, the same minister tells us in his budget that for the year 1990–91, our average interest rate should be about 11.1 per cent. Unfortunately for the Minister of Finance, yesterday the Governor of the Bank of Canada said he cannot see any easing in interest rates at all.

Most analysts who looked at the budget when it was delivered in February said that the projections of the minister were completely off base, yet all of the conclusions in that budget are largely based on that particular projection of 11.1 per cent, and further that the interest rates would drop next year. Now, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is saying something quite different from that, which is something that we will have to pursue with the Minister of Finance at some other time in this place.

Although we are talking about an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, let us talk about some government revenues. For example, let us look at some tax increases that have occurred over this period of time. Since we are talking about restraint today, it might be interesting to see whether the government has been able to restrain itself in terms of tax increases. There have been 32 tax increases in the time since this government has come to office.

It has eliminated the registered home ownership savings plan. It has changed marital exemptions. It has eliminated the low-income federal tax reduction. I am sure you are aware of the temporary 5 per cent and 10 per cent surtaxes, Mr. Speaker. It has deindexed tax brackets, family allowance and tax credits. There is a permanent general 3 per cent surtax. There is the clawback of the family allowance and old age security being paid to families and senior citizens of this country. The general surtax has increased to 5 per cent from 3 per cent in 1989, added on to the one I mentioned earlier. The full 5 per cent began on January 1, 1990, but of course there are no increases in taxes this year. That tax was discussed last year but just came into effect January 1, 1990.

It has raised the federal sales tax. While we have been talking about restraint in money available to take care of low-income Canadians, sick Canadians and young Canadians seeking post-secondary education, the government raised the federal sales tax that it wants to replace now to 10 per cent from 9 per cent, to 11 per cent from 10 per cent, to 12 per cent from 11 per cent. It finally wrapped it up with 13.5 per cent last year.

We have had taxes on candies and snack foods. There has been a 10 per cent tax levied on long distance telephone calls and cable service. There is now tax on paint and wallpaper, and toys. It increased the taxes on alcohol and tobacco so many times I will not bore hon. members with the details. The tax on gasoline has been increased seven or eight times.

We have a situation in which the government has talked about restraining the ability of Canadians to receive services that not only they became accustomed to but which they believe they deserve and have a right to. The government has shown again and again in the past five or six years that it has no real understanding of what is taking place in the country. For example, how are Canadians to believe that the Minister of Finance and the government are serious when they talk about this restraint program having a salutary effect on the deficit or the debt?

The Minister of Finance predicted in his plans released in 1985 that right now the deficit in Canada should be below $20 billion. You cannot keep telling people one thing and producing another result and expect them to believe you.

I do want to point out why Canadians have every right to be cynical, particularly those Canadians who follow what the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister say. The Prime Minister said to Canadians several weeks ago that he believed, and he stated it as a bald fact, that interest rates would go down. The finance minister in his budget states without any equivocation that the projections for interest rates this year are 11.1 per cent. As a matter of fact, he suggests that next year, as I recall the number, it should be down below 9 per cent.

We have gone by St. Patrick's Day so we cannot talk about leprechauns and wee people creeping into the system and doing the kinds of things that are throwing the Minister of Finance off base. But we have to question where the Minister of Finance is going to go now with his ally, in part, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who is saying very clearly in his report made public yesterday that he has to achieve price stability. For the Governor of the Bank of Canada to achieve price stability he has to keep interest rates up.

I think most fair-minded people would recognize that there is absolutely no way that we can get to an 11.1 per cent interest rate this year because we would have to believe, if that were to be the case, that at some point this year we will see interest rates in single-digit figures, somewhere around 8 per cent, to be able to average out to 11.1 per cent because we are already into the year. Why should Canadians in all 10 provinces and the territories believe that the government is serious when it is talking about financial restraint when it has been proven wrong time and time again in its projections? The only thing the government has been right about in terms of delivering is that Tory times are tough times and Tory times are taxing times.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It has been absolutely right on in those kinds of projections. Tory times being tough times was said a long time before anybody ever dreamed the NDP would appear on the scene in this country. So it certainly was not taken from any one to my left.

Tory times are often tough times. One of the nice things about the opportunity we have today to discuss the presentation made by the Minister of State for Finance is that we can discuss credibility. We can look at where the government has been in the last five or six years.

I hope that as this debate continues, my colleagues on the government side will stand in their places and explain to Canadians why they should be punished for the mismanagement of the Mulroney government and the inability of the Minister of Finance to be able to project, based on his information and his own policies, the kinds of results that would give any confidence to Canadian consumers, investors or, for that matter, to people outside the country looking at what is taking place in Canada.

In closing, I want to say unequivocally that we in the Liberal party oppose Bill C-69. We believe that the government is going to have to recognize that it is getting into an extremely difficult situation with the contradictory signals that are coming out concerning its budget, particularly as it applies to interest rate projections. I do not believe that we are going to be able to look at budget restraint measures any more than we are going to be able to look at the very illusory conclusions that were drawn in that budget based on this 11.1 per cent figure.

I hope that the Minister of Finance, the Department of Finance and the government will consider seriously revising their projections and their conclusions. It seems to me that as we are asking Canadians and provinces to shoulder a burden based on incorrect information or improper assumptions that we are not doing anybody a service.

In light of what was said yesterday by Mr. Crow, let us hope that the government will recognize that interest rates are going to remain high. If the government continues with these policies, the great danger that is inherent in this bill is that it is going to create more unemployment. It is going to force more Canadians on to welfare rolls in provinces. Provinces are going to be less able to cope with those problems because of these cuts.

The Government of Canada is creating a vicious circle out of which no one can escape. The people who will suffer the most are those who all Canadians want to protect the most—the sick, the poor, the handicapped, the people who need the services that are provided by many of those programs that are being cut by this legislation.

We are also taking a vicious cut at the young people in this country who understand now just how difficult things are going to be for them with the cutbacks to support for post-secondary education, the kinds of cutbacks we have seen in the employment programs for young people in the summer and the kinds of attacks we have seen on young people attending post-secondary institutions when there is a 3 per cent administrative charge being levied on their loan applications and that kind of thing.

It is important for all members to understand that if it is the government's policy to push Canada into a recession to satisfy Governor Crow's obsession with zero inflation, then surely we must be aware that there has to be programs to protect those Canadians who most need our help.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this government will be remembered long after it no longer occupies the benches on the opposite side of the House. This is a government that will be remembered for oppressing the poor, women, aboriginal people and workers during its two terms in office. This government will be remembered as the government that slapped the muzzle on everyone who cried out "Enough!"—even members of the opposition.

It will be remembered as the government that even when Canadians told it formally, using every vehicle open to them through petitions, rallies and legislative hearings, refused to listen. This is the government that will be remembered for saying: "We've heard from Canadians". But it will also be the government that will be remembered for not saying: "But we didn't listen".

This is the government that when elected in 1984 set out to implement George Orwell's predictions in his book 1984.

When the minister made his statement earlier he called on labour to exercise restraint in wages. He said that we do not want a return to the tragedies of the early 1980s. The tragedies in the early 1980s were not because of workers' wages. The tragedies in the early 1980s were because of poor economic policies on the part of both the Liberals and subsequently the Tories.

The early 1980s was when food banks started in this country—the first time since the depression. The early 1980s was when the labour movement had to develop unemployment action centres across this country to try and help working people, whether they were union or non-union, to struggle and survive because of bad economic policy. None of us want to go back to the early 1980s.

Mark my words, Mr. Speaker, the course on which the government has embarked is a sure blueprint to ensure that food banks will become the fastest-growing banks in the country, and that unemployment action centres will have to be revived and rebuilt to look after those who have been dispossessed and ignored by this government.

I would like to ask the minister—I am sorry he is gone—to point out to me one welfare payment that has increased the inflation rate of this country enough to have had an impact on the government's economic plan, or to have had an impact on the deficit. He asked Canadians to be patient. Then, in the next breath, he said that he would be putting a cap on government spending. I think that is shocking. It is shocking because the cap he is speaking of is the cap on funding for the poor. It is again the heavy hand of the government pressing on the poor, the unemployed, students, the sick and the elderly so that it can manage its budget and reduce the deficit in this country.

Mr. Parker: Right-wing policies.

Ms. Langan: The hon. member says that those are right-wing policies, and he is absolutely right. Right-wing policies are the kind of policies that ensure the government will help its friends at the same time as it screws the poor.

I would like to address the title of this bill. The act may be cited as the Government Expenditures Restraint Act. If I thought for one minute that it was a Government Expenditures Restraint Act and not an act to oppress the poor, I might not be so offended by the title. We must keep in mind, as we discuss Bill C–69, which is an omnibus bill, that it shows expenditures and restraint will take place only on the backs of the poor, students and the sick.

This bill is not designed to cut spending of the government in ways that are meaningful. This act is designed to take back commitments given to the people of Canada, commitments which this government has made for years to these people.

If we look at Clause 2 of the bill we see it refers to amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan. Let us talk about definitions. "Assistance" under the Canada Assistance Plan is defined this way:

> —aid in any form to or in respect of persons in need for the purpose of providing or providing for all or any of the following:
> (a) food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements ("hereinafter referred to as "basic requirements"),
> (b) prescribed items incidental to carrying on a trade or other employment and other prescribed special needs of any kind,
> (c) care in a home for special care,
>
> (d) travel and transportation,
> (e) funerals and burials,
> (f) health care services,
> (g) prescribed welfare services purchased by or at the request of a provincially approved agency, and
> (h) comfort allowances and other prescribed needs of residents or patients in hospitals or other prescribed institutions;

"Welfare services" is defined as:

> —services having as their object the lessening, removal or prevention of the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes:
> (a) rehabilitation services,
> (b) case work, counselling, assessment and referral services,
> (c) adoption services,
> (d) homemaker, day–care and similar services,
>
> (e) community development services,
> (f) consulting, research and evaluation services with respect to welfare programs, and
> (g) administrative, secretarial and clerical services, including staff training, relating to the provision of any of the foregoing services or to the provision of assistance,
> but does not include any service relating wholly or mainly to education, correction or any other matter prescribed by regulation or, except for the purposes of the definition "assistance", any service provided by way of assistance;

That is a long explanation of what those three words "assistance" and "welfare services" mean. In fact, if one looks at what is contained in Bill C–69, one will see a total departure from what the spirit, the intent, and, indeed, the definition of assistance and welfare services is.

If we look under the Canada Assistance Plan at the content of the budget and therefore the content of Bill C–69, we see that the federal government has provided funds to the provinces and the territories on a 50–50 basis, cost–shared for social assistance and social service programs. Social assistance, as I said in basic terms, is income assistance such as welfare. Social services include counselling services, rehabilitation services, homemaker services and child care.

Until this budget, the program had been an open–ended one. There were no ceilings on the amount of shared dollars the federal government was willing to match. Indeed, the measure was need. It was hoped that the provinces with the incentive of 50–50 funding would in fact make sure that those people in each province who required these services would receive them. For every dollar spent by the provincial governments, the federal government would pony–up a dollar in kind.

With the exception of Saskatchewan, all provinces have increased their spending on Canada Assistance Plan cost–shared programs in 1988–89. A 5 per cent growth ceiling for the next two years has been imposed by Bill C–69 on the three wealthiest provinces—British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. All the other provinces and territories are exempt. A saving of $155 million is projected over the two–year period, but is dependent on the actual spending of the three provinces affected.

We have to think a little about what we mean when we say that we are capping the three wealthiest provinces. In fact, British Columbia, the province from which I come, is a wealthy province because, first, it has over taxed its citizens. Second, it has not spent the money that has been required to cover the intent of the Canada Assistance Plan, or the national intent of ensuring that people who are in need in fact will receive what they need.

• (1250)

Approximately 46 per cent or 861,000 people receiving assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan live in the three provinces whose payments are being limited to 5 per cent. Given the finance minister's predicted increase in the levels of unemployment—and we have to think about that—there is every reason to believe that these numbers will increase. We also have to think about Bill C–21 which is going to limit the number of people able to collect unemployment insurance.

Choices by these provincial governments will have to be made on how to handle the increased demand for welfare assistance and social services knowing full well that they will have to take on the full costs once they have reached their cut off.

Ontario has led the way in the average growth of spending under CAP at about 14 per cent, with Saskatchewan and B.C. at the opposite end of the scale at between 2 per cent and 3 per cent, hence my comments about the inadequacy of the welfare program in British Columbia. As the previous speaker said, the governments of British Columbia and Ontario have in fact taken this to the courts with the support of Alberta.

The way things stand now, Ontario will most likely be unwilling to expand existing services or increase its share of funding for native services without the matching federal dollars. Given the rate of inflation and a rise in the cost of providing welfare services due either to a greater demand or a greater delivery cost, these provinces will have to review the priority they give to these programs. They will have to decide if they are willing to increase provincial taxes to provide services at existing levels, or if they will reduce the social services they are providing. I hope, but I do not feel any confidence, that it will not be the second.

Obviously, this can be done in a number of ways. But the one which is likely to take place is the tightening of eligibility requirements, or reducing benefits.

While the government fails once again to introduce a national child care program, it is forcing Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta to choose whether to provide programs and services to those in need or whether to provide child care. What a choice.

On the one hand we have single parent mothers desperate to get out of the welfare system. On the other hand, if that mother goes to work, there is no child care. What kind of trap is this person caught in? On the one hand, she is caught in the welfare cycle. On the other hand, she does not have the support of child care to get out of the cycle and into a decent paying job.

We feel expenditures for child care may be decreased to compensate for the 5 per cent ceiling. Again, the unemployed parent is caught in the squeeze.

Recently we have been bouncing Bill C–21 back and forth. In the study by the Canadian Labour Congress of the effects of UI changes under Bill C–21, it was found that 375,000 beneficiaries will have exhausted their claim before finding a job because of reduced entitlement under the new law. A provincial breakdown makes it even more shocking. Persons not qualifying due to higher entrance requirements and persons losing benefits due to reduced benefit periods in the three provinces are as follows: in Ontario, 117,360 people; in Alberta, 46,450 people; in British Columbia, 59,710 people. A portion of these people will seek social assistance from their province while another portion will find employment, most at low-paying jobs.

The finance minister's projection of increased unemployment levels in the next two years is true. He is predicting 8.2 per cent and 8.5 per cent unemployment in the next few years. Yet the rest of his policies is creating a tightening of the very programs these people will need.

More people will find themselves exhausting or not qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits. We can expect the demand on social assistance and the number of working poor families to increase, and increase dramatically.

While the government continues its crusade to erode Canada's social programs, at the same time it is bringing in legislation to disqualify Canadians from unemployment insurance benefits. It has not brought in child care. It has limited the ability of the provinces to cope with increasing demands for social services. This is not what one would expect when one talks about fairness, when one talks about the kind of Canada that is concerned with all people, the kind of Canada that ensures that everyone has an opportunity to survive.

Social assistance services cannot now meet the demands of low-income Canadians and their families. We have witnessed the rise, as I said earlier, of the number of Canadian families forced to go to food banks. Forty per cent of all food bank users are children—not your child or children, Mr. Speaker, not the children of the members opposite, not the children of members on this side of the House. Very sadly, 40 per cent of the users of food banks are children.

Why is that happening? It is happening because the responsibility of the federal government to provide enough assistance to the provinces is not being undertaken. In fact, the assistance is inadequate. This government has done nothing to help low-income Canadians and has, in fact, abandoned its responsibility to ensure that social assistance programs are available to all of those in need.

I spoke about the fact that welfare rates are not adequate in my home province of British Columbia. I also mentioned why, in my view, this is the case. The British Columbia government is strangling the welfare system and, therefore, is a have or a wealthy province.

I would like to read for the record some statistics that support my claim. In its 1989 report, the Social Planning and Research Council of British Columbia outlines that the shortfalls welfare recipients face each month represent the difference between welfare payments received and the amount calculated to enable an individual or family to fully participate in their community.

The first statistic is for a single male. The shortfall is 83 per cent. The person receives $430 but needs $787. For a couple with no children the shortfall is 59 per cent. The couple receives $732 in welfare payments. They need $1,164. For the single mother with one child the shortfall is 44 per cent. She receives $815, yet needs $1,176. For the single mother with two teenagers the shortfall is 66 per cent. She receives $986, but needs $1,633. For the couple with an infant and toddler the shortfall is 69 per cent. That couple receives $1,038, yet needs $1,753.

These examples are hypothetical, but they are based on provincial averages. They do not take into account the housing crisis in the lower mainland and many other communities in British Columbia that make life for social assistance recipients even more difficult.

The Canada Assistance Plan represents the principle that regardless of where one lives in Canada, whether it is on Vancouver Island, in the lower mainland of British Columbia, in Fort St. John, Yellowknife, Whitehorse, Edmonton or a farm in the rural part of the prairie provinces, Regina—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 20 minutes remaining in her speech should we come back to this bill after three o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to point out the deplorable state of summer employment programs for our post-secondary students.

This government has cut funding to the SEED program, the summer employment program for students, to the tune of $41 million or 35 per cent for the next year. Since 1985 we have seen the government's contributions to this program steadily decline from $149 million to $71 million. The number of jobs created has declined from over 87,000 to 71,000 over the last four years. These further cuts will mean that another 24,000 students will be without a summer job this year.

All this seems rather odd when we consider that since 1985, tuition fees have nearly doubled and living expenses have skyrocketed. With the cut-backs to transfer payments, we can expect this trend to continue. Yet, the SEED program provides students with only 10 weeks of work when they are available for 16 weeks, at an average hourly wage of $5.73.

It is also disheartening to see that the Minister of Employment claims that the unemployment rate for these students is at 4.7 per cent when Statistics Canada tells us that it is at 10.2 per cent.

If there was any doubt that university and college students have the lowest disposable incomes of any segment of society, the government, through its actions has made this very clear. Students do not want handouts. All they want is a decent summer job.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

FILM INDUSTRY

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate Montreal cinematographer Denys Arcand for the success of his latest production, Jésus de Montréal, which ranked him among nominees for best foreign film at the 62nd Oscar awards presentation last night in the United States.

After walking away with last year's Cannes Festival Jury and Ecumenical Prizes and recently receiving 13 of the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television Genie awards, Mr. Arcand has gained international recognition as a result of his film being among finalists at the American Oscar presentation.

The competence, excellence and creativity of the artist extend beyond our borders. We stand very proud, as do all men and women who work in the Canadian film industry. These awards inspire young Canadian film producers and encourage them to strive for international appreciation.

Again, Mr. Speaker, my heartiest congratulations to Mr. Denys Arcand.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I hope I speak on behalf of all members when I say that in Lithuania, President Gorbachev is teetering on the edge of forfeiting his most valuable asset, which is his reputation as a man of peace.

The people of Lithuania, in a free and fair election, elected a government, many of whom are communists, that seeks to re-establish Lithuanian independence. Instead of calling this process invalid, which it is not, President Gorbachev should sit down with Lithuanian President Vytautas Landsbergis and begin to negotiate the implementation of independence.

This will take time, and Lithuania should be prepared to take the time to accommodate Soviet economic and security interests in return for recognition. But they cannot negotiate with someone who does not recognize their right to declare their independence in the first place. Instead, they are forced to demonstrate rather than negotiate their independence, which only provokes the Soviet Union. Yet this provocation is of Mr. Gorbachev's own making by his refusal to negotiate.

I therefore call on the Soviet Union to negotiate, to respect the democratic will of the Lithuanian people, to renounce the use of force, to give full freedom to the international press in Lithuania, and to declare an end to arrests of Lithuanian deserters from the Soviet Armed Forces, as it is well known that Lithuanian conscripts were often in fear of their lives even before recent events, and would be even more so now.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on the airwaves of Radio-Nord in Noranda, a journalist discussed regional development with the Liberal Member for LaSalle—Émard who was visiting Noranda on March 12 last. In reply to the journalist's comment: "When we are told that a lot of money is being spent in regional development, we remain quite sceptical", the Liberal Member said: "You have every reason to be sceptical with Tory Governments which never keep their words."

Mr. Speaker, this Liberal Member is unaware of the progress made in the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on Regional Economic Development which was signed on June 9, 1988. I should like to emphasize that on March 12, the Conservative members respected this agreement and that this Government had already spent under this agreement $259.3 million, or 58.9 per cent, and the Quebec Government $7.6 million, or 2 per cent. As to the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area, it has already received a portion of that budget.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, today a delegation of Cree and Inuit from Great Whale River are in Ottawa. In a boat they built for the occasion, they will journey to New York City to protest the James Bay II hydroelectric project which would flood 5,000 square kilometres of land, contaminate water and fish with mercury, damage marine mammals and migratory birds, and hurt the economy and lifestyle of Cree and Inuit people in northern Quebec.

Following the federal court's decision on the Oldman dam, the federal government should exercise its powers and hold public hearings before it is too late. This government must start practising what it preaches on sustainable development. Federal public hearings to study the environmental and social impacts of James Bay II are a must!

We do not want to see the Canadian northern environment destroyed to feed the insatiable energy demands of south of the border.

SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, today the Jewish Students' Network and NAHON, a group of 200 students from all across Canada are in Ottawa for their annual lobby day.

The group, led by Stephen Granovsky, Dan Ronen and Pam Scheininger are meeting with many members of the House of Commons. This year there is an urgent call for action due to the large backlog of Soviet Jews seeking to have exit visas and the recent rise in anti-Semitism.

Recently, we heard of the suspension by Hungarian airlines of all flights to Israel due to threats of terrorism by various extremist pro-Arab groups.

The Government of Canada has always supported the cause of Soviet Jewry and I, as chairman of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for Soviet Jewry, along with all members of this House, call on the Government of the Soviet Union to speed up the process of emigration by permitting direct passage of Jews to Israel and to exploit all possible safe exit routes to the Jewish homeland.

I commend the work of Network and NAHON for bringing this issue to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada and I join with them in renewing our pledge to the Jewish people of the Soviet Union.

FISHERIES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the fish process workers at Cape Breton feel betrayed. They were told that the situation at the Cape Breton fish plants was not going to be that bad. First, they were told that in addition to the saltfish operation, North Sydney would have the overflow fish from Louisbourg. This was going to mean that the wet fish operation was going to be able to continue in North Sydney.

Now National Sea states that it is going to close Louisbourg from the end of July until November, three months. What overflow is there going to be now for the people in North Sydney? The fish plant operators in Cape Breton are very concerned about further lay-offs adding to the already bad work situation on Cape Breton Island. The fish plant workers are going to Halifax to protest and they ask the government to make it known to National Sea to come clean with the workers, to give them some security, to stand by their word and not change their minds from day to day and to provide the fish plant workers in Cape Breton with fair treatment so that they can get on with their lives and raise their families accordingly.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, prairie farmers are in a desperate economic plight. Their livelihoods are being ravaged as the result of unfair grain export subsidies by the Europeans and the Americans. Everyone agrees that an emergency aid package of at least $500 million is urgently required if farmers are to be able to seed this year's crops.

Yesterday, prairie agriculture ministers met to discuss this crisis. They indicated that the emergency aid package is a federal responsibility because the causes of the immediate problem arise from an international situation over which the provincial governments have no influence.

Prairie farm families are distraught. Their very survival hangs in the balance while the Deputy Prime Minister and his provincial counterparts continue to wrangle behind closed doors about who should pay what.

We call on the federal government to set aside its differences with the provinces over this issue and make an immediate payment before seeding to ensure farm families have a chance of survival.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the recent events in Lithuania are causing much anxiety and raising a great many questions among the Canadian people. The men and women of Lithuanian descent in my Outremont riding are no exception and they have asked me to appeal to the Canadian Government and people and urge them to support the stand taken by the Lithuanian Government over the past few days.

Apparently, the independence of the country is at stake.

• (1410)

Canada's recognition of that government will have a profound effect at this crucial time and will be fully consistent with Canada's proud international record.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add that the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed the very deep concern of the Canadian people over the increase in military activity during the past few days in an official letter which was addressed and delivered today to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the USSR.

In concluding his letter, Mr. Clark urged that a process of constructive and peaceful dialogue be established, one which would reflect the legitimate aspirations of the Lithuanian people.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, as a New Brunswicker and an Atlantic Canadian, I was pleased and proud that a fellow traveller, Premier Frank McKenna, seized the initiative to deal with the despairing difficulty of holding our nation together.

Premier McKenna understands full well the dangers currently besetting our frail confederation and the sickening consequences should the confederation crumble. It is unfortunate that another in the region is prepared to risk—for questionable motives—the country.

Surely all Canadians of good will, worthy of the name, will fervently pull together to ensure that the prejudice and intolerances of yesterday will be discarded and buried today so this magnificent country will continue to thrive, reinforcing our determination to honour the trust placed in our hands by our forefathers to pass on intact to our children and theirs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, this House and Canadians everywhere have been most critical of the government's job-creation policies, and with great justification. Now we have further proof of the illogic that is so pervasive in this Cabinet.

Over the next three years, 50 positions, primarily clerical, will be transferred from the Veterans Affairs office in Toronto to Kirkland Lake. The alleged reason is the difficulty in attracting qualified people to the Toronto office. But the only people who will qualify for those jobs in the north are precisely those people who occupy the jobs today. There are no new jobs being created. The people who hold them do not want to lose them.

New jobs are not created in town A by depriving people in town B. Equally important is what will happen to the level of service in the Toronto region office and the 87,000 veterans it serves. Many ask how their services will be maintained by an office that will now be several hundred kilometres away. Veterans will suffer extreme hardship.

On their behalf, I call on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to reconsider this regrettable decision to relocate.

PARKS CANADA

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, as I would have risen last week had I been here, to join with the Secretary of State for Canada, the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia, and others calling upon the minister responsible for Parks Canada to immediately rescind the policy that excludes those who are not white Caucasian males from participating in historical animations at Parks Canada sites, in particular at the Halifax Citadel.

One appreciates Parks Canada's commitment to accurate historical re-enactment, but surely it is a misguided interpretation of the concept to suggest that the ability to act should be assessed on the basis of the same discriminatory guidelines that existed in the British army a century and a half ago. Surely it is more appropriate to apply the values of 1990 and the employment practices they imply.

I would suggest that unless Parks Canada can arrange to bring back the original Highlanders and artillery men, they should recognize that substitutes are at best actors and that they should be fairly chosen.

COMMUNITY AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the week of March 25 to 31 has been proclaimed Community Awareness Week in Prince Edward Island.

This week allows individuals in their communities to reflect upon the importance of voluntary organizations and to recognize their significance.

Volunteer activity in my province is part of our way of life. This is why I believe our communities flourish. There are over 200 volunteer residents who serve on community councils in my riding of Malpeque.

Moreover, there are over 400 organizations, clubs and associations on the Island that promote volunteer activity and community awareness.

Groups such as industrial commissions, community advisory boards, recreation and service organizations, to name a few, all share in creating communities that are unique.

I know that all members will join with me in commending my province for recognizing the services of those individuals and organizations during Community Awareness Week.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, women in Newfoundland, who have had 100 per cent of the core funding of their seven women's centres cut, are still occupying Secretary of State offices in Newfoundland. They were there yesterday, all night, and they are still there. Women in Vancouver are holding a solidarity protest on the west coast. They demand, and the New Democrats demand, that core funding to all women's centres be reinstated immediately. They demand an immediate meeting with the Secretary of State and the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

Why do women in this country have to occupy government offices day and night, from sea to sea, in an attempt to be listened to by this government? And why is the Tory government still ignoring them?

When will the Secretary of State meet with these women? When will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women meet with these women? When will this government stop trying to silence the voices of women in this country?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISCAL POLICY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister recently said that interest rates in this country would be going down. The finance minister in his budget stated clearly that the rate would be reduced during this year. However, yesterday, the Bank of Canada Governor in his annual report indicated that he was totally committed to his high interest rate policy.

My question to the Minister of Finance is very simple. Does the Minister of Finance still stand by the projections and conclusions contained in his budget in light of clear evidence that his interest rate projection was very unrealistic?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the interest rate projection as it affects the deficit for fiscal 1990–91 relates to that fiscal year, and that does not start until this Sunday. We still have 12 months to go before we see what the impact of interest rates will be.

What the Governor of the Bank of Canada said yesterday is that he is totally committed to a policy which will reduce inflation in this country. Once we get inflation down, we will see reductions in interest rates. That is perfectly consistent with everything that I have said both publicly as well as in the budget documents.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Surely he must recognize now that the outlook and economic indicators contained in his budget were obviously wrong. My question is this: In view of the fact that almost everybody agrees that his projections as far as interest rates over the next 12 months are concerned are not realistic, does he still claim that his budgetary conclusions are right and reflect the true reality?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker. I feel that the projections that we put in the budget were realistic projections. As I indicated at that time, they are consistent with the projections that a private sector economist group had put together. We monitor this group on an ongoing basis. Our projection for this year, as I recall, was one tenth of one per cent higher than the average of a group of private sector economists. As I indicated earlier, we still have the full year ahead of us. Let us not draw any sharp conclusions here.

I can remind the hon. member of 1986 when the same type of question was being asked by members on the Liberal side. We had an interest rate projection, I believe, of 9.5 per cent. Interest rates were about 12 per cent at the time. In fact, we came in with an average rate of 9.1 or 9.2 per cent. So we still have 12 months ahead of us.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, looking at the last 12 months, the minister at this time last year was telling us we should be enjoying interest rates at about 10 per cent at this stage of the game.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that the Bank of Canada Governor has stated that his high interest rate policy so far has failed to control inflation to the extent that he would like to have it controlled, in view of the fact that he is going to require high unemployment rates to be able to do better, as he has promised to do in 1990, and in view of the fact that in his own budget documents the minister has predicted higher unemployment in Canada in the next 12 months and a slower rate of economic growth, is his government going to allow the Governor of the Bank of Canada to continue his obsession with zero inflation and drive this country into a recession? Is that the policy of the government?

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if we on this side of the House have any obsession, it is an obsession with avoiding the problems that we got into in the late 1970s and the early 1980s.

I remind the hon. member that at that time, the government of the day, the party that he supports, ignored the problem of inflation and swept it under the carpet. It let inflation go from 5 to 6 to 8 to 10 to 13 per cent. That led to the high interest rates in early 1981 and 1982. It was that high level of interest rate that led to the depression of 1982.

We want to avoid that problem. That was a very difficult lesson for all of us to learn. That is the lesson we want to remember and stop the problem of inflation today so that we do not run into the problems that we ran into in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister knows how anxious Poland is to be a part of the coming discussions dealing in particular with Germany's eventual reunification. The Minister certainly will agree they have good reasons for that, because for too long a time, they had no say in their fate. Is the Canadian Government ready to use all its influence to ensure that Poland's borders will remain inviolable?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just held worth while discussions with Prime Minister Mazowiecki of Poland, here on an informal visit, and the matter of Poland's borders has been discussed.

[English]

We outlined very clearly the position of the Government of Canada that Poland should be able to live in the secure knowledge that the existing boundaries will be respected and that that reality should be expressed in an international legal instrument to be negotiated as early as possible. We also discussed practical ways in which Canada might contribute to that turn of events being achieved.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Minister just referred to a meeting between the two Prime Ministers. Has the Prime Minister taken the opportunity of the Polish Prime Minister's visit to extend to that country a package of economic assistance greater still than the one that was announced? In particular, is the Canadian Government ready to grant Poland a special status among members of the Warsaw Pact? Is the Canadian Government ready to partially—and perhaps even completely—write off the debt Poland has accumulated over the years with our country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada already has acted to grant Poland significant debt relief. However, the two Prime Ministers have discussed other options open to us. Poland's Prime Minister has indicated he needs Canadian assistance in three areas in particular—technology, training, and of course the matter of debt. We have agreed to look at how Canada can develop a policy to reduce Poland's debt. The Deputy Prime Minister will be in Poland for a visit during the weekend—he is leaving Friday. Canada's Finance Minister will also go there in the coming weeks to hold detailed discussions on the debt matter with Poland's representatives.

FISCAL POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in tabling his annual report, warned that interest rates could go even higher in the months that lie ahead. That means that the deficit forecast of the Minister of Finance could be much higher than he predicted in his budget a few weeks ago in the House. In the recent budget, the minister in effect passed the buck to the provinces to pay for the increased cost of servicing the large debt.

When he meets with his provincial colleagues later on tonight, will the Minister of Finance be in a position where he will take on Governor Crow and say that the monetary policy he followed in the last year was wrong, it did not bring down inflation, and has got this country into more serious trouble than before he began with that policy, or will he once again submit to the wishes of Governor Crow and pass the increase in interest rates along to the provinces once again?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Governor of the Bank of Canada and I are of the same view that we are both disappointed that there was a degree of increase in the level of inflation last year and that has continued on to this year.

We have tried over the past couple of years to contain the rates of inflation. If we had had lower interest rates and interest rates which were unnaturally lower, we would have had an even higher level of inflation today and that would have led to even higher levels of interest rates.

It is important for us to understand that this is the best way that we can get inflation under control, and as we get inflation under control we will be able to see interest rates down on a permanent basis.

The simple solutions that my colleague continues to propose simply will not work, because if interest rates are reduced in an unnatural way it compounds the problem and leads to a more permanent level of higher interest rates, a more permanent loss of our competitive position, and a more permanently higher level of unemployment.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will give the minister a concrete way that he can bring down inflation because he said he is of the same view as Mr. Crow. Yesterday Mr. Crow said that he is concerned that wage increases have escalated sharply and were inflationary. In the last two years they have averaged about a 5 per cent increase per year.

Would the minister not agree that it is terribly hypocritical or sets a bad example when the government has agreed to increase the salary of Mr. Crow as Governor of the Bank of Canada by as much as 21 per cent per year for each of the last three years. Doesn't that set a bad example in this country when Mr. Crow's salary goes up by as much as 21 per cent per year and the minister agrees with Mr. Crow that 5 per cent per year for ordinary Canadians is inflationary? Is that not a bad example?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the record of this government in controlling wage settlements and controlling the amounts of money that are paid to our senior public servants is a responsible one and one that is in keeping with our desire to keep inflation down. I have said on many occasions that if we as Canadians do not take more out of the economy than it is able to provide for us then we are going to be able to control inflation and as we do that we will be able to get interest rates down.

[Translation]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question at all. I have asked questions. Mr. Crow said yesterday that 5 per cent was too high a wage increase for the Canadian workers. However, Mr. Crow's own salary has gone up by maybe 21 per cent each year in the last three years. Does the minister agree that such a large increase in Mr. Crow's case is setting a rather bad example for the Canadian people? Does he approve of his government's policy in that field? If he does not, why is it then that the government has allowed, throught its policy, such a raise to be given to Mr. Crow? And why does he condemn modest salary increases for Canadian workers? Why indeed, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that we do not discuss the specific salaries of any of our senior public servants. The range of those salaries is established by a private sector advisory group. It is the responsibility of the government to apply those salaries within the range that has been provided to us by the outside advisors.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs will be meeting with the Canadian Lithuanian community right after Question Period today.

We also know from a press conference held this morning that the Canadian Lithuanian community will be presenting an urgent appeal to the Government of Canada, and I quote from the press release, "to recognize immediately the Government of Lithuania as the legitimate government of the independent republic and to offer to send diplomats there as observers."

Would the minister share with the House what response he will give to the Canadian Lithuanian community and to all of Canada, considering the threat of military intervention if such recognition by other countries is not given?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary secretary had an opportunity earlier today to meet with representatives of Lithuanian Canadians in Ottawa, and I hope to have the opportunity myself later in the day to meet with them.

As the hon. member and other members of the House know, it is the view of Canada, and I think a view broadly shared in the House, that we want to have the de facto independence of Lithuania established by negotiation. We encourage both the Lithuanian and Soviet parties to follow that course.

This morning I called in the chargé d'affaires of the Soviet Union—the ambassador is out of town—to express to him personally our very deep concern about the events overnight in Lithuanian. I reminded him of the undertakings given to me and to the Prime Minister personally by leaders of the Soviet Union that there would be no crackdown. I expressed concern that the actions of the Soviet Union recently seemed to indicate that its policy might be proceeding in a different direction and that if that were the case it would have very regrettable implications for the relations between Canada and the Soviet Union.

We hope that both sides will return to the pursuit of a solution to this situation by negotiation.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, according to the news release circulated this morning at the press conference, which was supported by ten national ethnocultural organizations across Canada, the appeal of the Lithuanian community to the minister included a request that the Government of Canada demand that no Soviet forces be used to overthrow the legitimate government, that these forces be withdrawn immediately, and that Canada offer emergency supplies of food and fuel to Lithuania if the Soviet Government tries to starve out the republic.

Will the right hon. minister at least commit his government to these very reasonable requests for humanitarian aid?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the responsible course for the government and Parliament of Canada is to encourage both the Soviet Union and the elected leaders of Lithuania to proceed by way of negotiation.

We are very troubled by the events that have occurred in recent hours—overnight and this morning—in Lithuania. We have made that concern clear to the Soviet Union. We hope that our concern and influence, coupled with that of other nations which have encouraged with such determination the processes of perestroika and glasnost in the Soviet Union, may cause the Soviet Union to return to a course of negotiation which would mean that we would not have to contemplate the kinds of steps that were referred to in the press release quoted by the hon. member.

I have had discussions with members of the House privately with regard to steps that Canada might take to contribute constructively to the situation. I hope to continue those consultations, and I give an undertaking to the House that Canada will continue to respond to this situation in a responsible way.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade and it concerns yesterday's closing of the Southam-Murray printing plant in my riding which employs some 500 people. In eliminating these jobs the company cited "the new North American market" as one factor.

Given that no new adjustment assistance program has been introduced since the free trade agreement, will the government now honour the commitment of the Prime Minister who promised Canadians three days after the last federal election that his government would "ensure innovative and generous adjustment and retraining programs for individual Canadian workers"?

Will the minister now offer that generous assistance to the 500 employees in my riding who have just lost their livelihood?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the graphics arm of Southam announced that it plans to restructure its web printing operations and to shut the aging Weston plant which affects some 500 employees. Some 280 of those employees will lose their jobs while the remainder will retain their jobs in the Toronto area.

At the same time the hon. member forgot to mention that the company announced that it was expanding and modernizing its operations in Orillia, Ontario and in Candiac, Quebec and shifting Toronto area production to those facilities. That will result in the creation of 160 jobs at the Orillia plant and another 60 in Candiac.

There is a net loss of 60 jobs which is unfortunate, but this is because the company has not been doing well in its printing operations and therefore is consolidating and attempting to unload lower profit operations. The situation is not as bad as it has been painted.

I might say that the Canadian printing industry association is indicating that the industry is getting itself in a position so it can compete not only in the United States but internationally. The industry itself is already attracting business from major centres in the U.S., including

New York, Boston, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. In the meantime, all regular adjustment programs will be applied to the 60 jobs affected and to those who lose their jobs in Toronto.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The closing of this plant is not an isolated incident in the printing industry. Photo Engravers of Toronto, 450 jobs; Novalis of Ottawa, 41 jobs; Le Droit Groupe in Montreal, 63 groups; Transcontinental of Winnipeg, 50 jobs; and now the Southam plant in Weston, Ontario will be cutting 500 jobs in my riding.

Why did the government not heed the warnings and concern of the printing industry in regard to the job displacements resulting from this government's FTA?

When will this minister and this government have the decency to come to the aid of workers who have been displaced through no fault of their own, as was promised by the Prime Minister three days after a general election fought on the FTA?

He promised displaced workers that he would come to their aid with a generous package. Where is that package? Where is the commitment? Will this government come clean with displaced workers in this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is very regrettable that intellectual honesty is not a characteristic of the Official Opposition.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Come on. That is why you're at 17 per cent, John.

Mr. Crosbie: There is no honesty, intellectual or otherwise, in the Official Opposition, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: How would you know? Try for 15 per cent next week.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has not singled out any one member but seems to have included them all. That is not appropriate. Would the hon. minister put his answer in more civil terms.

Mr. Crosbie: I withdraw the remark. I know all hon. members opposite are honest.

From the end of December 1988 to the end of December 1989, 258,000 jobs were created over all in Canada; a net increase. In January another 65,000 jobs were created; a net increase. This comes from Statistics Canada's seasonally adjusted series.

When the hon. gentleman cites these cases he is being completely misleading. There has been a magnificent increase in jobs in the last 13 months.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and is with regard to the James Bay II hydroelectric project.

As the minister knows, this project was discussed by the energy panel at Globe 90 in Vancouver last week, where it was revealed that the potential energy savings in the Quebec hydro system are larger in volume and in value than could be provided by the James Bay II project. This means that Premier Bourassa is asking Quebecers to accept billions in hydro debt and severe environmental damage when an opportunity exists for direct benefits to individual Quebec consumers of hydroelectricity.

Since the minister knows all of that, will he demonstrate leadership this week and subject the entire project to a full environmental impact assessment which includes an evaluation of the cost benefits of energy options to the project?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we all know that this project is very important for the development of the economy of Quebec and Canada. That being said, the government has made a public commitment to apply extensively the requirements of the EARP process and make sure that there will be a full public review and public hearings on this project.

We are currently discussing with the Quebec government and Hydro Quebec the possibility of entering into an agreement to set up a joint process of assessment which will avoid duplication and allow a full and efficient assessment of the project. This joint process will be more or less tailored on what we did in the Al-Pac case in Alberta.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has already prejudiced the public hearings by saying that this is an important project for the province of Quebec and suggesting it is going to go ahead.

The James Bay project has already affected Cree and Inuit communities. As a result trap lines have been flooded, migratory birds have been diverted, fish have been poisoned with mercury, and even the beluga whales in Hudson Bay have been affected.

If a dam project like this had been built with the same impacts on Montreal or Quebec City, the minister would be responding to voices of outrage across Canada and cancelling the project even before an environmental impact statement had been drafted.

Given the serious known impacts of this project, will the minister use his power to have the Great Whale project stopped even before it goes to an environmental impact process?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are people who are biased and prejudiced against the environment. Others are biased and prejudiced against development and job creation. My honorable colleague is one of those who have something against job creation in Canada and against the development of this country. Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of this government to endorse sustainable development, which means that we will be harmonizing the development of the country with the promotion of the environment. That is what we are doing throughout the country and we are confident that we will have to take steps and will take steps so that, in the case of the Great-Whale project, the federal government will exercise its powers and jurisdiction fully to ensure that all environmental factors will be thoroughly evaluated against its requirements.

FORESTRY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

The minister knows, as do most Canadians, that the original FRDAs negotiated with the provinces showed a lot of foresight. The agreements have demonstrated irrefutably that they have been of value to the environment as well as to the economy. People across Canada want to see a renewal of these agreements. The agreement is going to expire in B.C. at the end of this week. It would be inconceivable if it were not renewed.

Would the Minister of Forestry give us his assurance that he and this government are committed to the renewal of that agreement?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my colleague's question draws attention to the impressive results that have been achieved, as he mentions, with the first generation of Forest Resource Development Agreements, not only in terms of the jobs they created but the rehabilitation of our commercial forests. A lot of people have looked at these FRDAs as perhaps the largest environmental rehabilitation program the country has ever undertaken.

Unfortunately I am not in a position today to announce the renewal of the agreement in British Columbia, but my hon. friend knows that the agreement with New Brunswick has been completed, the agreement with Nova Scotia has been completed, and discussions are going very well with the other provinces. There still remains a very strong federal commitment to the renewal of these agreements.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Grand Chief Matthew Coon Come of the Grand Council of the Cree of Quebec said today that the Canadian environment cannot be destroyed to meet the insatiable energy demands of New York.

We have heard repeatedly for over a year about an environmental assessment of the James Bay II project. Will the minister now give his personal assurance to all Canadians that no part of the James Bay II project will start before the full environmental impact is tested by the federal government independently, thoroughly, and openly?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can and I will reconfirm the commitment of this government to apply fully the requirements of the EARP process.

As we know, the scope of the EARP is very large and has sweeping effects. We will use it extensively because we think that the Quebec government has almost accepted the principle which will be the base or the foundation of the joint process we are to set up.

I can assure our colleague whose concerns are quite legitimate, because this is a huge project with large environmental impacts, that they will be fully assessed before the project is proceeded with.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I seem to hear an echo of things I have heard many times.

All people who truly believe that we have borrowed this earth from our children join with the Cree and Inuit people of Great Whale River in their journey to stop the devastation of their lands. No one more than the Minister of the Environment has a responsibility that we pass on a clean and fruitful earth to the next generation.

I ask again: When will the environmental assessment review process start? When will the minister take an unequivocal stand on behalf of the Canadian environment?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had the impression that my answer to her question was some kind of echo. It is simply because we give the same answers to the same questions. So, the question that was just repeated, Mr. Speaker, is: "Is the federal government conscious of the tremendous environmental impacts of the James Bay project? Will the federal government assume all of its responsibilities?" The answer is yes, and I am sure that we will soon be in a position to announce that, in conjunction with the Quebec government, or alone, if need be, we are starting an environmental impact assessment process.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Pearson International Airport is simply not working efficiently. It can only handle safely 70 flights an hour, which is grossly inefficient considering its vast equipment.

The air space around Pearson is congested because of the government's policy of deregulation. Security is weak, and this at the busiest airport in Canada; in fact one of the busiest airports in the world.

What is this minister going to do to correct this unacceptable and potentially dangerous situation?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my friend will be aware that during the 17 years that the Liberal government was in power there were no changes to the facilities at Pearson.

However, since 1984 we have commissioned Terminal 3 at no cost to the taxpayer. I toured it on Saturday. It should be ready on schedule in September. We have commissioned the Environmental Assessment Review Panel for new runways, and all of the other problems that we can tackle are being tackled.

This is part of a southern Ontario strategy which we are working on. We have not finished it, but it is entrain.

• (1450)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for those answers, but those solutions are long term. Last year the near misses at Pearson increased by almost 66 per cent over 1988.

Recently, while you and I, Mr. Speaker, were sitting in a secured area, an alarm went off. It was over 15 and a half minutes before somebody responded to this breach of security in a secured area at Pearson Airport.

Pearson Airport is simply not efficient. It is not working on the inside. It is not working on the outside. We are still playing Russian roulette with the air traveller in Canada.

When is the minister going to do something about these situations?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the system is working and it is working safely. The facilities that you let lapse—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: The airport processed 14 million passengers in 1984 and 21 million passengers in 1989. I think it is doing a good job.

URANIUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his capacity as the minister in charge of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada.

Evidence is mounting daily all around the world, including the recent Gardner report in Britain and the BEIR V report in the United States, that what had previously been thought to be acceptable radiation levels in fact constitute a real threat to the public and workers in the nuclear industry.

I am sure the minister is aware that, as a result of this evidence, the International Commission on Radiological Protection has recommended drastic cuts in the allowable limits world-wide, recommendations the AECB has basically scoffed at.

Will the minister listen to Canadian workers who today called on him to respond publicly to the BEIR V report and the Gardner report, to cut drastically those limits for workers in the public immediately, and to convene a national public inquiry into the occupational and environmental safety of the uranium mining industry?

Is the minister prepared to take action on these very legitimate requests now?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, obviously the safety of workers and the safety of the Canadian public are paramount in the government's considerations. I will take a look at the requests that have been made which were conveyed by the hon. member.

AECB guidelines and regulations are very strictly enforced. If they need to be changed, that can be examined through the due process by which changes have been made in the past.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, AECB's record in making changes and looking at evidence has been abysmal, going all the way back to what has happened at Elliot Lake through the years, and certainly what we saw happen at Wollaston Lake.

Does the minister intend to take seriously the demonstrated need for reduced radiation limits and an inquiry into the uranium industry now or after thousands more Canadians are needlessly exposed to dangerous radiation levels?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, comments like that by the hon. member are neither substantiated nor should they be made by a responsible member in the House of Commons.

First, Canadian standards meet world levels. Second, we are a member of the International Energy Agency which is headquartered in Vienna. We are members of that international organization.

In principle members of the NDP are opposed to nuclear energy. Second, including the hon. member, they want the jobs in their backyards, namely in uranium mining. Third, they get up on their hind legs when there are closures at Elliot Lake. They want all that, but in the meantime they also want to deprecate the position of nuclear energy.

Nuclear energy is a valid option for energy in Canada. It has to be met with the strictest regulations which are enforced by the AECB.

Maybe the hon. member should go back to his riding and talk to some of the workers about the jobs and the safety standards the AECB is enforcing. His charges today were unfounded and dangerous.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When Romanian Bishop Laszlo Tokes met with the Prime Minister last week he asked that Canada send neutral observers to monitor the elections in his country on May 20 so as to make sure that they are carried out in a free and democratic manner. As a matter of fact, this request will be echoed tomorrow in a document bearing 5,000 signatures which is to be presented to the Prime Minister by Canada's Romanian communities.

Would the minister tell us how the Canadian government intends to handle these requests?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, elections are to be held in Romania on May 20, and Romanian government officials have indicated that they are prepared to play host to foreign observers.

[English]

As the hon. member has indicated, there was a request made of the Prime Minister. As a result, Sir, of a meeting which you convened last week, there have been discussions among the three parties regarding the composition of an all-party delegation that might go to Romania in advance of the elections and stay there through the election period.

We think that would be a useful contribution that Canada could make and are looking forward to working with members of the House to ensure that that Canadian parliamentary delegation is able to function effectively in Romania.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. He will know that last Friday the Fisheries Council of Canada released a report prepared by the Oceans Institute on the subject of overfishing in the north west Atlantic.

The report said something that we have been saying for a long time, that the time has come for the Prime Minister to demonstrate some leadership on this particular issue, make it a priority, and take it to the highest diplomatic levels.

Does the right hon. minister accept one of the recommendations of the report, namely that the government ought to convene this year an international symposium in an effort to resolve the serious problem of foreign overfishing beyond the 200-mile limit?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to give the whole story of the report of the Fisheries Council of Canada, it also commended the government for taking very seriously the threats to the Canadian fishing industry that were posed by foreign overfishing.

The Prime Minister has been in touch with leaders of the European Community. My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I have been involved actively on the file. The Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be meeting with leaders of the European Community in Dublin, Ireland, next week.

With regard to the specific proposal, that is a matter on which we have already begun action. We have had discussions with other countries that are interested in the Law of the Sea with an eye to beginning the kind of preparations that may lead in an international regime that will achieve the results sought by the Fisheries Council.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Burin—St. George's on a short supplemental.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister has some familiarity with the report.

Would he comment on the suggestion in the report that some drastic measures are required to deal with this issue, including, if necessary, arrest and prosecution; in other words, unilateral jurisdiction of the 200-mile limit to give Canada functional control of the transboundary stocks? Does he agree with that recommendation and what in particular is the government doing to achieve that extension?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in effect I have answered that question with regard to the discussions that Canada has initiated—and I underline "that Canada has initiated"—regarding extending international regimes that are in place.

The hon. member will know as well as anyone in the House that there is no point in Canada taking unilateral actions which will either have no standing in international law or will not have effect in the circumstances. What needs to be done, on the one hand, is to persuade the Europeans to begin to respect the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization regime and, on the other hand, to try to enlarge the effectiveness of international law. That is what we are doing.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister himself has said that research and development and the resulting innovation are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country. Yesterday in his absence his government defeated a motion that would have recognized the need for Canada to increase its level of research and development.

Will the government now admit that it has given up any hope of increasing Canada's research and development performance?

• (1500)

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, we have not.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada and the scientific community have the right to expect the government to show leadership in scientific research and development. Yesterday the Minister for Science refused to repeat the Prime Minister's commitment to boost research and development to 2.5 per cent of the gross domestic product. Is the government prepared to show some leadership and, if so, what is the specific objective of its science policy?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the concrete goal of our policy is really very clear. It is our intention—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Winegard: It is our intention to make this country competitive, and to do that, you not only need a significant R and D effort, you also need to look at all those issues which make us non-competitive, something that previous governments never thought of.

We intend to look at these issues, sector by sector, industry by industry, and ask them what is wrong and why can't they increase their amount of R and D. When we have the answer to those issues, we will know what to do. We will not be just throwing money at the problem, which is always the hon. member's solution.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. House Leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the House for a moment or two. It is the intention of the Prime Minister to lead off the debate, but the Prime Minister has been meeting with the Prime Minister of Poland who is visiting Ottawa this day. I am informed that the Prime Minister will be here in a moment or two. Perhaps we could suspend until the Prime Minister arrives.

I have just been informed the Prime Minister will be here in five minutes. With the indulgence of the House, perhaps we could suspend the sitting until he is here. Or I will answer any questions hon. members might have, in the meantime!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: That is an invitation that may be taken up.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to recognize that the Prime Minister would want to lead off this important debate. Since we are waiting for a few minutes, I wonder if we could have unanimous consent of the House to continue with Question Period until the Prime Minister arrives.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. House Leader of the New Democratic Party will give us some assurance that these will be reasonable questions, of course, I have no objection.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think I have a very constructive suggestion to make to the House. Maybe we could have a period of answers, good answers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

He said: Mr. Speaker, in my speech to the nation Thursday evening, I announced I would introduce a motion in the House of Commons to refer Premier McKenna's companion resolution to a special committee of the House. I rise today to fulfil that commitment.

The matter is urgent. There are now fewer than 90 days to ratify the Meech Lake Accord.

It is worth recalling that 10 provincial Premiers, representing four political parties, and the leaders of the three federal parties here in the House of Commons, endorsed the Meech Lake Accord; that eight provincial legislatures have already ratified the Accord and that this House of Commons has twice passed it with overwhelming majorities.

It may be helpful, Mr. Speaker, to briefly recall how we as Canadians and as Parliamentarians got to this particular point.

In 1980, Quebecers were promised a renewed federalism if they voted against sovereignty association in the referendum. In November 1981, the then Prime Minister and nine premiers signed a Constitutional Accord. Only Quebec was left out.

The Government of Quebec, as a consequence, did not participate actively in Constitutional reform and systematically invoked the notwithstanding clause to exempt all of its legislation from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In 1985 a new government of federalist persuasion was elected in Quebec, led by Mr. Robert Bourassa of the Liberal Party of Quebec. Its premier set out a position based on five moderate proposals which, he said, were a basis for Quebec's finally endorsing the Constitution.

In August, 1986, a few months later, the ten premiers met in Edmonton for their annual conference. They declared in a communique—and I quote, because it is of particular importance—that they:

—unanimously agreed that their top constitutional priority is to embark immediately upon a federal–provincial process, using Quebec's five proposals as a basis for discussion, to bring about Quebec's full and active participation in the Canadian Federation.

The Edmonton Declaration then went on to say:

> There was a consensus among the Premiers that then—
>
> The reintegration of Quebec having been achieved.
> —they will pursue further constitutional discussions on matters raised by some provinces, which will include, amongst other items, Senate reform, fisheries, property rights, etc.

Nine months later, after extensive negotiations and consultations, the First Ministers met at Meech Lake and worked out an Accord which was subsequently formalized on June 3, 1987, with the Langevin Agreement.

The Meech Lake Accord makes good the promise to Quebecers in 1980, delivers Quebec's full endorsement of the Constitution Act 1982, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and fulfils the commitment made in Edmonton. Those are major achievements, Mr. Speaker. Those are historic achievements that have been endorsed by this House in the past and I trust will be endorsed by the entire country in the future.

The Accord recognizes what has been fact for centuries. Quebec is a distinct society "within Canada", as the Accord duly notes. Commentators often forget the words "within Canada".

Indeed, in 1865 in the Confederation debates, Sir John. A. himself referred to respect for Quebec's "individuality" as being a key component of acceptance of the BNA Act, which led to Confederation two years later. In fact, Sir John. A. made it very clear that if that individuality, call it distinctiveness, were not accepted and recognized by the other partners, there would be no confederation in 1867.

• (1510)

That is the manner in which the importance of the distinctiveness and the individuality was regarded by the Fathers of Confederation. Beyond that, Quebec's full and willing participation in the constitutional process makes other and quite necessary reforms possible. I think it is generally acknowledged that without Quebec at the table the constitutional reform process has been effectively paralysed.

The Accord brings Quebec back into the constitutional family and at the same time it strengthens the unity of all of Canada.

[Translation]

With the Meech Lake provisions, there is only one class of province in Confederation; all provinces have an equal role with respect to constitutional amendments affecting key national institutions. Mr. Speaker, I find it fair and appropriate that provinces should be given a say in whom the federal government appoints to the Senate and the Supreme Court. The final decision remains with the federal government. Also, I think it reasonable that provinces have a say in the development of new national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. That seems quite normal to me. That seems quite normal to me. I think it makes good sense for government leaders to meet annually to find ways to strengthen our economy and to increase prosperity for all Canadians. Co-operative federalism, not confrontational federalism, is the only way our large, diverse country is going to make its way in a rapidly integrating, highly competitive, opportunity-filled world. The Meech Lake Accord is indispensable to our ongoing unity and strength.

Mr. Speaker, especially in light of the developments since, it is worth recalling the immense joy we all felt on June 3, 1987, the day that the ten provincial premiers and I reached unanimous agreement on the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

At the signing ceremony in Ottawa Premier Vander Zalm said:

> Today, as Canadians around this table, there are no losers. Instead, Canada is a winner.

Premier Buchanan stated:

> This Accord—has healed a wound, it has brought Canada to whole nationhood, to whole maturity.

Noting that the Accord began with the Edmonton Declaration in 1986, Premier Getty said:

> —throughout this journey, Alberta's objective— has been a strong Canada— made up of a partnership of strong equal provinces with a strong federal government.

Premier Pawley of Manitoba, stressing the unifying value of the Accord, said:

> Are there risks in what we have undertaken? Yes, of course. Are those risks worth our taking? Yes, by all means, they are.

[Translation]

For his part, Premier Bourassa declared: "It is with great pride as a Quebecer and as a Canadian that I express my deep satisfaction today with Quebec's return to the Canadian Constitution."

Nor was the mood of elation and hope restricted to First Ministers. I remember the reaction in the House of Commons very well. The headlines echoed the mood of those optimistic days. Le Devoir's headline was "Canada has said yes to Quebec"; "A real tour de force" according to Le Droit; "Equal partners at last" said the Calgary Herald; "The welcome pact" was how the Globe and Mail described it. The joy felt across Canada sprang from a simple emotion—love of country, love of Canada.

The Meech Lake Accord is the product of 19 years of comprehensive constitutional review and of extensive commentary in learned journals and the media. But in the three years since the Accord was signed, three provincial governments, all original signatories of the Accord, have changed and their successors have raised concerns about it. And, regrettably, the complexity of the Accord has been reduced to symbols and code words that have distorted its intent as an instrument for unity.

Premier McKenna is saying that the Meech Lake Accord can be improved by adding to it and without subtracting from it. He is the first of the dissenting Premiers to recognize that Meech Lake cannot be reopened without losing the achievements and progress of the last three years in terms of consensus-building and momentum on one of our gravest constitutional problems.

By choosing to table a companion resolution Premier McKenna is acknowledging that Meech Lake cannot be opened and amended directly because to do so would mean eleven legislatures starting over from the beginning.

Premier McKenna's initiative endorses the major elements of the Meech Lake Accord. It recognizes that the distinct society clause works with and not against the Charter. It acknowledges that no new powers are conferred by recognizing the role of the National Assembly of Quebec in promoting Quebec's distinct identity.

It supports the spending power clause by providing an appropriate balance in a federal system. But it also has the virtue of moving the debate beyond symbols to ways of meeting the remaining concerns of Canadians.

By ensuring that each of the elements in his resolution can be judged on its own merits and that amendments can be proclaimed when the necessary level of consent has been reached, Premier McKenna has introduced welcome flexibility on the substance of the issue.

In leaving open the timing of the eventual proclamation of amendments, he has introduced as well flexibility on procedures, subject to the proviso that the Meech Lake Accord would have to be part of the Constitution before additional amendments to the Constitution were made.

By leaving open the possibility that other amendments could be added to the companion resolution and that existing provisions could be altered or even deleted, Premier McKenna has provided still another element of flexibility.

We, in Parliament, in convening national public hearings on Premier McKenna's companion resolution by a Special Committee of the House of Commons, will introduce a further element of flexibility.

This differs from the process followed to achieve the amendment on aboriginal rights in 1983 and the Meech Lake Accord in 1987, whereby governments concluded an executive agreement and agreed to have it adopted, as is, by their respective legislatures.

Parliament will not be asked to debate or commit itself to the text, or an amended version of it, until the people themselves have had a chance to speak to the issues involved and the committee has reported.

Today's motion therefore triggers an important stage of consultation among Canadians. Further action, if appropriate, however will be specifically referred to Parliament pursuant to a decision made at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in referring the New Brunswick resolution to a special committee, the House of Commons is inviting Manitoba's leaders to build on Premier McKenna's initiative set out in the second, companion resolution. We are inviting Premier Wells to do so as well—to come before the Parliamentary Committee and to put forward his constitutional proposals for consideration. Mr. Speaker, this would be a positive, constructive way for Premier Wells to put himself in the same position as Premier McKenna is. We make this request because it is not our intent to isolate any province, be it Newfoundland or Quebec. The isolation of a province once in the life of a nation is once too often.

The special committee we propose to be created might wish to consider carefully, proposals put forward by Manitoba and Newfoundland to add a "Canada Clause" to the Constitution which would set out the key elements of our national identity, without deleting any of the elements already entrenched in the 1982 Constitution or to be entrenched by Meech Lake in interpretive clauses. Hon. members will recall that a constitutional preamble had been examined in 1980, but that it was viewed as premature, in the absence of a full consensus on constitutional renewal. Instead, two elements of it—aboriginal rights and the multicultural heritage of Canadians—were included as constitutional interpretive clauses in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but Canada's linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct society were left out.

The resolution that I propose be referred to a special committee is sensitive to the fact that a complex accord was developed and approved by Parliament and eight legislatures, including the National Assembly. It recognizes that if Quebec's fundamental needs are set aside, the whole Accord will collapse. In such circumstances, Canada's constitutional development, including Senate reform, will stop and the issue of Quebec's constitutional isolation will remain.

[English]

Premier McKenna, in drawing on the public hearings across Canada and the concerns raised by Canadians, has restricted himself to matters which, in his judgment, might attract a national consensus, with support in all regions.

Where, in his view, it is clear that there is a strong national concern, but that a broadly-based national consensus on an idea has not yet emerged, he has called for a guarantee that the issue be addressed during the next round of constitutional negotiations. It is for that reason that he wishes to place aboriginal constitutional issues on the permanent agenda of the First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution.

The agenda included in Meech Lake already covers Senate reform. In fact, at the last First Ministers' Conference in November, it was agreed that a First Ministers' Conference on Senate Reform would be held in western Canada in November of this coming year. As Prime Minister of Canada, I have stated that I would table at that conference a comprehensive proposal for an elected Senate on November 1, next in western Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: For its part, the Government of Canada also wants to make progress on aboriginal issues, as set out in the Throne Speech of April 3, 1989.

In this context, I should also remind the House that the government announced in the same Speech from the Throne that it would attach priority to linguistic rights and to ways to strengthen the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as Senate reform and aboriginal rights, after proclamation of the Meech Lake Accord.

The government will be looking to the proposed Special Committee of the House of Commons for advice on how and when these matters should be addressed. In short, while the companion resolution is intended to address some immediate constitutional issues in the context of the Meech Lake Accord, it is not intended to resolve all of Canada's outstanding constitutional questions here and now and for all time. This, I think, is one of its strengths.

If the Fathers of Confederation had set as rigorous tests of perfection for Confederation as are now being set by some for Meech Lake, the noble idea of Canada would never have seen the light of day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It was only because the Fathers of Confederation recognized their own imperfections, respected each other's differences and acknowledged the fragility of their endeavour that Canada emerged through patient and generous compromise into greatness, and it is only in that spirit that Canada will continue to grow and prosper into the next century as a strong and united nation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Canada has always been known as a nation of reasonableness and compromise, of mutual respect and understanding. Canada has especially been known as a nation whose people and whose institutions have given sensible meaning and compassionate interpretation to all of the legal underpinnings of our democracy.

Why should we change today? It is the people of Canada who have given sense, leadership and vision to this country for 123 years, and if we listen and we maintain that elevated view of nationhood, it will be the same for another 123 years, and then on into the future.

[Translation]

Premier McKenna, in proposing adoption of the Meech Lake Accord and a companion resolution to be proclaimed subsequently, is adhering to the Edmonton Declaration of 1986 in which the Premiers agreed unanimously that Quebec's return to the fold would be the first constitutional priority. Premiers agreed then that this overriding priority should be unencumbered by other issues but that once this question was resolved, other issues would be promptly addressed.

Simply put, the New Brunswick resolution is intended to complete Round 1 so that we can get on with Round 2. It was spelled out in the decision made by all provincial premiers at Edmonton in 1986 and the Meech Lake Accord is consonant with their request. The resolution is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposition. The dialogue with Canadians through a special committee of the House of Commons will allow us all to reassure ourselves that the Constitution will be an instrument of unity and, hopefully, a true reflection of our values.

The government will obviously wish to receive advice from the Committee not only on the content of the companion resolution but also on the timing of the adoption of amendments contained in it. The proclamation of the Meech Lake Accord is not contingent on the proclamation of the companion amendments, but Premier McKenna has said that there will have to be significant support for his companion resolution before he can pass Meech Lake. The work of the Committee will be particularly important in developing both a broadly based national consensus on the amendments and popular support for them.

[English]

For this reason, we propose that the committee be empowered to travel within the time constraints for its report, consistent with the achievement of broad support. Creating such a dynamic is the best guarantee that amendments will, indeed, be made. But let us not lose sight of the most crucial issue, the one that was at the heart of the Edmonton Declaration, the one that was at the heart of all major interventions on the floor of this House of Commons, that the Meech Lake Accord must be proclaimed by June 23 or it will die.

We are at a critical juncture in Canadian history. For Canada, unity is an act of national will and purpose. Our unity was not created in violence against a common enemy, nor were the ties that bind us forged in the fires of revolution or civil war. In building this extraordinary country, man was not our constant challenge, but nature was.

Canada's unity deepened as generations of Canadians steadily surmounted difficulties of climate, geography and isolation to build a modern, prosperous and compassionate country that spanned the continent.

This time, the challenge is different. This time the danger comes not from an unforgiving climate, nor from a hostile world. This time the danger comes from within, from disagreement within our own hearts on how to make the extraordinary land that providence has given us better. It is worsened by a growing attitude of selfishness that is alien to our national character and inimical to our national interests.

• (1530)

The solution lies in our heads in recognizing the gravity of our dilemma, and in our hearts in drawing on the national values of understanding and fairness with which previous generations have built this country with their very hands.

The destiny of Canada is now in our hands. Let us recognize the dangers. Let us act in a spirit of generosity and tolerance. Let us remain true to the values of generations past. Let us guarantee that legacy for generations to come.

Let us make Canada one Canada, whole and entire again.

The government and all Canadians everywhere will eagerly await the recommendations of the committee, and wish them well in their deliberations across the nation because the government genuinely believes that their option is an important one in bringing about the final resolution of making Canada one Canada with all provinces, 10 out of 10, as a firm and inalienable part of our national identity once and for all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for several months Canadians have watched as their political leaders have tried to deal with the difficult question of how to resolve the current impasse over constitutional change. Steps are now being taken by provincial governments and by the federal government which may lead to a solution.

[Translation]

First we had proposals from Premiers McKenna and Wells, followed by study groups set up by the Western Premiers, and finally, the tabling today of Premier McKenna's resolution in the House of Commons for consideration by a special committee.

[English]

We believe that constitutional change of a kind that is broadly acceptable to Canadians can only be achieved through dialogue aimed at reaching the widest possible consensus. We support efforts to resolve this situation through constructive dialogue. Therefore we will participate fully and actively in the committee that has been proposed.

We welcome the initiative of Premier McKenna of New Brunswick to advance the constitutional discussions. While it is not fully clear at this time whether or not Premier McKenna's proposal for a companion resolution will receive sufficient provincial as well as federal backing, I believe it is a constructive step.

At the same time I believe the proposed committee must also be a vehicle for studying other proposals for breaking the constitutional impasse. An example of what I mean is the proposal of Premier Wells of Newfoundland. For this reason I welcome yesterday's letter from the government House leader to our House leader in which he states:

> The companion resolution sets out a number of proposed amendments to the Constitution of Canada. It can be amended, added to and/or subtracted from. In light of the above, I see no constraint on any constitutional issue being raised and discussed by the Committee.

We expect this to be the guideline for the Conservative majority and all the members of this committee.

[Translation]

However, Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that the Prime Minister did not act sooner to seek a solution. As I said before, the fact that he is now intervening in extremis may have disastrous consequences for constitutional reform. The proposals drafted by the Premier of New Brunswick might provide the basis for an expanded accord. With Mr. McKenna, I believe that many Canadians are concerned about the lack of flexibility in the constitutional debate we have had so far. Mr. McKenna's proposal is basically very close to the amendments to the 1987 Constitutional Accord proposed by the Liberals in Parliament. I think it is unfortunate the government did not accept those amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I say this because at the time, we tabled several amendments, aimed at strengthening and improving the accord, which dealt with many of the issues raised by Premier McKenna, including protecting women's rights, protecting and expanding Native rights, the creation of new provinces and regional equality, while seeking broader public consultation in the constitutional reform process.

[English]

We know that Premier McKenna does not consider his companion resolution to be a seamless web, and in fact expects further proposals. One important area which many Canadians would like to see addressed, and which we raised in our amendments is the matter of Senate reform. In that connection we specifically called for an elected Senate.

I believe that if the Prime Minister had accepted our amendments in 1987, we might well not be facing the current constitutional impasse.

We agree with the motion to set up the special committee. However, in spite of the Prime Minister's speech today there are still issues connected with the motion on which further and more complete answers are likely to be sought by Canadians, issues about which Canadians have a right to receive clear explanations of the thinking and the intentions of the Prime Minister. Not least among them is the process by which any final companion resolution produced by the committee and subsequently approved by this House could become part of our Constitution.

As the Prime Minister knows, there can be no constitutional amendment unless, in addition to being adopted by this House and by the provinces, the proposal is also considered by the Senate. Whatever the Prime Minister's views may be about the Senate, he cannot ignore its role in the process of constitutional amendment, especially if it is his desire to resolve more quickly the present impasse.

In short, I am saying it would be helpful if the Prime Minister spelled out more precisely than he has done today for Canadians the actual process and outcome of it that he has in mind. For example, he has said that he does not agree with my suggestion to call an immediate meeting of himself and all the premiers to discuss possible solutions to the impasse. Yet, as we all know, the Constitution makes it clear that the provinces, and therefore their premiers, have a pivotal role to play in most constitutional amendments.

Are we to take it that if there is passage by this House of a companion resolution, which may or may not be the same as that proposed by Premier McKenna, that the Prime Minister will then convene the premiers to discuss it? Do we have a commitment by the Prime Minister that he will in fact present such a resolution to the premiers and ask them to have it approved by their legislatures? What is the timeframe he has in mind for all this? How does he fit this timeframe into the deadline for the 1987 constitutional amendment which, as he has reminded us in his speech, is June 23 of this year?

• (1540)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, many Canadians who heard the Prime Minister's speech last week had the impression that he agreed with Mr. McKenna's proposals. Subsequently, the Prime Minister stated that tabling the McKenna proposals in the House did not mean that he agreed with and endorsed those proposals.

[English]

As the Prime Minister said in his televised speech: "I believe it is possible to extend a hand to Canadians who feel they were overlooked by the Meech Lake Accord" and, with the process now before us, this House "can by such an initiative signal its desire to reach out to all Canadians to allay any concerns they may still have about the Accord".

Also in his televised speech last Thursday night, the Prime Minister stated that the 1987 Accord is "not perfect". Canadians will therefore expect the Prime Minister to inform the House and the proposed committee as to how he wants to respond to the concerns he agrees do exist.

We recognize that all of the premiers have not given strongly positive responses to Premier McKenna's proposals. However, at this stage, we continue to believe that we should give the proposed committee a chance to try to stimulate more dialogue and possible consensus on this crucial matter.

It is important to keep in mind that, as Canadians, we have achieved our goals of nation building only through dialogue leading to compromise and consensus.

The proposals before us today give us an opportunity to take a very positive step toward achieving greater national unity through the exercise of tolerance, goodwill and generosity. Therefore it is important that the Prime Minister undertake a dialogue between himself and all the premiers, but in particular with those who appear to be furthest apart, with the aim of achieving consensus.

I sincerely hope that the Prime Minister and the premiers of all the provinces will carry out such discussions in the spirit of compromise and conciliation which I believe is truly necessary.

As I have said, it is time to roll up our sleeves and get down to the business of negotiating constitutional change to make this country stronger and more united.

Canadians from all across this country must be active participants in the dialogue. We need the people of Quebec, just as we need the people of Atlantic Canada, just as we need the people of Ontario, of western Canada and of the north. They are all needed and valuable.

Canada is more than the sum of its parts. I believe Canada is worth preserving. I believe Canada must be preserved.

We have a multicultural country, a country with two official languages, a country where all Canadians regardless of their backgrounds or origins, are free to pursue their own goals and seek their own fulfilment.

[Translation]

We are all Canadians, and the House of Commons brings together people from all parts of this country, English-speaking and French-speaking, people of various origins, and we must take this opportunity to build a country that reflects our common values.

[English]

As a nation, we have been able to respect one another's differences. Our remarkable tradition of tolerance and generosity is widely recognized around the world. It is part of what makes us who we are and gives us a foundation of mutual respect and understanding which is essential for building a stronger and a more united Canada.

The current impasse is no less important and no less real than other great challenges we have faced in the past.

Once again, we in this House, elected representatives from all across Canada, are now being asked to help meet this challenge. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I and my colleagues are committed to preserving this great country and strengthening our national unity.

The work of the proposed committee is important but, frankly, it is up to the government to give its work meaning and value. What the government does will be the test of the value of what this committee will accomplish.

All Canadians, particularly the premiers and the Prime Minister, must approach this challenge in the same spirit in which this country was founded. If we work together in this spirit—one of tolerance, goodwill and generosity—I am optimistic that we will meet the current challenge. I am optimistic that we will succeed. It is something that we must do.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the motion put forward by the government on the establishment of a committee to discuss the proposals put forward by Premier McKenna of New Brunswick on the Constitution.

It is a motion that I hope will finally lead to a constitutional process wherein the voices of Canadians can be heard and wherein those voices will count. To date, the people of Canada have too often felt excluded from this process. They have felt that constitutional matters were a dialogue among politicians rather than a dialogue among Canadians about the foundation of their country. Certainly Canadians cannot feel that their views are represented if they sense that their voices are not being heard.

[Translation]

First of all I would like to discuss the process followed so far and the results obtained. I will then talk about what we must accomplish in the coming months. In concluding, I would like to define the Canada we want to create for our children. Our party does not take the present situation lightly. It is true that progress was made last week, but the impasse continues. Every day, divisions are aggravated and antagonism is reinforced.

Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats do not believe that our country can adopt a Constitution that excludes Quebec. I also believe that our country cannot adopt a Constitution that fails to guarantee the rights of so many people across this country.

As I said before, Confederation will not be complete until the rights of women, native people and Northern residents have been recognized.

That is why, both personally and on behalf of my party, I am committed to keep working until we are out of the present impasse.

[English]

The Prime Minister said five days ago that he believes that Canadians want to participate themselves in the resolution of this great national issue. Exactly! I believe that if the Prime Minister had said those words two years ago, we would not be in the situation that we are in today.

Consistently, Canadians have felt, as I have said, excluded from the process and that their voices have not been listened to. Now we are engaged in an eleventh-hour attempt to salvage the process, a process that should have been instituted before.

A document was proposed which has profound implications for our country. From the beginning the Prime Minister insisted that not one change could be made to that agreement, not one amendment would be accepted.

There were no public consultations prior to the signing of the Meech Lake Accord. There was no draft Accord put before the Canadian people for discussion. There was no effort to include the representatives of women, of aboriginal people, of ethnic minorities in the formulation of the Accord.

• (1550)

Government leaders from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories were literally left standing out on the sidewalk in front of the Langevin Block, while inside the premiers discussed the future of the north.

The consultation process which followed the signing of the Accord was not much better. A parliamentary committee was restricted to hearings in Ottawa for 15 days in the month of August. Canadians remained isolated from the dialogue and uninformed about the actual contents of the Accord.

Finally, on September 9, 1987, the final report was presented. Many excellent recommendations came from even those limited hearings. As a result, there were recommendations to improve and strengthen the accord.

The New Democratic Party put forward three amendments. One was to deal with the concerns of the northern territories. One was to deal with the concerns of aboriginal people. The third was to ensure equality rights for women. These amendments were rejected by the Prime Minister and his government. The amendments we proposed at that time did not detract from the five conditions that Quebec had put forward, but rather built upon them.

It is this fundamental disregard for the legitimate concerns of Canadians that has led the country to the very serious situation we are in right now. It is a situation that the Prime Minister helped to create. Therefore it is a situation that the Prime Minister must help to resolve.

[Translation]

A committee has been struck, and its mandate is to consider Premier McKenna's proposal. As Mr. McKenna said himself, this proposal is merely the beginning. The debate will not be restricted to his list of suggestions.

We hope this is the spirit in which the committee will consider all reasonable suggestions and all recommendations it receives.

I also hope the Prime Minister is sincere when he suggests it is possible to redress the injustice to those who, for the time being, have been excluded. Obviously, conducting hearings is not enough. We must also listen and act accordingly. This government cannot afford to ignore the committee's recommendations.

[English]

In the government's motion, and in adopting the language of the McKenna proposal, it seems to indicate that any changes or additions would not happen until after the passage of the Meech Lake Accord. The Prime Minister confirmed that in his remarks today. This language obviously suggests that an agreement could not be achieved before or at the same time that Meech Lake might be ratified. Yet we are using terms such as "parallel accord". Parallel accord by its very definition would seem to mean an accord that goes alongside of the existing accord, not long after it.

Some people are referring to a "companion accord". To most people this would mean an accord which would accompany the existing Accord, not follow in some indeterminate time in the future.

I suggest to the House that we must be aiming for the best case scenario, not accepting a second or a third option before we have even begun.

If it is possible for the government on recommendation of this committee to devise a plan for implementation of a sound parallel or companion accord, which does not undermine the five conditions of Quebec, then surely we should leave the timing of that open. Let us not draw lines in the sand, but instead keep open minds and an open process.

We all want to work as quickly as possible to ensure the entry of Quebec into the Constitution, and ensure a constitution in which all of the people of Canada feel they belong.

[Translation]

The New Democratic Party believes in the importance of communities. It believes in equality. It believes in economic and social justice. We want our Constitution to reflect those values. It is because we believe in the importance of communities that we understand the distinct identity of Quebec. For years, our party has recognized Quebec's distinct identity. It is essential, because Quebecers have the right to protect their language and their culture. That is why we support Quebec's five conditions, and that is why we shall go on supporting them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Quebecers have realized, thanks to the work of people like Thérèse Casgrain, Robert Cliche, Ed Broadbent and now the hon. member for Chambly, our new Quebec member, that we share the values that Quebecers hold dear. We believe in social and economic justice.

[English]

Because of our belief in equality, and social and economic justice, we also assert that the rights of other communities in Canada must be recognized in the Constitution. A constitutional agreement which fails to address adequately the rights of women, aboriginal peoples, multicultural groups and northerners does not reflect our vision of Canada.

We are particularly concerned about this, quite frankly, because of the attitude that this government has shown in the treatment of those groups, an attitude that has varied from indifference to contempt. For example, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, had its budget cut in half. Eighty-five women's centres across the country have been closed by this government's budget. Post-secondary funding for aboriginal people has been limited. Aboriginal communications programs have been devastated by budget cuts. The Assembly of First Nations, a key representative for the aboriginal community, has had its entire Secretary of State funding cut.

It is no wonder that these communities feel threatened. It is no wonder that they do not trust the government. It is no wonder that they seek constitutional guarantees.

The New Democratic Party is going to work in this committee. We are going to speak out in the House. We are going to fight to ensure that these Canadians get those guarantees.

We also look forward to addressing the concerns of westerners, Canadians from the Atlantic provinces and ethnic and visible minority Canadians in committee. With western Canadians, there are very real concerns about the institutions of Parliament and that they do not provide adequate representation from the regions. With Atlantic Canadians, there are real concerns about justice and equity in the delivery of national social and economic programs.

As strong supporters of minority rights and the multicultural character of Canada, we will be raising, with Canada's cultural communities, their concerns and listening to their aspirations.

New Democrats believe that the rights of one community do not compete with another community; they complement each other. Just as Canada belongs to the people of Alberta, it belongs to the people of Quebec. Just as Canada belongs to immigrants, it belongs to aboriginal people. Just as Canada belongs to men, it belongs to women.

Canada belongs to all of us. It is a part of all of us. Our Constitution must do nothing less than reflect that reality.

[Translation]

In recent months, we have seen a growing wave of intolerance moving across this country. I find this disturbing and ugly, and the ugliness troubles me. The reasons behind this intolerance are many and varied. I believe one of the main reasons is a feeling of financial insecurity shared by many people across this country. Our responsibility as politicians is to help increase our understanding of others, both as individuals and as a community.

• (1600)

People in this country tend to forget their history, which prevents us from celebrating our successes or understanding the injustice committed against our Native people, against Quebec and against ethnic communities.

[English]

The political parties and political leaders of Canada have a crucial role to play in Canadians getting to know their history and one another. We have a crucial role, not just in moving from intolerance to tolerance, but to understanding and friendship.

One way of doing this is through the strengthening of our cultural institutions and programs. Now is not the time to destroy the CBC, as the government seems intent on doing. It is not the time to cut youth exchange programs, but to expand them. It is not the time to destroy the rail link that links this country. The value of friendship between our language and cultural communities cannot be understated. The diversity of our country enriches us all.

While we celebrate that diversity, we also need to recognize that we share a great deal. We have common problems, hopes, and aspirations and we must come together to meet the common challenges ahead.

The issue confronting us is not who loves Canada or who loves Canada more. It is about what kind of Canada we want to create. It is about creating a Canada of equality, harmony, and social and economic justice. Writing a constitution that reflects our values and corrects our historical injustices is a crucial element in the creation of that kind of Canada. It is, however, but one element and I say to the House today that, while we apply ourselves to this task of constitutional reform, we must work diligently with this committee to see if we can break this impasse. With the political will, I am optimistic that we can do that. With leadership by the government and by all parties, we can break this impasse.

We must not at the same time lose sight of other issues. We must put an end to poverty in Canada, put an end to food banks and soup kitchens. We must continue to work for real economic justice, jobs for all Canadians and fair taxation, to put an end to the violence against women, and for international development and peace. Finally, we must join together to ensure that the world we leave our children is a clean world and an environmentally sound world.

In my support of the Prime Minister's motion, I say to the House, let us write a constitution which reflects what Canada is all about. Let us move on to create a united Canada, a caring and compassionate Canada, a Canada for all Canadians.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have not had a chance to talk with my colleague across the way. It has been a pattern in many of our debates, including opposition days and many others recently, that when we come to the 20-minute speeches parties or individuals, if they would like, could indeed split their speech between two members for 10 minutes each, with a similar arrangement for the question and comment period which follows.

I wondered if there might be a disposition in the House to follow that pattern. Therefore, each party, depending on their speaker, would be free to go the full 20 minutes or to split it between two people. If, indeed, there is that predisposition then our first two speakers would do the splitting.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we would certainly concur with that suggestion since we started that some years ago. I would like to make sure that members splitting their times into two 10-minute speeches followed by five-minute questions would give notice when they start their speeches so that the Chair and everyone in the House knows that indeed we are dealing with a member who is splitting his time.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, of course, as—

Mr. Speaker: In response to the comment made by the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier, could the Minister tell us whether he intends to speak for 10 or 20 minutes?

Mr. Valcourt: It is an interesting topic that could be discussed for hours, but I will only take 10 minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, as Member for Madawaska—Victoria, in New Brunswick, as a member of the Acadian community in that province, as a francophone committed to promoting the growth and development of official language communities in this country and as a private citizen who favours a Constitution maintaining a balance between the need for a strong national government and the full participation of federal partners in national affairs, I am pleased today to support the motion before the House creating a special committee to return to the public domain the discussion generated by the initiative taken last week by New Brunswick's Premier, Mr. McKenna.

Mr. Speaker, I listened earlier when the Prime Minister referred to the current concern of so many Canadians now, including many young Canadian men and women. I was in the "Republic of Madawaska" yesterday, in Edmundston, Brayons country, and a 14-year-old girl told me about an assignment they had in their school on the issue of bilingualism, and she showed me her presentation. That child, a 14-year-old girl, was concerned with her country's fate. It is my belief that Canadian men and women are seriously worried.

When the Prime Minister earlier referred to this country's history, anyone looking at Canada's constitutional history will reach some inescapable conclusions. One of them is that our constitutional process is always based on political compromise. How could it be otherwise, in a country as large as ours, having to reconcile so many regions whose inhabitants trace their roots to so many different places? Our cultural and sociological heritage is a reflection and a proof of that diversity.

Now Canada was born out of political compromise, and at each and every turn compromise has been the basis of constitutional progress. Another conclusion to be derived from our constitutional history is that at no point have we succeeded in one fell swoop to set up a constitutional order or set of provisions that would automatically solve all the problem arising out of this country's development and progress. That historical reality must be kept in mind. It has never occurred that a cure-all was found. And some who are commenting on the situation today would have us in this generation solve all the problems outright, set up a perfect order.

As a number of members have indicated, Meech Lake is not a perfect document, but it is a serious, just and fair attempt at trying to ensure this country's continuance.

If we ignore Canada's historical reality, if we claim that everything has to be perfect, we face the danger that no further progress could be made for lack of a, perfect solution. But even if there is no perfect solution, clearly it is an ideal that we must constantly pursue. The constitutional history of Canada also reveals that the latter conclusion has a corollary, namely that failing to react to a problem of whatever nature inextricably leads to inflexibility, intolerance and confrontation between the federal partners. Recent Canadian history has confirmed that fact and it would be a grave mistake on our part to ignore this.

• (1610)

Like many Canadians, I found particularly unfortunate and dangerous the fact that unanimity was not achieved during the constitutional reform of 1982. What should have been acclaimed at the time as an important constitutional accomplishment, that is to say the repatriation of the Constitution as well as the adoption of an amending formula and of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, will have been tarnished by the repudiation of that initiative by the Quebec Legislative Assembly. And that refusal on the part of Quebec to adhere to the constitutional pact reminded me of the difficult episodes of our constitutional development since the failure of the Victoria Conference in 1971. It also reminded me of the fact that the inability of the members of our Confederation to come to a compromise regarding the constitutional claims of Quebec over a period of almost 20 years, has nearly led to Canada breaking apart. However, the solemn promise of renewed federalism made to Quebecers in 1980 could not be kept. We can not lose sight of that, Mr. Speaker, because it is the backdrop of the Meech Lake Accord. The premiers of all the provinces had come to an agreement in 1986; that was not at our instigation. They nevertheless met on their own initiative to give themselves a mandate and to say:"Our priority is the repatriation of Quebec in the constitutional fold."

And today, because in 1982 we failed to reach a general consensus, we are blamed for taking care of Quebec only. To those who believe that this is a question for Quebec alone I say: certainly not. We are not talking about Quebec, we are talking about Canada. And Canada is Quebec, is New Brunswick, is Newfoundland, is Prince Edward Island, is all the provinces and territories. There are those who would like to see Quebec join, enter Confederation, but without conditions. Some say: nobody is against accepting Quebec, they may come! But they would like it to crawl through the back door. However, Quebec wants to join with dignity and, according to Robert Bourassa, this is what the Meech Lake Accord does.

Some hon. members: Hear, Hear.

[English]

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord is an accomplishment which in my view is of the utmost importance. The world has witnessed from time immemorial the fearful effects of linguistic and ethnic tensions which can easily paralyse a nation and create a climate in which economic and social development is rapidly jeopardized. Therefore I believe that we must not permit any complacency with respect to constitutional issues and the issue before us today.

The Prime Minister is asking members of this House in endorsing this motion to bring together Canadians who believe that for one reason or another their concerns have not been addressed. I think Premier McKenna's initiative will create the occasion for Canadians to come forth and see what Meech is really all about. It does not take rights away from any Canadian. No rights of any Canadian are taken away. Canadians will have an occasion to air their views about the kind of Canada we want. That is what is at the foundation of this Canada. If we want to save this country this initiative is important.

I understand my 10 minutes are up. Therefore, I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Government Order No. 4, a motion respecting the referral to a special committee of New Brunswick's proposed constitutional amendments.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: All those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Less than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as you will be aware and my colleagues opposite will be aware, I will speak for 10 minutes. I am just going to synchronize my watch with theirs.

I rise today to express my support for the motion before this House. The motion calls for the creation of a special committee of the House to study a proposed companion resolution to the Meech Lake Accord.

Our purpose, of course, is to contribute to a process that we hope will enable the Meech Lake Accord to be ratified by all governments in Canada to break what has been called a constitutional logjam.

On March 21, Premier Frank McKenna of New Brunswick tabled what he called a companion resolution. Contained in this resolution are proposals that would add to but not subtract from the Meech Lake Accord.

There were 11 parties to the Meech Lake Accord and there are those in the House who have raised the question of why their amendments to the Meech Lake Accord were not accepted at earlier times.

No single party can amend an accord between 11 parties unilaterally. This is something that Premier McKenna has recognized in the form in which he has put his companion resolution and that is what he suggests are additions to or clarifications to the accord that will make it possible procedurally for the accord to become law, but also to reassure those with concerns and would like clarification about its provisions.

The Constitution is the basic social contract of our country. It defines the terms of our living together and establishes the ideals we want to uphold together. It tells the world how we see ourselves. But a constitution, as the Prime Minister said in this House during the Meech Lake debate, is more than words on paper. It has to reflect the reality of the country or it simply will not work. Nor is the Constitution to be carved in stone for all time. It must be susceptible to amendment to reflect the evolution of a society and their people.

For example, the Constitution Act, 1867 outlines the relationship between governments in our federal system. The 1982 Act provides an amending formula and entrenches rights and freedoms in our basic national law.

[Translation]

The Meech Lake Accord will fill in a serious gap because it will mean that Quebec accepts willingly our Constitution. The Accord takes into account some basic realities of our country:

—Quebec constitutes a distinct society within a country where all provinces are equal.

—The linguistic duality of our two founding nations, the French and the English, constitutes a basic characteristic of our country.

The Meech Lake Accord will bring Quebec back into the Constitutional fold under very acceptable terms.

Now, Quebec has willingly accepted the Constitution. It has recognized the legitimacy of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But the process will go beyond that. Other Constitutional negotiations will take place, but before that, the present debate must come to an end.

Why, at this very moment, is the Meech Lake Accord of such great importance for the history of Canada?

In 1984, Canadians gave Prime Minister Mulroney a mandate to make sure that Quebec would sign the Constitution. In 1985, the Quebecers elected Premier Bourassa for the purpose of carrying out negotiations based on five points.

Later on, the Provincial Premiers agreed as a priority to bring Quebec back to the Constitutional negotiating table based on these same five points. The First Ministers had reached an agreement at Meech Lake in 1987; it was agreed that this Accord respected the principle of provincial equality.

• (1620)

The Meech Lake Accord recognizes the fact that Quebec is a distinct society. It grants a right of review to the provinces on such institutions of the Federation as the Supreme Court. It maintains the power of the Government of Canada to set up shared cost programs in the areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction and the right of the provinces to opt out of these programs against payment of a fair compensation so that they can implement their own programs in accordance with national standards.

Finally, the Accord recognizes the need to come to the second stage of the Constitutional reform by putting an end to the activities scheduled for the 1980's and then come to those scheduled for the 1990's.

Mr. Speaker, we have reached a crucial juncture in the ratification process. The stakes are high. This is a critical moment of our history. By starting a dialogue with the Canadian people through a special Committee of the House of Commons, we can assure them that their Constitution will faithfully reflect their common values.

[English]

When the Meech Lake Accord was first created, I was a member of the legislative assembly of the province of British Columbia. British Columbia has always played a positive role on the national constitutional scene. In 1985 in a speech in Montreal, the then premier of British Columbia, Bill Bennett, stated that Canada was like a net and, as different parts of the net experience strain, other parts of the net supported those parts under strain and the whole created a support. It created strength that was the nature of the whole country. At the same time, on behalf of British Columbians, he commented that in his view and the view of many British Columbians, the French fact in Canada could best be protected in the envelope of Confederation.

British Columbians have been like Quebecers, assertive of their provincial rights but always ultimately committed to the nation. Recently Premier Vander Zalm put forward proposals to try to rescue the Meech Lake Accord. Those proposals were put forward in the same spirit that British Columbia has always reflected on the national scene.

I welcome this public process because I have spoken about the Meech Lake Accord to audiences throughout my province. I have found that wherever I was able to explain the Meech Lake Accord, audiences in British Columbia were extremely receptive. They accepted the accord and believed in it with the typical fair-mindedness found among British Columbians.

As a western Canadian, I believe the Meech Lake Accord is a good agreement for western Canada and for the country as a whole. It points the way to a stronger Canada where a vigorous federal government works with strong provinces, instead of against them, and where all provinces are treated equally.

Meech Lake guarantees the important issue of Senate reform will be on the agenda of annual conferences on the Constitution. It also gives provinces an equal say, rather than giving the veto to Quebec and Ontario together, as would be the case with the current amending formula. There are some who ask why the premiers did not agree on Senate reform in 1986, but I think it is fair to say that even at today's date there is no consensus on the ultimate nature of Senate reform. Premier Filmon of Manitoba has made the point very clearly.

In this process today with this motion to refer Mr. McKenna's motion to a committee, we are attempting to save the Meech Lake Accord. In his letter to the Prime Minister, which accompanied his proposals for saving the Meech Lake Accord, British Columbia Premier Vander Zalm remarked that what appeared to have been lost in the country since 1987 is what he called the spirit of Meech Lake. The only way we can save the Meech Lake Accord is to recapture the spirit of Meech Lake.

As the Prime Minister has said, this is the key. No law is unambiguous. The Charter of Rights has been hailed by many as an important legal development in Canada, but many Canadians have been disappointed by Charter decisions. As the Prime Minister said, standards of perfection are doomed to fail because there is no consensus on perfection.

The reaction to Premier McKenna's companion resolution has been positive and encouraging. Individual Canadians and interested parties will, as a result of the process we are putting in place with this motion, have the opportunity to address New Brunswick's resolution as well as other proposals.

Without this accord, I believe that our continued existence as a united country and our will to live together would be questioned. This is not the kind of future the next generation of Canadians expect to inherit, or has a right to expect. The Prime Minister said in his address to the nation:

> This is not just a constitutional problem, nor is it a debate among politicians. This is above all a question of will—the national will to be true to the legacy of tolerance and generosity of spirit on which this country was built.

That generosity of spirit was characterized among the 11 First Ministers who met at Meech Lake. I believe that it will be characteristic of all those Canadians who take the opportunity set in place by this process to understand the Meech Lake Accord and to appreciate its significance in our constitutional development.

I am therefore pleased to support the motion to put Premier McKenna's resolution before the special committee of the House, and I would like at this moment to move that the question be now put.

Mr. Speaker: Is there further debate? The hon. member for Beaver River. I see the hon. member and will recognize him in a few minutes. The hon. member for Beaver River.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on this motion concerning the Meech Lake Accord. I have to say that I am opposed to proceeding in the manner that is proposed for four basic reasons which I will articulate.

First, regardless of the contents of this motion or the Meech Lake Accord itself, there is simply not enough time. The goal remains approval of the accord by June 23. Even if the approval of the contentious points could be reached, 89 days is simply not enough time for full public debate and reflection upon such permanent constitutional changes. The House will know that on June 27 of last year, I pointed out to the Prime Minister that approval was impossible without new initiatives. That was the time to act. No action was taken then and nine months have lapsed since that time.

Second, it has become clear that there is simply no common ground on which to build a consensus at this point. That is clear from the reactions of the governments of Quebec, Newfoundland and Manitoba. At this particular moment that reaction is likely to be even clearer from the public. Under such circumstances, it is hard to see how a game a charades between now and June 23 can lead to anything other than more stands-offs and heightened tensions.

Third, there remains a failure to recognize the fundamental flaws in the original deal. In this day and age, a constitution cannot be drafted by 11 men and approved without widespread public support, nor can a federal state allow any or all of its regions to have absolute vetoes on the constitutional aspirations of the others. That is a totally negative version of equality that entrenches blackmail as the primary mechanism of constitutional development.

Fourth, and finally, I believe the accord remains based on a false premise. That premise is that Quebec has been excluded from the Constitution. The House will know that Quebec is a full legal part of the Constitution. Its political exclusion is self-imposed, a tactic Mr. Bourassa picked up from the previous separatist Government of Quebec. The House will also know that the Prime Minister himself supported the patriation of 1982 at that time.

I say these things knowing full well the depth of feeling in Quebec and the possible consequences, but I also know the depth of feeling in my own area. It is understandable that Quebec will feel hurt at the failure of this deal after it had been signed by all provinces and the country appeared set for the period to follow. However, the deal has been rejected by every segment of society outside of Quebec and the opposition is not just trivial. As delays crept into the entire process there was a greater chance to see exactly what Meech meant and have it rejected on its merits.

There have been developments since the deal was signed. Three premiers who had signed it have been replaced. Indeed, these three will likely never be able to hold public office again and that same fate may await other Meech supporters as well.

There has been the obvious insincerity on Senate reform demonstrated by the outright rejection of appointing Stan Waters.

• (1630)

Albertans do not take kindly to this. They believe that a parallel accord, if you will a full draft amendment for Senate reform, a triple E Senate, is essential; not just elected senators but elected and having equal representation from each province across the country.

There has been the frenzy of the Prime Minister and other senior ministers to drive us to the brink, and the separatist threats of Mr. Bourassa which have only served to weaken the deal because Canadians know this deal cannot be signed since Confederation will not survive with a gun constantly at its head.

Of course Quebec feels it will have to re-examine its place in Confederation after Meech. I am convinced that Quebec can do this in a balanced, mature and intelligent manner without taking the kind of advice it gets from some other fellow Albertans opposite. There is certainly going to be bitterness in this re-examination, and there is no doubt federalism will be a tough sell if only because of leadership.

The strongest federalists are relics of the past. The current Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec have inconsistent positions that are a credit to no one, whereas the separatist leader, Mr. Parizeau, is intelligent, consistent and committed and I think at this point he is smiling because he knows he gains whether Meech is defeated or whether it passes.

Many English Canadians believe that the Meech deal itself contains little justification for separation. However, the Meech process has shown that Quebec will have to re-examine itself, to choose once and for all a permanent commitment to either a small but exclusively French state with all the symbols of nationhood, or else a French part of a greater nation from sea to sea more intimately connected with the continental reality.

I hope Quebec appreciates that the Reform Party admires the courage of Quebec to debate this range of options and of the many politicians it produces who represent and articulate clearly these choices, a quality absent in most of English of Canada I have to admit.

I also hope Quebec realizes it will remain only a French island on an English continent and there will be no easy deals or easy formulae for survival.

I am confident that Quebec and the other parts of Canada will be able to deal amicably and peacefully and prosper together, prosper together no matter what road is chosen. Quebec of course is more confident now than ever before, and Albertans especially admire its determination to engage the American giant head to head in healthy competition and to look at the future in terms of economic opportunities.

History will record the great failure of this government to bring a similar forward looking feeling to the constitutional agenda of Canada, as this government has encouraged Quebec not to look forward but to reopen past bitterness and defeats.

For the first time in Canadian history, a Prime Minister has been responsible for creating constitutional tensions and crisis. He resurrected Quebec nationalism for electoral success. He tried constitutional brinkmanship when it did not appear the accord would pass, and it unfortunately blew up in his face.

The Meech Lake deal is dead and a new deal should be struck with a new three-year deadline. This new deal should be evaluated on its merits again as to whether it passes or fails. By continuing to pass Meech, all that is being done is to heighten emotions and to raise the stakes.

We cannot ask Canada to base its constitutional future on an artificial deadline of only 89 days left when 1,007 days have passed already with nothing happening in this place. Even if a perfect deal is worked out, there is not enough time to evaluate it on its merits and ram it through Parliament. This is not some bill simply to raise taxes. This is a constitutional law we are talking about, the supreme law of Canada.

From the start, members of this government have shown themselves to be rank amateurs at constitutional negotiations. They have done everything wrong, and their irresponsible behaviour has certainly created a crisis of which we are all aware. I cannot support this motion or any constitutional agenda of this government because of their inability to deal with it.

Now rather than later, before there is another opportunity at constitutional negotiations and crisis, we need harmony; not just an if-then formula: You give us this, and then we will think about giving you that.

It is my belief that we need to grow together and that it is only possible through a triple E Senate where we would have equal representation from all provinces to address these regional concerns which will make all areas equal siblings in this family that we all call home: Canada.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very brief because we have said and my leader has indicated that we view the McKenna proposal as a constructive way of helping us to go through the constitutional impasse we now face.

As one who has been very interested in this initiative and who sat on the parliamentary committee that dealt with the Meech Lake Accord, I am looking forward to these committee meetings, as well, as a possibility of getting us through this stage of the constitutional evolution of our country.

The experience that I had with my colleague on the constitutional committee that examined the Meech Lake Accord was not a very happy one. We were whipped into holding all our meetings here in Ottawa. We were denied the opportunity to call witnesses from across the country who wanted to appear. We were pressed into holding our hearings in the month of August, and witnesses were not allowed the time that they required to prepare proper presentations.

Nevertheless, my caucus was able to produce a minority report which is appended to the document. None of the amendments that we recommended, which I think would have improved the Meech Lake Accord and would certainly have increased its acceptance, were considered by the government and none were accepted by the government.

With the wisdom of hindsight, it should be obvious to the government that this was a tactical error. We accepted the Meech Lake Accord without our amendment package. We did so, not because we approved the tactics of the government but because we expected that it would be possible, with the kind of support that the House of Commons showed, to move our Constitution forward to begin considering concerns not only of Quebec but of many regions of Canada, of all regions of Canada, for the improvement of Canada's Constitution.

We support the reference of this resolution to committee, again in the hope that this will be a productive way of moving us forward so that we can achieve the Constitution for Canada that the Canadian people in all the various regions of our country, the ethnic groups and so on in particular want.

So far the Prime Minister and the statements that we have heard from members of the Conservative caucus give us no reason to be excessively confident that this process, that this set of committee hearings will be productive. I do not want to condemn the government at this point. I want to call on the government to put more on the table than the Prime Minister put on the table in the statement that he made today.

We need to know where the government stands on this package. We need to know what the government is prepared to do to try to achieve the kind of consensus that will make the Meech Lake Accord work and a commitment that something will be made of the McKenna proposals contained in the package that we have before us today, the additions that one can anticipate from other parts of the country and from the work of our committee and that they will not be treated with what I can only call the contempt that was given by the Prime Minister and by the government to the work that was done under very limited and tough circumstances by the parliamentary committee that met during the Meech Lake Accord process.

I am looking forward to the committee getting started. I have a great deal more to say but will not say it today. I want simply to urge that other speakers who speak for the government make it clear that this will be meaningful, that this will not be simply a participation exercise, because if all it is is a chance for members and for interested Canadians to appear before us and to sound off, it will not take us through the constitutional impasse.

I can say for my caucus that we hope fervently that the government will make out of the work that we intend to contribute to this committee a useful and successful step in dealing with the constitutional unfinished business of Canada.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is with a mixture of pride and concern that I rise to take part in this debate on the motion introduced today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). Of course, Mr. Speaker, you will not be surprised to learn that Mr. McKenna's initiative in trying to break the constitutional log jam was one of my concerns when I was a member of the McKenna's government, in the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly. But this issue is much more serious, Mr. Speaker, because there has never been a better time, in a very long while for politicians and Parlementarians to show their concern for Canada instead of the process and to consider the aspirations of Atlantic, Western and Central Canada, as well as Quebec. It seems to me that, on the eve of the June 23rd deadline, this is not the time to discuss in the abstract of a constitutional notion or ideology, Mr. Speaker, but rather for all Canadians to look for a way to live peacefully together, English and French, people from isolated areas and native people. This in no time for us to be thinking of our own little self, be we from Quebec or from New-Brunswick. The real question is how we are going to solve the problem.

Of course, it will not be easy. And I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal put forward by the New Brunswick Premier is only the beginning of a solution and not, as he admitted himself, the final solution.

[English]

Because we do not often have the opportunity to do so, I want to congratulate the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party for having set a tone which is very important, that we must in our own ways speak out very forcefully on whether or not we believe that we can solve the enigma that is Canada. It is not new and it certainly does not get any easier that tensions—regional tensions, in the past religious tensions, continually linguistic tensions and probably forever various types of tensions—will exist in this country because of the nature of its population, its size and its geography.

Surely this is not a time to be selfish or to start to point fingers as to who was right, who was wrong and who did what in 1980, in 1986, on the Plains of Abraham or in the settlement of the west. These are all very important things, but the challenge for Canadians, from what I hear from Canadians, is not to go on with political rhetoric or one-upmanship or who is going to be the political victor in this situation.

I believe today that every man and woman in this House would want to be on the parliamentary committee. It seems to me, as I stand in this House and look around and think of the men and women who have come before us—builders, people with vision, people with an understanding of what Canada could be and should be—that we had better be very careful because history is going to judge us very harshly if we pass up an opportunity to try to take every avenue open to us to make Canadians understand that constitutional processes are extremely complex, very difficult and can be divisive but should never be beyond the scope of our ability to deal with them.

Sometimes I make sure that in the final analysis I take the position that I misunderstood, because sometimes a person can be led to believe that somehow regional or personal perceptions are more important than Canada. People with very little understanding will say in an offhanded manner: "I understand the feelings of Albertans" or "I am very familiar with how the Quebecois feel".

We have difficulty in our own little communities and in our own lives dealing with family issues, with village, town and city problems, with relationships within our own small groups of people, associations, church groups and political parties. Yet there are people who would have us believe that they understand the complex problems that confront us.

I hope the result of this process will be just part of many things that are occurring as Canadians of goodwill, generous of spirit, work toward trying to find a way out of this impasse. Each of us in our own way does not matter very much, but we in this place have been given a responsibility. How we deal with it is going to serve as an example in many ways to Canadians who do not have the kind of opportunity that is being presented to us.

There are some who say that time is too short. There are others who say the battle has already been lost. I do not know if they are prepared to accept the implications of what they say.

Is there anyone in this place, after we go through this exercise, who is prepared to walk out on to the streets of his or her hometown and say: "I didn't do every possible thing that I could do to make sure that this great country stayed together", not to hurt or take away from one group to give to the other and not to be proud and selfish and beat one's chest and say: "I came up with the solution"?

Certainly the Premier of New Brunswick, in the attempt that he and the Government of New Brunswick has put forward to try to find a solution to the impasse, does not see it as a personal solution and hopes that it just part of the building blocks that are required to get us out of this problem.

The worst thing that can happen to us as Canadians is to somehow think that somebody else is going to do it for us or that somebody else's attitude has to change in order to make it easier to find a solution. We have to start changing our own attitudes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I cannot emphasize enough just how important it is for all parliamentarians to realize, without going into all the details of the motion which has been presented to Parliament and to the House of Commons, that nobody will come up with a magic solution. The only way to solve this problem is to be generous, but more particularly to be committed to continue to build this country—difficult though it may be—which was born under much more trying conditions than those we are facing today.

Mr. Speaker, again I repeat the challenge which I think is central to the motion. I hope every member of the House wants to say: I would like to be part of the parliamentary committee and to be part of the solution. I want to find a way to solve the problem rather than make it any more complicated than it already is, I want to find ways to suppress certain frustrations and allay certain fears. We have a few months or a few weeks ahead of us, Mr. Speaker, and I would not want to be too dramatic about this. It is not a matter of giving too much importance to what we are doing. We cannot overemphasize the importance of Canada, and this is why I hope that the work of the committee will produce the outcome which all Canadians are hoping for—a way of solving the constitutional dilemma which has endured for too long already.

• (1650)

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, in 1980, when the Quebec government asked its question in the referendum, many of us—or more precisely 60 per cent of us—voted no. Many MPs from Quebec, from all three parties, voted no. Others voted yes. Those who voted no did so because they thought at the time that negotiations between Mr. Lévesque and Mr. Trudeau could hardly be successful due to the intransigent attitudes on both sides. And we thought at the time that, since the issue had finally been resolved and the people had voted in favour of Canada, a constitutional accord could easily be reached. Were we ever surprised, a year and a half later, when the Canadian Constitution was brought back from England without Quebec's agreement.

I don't know if members of Parliament from outside Quebec, some of whom spoke today, realize what a referendum means in terms of discussions and fights between members of one family, of one community, of one village or small town. I don't know if you can imagine how traumatic that experience has been for many Quebecers, and how shocked they were when they suddenly realized that Ottawa had fooled them with fine promises concerning a future Constitution. In the following months, many of us decided to come to Ottawa, to try to repair this injustice, to show Quebecers, 40 per cent of whom had voted "yes", that it was possible for Canada to include Quebec as a distinct society as we know it, with a different language, a different culture, different traditions, a different civil code. So we came here. It seemed to me that 1985–86 was perhaps the ideal time for men like Premier Bourassa and Prime Minister Mulroney, people whose negotiating skills are well known, to reach some understanding. We had the Meech

Lake Accord, signed by the 11 first minister from all of Canada—a rare feat.

We were so happy! It seemed to us then and in the following months that Canada as a whole suddenly realized that Quebec was a distinct society and that they were happy with it. When asked the question "What does Quebec want?" in 1980, we answered, "We want Canada." We got the feeling then that Canada was telling us, "Yes, we want you too, as you are." Then all of a sudden we realized that people were starting to raise questions. However, of the 35 conditions set by the Parti québécois in 1981, 1982 and 1983, Mr. Bourassa kept only a minimum of five.

We have noticed that the inflexibility showed by the Reform Party in the West is growing throughout the country except in Quebec. When I show these articles to my constituents of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, you can imagine what they think. Can you imagine what they think of this Canada you are proposing, of the Confederation of Regions Party in the Maritimes, of the NDP's change of heart after approving the Meech Lake Accord, of the Liberal leadership race in progress? What do my constituents think of the language crisis and of all these Ontario municipalities declaring themselves unilingual English. What a joke! What do they think of Manitoba's, New Brunswick's and Newfoundland's attitude, of the other provinces' reservations, of this intransigence? Now that the deadline for approving the Meech Lake Accord is only some 90 days away, many Quebecers feel that the harm has already been done by these people I have just enumerated. Is it too late? I don't think so. When I was growing up, my mother used to tell me: "It's never too late to do the right thing." It's true, but we know it is late.

Quebec is still excluded from the Constitution. We have been excluded from this debate for nine years. A new resolution involving constitutional amendments to the Meech Lake Accord has been proposed today. Can we examine them without altering Meech Lake itself? I don't know. But one thing is for sure. I have always been extremely proud of my party's position, my leader's position, the Prime Minister's position on this, that never will there be any constitutional process in Canada without Quebec's presence. That was stated in 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, and now in 1990, and I am convinced this is just as true, it is a principle that cannot be changed. It cannot be changed for all the reasons I stated earlier. There is nothing that can be done to change that.

The amendments now put forward by Premier McKenna of New Brunswick definitely stem from good intentions. I understood and listened to the speeches made by the Prime Minister, who spoke extremely well, and by the representatives of the Liberal Party and the NDP. Yes, there are good things to look at. Certainly, if Meech Lake had been signed two years ago, maybe we would now be in our second constitutional round. But the process now put forward, that of an official committee of the House of Commons, is an official process of constitutional negotiations or talks. And as I now speak, Mr. Speaker, Quebec is not a part of that process, because the position stated by Premier Robert Bourassa and his Minister of Interprovincial and Intergovernmental Affairs. Mr. Rémillard, is quite clear: Quebec will not discuss any amendments to Meech Lake, any companion resolution, any parallel accord, until Meech Lake has been signed.

I see you are indicating my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I would ask you and hon. members in this House not to see the clock for the remaining two minutes I need to conclude.

• (1700)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed that we allow the hon. member two extra minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: So we have this proposed process, a public consultation process which will allow all those Canadians, and particularly Canadians from provinces other than Quebec, I suppose, to come and express themselves in a formal forum. Discussions can take place, but I do not think that process should be given a formal status.

I heard the Prime Minister say that eventually, this committee report might be brought to a vote in this House. To me, this is a very formal step. But if at that time the Government of Quebec has not taken part in these constitutional discussions, I cannot see how we in this House of Commons could be called to vote on a such a matter. It is to us a most fundamental matter of principle. I think this House would never agree to a repetition of what was done in 1981 under the leadership of Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Chrétien. I think that traumatic experience was so deep, we could never go through it again, so the process put before us today might go no further than discussions. It could perhaps stop at some recommendations or a list of recommendations. It could go as far as a precise recommendation to the House. It may come to a vote. I do not know how far the official process initiated today will go. At this moment when it is put under way, Quebec is not part of it. But the Government of Quebec did not officially object to its consideration by the House of Commons.

Editorial writers in Quebec are now divided on the issue of whether we should stay on that course or withdraw from that special committee or process.

So, personnally, Mr. Speaker, I will keep out of it. I want my non-participation to that proposed resolution to be clearly understood. Obviously, I could not vote on a resolution introduced in the House and I fail to see how Quebec members from all three parties in the House could do so. I would urge the committee to carefully examine Quebec's minimum demands and explain these demands to other Canadians, because I am convinced that these extremely minimal demands, once properly explained to Canadians across Canada, would break down the intransigent attitude that is doing so much harm to Quebec. In fact, recent public opinion polls have shown that today, a majority of Quebecers would say yes to sovereignty for Quebec yes, we want to separate. But it is not too late. Someone said it was the eleventh hour, but I would say, Mr. Speaker, it is five minutes to midnight.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Ms. Campbell, (Vancouver Centre)) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Mulroney) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.05 o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

BILL OF RIGHTS

SUGGESTED CHILD PROTECTION COMMISSION

The House resumed from Thursday, February 15, 1990 consideration of the motion of Ms. Langan:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiation with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today and speak in favour of this motion. I would like to set out the motion because I will refer to the motion later in my presentation. The motion reads:

> That—the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

First, I would like to point out to the House and to all people viewing today that in a recent news release it was announced that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney will join Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto of Pakistan in co-chairing the World Summit for Children to be held at the United Nations September 29 to 30. This was announced by the United Nations.

The summit will discuss policies to ensure the protection and development of children. This motion of my colleague, I believe, furthers some of that which has been set out and will be discussed in September. It comes as somewhat of a shock that the members of the government side have spoken at length, essentially in opposition to various parts of this motion.

They have taken four positions which I will set out. The first is that the division of powers in the Constitution Act of 1867 gives the provinces jurisdiction over civil rights and children. The second argument against this seems to be that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides for the legal rights of children. Third is that the ratification of the United Nations Convention will necessitate harmonization of Canadian laws affecting children, thereby negating the need for a domestic bill of rights. Fourth is that the implementation of a Canadian bill of rights for children would limit the flexibility of governments in responding to the need of children. I would like to speak on each of those points individually in my presentation today.

First, while it is clear that Section 92(13) of the Constitution Act does give jurisdiction over property and civil rights to the provinces, and that the Supreme Court of Canada stated in 1938 that child welfare was a provincial responsibility, this does not preclude the federal government from action with regard to children. The criminal law and various programs administered by Health and Welfare, for example, the drug and alcohol programs, child sexual abuse programs, child care funding through CAP and others, affect children and are not regarded as an infringement on provincial powers.

In dealing with the second matter, the sections of the Charter do apply to children and action has been taken to ensure the legal rights of children. However, the UN Convention goes beyond defining legal rights for children to include social and economic rights, which are not covered by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A domestic bill of rights would make clear Canada's commitment to the social and economic rights of our children.

Dealing with the third matter, there has existed a federal-provincial-territorial committee examining the impact of ratification of the United Nations Convention and how it would affect existing and needed legislation by all levels of government. While ratification would indicate provincial and federal compliance with the United Nations Convention, without a domestic means of enforcing the convention, no remedy other than moral suasion exists to ensure the rights are respected. Without a domestic bill of rights with a mechanism to seek redress and compliance, the United Nations convention remains largely symbolic.

Dealing with the fourth matter, once ratified the United Nations Convention requires that signators comply with it and that they report on action taken to implement the provisions of the convention. As such, rather than limit flexibility, a domestic bill of rights for children would set down enforceable guidelines which would allow for a wider range of policies than now exist to protect and provide for the welfare of children. That a bill of rights would restrict flexibility is a conservative argument that sees bills of rights as a ceiling of protection rather than a floor upon which rights can be expanded.

In short, what we are seeking is not an infringement on provincial jurisdiction any more than the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is an infringement on those powers. What we seek is a binding national statement of the rights of Canadian children in compliance with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

• (1710)

Our motion is explicit that consultation and negotiation with provinces be undertaken before such a bill of rights comes into force. That is the reason I read the particular motion. It is to be emphasized that consultation and negotiation with the provinces is to be undertaken before such a bill of rights comes into force. As such, what we are asking is what has already been started and will have to continue in order for ratification to come about.

What the United Nations has in mind for its children's bill of rights is that every child has the inherent right to life, and that the state shall ensure maximum child survival and development. It also states the following points. Every child has the right to a name and nationality from birth. Children should not be separated from their parents unless competent authorities forbid it for their well-being. The state should protect children from physical or mental harm and neglect. The state should ensure health care as provided to all children. Primary education shall be free and compulsory as early as possible. Discipline should respect the child's dignity. Children should have time to rest and play and have equal opportunities for cultural and artistic activities. The state should protect children from the illegal use of drugs. Children of minority and indigenous populations shall freely enjoy their own culture, religion and language.

It seems to me that this is not too much to ask in a society such as ours where we are working hard at projecting what we want not only in Canada but in the rest of the world. It seems to me that the motion put before the House today is a motion that would protect those children and progress the arguments not only here but around the world. It should be a projection that will show the world that Canada is at the forefront, that Canada is willing to stand up for what we wish for others within their own country for their own children.

Many stories abound of children living in poverty, of children who are abused physically, mentally and sexually, of children who go to school without food and without adequate care. We in this party care for the children of Canada and are asking through this motion that something be done about that.

Today's children need to grow up in a secure, social and economic circumstance if they are to become full participants in tomorrow's society as productive workers, effective parents and responsible citizens. The social and economic costs of failing to provide these circumstances are exceedingly high. Hardship, ill health and educational failure are the daily realities faced by children who grow up in poverty.

In Canada, infant mortality among poor children is twice the national average. Twice as many poor children fall behind in educational achievement by the age of 15.

This motion is a small step to resolving these problems. I urge the House to accept and adopt this motion.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak only briefly on this motion, Motion No. M–254. I want to speak in favour of it because, obviously, it is one which is very important. It is most important that the children of this country have a bill of rights which would strive to standardize laws throughout the country and to offer child protection, an emergency hotline and those other things that such a bill of rights would include.

At the time that we are meeting now there is an issue which is before the United Nations. We know that in 1959, I believe it was, the United Nations adopted the Declaration of the Rights of the Child. That declaration at that time spoke of the rights of handicapped children and other children. Although I do not have the text in front of me, I remember a portion of the text, particularly the preamble which states: "Whereas the child by reason of his or her physical handicap requires special protection before as well as after birth—"

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you know what I am going to mention next. It is that I feel that this bill of rights, if and when we ever have one in this country, should include the rights of children before as well as after birth. It could be that the person who proposed this motion would not agree with me on that point, although I hope that she will.

That being said, I happen to believe that the rights of children 10 minutes before birth or 10 minutes after are, in natural law, identical. I think the laws of this land should give children equal protection before as well as after birth.

There is no mention of that in this motion. But, on the other hand, there is nothing that would exclude that possibility either. So I suppose the motion need not be amended because it certainly does not exclude the proposition that I make at this juncture.

However, if the government adopts the initiative put forward by my colleague, with which I agree, I hope that it sees fit to include those rights of children in that bill of rights, whether those children are born or conceived and not yet born. As far as I am concerned those rights need to be recognized.

As a matter of fact, civil law does recognize the rights of unborn children. That is not a new concept. It is one that has been held constantly in this country and in others. The House will know of a number of cases where a testator has awarded his or her belongings to his or her children. The courts have always decided in such cases that a child conceived, yet unborn at the time of the death of such a person, was equally qualified to be a recipient of any belongings given in a testament.

That principle has always been held in civil law. So it follows, as far as I am concerned, that a bill of rights should give at least equal rights to a child yet unborn.

If such a bill of rights would not include the rights of the unborn child then there obviously would be a double standard, and the double standard would be as follows: A child yet unborn could be the recipient of the proceeds of a testament provided that someone did not kill him or her before birth. To me that would be a situation which is unacceptable in common sense as well as natural law.

• (1720)

So I would hope, if and when the government enacts or proposes to this House such a bill of rights as advocated by our colleague, the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, that the bill will include the provisions which I have just described.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to speak during this fifth and final hour of debate on Motion No. M-254 with regard to a bill of rights for children. As a member of the Metropolitan Toronto Council for 11 years, the rights of children was an issue that I was certainly very concerned about. I spent 11 years as a member of the Children's Aid Society in Metropolitan Toronto and also served on a provincial children's services committee as well as on a committee of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario. Certainly, this is a motion that greatly concerns me.

The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

I want to thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam for placing this motion before the House, a motion which focuses on protecting the rights of our children. No one can deny Canada's most important resource and, in my view, Canada's most important people.

If there is any one group in our society that is particularly vulnerable and in need of protection, it is our children. That being said, this government is responding by actively pursuing its commitment to ensuring the healthy growth and development of every child in Canada. Nevertheless, this goal represents a very challenging and complex task.

Since the hon. member tabled her motion last year, much has happened in regard to families and children. In particular, Canada and the world as a whole have witnessed the adoption of a major initiative, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. I would like to argue that, as a result of this change, the motion for another bill of rights may no longer be the most effective, appropriate route to address the needs of Canada's children.

The UN convention covers a wide spectrum on children's rights and, as such, fully satisfies the part of the motion before the House which speaks to the need for a comprehensive bill of rights for children. In this regard, this convention is intended to establish a modern, international standard for addressing the social, economic, political, religious, cultural and civil rights of children all over the world.

As well, the convention provides for the protection of children from abuse, neglect and exploitation, the protection of children with disabilities and the protection of children without families. The adoption of this convention will require the review of all our institutions and legislation to ensure that it conforms with the convention.

This could require amendments, not only to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms but also to other laws. I think about the incidents I personally have encountered in my constituency in regard to immigration and the refugee backlog. I think the adoption of such a convention would certainly have a major impact throughout our entire system.

The list of possible initiatives reflecting the convention are, therefore, endless and would include, for example, an emergency hotline for children, which was mentioned in Motion No. M-254 and which, in fact, has been the object of recent federal support. This could also possibly include a child protection commission, as the hon. member has suggested, or a secretariat for children, as has been requested by the Canadian School Trustees Association.

The federal government has already pledged $1.3 million towards an emergency hotline, the Kids Help Phone, which offers counselling, information and, if appropriate, referral services to Canada's seven million children. Since May of last year the Kids Help Phone has received well over 70,000 calls, so it is certainly a great success and obviously meeting a tremendous need.

The convention, through Article 27, also speaks to the right of every child to an adequate standard of living and calls on state parties to take appropriate measures to assist parents in fulfilling this right. State parties will, therefore, have to examine issues like financial deprivation among children—something which we in Canada tend to call child poverty—and to assess the need for action. In Canada, of course, child poverty and the need to alleviate poverty among children is an issue which has drawn, and rightly so, increasing attention, including in this House.

As you will recall, last November the House addressed the important issue of child poverty and unanimously supported the motion by the former hon. member for Oshawa which focused on seeking ways to eliminate child poverty before the year 2000. As part of this debate, the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare outline the government's support for efforts addressing the child poverty issue.

Furthermore, a House subcommittee, on which both the hon. member and I sit, as well as other hon. members, is now examining possible action plans for addressing child poverty. As part of its activities it is hearing from many of the key groups representing the interests of children and families.

Formalizing the convention in Canada, and thereby furthering the aims of the bill of rights for children, will require a co-operative effort between the federal government and the provinces, given that many of the obligations in the convention fall within provincial and/or shared jurisdiction. To this end the federal government is now seeking the support of the provinces and territories for signature.

Efforts are also currently under way through federal-provincial consultations on the question of ratification of the convention. Given the broad scope of the UN convention, this government believes strongly that the convention is a much more potent and effective tool to support the rights of children. Moreover, given that the convention is already in place and Canada is now considering its ratification, we believe it also serves as a most timely vehicle.

So rather than starting down on a new track, I would like to ask the member whether she would agree to substituting the former recommendation of the government that we now endorse the UN convention, which will certainly lead to the implementation of everything in her proposal and, in so doing, have a unanimous motion of the House that we can all start work on today. I understand that with unanimous consent this is quite possible. Consent would certainly be forthcoming from this side of the House.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to support this bill of rights for children. Certainly, the principles that are involved are among the noblest. Before I suggest a few refinements to what might be done, I want to review some of the statistics with respect to children in this country.

We have roughly five million children in elementary and secondary schools. We have approximately half that number at the preschool and kindergarten levels and, although we cannot call our college and university students children, there are over 500,000 young people in our universities and over 330,000 young men and women in our colleges.

We have talked about poverty in this House on a number of occasions. There are between three and a half to five million poor in this country, and over one million of those individuals are children. They are poorly fed and ill-housed. Often they do not have the basic supports that you and I would want for our own children.

It has also been indicated in the House that there are more soup kitchens or food banks in this country than there are McDonald's restaurants.

• (1730)

This is a relatively rich country. However, we have three and a half to five million poor in Canada, one million of whom are children. I ask you to pause for a moment and think of the plight of children throughout this world.

In spite of the fact that many of our boys and girls have a lot available to them, there is still much that needs to be done. Yes, we have impressive educational programs in place at the elementary, secondary and post-secondary levels, and yes, we have many other programs that are supportive and will help them develop and become the adults who will make significant contributions to their society. But there is still much abuse.

We hesitate often to mention sexual abuse, physical abuse, emotional abuse, but it does exist. It hurts me, as I know it hurts many, many Canadians to acknowledge this reality. We must do everything in our power to eradicate this from society.

[Translation]

There are many programs in place to provide support for our young people. I find that very encouraging. However, I think what we need is an in-depth study not only of what is available today but of what we could and should be able to provide for young people.

I wish we could also give thorough consideration to the kind of support we should give parents in the home as well as working parents. To me, it would be hard to find a nobler cause than this one: to implement a policy or legislation that enables us to do everything we can to promote the well-being of all children, of all young Canadians. I think that if we do this, we would also be able to help children in other countries who are not as privileged as our own.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I give the floor to the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, I must inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 44(3), the reply of the mover of the original motion will close the debate. The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we have had five hours of debate on this motion, a debate which has for the most part recognized the importance of enacting in law programs and policies which will protect and further the welfare of our children in Canada. I would first like to thank those members from all sides of the House who rose to speak to this motion.

We have heard support for this motion from all sides. Yet that support has not been without hesitation. Some members hesitate because they see technical or jurisdictional problems which would halt the development of this national bill of rights for children. They have brought to this place a list of the programs funded and administered by the federal government. They have noted the importance of provisions of the criminal law in protecting children and the advancements made. But still they cannot fully support this motion. They do not want to infringe on provincial jurisdiction.

But that is exactly what this motion seeks to avoid. It calls for negotiations and consultation, not to dictate. It calls on the federal government to begin negotiations with the provinces to put into Canadian law the rights and ideals of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Without such a move, the 10 years of effort which Canada led, I might add, to bring this convention in at the United Nations to the point of ratification will be lost. Without a domestic law, Canadian children will be denied recourse and denied a voice in their own futures.

Many children in this country live in poverty. They are exploited in the workplace. They are the victims of sexual abuse. They fall prey to the influence of adults who would draw them into a world of crime, drugs and violence. They frequent food banks. They go to school hungry.

All members, both in the government and opposition, know this. In fact, a number of members cited many of these problems in their addresses to this House. Yet what we have heard is, "yes, but—".

That is not what our children deserve. Our children care not about the constitutional division of powers in this country. They want and deserve a secure future, a future which respects their rights as individuals of value, a future where hunger, poverty, abuse and exploitation are not to be tolerated but are to be eliminated.

We in this place have the responsibility to exercise our rights as parliamentarians, to take this small step to see that the future of our children is a better one than that endured by so many children today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the nays have it it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

• (1805)

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

There is a special procedure for voting during Private Members' Business. I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in order to allow all members to vote according to their own voting patterns, rather than doing it by party, that you proceed with the vote row by row, and not party by party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House in agreement that the division should be taken by rows?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is at this point that I would like to remind hon. members that the voting will begin by my asking those members who are in favour of the motion in the rows to my right to rise by row, and then with those members in the rows to my left. Later, I will ask those members who are opposed to the motion in rows to my right to rise and end with those members opposed to the motion in the rows to my left.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, this morning we read in the newspapers that Canada's number one banker, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Crow, has had annual salary increases ranging from 12 to 21 per cent since he was appointed in 1987, while the Canadian average was 4.5 per cent in 1988 and 5.25 per cent in 1989.

Nevertheless, Mr. Crow insists that a 5 per cent increase is inflationary. The government is taking steps to reduce the deficit and asking Canadians to help by tightening their belts. The salaries of the members of this House, Mr. Speaker, have increased by an average of only 2.8 per cent annually over the past six years.

Without wishing to question Mr. Crow's competence and credibility, I think he has a duty to practise what he preaches. This morning, Canadians were indignant, as I was, when they heard the news.

I hope Mr. Crow will be more consistent in the future and will take the necessary corrective action.

ANNIVERSARY OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to extend warm wishes to the Greek community in Canada as it recently celebrated, on March 25, the one hundred and sixty-ninth year of Greek independence.

This event stands as a proud testimony to the dynamism of the Greek people, their history and their culture. One hundred and sixty-nine years ago the Greek people ignited the first spark of a democratic movement as they fought for freedom against the Ottoman Empire. Since that time, the people of Greece and Greeks around the world have carried the torch of democracy proudly and with great dignity.

Almost daily we open our newspapers and read of sweeping political changes taking place all over the world. Everywhere the voice of democracy seems to be booming. However, it saddens me that while in other countries there is a general ease of tension, the situation in Cyprus has not changed. For the past 25 years Canada has had peacekeeping troops in Cyprus.

I strongly urge the government to apply whatever pressure possible to encourage demilitarization and dialogue so that democracy might once again be restored and Canadian troops can return home.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, last evening this House had the opportunity to pass a motion presented by my colleague from Mission-Coquitlam. The motion called on this government to negotiate with the provinces and develop a bill of rights for children. It would have given legal standing to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

In debate, the government side expressed its genuine concern for the future of Canada's children. There were compassionate voices from that side of the House. But last night we witnessed the victory of partisanship over principle. Eighty-two government members voted against this motion. They turned and voted against a bill of rights for children.

Mr. Speaker, I am still shocked. This government denied Canadian children rights that we want for all the children of the world. To add insult to injury, the Prime Minister has agreed to co-chair the World Summit for Children. Such hypocrisy. The actions of this government yesterday show that it cares more about the limelight of the international stage than the future of real children in Canada.

I want Canadians to know that we had a great opportunity to help all children and I want Canadians to know who ended that hope; it was the 82 members on the government side who voted against a bill of rights for children.

CHILDREN AND HOSPITALS WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, this week marks the eleventh anniversary celebration of Children and Hospitals Week. Children and Hospitals Week is a public awareness campaign which focuses attention on the unique needs of children and family as they interact with the health care system. This year's theme is commitment to caring and a major goal of the week is to promote health care policies and practices which are both sensitive and responsive to the emotional and developmental needs of paediatric patients. Children and Hospitals Week is sponsored annually by the Association for the Care of Children's Health.

I invite all Canadians to celebrate Children and Hospitals Week by taking part in special events such as health fairs, hospital tours and, for the NDP, Teddy Bear clinics and balloon launches.

Finally, I applaud the Association for the Care of Children's Health and its members for their commitment to promoting the psychosocial well-being of children and families in health care settings.

MISS TEEN CANADA

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, as the opposition critic for youth, I today want to salute a young lady from my riding who was named Miss Teen Canada.

Tonya Goss was a student of mine at Notre Dame High School just a few years ago. I recall a time when we were talking about the Parliament of Canada and studying Canadian history. She is now becoming a part of that by being named here in this House of Commons and saluted by all of us for her accomplishments.

She was an excellent student and an effervescent young lady who was not only captain but coach of the cheerleading team. I believe that Tonya Goss will not only represent the city of Welland well; she will represent the Niagara Peninsula and, indeed, all of Canada as she travels extensively both within Canada and without, representing us. She will be a fine ambassador and I do indeed salute her in all of our names.

GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, Le Devoir reported that since 1986, the Governor of the Bank of Canada has had salary increases ranging from 12 to 21 per cent. Without wishing to question Mr. Crow's dedication, since we all know he is waging a tough battle against inflation, I think we should remember that the average Canadian has to make do with an annual increase of about 5.25 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we keep things in perspective.

* * *

GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I, too, was shocked to learn that the battle against inflation being waged by the Governor of the Bank of Canada does not extend to his own salary. I had fully expected that the man who asks so much from western Canadians would lead by example. Instead, I find that Mr. Crow has accepted wage increases of at least 12 per cent a year for the past several years and now the media reports a salary of up to $243,000.

How can we continue to ask the regions of this country to suffer today in order to have a better future tomorrow while at the same time Mr. Crow himself acts as as contributor to the inflation we are trying to control? I cannot justify these salary increases and I cannot ask my constituents to understand how this happens.

The newspaper headline reads: "Crow has no choice but to keep interest high". I will keep my interest high if Mr. Crow refuses his increase.

• (1410)

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, one of the most unconscionable aspects of the finance minister's recent budget was the cuts to our veterans. Canadians realize that we must ensure that the surviving Canadian veterans, who fought to restore freedom to millions and to help change the history of the world for the better, should be given every consideration.

Yet this government has decided to show its respect by forcing many of our veterans in long-term chronic care to pay as much as 400 per cent more for board and lodging. This government has also reduced the Veterans Independence Program by $18 million. This program assisted those 60,000 veterans still living at home with housecleaning duties they can no longer maintain themselves.

As veteran Captain P. L. Bender from my riding of Nepean wrote: "Such a move is highly inconsiderate and thoughtless. There are not many veterans left and all young people should remember that the life they are enjoying today is due in some considerable degree to those who fought in the wars".

Our veterans deserve better. They have already paid their dues.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the so-called campaign for fair taxes is a real con job being perpetrated on the public.

Unfair taxes are those which: (a) are hidden from consumers; (b) negatively impact on lower-income Canadians; (c) discriminate against Canadian goods in favour of imports; and (d) are applied at different levels to different things.

The GST does none of these things. It is an up-front, visible sales tax. The GST credit will shield lower-income Canadians who will end up better off under the GST than before. It removes the discrimination against locally produced goods, and it is applied uniformly to goods and services.

I believe in fair taxation, that is why I support the GST. That is why a vote against the GST is a vote against fair taxes.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the nominees for corporate welfare bum of the week are again three major corporations that did not pay any federal income taxes in 1988. They are: Brascan, Confederation Life Insurance and Xerox Canada. The three companies had combined profits of close to $400 million but did not contribute their fair share of taxes.

Were these companies so hard up that they could not contribute to their favour charities, the Liberal and Conservative Parties? Of course not. For instance, Xerox Canada gave over $11,000 to both the Liberals and the Conservatives.

And now for the winner. The envelope, please. And the winner is Brascan. Brascan is the corporate welfare bum of the week. It did not pay income taxes on profits of $263 million but it did give $50,000 to the Tories and $25,000 to the Liberals in 1988. Brascan did not forget to "dance with the one who brung ya".

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers are hurting right across Canada, from the wheat grower in the prairie provinces to the corn producer in southwestern Ontario. Net farm incomes are the lowest in decades in many provinces. Farm bankruptcies have increased dramatically. In fact, in Saskatchewan, they have tripled in the last three years to 152 last year. Farm incomes are so low that at least one-quarter of the grain producers in Saskatchewan are facing the loss of their farms. Bankers will not give loans any more on the basis of equity, but purely on the basis of cash flow, and many grain prices are so low that the crops will not cash flow.

I call on the government to respond to this tragedy for tens of thousands of Canadian farm families and to provide emergency assistance now.

Oral Questions

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, on March 26, the Ontario Government announced that over 10,500 acres of the Rouge River Valley System will be saved as a park.

As much as Premier Peterson's announcement is to be congratulated, it is the thousands of Save the Rouge Valley System organization volunteers to whom we owe our greatest appreciation. For over 17 years, SRVS has fought to protect the incredible wilderness as a park. The announcement is a tribute to their dedication and to their commitment.

We in this Chamber, and especially you, Mr. Speaker, can also be proud of the role that we have played in helping to save the Rouge. Over one year ago, the federal government committed $10 million toward the creation of the park in the valley and two months ago this Chamber unanimously endorsed a motion I put forward to save the valley.

Let us all celebrate this victory for the people of Scarborough and for the environmental future of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the provinces rejected his efforts to get them to help him collect his goods and services tax. This means that if the tax should ever come into law, we will be the only country in the world with at least 10 different sales tax systems.

In his White Paper on sales tax reform in 1987, the minister said: "If all governments were to have different tax bases the system would be a national tax in name only. Effectively, it would be unworkable."

Yesterday, the minister admitted that if his proposal for a goods and services tax went into effect, he would be putting into effect a system which he himself said in 1987 would be unworkable.

Why is the minister trying to ram this tax through the House of Commons? Why does he not simply withdraw it? Instead of trying to put through a tax he characterizes as unworkable why does he not go back to the drawing board and create a truly fair tax system for all Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this will be a fair tax system for all Canadians. With the introduction of the goods and services tax credit, which will help low-income Canadians offset a good portion of sales tax, compared to the system existing today the new system will be much fairer.

The hon. member has referred to the fact that the provinces have not seen fit to join in with us to collect the tax. That is true. But there are a number of other efforts under way through which we are working with the provinces to develop ways of reducing the complexity of the tax to minimize the compliance burden. We are taking advice from the small business sector as to ways we can do this.

I believe that the result will be a less complex tax for the small business community and something which should provide a basis for expansion of that co-operative effort into the future so it will have more co-operation from the provinces and less overlap.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, small business people have a quite different view of the effects on them of the minister's goods and services tax.

John Bullock, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said: "When you talk to a small businessman about operating two totally unharmonized retail sales tax systems you are talking about a nightmare." Those are not my words. They are those of Mr. Bullock, a leader of small business in this country.

Once again, why will the minister not withdraw this unworkable sales tax proposal, send his departmental officials back to the drawing board and tell them to develop a totally fair tax package for the country which would not be a nightmare for small business and which would be fair to all Canadians? Why will he not do that instead of trying to stick to a tax which he himself admitted, when he first started talking about it, would be unworkable if there was not one single sales tax base?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for the last 50 years now we have had one royal commission after another, one task force after another. There have been five royal commissions, task forces and committees recommending that we move away from the existing sales tax.

John Bullock agrees we should be moving away from the existing sales tax. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce agrees we should be moving away from the existing sales tax. The Business Council on National Issues, the manufacturers association, the construction association, the exporters and the importers have all recognized what the leader of the Liberal party has not recognized, that we have a tax system that, today, does not work. It is unfair. It is administratively so complex that the regulations for that tax are three feet long. It is time for us to change.

• (1420)

We have put forward a proposal which is quite workable. It is going to be a much better tax system for our exporters. It will put Canadian producers on a level playing field with the importers with which they compete.

Today, Canadian producers pay one-third more than the exporters with which they are competing. This is the change that we want to make and we believe it is a good change.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said in his own paper two years ago, and I quote: "If all governments were to have different tax bases, the system would be a national tax in name only. Effectively, it would be unworkable".

I would therefore ask the Minister of Finance why he insists on imposing a tax on Canadians which he himself has said is unworkable and which small businesses see as a nightmare. Why do we need a tax system that is both unworkable and a nightmare?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, possibly it would be of interest to Canadians to know why the Liberal party wants to keep a tax that is deeply hidden in the price of everything that we buy. Possibly Canadians would like to know from the leader of the Liberal party why the party is in favour of a tax that adds a hidden tax to everything that we export. Possibly Canadians would like to know why the Liberal party is in favour of a tax that taxes Canadian products one-third more than the imports with which they compete.

Would the Leader of the Opposition let us in on the secret? Why have they taken this stupid position?

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He just finished quoting the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Chamber of Commerce as being supporters of his goods and services tax because they want to get rid of the present federal sales tax.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he is going to repeat that again because he knows full well that the Chamber of Commerce in Saint John last year and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business still today insist that if you cannot get this tax right by getting provincial co-operation you should stick with the federal sales tax because this is an administrative nightmare.

Is the minister denying that that is what the Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business say?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are many organizations which agree that we should be getting rid of the existing sales tax. Even my hon. friend is on record as saying the existing sales tax is wrong and it should be changed. All members of the finance committee in the last Parliament—Liberal, New Democratic and Conservative— agree that the existing sales tax is a mess. We, as a government, have to take that advice. We, as a government, have to put up our proposal for the best way of fixing it.

Sure there are people who would like to have a lower rate. Sure there are people who would like to tax food. Sure there are people who would like to have a national sales tax, including the provinces.

We would like to have a national sales tax too but, unfortunately, the provinces are not ready for that. They know that there are things that they could do to help us improve their compliance burden and those provinces are helping us take steps to improve the compliance burden.

The government has to move ahead. We were elected to govern. We were elected to face the problems of the nation. We are going to deal with one of the major problems that we are facing today.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance said earlier in answer to a question, that the new goods and services tax would be fairer than the present tax. Is the minister prepared to tell the House today whether his government will index credits for the neediest in this country? Will the credits for Canada's most vulnerable taxpayers be completely indexed? Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are treating the goods and services tax credit in the same way as all other elements of the tax system. That is, it will be indexed at a level of consumer price index less 3 per cent. We have demonstrated time and again since we put in that provision that we make adjustments in an appropriate way to take into account the changing circumstances of people in low income brackets.

We have increased the refundable sales tax credit threshold from $15,000 to $16,000 to $18,000, and now, with the GST credit, it will be $25,000. We have increased the size of the child tax credit. We have also made changes in the income tax system that came into effect in 1988 which took 850,000 people off the tax rolls by making adjustments in the index formula.

That is precisely how this government will operate in the future. Where it is appropriate we will make the changes to improve the position of low income taxpayers.

AGRICULTURE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. As the minister is well aware, many Canadian farmers feel there is a crisis in this particular sector. Farmers deserve adequate compensation for all the work they do and for their production costs. This is only fair. Will the minister immediately set up a national plan for farm income stabilization?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yes, I am indeed aware of the difficulties that the agriculture community faces, particularly in Saskatchewan and the prairie region where depressed prices, drought and other factors have led to a serious downfall in projected net farm income.

The hon. member asks whether we would put in place a new stabilization program. I can advise her that that is, indeed, one of the major priorities that is being undertaken as a result of the agriculture policy review.

We expect the task force that is studying this particular issue in depth to report back to us by April 30.

I might also indicate to the hon. member that I will be meeting with ministers of agriculture tomorrow to talk about the agriculture review process and options for the possibility of putting together a package that might alleviate the farm income situation as well.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Minister of Agriculture. Of course the minister knows that the crisis is now. It has been going on, however, for some time. I would like to remind the minister that in October 1988 the Prime Minister said that we are not going to allow a single farmer to hang out to dry simply because the Americans and the Europeans have a subsidy war going on.

I would like to ask the minister about his program for farmers. It now appears that the United States is going to extend the American farm bill to 1995 providing American farmers, as he knows, with guaranteed protection against a depressed world market. Yet, here in Canada the government has failed to come to terms with this. Farm incomes here in Canada are expected to go down by 43 per cent.

We need those programs now. When will the government put Canadian farmers on an equal footing with American farmers and guarantee Canadian farmers the support equivalent to the price support that their American counterparts are going to have?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware that the need is now and that is precisely why, in December, we set up a federal–provincial monitoring committee to look at the various facets of the farm income question. It is a multi–faceted question. The low commodity prices as a result of the trade war being conducted between the European Community and the United States is indeed a factor.

If the hon. member is suggesting that all the help farmers need is the equivalent of what the United States has been paying with respect to the Export Enhancement Program, I can tell her, for her information, that so far this year the Americans have spent $140 million on the Export Enhancement Program. I think the problem is much more serious than that and I can assure her that we will be dealing with it in that vein.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the Minister of Agriculture that this requires a number of initiatives including the farm stabilization program and help to assist our farmers in getting a fair price for their produce.

• (1430)

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance about another initiative that this government could take. Canadian farmers are not suffering from inflation that the Minister of Finance so often speaks of; they are suffering from deflation. The minister knows that Canadian farmers are paying out billions of dollars in interest on land which is worth less than it was six years ago. This cannot continue.

Will the minister act immediately to look at implementing a program of protected interest rates for all farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the Farm Debt Review Board there is flexibility in the administration of that to take into consideration interest rate reductions and to take into consideration declining values in farm land. One of the areas we are looking at is an expansion of that program to make it more flexible in order to deal with the current situation, particularly as it applies in western Canada.

I should say as well, for the benefit of the hon. member, that with respect to the livestock industry we just announced last week a continuation of the deferral program on the sale of livestock in the drought stricken areas of western Canada. If there are any other affected areas in Canada, we will apply it there as well.

I might ask the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party to prevail upon her colleagues when we do have important agriculture legislation like the crop insurance program, which was filibustered for two or three days by the NDP. That does not do a great service to the farmers or the people of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister failed to keep his promise that he would not tax food. With the GST, the Minister of Finance is going to tax all baked goods. More than 85 per cent of Canadian families eat cookies, baked goods or pastry with their meals. Will the Minister of Finance finally admit to Canadians that he misled them, since he is also taxing food with his GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that is before the finance committee of the House of Commons. I think that is where it should be dealt with. Once the finance committee reports, then the government will respond.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I hope the chairman of the finance committee is listening to the minister. Yesterday at a press conference, the president of Culinar stated that more than 300 jobs might be lost in East Montreal because of the GST. Will the Minister of Finance keep his word and refrain from taxing food? Or even better, will he withdraw his proposed goods and services tax?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the second question is the same as the answer to the first question.

The hon. member is talking about things that are currently being discussed by the finance committee of the House of Commons. Until it reports, it would be inappropriate for the government to make any comment.

WAR CRIMINALS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. I want to ask the minister a question that I raised with the former minister by letter and in the House of Commons in May 1988, namely the fact that Wilhelm Mohnke, a former SS officer, alleged to have murdered dozens of Canadian prisoners of war, is living today without challenge and in comfort in West Germany.

The minister, when I asked before, gave me an answer that was meant to imply some type of activity on his part. It now appears that he did absolutely nothing to press the West German government to act on this case. I want to ask the new minister whether she will take up this case. Will she press the West Germans, on behalf of the families of victims in Canada, to take action in the case of Wilhelm Mohnke?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to remind the hon. member that it was this government that did take up the question of war crimes and war criminals, instituted the Deschênes commission, and brought laws before this House which now make it possible for us to prosecute war criminals.

Unfortunately, the gentleman to whom he makes reference is a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany whose own laws prohibit them from extraditing their own nationals.

We have as early as 1976 advised the West Germans of our information with respect to Mr. Mohnke, and there is an ongoing investigation. Unfortunately, under the terms of our international agreement with West Germany, I am not at liberty to reveal the details of that investigation except simply to say that it is ongoing and that appropriate efforts are being made to bring the information to the attention of the West Germans.

My officials have raised and discussed this case with the West Germans. I take the hon. member's question at face value as expressing his serious concern for this issue. I will certainly undertake to raise it in addition with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): The minister pointed out the limitations of the government's present policies. These do not apply to German criminals because they are not prepared to extradite their own nationals. That is why it is important to make representations at the political level. The minister said she would make representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but what is she going to do about the Germans, or what is her colleague going to do to ensure that something is done–in this case, about a war criminal living in Ottawa?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer for my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I repeat what I said in English, namely that my department has been investigating the matter, and we are looking into this. As soon as I have anything to report to the House, I will do so.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. members: Go on! Go on!

[English]

Mr. Barrett: The Prime Minister has indicated publicly that he would not be scandalized, among other things, if Canada, the United States and Mexico had a free trade agreement.

Now that we are aware that the United States and Mexico are engaging in negotiations for a free trade agreement between those two countries, is the intention for Canada to be a participant in trilateral negotiations for a free trade agreement, or will there be an observer at the U.S.–Mexican discussions about free trade?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I first want to say that his French was so impeccable it deserves the applause of all members in this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: We are advised of the general interest of the Government of Mexico to expand its trading horizons with other countries, including perhaps the United States. We have received no formal notice of that, nor have we been advised of any arrangements that might directly or indirectly impact on trading arrangements that we have.

Should that come about, I can assure my hon. friend that we will exercise all the vigilance he would want us to in those circumstances.

[Translation]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): I thank the Prime Minister.

[English]

I want to inform the House that your English is impeccable as well.

The Prime Minister has claimed that over 200,000 jobs have been created by the free trade agreement over the long haul of the agreement and that 25,000 of them were created last month.

I know the Prime Minister to be a man of his word. I have seen no evidence of those 200,000 jobs listed in detail or no evidence of 25,000 jobs created last month. In order to avoid the press criticizing the Prime Minister for not being accurate and backing up his statements, I would ask the Prime Minister, through you Mr. Speaker, if he is prepared to table in detail those 200,000 jobs that have been created according to him by the free trade agreement and the 25,000 created last month, in French or in English.

• (1440)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will table them, in both official languages. I should say en passant that it is a very good thing that my hon. friend did not display such remarkable agility in the other official language in December; otherwise the present leader of the New Democratic Party might have been in serious trouble.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Somebody said she already is, and I disagree with that completely.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I think she is doing a tremendous job and we should all sustain her in those efforts.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this discussion could be continued elsewhere perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister would answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, since the free trade agreement came into effect in January 1989, there have been 257,000 new jobs created in Canada. Ninety per cent of those jobs have been full time, 79 per cent of those jobs have gone to women. Forty-nine per cent of the jobs created since January 1989 have been created in western Canada, the vast majority of them in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Barrett: Give us the list.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend asks for a list. Well, 7,000 new jobs in Nova Scotia; 5,000 in New Brunswick; 16,000 in Quebec; 102,000 in Ontario—

Some hon. members: More, more!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps not the whole list at this time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Notwithstanding our current difficulties, the Atlantic fishery is a $1 billion industry that needs to be protected. Some are suggesting that aerial surveillance of our Atlantic waters will end with the elimination of the tracker fleet.

In view of these concerns, will the minister advise the House as to what measure he is taking to ensure that there is continuity of protection for this valuable resource?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this question is prompted by a Liberal member raising this matter last week in order to have Atlantic Canadians believe that we are doing less. The fact of the matter is that there will be no lapse—and that was the suggestion—in air surveillance in Atlantic Canada.

If we look at this year, for example, we had something like 1,750 hours of air surveillance in Atlantic Canada. Under the new contract which is about to be announced at $28.5 million, this will go up to 3,850 hours. Even back home in Atlantic Canada that is more, not less.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

[English]

Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade confessed that he was not aware of the free trade talks between Mexico and the United States.

This is a government that prides itself on its very close and special relationship with the United States. Can the Prime Minister explain to this House how, when this trade deal has such profound implications for Canadian businesses and workers, his government was not made aware of it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend is offended by the idea of free trade, in view of the remarkable support free trade is now getting from the Government of Ontario. If it is good for Ontario, it has to be good for Mexico.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: The Government of Mexico can initiate talks with whomever it wishes, at whatever time it chooses. It has not initiated any conversations of this kind with the Government of Canada, nor am I informed has it done so with the Government of the United States.

If there are exchanges which interest us or impact upon treaties that we have concluded, we will of course exercise that degree of vigilance that is appropriate and will intervene. I will be happy to report to my hon. friend as these matters develop.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): On this point, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: —maybe I could quote for the Prime Minister an official from the office of the Minister for International Trade office. He said yesterday regarding the Mexican free trade deal: "One of the big advantages we were promised under free trade, preferential access to the U.S. market, could—disappear".

Did the government address these concerns when it was negotiating the free trade deal with the United States? If not, how could it have been so derelict in its responsibility toward Canadian businesses and Canadian workers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will understand that I cannot comment on the views of an unidentified official who remains anonymous after my hon. friend's question.

The free trade agreement dealt specifically with the kind of concern that is being raised by my hon. friend. We put in the rules of origin provisions in the free trade agreement which prevent the kinds of things that my hon. friend is concerned about.

I noticed the other day that he said he was fearful of the fact that low wages in Mexico could have a deleterious effect on Canadian jobs. But, here is the Government of Ontario putting out a $500,000 ad which boasts that relatively low wages in Ontario at $13.80 per hour compared with $18.30 per hour in Michigan will have a beneficial effect upon the economy of Ontario. Make up your mind. If it's good for Ontario, surely it has to be good for other provinces and other countries.

HEALTH

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Sixty-four per cent of the former workers at the coke ovens in Sydney, Nova Scotia who have died in the past 26 years were being treated for cancer. I realize the provincial responsibility here, but the minister is well aware of this serious situation and has been requested on many occasions to do health studies of that region.

Will he announce today that he will be doing health studies of the coke ovens area in Sydney, Nova Scotia as soon as possible?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare is very much concerned about this issue. Some years ago we gave information to other officials who were involved, indicating our concerns about the health effects. We have communicated with the Government of Nova Scotia to indicate that we are prepared to provide any possible assistance to them in doing any research they would like to see done.

As the hon. gentleman pointed out, the responsibility for occupational health and safety belongs to the province. We stand by available to help out if we can, but it is their initiative to take.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister would not want to give the impression that the Government of Canada is hiding behind the responsibility of the province of Nova Scotia. I know he feels, as I do, that this is a very serious situation. He also knows that there are things the federal government can do, particularly in public dialogue with the province of Nova Scotia to get it to move on this issue. The health of Canadians is at stake.

With the health of Canadians at stake and with the seriousness of this situation, will he not do more than the federal government has done in the past?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, we are very much concerned about the health of all the people in the area. As the hon. gentleman recognizes, the responsibility for occupational health and safety is that of the province. We cannot violate the Constitution of Canada.

We are doing everything we can, and that is to offer to the Government of Nova Scotia any possible assistance we can provide in terms of giving advice or conducting studies. We would be pleased to do that. We are standing by to give any assistance we can provide and we are available to do that. The initiative must be theirs.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

On March 14, the Minister for International Trade told the House: "There will be no raw herring exported to Japan by this means or any other."

The minister was referring to the 107 permits issued by the international trade department to processors to allow export to the U.S.

Over the past weekend there was concern over the attempt by a B.C. company to export 300 tonnes of unprocessed roe herring to Japan. According to officials in the international trade department the company withdrew its request.

Will the minister clearly indicate just what is the federal government's policy with respect to export permits for herring and salmon?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will confirm the minister's answer in the House some time ago. Under the Canada–U.S. Trade Commission agreement reached last month, the government will not issue export permits for unprocessed Pacific herring to any country, except the U.S., when valid certification is presented that the herring in question will be consumed there or processed to the same degree as in Canada.

The Department of External Affairs and International Trade has established the procedures to allow my department, DFO, to review any application for export permits that do not meet the herring export control requirements.

That is the situation, and that is the policy of the government.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the fishermen's union on the coast will be very pleased to hear that. Had it not been for its picketing action, those herring would have left Vancouver and be halfway to Japan by now.

On another matter, the report released by the Employment and Immigration Advisory Council confirms what many in Atlantic Canada have been saying for months, namely that the crisis in the fishery will likely become much worse before it gets any better.

The Harris report was delivered to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans some five and a half weeks ago. When will the report be made public, and will the government commit itself to bring to the House the long promised aid package including any necessary legislation by the end of March?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I can meet the deadline being imposed here today for the end of March, but I can tell the hon. member that this government and my colleagues have been engaged in this process for quite a while.

As I have said in the last three weeks, I have consulted with many people in Atlantic Canada about the fisheries situation, the Harris report, as well as initiatives we can take to ensure that a viable fishery industry in Atlantic Canada is the goal.

I am confident that in the not too distant future we will be able not only to release the Harris report, but also tell how we intend to go about dealing with the recommendations made therein.

HOUSING

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of State for Housing. We all know that the minister has recently been doing a lot to alleviate the housing situation in Toronto. Now, with the whole world wanting to move to beautiful British Columbia to take advantage of the jobs that the Prime Minister was just telling us about, Vancouver has taken over from Toronto in the least affordable city category.

I would like to ask the minister today what he is planning to do for housing in the Vancouver area.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, because of all those jobs being created in Vancouver and in British Columbia people are flocking to B.C. and to Vancouver and, as a result of that, there is a most severe affordability situation there.

The government has been taking some action and is expecting to take some more in this regard. First of all, we formed a federal–provincial–municipal joint committee on housing affordability. It met for the first time this week.

Also I announced a month ago a new government initiative called "Affordability and Choice Today" aimed at producing more affordable housing by speeding up the building approval process, as well as by getting the municipalities to accept different forms of housing which will house more people in the same area.

In addition, we are looking at surplus federal government lands and I hope to be able to make an announcement about that before too long.

PORTS CORPORATIONS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns the disastrous effects of his recent budget on Atlantic Canadian ports.

On February 20, the minister announced that Ports Canada will have to cough up a $100 million dividend to the federal government. In the port of Halifax this 400 per cent increase in its payments to the government has resulted in the cancellation of a number of projects for port upgrading.

In light of the fact that the port of Halifax needs these projects to remain competitive with ports on the American seaboard, why is this government pursuing a policy which denies Canadian ports the resources necessary to keep traffic and jobs from flowing south of the border?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in an effort to reduce the deficit all the resources of the country, including the the ports corporations, were asked to make a contribution. We have reviewed the plans of action of all the ports and came up with what we felt was a reasonable amount to be contributed by each port.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this government is acting like the school yard bully extorting the lunch money from the smallest kids on the block.

Industry analysts have warned of an impending crisis in competitiveness of eastern Canadian ports. At the same time that the ports of New York are spending literally billions of dollars on upgrading to attract traffic from Canadian ports, this government has abdicated its responsibility to have a Canadian ports policy.

How can the minister possibly justify his government's fiscal policy which will see American ports having a distinct competitive advantage over Canadian ports on the east coast? How can he possibly justify that?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I have been reviewing the various areas of the portfolio. I have every intention of sitting down with the ports commission. I have not had any direct representation to the best of my knowledge on this issue, but I certainly will take it up with the Halifax Port Commission.

VIA RAIL

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As he knows VIA Rail recently sold its "Rocky Mountaineer" passenger service in western Canada, a very popular and very profitable service.

This is not the first time that this government has moved to sell its services. One group of people that has been left out in this discussion is pensioners. As rail passenger services across this country are privatized, will the minister please inform the House whether or not CN and CP pensioners will have their passes acknowledged so they can use them?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that that particular run was sold off to a group that feels, with the new cars it will be able to buy, it can increase tourism in that particular section of the country. We encourage that type of action, because VIA is in the business of running a nation-wide rail system and not just a particular tourist action.

I will take the hon. member's question under advisement and endeavour to find out exactly what that did to pensioners' passes on that particular run.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of a letter dated yesterday which was sent to the Secretary of State from his colleague, the Minister for International Trade. The letter concerns the cuts in funding to women's programs that are closing women's centres across this country. The letter says:

> I can assure you that the women of Newfoundland and Labrador will suffer desperately without these centres.

It goes on to say:

> Since the cut to core funding for women's centres in Newfoundland is only $240,000—and the national figure amounts to only $1.6 million, it is hard to believe that money is the real issue here.

The letter urges the minister to consider every possibility to keep the women's centres open.

• (1500)

Since the Secretary of State refuses to listen to the women of Canada and to the women who have been in Secretary of State offices in Newfoundland for two days and two nights— who are still there—will he listen to his colleague in his cabinet and reinstitute the funding to women's centres immediately?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there is a meeting under way this afternoon between senior officials of my department, who went to St. John's today, led by the Associate Under-Secretary of State and the director of the women's program.

They are meeting with the citizens who have spent the last couple of days in the offices of the Department of the Secretary of State. We hoped that in the interim they would have begun to complete some of the application forms that have been available. We indicated the staff was available to help them fill in the applications, and I was prepared to fast track those applications.

We have funding that is available to help the groups implement a program to meet the social justice and equality parts of our program.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, just before you move to Routine Proceedings, perhaps I can deal with a matter for which I think you will find there is unanimous consent.

There have been discussions among the parties with respect to the following order:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Orders, standing committees of the House be empowered to sit together in plenary session and in a series of joint sessions to hold a parliamentary forum on global climate change;

That the plenary session be held on Monday, April 23, 1990;

That, notwithstanding Standing Order 115, the joint sessions of standing committees be held during periods coinciding with the hours of sittings of the House;

That all questions relating to the organization of the forum and implementation of this order be decided by a committee composed of representatives chosen by participating committees, chaired by Dr. Harry Brightwell, MP;

That the organizational committee be empowered to print a single, joint record of the proceedings of the forum.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the government House Leader about television. Will televising of the proceedings be allowed?

Mr. Andre: The plan was to have these discussions and come back afterward to amend the order and deal with questions like television and so on.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposal of the minister. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-65

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I wish to indicate that agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the second reading stage of Bill C-65, an Act to provide borrowing authority.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allowing a specified number of days, or a day, for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the bill.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just want to remind the House that the government has allowed one hour and three minutes for discussion of Bill C-65, and this measure is the kind of treatment he gives to such an important matter. We take strong exception to the government using this strong-handed method.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think there must be some mistake on the part of the government House Leader. I say that because Bill C-65—

Mr. Thacker: You hypocrite!

Mr. Riis: You will have to withdraw that.

Bill C-65 asks permission to borrow $25.5 billion, and we have only had, as my colleague has indicated, a couple of hours of debate.

Mr. Gauthier: One hour and three minutes.

Mr. Riis: Already, the minister is indicating his intent to close off the debate on borrowing $25 billion. Has there been some mistake? Will we be allowed to at least have a few days to discuss whether the government should have the authority to borrow $25.5 billion and ask the taxpayers of Canada to pay that back?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, let me say parenthetically that it is encouraging to hear the New Democratic Party being concerned about borrowing. It seems usually that it is only concerned about spending. We welcome this conversion.

However, what has happened on this bill, is that we have had one day thus far. We will have another day of debate today. The bill will be called tomorrow. There will be debate then. When the allocation motion is read it will allocate subsequent debate as a result.

In the discussions that we had it was suggested to me that the appropriate number of days would not require you to take the mitt off your other hand, and that will be provided for in the time allocation motion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTHERN AFRICA

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, having just returned from Africa, I wish to report to the House on my assessment of the current situation in Ethiopia, and recent humanitarian and diplomatic initiatives which Canada has taken in regard to the crisis in the northern part of the country.

Members of Parliament will be aware that some four to five million people in the northern Ethiopian regions of Eritrea, Tigray and Wollo are now seriously threatened by starvation.

I wish I could provide the House with assurance that serious loss of life could be avoided, but I fear that that is not the case. The situation created by the drought was serious, but it was manageable. When augmented by the ongoing military struggle in the region, the situation has rapidly deteriorated and is no longer manageable.

The tragedy is that not one single Ethiopian needed to die as the result of the current crop failure. Donor governments had responded generously and international and local agencies were poised to ensure delivery to those hardest hit.

A variety of channels were foreseen—distribution by the government within the areas controlled by it, cross-border operations supported by the NGOs from Sudan into the rebel-held areas of Eritrea and Tigray, and relief corridors crossing battle lines into vulnerable rebel-held areas of Eritrea, Tigray and Wollo that could not be reached through the cross-border operations.

This was a complicated package, but one that could have worked if two elements had been achieved. The first was the continued availability of the port of Massawa for the trans-shipment of emergency food aid supplies. The second was an agreement between government and rebel groups to allow the safe transport of food across battle lines.

The EPLF offensive of February, which saw the port of Massawa fall into rebel hands, and the continued unwillingness of the Government of Ethiopia to allow the port to be used for food shipments while still under EPLF control have effectively ended any chance of seeing through the present crisis without loss of life.

It is a sad fact that we cannot guarantee the delivery of essential life-sustaining food to the inflicted of the region, if the political entities that guide their destinies continue to use food as a weapon to attain their strategic military and political objectives.

That is not to say that we will not do all we can. We will continue to press for peace, and we will continue to use all channels available to us in an attempt to minimize the impact of this famine. I must, however reluctantly, conclude that we have passed the point of no return for many of those most affected, and it is only a matter of days until those agonizing reports of starving Ethiopians begin again to fill our newspapers and television screens.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Since the 1984 famine, which affected some 11 million people, our country has been one of the main providers of humanitarian aid in northern Ethiopia.

In all, the aid provided to civilians by the government and people of Canada has amounted to $300 million. This year, in addition to the approximately $26 million in aid that we have already sent through the United Nations and various non-governmental organizations, we announced initial commitments of $14 million for next year.

Canada has encouraged the warring parties to make peace and ensure the free movement of aid.

It has stepped up its diplomatic efforts: in Addis Ababa, we have had regular discussions with western donors, international humanitarian organizations and Ethiopian ministers and representatives; we have also contacted the Ethiopian chargé d'affaires in Ottawa and held discussions with the Secretary General of the United Nations and officials of specialized UN institutions in New York, Geneva and Rome.

Finally, we have continued the dialogue with representatives of the armed opposition fronts in Eritrea and Tigray.

In all our consultations with members of the European Community, the Soviet Union, the United States, the Nordic countries and Ethiopia's neighbours, we have pleaded for humanitarian and diplomatic intervention.

On December 20, 1989, I appointed the senior vice-president of CIDA, Douglas Lindores, special adviser on Ethiopia and its neighbours.

Mr. Lindores recently went to Ethiopia and the Sudan, heading a delegation of officers from External Affairs and CIDA.

The delegation met government representatives, representatives of rebel groups, of other bilateral donors, of the UN and non-governmental organizations, who are seeking ways to relieve the suffering of the Ethiopian people.

This week in Washington, Mr. Lindores met representatives of the EPLF and the TPLF, as well as a number of Americans involved in aid operations.

Just recently, Mr. Speaker, on March 18, the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair, the hon. member for Kitchener—Waterloo and I had a meeting with President Mengistu and important members of his cabinet in the Ethiopian capital, a meeting that lasted over two hours. I explained Canada's position on issues of major concern including the famine, peace negotiations, political and economic reform in Ethiopia and human rights.

It is a fact that President Mengistu and his cabinet are under very strong pressure and have to manoeuver in the midst of a national crisis, but they do think the views of a country that has always provided assistance to Ethiopians are important.

During our meeting, I emphasized the need for immediately clearing a route to the interior of Tigray, in the south, and to use all other possible delivery routes to the north, including the port of Massawa.

I urged President Mengistu to deploy efforts for the resumption of peace negotiations between his government and the rebel forces.

I am referring to the negotiations conducted by former presidents Jimmy Carter and Julius Nyerere to bring the Ethiopian government and the EPLF closer together, and to those conducted by the Italian government with respect to the TPLF.

On March 20, the Ethiopian government announced that it would facilitate the relief operation which has started in the south, will cross the war zones and bring food to the north.

The Joint Relief Partnership, the JRP, consisting of the Ethiopian Red Cross Society and three church relief organizations: the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the Catholic Church and the Mekane Iyesus Church, will channel relief to those who need it.

Perhaps, like me, you had the pleasure of watching television, last Thursday, when the first convoys arrived in the famine-stricken areas.

[English]

However, more—much more—needs to be done. The southern route must be supplemented by further intensive relief operations to ensure that food reaches all areas of the north. Traditional non-governmental assistance to areas which can only be reached from Sudan must continue. I so informed the Ethiopian government.

As I have said, the port of Massawa is crucial if famine is to be avoided. To this end, it is essential that, notwithstanding the delicate political and sovereignty issues involved, the parties to the conflict take the high ground and make whatever arrangements are necessary to ensure the safe passage of food.

However, the determination of the Ethiopian government to recapture Massawa at all costs puts some shadow on that option.

I discussed these matters in Rome with Minister Lenoci of the Italian government and with the executive director of the World Food Program.

In Windhoek, Namibia, last week, I assured the United Nations Secretary General of Canada's support for an increased UN involvement in the relief efforts and the search for peace.

We should not underestimate the difficulties we face. On the one hand, rebel groups sense a final victory, while on the other, an embattled government struggles to preserve the territorial integrity of Ethiopia. Yet it is abundantly clear that only a just and enduring settlement of the Ethiopian conflict will bring to an end the suffering of the people of that country.

The peace process involving the Ethiopian government and the TPLF is resuming in Rome. The talks, under the chairmanship of Presidents Carter and Nyerere, are scheduled to resume in Nairobi, Kenya, April 8 to April 21, 1990.

The Canadian government has urged the Government of Ethiopia, the EPLF and the TPLF to accept that none will prevail by force of arms without unconscionable human suffering. We have urged them to pursue the negotiations to a successful and early conclusion and, in the interim, to permit the safe operation of relief efforts.

In this latter respect, belligerents are assuming a very grave moral responsibility.

Peoples everywhere have collected food to prevent famine and transported it to the region only to find that continued fighting is, in some key areas, interrupting delivery. How, in all conscience, can this be allowed? How can food deliveries be confined this way?

For my part, I am presently consulting with my colleagues from donor countries to underline the urgency of the situation and to ensure the greatest possible co-ordination in assuring food delivery to the needy.

At the same time, the Canadian government strongly supports an initiative by members of Parliament to mobilize international parliamentary support to seek an immediate agreement for the safe and assured delivery of all necessary famine relief assistance to all persons innocent to the conflict.

Let me end by reiterating the gravity of the situation as we found it.

Despite food aid which has been provided and will continue to be provided by the international donor community, fighting on the spot continues to hinder adequate, timely and sufficiently widespread delivery. A continuing stalemate in peace talks is unacceptable.

It is already too late for some. We appeal to the parties to accept that intransigency risks the lives of further innocent populations.

In conclusion, I assure members of this House, as we have assured the parties to the conflict and the chairmen of the peace processes, that Canada is ready to support the search for peace in any way that would be helpful.

• (1520)

I have received from the two opposition parties a resolution on the situation which we endorse. The resolution states:

> That this House, noting that:
> —4 to 5 million innocent Ethiopians in northern regions of Eritrea, Tigray and Wollo, are seriously and unnecessarily threatened by starvation;
>
> —Canada is a major aid donor to the region today and was so during the 1984 famine crisis;
> —and, further noting that Canada, with other western nations, could prevent today the loss of any life through starvation in the region;
> —does unanimously condemn any and all parties to the conflict in Ethiopia, Eritrea and Tigray who would use food as a weapon to attain strategic military and political objectives, or,

—who would not assist the international donor community to provide adequate, timely and sufficiently widespread delivery of food to the starving millions in the area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed to accept the resolution?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Resolution agreed to.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to thank the hon. minister for reading my resolution and for having given her support to it. I also thank my colleagues on the other side of the House from the NDP.

It is with great sorrow and anger that we are reminded again today by the minister that some four million to five million Ethiopians living in the regions of Wollo, Eritrea and Tigray are once again on the verge of starvation.

We all remember so well the impressive and heartfelt response in 1984 of millions of Canadians from our poorest regions of the north to our wealthy businessmen of the south—those who responded so generously to the drought crisis in the same region which threatened 11 million persons.

It is with anger, a deep sense of outrage and even contempt that we realize that the current crisis is unnecessary but for the lack of political will on the part of all parties in the conflict between Ethiopia, Eritrea and Tigray. Government, rebel forces and parties outside the region encouraging the conflict must recognize and accept the condemnation of citizens and governments of the world who have tried in good faith to prevent the current impasse through diplomatic interventions.

I can only reiterate the words and sentiments of my hon. colleague across the floor that all parties to the conflict must take the high road, setting aside the political and sovereignty issues at stake and make the absolutely necessary arrangements to ensure safe passage of food to the innocent starving millions of Ethiopia.

Although we can all agree on this here in this House, I wish to impress upon the government that what has been done to date by the government and what we are doing here today is not enough. The minister has promised to continue to search for new ways to find a solution to lessen the holocaust which is beginning to take place again in the Horn of Africa. The unfortunate and regrettable fact is that Canada has not continually mounted the pressure we have seen in recent months in order to avert this new disaster.

We have heard the government's financial commitment this year and the initial contribution for next year. But Canadians will want to know on an ongoing basis what other aggressive actions this government is taking to resolve the crisis.

We cannot allow cycles of misery to repeat themselves. NGOs, who have an extraordinary ability to provide aid in ways that are not available to governments, must be provided with all the resources necessary that they are able to absorb.

I would be interested to know what exactly is the support that the Canadian government is giving to the initiatives of members of Parliament to mobilize international parliamentary support to aid the victims. Certainly, there is a member on the government side well respected for his experience and expertise in the area by diplomats and the NGO community whose services it would seem to me should not be restrained.

All members of this House and the Canadian public will want to be kept informed of the government's initiatives with regard to this crisis. We do not want to sit back and watch a disaster unfold.

We and Canadian citizens want to respond—knowing that all possible measures are continually being taken by this government to stop the disaster—to prevent this from ever being repeated again.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to respond to the minister's statement on behalf of my party.

The tragedy of Ethiopia is not a partisan issue. It is a tragedy rooted in ancient quarrels and historic enmities complicated by the intricate interplay of competing national interests extending throughout the Middle East and the Horn of Africa. Compromise has not been a virtue among the combatants. Intransigence is a matter of principle even when it results in the slaughter of innocents. Hence, in this once noble land of riches beyond the needs of its inhabitants, a local drought is expanded once again by a general violence into an epic famine choreographing the ghastly scenes of thousands of children dying in the arms of mothers who can but wait to die in their turn.

As noted by the minister, all three Canadian political parties were represented in consultations in Addis Ababa with the representatives of NGOs, the Ethiopian government and President Mengistu. Our goal was to facilitate the delivery of food to the starving, to contribute to the negotiations for peace and to measure the significance of economic and political reform in Ethiopia.

Through the efforts of donor governments, international and domestic organizations, arrangements have been made to provide food if safe delivery could be assured. Canada alone has already committed $40 million to the effort. Horribly, the bellicosity of the combatants in the many-sided civil war limits that humanitarian intervention. Food is a weapon in this conflict and the deaths of thousands is now inevitable.

Much of the reason for this certain catastrophe is the capture of the port of Massawa by the EPLF and Mengistu's adamant refusal to permit the delivery of food through that port. The remaining paths of delivery are the cross border between Sudan in the north and the southern route for which clearance for the first convoy was given by the Ethiopian government shortly after our consultations at the Joint Relief Partnership.

An Ethiopian government proposal to employ a logistically difficult and costly airlift was pressed upon us but was not supported by the aid donors. Because of the failure of effective food delivery in the north, food will also have to be provided for refugees in the Sudan. The real solution to the crisis must address the real cause of this starvation—the war or wars that prevent the distribution of food.

That is why New Democrats support the minister in pressing President Mengistu to urgently pursue peace negotiations with the rebels, as we support the pursuit of peace to every other diplomatic channel available. In this regard we laud the efforts of the Italians and Messrs. Carter and Nyere at mediation.

We also support the proposal to initiate an extra-governmental effort by an international alliance of parliamentarians in support of the peace process.

Because of the nature of the conflict and the engagement of diverse interests, these will have to be neutralized, whether from the neighbouring Arab states, Israel or the major players of east and west. My party and I stand ready to support this effort to achieve the peace and, if necessary, to commit Canadian personnel and resources to keep the peace. Without peace, no effort, no matter how great, no matter how noble, can hope to save the millions who will die not because of drought but because of starvation wrought by enmity and war.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table two petitions today.

The first one consists of hundreds of signatures to be added to the thousands upon thousands that have already been tabled in the House, and it pertains to the government's proposed goods and services tax. Canadians are still lobbying the Tory government to abandon the implementation of the proposed GST.

The petitioners humbly sheweth that the Liberals on behalf of Canadians strongly oppose this new goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. Wherefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my second petition concerns Mr. Leo who has been arrested unlawfully in Taiwan. I do not know how many more petitions and representations Canadians have to make to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to get him to intervene in the case of Mr. Leo, a Canadian citizen who has been arrested unlawfully in Taiwan.

When a Canadian citizen is arrested unlawfully, be it in Canada or outside Canada, when speaking or exercising his right to freedom of speech, the Canadian government must not only intervene but be perceived as intervening in that Canadian citizen's case.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Chibougamau, in the riding of Roberval, Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Chibougamau is without a doubt an isolated community and for this reason, the petitioners believe that the Brunelle recommendation is unfair, discriminatory and inefficient considering the objective of the northern tax benefits plan. It does not promote settlement and resource development in the North.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to present petitions that I have received from constituents in my riding of Northumberland. These petitions speak out against the proposed goods and services tax legislation.

The people in my riding have many reasons for objecting to this, housing being one of them. Many of them are very concerned at the present time about renewing mortgages because of high interest rates, and they are also concerned about the extra costs on new housing that this tax will cause. With me, they are very concerned about the Governor of the Bank of Canada's announcement that he may have to increase interest rates yet again because of this proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners ask the government to withdraw the legislation.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present petitions on behalf of 4,000 people. These petitioners are mostly residents of Alberta but certainly others from B.C., Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The petitioners are opposing the government's goods and services tax and object to this Parliament increasing taxation rather than reducing spending. They also object to taxation without representation as an unacceptable violation of their democratic rights. They, like the majority of Canadians, wish that their elected representatives, particularly on the government side, would vigorously and faithfully represent their interests in this matter, oppose the tax and instead reduce government expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, my second petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, contains 69 names from my riding of Beaver River who request that, if the goods and services tax does go ahead and is imposed on Canadians, skating expenses such as equipment, instructors' fees, facility rentals and other expenses be considered as educational expenses and, therefore, exempt from the tax. This proposed tax will place a significant financial burden on young athletes who are involved in a pursuit which contributes to their physical and mental health and allows Canadian youth to enjoy more economically the great outdoors in northern Canada, a great Canadian pastime.

BILL 178

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition from some of my constituents. They are petitioning the government to use all its powers, or whatever powers it has, to disallow Bill 178 in Quebec. The bill was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada and is seen by these people more and more as the national irritant and the main source of the great disunity that we are witnessing in our country today.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present a petition from a number of constituents in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt; from Penticton, Grand Forks, Osoyoos, and other places within that riding. These people are asking me to present this petition showing that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place, which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

They are petitioning Parliament to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of different petitions to present today. The first is a petition from Kamloops, British Columbia on the old topic. I think I have been delivering these petitions every day for what seems like years, but I guess it has only been months.

The petitioners point out that the government's goods and services tax is wrong-headed and a terribly stupid idea. People are distressed that they are still having to put these petitions together because the government continues on. They point out that this tax will affect skating lessons, coffins, diapers, haircuts, books, heating fuels, and on and on, and they are asking the government to stop from proceeding with this tax.

FORESTRY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the government is expected to sign a forestry agreement with British Columbia by this weekend. So far no luck.

The petitioners are from British Columbia, and there are pages of their names. They point out the importance of reforestation and silviculture to the long-term best interests of the forest industry. They point out that the forest industry is Canada's number one exporter by far and its health is critical to the health of the country. They are urging the Government of Canada to enter into a federal-provincial forest resource development agreement to advance the regeneration of our forests. Time is running out, as I say, and Friday is the day.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a third topic, I wish to present a list of petitioners from all over western Canada. They point out that although the percentage of the population who are young children is actually decreasing somewhat, the number of children living in poverty is increasing. That is why the petitioners call upon members of Parliament to support Private Members' Motion M-252 for a comprehensive bill of rights for children, which as we know the Conservatives voted against yesterday. The petition is a little bit out of date, because the government voted against a comprehensive bill of rights for children yesterday evening.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–23.

MR. BRIAN O'N. GALLERY

Motion No. P–23—Mr. Boudria:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all logs, registers, correspondence and reports pertaining to the use of CN business cars by Mr. Brian O'N. Gallery in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, Canadian National's position is that the documents requested are confidential and proprietary in nature and their release could be reasonably expected to seriously prejudice CN's business and competitive position and to result in significant financial loss to the company. This was reflected in the chairman's report tabled in the House of Commons on February 12, 1990. Therefore, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): On behalf of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I would request that in light of the cover-up that is going on here this matter be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

• (1540)

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

PLIGHT OF WESTERN FARMERS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have received a request for a motion to adjourn under Standing Order 52. I would like to hear from the hon. member from Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, in my letter to you I outlined what I consider to be an urgent situation, that is the economic conditions facing western Canadian farmers. We know that they are the worst that have occurred since 1932, in the midst of the Great Depression.

The Farm Debt Review Board in western Canada recently reported that more than one-third of western farmers are in severe financial crisis. Bankruptcies and foreclosures are at alarming levels and predictions are that this year there will be a negative realized net farm income in the province of Saskatchewan. That means farmers will spend more money than they receive for the sale of their crops. They will have difficulty providing for their families and difficulty arranging the financing that is necessary to put in the coming year's crop.

Within the next three or four weeks, the farmers will be out attempting to put seed into the ground. As my letter also points out, the banks need three to four weeks to make a decision on an application for a loan. These loans are made on the basis of the cash flow of the farm. The bank wants to know how much money will be coming in and how much output there will be. They cannot make those calculations final until we and they, that is, the banks, farmers, and politicians know with some precision what sort of aid and assistance the federal government will be providing.

Since the two time limits are coming very close together, that is, the time limit for when seeding starts and when loans will be approved or rejected, it is extremely important that those announcements be made in the next day or so. Therefore, I move that in order to bring these matters to the attention of government, we have an emergency debate this evening.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I appreciate the hon. member for Mackenzie giving me notice of the request for an emergency debate. I too feel that this is very serious. There have been some very questions in regard to the hon. member's standing order request, but it is not just appropriate at this time to have an emergency debate. I think we will wait, and it may be appropriate at another time.

Before I call Orders of the Day, I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended 20 minutes.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–65 is a very important bill, and so far, this legislation has been debated for one hour and three minutes in the House of Commons. However, as all members will recall, earlier today, the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons gave notice that he would once again impose closure in other words, limit debate on this very important question.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C–65 is to authorize the government to borrow up to $25.5 billion, which is 25 thousand million dollars. Canadians know perfectly well that when such enormous amounts are borrowed for the coming fiscal year, 1990–91, which runs from April 1, 1990 to March 31, 1991, that these amounts are needed to cover the government's budget deficit.

As we know, in his 1990 Budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) announced that he intended to go to the financial markets to get this $25.5 billion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, as you can see the government will borrow an amount which is less than its projected $28.5 billion budget deficit. This is because non–budgetary transactions will generate another $7.5 billion of revenue, which reduces the amount the government needs to borrow from financial markets.

These non–budgetary transactions include government employees' pensions accounts—this is the public service superannuation account which has a healthy sum in it which the government regularly borrows every year. It means they can also use accounts payable, cash in transit, and outstanding cheques. So that $7.1 billion is actually government bookkeeping, which allows them to use moneys they do not actually own but which they use to reduce or pay off the budgetary deficit by such transactions.

The $25.5 billion borrowing authority requested in Bill C–65 is accounted for as follows. The government deficit is $28.5 billion, the non–budgetary transactions are $7.5 billion; reducing the amount of $28.5 billion by $7.5 billion leaves $21 billion; exchange funds earnings will bring in about $1.5 billion, the foreign exchange contingency fund will bring in an additional $3 billion, for a total borrowing authority requested of $25.5 billion.

Members can find a complete explanation of the borrowing authority requested in Bill C–65 on pages 109 to 110 of the 1990 budget.

While I am on my feet, I would like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I am sharing our allotted 20 minute time with one of my colleagues.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, considering that Bill C–65 accompanies the Budget and seeks authority for the government to borrow to cover its budget deficit, I would strongly advise anyone with a desire to understand these transactions to consult the so–called post–budget analysis, a very impressive document prepared by experts in the field.

Mr. Speaker, now that I have basically explained the purpose of the bill, I am prepared to yield the floor to any members who may wish to comment further on this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Welland–St. Catharines—Thorold.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take up where my colleague left off on the borrowing bill C-65.

The sum of $25.5 billion is one which boggles the imagination. The salaries of thousands of Canadians would still not add up to the money this government is borrowing at this time to carry out programs which, for the most part, are programs that have been cut back from their election promises.

• (1550)

As the borrowing bill itself deals simply in money matters, I would like to put a face on this particular borrowing bill. In addition to the moneys which are going to be raised, ironically to carry out programs which are cut back, the House should also look more particularly at other revenues that the Minister of Finance is raising.

Last August, the Minister of Finance released details of his goods and services tax. After the presentation, he told reporters that nobody likes this tax. Then he added: "Let me be quite clear, we are absolutely committed to going ahead with this tax". He also announced that the goods and services tax, the GST, would create billions of dollars a year in revenue, would increase exports and create jobs. If this tax is supposed to create so many more billions in revenue, what in the name of goodness are we doing borrowing an extra $25.5 billion?

One of the questions which comes to mind is, if nobody likes this tax, why go ahead with it? Second, why indicate that this proposal will be implemented regardless of the feelings of Canadians, irrespective of any debates or committee hearings? Witness the charade that has been going on for the last few weeks in the finance committee. We have had filibusters. We have had the chairman of the committee, if not making a fool of himself, sometimes making a fool of the committee itself. I do not think that this is in keeping with our parliamentary procedures.

I and many other members of Parliament have tabled petitions. I have tabled over 14,000 names on petitions against this GST. This has all been done in the last few months. These signatures represent the opinions of thousands and thousands of Canadians. This is in addition to the letters addressed directly to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other elected members of Parliament.

We have a right to wonder if the government is listening to the people of Canada when it collects all of these billions in taxes. My colleagues say that it is not, and I agree with them absolutely. If it was listening to the people of Canada, then surely it would withdraw this terrible tax which is heaped upon the backs of those people who can least afford it.

The statement "absolutely committed" which the Minister of Finance made, is a clear signal to me that the government intends to impose this extra burden on Canadians, who have already contributed $120 billion to the treasury in 1989. That is $50 billion more than when this government took office in 1984. But it will not even listen to the plaintive and angry voices of Canadians who are so adamantly opposed to the goods and services tax.

On December 9, 1989, the Minister of Finance put forward his 7 per cent solution, stating that he had listened to Canadians. He must have listened to every Canadian I did not listen to because we have not been getting the same signals. The people of Canada have clearly stated that they do not want the GST and the new 7 per cent package is no more fair than the 9 per cent package was.

The issue is not whether we generate enough money to look after ourselves, but whether the government has the ability to plan and govern. This very day in the House, we are asked once again to give the government carte blanche to borrow $25.5 billion and we are supposed to do so with a glad heart. I, for one, am not at all enthused about granting them this extra money to play with, so that they can do what? Spend it on their big business friends and cut the programs of the poor? No, the government will not be getting my support on this.

I referred to the $50 billion more which the government collects in taxes every year than they did in 1984. The extra $50 billion, which was collected through a myriad of taxes, could have taken care of the deficit. Remember, this was a government that was elected on the basis that it was going to cut the deficit. It has doubled it in the five years that it has been in office.

There would have been some money left over to start retiring our big national debt. Here again, we have seen increases of staggering proportions. In 1983-84 the national debt was $160 billion. Projections for the end of the fiscal year 1989–90 show our national debt reaching $351.6 billion. What a fantastic amount.

[Translation]

Even with these $50 billion, the deficit which was $32 billion in 1984 is still $30 billion per year more than we collect in taxes, and this is a government that claimed it knew how to cut spending in government operations and throughout the country. That has not been the case, Mr. Speaker, and I am looking forward to 1992!

[English]

Canadians are informed that family allowances will be cut because the government has no money. Senior citizens must face an uncertain future confronted with decreased old age benefits and this damnable clawback that the government has put forward.

This decrease is commonly known throughout Canada as the "clawback". I wonder why they did not just call it something gentle. Can you imagine the spectre of a great big claw coming down upon you? It is like the American eagle coming down on the little mouse and that mouse, in his last act of defiance, sticking out his tongue at the great American eagle. The Canadian people cannot stick out their tongues except to gasp in horror at how the government has mismanaged the affairs of Canada.

This is nothing more than a broken promise, or a set of broken promises. It is a frightening change in social policy, a change which is being implemented without prior consultation with the seniors. The clawback will soon be followed by another devastating tax, the infamous GST, the goods and services tax. Seniors and other Canadians agree that the deficit must be reduced. I agree with that. They also know that the goods and services taxes introduced in other countries have gone up 20 per cent.

My learned colleague on the other side takes this as a jest, as a joke that should be perpetrated on the Canadian people. I wonder if the people can pick up his laughter from across the aisle, as they are struggling to make ends meet in their homes with this extra burden of taxes. I would advise my hon. colleague, with all respect, that his laughter should not take place in this House. This laughter, if it is laughter at all, should be hidden away from the ears of the hardworking Canadian people who must pay these taxes.

We have made valuable suggestions to the government so that all Canadians might share the burden fairly. Did it listen? Not at all. It was far too busy preparing a costly advertising campaign which was misleading and in contempt of Parliament, as was said by the Speaker himself, and finally had to be abandoned because, to put it mildly, it was slightly premature if not illegal.

The GST will add to the cost of most essential goods purchased by ordinary Canadians. The Canadian Home Builders' Association says that the GST will increase the price of a typical new home nationally by $3,000, which is more than six times the cost estimated in the technical paper prepared by the finance department. Is this just more misleading of the House and of the people of Canada?

• (1600)

Cuts in housing rebates for low income Canadians amount to $400 million. The proposed changes to the GST do not address the affordability problem or housing for low income Canadians. In other words, the government is not listening.

This government is not doing anything to alleviate the burden it places upon Canadians. The increase in the cost of housing will vary by market areas from a high of $9,200 in Toronto and $4,700 in Vancouver to $800 and $1,000 in Charlottetown and Trois-Rivières respectively.

Some services have been designated as tax exempt. This does not mean the end result is tax free. For instance, a day care centre that is tax exempt will not charge the GST on its final invoice for day care services to parents. The day care facility will have to pay 7 per cent or more on all its purchases of books, equipment, et cetera. It will have to raise its fees to parents to recover these added costs.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling me that my time is running out. I have many more points I would like to make, but I would like to end with these last two.

The list of taxable goods and services will now include such things as haircuts, funerals, stamps, taxi rides, cheque books, lottery tickets, car repairs, and a host of other items which Canadians buy every day. The Minister of Finance has exempted brokerage fees, underwriting fees and foreign currency trading, all items purchased predominantly by upper income Canadians who could more easily afford to pay the new tax than average Canadians.

My last point, Mr. Speaker, and I have many more that I would like to make, but as the critic for youth for the Liberal party, I have said many times in the House that the future of Canada lies in the well-being of our youth. I have said we must educate them, train them, and give them a sense of responsibility in being a Canadian.

What kind of government is it that puts taxes on books, pens and on the very things so necessary to acquire an education in order to take their place in society? No, I am not in favour of this borrowing bill. I condemn the goods and services tax which I believe will be seen as one of the most dastardly bills ever put forward in the House of Commons.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my hon. friend. He reminded us that the legislation asks for the borrowing authority for $25.5 billion. That seems like an awful lot of money to borrow. I worry about borrowing $5,000 or $6,000 to buy a car. I start thinking about the payments and so on. But we are being asked by the government to give it authority to borrow $25.5 billion. I cannot even imagine what that would look like if it were in a pile. All I know is it is an awful lot of money.

I cannot remember when the House was asked to do something like this, to give authority to the government to borrow $25 billion. At the same time the government is saying it does not want to talk about it. The government has just given notice to stop debate.

I want to ask my hon. friend, a parliamentarian of long standing who has been here a long time and knows how things have gone over the years, if he can recall any time in the past when the government has asked to borrow so much money. The government is running things so badly that it is desperate to impose this 7 per cent goods and services tax. Can the hon. member recall any time when the government has asked to borrow so much money, but at the same time does not want to debate this legislation, so it will invoke closure to muzzle the duly elected people of Canada and keep them from responding to this request? Can he recall any such request in the past?

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, not only can I not recall sums of this magnitude being asked for in the House of Commons from the governments of which I was proud to be a part, but when we tried to borrow sums of $5 billion to $7 billion it was viewed as the most enormous sums that had ever been asked for by the Government of Canada.

My colleague asks a question and to let him know that not only are they borrowing this money, but according to a study by the Canadian Council on Social Development and the government's own sales tax documents, a middle class family with two children and a total income of $45,000—$27,000 from one parent and $18,000 from the other—will have their taxes increased by over $3,400 in 1991, $2,797 by previous Conservative tax increases, and by $629 for the GST. We are asked to permit this GST to go through and to grant the government this enormous sum. This is truly unheard of in Canada.

I for one would associate myself with any members who would oppose this borrowing bill. The government must be brought to its senses. The best way to do that is right here in the House of Commons by pointing out to it the mistakes made and the mistakes it is making. Hopefully, this government will not make them in the future.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have spoken in the House before closure was invoked. I really do appreciate that.

An hon. member: They have given us notice though.

An hon. member: It's like having a crystal ball.

Mr. Butland: I wish to speak against the borrowing bill. We recognize that the government requires money to run this country, albeit very poorly. We object to the priorities of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Could I ask the hon. member if he will speak for 20 minutes, or 10 minutes plus 5 minutes?

Mr. Butland: Hopefully, about 20, Mr. Speaker.

During my 20 minutes I will refer to a couple of my favourite books. One is entitled Tommy Douglas Speaks.

That is a non-fiction book. The other one is Where I Stand by the right hon. Prime Minister and that is obviously a fiction book. Any resemblance between these two gentlemen will be purely coincidental.

When you hear the quotes from both books it is hard to differentiate between the two in what they say, but certainly in what they did and do are very, very different.

Mr. Douglas often said that fools, charlatans and evil doers will be exposed in open debate, with present company of course exempt. He also said: "We won't give up the fight against the government despite the adversity, despite their jackboot tactics, their non-democratic closure, their GST". He did not say some of this but I am paraphrasing it. That is exactly what he meant when he said "We are going to—" and I best not get too far astray from what Mr. Douglas said. "If your cause is just and right sooner or later you will win. It must triumph because it is a part of the warp and woof of the universe. No matter how many setbacks there may be along the road, you may be sure that someday the right and just will prevail. It will prevail simply because it is right and just."

That is why, despite the fact that this government tries to muzzle the opposition and the Canadian people from speaking against its policies, we must continue in the House and outside of the House to fight the government and its heinous policies.

This borrowing cannot be taken out of context of the budget. It is part and parcel of it. Everyone knows that the New Democrats stand for total tax reform, that this kind of willy-nilly borrowing and this kind of budget process would not be necessary.

• (1610)

My hon. colleague from Nickel Belt has become somewhat infamous, as far as the government is concerned, with his corporate bum of the week announcements. I asked him to provide the names of some of the groups of whom he has spoken these past several weeks. I am sure he will have another 20 years to go because there are so many.

I was disbelieving when I was told there were 86,000 profitable corporations in the country which did not pay tax. I did not believe it. In fact, it has proven to be 90,000. I will cite just a few cases. Perhaps the names are best unstated. With profits of $214 million one received a tax credit of $2.12 million. Another with $75 million profit received a tax credit of $2.86 million. But in its heart of hearts it found some money to donate to the party in power. I suppose that is honourable.

Revenue Canada answered when asked to define a large corporation that it is a corporation that makes about $7 million. My next question was why would a special tax of $.0175 be put on corporations that had profits of $10 million? The answer was to be fair and give or take a couple of million, what is the difference? One has to wonder if at the poverty level if a couple of thousand would not make a difference to the poor in this country.

Mr. Douglas said "the art of governing is the art of foreseeing, having a crystal ball". I agree with that. The Prime Minister from his crystal ball said in 1983: "It is a continuous fight card in which it is difficult to find winners and easy to identify the loser, Canada itself". It seems the phrase "the common good" has been struck from our vocabulary. The Prime Minister was prophetic as well but sadly prophetic. The common good seems to have left the country. Policies breed cynicism in the country. He has lost not only his foresight but lost his physical sight.

It is very easy to trace the losers in this budget. As a result we have to go through this borrowing bill. The losers are the prairie farmers, maritime fishermen, natives across the country, women's centres and the provinces. The have provinces have to suffer a little more than others. In that have group is the province of Ontario which is well off compared with some of the maritime provinces. Some people forget—in fact, the government has totally forgotten—that northern Ontario is part of the have province of Ontario.

We are not doing all that well and the government is not going to assist us, certainly not through the budget. Its acts of deregulation, privatization, reprofiling, rationalizing and all the buzz words of the government are not going to do anything for us. They are going to hit us in a very heavy-handed, negative fashion.

That brings me to my most unfavourite topic. All this is part of the government agenda. The free trade agreement was supposed to bring us all wealth and save each family $800 per year as the Prime Minister said. That is not happening. It was supposed to create 250,000 jobs. This past Monday I attended a forum in Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan. The Canadian official in charge of implementing the deal said that the free trade plan has been a bit player in the over-all picture. He also admitted that it has failed to secure access for Canadians into the United States market. He has admitted that.

Gordon Ritchie, the former free trade negotiator, really is a candid individual. He said just this past week that free trade will not be a major creator of jobs. It will not be. That was a "specious claim". That means something that appears to be the right thing to say but, in reality, it is not true. It was a specious claim made in the heat of an election campaign. The Prime Minister made that specious claim 20 months before the election when he told Canadians free trade could produce hundreds of thousands of new jobs.

It seems that what they said and what is happening are both, indeed, specious claims. It is just not working out to our benefit. I have cited this so very often and I have had the opportunity to meet with our American counterparts. I found out what they thought about free trade. Their words to us are: "Don't bite the hand that feeds you. Canadians, keep quiet. You are not going to get any more of our market. Please realize this. Don't rock the boat". When our own negotiators and the American politicians tell us the same thing, I suspect we have some problems.

The indication was that social programs would not be hurt and, in fact, they would be enhanced. Well, unemployment insurance is not being enhanced. Family allowances and old age security certainly have not been enhanced. The government has attacked universality, even though it would not admit it. All of this is part and parcel of the government agenda—the government policy—that we react so negatively to. Therefore, we must vote against this borrowing bill for all of the wrong reasons.

I want to come back to the GST. I was going to bring a backdrop of probably 15,000 cards from bowlers, dance teachers, skating teachers, music teachers, small businesses, veterinarians, and everybody. You name the group. They are all hostile to the GST. If the government is going to plough through with it, and it gives every indication that that is what it is going to do, it is going to realize a cash cow with multi billions of dollars against the desires of any Canadian. It would appear that the government is against the will of the people, at least 80 per cent of them and probably it is growing on a daily basis.

Yet the government says there are no tax increases. We know full well that that is not true. The tax increases will be passed on to the provinces and the provinces in turn will pass them on to the municipalities and thus we see some of this negative reaction by municipalities, including my own. That is one reason that they are hostile toward government in general. Some of the actions may not be the message that wants to be delivered, but it is a message of desperation: Is anybody listening out there to a lonely voice in the wilderness up in northern Ontario?

I think all would agree with Mr. Douglas' philosophy and our party's policy that humanity comes first. We believe the measure of any community is the amount of social and economic security which it provides to even its humblest citizens. I do not know anybody in the country who would disagree that we do stand for that. The Prime Minister suggested that he also agrees. He said: "Then there is what I call the dimensions of tenderness. It is that vital responsibility of government to demonstrate a compassion for the needy, an assistance for the disadvantaged, the equalization of opportunity for all and an elevated sense of social responsibility that must continue to find favour with every thoughtful Canadian". We agree with the Prime Minister. Mr. Douglas agreed with the Prime Minister, but actions speak so much louder than words. The government's policy does not in fact exemplify what the Prime Minister said in 1983 and I suspect people would agree with that as well.

How did this budget come about? I will not cite exactly the words, but I will paraphrase the Prime Minister when he said that budgets must come as a result of a great deal of public consultation. It must be a consensus of the Canadian people before a budget is brought forward. The people must agree with the direction of the country. We could not agree more. We think it is a great idea.

Well, we know how the budget was struck last year—in the dead of the night. We know how it was struck this year. The Minister of Finance said he was too busy to meet with people this year. He was too busy. There was no consultation. He sent out 50 letters. I asked to whom he sent those letters and was told: "Well, we can't really tell you to whom we sent the letters." That is an interesting point unto itself. I did not pursue it. Maybe it is not important. I do not know, but it certainly does not give any indication of consultation or consensus.

I want to talk about positives. Canadians look to leadership to display some innovation, some creativity, and some positives. I have been here for 16 months and all I ever hear are negatives from the government. It is the old "We have to cut VIA Rail to make it better" and "We have to cut your social programs to make them better". In the budget, I read the list and it is a litany of cuts. There are no positives. That is why the Canadian people say we despair. There is nothing positive for us anywhere.

I would like to touch on a few local issues that really hit home, a microcosm of the big picture, if you will. VIA Rail is selling off its excess stock—selling it off. We have a tourist attraction in my community that will have to spend $25 million to $35 million to buy new cars or to refurbish old cars. It is the single major, most significant tourist attraction in our community. The government could say that perhaps this community or that community, or maybe this enterprise, could use this excess rolling stock, and maybe it could sell it to them at a bargain price. What a lift it would be to the community. But no, the decision of Transport Canada thus far is to privatize the sale of it. Contract it out, give it to a consulting group or a marketing agency, and it will sell it back to you. The cry was that we have been subsidizing VIA Rail for half a billion dollars every year. Now the government is going to do us a big favour and sell excess rolling stock to us at market value. What an excellent opportunity that could be seized to make a lot of people happy—and probably save the municipal and provincial governments some money down the road.

I have a humorous example. That is the FBDB and its now infamous funding of 38 strip clubs across the country to the tune of $17 million. I can understand why the government is a little bit skittish about continuing that kind of process because Canadian taxpayers were kind of aghast at that. I am sure the government members were as surprised as we were and somewhat aghast that Canadian tax dollars went to that kind of entertainment.

Mr. Tobin: Some of them weren't.

Mr. Butland: Some of them weren't. Okay, some of them knew, right.

Anyway, it has reacted to that now and it is saying that it has got to be very, very, very cautious, not only with FBDB but also FEDNOR funds.

There was an application in my community for a renovation to a tourist motel/hotel, if you will. Last year, it had one piece of entertainment that might be considered off-colour by some people, but there was every indication that FBDB and FEDNOR would be giving funds to this group to complete its renovation. Because of the new policies and the new restrictions, it is conceivable that funding could get cut off. I can understand that, the fearfulness of spending money on those kinds of enterprises. But, can a person be persecuted because he had one show last year, and would give an undertaking that he would never ever again present that kind of entertainment in his establishment? That was not enough. He gave that undertaking.

The next thing was to get from the Member of Parliament, myself, a letter stating that I did not think this establishment would destroy the moral tone of my community. I went ahead and gave them my okay on that. One has to wonder if there is going to be porno-police. It is also going to measure the gallonage of beer out of that establishment. It is a classic. I do not know if this is to save money, to save face, or whatever.

Another example is the Sault Locks which is a landmark in my community. It is 100 years old. Books have been written about it by the Canadian government. The present government says: "We want to walk away from it. We want to give you $5 million. Privatize it. We do not want any more to do with it." That will tear the face off my community unless private investment comes in to assist the government. I hope that does not happen, because the Americans—they have told me this—will want us to participate in the financing of their super-lock to the tune of $250 million, just across the river. But our government says: "We will wait and see what happens." We are going to save money now, but we will have to spend millions in the future, because the Americans will insist that we do so.

To conclude, Mr. Douglas said the only freedom which the NDP would destroy is the freedom of the few to exploit the many. The only people who need fear us are those who are seeking to live by the sweat of someone else's brow. Our agenda never changes, and it shall not, because it is right and just. The good will out in the end. We will be voting against this bill because of the government's abusive policies to the Canadian people.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to compliment my friend on his presentation to the House today.

I would particularly like to ask him to turn his attention to what has become an institution in Canada in cultural methods and also in communication, the CBC. I am speaking in particular of one of the areas in the west in British Columbia. I know that many of my constituents in Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt listen daily to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation radio and also watch CBC television. There were the cut-backs of, I believe, $140 million in 1989, and the cut-backs of some $20 million in this particular budget. Many of the people in my constituency and many of the people I have spoken to in contacts across Canada are somewhat concerned in that what is being attacked here is not simply another radio station or another Crown corporation. What in fact is being attacked in the cutting of funds to CBC radio and television is our cultural communications system across Canada.

They listed all of the programs that they listen to. One of the things is the thread that goes across Canada in the phone-in programs on Sunday mornings. I know that my young daughter, who is only 11 years old, listens to a number of programs on CBC radio which she finds not only entertaining, but also educational. I have had letters from people in small communities such as Midway, Greenwood, Bridesville, Osoyoos and Christina Lake, asking us to point out to the government that these are their links to the rest of Canada, and part of what they consider their cultural heritage. I wonder whether those from northern Ontario feel the same way about CBC and these cuts. Would he have any comments on the fears of the people in my riding and in fact in all of British Columbia?

• (1630)

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. This once again ties into the whole issue of the Canadian fabric in our society. Cuts in the CBC are just another attack on the Canadian fabric as we know it. Yes, the CBC is looked upon not only by Canadians but by people around the world as being special, as being an excellent broadcasting operation.

People are now looking more and more south rather than east-west, not only in communications but unfortunately in trade and sometimes in cultural and recreational pursuits. It is part of a much larger scheme.

If I might hit very close to home and refer to the House of Commons, the CBC will be forging an agreement with a private cable company for House of Commons coverage. I think just about everyone endorses the loosening of rules in this House, but in a minority report my party expressed some concerns that the CBC is forming a partnership with a private enterprise. That is another blow to the CBC.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I have a short question, Mr. Speaker. I listened with interest to my hon. friend's comments. I must say I found them to be most interesting and very educational. He went on at some length about a number of initiatives that the government has failed to take. I think of things like not funding the forest sector adequately, cutting back on regional development grants, cutting back on support for the small business sector, and not providing much endorsement and support for tourism.

I asked myself what good the government has done. We can think of all sorts of things it has not done that it should have done and we can all think of all kinds of things that it has done that it should not have done, such as the imposition of the goods and services tax.

I was racking my brain, as I was listening to my hon. friend, trying to think what this government is noted for accomplishing that people would perceive to be positive or useful.

Can my hon. friend think of anything that this government ought to be recognized for, other than a host of very negative initiatives which amount to the dismantling of the infrastructure of Canada?

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I too, even as he asked the question, was racking my brain to come up with something positive.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Given the size of your brain, I am not surprised you didn't find anything.

Mr. Butland: The winds of dissent are there. To answer the hon. member's question, I cannot think of anything. The only thing positive, perhaps, is the fact it has have achieved 17 per cent in the polls and I think Canadians think that is very positive. Let us hope that that positive wind across the country will continue.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-65, the borrowing authority bill. As many of my colleagues before me have said, we are dealing with a request for authority for the Government of Canada to borrow some $25.5 billion.

Traditionally it is an opportunity for members to comment on how the government makes use of the tax dollars of the people of Canada and how it goes about collecting those dollars. It is an opportunity for all of us to comment on a wide variety of programs and policy.

I came today prepared and armed with a long list of specific grievances of my region and indeed the country in general with respect to the fiscal policy of this government. I decided, instead, to put aside that list and to talk in more global terms, global in the Canadian sense, about the policies of this government and where those policies are leading this country.

We have a new theology at work in Canada today, a different kind of approach to government and one which on the fiscal side, I humbly submit, contributes as much to the great frustration and division in the country today as do questions of constitution in particular.

In other words, there is a lot of anger and frustration in Canada today. There is a sense by many groups, regions and individuals within society that they have been abandoned by the national institution, by the national government. Out of that grows a sense of frustration and that frustration is personified by lashing out: sometimes lashing out at neighbours; sometimes picking on minority groups; sometimes, unable to get at the source of your frustration, reaching out and attacking those nearest you.

That in a nutshell personifies the mood of this country today. Why is that? I submit that that in large part is happening because the kind of contract we as Canadians have had with each other from sea to sea, across ten provinces, across two language groups and through the multiplicity of our multicultural institutions, which has always bound us together as a nation has been dissolving over the last period of time.

It used to be that if you lived in Newfoundland you knew that you could aspire to equality of opportunity. You never expected to be equal in every way with every other province, most notably the wealthier provinces. You did not expect the same quality of highways necessarily, or even the same quality of municipal services, or even as many or as bountiful green spaces and park lands, but you did expect equality of opportunity. You had a belief, if you lived in Newfoundland or lived in Aqaluit or in Chimo, Quebec, that at least you had equality of opportunity. While your personal or community circumstances could not be said to be equal to the most prosperous parts of the nation, at least your opportunity or your chance to succeed as an individual in your society was there. That meant that in fundamental areas, no matter where we live in Canada, no matter what our circumstance or language, the notion of citizenship, the notion of being a Canadian meant that we were equal in fundamental ways.

What are the ingredients of ensuring if not equality of circumstance at least equality of opportunity? Surely the first and foremost among those ingredients must be the right to a good education, access to quality institutions, the ability to train the mind to acquire the skills to compete in an increasingly competitive world. Is that not the first and foremost ingredient necessary to participate in the notion that there is equality of opportunity? Traditionally in this country it has been. I believe that traditionally Canadians believe they have had equality of access to good education.

What is another ingredient? It is very basic: access to health care, good health care, quality health care. No matter where you lived, no matter what your personal circumstance, when the need arose to have access to good quality health care, whether you lived in Quebec, British Columbia or Newfoundland, you had equal access. Traditionally that has been the case in this country. It is another of the fundamental agreements that is part of the contract called Canada, one of the things that binds us together no matter where we live as being a fundamental component of the notion of Canadian citizenship.

There is another part of the contract that has kept Canada united, and that is the notion that even though we acknowledge that there are disparities within the nation between regions, and even within provinces between regions, between those who have and those who do not on the economic side, the Government of Canada would always intervene to try to reduce the gap between the have and have not parts of this country. That has been another primary tenet of the notion of citizenship in this country.

I submit that the fiscal policy of this government that is now asking to borrow $25.5 billion in Bill C–65 has dissolved the basic Canadian contract. Why? When you cut billions of dollars as this government has in its last budget—in fact in EPF alone $7.5 billion in health and education out of transfer payments to the provinces—you set up a system where the notion of equality of opportunity is destroyed. Even though the cut to Ontario over five years is $1.2 billion and to Newfoundland is only $164 million, the reality is that Ontario is more able to make up that shortfall, if that is the decision of the Government of Ontario, and maintain the quality of both health and education programs in Ontario than is Newfoundland able to make up a $164 million cut in the province of Newfoundland.

So what happens? Some provinces of Canada have the fiscal ability to maintain, if it is the determination and political will of that jurisdiction to do so, the quality and standards now available in health and education and other provinces, even if they have the will, have reached the limit of their borrowing capability. They cannot borrow any more and they cannot tax any more. A province like Newfoundland where the sales tax is already 12 per cent has only one option left, and that is to raise user fees for either health care or education or to eliminate programs.

That is what is happening. Those provinces that do not have the fiscal capability are being forced to eliminate programs. The fundamental notion that as a Canadian I have fundamentally equal access of opportunity is gone and in certain regions of this country, as a consequence, there is an acknowledgement of that cold brutal reality, a fundamental sense of frustration at the loss of what Canadian citizenship used to mean. There is a fundamental sense of rejection by the national government for those kinds of regions; not only Newfoundland but many other provinces as well.

That kind of feeling brews frustration, a frustrated nation unable to reach out the thousands of miles to strike a blow, even metaphorically. The government that has authored this policy begins to reach out and strike a blow at neighbours. It is that kind of policy that contributes to the lack of tolerance which exists in Canada today.

Since 1969 regional development has been institutionalized in this country, initially under the auspices of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the sole purpose of which was to combat regional disparities, reduce the gap between developed and less developed regions and, although not to guarantee equality, at least to provide the possibility of development, the basic infrastructure to allow industry to develop in regions where it currently is not the case.

That has been the basic philosophy. We can sit here and argue in this House about whether or not it has been successful. We can talk about whether or not dollars spent in the combat against regional disparity have always been well spent and whether we always got the best bang for our buck, but if we believe in the concept of this federation we cannot dispute that combating regional disparities is a fundamental obligation of a national government and has been a fundamental characteristic of modern day Canada.

That policy has been abandoned by this national government. We have seen a dramatic cut in regional development expenditure in Canada, an abandonment of the notion of investment in infrastructure. We essentially have a policy that says to those who want a different quality of life than is now available to them: "If you want a different quality of life, man the wagon trains and resettle".

It is a national resettlement policy. Whether it is the 65,000 people who have been pushed off the farms in Saskatchewan, run off the land in the last four years, or whether it is the thousands of fishermen who have been run off the water in Atlantic Canada over the last couple of years, we are seeing in this country, not by accident but by design, an abandonment of our primary producers and those who live in a rural lifestyle, those whose wealth is primary wealth.

There is not a member of this House who generates one cent of wealth for Canada. We operate on the fringes, on the froth of the economy. We are part of the great service sector. We are elected to be here representing our constituents, but we do not generate one cent of wealth. Those men or women who go out and put their hands into the land and yield from that land a crop that feeds this nation and the world are primary producers. That is real wealth being generated for Canada. The fisherman who goes out and harvests the sea, the humble fisherman, the gentleman who barely subsists on an income below the minimum wage, generates far more wealth for Canada than any member of this place because none of us generate a cent.

Yet the policy of this government that wants another $25.5 billion—an incredible figure—has been to abandon those primary producers. These people are frustrated. They are angry. They want to be here. They want to look across at the Prime Minister who is abandoning them, the Prime Minister who said: "You can trust me". They want to have their say, but they cannot because they cannot reach across the thousands of miles of the great land that is Canada and have their say.

So, in frustration, they reach out too often to those who are closest, their neighbours, and there is more intolerance in this country. It is not born out of an intrinsic intolerance in Canada, but out of frustration.

When we hear, as we do these days, all of the talk and discussion about Meech Lake, constitutions, potential amendments, resolutions and solutions, I ask myself whether it is not time we understood that a large part of the poison injected into the bloodstream of Canada did not find its way there yesterday or the day before or the week before, but found its way there as a consequence of the policy of a national government in fiscal terms which has melted away the glue that has bound this country together over the decades.

• (1650)

The fabric of Canada is not the flag beside you, Mr. Speaker. It is but a symbol, albeit an important one. It is not the Parliament Buildings. They are but a symbol, albeit another important one. It is not even the border between Canada and the United States, which is another important symbol. The fabric of Canada is to be found in the hearts, the minds and the souls of Canadians.

Unless you can go to Quebec and find in Quebec people who believe that every bit of Canada from Cape St. George in Newfoundland to Prince Rupert in British Columbia belongs to them, then you have no fabric called Canada. Unless you can go to Newfoundland and find there Newfoundlanders, Canadians who understand that the problems they confront daily in their lives are the same problems being confronted by the average family in Quebec, then you have no Canada.

Until we understand and until this government understands that the policies, the contract, the commitment we gave to each other as Canadians by way of equality of opportunity in fundamental areas, the commitment to combat regional disparity and indeed in simple terms, to share the wealth and opportunity of this country, are fundamental tenets of this nation not to be melted away or dissipated as a consequence of the bottom line necessity of meeting the budget projections of the Minister of Finance, I submit that all the other ongoing negotiations today about how to bring peace to this country will continue to miss the point.

As a member of this place who has been here for 10 years, I am increasingly convinced that this Prime Minister shall preside over without radical intervention the Balkanization of this great country, the dismemberment of this great country. Until there is some awareness on the other side that high stakes poker is no game to be played with the future of a nation, I cannot support Bill C-65. I cannot support this government's request to borrow another $25.5 billion. I cannot support continued administration by a political party which has not only cut deep into the Canadian psyche, which has not only begun to dismantle it, but has cut through the meat, the fat, and into the bone and has drained the marrow of the wellspring of goodwill that once was Canada.

I call upon my colleagues in all parts of this House and from every region of Canada to reject Bill C–65, not to grant the current Government of Canada another $25.5 billion in borrowing authority, and to be here to ensure that when the time comes this motion is rejected. Hopefully this government in Canada's interest, because it is a money bill, will put itself and this country out of our collective misery by quickly going to the polls because time is running out.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for the usual passion and emotion with which he gives his speeches. I suspect that some of that may come from his staff member who hails from Sault Ste. Marie, who has good Italian blood, and was a student of mine some 25 years ago. I will not give her all the credit.

Nevertheless, what the member said is certainly what I would want to say about this country. There is much doom and gloom among Canadians and parliamentarians. I am sure that even some of those members across the way are somewhat desperate in their feelings about what is happening to all of the regions in Canada.

Is there any hope for us, I ask the member very seriously. What will transpire in the next year or two years or three years? Do we have hope for the country? Does he have hope for the country?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest hope for this country. I have a profound belief in the gut desire of Canadians to build and unite this country, to keep it growing and prosperous. I am not naive about the fact that this country is in difficulty. The country is not in difficulty because on March 28 we do not have an agreement on the Constitution. The country is not in difficulty only because on March 28 we have a continuing process, a difficult and frustrating one, on the Constitution. We did not get to where we are today because we woke up yesterday with a problem called the Constitution.

I am saying to my friend and to all members of the House, and through the House to Canadians that I believe a considerable amount, a lion's share of the origins of the increasing intolerance we are experiencing in Canada today on matters that have to do at least on the surface level with the Constitution, can be found in the fiscal policy of the national government.

I do not separate fiscal policy from social policy or from regional development policy. If you take away all of the national institutions, if you take away from the country those things that have been part of the contract we have made with each other for 100 years, then you dissolve as well in the minds of Canadians no matter where they live, and in particular those who live farthest away from the centre, their attachment and commitment to the federation.

The fundamental glue that holds a country together is not a constitution. That is profoundly and unquestionably important. Fundamentally what holds a country together and develops a country is ultimately what is in the hearts, souls and minds of Canadians.

Increasingly as the days, weeks and months go by there is little and little more daily, weekly and monthly left of our national institutions with this government. Any and all of the destruction of the CBC, the elimination and destruction of regional development programs, the abandonment of health and education programs, and a transfer of the debt to some of the poorest provinces and jurisdictions in this country contribute to division in the country because they take away the national institutions to which we attach ourselves in the communities in which all Canadians. Intangible examples of the value and the wonder of being a Canadian are eliminated. You treat the nation as nothing more than so many bits on the Monopoly board. If that is the bottom line, if that is the way we ask Canadians to measure the value of their Canadian citizenship, then we have sold our soul and sold our heart for the bottom line.

That may make the Minister of Finance very happy. That may motivate him when he wakes up in the morning. That may get his juices flowing, but it does nothing for the ordinary Canadian and it does nothing for the people who today want nothing more than for this country to succeed.

This fiscal policy, this request for $25.5 billion more, is pathetic in the face of the problems that we have, and it would be pathetic for Parliament to grant these moneys to a government that has not understood the root cause of the difficulties we confront in Canada today.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned the CBC, and I mentioned it in a prior question to my friend from Sault Ste. Marie. Would he like to comment on the thread of what I and others have seen in the budgets of this particular government over the years?

• (1700)

It has attacked of the thread of national unity, whether it be through privatization of various Crown corporations, cutting funding and perhaps ultimately privatizing institutions like the CBC, whether it is the cut-backs on VIA Rail and the elimination of the Silver Bullet.

In this particular budget, the government proposes the ultimate sale of PetroCan, something which was brought in by the member's own government with some approval by my party, a corporation that is now becoming somewhat profitable and well run. Now that it has become profitable, and there is an opportunity of getting some money back into the coffers, it appears the government wants to get rid of it.

If the government negotiates as well as it did in the sale of de Havilland to Boeing, it is going to end up costing us money. Would the member like to comment on the destruction of the Canadian cultural and ethnic fabric that is set out not only in this budget but in previous budgets of this government?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague who has just spoken has given us a thorough list of those institutions. We can make the analogy that those institutions are arteries in the body that is Canada and they are being severed. The country is not exploding, it is imploding. If all the arteries are severed, the heart ceases to function. That is what this Prime Minister has never understood.

A fisherman, in a community on the great northern peninsula, said to me one time: "If that fellow Mulroney was a lake, you could walk across him and not even get your ankles wet. He has no depth". I thought that was a profound insight: no depth, no vision and no understanding that the kind of magic that is required of leadership is not to be found in the flow charts, not to be gleaned from the words of wisdom of the pollsters, pundits, the Dalton Camps, the PCOs and the PMOs. The kind of wisdom necessary to appeal to what is fundamentally good, tolerant and positive in Canadians is better to be found in the heart of that fisherman than to be found in the cold graphs offered in the polling data that the Prime Minister spends too many long, lonely hours with.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are terminated now.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills: C-70, an act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada, for the financial year ending March 31, 1990; and Bill C-71, an act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada, for the financial year ending March 31, 1991.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is the borrowing bill in which the government is requesting authority to borrow some $25.5 billion.

When considering this request, I think we have to ask if the government has the ability to manage, as it say it has. It has been pointed out by the hon. member from Kamloops and other members, that if this is management, this country is in for a rough ride. The type of management we have seen since the election of 1988, is management by time allocation and closure. The government with its arrogance and authority, has seen fit to manage by cutting off free debate in the House of Commons and to ignore totally the wishes of the Canadian people.

We witnessed again today the House leader of the government party advising us that he is going to close off debate, essentially before debate is started. After only one hour and three minutes of debate so far, we already have notice from the government that it will not allow any more debate on this borrowing bill for $25.5 billion.

This is in addition to the government's ridiculous attitude toward debate. Last week we were debating the crop insurance bill, a bill that both the Liberals and the New Democratic Party decided should go through and be passed in the best interests of Canadian farmers.

Before asking for any input, the House leader of the government party simply said: "Bang. Closure. No more debate." We ended up voting on the closure motion on a bill that neither the Liberals nor the New Democrats had opposition to in principle, even though they believed that perhaps it should be expanded as suggested by some amendments that had been proposed.

We have now experienced closure 13 times in the last year and three months, and time allocation another 10 or 12 times. It is getting to the point where I wonder what it is this government is managing. It is managing to cut off the freedom of expression and the freedom of debate of the people of Canada.

That is not what we are here for. That is not what the Canadian people have voted 295 members of Parliament into the House of Commons for. They have elected us to review, read, study and to debate in their interests the bills before Parliament. That process has been cut off, constantly and totally by this government in its arrogant use of those jackboot tactics to slash the debate already on this major borrowing bill before anybody has had the opportunity of speaking on it.

I shake my head, along with the people of Canada. This is how the government is managing change. The change it is managing is the change in the democratic process of allowing reasonable debate on all legislation that comes before the House.

If there is an apology to be made to the people of Canada, it is the apology that we have to use what methods are available to us in opposition to combat the arrogance of a government that is willing to use these Draconian methods, these measures that were brought in to be used only as a last resort. We are now seeing these methods being used as the primary resort. Every bill, regardless of what it is, if it looks like it is going to be debated, is met with closure. No more debate. We can talk on it today and that is it. Nobody else can speak on it.

That is what we have seen in the committees going across Canada, whether it be the unemployment insurance or the finance committee. The government sets up a schedule that we must follow. If not, you are cut off. It does not matter whether you are a member of the House of Commons or whether you are a public citizen. While you may want to be heard, if you do not fit within what the government sees as the area it wants to hear or you do not fit within the time frame of the government's schedule, then you cannot be heard. Is that democracy?

When we see what is happening in eastern Europe, with the democratisation of the eastern European countries and the Eastern Bloc countries, and we look at what is happening here, I scratch my head in amazement and wonder: Are they progressing and are we regressing? What is happening to us?

• (1710)

I would like discuss now what I have seen happening since I have been in Parliament, specifically dealing with the borrowing authority and the budget.

Last Thursday I attended a forum on literacy. This is the International Year of Literacy. In the city of Penticton I saw a play which showed the difficulties in Canada of literacy. I did some reading to see what was available for Canadians.

Approximately $110 million has been provided over a five-year period for the promotion and study of literacy, although the demand is much greater and immediate to fund existing programs and to start up new ones to combat the actual problem. The need now is for core funding for literacy projects and for education of those who are illiterate.

Are you aware that there is somewhere between 4.5 million and 5 million people in Canada today who are functionally illiterate, Mr. Speaker? In my province alone, there are 360,000 people who are functionally illiterate. In looking at the studies that have been done across Canada, unfortunately it shows that as we go further to the east, the illiteracy rates rise.

Being functionally illiterate does not necessarily mean that those people cannot read the spoken word. It means that they cannot function because they cannot put enough words together in many cases to be able to understand the everyday forms that they have to fill out for income tax or for their child tax credits or, as the GST comes through, for their rebates on the goods and services tax. These are the types of skills that they need.

We who can read take it for granted, as those of us who can see and those of us who can hear take those senses for granted. We do not see how serious this is. In fact, if you take our sight and our hearing away from us, it is not much different than taking away our ability to read. It is a mode of communication that is essential for many people.

The play that I saw really hit home. It is called Reading the Signs. It is a play by a Canadian playwright, Jim Betz and produced by World Literacy Canada and performed by the Young People's Theatres. I would strongly suggest that people get out and see this play if it comes to their area.

I implore the government members to go to see this play because it shows what I talk about when people ask where would I spend money and where would I save if I were in government. It is a matter of priority. It has been shown, time and again, that if we teach those who do not know how to read and write to be able to do so, they become more employable. They become higher income earners. I think the figures show us that those who are literate earn 44 per cent more than those who are unable to read and write. This is what we should be addressing when we are trying to make a better Canada.

I implore this government to see this play, Reading the Signs, because it is an excellent play showing the difficulties of those who cannot read and write and the problems that they go through in everyday life, the problems that those of us who can read and write, who are functionally literate, do not even recognize.

In many cases we do not even recognize when we see people making excuses about why they should not read a particular document or letter. But this does puts us on our guard, and makes us more aware of some of the things that are so important to many of us out there. I implore this government to look at that. The $110 million is a good start, but perhaps somewhat misdirected.

In looking at future budgets and in looking at this budget, I ask the government to consider putting more money toward training teachers, more money toward the programs and the core funding required to look after the problem of literacy in Canada.

Let me move on to one of the things in the budget that was particularly upsetting to me as seniors critic for my party, namely, the cuts concerning veterans. This has hit home in an area that I represent, Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, where we have a fairly high seniors population, almost triple the national average, many of whom are veterans.

The Royal Canadian Legion from Grand Forks wrote to me on March 7 and I would like to read this short letter into the record because I think it is relevant. It is from Branch 59 and it reads as follows:

> Branch 59 of the Royal Canadian Legion, Grand Forks, British Columbia would like to express our very deep concern about the cuts to veterans allowance in the government's budget of April, 1990.
> Surely the veterans who were identified in the Veterans Improvement Program are, as they get older, more in need than ever.
> Particularly shocking was the decrease in subsidization of the costs of veterans in intermediate and long-term care facilities. Virtually doubling the veterans portion of these charges from $240 to $400 per month is a cruel blow to those ageing and dying veterans who so willing jeopardized their well-being in the service of Canada. Many have not long to live, and to make savings on their hardships seems particularly insensitive.
>
> It will not be long before the numbers of all veterans will be seriously depleted and eventually disappear, but in the meantime, it is the intention of this branch and hopefully the entire Legion membership to rise and defend their comrades who are least able to defend themselves.
>
> It is a shame that our government's memories are so short.
>
> To balance a budget on the backs of the least fortunate of our society is a public disgrace.

It is signed by the president, Rae Hayward.

I could not have described better than Mr. Hayward in this letter the disdain and disgust that I feel in the cuts to the allowances and the programs that are there to protect and assist those who have fought in both wars and in the Korean War so that I can stand up freely and speak my mind in the House of Commons. I am very pleased to have been able to read this letter into the record.

Equally as shocking, at a time when we pay pay lip service to women's issues and the equality of women, is to have the government attack by cutting core funding to women's centres on top of a 15 per cent last year, of $2 million, I believe, to a cut of some $1.3 million this year. Again, it is a disgrace. It is not only an attack on women, it is attack on all Canadians. Those women's centres offer so much. The women's centre in Penticton in my area will shut down as a result of this core funding cut. They will try to continue it on a volunteer basis. L. Burnham of that centre has been a hard working member of the Penticton and area community.

• (1720)

This group has done such things as spearheading a drive for family housing, investigating the need for day care. They have sponsored workshops on such important subjects as poverty awareness and family violence. They have provided a library on subjects of interests to women. They have been sending out regular newsletters to keep concerned people aware of the local and national issues and they have run a series of leadership development workshops for women.

They also participate actively in the women's shelter and the assistance with the women's shelter that is so key not only to Penticton but to all of the small communities around Penticton such as Osoyoos, Oliver, Okanagan Falls, Cawstin, Summerland. All of these areas are drawn in and looked after by that particular shelter in the city of Penticton.

I am not the only one who worries about these cuts to the women's centres. I received a petition which unfortunately is not in a form that would be presentable in the House but I think the message of the 87 people who signed this particular petition is relevant. They protest the federal budget cuts to women centres and transition houses throughout Canada. The services provided, especially those involving emergency shelter and safety, are essential to the welfare of women, their children and pivotal in the struggle to end family violence.

I speak of these cuts I return to the question of priorities. If we are to come out of the dark ages then we must take steps toward the equality of men and women. It is a small thing when you consider the little bit of money that is required in order to fund core funding for these women's centres or even to expand them.

When we consider that this government has seen fit to proceed with a program of advertising of over $14 million for the goods and service tax when it knows that over 80 per cent of the people of Canada do not want, that in itself is a comment on the priorities of this government. Do not give the people what they want but what you want and then proceed to sell that program to them with their money. What Canadians need is more things like women's centres and arms of our communities that will help those who are less fortunate.

Finally, I would like to comment on the environment. When I read the budget and listened to the minister's budget speech I wrote down in the margin "Lip service but where is the money"? That is exactly what has happened.

There appears to be no money for the environment. There are cuts to just about everything else. There are cuts, it appears, in the Forest Resource Development Area, an area that would assist in silviculture and reforestation of our forests at a time when, particularly in British Columbia, we recognize how important our forests are to us for the future.

The government has not set anything aside for that and it is talking about substantially less money being available. The FRDA agreements come up for renewal at the end of this month, a short few days away. We fear that if those programs are cut it will be costly not just in jobs but to the environment.

What is not in the budget with respect to the environment is the funding for conservation and alternative energy programs as promised in the last election campaign. Funding for research and development and environmental technologies as promised in the Throne Speech is not in this budget. There is, however, the cap on much needed overseas aid and development. There are no new funds for reforestation programs. There are no attempts to deal with global warming or disintegration of the ozone layer. There are no cost sharing programs for conservation, recycling and mass transit programs.

There are also all of the cuts in VIA Rail, an area that perhaps we should be looking at to ensure that those of us who are so ready to use our cars for transportation might turn to if we had a rail system that is more efficient and more effective and ran more often. But what happens is a constant attack on these systems.

I wind up as I started. The government says it will manage change. Well, Mr. Speaker, if these are the changes that we are managing to get then I think it is time that we managed to change this government.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I just want to congratulate my colleague on a fine speech and congratulate those who have preceded him this afternoon.

It seems strange that when there is a bill to borrow approximately $28.5 billion that we would hear absolutely not a peep, not a squeak, no justification coming from the other side of the House whatsoever.

Is this a sign or is this an extension of the malaise that has set in in this country, that the government would suggest to Canadians who are watching that it does not have to justify this borrowing? Are the members saying they know where they are going and they can assume that is right.

Canadians to whom I am talking are not assuming it is right, I can assure you of that. I just wonder if I could get some reaction from my colleague on the fact that there seems to be nothing, no justification whatsoever coming from the other side of the House to argue, at least present a case to the Canadian people to suggest that they know where they are going or what they are trying to do with this nation.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, certainly from what I have seen in the short time that I have been in this House and as a student of politics and Canadian history for most of my life, I think the hon. member is correct. We have a government that simply proceeds with what it wants as opposed to what the people of Canada want. It promised one thing in the election, as I have explained with the environment, but it has come through with something totally different, nothing.

In the last Parliament the Tories said nothing at all, and in fact were against the free trade agreement. They turned around and before the end of Parliament, we had a free trade agreement on the table. It is an arrogance that I have seen building, particularly over the last few years with this government that, the majority's will must be the will of the people, regardless of what the thoughts of the people are. I think the attitude of the government here is a small snapshot of everything we have seen over the last little while, the clawback on the old age security and family allowances. People did not want that but they are getting it anyway.

There is the goods and services tax; 80 per cent of the people in Canada are against it but our Prime Minister knows best and we are getting it regardless. We are getting it without the ability to debate or change it. The Tories are doing it, what they feel is best for Canada.

The unemployment insurance changes hurt not only my province but many of the other provinces across Canada. Again, labour did not want it, many management people did not want it, and certainly the municipalities are going to end up paying a lot of extra dollars as a result of being employers. It is shifting the balance of payments from one to the other, from one pocket to the other with the taxpayer ultimately being the loser. It is all done by essentially a thumbing of the nose at what in fact Canadians want. The government is simply saying, "There is what is on the plate, you children of Canada, eat it and be happy and do not give us any back talk".

• (1730)

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I think the member has brought to the debate a slightly different perspective, one to which we probably do not give enough priority. It is the concept of people who are literate, but not functionally literate.

I am sure that he experiences this in his office, as I do in my office, and as do members of our staffs to a greater extent. It concerns the forms that average Canadians are expected to fill out. I refer to forms from Revenue Canada, Canada pension appeals or immigration and disability credit forms. Any kind of application that comes from this government must be a tremendous burden to people just trying to get through them. Those of us who are fortunate enough to have extensive education have a great difficulty ourselves.

I would be very interested in the hon. member's comments on the complexity of the forms, something which seem to go against the people who are already disadvantaged.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, something that we in Parliament have to work toward is the simplification of forms, not just forms for income tax but simplification of all forms. We should put those forms in plain words, English or French, so that the people can understand them. We do not need the wherefores and the heretofors that we so often get in the legal jargon. All that does is confuse people.

What we should be striving for is what we are now seeing in the insurance and legal areas where there is encouragement to get rid of the old-fashioned language and getting down to basic, easy English and French so that we, the average person out there, can understand. We should not need a Toronto lawyer to interpret these things. We want to be able to interpret them ourselves without the necessity of some high-falutin accountant or lawyer having to be employed to do it for us.

In that vein, I would like to bring up two things that I have not touched on. It is an expansion of what we have heard here today. I refer to the cuts in citizenship and multiculturalism and the cuts in native funding.

In each of those areas, if we look at English as a second language, and in some of the areas of citizenship and multiculturalism, built in to them is part of an educational process that I mentioned when I was speaking of the illiteracy problems within Canada. Certainly, the cuts to the native programming have been a knife thrust to the very heart of a problem that we have here in Canada.

If we look at the Southam News study on illiteracy, we see that it looked at Canada as a whole, but did not go into the territories where we have a high native population. What the study showed was that often, because of the lack of training and opportunity, those in our native communities do not have the opportunities that others do to gain an education. Therefore they are not able to take advantage of some of the government programs because they do not understand the paperwork. They cannot fill out the paperwork because they do not even know it exists.

I am saying to the government, shake your head and refocus on what is important to keeping this country together. Let us get on with the job of managing Canada in a manner that keeps it intertwined and happy.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this debate, which has been going on for some time now, brings to everyone's attention the importance of the financial crisis being faced by this government. Although it is fond of talking about market forces, about what the opposition did when it was in government and about what the provincial governments are doing, in reality it has put Canadians into a corner, something which we all feel very badly about and which we wish we were not in.

The bill in front of us, Bill C-65, authorizes the government to borrow $25.5 billion. I would like to take time to show ways in which that affects people in Winnipeg North Centre. I think the people in that constituency deserve an explanation because as taxpayers they are carrying the burden. That is because there has been a tremendous shift in our Canadian tax system away from the corporations and on to average families. In fact, we see that most of the people who are hurt by this deficit are those who can least afford it.

It is hard to interpret these policies for people who do not follow the government closely every day and who do not have to watch it in Question Period, as we do, trying to defend policies which are indefensible. It is hard to understand why it caused this financial panic in the country. I call it a financial panic on purpose.

Before I arrived in the House of Commons two years ago I spent my time teaching political science at the University of Winnipeg. The question that is very basic to political science is the question that is asked by one generation of scholars after another and that is: "Who gets what, where, when and how?" It is also a question that journalists ask.

A country gets itself in trouble when it loses its sense of legitimacy, when it loses the will to be taxed and when it loses the sense that what their government is doing is correct. It is then that people begin to revolt. When Canadians look around and ask themselves that basic question of who gets what, where, when and how, they begin to feel that this country is spending money contrary to the democratic principles on which the country was founded.

We chose to build this country and to tax ourselves out of a sense of purpose, whether that purpose be defined on a regional basis; helping people in the north build communities, helping people in the west establish farms, helping people in northern Ontario establish mining and lumber communities, helping maintain the fishing industry in the maritimes, helping Toronto to grow into a world class city with financial strength or helping Vancouver develop as a port. There was a decision made that we would help each other. At times the west has been a great generator of income for this country; and at other times the west has had to turn to the central government and say: "Please give us a hand". Similarly, we could go across each of the regions in this country and point to times in which they needed somebody's help.

When we become as bankrupt as we are now—and the government can use any figure it wants, but we are probably dealing with a deficit of $35 billion and rising each day—people realize that we can no longer help each other. When we say that we can no longer help each other, then the very fibre of the country is at risk. When we have to deal with a bill such as the one in front of us today, we have to come to grips with the fact that government has put the fibre of the country at risk because we cannot finance our efforts to help each other out.

We have at other times listened to the government and to members of all parties talk with a great deal of seriousness about the constitutional crisis facing us. It is wrapped around deadlines, factions, what one provincial government wants to do versus another and what opposing leaders want to do. For all these reasons there is a great deal of tension in this country, but nobody sits back and thinks of the relationship between the economics of Canada and the constitutional crisis.

I use this opportunity to say that there is a direct link. People are less supportive of our country right now because they do not feel they have a stake in it. All they have is a bill. If you want to be like Ronald Reagan and argue in family homilies, then the reality is that people feel less committed if they cannot continue to work together and produce an income; if they cannot continue to look after their own homes and if they cannot look after those who are sick. People become depressed. This country has become clouded by a depression which was caused in part by a government strategy which has raised taxes among those who are least able to pay for it and who are struggling the most. That strategy does not turn and give out money to the poorest people in this country in the poorest regions who desperately need it. In fact it pulls the money out of the system and creates more and more debt.

The government made the strategic decision in 1984 that it had to lower taxes on the rich and increase the taxes on the poor. It is a variation of the American thesis that the rich do not work because they do not make enough money, and the poor do not work because they make too much money. The government decided what it would try to do was give the rich more money and at the same time take the money away from low-income Canadians.

That strategy has created incredible tensions in the country, whether we define rich by region or by families, or whether we define the poor by certain groups in remote parts of Canada or in our cities, whether we are talking about the homeless, children, or native families on reserves across northern Manitoba. The poor are not getting anything back. So when we look at a borrowing bill we say: "Who are they borrowing it for? What has happened to our tax base in this country?" The strategic decision to lessen the tax burden on some people in the hope that they would generate so much income and that money would be replaced has absolutely failed.

The second strategy that is now becoming apparent and is failing is the free trade agreement. I know people will say right away: "What has free trade to do with taxation? You are off the mark, Mr. Member." It has a lot to do with taxation.

The federal government has made the decision to reduce all sorts of revenue bases dealing with international trade. When people talk about reducing tariffs and subsidies, it means that the government is losing an income base. The GST argument is based upon not only the inefficiency of the manufacturers' sales tax, something which nobody would deny, but as free trade takes effect, the government loses a large revenue base. The logic of a North American marketplace, governed by market forces and not by government action, and not by government leadership, is that you lose your taxation base in that economy. This is what is happening to Canadians right now. Canadians are afraid.

I am thinking particularly of the city of Winnipeg. It is a great city and has played a great role in this country. But the reality is that right now Winnipeg is under a tremendous amount of pressure. People in that city feel it with their hearts and are looking for a way of redeveloping it. There are many groups that have been formed and so forth. They turn to the federal government and say: "You have been a partner with us. You have helped form Winnipeg. You helped, for example, with the CN which goes through the city. You helped with Air Canada. You helped with a number of government institutions. You helped build up our hospitals. You helped transfer money to our province. We are there and now we are ready to do something".

The federal government turns on the government of Manitoba and the people of Manitoba with a vengeance and says: "I am sorry. Do you not see our deficit? Do you not see we have no money for farmers or for western economic diversification? Do you not see that we have to move CN out to Edmonton or back to Montreal? Do you not see that we have to close down VIA and pull Air Canada out and privatize it?" The list is endless. The end product of that is that a total depression sets upon leaders in a city and a province who are trying to rebuild and to grasp a role for it.

Winnipeg threatens to become a city of wholesaling and not a city of manufacturing. That is not because it does not have the ambition, but because the reality is that the government is doing absolutely nothing to help it out. I hold this federal government and these ministers responsible.

If you looked through the articles in the newspapers after the budget, a time when people raised some very serious complaints about this government and the budget, what did you see? We saw that the Minister of Energy said: "Manitoba gets so much money they should not be complaining". Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? This is a city which has been impoverished through federal government inaction for the last five years, and it has to apologize for asking for money. What kind of country do we have when we have to apologize for asking for money when there is a legitimate desire to grow, expand and be a healthy city?

The fact that the government has consistently tried to make the people of Manitoba feel guilty about asking for money was one of the most sudden turnabouts in government policy, particularly in a party which has spent years decrying federal intervention. When it was asked what it was going to do for the city of Winnipeg, it said: "Sorry, we have no ideas. We have no money. We hope you do well. We are going back to Ottawa. We have cabinet meetings. We have this and that to do. We are not here for you. Best of luck".

When people go back to that basic question of who gets what, where, when and how, they find out that in the case of Manitoba, Winnipeg and the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, it is not them. They do not know how other people do it. They know it goes elsewhere. They know that the large sums are being lost in carrying out activities which are not beneficial.

The purpose of any member's response to a budget is not to decry on behalf of one region, but to use one region as an example of the tensions being created across this country. I am sure members who sit on this side, whether they are from Kingston or Ottawa, share in my anguish and frustration that the government chooses to hurt so many parties through this budget.

I would like to spend some time talking about the fact that this is one of the few times in Canadian history that Canadians are literally refusing to pay taxes. Those of us in the west who read the accounts of public meetings being held in Winnipeg, in Estevan, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton know that on the prairies people are saying: "We will not pay the tax. We do not want the GST."

People realize that we have a huge deficit. After the war we had a huge deficit. People did not refuse to pay taxes. We introduced income tax in the first world war to finance the war. Yet here we have a crisis and people are walking on us. As politicians we have to ask these questions. Why are people walking on us? Why are people not willing to finance government? It is because of the irresponsible action of the people sitting across from me that people refuse to pay their taxes now?

The question for the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Prime Minister who are from the west, and the Prime Minister who never comes to the west is this. "How far are you going to push Canadians?" Is there, among you, a Maggie Thatcher who thinks that people can be policed into paying taxes? Are we going to have the same sight in Canada that we do right now in Great Britain of people in fist fights and people being bullied into paying an unfair tax?

Canadian leaders, particularly those across the aisle from me, have to learn that they cannot push people into a situation like that. Canadians are trying, in their usual gentle fashion, to say they do not want to pay this tax. It is not because we are irresponsible. We simply want you to get your house in order. Until the government gets its house in order, people are going to continue to reject and to fight that tax. I think that they should be supported because the tax is inherently unfair. The borrowing of money to do things which are contrary to the interests of average Canadians is unfair. Generally speaking, when everyone sees an unfairness, then I think you have to turn around and say: "Let's stop and let's listen."

In England, Maggie Thatcher made the decision that she did not have to listen, that she was above listening, that she was above democracy. Right now she is paying the price for that. She is having to deal with people in the streets being hurt by their fellow citizens. What kind of country do you have when people turn on each other rather than pay taxes? You have the beginning of a national crisis.

The last thing that we need in Canada, given the national crisis we are already in, is a tax revolt. It is incumbent upon each and every minister of the government, to review departmental budgets and find ways of reducing expenditures, cutting out waste and, more important, to speak to the Minister of Finance and tell him: "Get those interest rates down. Speak to the Bank of Canada. Tell it how many billions of dollars it is costing the taxpayer simply because of some crazed, Thatcherite-like monetary attack on the economy."

As people scream and beg for mercy across this country, it does not matter whether you are talking about farmers, small business people, people in medium-sized firms, international business people are laughing at us. They go back to their host countries and borrow money for next to nothing. Our Canadian businesses cannot get access to capital because we are drawing in money through an artificially high rate to pay off our debt.

I cannot think of a situation any more more incompetent than the federal government welcoming offshore capital to finance our debt. For generations we financed ourselves, although we might have begrudged it. We were able to do that through the Canadian Savings Bond program and other short-term treasury notes processes.

A few years ago the federal government very quietly gave up financing the debt within the country. Now we are borrowing offshore, which contributes to the depletion of our national savings. Canadians are saying two things as they hear this debate taking place. They are saying: "Keep up the fight on taxes. Keep up the fight against borrowing. Tell the government in no uncertain terms that we do not want to continue in this fashion any longer."

• (1750)

A Winnipeg journalist writing in the Winnipeg Free Press spent some time elaborating on one of the missing links in the Canadian taxation system. Many people talk about tax reform, which is one of the more over-used expressions in political debate lately. This government took on "tax reform".

What does it mean to have tax reform when you are a Tory? It means you decrease the amount of money you tax in the corporate sector and you increase the amount of money you are taking from average Canadians.

For example, since 1985, the year after the Tories took power, personal income taxes have risen 49 per cent, and sales taxes have gone up 51 per cent. Meanwhile, corporate taxes have actually dropped 10 per cent. According to Frances Russell, the columnist at the Winnipeg Free Press, had the Mulroney government maintained the same ratio of corporate taxes to corporate profit existing in 1984, it would have taken in an additional $6 billion. She is basing her writing on a Dalhousie University economist, Allistair Sinclair, who noted that this extra tax revenue would, in turn, have reduced interest charges by another $2 billion, leaving a deficit of $22 billion rather than the current $30 billion.

Canada's poorest taxpayers saw their bracket climb from 9 per cent to 17 per cent. Meanwhile, Canada's wealthiest citizens watched their bracket drop from 34 per cent to 29 per cent. That 29 per cent begins at the $55,000 level, meaning that the tax system treats multi-millionaires and middle-class income earners the same.

When people read this sort of information about the Canadian tax system, they begin to have a sense of disbelief within themselves. How can you have a system when, at the time this government took over, it said that the biggest problem facing it was the fact that the Liberals had bankrupted the country? What was the government going to do? It was going to tell all its friends in the high-income brackets not to worry because their taxes were going to be reduced; but, by the way, the rest of you Canadians watch out because we are going to take it from you. That turns out to be one of the meanest and most miserable governmental strategies we have ever seen in this country, and perhaps even in the western world in the last five years.

Nobody has really sat down and thought about how many tax increases have been introduced since this government took over.

In round one, in 1985, there was an extra two cents per litre for gasoline, and an additional 25 cents per package of 25 cigarettes. There was a 2 per cent increase in the excise tax on wine, beer and other alcoholic beverages. The federal sales tax rose one percentage point and was extended to candy, pet food, soft drinks, shampoos, soaps, some energy-saving devices and insulation materials. A surtax of up to 10 per cent was imposed on middle and upper-income earners for the next 18 months. That was only round one.

In round two, in 1986, a surtax boosted income tax by 1.5 per cent in 1986, and 3 per cent more starting in 1987. The government likes to introduce taxes, give you 12 months to forget about it, and then hit you. The federal sales tax increased by another percentage point. The excise tax rose by 6 per cent on tobacco and 4 per cent on alcohol. An estimated four million low-income families received refundable tax credits of up to $50 per adult and $25 per child to help offset the impact of the higher sales taxes.

In round three, in 1987, excise taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel increased by one cent a litre. Taxes on cigarettes and other tobacco products went up 4 per cent, resulting in a three-cent increase in a package of 25. A federal sales tax of 12 per cent was added to snack foods such as popcorn, potato chips, and granola bars, popsicles and some types of ice-cream. Even the granola crowd was hit. Airline passengers faced a new $4 tax on domestic flights and on tickets purchased abroad to help pay for measures such as increased security.

The most interesting is round four. In round four there is only one tax increase. That was an extra one-cent a litre tax on gasoline and aviation fuel, with a corresponding 1 per cent rebate for farmers and fishermen.

What was the year for round four? The year was 1988. What else took place in 1988? Was that not the year of a federal election? What a coincidence.

In round five we are now back up to speed. There is the proposed goods and services tax which is now 7 per cent, but who knows what it will be when these guys get finished with it?

Second, there are personal income tax increases. The federal surtax on all taxpayers went to 5 per cent from 3 per cent. An additional 3 per cent surtax was slapped on people with incomes above $70,000. There were corporate tax increases of 7.1 per cent. There was the so-called clawback of baby bonus and old age security benefits from those with net annual income of more than $50,000. The federal sales tax rose to 13.5 per cent from 12 per cent. The excise tax went up 2 cents a litre on unleaded gasoline—what people were touting as being a great environmental benefit. There is also a 3-cent increase on leaded gasoline. Excise tax on tobacco rose, including a $4 a carton increase. Sales tax rose to 19 per cent from 18 per cent on alcohol, to 9 per cent from 8 per cent on construction materials and to 13.5 per cent from 12 per cent on telecommunications and programming services.

Can you imagine that as a record? When I look at 1990 and 1991 I fear for Canadians and what other burdens they are going to be carrying. With some of these taxes we lose sight of just how much money the government has gained as a result of these tax increases.

Let us talk about some of them. When the government eliminated the registered home ownership savings plan in 1985 it received another $105 million. Did it have any idea how much difficulty it brought to families, particularly families in the Toronto, Calgary and Vancouver markets by eliminating that opportunity that these young families had to save for their first home? It probably have no idea. On the changes to marital exemptions it pick up another $20 million. The elimination of low income federal tax reductions brought in $650 million. The temporary 5 per cent and 10 per cent surtax in 1985 accounted for another $500 million. The de-indexation of tax brackets and family allowances and tax credits in 1986 accounted for another $635 million. The permanent general 3 per cent surtax in 1986 brought in another $1.2 billion. The family allowance and old age security clawback in 1989 accounted for another $500 million. The general surtax increases from 3 per cent, pro-rated and beginning in 1990 brought in $1.1 billion. The high income surtax was pro-rated for 1989 and increased a full 3 per cent in January for $165 million. The list goes on and on. It is endless as to the amount of money this government has collected from Canadians.

What is the end product for us sitting here? It wants us to approve another borrowing bill for $25.5 billion. The questions that are being asked throughout this country and in Winnipeg North Centre are these. When is this going to end? When is some sanity going to be brought to the government? When is it going to be stopped from taxing and from borrowing? When is it going to start taking care of us again?

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague very much for his very lengthy and detailed description of the actions of this government in the financial field. I wonder if he might talk a little more about the impact of the spending in taxing patterns and as a result the borrowing of this government and its effect on the low-income Canadians.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, when one speaks of the poor in this country one does not know where to begin nowadays. You do not know whether you should just talk about the increased difficulty of students who had an extra 3 per cent surcharge on their loans for administration. You ask yourself why would you begin to tax the poorest people for giving them the opportunity. Can you imagine a welfare office charging people for the right to receive money? This is what this government is doing. It is saying: "If you are so poor you have to borrow money to go to school. In order to get the money you have to pay us 3 per cent". If you saw that taking place in the bank among the poorest people in the country there would be a revolt. This government hiding behind its Prime Minister and all its sanctimony says: "That is fine. That is what it costs to administer it. That is all there is to it".

Where do we begin to talk about native peoples in a short answer and their poverty? With this government's new strategy, as announced through the Secretary of State, who does not seem to understand what he has done, they cannot even communicate with each other. They cannot even build up within themselves the communication infrastructure so that Canadians understand the desperate situation they are in and that they can share from one part of the country to the other what they are doing. They do not get on a plane every day. They are not like the business traveller. These are people who are trying to understand each other's situation, develop some commonality of spirit among the 300,000 to 500,000 aboriginal peoples in this country. Yet we turn around in a moment of need, right in the middle of judicial inquiries saying how unfairly they have been treated and we say to them, by the way we are taking away your money to communicate. Best of luck to you. It is that sort of attitude which brings a total amount of disrepute to the government.

• (1800)

It is not only the opposition party that feels this. The Canadian Council on Social Development responded to the budget with the following statement: "If we have had eight consecutive years of economic growth, why is this the sixth consecutive year we have had cuts in social programs?"

I think that is the critical question. Why, after all this growth? We know the Prime Minister loves to talk about his jobs, jobs, jobs. But does he talk about the heartache he has created by cut-backs, cut-backs, cut-backs? I do not hear anything. Does anybody else hear anything? The answer is no.

For these reasons, and the question about what has happened to the poor in this country gets to the heart of our opposition to this borrowing bill.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, any debate on borrowing authority is an opportunity to talk about a great many things and I hope that I will have an opportunity to touch on a number of policy areas in the course of my remarks.

Today, in Question Period when the hon. member for Nickel Belt got up I felt that we had a very convenient summary, if you like, of the political landscape in Canada. As you know the hon. member for Nickel Belt has been on a weekly basis every Wednesday awarding the corporate welfare bum of the week award to a corporation selected from among three that are nominated every Wednesday and these corporations invariably have similar characteristics. They are large, they pay no taxes but also as it turns out in many cases, although they are not able to pay taxes by the government's definition, they are too poor to pay taxes, even though many of them make millions of dollars in profits, they are able to make donations to the Conservative and Liberal parties of Canada. This surely must be a sign to all of those who want to hear, those who have ears and can hear, of what is really at the root of our Canadian political system. The corporate sector is looked after regardless of who is in government, whether it be the Liberal party as it was for so many years, or the Conservative party.

That is why we found in recent weeks that the opposition of the Liberal party to the goods and services tax has been rather pro forma, that they have sought to dissociate themselves from the authenticity and the tenacity of the NDP opposition to the goods and services tax because these are people who know that the goods and services tax is part of the corporate agenda and who know that if the Tories did not implement it that should they be elected next time around that it is the sort of thing that they also would have to do in obedience to the same masters. So we find that there is this funny sort of reticence about digging themselves too deep with respect to the goods and services tax, hoping that they can get away with being seen to be strongly in opposition to it but also hoping that the government very much succeeds in getting it through.

Of course the story of the Conservative Party in government from 1984 to 1992 or 1993, whenever it comes to a well deserved end, will be that it will have done the dirty work of the Liberal Party of Canada. It will have done what the right wing of the Liberal Party of Canada would have wanted to do but may have found it more difficult than the Tories have done. To be fair to the Liberals, what they would do shamefacedly and evasively, Conservative always do with enthusiasm. That makes them in some respects more worthy opponents, but it also makes them more destructive because they do not know restraint in their policies.

The fact of the matter is that the middle class, the low and middle income earners in Canada are under attack from every which way one can think of as a result of the tax and social policies of the government. People are starting to catch on that they under attack. People are starting to catch on that it is getting harder and harder to make ends meet. Everywhere they turn they are met by an increase in something, generally a tax or a price, or a decrease in something, generally a benefit or service of some kind. People are only going to put up with this for so long. It is unfortunate that in the nature of the Canadian political system they may well have to choose once again between tweedledum and tweedledee, between trying to eat their soup with a knife or a fork, leaving the spoon untried.

One of the other things I would like to talk about is the whole question of the transportation policy in the country. It is something that I do not get to talk about as much as I used to being the external affairs critic for my party. Transportation policy in the country is very important and very important to people in my riding. I can think of a number of different things that are of concern, but perhaps I will start with the one which has had the highest profile since the last election. That of course is the cuts to VIA Rail. It seems to me that the cuts to VIA Rail sum up and are a rather depressing symbol of everything that is wrong with the policy of the government.

There is a train which since the 1920s, and perhaps even before that, has served many people in my riding. They are the cottagers who have cottages along the CNR mainline in places like Ophir, Winnitoba, Rice Lake, Malachi and Ottermere. For years people have been going down to their cottages on the train. There was a special train called the "Camper Special" which went down on Friday night and came back on Sunday night. In the early 1980s, as a result of negotiations between VIA and the campers, this service was blended into the Winnipeg to Capreol service. The train was scheduled in such a way that it could meet the needs of the cottagers.

When the former transport minister, the hon. member for Roberval, ordered VIA to come up with a plan to implement cuts, he ordered them to preserve service on nine remote routes. One of those routes was the Winnipeg to Capreol route. Eight out of the nine routes were indeed preserved, but the ninth, the Winnipeg to Capreol route, was subsumed or absorbed into the transcontinental service which was to run from Vancouver to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg east over the CN mainline, which is where the Winnipeg to Capreol service used to be.

That train now leaves on Saturday night at 8:15 and comes back on Monday morning at 7. That is bad enough, but the fact is that VIA has indicated it has no intention of adding any equipment to that train to service the needs of the cottagers. For instance, take the long weekend in May. On any long weekend in May for the last 60 years that train has probably taken anywhere between 500 and 700 people down to the lake. Do you know how many coach seats there are on that train for the long weekend in May, Mr. Speaker? Fifty-six seats. Maybe that is all they will need because who is going to want to go down on Saturday night of the long weekend and come back on Monday morning of the long weekend?

• (1810)

That is not preserving service to that remote area. Many of these areas have no roads. How are they supposed to get to their cottage? That is the situation that people find themselves in because of the policy of this government. What are we going to have to do eventually, unless the government comes to its senses? All these hundreds of people who formerly took a train to their cottage in two hours will now travel on the Trans-Canada Highway between Winnipeg and Kenora.

Then we are going to have to cut new roads through the bush, in some cases through wilderness areas. We are going to put more hydrocarbons into the air and clog up the Trans-Canada Highway which is already clogged with trucks, thanks to the deregulation policies of this government which has taken freight off the railway tracks and put it on the highways.

Next we are going to cut roads through bush that up until now has been undisturbed. On the roads that do exist, some of them into adjoining lakes, people will need to have pick-up trucks or four by fours in order to have half a chance of ever getting out again, once they get in. Other people will have to go seven and a half miles across water to get to their cottage.

All this is in the name of a phoney way of keeping the books, because all this is bookkeeping. All this is policy set on keeping one set of books, the VIA set of books with respect to that particular service and not figuring into the larger bookkeeping the cost of more hydrocarbons going into the atmosphere, the safety matter of having more people on the highways, and the environmental factor of having to cut roads through areas that up until now have been left alone, not to mention the enormous inconvenience to families and communities which had a right to expect that this service which has been provided since the very beginning, if you like, would continue pursuant to the orders of the Minister of Transport himself who said that service to remote communities should be preserved.

I have spoken to the former Minister of Transport and the current Minister of Transport. I have not given up that we may yet find some solution to this problem. I think that part of the reason why, so far, some of the people are not as upset as they will be, come the long weekend in May, is because they cannot believe that anybody would do this. They think: "You've got to be kidding that I won't be able to get to my cottage". They cannot believe that they will not be able to get to their cottages that, in some cases, has been there for three or four generations.

Mr. Thacker: The taxpayers should pay for people to get to their cottages?

Mr. Blaikie: The taxpayers pay through the nose for other people to get to their cottages on highways. The taxpayers are paying through the nose to fund the deregulation policy of this government for trucking companies. We know that part of the transportation policy of this government is to freeze out the railways. It is only the railways that have to pay for their own track bed.

Mr. Thacker: The NDP subsidize people to take holidays.

Mr. Kristiansen: You destroyed the cost of their land, you pay for it.

Mr. Blaikie: I hear the hon. member for Lethbridge being his usual ignorant self saying that our policy is to subsidize people for taking holidays. I hope the people from Winnipeg are listening, and I hope the people who have used the railways over the years are listening because that is part of the problem. The hon. member does not mind subsidizing all kinds of other people to take holidays in the Caribbean so they can fix up their tax holidays that they are arranging while they are down there. He does not mind that. That is just good capitalism. But for a retired railroader to be able to make it down to his cabin, that is a subsidy. That is something we have to do away with. That is part of the problem.

• (1815)

This government is committed to subsidies, subsidies of the rich and the rest of the country has to pay for the kinds of subsidies they have been arranging, like the $500,000 capital gains tax exemption. If that is not a subsidy, I do not know what the hell is.

I am running out of time. I had hoped to talk about health care. I had hoped to talk about UIC. I even hoped to talk about foreign policy. But I have this feeling that I will not because I got talking about transportation.

While I am at it, Mr. Speaker, I would not mind passing on to you and hopefully to the Ministry of Transport and the National Transportation Agency what I have been picking up from people in my riding who work on the railway, and that is as a result of the policy of deregulation we see a decrease in maintenance. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, sometime when you are in your riding, now that the weather is improving, to sit by the level crossing with your window down and listen to the flat wheels going by. The railway has a policy of not "bad ordering" wheels the way they used to. One of the reasons they do not is because they do not have as many carmen inspecting the wheels as they used to. These trains are going bang, bang, bang, bang all the way down.

People who know anything about railways know that this is happening because all you have to do is listen if you have a trained ear. That is what is happening. I have people who work on the railway, and others who are writing to me about this. They know that maintenance is being neglected as a result of deregulation.

They know that at Symington Yard at the Hump, where they hump cars and send them down different tracks and marshall different trains that they have taken out what are called the manual car retards, the way that guys used to be able to judge cars: their weight, what kind of car they were, the right speed, et cetera, and respond accordingly. They have taken those out. Now they do everything by computer. If you stand by the hump you can hear these cars, some of them with hazardous commodities in them, going bang, bang, bang. There are people I know in the railway who live near there who are moving out. They know it is only a matter of time before something happens, thanks to the great computer that is supposed to look after everything, as in so many other instances in society where we are removing people and replacing them with these little terminals that are supposed to do everything. Black boxes on the ends of trains. Every time I see a train go by and there is no caboose, I realize just how little we have succeeded in trying to resist the agenda of this government.

It goes on and on. In Ontario, the government is talking about double and triple trailers on trucks. Pretty soon you will not want to go on the highway unless you are in a tank for fear of colliding with one of these things. The rail beds will be increasingly empty. The next step, once the Tories get their way, once they get the successor to the Crow payment paid not to the railways but to the producers, we will be trucking grain all over the place. There will hardly be anything to put on the railway. The highways will be even more clogged, in this case with trucks hauling grain to bigger and bigger terminals owned by Cargill and other multinational agri-business people who are trying to arrange the world economy to their own benefit and to hell with communities, to hell with workers and to hell with everything that the Conservatives used to say they were for: small town Canada, rural values, all that sort of thing where people are not subject to urban rot. These are the people who are destroying rural Canada, their post offices, branch-lines, elevators, you name it, all in the name of global competitiveness. It is disgraceful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have three minutes left in his debate plus ten minutes questions and comments, if he wishes to carry on tomorrow.

It being 6.20 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government, and pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed to be referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, the 1989 annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Statements by Ministers.

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I understand that today the Minister of the Environment is making a very important statement on behalf of the government. I wonder if the government House leader could explain why the Minister of the Environment is not in the House of Commons, in the nation's capital, making that ministerial statement, as opposed to elsewhere.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am sorry I do not have the data right here with me, but I think the hon. member will find that this government has used the House of Commons and the Statements by Ministers provisions, on orders of magnitude, more frequently than previous governments.

Indeed, I share with the hon. member the desire that this House be used more for those purposes and I encourage colleagues to do so. In fact, we do that more so by government. I would say that that, plus other changes in respect of business, in the conduct of Question Period and so on, would go a long way toward restoring the reputation of this House as the true highest court in the land.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the government that we believe it is entirely unacceptable that a document as important as this is being released this morning, at eleven o'clock, at the Bonaventure Hotel in Montreal. The House is in session. This is an important document about environmental issues. It is a long-awaited policy that had been promised by the government. I fail to see why the government treats this House with so little consideration—

Mr. Boudria: With disdain.

Mr. Gauthier: —and even with disdain, says my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, by refusing to come here, before the members of this House, to share with us the government's environmental objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I am also amazed that the briefing notes and the minister's comments were given to others before being made available to Official Opposition critics. I think that is totally unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. The government is not playing fair, and we will not play fair with the government if it keeps playing these silly games. Ministers should realize that Official Opposition critics have the same right as friends of the Conservative Party to be advised of the government's major decisions on matters of national policy, especially concerning the environment. We are absolutely shocked at the arrogance shown by this government in the way it treats the Official Opposition. I think it is high time they realized that if they want consultation, if they want a House of Commons that runs smoothly, they will have to share a little with us and do so more often, and the fact that they failed to do so today in the case of a document as important as this one, on the environment, a policy that has been at least 18 months in the making and which was announced by the previous minister and the present minister—Mr. Speaker, I think that is intolerable!

• (1110)

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, first, I want to take the opportunity to acknowledge what the government House leader has indicated, that in the last number of months, indeed year, we have had an opportunity to have statements on important issues presented first in the House of Commons by ministers more often than we have seen in the past.

I want to say that we have appreciated that, and we have also appreciated the courtesy that the ministers have offered the opposition spokespersons in the area of interest, in giving advance copies of the statements so there could be an informed reaction by both opposition parties. I want to say that we have appreciated that process, and that is why, I must admit, I was rather astonished this morning, knowing that this was going to be the day when perhaps the most important ministerial statement of this government is to be made.

Having not seen a written copy of this statement or, of course, not heard the statement yet, I am assuming that this is going to be the government's opportunity to actually address the critical environmental issues facing the country.

I must admit, as my hon. colleague has indicated, that we expected that to be done in the House of Commons. Again, I am simply asking, in a very serious way to my hon. friend, the government House leader, why the minister is not here in the House of Commons making such an important statement on the environment. I understand it is going to be done in Montreal. There may be a very good reason. I am simply asking what that reason was.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party understands, in a general sense, what the reason is.

I agree with him, and I wish this place was in fact much more the focus of the national agenda than it has been. We have done a lot in the last few years to make it more so. I am sure the hon. member will understand also that because of what may be inevitable partisanship, the circus and the performances for television and so on, there is a significant disincentive to somebody who wants to get an important message out to the country.

Mr. Boudria: So, if we would be kinder to the government maybe it would make more statements.

Mr. Andre: There is the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell again, that great contributor to decorum in this place, the founding member of the rat pack, lecturing about how this House of Commons should be orchestrated.

The reality is that it is the rat packs of the world that detract from this place, but I welcome—I say this genuinely—that my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, feels strongly about this place and would like to see it restored to an institution where people deal with each other with respect and where the national agenda is set. In fact, if we can engage in discussions between House leaders in this regard, seek amendments to procedures, rules and so on to achieve that, I would be more than willing to participate in that activity.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to unduly delay the procedures of the House. That is not what the objective is here this morning.

Obviously, the House is concerned, members are concerned that an important issue like this has not been brought to the attention of the House. My colleagues have raised that.

However, there is a further point that I want to make to the Speaker, quite apart from the suggestions of the minister only moments ago that perhaps if members did not criticize the government so ardently, it would be more tempted to provide information to the House. I find that unacceptable.

Beyond that, there is the further point. Not only is the statement not made in the House, it has been made a far enough distance from the House that if one wished to go there and see the press conference, members would not be able to return to Ottawa in time for Question Period.

For instance, if a member was in Montreal listening to this press conference now, it would be most unlikely that after the conclusion of the press conference, the member in question could actually come back to Ottawa in time for Question Period in order to question the government.

There are three issues: first, that it has not been tabled in the House; second, that the government has now indicated to us that the determination of the opposition toward questioning the government is a contributing factor; and finally that the government has made this decision far enough away from the Hill in order to prevent members from being here to ask questions today on the issue, either deliberately or otherwise. I am not suggesting that it is necessarily deliberately, but nevertheless the distance factor is there, and it does prevent the House from being able to be apprised of this issue, and for the issue to be questioned by hon. members today.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one or two points in response to some of the information that has been provided to the House.

First, it is my understanding that copies of the document are to be delivered to members of Parliament offices this morning at a time coinciding with its release in Montreal.

Second, I do know that at least one member of the Official Opposition who has had a long and distinguished association with environmental issues did receive a copy of the document from the minister I think during the course of Question Period yesterday. At least that is my understanding. Whether more were distributed in advance or not I do not know, but I hand delivered to the minister a copy of the document which was destined to go to the hon. member for Davenport. Perhaps the Official Opposition House leader is not aware of that but I believe that was done.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, what happened is that at three o'clock I asked our critic, the member for Ottawa West, if she had been apprised of that and she said no. I told her that she had better call the minister's office. What happened after that I do not know. If a copy was given to a member of this caucus I would like to know who, as it was not given to the member who is speaking for us at this time on environmental matters.

Mr. Speaker: This is an exchange which is of course interesting to the House. However, I think the matter has to be settled in consultation with both sides of the House and it is not a matter that I can rule on.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF DELEGATE TO CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34 I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the thirteenth report from the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF DELEGATE TO CANADA–U.S. INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1) I have the honour to present to the House in both official languages the report of the official parliamentary delegation of the Canadian section of the Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary group which attended the thirty-first annual meeting of the Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary group at Kiawah Island, South Carolina, February 22–26, 1990.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present copies in both official languages of the second report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs on behalf of members of the committee. The title is "Unfinished Business, An Agenda for all Canadians in the 1990s".

Routine Proceedings

STRIKING COMMITTEE

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of the House the composition of the striking committee of the House of Commons be amended by substituting the name of Mr. Iain Angus for that of Mr. Rod Murphy.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from the great city of Kamloops, British Columbia. The total must be over 19,000 who are asking the government to come to its senses on the goods and services tax and back off from imposing such an unfair, cruel, punitive tax on the people of Canada.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition on another matter. This is a rather sad petition because it was asking the members of the House of Commons to support the comprehensive bill of rights for children. As we know, sadly earlier this week the Conservative members voted against the comprehensive bill of rights for children. Unfortunately this petition is coming in a little late. However, I present it for what it is worth.

• (1120)

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present to the House seven petitions with a total number of signatures of 8,303. The petitioners pray that the House will take action to prevent the heinous and cruel act of abortion.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition duly certified under Standing Order 36 from such diverse communities on Vancouver Island as Nanoose Bay, Port Alberni, Campbell River, Victoria, British Columbia. Those citizens are calling on this House of Commons to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of citizens of the great city of Windsor so ably represented by the hon. Leader of the Opposition in this House. These people call upon Parliament to reject the government's GST which used to stand for the goods and services tax but has since been renamed the grief and suffering tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have one petition to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 that discusses the cuts in VIA Rail. The petitioners petition Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network and ask Parliament to upgrade the VIA Rail with new equipment.

They are further asking for a passenger train act giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and that Parliament revise costing arrangements with the rail companies.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition from a number of people in British Columbia. I add this to the thousands of names on petitions I have already presented to the House against the present proposed goods and services tax.

These people are asking that Parliament reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax and reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present two petitions this morning, one concerning the goods and services tax and duly authorized under Standing Order 36. The people point out that the GST is extremely unfair. The whole idea of equality has been removed from the taxation system. They plead with the government and the Parliament of Canada to turn it down.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my second petition concerns VIA Rail, pointing out that the transportation system in Canada demands that we have a decent passenger service on the railroad. They ask that Parliament support the maintenance of VIA and the improvement of it as well.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Lebel-sur-Quevillon, in Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Lebel-sur-Quevillon is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient with regard to the purpose of the Northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive do develop northern resources.

[English]

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr.Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of constituents of mine in the constituency of Oxford.

The petitions have been signed by some 165 citizens who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to establish a law which protects the unborn from conception to natural death.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions to the House today. The first refers to the goods and services tax, the grief and suffering tax being pursued by the government. It is a petition signed by residents of the central interior of British Columbia who call on the government to withdraw the tax proposal and ensure that we get a good and fair tax system.

I know they join with me in certainly urging the government of British Columbia to come clean on its participation with the Conservatives in implementing this most unfair tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, this petition relates to VIA Rail, which is back in the news today because of rumours of further cuts by this government.

This petition is particularly relevant because it really gets to the core of the problem. When VIA Rail was created by the Liberals they gave it some unmanageable tasks. It calls for legislation to be implemented to give VIA Rail a mandate so that it can continue to survive and operate on a rational basis.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to present this petition on behalf of many Canadians who oppose the goods and services tax. The petitioners feel that this tax will cause higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. They call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged today to present a petition from Canadian farmers who are experiencing increased costs in operation, reduced profit and low commodity prices. They are asking the government to reinstate the fuel tax rebate programs, the advance crop payments, fair and equal market access for Canadian agricultural commodities and to introduce agricultural policies that will encourage agricultural development in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to inform the House that I got a copy of The Green Plan—A National Challenge, but I had to go to the Press Gallery to get it. Distribution does not have it here in the House. I wonder if we could make sure that Distribution has copies of this document and we do not have to go to the media to get a copy.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I understand that has been taken care of.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-65

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That in relation to Bill C-65, an Act to provide Borrowing Authority, not more than one additional day shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage and, that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on such day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order, and in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of the second reading stage shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to raise a matter as to whether or not this particular initiative has been dealt with appropriately.

First of all, I want to say I appreciate that the government House leader has been recently appointed and this is in no way criticizing what he has done this morning. He has the right to do that, I believe.

Mr. Speaker, I want to refer you to Standing Order 78(3):

A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Sections (1) or (2) of this Standing Order in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration either in the House or in any other committee—

• (1130)

What this refers to in my judgment is that negotiations would take place between the parties and from those negotiations there would be an understanding that no agreement could be reached in terms of the amount of time left to require the completion of debate, recognizing the participation of all three political parties.

I recall a conversation taking place with the House Leader's parliamentary secretary who asked whether or not we could conclude this debate today. I think that was the nature of the discussion. I said that I was not certain, that we had some speakers who wanted to participate in the borrowing authority debate but I could not rightfully say whether or not we could conclude it today.

I must say that I was not under the impression that an agreement could not be reached either. I was not under the impression that we were not actually carrying on serious negotiations to see if we could not agree on an appropriate time for debate.

I simply raise this matter, Mr. Speaker, because I have a feeling that this is going to go on for some time in respect of future pieces of legislation. I simply want to ensure that before the government acts to close off debate using one Standing Order or another, that in fact the parties do sit down and attempt to negotiate an appropriate time for debate.

On this occasion I do not believe that process was completed. I think it was probably initiated, but I do not think it was completed. I do not recall any negotiations.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am at a bit of a disadvantage in this discussion in that the hon. member alluded to the fact that my parliamentary secretary, the member for Peace River, who is not here now, did in fact talk to him and the House Leader of the Liberal party, as I understand it, and then informed me that we could not get agreement.

The other parts of the conversation occurred in our weekly House Leaders' meeting which in fact are confidential. I would hate the record to show that somehow I am trying to pull a fast one and that I did not have the sense of it.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this motion was introduced under Standing Order 78(3) which, as the hon. member acknowledged in his opening remarks, is quite legal and proper for a minister to do. But if he would like to co-operate with me and move the motion under the provisions of Standing Order 78(2), something which is allowed when two political parties agree, and if he is saying that he is prepared to see some reasonable time and we could agree on that, then I am quite prepared to ask for this motion to be withdrawn and replaced by a motion to which we both agree, provided of course it can be done within the reasonable amount of time that we talked about.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: If you want to co-operate and use Standing Order 78(2), then I am quite prepared to do that. In view of our conversations it did not seem to me that that was a possibility. That is the feedback I got, as well as what my parliamentary secretary, the member for Peace River, got.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a complaint. At the same time, he has indicated that at least in his mind there was a possibility of obtaining a workable understanding. The hon. minister has said that in his view that was not possible.

I have had to deal with this matter before, as hon. members know. I refer all hon. members to a ruling made on August 16, 1988, as reported on page 18380 of Hansard. In the very last paragraph I had to say this:

> Standing Order 117—

Which is now Standing Order 73:

> —provides for a Minister to act if there is no agreement and as I stated on June 6, 1988, the Chair must take a Minister's declaration at face value and cannot judge the quality of negotiations or of any proposals that may have been made.

I think that is the position that the Chair has to take.

However, I certainly can encourage hon. members, if there is still a possibility to enter into an arrangement, as the minister has suggested might be possible, then perhaps hon. members and the minister would like to discuss the matter further.

In the meantime I must accept the minister's motion as being in order.

[Translation]

TIME ALLOCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is always possible to be reasonable, and I looked up the word "reasonable", which the minister is constantly using, in the dictionary. I would like to read the definition to the House. Reasonable, is according to Le Petit Robert, means "endowed with reason". It says here: "intelligent, thinking".

Well, Mr. Speaker, we accept the minister's proposal. We are prepared to negotiate intelligently, reasonably. If he wants to move for time allocation, perhaps he should put his motion on the Table, and we could perhaps consult further on the matter of agreeing on a timeframe for the consideration of this very important bill which will commit $25 billion in Canadian taxpayers' money. I am open to the minister's suggestion that we meet and discuss Standing Order 78(2), if he is still willing.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that definition from the dictionary sounded like a personality description of yours truly.

I appreciate the hon. member's comments. I look forward to having those kinds of discussions on subsequent important legislation.

However, having gone through this exercise and having given adequately, as the Speaker mentioned, indications of previous negotiations, and in view of the fact that at some time the House must reach a decision, I would suggest that the most expeditious way to proceed is to proceed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I regret that comment by my friend, the Government House Leader. I hope that that expeditious process will not always be the governing process of the day. After all, a democracy does take time. A democracy can be somewhat inconvenient for a government.

As my hon. friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, indicated, we are not talking about a minor tax adjustment. We are talking about the borrowing of $25.5 billion. With interest rates likely going up this afternoon, that will add considerably to the deficit of Canada.

The offer was there by both opposition parties to attempt to negotiate a reasoned time to debate this incredible borrowing authority—probably the largest in Canadian history—but if the Government House Leader refuses that offer as you say, Mr. Speaker, then there is nothing much you can do about it.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I have just one comment to make.

I find this debate quite incredible. It appeared to me that the minister clearly stated in the House less than 10 minutes ago that he would negotiate this item. Yet when the offer was made by the Liberal party and by the NDP to do exactly what the minister requested, he said: "No, I won't". I find it quite incredible that five minutes after he has made an offer he could reject the fact that he made an offer.

Mr. Whittaker: That's the Tory way.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I invite the new member to read Standing Order 78(1) and he will see that there is a provision that at any time we can agree to time allocation, if all the parties agree.

Mr. Pickard: My reference is not to Standing Order 78. My reference is to your statement.

Mr. Andre: If the hon. member would just keep his mouth shut for half a minute and let me explain, he will learn something.

Mr. Boudria: Harvie, you have a lot to learn too.

Mr. Speaker: Each day we all learn something. The hon. House Leader has the floor. I would ask hon. members to give him the courtesy of hearing him.

Mr. Andre: There is also Standing Order 78(2) which states that if the majority of the parties—in other words if two of the parties—agree then the same motion could be read.

The motion would be the same. It could be done by agreement of all three parties, agreement by two parties, or by the government alone. The outcome would be the same.

• (1140)

What I said 10 minutes ago was that if in fact they wanted to participate with me, that is a welcome change from what I had been led to believe was the situation yesterday. I would welcome it. All they need to do is to stand up and say that they agree with the motion and what I have suggested could be done would be done.

Mr. Speaker: I think that any further discussions had better take place elsewhere.

I am, of course, moved mightily by the contribution from my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I would suggest that he circulate his definition of raisonnable to all hon. members. It would be at times very helpful to me.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by commenting on the necessity of the House of Commons to pass Bill C–65 in its entirety, consisting of three clauses the major thrust of which is to authorize the borrowing of $25.5 billion.

Mr. Boudria: Too much. You have wasted the money we gave you last time.

Mr. Crosby: The hon. member says: "Too much". I suppose he is going to argue in his presentation, when his time comes, that it should be a lesser amount. The amount arises from a calculation. The calculations are beyond dispute. There is no question about the amount. There is no question about the need and the necessity for the bill. The Financial Administration Act requires parliamentary approval of long–term borrowings. This is an annual event. If my memory serves me correctly, it has happened in some years more than once.

It is no surprise to the House of Commons that the government is presenting a borrowing bill. All administrations in the past decade or more have done the same thing, so why would the opposition be so surprised and find such need to protest this action?

Of course, members of the opposition have every right to record their concern about the massive borrowing and the massive debt of the country, but do they co–operate with the Government of Canada in a program to reduce that debt and to reduce government expenditures? No. Every day in the House they stand up objecting to this. They talk about the cuts, the clawbacks, the terrible actions taken by the government, and then when the swallows come home to roost—or whoever comes home to roost—they complain.

The ultimate result of all their demands is a $25.5 billion borrowing. That does not bother members of the opposition. They object to that as well. They want to spend money. They want to spend more money than the government takes in in revenue. They do not want to increase the revenue. They do not want to borrow to support the difference. All we get is negative comment that adds up to empty rhetoric that cannot possibly convince the people of Canada that anybody on the opposite side is fit to govern this nation.

Let me talk for a minute about the national debt which is the raison d'être for the action being taken in the House of Commons today. When the government of the right hon. Prime Minister took office in September, 1984, the national debt was $160 billion.

Mr. Gauthier: What is it today?

Mr. Crosby: I want to explain that. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier asks what it is today. That is very easy to explain. The debt was $160 billion in September, 1984. Equally important was the fact that there was a projected deficit by the Liberal administration for that fiscal year of another $38.5 billion, totalling approximately $200 billion. That was the legacy of the Liberal government of the previous two decades. That was the legacy it left the new Progressive Conservative government—a debt of $200 billion.

I want to say to my friend, John McLeod, who writes for The Daily News of Halifax who said our claim that the national debt is $200 billion is a false claim that he did not know enough to add the projected deficit for the 1983–84 fiscal year to the accumulated debt to come up with the figure of $200 billion. It is very simple.

Members opposite say the same thing all the time. They say: "Oh, yes, you had a $200 billion debt, but why didn't you reduce it?" We did not reduce it because we did not want to destroy the social programs of Canada. We felt an obligation to the people of Canada to continue social programs and the kind of spending that aids and assists the economy. We could not stop in our tracks. We were very reasonable about that.

Over the last five or six years we have made a monumental contribution to the reduction of government expenditures. We are on our way to reducing the national debt. By 1995, we will actually start to repay the national debt, something that a Liberal government would not even think of doing.

Let me tell you the facts and figures on that, Mr. Speaker. When the government of the right hon. Prime Minister took office, the projected expenditures of the Government of Canada on program expenses was $16 billion in deficit. That is to say, the revenues of Canada were $16 billion less than the projected expenditures for that fiscal year.

Four years later the government has provided for a surplus in terms of program expenditures of $9 billion. That is to say, our government will collect $9 billion more than will be spent on program expenditures. That represents a turnaround in that five-year period of $25 billion.

I would like members of the House to reflect just for a moment on what would have happened if that turnaround had not taken place by virtue of the program expenditure reductions of this government. If that initiative had not been taken and we had in addition to the current projected deficit for this fiscal year $30 billion, then we would have had an extra $25 billion to add to that deficit. We would have had a deficit of $55 billion had our government not taken the action in expenditure reduction that has been taken over the last five years.

What would happen to this country with a deficit of $55 billion? We would have the situation that exists in Brazil, Argentina and many countries around the globe where people get their pay in the morning and have to spend it that afternoon, otherwise it might be worthless that evening. There would be an inflation rate going into triple digits, not double digits as the Liberal government brought us.

These initiatives by our government are paying off and are resulting in a buoyant economy. There has been seven years of continued increase in the Gross National Product. There has been seven years of reduced unemployment. I believe, and I am from Atlantic Canada, that that is the statistic that really tells the tale.

We have come down in the last five years from double digit unemployment of nearly 12 per cent to an unemployment figure in 1989 of 7.5 per cent. This is something that was unheard of in the days of the budgets of Marc Lalonde and Allan MacEachen and the Liberal over spending which did not even result in effective, economic benefits in terms of employment. While the Liberal government was over spending and creating this massive debt, unemployment rose to 12 per cent in Canada. Inflation was in double digits. Every economic indicator in Canada pointed to a problem in Canada which we have set about to resolve. We have resolved it by sensible economic measures and sensible financial policy—a common sense program.

What do members of the opposition do? They obstruct every effort at improvement. Earlier today you, Mr. Speaker, saw more delay in the House of Commons. I have a little argument with my good friend from the New Democratic Party from Thunder Bay—Atikokan. In this House on March 23, 1990, he made this comment:

> I would prefer if members of the Liberal party had not always caved in to work with the government to short circuit our delaying of the House, but so be it. That is their right.

If there was any doubt in the Speaker's mind about the necessity for bringing in time allocation and for limiting the debate on a bill, which is a common occurrence in this House, then surely that statement and other activities in this House support the absolute necessity for proceeding in this fashion.

We know that members of the opposition have no real concerns about the borrowing bill that has been presented in Bill C-65. We know members of the opposition do not intend to co-operate in some sensible way to have this measure pass so that the financial requirements can be met. Thus it is unfortunately necessary that the government has to resort to these measures to get on with the work of governing Canada and the work of ensuring financial stability for Canadians.

• (1150)

We are always told about reductions in social programs, the threat to social programs, but any sensible person knows that the real threat to social programs is a bankrupt national treasury. If you do not have the money in the national treasury you cannot support social programs. Anybody who demands the expenditure of more and more funds on more and more programs and loses the ability to pay for those programs is destroying our social network, not aiding and assisting that network.

I urge that all members act quickly to pass this bill to ensure that the Government of Canada has the financial ability as required by the Financial Administration Act to carry on the work of restoring economic stability to this country.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the debate before us flows from Standing Order 78(3). It flows from a government that does not want to have a debate on a subject matter. Therefore it cuts off debate, gags the House of Commons and imposes a limit on debate.

I want to remind Canadians who are listening here that this Bill C-65 proposes to borrow some $25 billion. We have had less than four hours of debate on the bill. Yet the government comes in and imposes time allocation on a democratic process needed to explain to Canadians what the government is going to do with that money. It will not tell Canadians what it wants to do with that money. It will not tell Canadians what the truth of the matter is, or how incompetent it is.

The truth is that this government in the last five years, in increasing economic good times, has failed to come to grips with the deficit that was just mentioned by my colleague from Halifax. Indeed, this government has doubled the deficit from what it was in 1984. It has done that even though we have had five years of international prosperity. This government has failed even to address the annual deficit, let alone the cumulative deficit of this country. It has been totally bankrupt, absolutely incapable, absolutely incompetent.

I want to tell the minister responsible for this difficult situation we are in today that the Tories' time is running out. Yet we have to accept that the majority of this House, being Tory, will have it their way. I hope Canadians will smarten up next time and not give this bunch of bandits the chance to run down debate in the House of Commons, thereby not allowing MPs of the Official Opposition and of the NDP to make comments, to ask questions, to comment positively as we usually do on the proposals put forward by the government.

I asked the minister a few minutes ago to be reasonable. I defined the word reasonable using a good dictionary, saying that it is usually used by people who are intelligent, who are willing to think a bit. Do I take it that since this minister is not reasonable that he is not intelligent and he cannot think? I am not saying that because that would be demeaning the individual. I am saying that his politics are not intelligent. I am saying to him that his methods of using a jackhammer when he could be using a smaller tool would be much more in keeping with democratic processes.

I want to address the process. Usually House Leaders, and I happen to be the one for the Liberal caucus, meet regularly with the government side to discuss the agenda of the House, to discuss House business. It usually happens on Tuesday. The minister will give us the government's plan for the coming week.

Today, this afternoon, I will ask him after Question Period what his plans are for the coming week. He will give them to us. These plans are arrived at, we hope, following consultation with all interested parties, that is, the Official Opposition and the third party.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is the thirty-fifth time in less than five years that the government has either used closure—the gagging of the House—or time allocation. Thirty-five times the government has used one of these to ram through legislation because it would not listen to debate. It would not listen to reason. It was not being very intelligent. Yet the government wonders why, today, it is at 17 per cent in the polls. I will tell the government why. It is because Canadians are saying: "We don't want you guys over there any more. You are a bunch of incompetents. You hide from us. You are secretive. You do not tell us what is going on. Yet you ram legislation through with your majority".

I ask the member from Mississauga to sit down and listen to this. I am telling him that someday he will regret being associated with that bunch of people he calls his friends in the Tory party. He is a nice fellow, and I have nothing against him. It is the gang he hangs around with that I cannot stand. They have absolutely no understanding of what the process is all about or what democracy is all about.

I say the same thing to the member for Halifax West. I like the guy. He is a nice fellow, but he too hangs around with the wrong gang. He will have to account to the taxpayers come the next election. He will be very sorry to hear them say: "We don't want you any more, Howard". That is going to be the message they are going to have to give this fellow.

Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? Because they have been absolutely incompetent in coming to grips with the problems of this country. They have been unable to work with the House of Commons. Even though the government has a massive majority, it has been unable to come to us in a reasonable fashion to put reasonable things before the House. They have been unable to do as reasonable people do, that is, debate. Normally, after a reasonable debate, the question is put.

I am a very reasonable man, and even the minister will admit that. I want to negotiate time allocation if we have to, but within another a specific order. If he needs to have certain legislation, we have always said that we would co-operate.

The hon. member from Halifax West mentioned co-operate in his comments. He said that we did not co-operate.

[Translation]

In French, to co-operate means to operate with someone. Mr. Speaker, that is what we want to do with the government. We want to try and help them out of the present morass. We want to help these poor Tory members regain some of the pride they had in belonging to a big party that is now sadly crumbling. With 17 per cent of support in the polls, Mr. Speaker, this means not one of them would be re-elected if an election were held tomorrow. That is the truth, Mr. Speaker. And there they are, wielding a big stick, imposing closure and time allocation and telling members: we don't want to listen to sensible arguments, we don't want to listen to a democratic debate. We only want to end the debate, gag the House of Commons and impose our ideas, our ideology.

Mr. Speaker, about the mushrooming deficit referred to by the hon. member for Halifax, the Minister of Finance, when he was elected, announced a five-year plan that would reduce taxes by half by at the end of that period. Well, Mr. Speaker, he failed to keep that promise as well. Today, the federal deficit has doubled. In 1984 it was $170 billion, and today it is $351 billion. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the Tory caucus and all the Tory ministers, they started their fight against the deficit in 1984, at a time when we were in good shape and the international economy was in good shape, but the government failed to reduce the deficit in five years. The deficit is certainly not less than it was in 1984. And I ask you why, since they taxed Canadians 31 times, in the form of 31 additional taxes in five years, why none of this was able to absorb the national debt? Why? Because they are incompetent and entirely incapable of running this country, and it is high time we got rid of them, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say that there are dark, evil and sinister forces at work in the House at this moment.

I look across the aisle and I see Conservative members as individuals. They are very decent people. But something happens when they get together. They start thinking in terms of totalitarianism or dictatorial initiatives; and they do not like to hear dissent. They do not like to hear people saying that they are doing the wrong thing.

Let us understand what is happening at this moment. The government decided, because it has mismanaged the economy so badly, that it had to bring in a special bill, Bill C-65, to ask permission to borrow vast sums of money. It is not hundreds of millions, or a billion dollars, but billions and billions of dollars, $25.5 billion. Can you imagine what the interest on $25.5 billion is going to cost the taxpayers of this country because of the mismanagement of the government?

The bankers love the Tories because they know that they are going to rack up the biggest debts and deficits ever seen or imagined in this country. The bankers say: "We thought the Liberals were bad, but my goodness the Tories doubled their debts".

Let us look back at what this government has done. It introduced this bill and then said: "Listen, we have to pull a quickie here because if the people of Canada realize what we are doing, they are going to get awfully upset, so we are not going to allow any debate on this bill". Can you imagine not allowing any debate on a bill that requests the borrowing authority for $25.5 billion? That is what the government says. "We do not want to hear any opposition. We do not want to hear any criticisms of what we are doing or this incredible debt load we are about to impose on the young people of this country". So it brought in a form of closure which is a totalitarian tactic that this government now has introduced time and time again because it does not like opposition members telling the truth.

The government does not like people telling the truth. The other day there was a poor priest out in front of the Parliament Buildings. I might disagree with the cause that he represents but he has the right to stand in front of his Parliament Buildings with a small plaque outlying the cause of his concern. He has a right to do that because this Parliament does not belong to the Conservative party. This is not the Conservative government's Parliament. This is the people of Canada's Parliament.

The priest was quietly standing there day after day as his way of protesting what he thought the government was doing and to suggest to members what he thought that they should do. What does the government do? It passes a law in secret and then brings in the police to drag this poor priest down to the jail, throw him behind bars and clank the doors closed, and he sits there for days and days in shackles, my hon. friend from Edmonton tells me. All this person did was stand in front of his Parliament, quietly, day after day. He was released from jail and now he is going to be going to court. Presumably he will be found guilty. I do not want to presume that but I suppose if the law that the government brought in is enforced, which everybody now agrees is a totally silly, oppressive law that ought not to occur in a democratic country, he will be found guilty and have to pay a fine presumably, to say nothing of others who were also arrested.

Why does the government want to do business in secret? Why does it want to do business behind closed doors? Why does it not want people to know what it is doing? Why does it not want to allow opposition members to voice their concerns? No wonder people are cynical about the government. No wonder the people of Canada do not trust the government, because it does not allow the free expression of people's views in this country. It is a very totalitarian approach, just as the East Bloc countries are opening up their systems and stating that they welcome dissent, and welcome people grouping together to express their views and indicate alternatives. While the East Bloc countries are lifting off the shackles, here they are shackling priests and throwing them in jail for doing nothing more than simply standing in front of the precincts of Parliament.

There is something sinister about this process. We just cannot stand here and say that there is nothing we can do about this; this is something that is appropriate. It almost makes one gasp when looking at the record.

Back in 1979 the government decided to use some form of closure twice. In 1980, when there seemed to be an impasse, the government decided to use closure once to get their legislation through. Goodness knows, at the end of the day, after considerable debate, the government has the right to pass legislation, but only after reasonable debate.

In 1981 there was one effort to muzzle off the Parliament of Canada. In 1984, it was used twice. Then the Conservatives were elected and time after time closure was used. In the report I received from the Library just a few minutes ago on statistics respecting House business, we find that in the last 11 months, time allocation or closure was used a total of 15 times.

This is a government that does not like freedom of expression. This is a government that does not like freedom of speech. This is a government that does not recognize the traditions, practices and customs of Parliament. It does not recognize that there is an opposition. We have an obligation to Her Majesty to oppose and critique government legislation. That is our job. We are paid to do that, and the government will not let us do that.

Look at the times the government has closed off debate in the House of Commons, the last place where the elected representatives of the people of Canada can express their views. This is the way it has been done for decades, in excess of 100 years. This is the way it has been done in the Mother of Parliaments for hundreds of years. Yet this is the only government in Canadian history that has used closure and closure and closure, time after time and it is accelerating.

If the people of Canada really knew what was going on, they would probably be revolting. They would find what is going on revolting, and they in turn would revolt. The government is going to borrow, on their behalf, $25 billion. What is worse is that this afternoon the interest rates are probably going to go up, which means billions of dollars in additional interest rate payments will be paid by our children as a result of this government initiative, and after only a handful of hours of debate on one of the largest borrowing authorities in Canadian history the government states that it is not going to tolerate any more debate. That is wrong. It is undemocratic. There is no place in a parliamentary institution, after that length of time, for the government to muzzle debate. Had the debate on this borrowing authority for $25.5 billion gone on for a week or two I can see then the government stating that it is time to move this legislation to the next stage.

Is there a single Conservative member opposite, and I look at my hon. friend, the chairman of the cultural committee, who is prepared to stand up in this House and say: "I believe that after a handful of hours, one day debate, it is time for the government House leader to muzzle off the Parliament of Canada." I am waiting for them to make those comments, because those comments would have no place in a parliamentary democracy. They would have no place in a country that has prided itself on free speech. Yet, that is exactly what is going on.

In another hour and a half we are going to vote on this. I really hope that any member who rises in this House to support this muzzling of Parliament, this closing off debate at this stage of the largest borrowing authority in Canadian history and part of a process which we have never seen before in terms of being so anti-democratic, will think before they support this legislation.

Let's recognize that eventually the sides are going to switch in this House. Members opposite can be smug and say: "We are in government now and we can do anything we want." That is not the way the parliamentary system works. This is not a four year dictatorship that we have in this country. There is a role for the opposition parties. Unfortunately it has become a four year dictatorship, but the parliamentary system requires that legislation be debated. That is why we are here. It is our job to debate legislation. But to debate legislation, we must have time. We must have the opportunity to do that.

That is why I appeal to those members on the government side when the time comes to vote, please vote for freedom of speech. Vote for democracy and vote to uphold our traditions of Parliament that we dearly love.

• (1210)

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it certainly must be Thursday noon because of what I am hearing from my hon. colleagues from the New Democratic Party this morning in the debate on this borrowing authority which the government seeks. I find what I heard this morning absolutely unbelievable.

I seem to recall a few days ago sitting in the finance committee when the very party criticizing this government for restricting debate, filibustered real debate for 30 hours on the finance committee considering the proposed goods and services tax. They really filibustered and talked about every kind of nonsense, what Canadians were not at all thinking about, and now accuse us of restricting debate. When proper debating times were given and accorded the opposition party, they were the ones who filibustered.

They stand here today screaming about the authority to borrow this money, which goes into the financing the debt, and nobody denies that there is a tremendous debt, but also funding programs. These are the very programs that the New Democratic Party always says are too little, too late. For the last six years, every time a New Democrat stood up in the House of Commons, he or she said the government did not spend enough money on a program, whether it was agriculture or whatever. When the government spent a billion, they stood up and said it is too little, too late. They would have spent $2 billion.

The fact is that the money we are trying to borrow to run this country would never have been enough for members of the New Democratic Party. They would have had to borrow $50 billion because they speak out of both sides of their mouths. They are saying we should debate the amount we are borrowing and yet I have heard for six years that whatever we did, whatever program, we never spent enough money.

Where do they really stand on the issue of financing government projects? Do they want the government to spend more on these programs, in which case there has to be revenue, in which case there has to be borrowing authority. On the other hand, do they want to reduce these programs? I do not think any one member of the New Democratic Party could stand in the House today and persuade any Canadian to vote for them if they would reduce programs.

In fact, the very bill that we are debating is a money bill. It is a requirement of funds for programs to finance debt. Every one of them knows that prior to 1984 when the Liberals were in power, they supported the ridiculous spending programs of the Liberal party, knowing that some day Canadians would have to pay. That is exactly what is happening today. The biggest portion of our debt since 1984 is moneys to pay back former debt which is almost $100 billion or $120 billion. They do not want to stand and talk about it because even the New Democratic Party was responsible for that debt.

When we hear the hon. members from that party stand in their place and say the government gives too little, too late, there is not enough for agriculture, not enough for seniors, not enough for this and not enough for that, what they are saying to Canadians is that we should borrow more money. We should actually borrow billions more, as they were used to with their colleagues. That is what has happened and what has been suggested.

Even members of the Liberal party have stood up in their places since 1984 and said that the government has not provided enough money for programs for Canadians. That is the way of the past. There is going to be a fear as we approach the next election that that old group, the old team is going to revert back to the style of borrow, borrow, spend, spend. There will be no conscious effort to reduce the deficit as we are seeing the Minister of Finance do. They never talk that way. I recall vividly during the last campaign that the then leader of the Liberal party suggested that they were going to reduce the deficit. Yes, that was the plan. They had no way of achieving that, but that is what they had a plan for. I suppose if you were to really investigate the New Democratic's platform, somewhere hidden in small print for a specific audience, they would say: "We, too, would like to reduce the deficit." But first they would like to crank it way up to get everybody on side. This government was mean-spirited, this government did not give enough to the seniors, this government did not give enough for education.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holtmann: There they go! I've got them clapping already, Mr. Speaker, because they want more. But then they have not decided in fact how they are going to pay for more.

My colleague in the Liberal party is starting to laugh because he sees the folly of the thinking over there. Yes, Felix, yes, Mr. Member of Parliament from Portage la Prairie, we do want more. Once again you fell into your own trap. That is why you do not get elected as a government because people are so afraid of the irresponsible actions and positions that you bring forward in the House of Commons.

In fact, maybe you belong in that corner from now till eternity to represent some of those radical left-wing views. Certainly, some constituents will say: "I have a good representative in Ottawa. He is a marvellous chap, or a wonderful lady. He really represents the way I would like to spend money. He really represents the way we should get everything from those rich tycoons living around the country. We will be the Robin Hoods". There they are, the Robin Hoods and the Robin Hoodesses—I do not know what you call a female Robin Hood, but there are some of them over there as well.

They sit sanctimoniously and righteously and say that what we are doing is wrong. Yet if they were ever in power we would probably have to borrow twice this amount. Not $25 billion. That would be peanuts for those people over there. They would have to borrow $50 billion, maybe $100 billion.

They know how to spend. But you will not find an individual in that party who knows how to balance a business sheet and knows how to make economies tick because they come from a background of non-business. They come from some sort of a social welfare background. They do not know that this country is built on hard work, people who work hard and contribute.

By the way, the Tory Parliament is represented by a cross-section of Canadians. I mean, you have them right down from pig farmers like myself to doctors, lawyers, accountants, business people, and truck drivers. I would like to take a look at the cross-section of that particular group over there in the corner because I am sure it is not very different. One almost has the same profession as the next, to spend money.

Mr. Speaker, if this government knew it could get some solid and sincere debate about this borrowing act from those opposite, somebody who could hold an intelligent conversation about this particular discussion, I suppose we would endure the request to go on for a few days. But what we are getting is nonsense rhetoric. Absolutely nonsense, and rhetoric of how this government never spent enough before, never spent enough on any program, and yet on the other hand should not have the right to borrow this amount of money with which to sustain the programs and the economy of the government as a whole.

They do not know which way they would like it. It would be most interesting to hear some comments. Is anyone over there suggesting we should not borrow this money? I will bet you there is not one member of Parliament in his seat who, if he knew his pay cheque would be cut in half, would stop this borrowing authority. You never hear them talk about that, not a chance.

I just saw the entrance of one of the members of the New Democratic Party. He is probably going to put his pay cheque on the line for this borrowing authority. He says it is probably worth losing my pay cheque to stop this borrowing authority—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I probably do not need to draw it to the hon. member's attention, but he has been a member here for some time and what he has just done is not what is normally done in this House, referring to the absence of members of Parliament. The implication of course is that people are aware—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That's debate. The hon. member for Etobicoke North has the floor on debate.

• (1220)

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the borrowing authority is traditionally an occasion in the House of Commons when members are able to debate economic policy of the government, and it is my regret that on this occasion the government has chosen to cut off debate before that discussion has taken place. There is certainly much to be said about the government's failure to provide real economic leadership in our economy, real economic leadership to the Canadian people.

It is a well known tenet of basic economics that a short-term deficit can be a major way of promoting growth and demand during a downturn in a business cycle. The opposite side of that equation is that when the economy re-enters a period of growth, public expenditure must be reined in, both to reduce inflationary pressures in the economy and to repay the debt which the government incurred when it was stimulating the economy.

This government has shown no evidence of real commitment to constraint in its spending during the past eight years of remarkable prosperity; prosperity I might point out which was to a substantial degree triggered and augmented by the spending of the previous government during a period of economic recession.

The single failure of this government to employ both fiscal and monetary policy to restore our economy to growth and expansion is everywhere evident. Since the 1981 recession, Canada has experienced uninterrupted economic growth. Yet during this period the government has allowed the public debt to more than double. The public debt is well over twice today what it was when this government entered office.

In 1988, for example, the net financial debt of the federal government, the provincial governments and the local governments across Canada was about $400 billion or over $15,000 for every Canadian. Among the other major members of the OECD, only Britain and Italy had a higher debt to gross national product ratio.

The growth of this debt is of even more concern than its size. Admittedly, there has been some modest progress in reducing the ratio of expenditures to revenue. In 1984, when the deficit reached its peak, federal expenditures were equal to 24 per cent of GDP, whereas federal revenues were only 17 per cent. By 1988, the government reminds us, federal expenditures had dropped to 21 per cent of GDP and revenues through tax increases had risen to over 18 per cent. These modest gains were more than offset by the dramatic rise in interest rates and accordingly in debt service charges.

According to the finance minister's last budget, average interest rates for the next year are forecast at over 11 per cent, while Canada's growth rate will average no more than 2 per cent.

When interest rates are higher than the rate of growth, the stage obviously is set for a further explosion in the public debt. Under these circumstances, the primary budget, that is excluding net interest payments, must generate a surplus sufficient to offset the growth in interest costs, if an increase in the debt is to be avoided. In other words, increases in revenue and reductions in government expenditure are both needed simply to overcome the rising costs of the public debt. Yet there is no evidence that interest rates will fall dramatically in the short-term, despite the Finance Minister's optimistic predictions.

Largely as a result of six years of government overspending, inflation is now running at more than 5 per cent. Moreover, escalating rates in Japan and in western Europe will force the Bank of Canada, if it chooses to continue its present policies, to raise its own interest rates if Canada wants to continue to attract foreign capital and to maintain international confidence in our dollar.

This afternoon, I think we will see interest rates increase yet again. There is certainly every reason to believe that interest rates will be even higher than those forecast by the Minister of Finance not a month ago.

What are the implications for Canadians of this mismanagement of our economy? First, we increase our net foreign liabilities. Of course, many Canadian corporations, public utilities and provincial governments traditionally have borrowed abroad. Recently, however, the national government also has turned to offshore borrowing as a way of financing its debt and its expenditures. About 30 per cent of Canadian Government bonds are now held by foreigners. With the current high levels of interest, an increasing share of wealth will now be siphoned off abroad in order to pay those debts.

Moreover, the Canadian government will become that much more addicted to high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar, if it is to continue to attract the high levels of foreign capital it believes that it needs to finance its operations and its growing debt.

The second major implication for Canada is that private investment will be discouraged by the present fiscal and monetary policies of this government. The high levels of taxation needed to finance the federal deficit has undoubtedly served to crowd out domestic investment. The Canadian economy today needs about $100 billion a year to finance itself. But since only $40 billion of this can be supplied from consumer savings in Canada, the economy looks offshore for almost $60 billion a year.

Moreover, the government's failure to solve its debt problem has raised further concerns about future levels of taxation. That, in turn, undoubtedly discourages private sector capital formation.

Further, given the current differential between domestic and international interest rates, Canadian businesses are encouraged to draw upon foreign savings, and these foreign borrowings have in turn pushed exchange rates for the Canadian dollar far beyond what our productivity would seem to warrant. The implications of a high Canadian dollar for our existing and future trade opportunities, particularly in light of our increased vulnerability to the United States, is obvious.

I want to remind the House for one moment that when we speak of government borrowing, we are also speaking of a form of social inequity. We are redistributing wealth upwards from the less affluent sectors in our society. It is after all, every Canadian who ultimately pays interest on the public debt. And since this debt is held mainly by more affluent Canadians, it is clear that there is a negative redistribution of wealth from the bottom up.

There is much more to be said about the government's present fiscal and monetary policies, but since it has chosen to cut off debate, I shall have to satisfy myself with these few comments.

• (1230)

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to speak to Bill C-65, a bill with which the government wishes to borrow $25.5 billion.

This borrowing is fundamental to our government's objectives as they were presented in the recent budget. Our objectives are to cut spending and reduce the deficit. I know that the people of Calgary North are very concerned about these objectives and want to see them accomplished. Any delay in passing this bill will interfere with these objectives.

There is a growing understanding in my riding about the need not only to cut expenditures as we have, but to continue to cut expenditures in the future.

The people of my riding understand that when the government took office in 1984 spending was out of control. Over $25 billion a year was being spent in terms of the balance between revenue and operating costs of the government. At that time, the government was spending $16 billion more than it was receiving in revenues. At the present time, we are spending $9 billion less than we are receiving in revenues. Despite all this, we have heard many objections about some of the actions of the government, such as the plan to bring in the goods and services tax.

My constituents realize the need to reorganize the tax system. They realize that a fundamental part of our budget is to restructure the tax system so that we have a clear-cut, visible consumption tax as well as an income tax. These are two fundamental objectives that any government should have. Those who use in society should pay in proportion to their use, and those who gain from society should pay in proportion to that gain. These are the fundamental objectives of any tax system. We have undertaken to revise the manufacturers' sales tax which is such an insidious detriment to our economy.

In Alberta, we need to free up our industry. At the present time most people do not realize that the manufacturers' sales tax means that some 1 per cent to 2 per cent of the cost of production of oil and gas exported consists of manufacturers' sales tax. For the companies operating in Alberta this means that that 1 per cent extra revenue could mean as much as a 10 per cent increase in their profits. That profit would certainly go toward improving the economy of Alberta.

With regard to the GST, I think it is also important to note that senior citizens in our area are beginning to understand how important this move is to them and that they will not be hit detrimentally by this tax. Many of them are now waiting with some anticipation for the rebates of the GST which they will receive every three months.

I was also interested to receive a delegation from the Calgary Real Estate Board. I assumed they would be telling me they were against the GST because I had heard about many individual real estate agents in my riding telling customers to buy now because prices would go up when the GST came in. But the members of the Calgary Real Estate Board acknowledged to me that only about a 1 per cent increase would take place in home prices for normal-sized homes—that is up to $350,000 in Calgary—and that in fact rate of increase that takes place normally in the market roughly every two weeks in Calgary, due to the vibrant economy that we have.

Bill C-65 is simply a borrowing bill that will allow the government to get on with its job, to reduce the deficit to some $28.5 billion this coming year, and to bring it into balance in 1995. This is a difficult and, slow process, but it is important to understand that the deficit that we now have is not primarily the result of the actions of this government. This government inherited a deficit of some $200 billion and, admittedly, while it was trying to crank the spending down, it spent another $30 billion or so in addition to the revenue that it was receiving. During that time, the interest alone has added some $150 billion of interest so that we now have a debt in the order of $380 billion.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier indicated that we would not tell him or the House how this money that we want to borrow is going to be spent. Every detail of how we want to spend this money has been presented in the budget. The budget has outlined clearly such things as transfers to persons, some $35 billion. This $35 billion is not affected by the restraint program and the elderly will benefit to the tune of some $17.5 billion of that amount for the old age security program, the guaranteed income supplement and the spouses' allowance. The increase in this spending is due to the increased numbers of people receiving these benefits. But we have limited the increase by introducing a 15 per cent repayment program for those individuals whose net income is over $50,000. This further restrains the amount that we need to borrow under this bill.

Under the transfers to persons, the unemployed will receive some $13.3 billion. This is an increase in the amount of money spent on unemployment, despite the reduction in the level of unemployment in the country. The dollars are up because the benefits are up. We have also, quite rightly, introduced structural reform which will restrain the amount of money that we need to borrow under this bill.

Under the family allowances program, some $2.7 billion will be paid out. Admittedly, this is a lower amount than in previous years because we have fewer payments due to the smaller size of families. Again, we have been responsible in capping and restraining the need to borrow by introducing the 15 per cent repayment for those whose individual net income exceeds the $50,000.

Veterans payments remain unchanged at $1.3 billion.

There are other payments which are, of course, outlined in detail in the budget. There are the transfers to governments of $36.1 billion. These payments are being made to provincial, territorial and municipal governments, $24 billion in straight cash and $12.1 billion in tax transfers.

There is Established Programs Financing. The growth of this program has been reduced by 2 per cent in 1989 and 1 per cent more in 1990. This is further action taken by our government to cut spending and reduce the need to borrow.

• (1240)

The Progressive Conservative government has introduced programs to reduce spending in virtually every area and has kept the amount that we have to borrow under this bill to an absolute minimum.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, here we are again, instead of debating the contents of Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, debating another one of the government tactics to prevent debate, and that is closure. I do not know when the government is going to learn that when it brings important topics to the floor of the House, there should be no time allocation, there should be no closure.

Here is what a Canadian, the minister's friend from 401 Bay Street, Mr. Bruce Haines, thinks of the Prime Minister's and the minister's tactics of closure. I will quote from his letter:

> Dear Prime Minister
> You have resorted to closure in the House of Commons to fend off the avalanche of criticism directed against the GST and inundated newspapers with taxpayer-paid propaganda about the tax as if it was already the law of the land. On the theory that a lie will gain acceptance if repeated often enough, you have urged Canadians to believe that the 7 percent GST is little more than a benign replacement of the 13-1/2 percent Federal Sales Tax (which was only 9 percent before you got elected and then only imposed on certain goods at the factory or manufacturing level).

Mr. Haines also says:

Never before have Canadians been treated so shabbily by a government which, against a nearly unanimous outcry, has expressed a determination to saddle them with the biggest and most cynical tax grab in history, the GST—Why should Canadians trust you with another dime?

On February 28, 1990, the Hon. Minister of Finance said that he was proud that he has moved, and I quote "further and faster" than his counterpart in the United Kingdom. I would suggest to him that he slow down, because if he does not, he is going to find himself out in the cold, way ahead of his hero in 1992. The race is on. Which of the two parties in question is going to be first in the loss of support among its own party colleagues? The standings to date show a draw, one Tory riding in Canada to one Tory riding in the United Kingdom. We are not even out of the starting gates.

In the United Kingdom, the last straw was the introduction of what is commonly referred to as the poll tax, a tax levied on the number of adults in a household. Estimates done by officials had put the average expected tax at approximately $565 Canadian a person. The actuals come in at approximately $742 Canadian, a difference of approximately $180 Canadian a person. This is not per household but per person. That means that for a family of four, it will cost $800 Canadian more in a year in taxes than anticipated. That is no joke.

This example begs the question of exactly how accurate the estimates that are being thrown around by our hon. minister are with respect to the GST. It also begs the question as to what exactly the government wants to achieve. Granted, the bottom line in the United Kingdom looks good in terms of financial management, but let us look at the underlying side effects of the numbers. In other words, let us look at the effects suffered by the people of the United Kingdom.

In the words of Andrew Gamble, a professor of politics at the University of Sheffield, and I quote:

—the policies of Mrs. Thatcher precipitated a major shake-out of labour and the destruction of a large part of Britain's manufacturing capacity pushing millions into poverty, destroying and demoralizing many communities and accelerating the decay of the inner cities and the older manufacturing areas.

According to the OECD statistics, in every year of this decade unemployment has been higher in the U.K. than any other of the summit seven leading industrialized countries. In the latest comparable statistics from OECD, unemployment in the U.K. was over 50 per cent higher than the average of the other countries.

This will sound familiar to most of my colleagues in the House but this was as a result of cut-backs in public spending and borrowing, direct tax cuts that were counterbalanced by indirect taxes, increases via the infamous VAT which caused the burden of taxes to rise.

There are approximately three million unemployed in the United Kingdom. Beggars defined as less deserving, not less fortunate, have become a tragic visible symbol of the country's policies.

If these are the types of policies admired and embraced by the government, we are in big trouble. We better start to defeat this government now because in a few years this country will bear no resemblance to what we have come to know as Canada.

We will be in the same situation as the United Kingdom. Thank you very much but, personally, I do not want to see more food banks as a result of more families starving. I do not want to see more people sleeping on the streets than are already there. God knows I have enough of those in my riding. I have absolutely no interest in seeing one of my country's most valuable and essential resources such as water being privatized.

The hon. minister has been tightening the belts of Canadians for six years, "for their own good" he says. If the government can rid itself of the deficit all Canadians will benefit from it. Yet, he insists on keeping interest rates high—and I expect they will go even higher today—forcing the debt to grow even larger at the same time and increasing taxes and cutting back on programs for the most needy Canadians.

It reminds me of a story of a hotel owner in the Klondike who fired his bartender. "Why?", he was asked. "Because he was crooked," was the answer. "I watered the whiskey and watered the whiskey and I still couldn't make any money." The minister has been watering services to the public. He has been watering his commitment to the public. He has been watering down the pockets of Canadians.

All over the world, people are opening up to new ideas. Here we have a rehashing of ideas that did not work in 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989. But for some reason they are all of a sudden going to work in 1990. The Minister of Finance said: "We have to be more productive and more competitive." He continues to reduce budgets for R–D and science and technology. He has cut, not reduced, transfer payments to provinces that will result in an incredible rise in the cost of higher education.

Are we going to harmonize our educational system with that of the Americans? The average tuition of a state university—and I am not talking about Harvard. I am talking about an ordinary university—is $18,000 American a year. Are we going to be more competitive when Canadians can no longer afford to educate themselves? Education is the most important weapon against poverty. It is the most important tool for our younger generations in trying to secure for themselves an adequate standard of living.

This fact obviously escapes my hon. colleague, the minister, who plays politics with the future of our country by passing the buck. It begs the question, the quality of brainpower behind this fudge-it budget. The priorities of this government are based on money, not people. They do not reflect the spirit of Canada. If the Prime Minister could manage to limit himself to a pair of shoes, like the majority of Canadians are forced to do, maybe a homeless family could move into his closet.

I am not trying to be funny. The question of homeless people is a growing one as less Canadians are able to afford both food and shelter. Yet this government decides to cut the social housing budget by 15 per cent in 1990–91 and a further 15 per cent in 1991–92. Over five years this budget will lose $165 million. There are over 200,000 homeless people in Canada and a further 84,000 a month who, after paying rent, have a mere $23 a week to spend on food, medicine and clothes.

The number of people using emergency food programs in Metro Toronto has doubled over the past three years. The average income of people who are forced to use food banks is higher than in 1987, but the remaining income after rent is not.

According to a special report by the Daily Bread Food Bank located in my riding, a food bank agency that is very credible around the world—and I want to give them credit and congratulate them—states that this fact implies that people with higher incomes who were not food bank users in 1987 can no longer make ends meet today because rental costs leave them with insufficient funds to buy basic necessities. This government is picking on the very Canadians who need help the most. They have cut funding to groups for the poor, disabled persons, women, minorities, natives and seniors. To add insult to injury, we are told that we do not understand the issue. We are told that we do not understand why the government has to cut back. We are told that if we really understand the GST, we would welcome the tax. This government undermines the intelligence of Canadian people. Canadians will not accept the GST.

• (1250)

Mr. Speaker, I jut have one more sentence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak at a time when there is a cloud over this whole institution of Parliament. It is a cloud placed there by this government. After only three hours of debate on a bill to borrow some $25.5 billion, this government has again—I think it is the thirty-fifth time—invoked closure or time allocation.

Personally, I am annoyed because the last time the GST was debated in the House I was unable to speak because of closure. I was too far down the list and time ran out.

Most people in my riding are very upset with the way the government is muzzling members of this House. They are also upset with the way the government is running this country with respect to taxes. They are upset when the minister says there are no new tax increases in the budget and that is not true. They are upset when the minister says that we went through good times but now it is time to tighten our belts. People in the Moose Jaw—Lake Centre riding, who are they? They are mainly seniors, small business people, farmers and workers. They are middle income earners and lower middle income earners. They do not mind paying their fair share of taxes, but that is not what is happening.

In Saskatchewan services and opportunities are drying up. In Moose Jaw businesses are closing at an alarming rate and housing prices are depressed. Saskatchewan alone in the last four years has lost some 50,000 people. That is 50,000 people out of a population of one million. We have 14 per cent of our population living below the poverty line. This is the second highest in the country. We have no Conrad Blacks or others of his ilk. We have no major corporations that made some $27 billion in profits and pay no income tax. We do not have those types of people. For the minister to tell the people in Moose Jaw—Lake Centre that they have to tighten their belts is simply insulting and they realize how much this government has lost touch with the people of this country.

This government is good at misleading Canadians. The finance minister says there are no tax increases in the budget. That is not true. The GST is certainly a budget bill and will increase taxes in the country to bring in an extra $5 billion in revenue a year. There is another item that the government has conveniently overlooked as well. This year's budget is really a continuation of last year's budget where cuts were made.

Because of the time, I will only focus on the area of agriculture which is important to Saskatchewan. In last year's budget announced over a year ago there were cuts that will take effect this year. Crop insurance, $110 million; at and east freight rates, $40 million; branch line rehabilitation, $4 million; advanced payments $27 million; dairy export program, $7 million; commodity-based loans, $8.5 million; Canadian Dairy Commission, $7 million; fuel tax rebate, $125 million. That is a total of $328.5 billion taken out of the agricultural economy this year from last year's budget. There are cuts and this year's budget is simply a continuation of last year's budget, pure and simple.

I have been speaking with many people in my riding who are upset and angry with this government. I would like to highlight one particular example. Mr. Bert Mickleborough came into my office some time ago. He was outraged at the way the government is performing. Mr. Mickleborough has brought in tax receipts and pay stubs for me to bring to the House today. He has indicated that he voted for the Progressive Conservatives in the past but certainly will not do so in the future.

I would like to outline Mr. Mickleborough's situation which is not untypical of the riding. Mr. Mickleborough is 35 years of age and lives in Moose Jaw. He is married and has two children aged 11 and 8. He is a certified engineer technician. He is working and not living off the government. He is not taking the dole. He has never been on unemployment insurance. He is a hard working member of the community.

Mr. Mickleborough feels outraged when the Minister of Finance says that Canadians have been living beyond their means. He has not. He is maintaining a very small debt, lives in a 1,100 square foot bi-level with three bedrooms, does not take holidays to Disneyland but may drive to Medicine Hat, 200 miles down the road for a holiday. He is not living beyond his means. He is outraged at this suggestion. He is so upset that he gave me his receipts indicating that in 1983 on a two-week basis his cheques were $1,320. They are now $1,722.40 which is a 30 per cent increase. However, his tax has gone up from $365.08 to $506.34 which is a 39 per cent increase.

Mr. Mickleborough is a middle income Canadian earning approximately $40,000 a year whose taxes have increased faster than his income. Now he has to face the GST tax. This typical Canadian did not intend to rock any boats. He is happy, but is so upset by statements of this government that he has come forward to ask me to bring these facts to the attention of the House.

What we need is a government which will bring forth a budget that will build for tomorrow, that has a strong commitment to the environment, that has a plan to build and sustain regional economies, that will cut the interest rate to support economic growth and restore and improve social programs. We need a government that will allow families such as the Mickleborough family to live and work in an environment that will encourage them to do that type of work.

We have lots of Mickleboroughs across the country who are hard working Canadians, who deserve better than this and are being simply ignored by this government.

Mr. Speaker, I realize my time is just about up. I would like to conclude by saying that we do need a government that will listen to all Canadians and not just to the upper crust such as the Conrad Blacks. We need a government that will respect the needs of Canadians and to allow them to have healthy, happy and productive families. This government failed to do that in the past. It continues to fail to do that now.

Bert Mickleborough is typical of many voters throughout this country and he certainly intends to let the government know his feelings next time when it really counts at the next federal general election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

P.E.I. SNOW CRAB FISHERY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there is great concern among the snow crab fishermen of Prince Edward Island that their livelihoods will be endangered if the Department of Fisheries and Oceans drastically reduces the snow crab quota in P.E.I. zones.

It is my opinion that Prince Edward Island should not have a restricted zone. P.E.I. snow crab fishermen should have open access to the fishery, equal to the access that the New Brunswick and Quebec fishermen have.

It is discriminatory that my fishermen have to stay within a small zone which is open to the other Atlantic Canada fishermen. Prince Edward Island's 30 licenced permit holders must have a quota which both sustains their incomes and keeps the high quality crab processing line operating at the Tignish Fisheries Co-op.

Our crab fishermen support the concept of a management plan for the fishery. Stocks have been depleted and the remaining stock must be managed for the long-term benefit of all concerned.

Prince Edward Island crab fishermen were the first to exploit and develop the snow crab fishery in Atlantic Canada. I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to deal fairly with this matter. That is all we expect and ask for fair and equal treatment. Five per cent of total catch based on landings of the past five years would meet the minimum requirements of P.E.I.'s crab fishermen.

JEWISH STUDENTS NETWORK

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, many members of Parliament received visits by the Jewish Students Network this week. These very concerned and thoughtful young people are getting us thinking about some very basic questions. Why is Soviet President Gorbachev opening the gates to freedom of expression and glasnost but not letting Jewish people out of Russia? Why is anti-Semitism growing in the Soviet Union? Why are so many Jewish refusnik cases still outstanding? In short, why is there developing a very ugly persecution of the Jewish people in the Soviet Union?

I want to commend the leadership of the Jewish Students Network on their initiative in creating freedom for millions of Soviet Jews. I also want to urge the Canadian government to continue to press Moscow to open any gates possible to the 30,000 exit visas for Soviet Jews which are still outstanding.

President Gorbachev, please tear down your own wall against the Jewish people.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, agriculture is a key part of the Canadian economy. Farming and related industries provide one job in ten, and the agri-food sector must not be neglected, since it accounts for 10 per cent of the gross national product.

However, it is important to remember that agricultural productivity depends on the condition of the soil, and the week of April 9 to 15 again this year will be devoted to making Canadians aware of this resource that we must protect.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has understood the critical importance of agriculture to us and therefore last year it instituted a three-year national soil conservation program.

FOREST AGREEMENTS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, according to the federal government's own figures, we are still not replanting every hectare of forest land we harvest. In 1987, the last year for which figures are available, there was a shortfall of 200,000 unplanted hectares. Despite this, this government has failed to renew forest agreements with Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

The current agreement with British Columbia expires on Saturday and the minister said he likely will not be able to sign a new one. He has even called the provinces' plans to clean up our backlog of harvested areas unreasonable. What is unreasonable is the complete failure of the Ministers of Forestry and the Environment to use effectively the programs currently available to regenerate and manage our forests.

The minister should sign those agreements today so that we can ensure that our forests are replanted and the necessary research is done to sustain our forests for the future.

TRIBUTE TO ISMAILI MUSLIMS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, March 24, 1990, I had the distinct honour to join with many leaders of the Ismaili Muslim Community in a ground breaking ceremony in Markham for the Ismaili Torrent North Central Jamatkhana which will be built over this year.

The Ismaili Muslim leaders at this historic ceremony included Nizar Kanji, the Canadian president for His Highness Prince Aga Khan Council; Mohamad Manji, the Ontario president for His Highness Prince Aga Khan Council and His Excellency Tariq Altaf, consul general of Pakistan.

Also at this special ceremony was Barkat Ali, an Ismaili Muslim leader from Markham who first approached the mayor of Markham to obtain a piece of land for the construction of the Jamatkhana.

This special occasion marked yet another milestone in the establishment of strong institutions across Canada by the Ismaili Community and reflects their tolerance, generosity, industry and spirit of voluntarism for all Canadians.

This initiative also speaks of the Ismaili Muslim community's gratitude to His Highness Prince Aga Khan who has 20 million followers around the world.

AIR CONNECTIONS—NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, a direct, non-stop air service between the national capital region and Chicago is vital if the economy of the capital region is to continue to diversify, reducing its dependence on federal government employment and contributing to Canada's competitiveness in the world economy.

The community of Ottawa—Hull is the fourth largest urban Canadian centre. It is not reasonable that the competitiveness of this region is hampered because business trips that could be accomplished in two and a half hours now take seven to eight hours. Business that could be done in a day now takes two days, resulting in extra costs and the loss of productivity.

It is inconceivable that international travellers are unable to access the capital of Canada conveniently, economically and efficiently.

I challenge the Government of Canada to do its part in agreeing to Ottawa—Hull as a co-terminus with Montreal on the Montreal—Chicago route.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in an attempt to educate the hon. Minister of National Defence.

I would like to read a passage from a recent mailing to the Minister's Saskatchewan constituency in which the Minister said: "Saskatchewan does not have any defence establishments."

This will come as quite a surprise to the 1,300 personnel at Canadian Forces Base Moose Jaw which, the last time I checked, was still in Saskatchewan, still one of the busiest airports in North America and still home of the internationally acclaimed Snowbirds.

This will also come as quite a shock to my constituents in the city of Moose Jaw who benefit from the $55 million that the base contributes annually to the local economy.

Given the experience of Summerside, P.E.I. and Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, the question must be asked: Was the minister simply exhibiting ignorance of his ministry and his home province of Saskatchewan, or was he committing the proverbial Freudian slip?

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the government's attention, a very serious situation for Canadian companies resulting from the Canada–U.S. Trade Agreement.

Some of you will know that under the Accelerated Elimination of Tariffs Agreement, products classified under Tariff No. 4201 will have tariffs removed on April 1.

One product group in this classification has successfully appealed, but others now have little time. They just found out recently that time was running out.

Unless action is taken now, companies such as Western Rawhide and Harness Manufacturing Company will have to lay-off their remaining production staff long before the expected date of 1995 or 1996. In fact, perhaps they will have to do it immediately.

The company will end up being a distributor of American made products. I call on the government to act now. This is but one example out of the many which are going to be affected in Canada.

[Translation]

The company is counting on the government. The employees and their families are counting on the government.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, in the course of my reading the other day, I came across an editorial on the dual language debate, a part of which I would like to read into the record in this House:

> It behooves the people of this Canada of ours, French and English, to stand shoulder to shoulder, forgetting the differences of opinion which may exist between us and only remembering the great love we bear for our country, to push forward in the great work of building up a nationality in Canada which shall be able to challenge the applause and admiration of the world. Then the time will have come in the history of Canada when the proudest words a citizen of this country can utter will be, "I am a Canadian."

The interesting part of this editorial is that it was written on March 6, 1890.

It is repeated by me in March of 1990 and I want us to resolve that no one will be making statements like that in March of 2090. Let us, from this day forward, make our language duality a source of unity and not divisiveness in this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the previous statement.

Yesterday I received two letters from constituents in Delta, and I would like to quote briefly from them.

The first, one said: "Let me say I hope Quebec stays with us. They are a great people". The writer then goes on to tell of his very positive experience in World War II with his Quebec compatriots.

The second letter says: "With regard to the present turmoil surrounding the Meech Lake Accord, I would like to see more feeling put into making our Canadian French feel more at home in this country". Then the writer goes on to give some practical ways in which this might be done.

This is a very critical time in Canada's history, as these Delta residents have shown. It is a time for understanding, patience, goodwill and effective dialogue. Canada without Quebec is unthinkable. It is time for all Canadians, east and west, north and south, to preserve this magnificent country that has such a vital role to play in the future of our whole planet, let alone ourselves and our children.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, the just released discussion paper for the Environmental Action Plan shows that this government has let Canadians down with its lack of concrete action to tackle environmental problems.

But this Green Plan serves only to buy the government time, while the Minister of the Environment struggles to convince his Cabinet colleagues of the necessity and the virtue of strong programs. Meanwhile, over 900 chemicals in the Great Lakes still have no federal standards. We are the world's largest producer of garbage, the greatest consumer of energy, one of the leading emitters of carbon dioxide, and the Tories fumble with a Federal Court order on the Oldman River Dam.

This Green Plan is just the latest example of Tory policy: All talk, no action. Canadians want concrete action taken on the environment, with measurable goals in a specific time frame with national standards.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE PROGRAMS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, by cutting $4.1 million from heritage language programs, the government is turning its back on multiculturalism. Many of the 1,500 classes across Canada will be forced to close.

Heritage language classes cost very little, but their cultural and economic value is great. They promote cultural identity and family unity. While the Minister for International Trade spends $14 million on Pacific Rim languages, children are denied language classes.

Leaders of major ethnic groups in Ottawa today demand continued funding. The government must listen to one-third of Canadians whose origin is neither French nor English, who demand their rights as taxpayers to funding for their children to learn their mother tongue.

CEC says cuts are bad for Canadian culture, bad for education, bad for international trade and bad for national unity.

I call on the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship to fulfil his multicultural responsibility by reinstating full funding for heritage languages immediately.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the women occupying the Secretary of State offices in St. John's, Newfoundland have now spent four frustrating days calling for the reinstatement of funding to the women's program.

Last night, the Secretary of State graciously allowed some of his senior officials to meet with the protesters. Unfortunately, the only message they were allowed to bring was that they had no authority to reinstate the $1.6 million cut from last month's budget.

Even the senior Newfoundland cabinet minister himself, the Minister for International Trade, pointed out to the Secretary of State that the main issue is not money, but a drastic change in Secretary of State policy. Is this change in policy an attempt to stifle the voice of Canadian women?

Two ministers have now made representation to the Secretary of State to restore these funds. Does Cabinet speak with one voice, or with a forked tongue? Canadian women and men demand that the Secretary of State reinstate funding immediately. At the very least, he must meet with the St. John's Status of Women group, face to face and stop sending powerless bureaucrats.

LITHUANIA

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend and encourage the people of Lithuania.

We must never forget the recent history when, from 1939 to 1941, they were forcibly annexed to the Soviet Union. Recently, however, we have witnessed the rebirth of this small country.

I am sure all members of this House would want to say: "We are one with you in your historic struggle for democracy and your right of self-determination. We encourage you and we admire your bravery".

I urge the Government of Canada to do all that it can responsibly do to assist Lithuania in its courageous march toward freedom through words of encouragement, offers of goodwill and through government action to facilitate technical assistance from our business community to theirs, and by advice where requested of our financial officials as Lithuanians seek to restructure themselves toward a free economy and a truly democratic society.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment I have a question for the Prime Minister. In the Throne Speech last April, 1989, the government promised a new environmental agenda. Instead, after a year of waiting, today the government brought forward nothing more than: "a framework for discussion on the environment". What a let-down. Just another discussion paper.

I ask the government why it has not presented today a concrete plan of action with specific measures and a timetable to implement them? Why has the Canadian government let down the Canadian people so badly today when they have been calling for real action on the environment? Where is that action?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, should, I would have thought, have been reacting more positively to the announcement today by the Minister of the Environment. It represents with the issuance of the consultation plan a very major step forward for Canada. It invites consultation from industry, from the provinces and from interested parties across the country to devise a program that is consistent with the priority we attach to the environment and economic development in the country as well.

In my own consultations with people across the country, it was requested very specifically that at this particular juncture there be intensive consultation with people across the nation, particlarly provinces, industry, trade unions and such.

So while the minister gave the outlines of what I believe will be major advances in the protection of the environment, he is actively inviting the participation of provinces and other interested parties. I do not know why that would offend my hon. friend because it is perfectly consistent with co-operative federalism.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are calling for action on the environment. If this document has any meaning, why is it filled with weasel words like: "the government will consider, move toward, option, possibility"?

Why, after being in office for five years and having a chance to take concrete action, has it done nothing more than bring forward what itself calls a framework for discussion in which almost nowhere in it is there any pledge of concrete government action? Why is it that the document is filled instead of with pledges of action with nothing more than a series of wishy-washy questions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if at this moment the document had been filled with announcements that we are going to do such and such a thing tomorrow, then my hon. friend would have been criticizing the government for not consulting in advance with the provinces and with industry. So with the—

Mr. Gauthier: You had five years.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, my hon. friend says five years. In that period of time Prime Minister Brundtland, chairman of the Brundtland Commission for the United Nations indicated publicly that Canada had assumed leadership in the world in protection of the environment, and Foreign Minister Shevardnadze said in Moscow in December that Canada was the first nation to place the environment on the international agenda and that the country deserved congratulations for its leadership.

The Minister of the Environment today deserves the congratulations of this House for what he is doing in Montreal.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Brundtland report came out three years ago. I am sure that Madam Brundtland would not have anything too good to say about this government today.

An example of the kinds of empty questions in this discussion paper is the one in which the government asks whether it should emphasize compliance for enforcement of environmental laws. Does that question have to be asked? Why does the government have any doubt as to whether it should enforce its own environmental laws on something so important as the future existence of this planet?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, why does this document just raise questions about the environment, when the Canadian people think that the government should rather give answers and do more to implement them? Why this lack of action on the environment?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that Madam Brundtland would not have anything nice to say about the government now. Last week, in Vancouver, she said that the Government of Canada was providing genuine world leadership on the environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: She was defeated, also.

Mr. Mulroney: Now the House leader of the Liberal Party says no wonder Mrs. Brundtland was defeated. What an awful thing to say about one of the finest people serving in world politics. What a disgraceful thing to say about one of the leading environmentalists in the world. Why can't you accept the fact that Mrs. Brundtland thinks the government and the people of Canada are assuming dignified world leadership on the environment and be proud of it?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, one can understand the desperate efforts by the Prime Minister to climb up from his 17 per cent level in the public opinion polls.

My question is directed to the Minister of the Environment, and in his absence, we will be very grateful to whoever wishes to deal with it. In the same report, published today by the Minister of the Environment, there is a promise to introduce a bill on environmental assessment soon which is, by the way, a promise made by the Progressive Conservative Party in 1984.

Can the minister assure Canadians that such legislation will not be weaker than the regulations passed by the Liberal government in 1984 and reinforced by three separate court decisions since?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it would hardly be possible to produce anything that would be much weaker than what the previous government had produced.

Of course, there is going to be legislation and, of course, there is going to be an environmental action plan, but the action that needs to be taken will affect every Canadian and it will affect the lifestyles of most Canadians.

Therefore, it is critically important that everybody gets drawn into the debate before this kind of critical action is taken. What the minister has done today is announce the four-point action plan that will permit us to consult throughout the country until fall. It is clearly laid out what the results of this exercise are going to be. Of course, we hope that the opposition will engage itself as well with other Canadians in developing just the right kind of legislation.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Transport and it flows from a statement in the same report in which belief is expressed in the government supporting and enforcing existing laws.

In light of the fact that two weeks and more have gone by since his approval has been struck down by the Federal Court on the Oldman Dam, will the Minister of Transport indicate when he will enforce the law that he has, do the job that he is expected to do by Canadians, in stopping the construction of the dam on the Oldman River?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, naturally that was a very important legal decision.

There are implications as to safety and the government is considering the action that should be taken. As soon as we have reached a decision we will announce it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. For more than a year, the government has been talking about the environment and has made all kinds of promises. Last year, a five-year plan was mentioned including specific objectives, an agenda, and promises of funding. Today, what we get is just another working paper with a lot of old ideas. My question is this: Where is the political will that is needed to get things moving on environmental issues?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to answer my honorable friend, quite a bit has been achieved in this area. I am thinking of international agreements concluded by this government. For instance, we were the first country at the Vienna Convention to ratify an agreement on protecting the ozone layer, and we concluded an agreement with the Soviet Union on November 1989. There have been federal-provincial agreements, the environmental protection legislation passed in June 1988, and in 1989 the regulations to eliminate lead in gasoline.

[English]

Water quality initiatives: strengthening and a revision of the Canada-U.S. Great Lakes Water Quality Act in November, 1987, in June 1988, the provision of a five-year, $110 million federal program to clean up and protect the St. Lawrence River. An announcement of a $125 million Great Lakes action plan. Sulphur dioxide emissions under acid rain already reduced by 40 per cent in Canada. Technology development and pollution abatement initiatives.

I think probably this characterizes it best of all. Since 1984, apart from all of the other areas, six new national parks have been announced in Canada, including South Moresby. We are very much committed to sustainable development and the protection of the environment, and our record clearly illustrates that.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I would remind this House as well that the record also indicates that the Prime Minister and his government voted against completing the national parks system by the year 2000 as was proposed in this House.

In today's watered down frame work for a discussion paper, the government says: "We cannot afford the costly react and cure approach to dealing with environmental problems, nor can we any longer afford to ignore environmental considerations in properly assessing our economic performance."

The government promised a Canadian environmental assessment act during the last election and in the Throne Speech. First it was going to be tabled last summer, then it was going to be last fall. Now it is spring and there is no environmental assessment act. As a result of the government's inaction, projects like the Oldman Dam and Rafferty-Alameda are being decided by the courts rather than by the environmental policies set by this government.

Will the government commit today to the tabling of a strong Canada environment assessment act?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because of the high priority given to the EARP reform, the government plans to table legislation later this spring rather than waiting until the release of the Green Plan in the fall, and I think that will be welcome news to my hon. friend.

• (1430)

Given my hon. friend's interest in the environment, I am somewhat disappointed that in her blanket criticism she tends to completely dismiss and neglect things, such as the signing in 1984 of five year forestry agreements with over $1 billion in committed funds, making this the largest environmental rehabilitation program in Canadian history; the beginning of a clean-up program for the Sydney tar ponds chemical dump site, which will cost $34 million over the first five years; the signature in 1988 of an agreement to clean up Halifax harbour at a cost of $196 million; a $4.5 million program to clean up the Hamilton Harbour Windermere Basin; and the Fraser River Estuary Management Program.

Mr. Speaker, only time prevents me from reading a much more extensive list which I thought my hon. friend would applaud.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in the government's own framework for discussion on the environment, which is not a plan and which does not contain any concrete ideas or financial commitments, the government itself outlined some of the serious problems that are currently devastating the environment in Canada.

We are the heaviest users of energy on a per capita basis. Canadians are the world's fourth-largest producers of carbon dioxide on a per capita basis. I repeat that the government itself says: "We cannot afford the costly react and cure approach".

What Canadians want to see is a real plan with real teeth and a real timetable. I ask the Prime Minister again to give us that timetable. A year of discussion and then some action in the future is not a timetable. The environment is a concern. I ask the Prime Minister to commit to Canadians a real agenda for action. That is leadership.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to commit to my hon. friend that, indeed, following consultation with the provinces there will be a real environmental agenda for action. I expect that in turn my hon. friend will commit to the full the unreserved and unalloyed support of the New Democratic Party for that program when it is introduced into the House of Commons.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today, the Canadian bank rate rose more than 13 basis points to 13.51 per cent. That is the highest level since the Prime Minister and his government were sworn in in September of 1984.

The spread between Canadian and U.S. rates remains above 5 per cent, which is far higher than the historical average of 2 per cent.

The Prime Minister himself predicted within a few days of the February 20 budget that interest rates would go down. That was the Prime Minister's prediction. In fact, interest rates have continued alarmingly to go up.

My question for the Prime Minister is simple. Why?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the very simple answer is that we want to avoid the problems of 1980 and 1982, when we saw interest rates under the government that he supported at 20 per cent to 25 per cent. That was a lesson—a very, very tough one—for everybody across this country. It is a lesson from which we must learn. It is a lesson that we do not want to see repeated.

It means that we must get inflation under control. That requires us to continue doing the things that we are doing, whether it is through monetary policy or through budgetary policy, to ensure that we get the level of inflation under control and not sweep it under the carpet as his government did. We must face it head on. That is the way we will get lower interest rates. That is the way we will get lower interest rates on a much more permanent basis. That is the way we are going to have a healthier economy in Canada.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House want the Prime Minister to come out from underneath the carpet and answer the question.

When the February 20 budget was brought down, which budget included dramatic cuts to fundamental programs like health care and education, as well as a transfer of the federal debt on to the backs of the provinces, we were told that this pain was worth bearing because, in the words of the Prime Minister, interest rates would come down shortly. Interest rates are at their highest level since this party came to power in September of 1984, and are at the highest levels since the recession of 1982.

Given that the interest rate policy is not working and given that the Prime Minister's prediction has been shown to be false, is the Prime Minister now considering withdrawing those cuts in health and education spending across Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should ask himself what caused the recession of 1981-82. The high interest rates were caused by the high inflation of the government that he supported at that time. That is precisely why we are doing this.

What is absolutely and totally puzzling about the hon. member's question is that he says what we want to do now is increase government spending, so that we can increase inflation, and so that we can increase interest rates. He has absolutely no idea what he is talking about when he suggests what we should be doing with monetary policy in this country.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries.

Yesterday, National Sea Products pulled the plug on the Canso fish plant four days early. Even John Buchanan expected a rescue plan after the minister's flying visit and fine words in February.

Now that the Canso fish plant is closed where is the rescue plan?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about rescue. I went down there. I put my hands over the water and the fish did not show up.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Valcourt: Liberals want Atlantic Canadians to believe that we can put fish back in the water. If the Liberal member can teach me how to put fish back in the water, then please tell me how.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, that just goes to show you the seriousness with which this minister takes the problem of the crisis in the Atlantic fishery. Rather than give us concrete answers, he continues to play hide and seek with the lives of the fish plant workers in Atlantic Canada.

When is he going to end this uncertainty? When will he tell the people of Canso what plans the government has to secure their future?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, he claims that I am toying with the issue in Atlantic Canada. The question—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Valcourt: I wish they would shut up!

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: You're a joker.

Mr. Valcourt: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

The members are treating the problems in the Atlantic fishery as if it were something that we could solve overnight and that politicians can solve just like this. It is not as easy as that.

In the last three weeks I have been talking to people in the industry. I have been talking to people in the provincial governments in Atlantic Canada. We are working on a plan.

I will not lie to the people of Canso and tell them that I have a solution that will bring everyone into the plant, but I can tell them something. We are working on it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, on behalf of the people of Chambly and Saint-Basile-le-Grand. How can he endorse the Environment Minister's green plan, knowing that on his two visits to my riding, he promised the people of Chambly and Saint-Basile-le-Grand that he would take immediate action to protect the environment? What is his answer to the people of Quebec, who say that this government is all talk and no action?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, considering the importance of the environment in Quebec and across this country, I am astonished at the hon. member's rather negative reaction to the release of this extremely important and fundamental document, a document that is indispensable for intensive consultation with the government of Quebec if we are to develop joint policies that will provide beneficial solutions, for the riding of Chambly as well as for British Columbia and for the whole country. Imagine my astonishment when I hear an hon. member complaining when a vitally important document is tabled recommending consultation with the public. We intend to use the results of this consultation to take what I believe will be historic action to protect the environment in this country.

• (1440)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister went along Highway 116 in my riding, he might have seen the PCBs that are still stored at Saint-Basile-le-Grand. He might have seen the Richelieu River which is still polluted. During the past two election campaigns they promised to take action to protect the environment but nothing was done.

Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is this: Will his government act today to levy a green tax and settle the issue of PCB storage, and will it do something about the issue of drinking water and the use of pesticides? Those are issues that concern my riding.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises some very important issues that concern his riding, but I may remind him that the answer to his question should not come from the Parliament of Canada but from the Quebec National Assembly.

Some hon. members: Really?

Mr. Mulroney: That is where the hon. member should get his answer.

An hon. member: Not true!

Mr. Mulroney: Regarding the hon. member's question, I already gave his leader an impressive list of what the Parliament of Canada has done to protect the environment since 1984. The document tabled today is an invitation to the provinces, unions, industry and the Parliament of Canada to co-operate and consult, with a view to promoting protection of the environment. Normally, the hon. member would be on his feet to applaud such a noble cause!

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

As the minister knows, there has been considerable concern expressed nationally about funding cuts to native communications programs. Can the Secretary of State confirm that additional funds will be provided to essential native communications societies?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, cuts to any program are very difficult. I have had an opportunity over the last year or two to come to know even better how effective a job all of these societies are doing for the community.

We established a task force that is well in place which is reviewing all of the options that may be available to help these societies continue their growth and maturity.

I want to indicate that I am particularly pleased that the minister for the Northwest Territories, Titus Allooloo, came to visit me. He brought forward an idea in which his government will be participating with us. I have agreed to the suggestion for the partnership.

I am encouraging other governments to get involved in partnerships to also work with native communications.

I might say that the minister had these words to say yesterday: "The Secretary of State can be credited with being responsive to the needs expressed by the people of the Northwest Territories and for seeking avenues to accommodate the legitimate needs that have been expressed".

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. There is no smoke without a fire. In all likelihood, the Outaouais area will be severely affected by Canada Post's decision to close three mail sorting centres in Hull, Aylmer and Gatineau. Can the minister confirm these closures which would transfer services to Ottawa, thus resulting in the loss or transfer of about 100 employees?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with admonitions from this House when the Crown corporation Canada Post was created, and with the views of the hon. member's party as they were articulated, for example, by the member for Papineau, it is our policy not to interfere with the management of the Post Office as it seeks to achieve efficiencies on behalf of its customers and taxpayers.

However, I will make the hon. member's representation to management so that they might bear it in mind as they balance the interests of Canadian taxpayers, users of the Post Office and, of course, their employees.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, following the closing of Northern Telecom, the closing of Boiseries de L'Outaouais, the popular Transport Canada file and, more recently, the cuts at the NCC, can the minister assure me on behalf of the people I represent that he will take into consideration all these unfair actions before making any decision relative to Canada Post?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, over the last five years, but in particular over the last year, 250,000 new jobs have been created in Canada as a result of the policies of this government. These policies have stressed deregulation and the fact that we expect industry to operate in the most efficient manner possible, including Crown corporations such as Canada Post. All of these activities have resulted in an economy that surprises people by its buoyancy. From that comes jobs.

Every year in Canada three to four million people change jobs. The hon. member is concerned, and rightfully so, about the jobs in his constituency, as is this government. I can assure him that if the policies of this government are allowed to be implemented by a co-operative House of Commons and Senate, then those jobs will be created.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Coalition on Multiculturalism representing seven million Canadians has come to Ottawa to insist that the government reinstate heritage language funding for 150,000 children and pretty close to 6,000 teachers.

The Prime Minister and most senior ministers have refused to meet this group. That shows the absolute lack of commitment to our cultural communities by this Tory government.

When is the Prime Minister going to insist on the reinstatement of heritage language funding?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has frequently met with members of the cultural communities. Indeed, on his recent trip to Toronto he had another opportunity to be with the members of the communities.

I had the opportunity to meet with the coalition today at lunch. I am also advised that the Minister of Employment and Immigration met with the group today.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Weiner: We are partners as far as we are concerned. We are very heavily involved in helping promote their view of a multicultural society. We have a very vigorous program.

As I said previously, that member should be embarrassed even asking the question, considering how little her government ever did for multiculturalism in this country.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I am in no way embarrassed, because I do not put up a $6 million facade and cut a $4 million program.

[Translation]

Could the Minister explain to Canadians what the point is of founding a heritage language institute when the schools will be closed? There won't be any teachers. Who is going to use this centre? Isn't this just one more example of the Tories' lack of commitment to our cultural communities?

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the commitment of this government is very firm. We have been giving expression to that commitment with a structural and a legislative base, as well as with a Canadian multiculturalism act. A new department of multiculturalism and citizenship is in the process of being formed. There is a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute with headquarters in Edmonton, as well as a race relations foundation being established. These are important instruments which cannot be altered in the future on a whim.

• (1450)

I might add that we have had budgetary cuts. They are very difficult because I realize how important the activities of these communities are.

We should not trivialize their activities because they are mainstream now. It is important for all of us to recognize that the whole of society should be participating in their growth and development.

This year multiculturalism will have the same amount of funding it had last year, in addition to the $24 million for the endowment for race relations. The areas of heritage cultures and languages are very important. Six million dollars will be allocated to those areas. There will be more money for community support, race relations and cross-cultural understanding.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

He will be aware of the very sad, disappointing and serious news that we received at two o'clock that, once again, the bank rate has increased to its highest levels since those devastating days back in 1982.

The Prime Minister will know that the prime rate is now coming perilously close to the psychological 15 per cent level beyond which the confidence in the Government of Canada's monetary policy will completely collapse.

How long do Canadians have to wait, as interest rates creep up week after week, before the government plans to act?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that we are committed to bringing interest rates down, but we want to bring them down in a way that will ensure they will stay down.

Even though people talk about a recession, our economy still has tremendous pressures underneath it which are causing the dollar and interest rates to go up. We are hopeful that with our fiscal policy, together with our monetary policy we will soon come to terms with that problem. We are tackling it in the only good way that there is today.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister talks about upward pressure in terms of inflation. I want to ask the Prime Minister the following question.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has been asking Canadians to tighten their belts. He will know that a number of his own back-benchers have been asking the government why on earth it would give the Governor of the Bank of Canada annual increases which exceed what most Canadians make on an annual basis—now up to the $200,000 plus level.

Does the Prime Minister support giving raises to the Governor of the Bank of Canada between 12 per cent and 20 per cent on an annual basis? Is this the kind of signal he wants to send to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe a comment like that from a gentleman with whom I shared prayers at Prayer Breakfast this morning.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: My understanding is that for an extended period of time, because of the personal reasons of the previous occupant of the position, there had been a disinclination to accept standard increases. As a result, when this matter was reviewed by the Burns Commission on Executive Compensation and by other advisors, it was pointed out that there was a very considerable disparity between the range of salaries of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and comparable office holders, both in the private and public sectors.

In fairness, I point out to my hon. friend that whatever numbers he comes up with—and I do not have them in front of me—there was a substantial amount of catch-up, inasmuch as that particular range had been frozen for an extended period of time, quite unfairly to the office holder as it turned out, and quite unfairly in comparison with other comparable jobs in the public sector.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Given the fact that recent media articles and reports have indicated that our tax system is getting more complex and that in fact increasing numbers of Canadians are now relying on professional tax preparers, despite the claims of tax reform, could the minister explain why Canadians are apparently finding it more difficult to file income tax returns?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, indications thus far suggest the exact opposite. In fact, as of this week we have already processed some 2.3 million returns as compared to 1.1 million returns last year. This suggests that Canadians are finding the system simpler to comply with and the administration of the department more efficient.

As I pointed out last week to the critic from the New Democratic Party, there has been no substantial increases in outside tax preparers. Preliminary estimates at this stage indicate that no increase for this year is taking place.

The bottom line to me is quite evident. Tax reform is working. It is fairer. It is simpler. It benefits all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister answered the previous question he reminded me of the divine teaching that states when nothing else works call upon the help of the Lord.

Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Finance but I see that he has left. I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Business has called the GST a nightmare. Consumers call it a travesty, a travesty because it taxes homes and utilities. It taxes natural gas, fuel oil and electricity. It will add $60 of cost to a household in Windsor; $84 to a household in Sudbury; and $102 to a household in Regina.

Does the Prime Minister recognize that home heat is a necessity? Does he recognize that home utilities are not a luxury? Will the Prime Minister withdraw this regressive tax—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put several questions.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask the hon. member to go back to the technical papers. Again he is presenting a picture which has nothing to do with the tax reform we are introducing.

He fails to understand that together with the reform comes a credit system which will ensure that lower-income people are fully protected from the impact of our taxes.

He fails to understand that the present inputs paid by various companies which provide the services he was referring to will be able to deduct the present tax which is a silent killer of jobs.

When he goes around telling Canadians about his conception of a disaster he should make the effort to inform them honestly.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question was just to inform them of the reality in the taxation system.

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Yesterday in the House the minister said: "John Bulloch agrees that we should be moving away from the existing sales tax". In fact, what Mr. Bulloch said yesterday was that the GST chaos will disadvantage small independent retailers, calling it an impossible situation and stating that business will be absolutely furious and frustrated.

Will the minister agree with the 400,000 members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business that the GST is a nightmare, not workable, places small retailers at a disadvantage and should be withdrawn?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman reads John Bulloch he should read him throughout. He will find out that Mr. Bulloch agrees with the tax.

What he does not agree with is the fact that we have not been able to provide a national sales tax, not because we failed to try, we are still working on that.

He talks about 11 different rates in Canada. Canadians do not live at once in 10 different provinces. They may have to tackle two rates.

Underlying these remarks is a feeling that our small business community is unable to adapt to reform. I come from a small business family. I can tell you that they can very well adapt to these kinds of reforms.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York Centre, a single question.

WAR CRIMINALS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Yesterday I asked the minister about Canadian efforts to see justice done in the case of SS Officer Wilhelm Mohnke who lives in West Germany and who according to available eye witnesses murdered dozens of Canadian POWs after Normandy.

The minister said that there was an ongoing investigation in her department and that Canada had been in touch with West Germany. It now appears that West Germany closed its file on this matter in 1976 and that Canada has never asked that the file be reopened.

I want to ask the minister what she was talking about yesterday. Is she prepared to make representations needed to the West German government to take Canada's grievance seriously?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would know better than I what occurred between 1976 and 1984 on this file, because I believe he had some responsibility for it.

I will simply repeat what I said yesterday in the House, which is that there is an ongoing investigation in Canada and appropriate efforts are being made to bring the results of that investigation to the West German authorities.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the usual Thursday afternoon question to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and ask him about his plans for the business of the House. Second, I have a very important question I would like the government to answer, and I see the Prime Minister is in the House. I would be grateful for his attention.

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, but it also concerns the Prime Minister. We have not had a deputy speaker of the House for nearly a month and I would like to ask the government what it intends to do about filling this position and what the procedure will be. Will there be an election at large, as is the case for the Speaker or are there other procedures? Why the delay? Why don't we have a deputy speaker?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will be an opposition day. Monday will be the last day of debate on second reading of Bill C-65, the borrowing authority bill. Tuesday we start the report stage of Bill C-62, the GST bill. As for the rest of the week, we shall see.

[English]

In terms of the question respecting the Deputy Speaker, it will be happening very soon and it will be done in the way prescribed in the McGrath commission report. As we know, the recommendation was that the position of Speaker be elected and the other positions be appointed in the traditional manner. That will happen and happen very soon.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders also say "forthwith". That means immediately. We have been very patient with the government. They know that, and I think they will recognize that we have accepted once in the absence of Mr. Speaker that the replacement for the Speaker not be the Deputy Speaker. That was a concession the opposition made.

We will not continue to wait until the government makes up its mind as to how we are going to cope with that problem. It may be a difficult solution to a difficult problem. Why is the government not giving us a solution to the problem? Just put someone up for election and then we will proceed as we usually do.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that will happen forthwith. I am not sure why the hon. member is so exercised. If someone should be exercised perhaps the present occupants of the chair should be, bearing in mind their numbers, and we appreciate that.

The House leader of the Liberal Party will recognize that there is no Machiavellian scheme afoot to try to make life miserable for the opposition or any other such thing. There is in fact a busy schedule and very soon the concerns of the hon. member will be met.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could say to the hon. House leader that the sooner the better.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of House business, I should also like to ask the government House leader about Bill C-61, an amendment to the Divorce Act, which was of great interest to the former Minister of Justice and is of great interest to me as well.

The legislation has now been through committee and it has been reported. I wonder if the minister might be prepared to call it at an early date.

Mr. Andre: Indeed I have a considerable list of important legislation including that, which I am most anxious to get before the House and completed and in place. I hope he will make representations to his colleagues, the House leader and the deputy House leader of the Liberal Party, as well as the New Democrats, so we might reach some agreement between us on how to proceed in an expeditious and effective fashion.

Mr. Gauthier: I just heard the Minister of Transport saying: "I thought you were the House leader for the Liberals". I am, Mr. Speaker. I want to remind the former House leader that in those days at least we knew where we were going. Now we do not.

We were told this week that Bill C-26 would be called on Friday. Now we learn at 3.05 p.m. that it is not going to be Bill C-26; it is going to be an opposition day. We cannot operate this House in that manner. Either this House leader gets his act together and tells us what the agenda is for the next week, or he tells us every day what the business of the House will be the next day. That way we might at least have some knowledge of what we are going to be looking at. I find it difficult to have a negotiating period on Tuesdays and have it changed on Thursdays.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy for that. I realize that when people make plans for Fridays, as we did last week, and have those changed at the last minute—

Mr. Gauthier: That was not my fault; that was your own doing.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member is correct in saying that it was not his fault. This is not some sort of get even situation. It is simply a case of being unable to get assurances that in fact we would be able to proceed expeditiously with that bill. Had we had those assurances, we could do it, but without those assurances we are in a situation of again having to ask people to break their plans, to cancel engagements, to come back and so on to be here in order not to be bush-whacked, as it were, by dilatory motions and so on.

I regret that we have to do it that way. I again say that it is not my preference. I would much rather we sat down and negotiated a situation, and people kept to their word. We have not been able to reach that stage. I am willing to continue to try and I think the hon. member is. Between the two of us, maybe we can convince the third party to co-operate, and we could all serve our country a lot more effectively.

PRIVILEGE

REMOVAL OF AT AND EAST PROGRAM—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On February 12, 1990, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre rose claiming that a contempt of Parliament may have been committed. The hon. member explained that in its budget of April 27, 1989 the government announced the elimination of the "at and east" grain and flour subsidy program, effective July 15, 1989.

The cancellation of this program took place prior to the adoption of any legislation by Parliament, which would have repealed Section 281 of the Railway Act, the statute which first established this program.

This action, the hon. member contends, is a contempt of Parliament and impedes the House from giving proper consideration to the bill presently before it at second reading, since the proposed objective of the bill is already a fait accompli.

[Translation]

The next day, the Chair heard further argument on this point and wishes to thank the hon. members for Kingston and the Islands, Regina—Lumsden and Peace River who made perceptive and eloquent interventions. The Chair reserved on the matter and stated it would come back at a later date to render its decision. The Chair is now prepared to deliver that decision.

[English]

Basically the issue which the Chair must decide is whether or not the government has committed a contempt of Parliament by eliminating the "at and east" program, prior to the adoption of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies). The proposed legislation seeks to amend section 281 of the Railway Act, which would allow the railways to charge commercial rates, effective July 16, 1989.

The removal of the "at and east" program was part of the budget measures announced by the government on April 27, 1989. As all hon. members realize, budgets do not deal only with the raising of revenues. They also enunciate the fiscal, economic and even social policies of the government. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre did make a distinction between retroactive tax legislation emanating from a budget and legislation proposing to end a specific program.

• (1510)

With regard to the "at and east" program, the general practices of the House relating to budgets appear to have been applied. An announcement was included in the budget statement, the government made it effective shortly thereafter, and enabling legislation, namely Bill C-26, was introduced. Bill C-26 was read a first time on June 16, 1989 and has been debated at second reading on February 12 and on February 20, 1990.

The essence of the matter raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre is that the government announced May 4, 1989: "That the 'at and east' program would be eliminated effective July 15, 1989," and that today, some eight months later, Parliament has not yet passed the legislation to this effect.

[Translation]

In his presentation, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands recalled at some length similar interventions made in 1971 by then-members of the opposition who were vigorously protesting the withholding of wheat payments in anticipation of the repeal of the Temporary Reserves Act which provided for such payments. The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden reminded the House of the eventual legal outcome of that 1971 situation in the Federal Court of Canada.

[English]

The Chair has been struck by the parallels between the 1971 wheat payment controversy and the situation before us relating to the "at and east" program. Indeed Speaker Lamoureux's decision is as illuminating today as it was then, for then as now the issue of whether the government is in violation of the law is not a question for the Chair to decide.

As Speaker Lamoureux explained on September 13, 1971, at page 7740 of Hansard:

> Whether the government has an obligation under the terms of the existing law to make certain payments is not a question for the Chair to decide.
>
> The crux of the whole matter, as I understand it, is that the government is withholding payments authorized by an existing statute until a new statute has been adopted. Either what the government is doing is or is not contemplated, or anticipated, or authorized by the existing statute. Its action may well be subject to censure, but that would be a decision for the House to take.
> Whether it is in order to use this method to induce the adoption of alternative government legislation can again be the subject of debate, but I suggest that this should not be done within the framework of the debate on a question of privilege.

In assessing the case before us today, the Chair must be solely concerned with the issue of whether or not the action of the government constitutes a contempt of Parliament by impeding the House from properly considering Bill C-26. A careful review of the situation leads me to conclude that the termination of the program was an administrative decision made by the executive.

The legality of such a decision is another question, but the decision of the government as such does not in any way impede the House from considering Bill C-26.

[Translation]

Nevertheless, that is not to say that this is a simple matter. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre has raised an issue of continuing concern: namely the implications of the practice whereby an initiative is implemented or a program terminated prior to the passage by Parliament of enabling legislation.

[English]

There can be little doubt that in having recourse to this approach a government must be ever mindful that Parliament makes the ultimate decision on the legislation before it. I have noted in the correspondence provided to me by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre that the Ministry of Transport has been careful to advise the railway companies of the consequences if Parliament chooses not to approve this legislation and stresses the fact that it is still before the House.

The Chair agrees with the ruling of Speaker Lamoureux in 1971 and therefore finds that this case does not fall within the ambit of privilege or contempt. The hon. member may well have a founded grievance in law, which he may wish to pursue in another place.

I commend the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre for drawing this important issue to the attention of the Chair and of the House. I also want to compliment him on the succinct and careful argument that he presented. I thank all other hon. members who participated in the decision for their contributions.

POINT OF ORDER

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the House agreed to strike a committee to look into the proposals by Premier McKenna. Time is very critical. I wonder if I could ask the government House leader whether the committee looking into Premier McKenna's proposals has been struck, when it will meet, and whether there have been consultations regarding the person who will chair that committee.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been some casual consultations.

According to the motion, as the hon. member will know, that committee will be struck by the striking committee of this House, which I understand will be meeting this afternoon to make those decisions and then a chairman will be elected from among those. Those conversations can be had there frankly with the representatives of each party in the same manner as we have done for any other committees of this House.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I believe the order adopted by this House on Tuesday specifies that within three days the striking committee must report. It is only the second day today, so I take it we have another day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-65

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre:

> That in relation to Bill C-65, an Act to provide Borrowing Authority, not more than one additional day shall be alloted to the further consideration of the second reading stage and,
> That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on such day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order, and in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of the second reading stage shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today, Bill C-65, would authorize the Conservative government to borrow $25 billion. That is 25 thousand million we are being asked to put in the hands of some totally irresponsible people. Since the last election in 1988, this government has acted totally irresponsibly, first of all on the subject of unemployment insurance; second, on VIA Rail; third, on the GST they are getting ready to impose on Canadians. Those are some of the reasons why we in the Liberal Party cannot afford to let this government go to the financial markets for $25 billion.

I truly deplore the attitude of this government which seems to be running our country on an ad hoc basis. They have completely lost control of public spending, Mr. Speaker. They are cutting right, left and centre, and they are totally oblivious to the impact of these cuts. They want to introduce new taxes without prior agreement with the provinces. They want to impose a new tax across Canada while ignoring our information on the market, inflation, and the new costs this will entail for Canadian citizens. Mr. Speaker, when a government has only 17 per cent of public support, it should be more anxious to consult, especially with the official opposition and in fact with the whole opposition.

Mr. Speaker, the government will very shortly impose closure on this bill as it has been doing recently on a number of bills. The government seems to want to muzzle the opposition because it no longer knows what it is doing.

Mr. Speaker, let me give you a few examples. Near the National Capital region, in my riding, on the other side of the Ottawa River, only a year ago Northern Telecom was closed. This, of course, was blamed on free trade.

• (1520)

Just recently, we learned that Catelli would continue operations in Montreal provided employees accepted large wage cuts. Otherwise, it would shut down and go to the United States. Nearer here, Les Placages de l'Outaouais just signed a new collective agreement yesterday or the day before allowing the company to hire non-unionized workers for $6 an hour to replace employees who used to earn $10 an hour. They said in fact, "Take it or we close down!" Mr. Speaker, is that what the Prime Minister means when he tells us that 200,000 jobs were created last year, while in the National Capital Region and especially in our area, they boast about cutting the Public Service by 15 per cent over the last four years, they almost boast about closing down businesses—

I just spoke about Northern Telecom. I could tell you about Les Boiseries de l'Outaouais; the Federal Business Development Bank refused to lend it money to keep it going. We could talk about the Museum of Civilization for which the government, through the National Capital Commission, last year, just a few months ago, announced major cuts. That project, including the fountains costing $500,000, has still not been finished.

We remember all the patronage surrounding the construction of the Museum of Civilization, which originally was to cost $80 million and is now up to $260 million. That is where we should look, instead of imposing new taxes, continually sticking it to Canadians and making them bear the burden of mismanagement. That is where we should look!

The other day, I was examining the famous case of Transport Canada, and I want to look into it more closely soon. Last year the federal government decided to renew the lease at Place de Ville owned by Campeau Corporation. We know it will have to pay to remove the asbestos inside this building. The costs are estimated at some $100 million. A few weeks ago I was told that, should the government stay in its current location in Place de Ville where it faces major expenditures, after 20 years it will have paid over $900 million more than if it had awarded the contract last year to the lowest bidder who happened to be from the Outaouais. This is another example of mismanagement by this government that operates from day to day.

There were recent reports on CKCH, a local radio station, and in Le Droit that Canada Post was about to make major cuts in the Outaouais side of the National Capital Region and to eliminate sorting jobs in Hull, Aylmer and Gatineau. Cutting jobs left and right will not lead to economic recovery.

We, in the Liberal opposition, have given the government suggestions we consider realistic. There is a 5 per cent gap between the current interest rates set by the Bank of Canada and the American rates. How can Canadian businesses be competitive when our interest rates are so high and when the consumer always ends up paying for the damage?

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Opposition has presented you and the Government with solutions to try and reduce the current economic trend that is leading inevitably to a recession.

The government today is asking for authority to borrow $ 25 billion, which is 25 thousand million, Mr. Speaker! In order to do what? To go on managing on a daily basis as they are now doing, by restricting debate because it is quite possible that in a few moments we will be denied the opportunity to further discuss the matter.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that will not work. The Liberal Opposition no longer can help or let this government rush us along the road to recession and increased inflation with the coming imposition of the For all those reasons and more, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Opposition will flatly refuse to endorse any measure this government intends to force upon the Canadian people.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, and I insist on this because according to recent polls—and as we know public opinion polls, in Canada are accurate to a few percentage points—hardly 17 per cent of the Canadian people now approve of this government. Mr. Speaker, I believe this government is routed. This government whom the people no longer trust to lead them is preparing once more to introduce new taxes under the pretext of reducing the debt, reducing the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Canadian people just as the Official Opposition no longer believe in this government's actions, and we cannot support Bill C–65 which would grant this government authority to borrow $ 25 billion.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I understand that I am debating the time allocation motion rather than Bill C–65 itself. The object of this time allocation motion is to limit debate on a bill that authorizes the government to borrow $25.5 billion on the credit of the people of Canada at interest rates that as of today have increased substantially.

My concern is that this government is acting in a more and more authoritarian manner and is dealing with this House of Commons in a more and more rigorous and dictatorial manner by ramming each and every piece of legislation through this House. As our House leader pointed out this morning, in the last 11 months this government has used closure or time allocation 15 times, more than any previous time in history. Since its term in office in the last six years it has used closure 30 times.

This government is abusing the House of Commons and abusing the rights and privileges of the members of the House of Commons by denying them the right to debate, in particular, the most important legislation coming into this House. This piece of legislation is extremely important.

The government is asking the opposition to give it carte blanche to borrow something like $25.5 billion on the credit of the people of Canada. That simply cannot be done after a mere four hours debate in the House of Commons.

The government has not been entirely honest with the members of this House as to what this money is going to be spent on.

• (1530)

I recall that when I served in another legislature, in a previous life, that it was almost natural for the government to bring in a borrowing authority bill each year. It would give it the right to borrow $1 billion, $2 billion or $3 billion and did not provide even a schedule of the government's borrowing plans and what it planned to spend this money on. We certainly have not seen a schedule tabled in the House as a part of this bill. When we hear the Conservative members speak on this piece of legislation, we do not hear anything as to what the government's plans are in respect of the $25.5 billion that it is borrowing under the authority granted in this bill.

This is the highest level of borrowing authority ever sought from the House of Commons by any government. This is a government that makes a pretence of being fiscally responsible and of being responsible with the public's money. Yet, here it is, on the floor of the House, borrowing the greatest amount that any government has ever come to the House of Commons to seek authority to borrow, without providing a shred of useful information to the members of the House and to the people of Canada, through the members of the House, as to how the money is going to be spent and what it is going to do to benefit the people of Canada.

How can the government expect us to accept a time allocation motion, after four hours debate, on a bill to borrow $25.5 billion? I just cannot understand the government's attitude in this case.

A member from Calgary stood up this morning and told us that this borrowing authority is required to handle social programs. He talked about the family allowance system, the payments to veterans, the old age pensions and supplements. But we were told by an earlier Conservative speaker that the programs of the government are already covered by tax revenues and that in fact the government has a surplus of tax revenues over program expenditures. So, it does not really need this borrowing authority to cover the programs of government. We would like to know precisely what this $25.5 billion is for.

When I sat in that other legislature and we refused to vote in support of this type of bill, the government was forced to come in with a schedule showing what it intended to spend that money on. How can we grant authority to borrow $25.5 billion at the government's discretion, without knowing what the government is going to spend that money on? That is not the duty of a responsible member of Parliament, and we certainly have no intention of doing that.

This bill, which involves $25.5 billion, has been debated for four hours. That is about $6.5 billion per hour and the government is asking us to vote for it without any information at all as to how the money is to be spent. It would be irresponsible for members on this side of the House and members of the House on the opposite side to vote that much authority and credit to the government, at the expense of the people of Canada, without the government telling us what the money is going to be spent on.

We have had different stories from the other side of the House. Some have said it is for social programs. That is completely false because even the Minister of Finance said that the tax revenues of the country cover those social programs. Some have said it is for other reasons, but we simply have not got the accurate information from the government as to what it is going to be spent on. What we need is far more honesty from the government than we have had up to this point if we are going to be expected to support this motion for time allocation, which we do not, and if we are expected to support this borrowing authority, which we cannot as responsible members of the House.

The government acts along the pattern established by Ronald Reagan. It talks lean and mean; it talks about cutting back expenditures; it talks about cutting back debt; and it talks about keeping taxes in line. Yet, the government has been the worst government in history in terms of running up the debt of the country, increasing taxes, and its spending priorities. The government has been one of the worst governments in history. We cannot really be expected, when we see the government following the pattern of Ronald Reagan in the United States who was supposed to be the great budget cutter and the great deficit cutter. In fact, he ran up the biggest deficits in the history of the United States, the biggest foreign debt in the history of the United States and made that country the largest debtor country on earth. The Tories here are doing precisely the same thing.

We heard one of the members who spoke this morning say that when the Tories took over the Liberals had run up $160 billion in our national debt. Various speakers on the Tory side then indicated that the debt is now $294 billion, $350 billion, and one person on the opposite side of the House even suggested that the debt is now $380 billion.

This is a government that has increased the debt in six years by more than the debt that all of the governments since Confederation ran up between 1867 and 1984. How can you call that a responsible government? How can you call that a government that is fiscally responsible and that manages the funds of the people of Canada in a fiscally responsible way? This is the government that at the last election called on the electors of Canada and suggested that it was the competent management team. When that program fell flat because people in Canada simply did not believe it, it tried another election strategy. It is definitely not the competent management team. For a team like this to come to the opposition in the House after four hour's debate and ask us to give it the authority to borrow and to spend $25.5 billion, without a shred of evidence as to what they are going to spend it on, is absolutely irresponsible on the part of the government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you are asking me to wind up my remarks. I simply want to say that we have no intention of supporting the time allocation and that is the position of this party.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking today on this time allocation motion and I am going to say categorically, shame on the government. This is the thirty-fifth time, I believe, that we have had stifled democracy. Democracy, to the gentlemen and ladies from across the way, is allowing people to speak their minds, allowing them the benefit of listening to them, and also of speaking to them and explaining to them what is happening.

In the eyes of the government, democracy is "do it my way, or the highway". I have news for them. Maybe it should go back to take a lesson in political science. I thought democracy was everyone having a chance to be free and to speak their minds without any fear of being stopped. This is a stifling of democracy. Why? Because the government wants permission to borrow $25.5 billion more without any explanations whatsoever. It says: "Trust me, and I will do great things for you."

The recent polls have told us that people of Canada do not believe the government. They are not trusting the government. They are wanting answers, concrete answers. What will it do with this $25.5 billion? Why does it have to borrow $25.5 billion?

Today we know the interest rates are up, and tomorrow the government will tell us: "We have a larger deficit than was expected because we did not expect the interest rates to go up so high." Why will it not allow us the benefit of judging whether or not the $25.5 billion that it wants is rooted in fact or in just plain needing the money and wanting to have a slush fund.

We all understand that borrowing authority means going to the banks and they give a credit limit. But when governments get that credit limit, it is used up. How many times have we heard of somebody not asking for a higher credit limit, especially when it is government? But tomorrow, you and I and everyone else is going to hear about how expensive it is to borrow that money. Not only is it expensive to borrow that money, but the government is going to bring in a goods and services tax which will create inflation and Mr. Crow will insist on holding tight on his high interest policy. Again, the long term debt will increase because interest rates are higher. When will the government stop hiding, come forward and do something positive for the Canadian people? Tell us, if the government really needs the $25 billion and it is legitimate, why not tell us? Why impose closure?

I have a very difficult time with closure all the time. To me, closure says that the government is anxious about its popularity. It thinks that the less we speak about it, the more quickly it will go away. Well, things do not go away. The people of Canada live today, watch television, read newspapers, and they are better educated and concerned. They will not believe the fairy tale stories any more. No one believes that we will happy tomorrow, that the GST will solve all our problems, or, for that matter, that this past budget has solved all our problems.

Everyone understands that when the burden is passed on to the next level of government, that level has very little choice. It has either to raise taxes or to pass it down. The municipalities have no choice. They go to their ratepayers and increase taxes. Those people understand the cost of paying their water rates and their taxes when they increase.

There are a large number of people today facing very, very difficult years ahead. They are living on fixed incomes. Municipal taxes are increasing, water rates are increasing and now heating bills will increase because the GST will impose a terribly harsh burden on hydro bills and gas bills.

Has the government listened to people when they have said: "Listen, we cannot afford to pay the 12 per cent more"? Absolutely not. The government turns a deaf ear and wants to know what it will do. Because some people own big houses and it would not want them to get a break on their heating bills. The government is very willing to give a break to the large corporations. The large corporation is going to get a tax rebate on its heating bill, but the average homeowner is not going to get that break.

If one works for a large corporation and has an expense account, one will be able to go to the Dome, rent a room, have a private party and the company will be able to claim tax input credits. Everything will be all rosy for those people because they are big business. Big business is great and we have to keep encouraging it. We have to give them all the breaks. What about the little guy at the bottom who pays the tune? He is the one who has to pay the bill and he only has two pockets. It is the municipal pocket, the income tax pocket, the GST pocket, or the sales tax pocket, but he only brings in so much money. When the pocket is empty, it is empty.

I implore members of the government to have some consideration and to take the plugs out their ears. The people of Canada are imploring them. It is their future, their country. Would they please stop stifling debate? Would they please start explaining to people? Not only does the government stifle debate, but it does not explain to people what it is doing. Be honest, be upfront. Tell people: "This is what I have to do". It may not be the best thing in the world for you, but I think the people of Canada can understand that there are times when it is necessary to borrow money. But tell us why.

Mr. Speaker, if your wife went out and borrowed money, I would think that you would want to know why. You would want to know what the heck she was going to spend the money on. It would have to be good. It is only normal. I see you agreeing that, yes, she had better. Well, that is what I am saying to the government. This government has to tell me why it is borrowing that money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 3:45 p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), have expired.

[Translation]

Accordingly, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, although I did not hear the call of my name, I understand that I was incorrectly named as one of the other members, Mr. Axworthy. I would just like it verified that I in fact stood for the count.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You are recorded with the nays.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 28 consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are reverting to the regular routine which is PC, Liberal, PC, Liberal, PC, NDP. The first speaker will be the hon. member for Saint-Jean.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the government has tackled the national debt issue and will continue to introduce economic policies designed to boost Canada's economic growth.

Of course we have to admit that as a nation we live in an ever more competitive and rapidly changing world. If Canadians are to survive in such a competitive environment, they need a dynamic and flexible economy which can react quickly and efficiently to new challenges and new opportunities, a more open economy which is better atuned to markets where our best men and women can compete.

For five years now the government has been busy getting our economy ready to face international competition. Piece by piece we have erected better structures to promote economic growth and job creation.

Mr. Speaker, a number of components are already in place. The Canada-U.S. free trade agreement opens up new avenues for Canadians seeking to do business on world markets and will eventually translate into a permanent 3.5 per cent increase in economic productivity and the creation of jobs right across the country.

Deregulating the energy and transport industries and shelving the National Energy Program enabled the governement to withdraw from key sectors of our economy.

The income tax reform led to lower tax rates and the elimination of preferential treatment and tax loopholes.

• (1620)

It has led to higher economic production by increasing incentives to work, save and invest.

The Labour For a Development Strategy will result in improved labour force skills and flexibility. Better training helps Canadians adjust to new and changing technologies. This means better jobs for Canadian workers.

The privatization of Crown corporations helps strengthen economic efficiency and reduce the deficit. The initiatives we have taken to date have helped improve to the financial position of many Crown corporations. Replacing the existing manufacturer sales tax by the goods and services tax will strengthen competitiveness, help reduce the deficit and implement a fairer sales tax system. This is a necessary move to replace a tax that destroys jobs, makes our exports less competitive and favours foreign imports over Canadian manufactured goods, at a cost of $9 billion in production loss. It is needed in order to replace a frail and unreliable tax by a secure source of revenues.

Mr. Speaker, those initiatives will increase our competitiveness and our economic potential. They encourage private enterprise, eliminate barriers to economic growth, ensure access to markets, increase investments and efficiency. Taken together, they will raise the potential for sustainable growth by some 2 3/4 to more than 3 1/4 percent a year on average, which in turn will mean more jobs for Canadians. Over five years, this will represent a gain of some $2,500 for a family of four.

Mr. Speaker, by putting forward economic policies that strengthen our competitiveness and our economic potential, we are not only building a safe and promising future on a solid foundation, but we are also reducing the deficit, thereby giving a responsible government the financial flexibility needed to maintain our worthwile services and meet new challenges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Comox—Alberni on debate. Is the hon. member going to take 10 minutes or 20 minutes?

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I was going to take the full 20 minutes. Were you going to permit questions?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will permit a question or a comment if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member if he would not agree that the government has created a very serious state by its financial mismanagement of the Canadian economy. We have a request for borrowing an astronomical sum of money without any real justification because the government has failed to do anything to control its bad spending habits.

As members of this House we are being asked to agree with this really outrageous bill to authorize the government to spend this money.

One of the things that surprises me is that the Minister of Finance rants and raves in this House about what a wonderful job the Governor of the Bank of Canada is doing. He says he has great confidence in the Governor. The Governor has indicated that he will wrestle inflation to the ground. He is going to bring the inflation rate down to zero per cent.

The extraordinary thing is if the government genuinely believes that the inflation rate will drop to zero per cent over the next five years, it will continue to issue long-term bonds at 11 per cent. Everyone knows that the inflation rate in this country is between 4 per cent and 5 per cent and that interest has two purposes—to compensate the person who borrows the money for the loss of value of the money through inflation and to pay a fee for the use of the money.

The clear implication here is that the loss of value is 4 per cent or 5 per cent which the Governor says he will reduce to zero through his Draconian and vicious policies that affect every Canadian and that we condemn roundly in the House, except himself, of course, with his 36 per cent increase over the last three years. This is a generous increase by any standards especially when you start with a nice plump salary.

The government says it believes the Governor and is convinced that the Governor will reduce the inflation rate to zero. But the government is still paying 11 per cent on its long term money. Why? The Minister of Finance, if he believes as he says he does, that the Governor will reduce the rate to zero, should not issue any long term bonds. He would be crazy to do that because in another three years when the rate is down to zero he could issue the same bonds at 5 per cent or 6 per cent.

Instead of that, the minister is issuing bonds willy-nilly at 11 per cent. Why? Is it because he does not believe the Governor or is it because he does not believe what he himself is doing? Does he believe his policies will keep the inflation rate up at 5 per cent or 6 per cent in spite of the Governor's interest rates? Is the minister working at cross purposes with the Governor?

I invite the hon. member, who I know has discussed this matter extensively with the Minister of Finance in caucus and presumably in private conferences, will want to comment on the way the Minister of Finance is gouging and screwing Canadians with both high interest rates, which he and the Governor have joined up to do, and with the high taxes that the minister has proposed continuously in his budgets.

I ask the hon. member to comment on the position of the Governor because the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have got together with the Governor and said: "Look, we'll give you a little more money, now you take the rap for the high interest rates, and away we go. We'll give you a 30 per cent increase or 36 per cent increase or whatever it is"—it may be more, it might be 60 per cent, we don't know—"in the meantime you help yourself to some extra dough and hike those rates and do your duty, but you take the flak for it. We are going to blame it on you as Governor of the bank and let you take the rap".

Is that what is going on? Has the member discussed those matters with the Minister of Finance? Could he perhaps let us into his confidence and tell us what answers the minister gave him to answer for the atrocious way in which he is running the economy of this country?

Mr. Couture: Mr. Speaker, there were many questions but I will try to answer them one after the other.

[Translation]

First, Mr. Speaker, they talked about overall management. I would like the hon. member opposite to say which of the following governments is better: the Liberal government which from 1980 to 1984 raised government expenditures at an average rate of 14 per cent in those four years or the one which from 1984 to 1988 increased expenditures by 3.6 per cent and from 1988 to date, expenditures increases are never to exceed 3.2 per cent.

In 1984, we were left with a $38.3-billion deficit, which we were able to reduce to $28.1 billion in 1988 by cutting government spending. That shows the government's overall management. I think that if you compare the two, we are far, far ahead of you all.

As for monetary policy, as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, I had the opportunity to meet Mr. Crow many times. I must tell you that in a country as large as ours, with such regional variations, it is clear that we absolutely must have a monetary policy to control inflation. We cannot go back to what we went through in 1980, 1981 and 1982, with interest rates over 20 per cent. We must control them. The one and only way we can control them is monetary policy and I think that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is doing an absolutely impeccable job of keeping inflation under acceptable control.

As for Mr. Crow's salary, everyone has talked enough about it here in the House; I do not see the need to add even a very short comment about it.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a few quotes to my colleague across the way. I know it is unfair to do this but who is in favour of fairness when you are dealing with the Tories. Mr. Speaker, you may recognize who this is: "The inflation rate in the market-place, the non-government controlled part of the economy, is between 5 and 6 per cent. The current interest rate at 13 per cent or 14 per cent is simply too high".

I want my colleague across to guess who said that. I have another here. This one is dated March 13, 1984: "It does not make sense to all of us to have this situation in Canada where interest rates are allowed to rise".

This one is from May 1, 1984: "The only response the minister has is to increase interest rates. That in itself has led to further weaknesses in the already weakening economy over the past six months".

I want my colleague to guess who that is and without keeping the House and all Canadians in suspense too long, those comments were made by the member for Etobicoke Centre on December 13, 1982, March 13, 1984 and May 1, 1984. I would like to invite comments from my colleague across the aisle.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on what happened here in 1984, because I wasn't here. I was elected on November 21st. But there is one thing that I can tell you people across the way: in a relatively short time, you succeeded in making a morass of our economy. Since 1984, there is a government who takes care of economic details and who is doing an impeccable job in correcting the situation—

An hon. member: "Impeccable"?

Mr. Couture: Yes sir. Considering the mess you left us in 1984, I think that the current statistics give us good reason to be proud of our administration. And obviously, three, four or five years are not enough to correct 12 years of financial neglect. Some say that in 1994—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry but the question and comment period is over.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the first question that I want to ask is why I cannot support this government's borrowing bill. Before I begin the address I want to make one particularly important point. If one looks at the actions of a person, one can then judge from those actions the kinds of values and beliefs that are in operation.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I will continue my debate. I was saying that I wanted to explore with my colleagues the actions of government and attempt to identify, if you will, the values and beliefs that drive its decisions.

If one looks at a person's decisions and the actions he takes, I think it is quite possible to have a sense of his priorities, of what he holds important. I want examine the general budgetary and financial policies of the of the government in order to understand its values and beliefs.

Let us look at some of the cuts in programs, starting with health. The government said that it would not change the formula before it became the government. But in 1986 it cut it by 2 per cent; and in 1989-90 by another per cent; and it froze it for two years. Now who was affected by those kinds of decisions?

The elderly, of course, because they need more health care generally. The sick, obviously. The handicapped. They are the ones who are in need. So what does that say about a government which undertakes those kinds of decisions? It does not make a very positive comment.

Let us look at another reduction; education. Again, the government was not going to change the formula. That is what it said publicly. It was changed in 1986 by 2 per cent; again by 1 per cent in 1989-90; frozen for two years. Who was affected? The young men and women who want to become educated, trained and devote themselves to this country.

There is training and retraining. According to the Canada-U.S. trade deal, we were to have the finest training programs in the world. What happened? There have been reductions all along the way. There have been no adjustments for growth, no adjustments for new programs. Not only were they reduced, they were transferred and put on the backs of the workers and employers. Who will pay for that? The workers, employers and the unemployed.

Who is going to be affected negatively? The unemployed, the people who need help, the workers, those who are called upon to retrain because of the massive changes in our society. One can see this government's values, beliefs, and priorities by examining its actions.

Let us look at literacy. We have in this country roughly five million functionally illiterate Canadians, people who do not read or write well enough to be able to give as much to this society as they would or withdraw from it what they could. It is costing Canada perhaps $10 billion to $11 billion per year.

The government responds by spending $4.50 a day. What does that say about the government in terms of its values, beliefs and priorities? It suggests a great deal of cynicism, because with $4.50 per day per individual, what can you possibly do?

Let us look at student aid. There have been no changes in criteria since 1984. The cost of living has gone up significantly since then and the cost of education has gone up even higher and more quickly than the regular cost of living.

What has been done? Not only have there been no increases, an administrative fee of 3 per cent has been added on. What is the logic behind adding an administrative fee of 3 per cent to those who need money, to those who have to borrow in order to continue their education. It seems to me that that is totally contradictory to what ought to be done. I mean if you are poor, you ought not to have to pay more in order to pursue an education and a career.

Let us look at research and development. You will recall that the government was going to double the investment. It is roughly half. It has slipped since 1984. We were told to factor out the military. I looked at that because the minister tried to make that point in the House the other day. I looked at the situation and verified that we would still be in sixth place. So let us cut out the corn.

Who is affected? All of Canada. All Canadians are affected by the breaking of that promise. Who is affected mostly? Our young men and women, some of our brightest, who contribute most to this country. All of industry, all of society will be affected negatively by the government's actions.

Quite apart from all of those reductions and quite apart from what it says about the beliefs and the values and the priorities, let us look at what else the government has imposed. The costs of the goods and services tax, education, and the postal subsidies will be absorbed. That means that people will be penalized even more. Again our young men and women will have to pay the price. If they have to pay the price and they cannot continue to develop, it will be Canadians and Canada who will suffer.

As a result of this freeze that has been imposed by this government over the next two years, there will be an absorption of roughly 10 per cent. The governments own papers predicted that inflation will be roughly 10 per cent over the next two years.

Many of us believe that is a rather conservative estimate, and that inflation will go much higher. But it will be at least 10 per cent. That means that young men and women who go to college and universities, who get into research and development, will have to absorb 10 per cent more costs over the next few years.

I have been following the hypothesis that if you look at an organizations actions, then you can get a sense of its values, a sense of its beliefs, a sense of its priorities.

Programs for aboriginal people have been cut. Their programs have been reduced. The aboriginal people are among the poorest of the poor in Canada. We often forget that we have between 3.5 million to 5 million poor people, most of whom are women, one million of whom are children. We have more food banks than we have McDonald's hamburger restaurants.

Who else has been cut? The multicultural groups, our new Canadians, those people who are hoping to contribute more to this country while preserving what they have and integrating it into the Canadian fabric. Women's groups have been cut. Women have just started to make some inroads, some gains in education and in the workforce. What happens? The moment they start to make some advances their programs are cut, reduced, pushed back. What does that say about the government?

What about the clawback that has affected seniors? Remember that the government tried to deindex and seniors were able to hold it off. Then it came back with this clawback, which is in effect the same thing.

What else was there? The family allowance. That is a direct attack on the families.

If you look at the tax increases, you see that there were 31 tax increases. The goods and services tax will be number 32. Who is affected? Look at the statistics. The poor. Just consider the people who make $25,000 a year and less. You will find that their taxes have increased by 60 per cent. Take the middle class defined as follows: two wage-earners, one earning $28,000 and the other $17,000. You will find that they are paying roughly $300 a month more in taxes than they were paying in 1984. What does that say about government? What do those actions say about its beliefs, its values, its priorities?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 10 minutes remaining in his debate, plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF HALIBUT

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should protect the halibut fishery off the British Columbia coast from overfishing and ensure adequate stock enhancement by all responsible countries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the terms of the International Halibut Fishery Commission govern the allocation and the security of this endangered species on the west coast. It is an example of the way in which the fisheries have been managed on both coasts by this government and by its predecessor. At the moment I am concerned and talking about the halibut off the west coast of British Columbia.

In recent years there has been a growing problem with respect to this halibut fishery, namely, that the U.S. troll operations operating out of Alaska have increased to the point that the very future of the fishery itself may well be threatened. This is not a new story about fisheries in Canada.

I refer to the information put forward by the International Pacific Halibut Commission which indicates quite dramatically the direction the catch limits on halibut are in fact going. There is a table put out by the commission called the "IPHC Staff Regulatory Proposals, 1989" in millions of pounds. Most of the material is about area 2: 2A in Washington, 2B in B.C., 2C, 3A, 3B and 4 in Alaska.

The 1988 catch limit totalled 74.15 million pounds. The 1989 staff recommendations were 64.65 million pounds. The projected future catch limits sets out the same story as we are hearing on the east coast with respect to cod: each year the catch limit is going down. For 1990 the total catch limit is 55.8 million pounds, and for 1991 it will be 47 million pounds.

The commission recognizes that the stocks are being depleted rapidly and is suggesting lower quotas year by year, rather than biting the bullet and making a significant reduction in one year in the hope that the stocks will rebuild.

These figures include the total recreational, treaty Indian and other commercial fisheries.

The origins of many of the problems that have led to the figures I have given can be traced to a 1980 treaty signed between Canada and the U.S. which prohibits the harvesting of halibut in U.S. waters by Canadian fishermen and vice versa. A system for division of the catch was based upon historical catch data held by the IPHC. In area 2, which is from Cape Spencer in northern B.C. to the State of Washington—a lot of water—the Canadian share was set at 60 per cent. The U.S. share was supposed to be 40 per cent of the halibut catch.

There is a chart available again from the same source, the IPHC, which shows that we have not been able to harvest 60 per cent of the total catch in any single year since these records have been kept. In 1984 we came close: between 58 per cent and 59 per cent of the total catch was harvested by B.C. fishermen. It went down to 51.72 per cent in 1985 and to 50 per cent in 1986. There was a bit of a recovery in 1987 when it went up to 51.13 per cent. It went down to 51.52 per cent in 1988 and to 49.7 per cent in 1989. In 1990 it is projected at 49.4 per cent. In 1991 it is projected at 49.2 per cent.

Each year the catch and the projections are going lower and lower. We are getting further and further away from the agreement that we would be able to harvest 60 per cent of the total catch.

One of the major concerns has been that any increase in effort in Alaska, which has been occurring, will seriously affect the harvesting sector in B.C. due to the fact that the migration of halibut from Alaskan waters is interrupted.

Since 1984 there has been a higher than normal abundance of halibut in the Alaskan 2C area. The Alaskan harvesting sector was able to justify an allocation higher than prescribed by the quota due to this abundance.

In 1989, with the halibut stock declining in the 2C area, the Canadian fishermen were still denied the 60 per cent allocation due to the declining stocks in total. The question immediately comes to mind: What is the situation with respect to the total halibut stock?

The viability of the nursery beds was once threatened by the presence of Japanese draggers. Once again this reminds me of what is happening on the east coast with respect to bottom fish stocks.

The U.S. and Canada jointly applied in the 1960s to force Japanese trollers to stop dragging on the more sensitive halibut habitat in the Bering Sea, long before the 200-mile limit ever became law in the late 1970s. The Japanese heavy bottom draggers were tearing up important rearing grounds, which meant they not only slaughtered younger generations of halibut that live to be 30 to 40 years old. but they also ruined feeding and spawning habitat for future generations. The Japanese had to be stopped to protect the species, and they finally were.

As I said, this is the story I kept hearing in Newfoundland and in the Atlantic areas generally about what could be one of the main problems with respect to the cod stocks in those areas.

The viability of the nursery beds were being threatened by the Japanese draggers. They have been expelled. They agreed to be expelled.

Now it is the U.S. dragger fleet that is operating. Regardless of whatever initiatives are taken by the U.S. to monitor activities on the nursery beds or other activities of the U.S. fleet, such as the observer program, the available data indicates that the stock is in serious trouble. According to a submission to the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries in April 1989, it is the same fleet which with the permission of the Alaskan authorities overfished the king crab stock to the point of extinction in the late 1970s to the early 1980s.

Incredibly the information provided by IPHC scientists is that 50 per cent of the damage done to the juvenile halibut stocks is being done on the nursery grounds by the U.S. dragger fleet. In spite of knowing what is the situation, there is a current construction program which will see put in place in the course of 1989 and 1990 an additional 62 new Alaskan factory trollers.

The by-catch by the U.S. trawlers has been estimated by the International Pacific Halibut Commission scientists to amount to 17 million pounds annually or 7 million more than the legal Canadian quota in the 2B area, which area extends from the U.S. border in the south to beyond central B.C. Again there is a problem with respect to the ability or the willingness of the U.S. regulators to restrict their activity.

• (1710)

There is also the question of the illegal Japanese market. If I may quote from the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union brief of April 1989, it states:

> Bob Alverson, the U.S. government appointee to the north Pacific Fisheries Council, was recently astonished to find that before the legal halibut fishery even commenced in May, the four million pound plus Japanese market for under 20 pound halibut has been filled. This illegal trade is supplied almost totally by the U.S. domestic troll fleet.

The United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union set out seven recommendations in its brief. They are that, first, Canada must act immediately to ensure that the U.S. establish regulations prohibiting U.S. trollers from dragging on the more sensitive halibut nursery and rearing grounds.

The second recommendation is that the Canadian government give all possible aid to appropriate private or government groups from Canada and the U.S. which are attempting to lower halibut by-catch limits dramatically in the Bering Sea downward from the current 5,300 tonne limit.

The third recommendation states that American authorities establish a 100 per cent observer program to regulate strictly the U.S. domestic troll fleet. Nothing less will be sufficient.

Fourth, a public investigation into the illegal supply of halibut to Japanese and/or other markets should take place and that corrective measures be taken immediately.

Fifth, the United States should compensate Canadian industry for any loss occurring as a result of illegal and/or negligent activity and covered by any such investigation.

The sixth is that the U.S. government move to establish penalties harsh enough to deter law-breakers and to bring them quickly to justice.

Finally, the UFAWU recommends that there is adherence to the Canada-U.S. halibut agreement calling for a Canadian share at the rate of 60 per cent of area 2 quotas.

It is a serious matter. The halibut stock is in danger from overfishing by the U.S. fleets.

The Canadian government, in its Speech from the Throne in April of last year, declared that one of its major concerns was the extent of overfishing which was destroying our domestic industry. This motion will provide all members the opportunity to express themselves in support of an initiative to combat overfishing.

The overfishing endangering the halibut fishery is but one more example of the neglect which has been occurring in respect of the future of this B.C. fishery, as well as of the Atlantic fishery.

I invite all members to support this motion and take this opportunity to demonstrate on this international issue that the Canadian government stands with the fishermen on the west coast in their fight to preserve this Canadian fishery resource for Canadians.

This is a resolution that I think all members of the House could support. It is not criticizing the government. It is asking the government to take action to save a Canadian resource for Canadians. I invite all members to support this motion.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on this topic which is very important to British Columbians. I appreciate the motion which has been brought forward by my colleague from Vancouver Island and how ably he presented the problem and the solutions for it.

I had the privilege in my misspent youth of working for B.C. Packers in the halibut industry. In spite of working with raw fish all day, we were still able to go home at night and enjoy a choice halibut steak. To me, halibut is one of the most delightful treats that we have on the west coast. I think that it is a product and a stock that we do need to look after.

What I would like to do is review the halibut industry on the west coast and how it has developed. My colleague has very ably done that to some degree.

Halibut is one of the oldest fisheries in the north Pacific. Well back in our native history we see references to the halibut and the significance that it had in the early days before the white man appeared on the west coast.

While salmon and herring are highly cyclical, halibut, as our colleague pointed out, live much longer. They are not as mobile, although they do range over the north Pacific. It was mentioned that these fish live to 30 or 40 years and arrive at several hundred pounds in that lifetime.

In spite of that we are seeing a decline in the numbers of halibut that we are catching on the west coast. I think the important thing is to pinpoint the reason for this. If indeed overfishing is a significant factor, then we should certainly be changing our quotas, and certainly be negotiating with the Americans to make sure that this very valuable stock is being cared for.

There is also some suggestion that the climatic changes and water temperature changes on the west coast do have an effect on the spawning and on the movement of the halibut. As was pointed out, they do move from American into Canadian waters at various times in their life cycle, so it is important to remember that this is an international problem that we are facing.

It was during the 1930s that the halibut fishing industry took a tremendous growth. It experienced substantially increased landings. Following a catch of 44 million pounds in 1931, annual landings of Pacific halibut rose steadily, peaking at a record 75 million pounds in 1962.

During those early years of the 1960s it became very clear that the resource had been overexploited and halibut landings took a sharp downward turn. In the next 12 years these landings plummeted to a low of only 21 million pounds. This figure includes the American catch as well as the Canadian catch in 1974.

As was pointed out, this was following a prolonged period of foreign fishing and low recruitment. The whole Pacific halibut fishery declined not only because of local overfishing but because the international fleet was overfishing well. The greatest reductions were off British Columbia and Kodiak Island where the foreign trawling had been most intense and prolonged.

In 1979 Canada and the United States extended their territorial limit to 200 miles. After several years of greatly reduced harvesting and stock rebuilding, the harvest levels recovered and the annual landings rose rapidly.

Although the landings in all areas recovered substantially between 1980 and 1987, the sharpest increases have occurred in the Gulf of Alaska. Again, my colleague has referred to the amount of fishing that has been going on.

During those years, between the 1950s and 1960s, the price of halibut was very stable, but as the presence of halibut declined, the prices increased which again encouraged overfishing. In 1980, however, the price of halibut fell again faster than it had risen in the 1970s. As a result the prices declined to what they were in the 1930s. Adding to the decline in the prices was the expanding growth and efficiency of the halibut fleet resulting in a shorter fishing season and less product sold in the higher priced fresh fish market.

On the west coast of Canada the halibut fisheries spans 500 miles. It always has played an important role in the commercial fishery in British Columbia.

Prior to the signing of the extended jurisdiction in 1977 and the implementation of the 200–mile limit in 1979, vessels from both nations fished halibut off each other's coasts. Similarly, the fishing fleets of each nation shared in the good and bad times of the halibut fishery.

Since 1979 and 1980 Canadian and U.S. vessels have been restricted to fishing in the waters within their own national jurisdiction. This has had a tremendous effect on the B.C. halibut fleet because we no longer have the opportunity to fish up in the Bering Sea where there are 2,000 miles of coastline to fish. We are now limited to the 500–mile area off the B.C. coast.

• (1720)

These limitations have had one beneficial effect in that the Canadian government has been able to better control the fishery. It also prevented the Canadian fishermen from sharing in the boom of the 1980s in the Gulf of Alaska.

Between 1979 and 1983, B.C. halibut landings hovered around the 5 million pound level. After 1983, landings have risen steadily and reached 12.9 million pounds in 1988.

Although the increase in the harvest level was good news to Canadian fishermen, catches were increasing even more rapidly in the Alaskan fisheries where substantially larger quantities of halibut are landed. Quota increases were implemented several years later. We recognize that this may not necessarily be due to increased stocks but perhaps to the increased fishing effort.

In 1981, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans limited the growth in the number of fishing vessels in the commercial halibut fishery by cutting the number of licences issued to form a limited entry fishery. Approximately 440 halibut licences were issued to Canadian fishing vessels. It should be noted that not all vessels with a halibut licence participate in the halibut fishery each and every year.

In the mid-1980s, the number of fishing boats was between 301 and 337. Because of the increasing value of the halibut since 1984, in 1988 all 435 licences were renewed.

By 1987, virtually all commercial fishing vessels with halibut fishing privileges were actively fishing halibut. The fishing capacity continued to increase. The Canadian fleet was able to catch in excess of 12 million pounds in a mere 16 fishing days.

In 1989 Canadian fishermen were permitted to fish only one eight-day period and one three-day period. This was largely due to technological changes in the gear and equipment, such as circle hooks, snap-on gear, automatic baiting machines and improved fish finding electronics. This increased the efficiency to levels that had been entirely unheard of and unthought of just five years earlier. The result of these changes was a halibut fleet which in 1987 harvested over twice the catch in nearly one-quarter of the time required in 1982.

As has been pointed out, the changes in halibut fleet catching power were most dramatic in the unlimited entry fishery in the Gulf of Alaska where, in 1987, 30 million pounds of halibut were caught in less than two days. This of course is one of the real concerns of the halibut fishery on the west coast.

In recent years the halibut fishery in the Gulf of Alaska has taken the allowable catch limit, also in a few days, even though recent annual catches are nearing historical highs. For comparison, the 1988 Gulf of Alaska catch limit of 55.5 million pounds was taken in five days and three days, subject to limits on the amount of halibut which may be landed by each vessel, whereas in the late 1970s over 40 days were required to take the annual catch limits of less than 20 million pounds.

The Canadian fishery, which is smaller in size and has limited entry licensing, has also realized substantial increases in catchability and sharp decreases in the numbers of fishing days.

In 1979 the Canadian fleet landed less than 5 million pounds in 40 unrestricted days and in 1988 caught 12.5 million pounds in 13 fishing days.

In 1990 fishermen may choose to fish a four-day period in April or a four-day period in June. The remaining total allowable catch can be taken in a clean-up fishery in September.

The total allowable catch this year is 7.8 million pounds. These shorter fishing seasons are the result of new fishing technology, increased efficiency and, in the case of the United States, increases in the number of vessels.

Declining halibut stocks off the B.C. coast are probably due in part to overfishing, but we need to do much more research into the causes of the decline of the fishery. If there are climatic changes, changes in the sea bed or drift-net fishing, then I agree the Canadian government should certainly take a firm stand in these areas.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me this opportunity to support the motion before the House which calls for the protection of the British Columbia halibut fishery from overfishing and the maintenance of adequate stock enhancement by all responsible countries.

For the information of the House, halibut is a migratory stock which spawns in specific spawning areas in British Columbia and Alaska. They migrate south and east. The migration brings them into the fishing grounds of British Columbia and the states of Alaska and Washington. It is here that they become available for the long-line fisheries harvest.

There is also an important rearing ground for the halibut fishery in the Bering Sea. This area nurtures the fish which can live to be 30 to 40 years old and weigh up to 500 pounds.

In the 1960s it was discovered that the Japanese trollers were dragging this area and tearing up the feeding and spawning halibut. The Canadian and Americans, under the auspices of the International Pacific Halibut Commission, IPHC, succeeded in stopping the Japanese dragging in this area after intense international pressure was applied.

Today, however, the Americans and Canadians operate under the 1980 treaty which prohibits Canadians from harvesting in American waters and vice versa. The treaty negotiated in good faith was based upon the assumption that the two nations which fought so hard to preserve the halibut stocks would act responsibly in their own fishing grounds. This did not turn out to be the case. The Japanese have been replaced by the Americans who are now trolling the nursing grounds.

One advantage of having fishermen fish in each other's waters was that each nation would have a vested interest in ensuring that the stocks were healthy along the entire migratory route. The Americans, in particular the Alaskans, decided to take advantage of this situation. The Alaskans realized that the fish migrated from the Bering Sea through the waters of Alaska, British Columbia and Washington, in that order. Therefore, they would always have the first grab at the stocks.

From this situation the Alaskan fishing fleet grew dramatically to approximately 4,300 vessels. This is roughly 10 times the size of our fleet in British Columbia. Not only is the fleet huge but it is largely unregulated. Therefore, it is difficult to detect overfishing.

The IPHC has known about this situation for several years but has consistently been unable to persuade the Americans to institute observers on all their vessels. This is annoying to the Canadian fisheries industry which each year helps to stock and conserve the species but continues to find its catch declining in volume.

In 1989, new and alarming statistics came to light regarding the overfishing by the Americans. Here are just a few examples. The Alaskan Fishermen's Journal reported that the southeastern Alaskan troll fishery catch of targeted flounder was less than one-quarter the value of the prohibited halibut and crab taken in the fishery.

IPHC scientists estimated that the incidental by-catch of halibut by the U.S. trollers amounted to 17 million pounds, which was 7 million pounds more than the total allowable catch for Canada in 1988. These figures were later determined to be too low.

The IPHC scientists also believe that 50 per cent of the stock damage done to juvenile halibut stocks is done right on the sensitive nursery grounds. Given these alarming statistics, we must further study methods which will enable us to protect our common halibut nursery grounds and also deter the Alaskans from overfishing and trolling the nursery grounds.

Further to this, it is of the utmost importance that we enlist the help of Americans in this matter. A unilateral Canadian action in this matter is futile without the co-operation of all parties involved in the international halibut fishery.

• (1730)

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan for bringing this resolution to the floor of the House and also congratulate the other speakers who have intervened in this motion.

It is very important, from the point of view of the Pacific Coast fishery, that Parliament resolve on this issue and take a strong stand. It is very important to the people on the west coast who have already seen what has happened in the east coast fishery as a result of competing fleets taking more and more of the resource and less and less attention being paid to conservation of that resource. We have seen serious damage done to the fish stocks off the east coast and serious damage done to the economies with fish plants shutting down in a number of towns throughout the Atlantic provinces.

I used to work in the fishing industry in British Columbia back when I was going to university and high school. I worked in a shipyard in Richmond, B.C. owned by Nelson Brothers Fisheries Limited. I recall when the boats came back from the Gulf of Alaska and the Bering Sea they used to bring for the workers in the shipyard huge halibut that they had caught in the Bering Sea and in the Gulf of Alaska. It was my job as somebody who worked in the shipyard to go down in the hold of these big fishing vessels to put a block on these halibut and lift them up so that they could be cut into chunks for the shipyard workers. When those halibut were standing on end with the blocks they used to be eight to ten feet high.

In recent years, the number and size of halibut has declined dramatically. We are concerned on the west coast of Canada that this fish is being fished to extinction by bad management, not necessarily bad management within Canadian waters and by Canadian authorities but definitely bad management in the state of Alaska and in the United States where the prime nursery grounds for the halibut reside.

I hope that this resolution will give strength to our government negotiators and strength to our government in negotiating with the United States, with the government of the state of Alaska and with Alaskan fishermen to try to change the attitude that those fishermen and that those jurisdictions have with respect to the nursery beds of the Pacific halibut.

If we do not protect those nursery beds from which the halibut originate and spread in their migratory patterns throughout the balance of the west coast, as other members have mentioned, we are going to lose these fish altogether. Anybody who has tasted Pacific halibut will know that it is one of the highest quality and value fish that we get off the west coast, second only to our salmon and herring. Again, I would like to congratulate the members who have spoken on this issue.

The problem is that the United States fishery in the Gulf of Alaska and in those critical halibut nursery areas are virtually unregulated. That is the same fishery as was mentioned by previous speakers that fished the Alaska king crab to extinction. What they are doing now is the equivalent of what was discussed several years ago in the Atlantic coast fishery. What they are doing is pulse fishing. As they fish one species to extinction, then they go on to the next species and fish them to extinction. We have to ask ourselves, when they finish with the halibut, what is the next species in line for extinction on the west coast of Canada?

This is an extremely important issue. I know that government members, official opposition members and New Democratic Party members are fully in agreement on this issue. I hope that the House will resolve itself in order to give government the authority and the voice of Parliament when it is negotiating with the United States on this issue so that we can come up with a fairer allocation of the fishery between Canada and the United States and also more appropriate methods of protecting the nursery grounds for halibut in the Gulf of Alaska and the Bering Sea so that we do not lose the halibut fishery entirely on the west coast of British Columbia.

We do not need one more species fished to extinction by bad management or by neglect in the discussions and the relations between Canada and the United States. I think on this one, Parliament should give the government the authority to take a very strong stand with the state of Alaska, a very strong stand with the Government of the United States and a very strong stand with American fishermen to let them know loudly and clearly that we would like to see this fishery preserved and that we would like to see this fish brought back from the verge of extinction.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to speak to the subject matter of Motion M-305, and more specifically to the concerns of the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan (Mr. Stupich) regarding the development of halibut stocks.

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about a development program that is a little better known on the Pacific coast, and I am referring to the Salmonid Enhancement Program. The program, a welcome federal-provincial project, was launched in 1977 to double salmonid stocks on the Pacific coast and bring them back to pre-1900 levels. The program was also designed to raise national income levels, create jobs, help remote coastal communities, enhance the well-being of Native peoples, and preserve and protect the environment. The program includes construction and operation of hatcheries, spawning and nursery channels, fish ladders and incubators. It applies techniques including improving habitat, stocking lakes and the use of aquaculture to raise five species of salmonids and anadromous rainbow trout.

The Salmonid Enhancement Program is expected to produce nearly one-third of salmonid production in British Columbia in the course of the last decade of the twentieth century. Is the hon. member suggesting that the program be expanded to include other species such as halibut? We must realize there are significant differences between the life cycles of salmon and halibut that would make it difficult to apply this enhancement program to halibut.

Pacific halibut is a flat ground fish that may grow to a very large size. In the northern Pacific, halibut is found from Southern California to the Bering Sea. It generally lives in deep waters, especially during the winter when it goes to its spawning grounds off the continental shelf. Halibut prefer cold waters with temperatures varying from 3 to 8 degrees celsius and have been found at depths of up to 1,100 meters.

The halibut's life cycle starts with tiny eggs freely floating in water. Fertilization is external, and the eggs hatch about two weeks later. The larvae start feeding on zooplankton when their vitellus has been absorbed.

During the first four or five months, juvenile halibut are carried by deep ocean currents. As the larvae mature, their specific gravity decreases. They rise to the surface and drift towards shallow waters on the continental shelf. Many are carried north by the Alaska current to the Gulf of Alaska, the Aleutian Islands and as far as the Bering Sea.

A halibut undergoes significant physical changes in the first six months. Ordinary-looking at first, it gradually changes into a typical flat fish with the eyes located on the upper side of the body.

That is when the fish begins to live in relatively shallow breeding grounds less than 61 metres along the continental shelf where it will remain for about three years, feeding on shrimp and fry.

At age three, halibuts seek deeper waters and a good many of them travel in a southeasterly direction, the opposite of their first migration towards the northeast as larvae. Some have been know to migrate over distances in excess of 6,000 kilometres. Halibuts coming back to B.C. waters are usually five or six years old. Data recorded from tags indicate that migratory stocks mix together and that no distinct population has been noted.

• (1740)

Male halibuts reach maturity at age eight, as compared to age 12 for female halibuts. The latter grow more rapidly and live longer than males do. A halibut weighing more than 45 kilograms is usually female. Specimens weighing up to 227 kilograms have been reported but the average weight of halibut caught on an ordinary fishing line ranges roughly from 14 to 18 kilograms and in an 8-to-12 age bracket. The halibut's known longevity record is 27 years for males and 42 years for females.

The halibut spawns in winter—November to March—at depths ranging from 270 to 400 metres. Spawning grounds have been spotted over wide coastal areas, but we know they are found primarily in British Columbia, Cape St. James, Langara Island and Frederick Island. Goose Island, Hecate Strait and Rose Spit are other known spawning grounds. Females lay a huge number of eggs and fecundity depends on the size of the fish.

Successful stock replenishment also depends on natural abundance cycles which seem to recur every 20 years. Halibut catches are beginning to decrease after several years of record production, so obviously the species will decline over the next few years and halibut landings are bound to be smaller than they have been in recent years.

Accidental young halibut catches are a major cause of mortality, particularly in waters off the Alaskan coast. Contrary to the larger size halibut which prefers to stay in a definite area, younger halibut less than 65 centimetres in lengh travel a lot and may be captured in many fisheries. Younger halibuts have a high growth potential and their mortality rate resulting from accidental catches may reduce significantly the strength of the mature halibut stocks over the following years.

The Government of Canada is concerned about the high mortality rate of the young halibut population resulting from trawl fishing. It should be recognized that last year the accidental catches were somewhat higher than over the past five years. The assessment of accidental catches over the 5 to 10 previous years was 1.5 higher. Canada is asking the United States to implement a conservation program and a monitoring program. I think this is one of the points which will interest my Hon. friend.

The United States have recognized the legitimacy of our concerns and support our requests for a stricter implementation program. Other initiatives such as the imposition of quotas per outing, a controlled access, changes to fishing gears, the restriction of over fishing areas and seasons, as well as the closing of spawning grounds are being considered.

As I mentioned earlier, most of the salmon stock enhancement techniques are being used in the shallow fresh water spawning grounds before the prococious parrs start their migration towards the sea where they will mature. Halibut, as I said, has quite a different biological cycle.

Salmons return to fray in the shallow water of the coastal rivers and lakes, while halibuts spawn in deep sea water. It is therefore difficult to implement enhancement activities for the halibut, a pelagic species. The same comparison applies to rearing habitats. The salmon's environment can be modified to a certain extent in fresh water, for instance by restocking lakes, in order to increase productivity but halibut rearing habitats cannot be changed.

Halibut incubation is possible and research is under way in this area. However, this technology is not advanced enough for large-scale application and there is no guarantee that efforts will lead to more abundant halibut stocks for Canadian fishermen. The future of these stocks rests with fishery managers who, as it has already been said, can take certain steps to preserve stocks and make sure that our fishermen benefit from the abundant renewable natural resources in British Columbia waters.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure my hon. colleague that the government objective is to protect halibut stocks in the Pacific as well as other Canadian fish stocks. In dealing with this situation, the Canadian government is working closely with our neighbours to the south, the United States, to conclude agreements aimed at protecting halibut stocks in the Pacific while ensuring a fishing activity which will allow many British Columbia communities to benefit from the economic spin-offs.

[English]

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to speak this afternoon on the motion put forward by my friend across the way from British Columbia. I am used to speaking in this House on fisheries matters that tend to pertain more to the east coast and so it is nice to have the opportunity to speak on a matter which is of particular importance to western Canada, to British Columbia.

The fishery in British Columbia is very different from the fishery we have in Atlantic Canada and certainly right now it does not face the same nature or level of problems that we face. Nevertheless, it is important that we not totally forget that the industry in British Columbia is a very important employer in a number of communities along the coast on Vancouver Island, particularly in the native communities. There is a thriving commercial fishery certainly in the context that I know it, a very strong recreational fishery, a commercial recreational fishery, a native fishery that is booming and seeing some real innovation.

The attention of the government of Canada must be maintained in that area. They too have problems. Quite often their problems are problems that we would love to have as they are more problems of allocation of resources, whereas ours on the east coast tend to be in finding the resources that we could allocate. We would certainly have no trouble in allocating fish, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you can imagine, if it were there.

The question of halibut has been discussed quite ably here this afternoon. There are a number of aspects to it. I would like to concentrate if I could on one that is of particular concern. My friends from the New Democratic Party have alluded to the Atlantic Pacific Halibut Commission. It is the organization that governs halibut and governs how we in Canada, and to some extent the United States, catch this species. It is a commission established by both governments to deal with the halibut resource in the northeast Pacific. The commission meets annually to establish quotas and to set regulatory measures and the implementation of those regulations and those quotas is up to the governments of each country.

The involvement of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, which is responsible for Canada's role in conservation of fish stocks and also participation in international organizations like the halibut commission, is to ensure that prior to the annual meeting of the commission there is a fair amount of consultation. That consultation is not only focused simply on the particular issue of the annual meeting of the commission, and it has an annual meeting of the Canadian participants in the fishery in advance, but also an ongoing consultation throughout the year to deal with issues that may or may not arise on a variety of things such as juvenile mortality, incidental by-catches, particularly in the Alaskan groundfish troll. We have heard a fair bit about that. It is a problem. It is something in which the DFO is involved with the industry, the unions and a number of others.

One of the most important things DFO is trying to do in consultation with the industry and discussions with those involved is to deal with the competitive intensity that we see in the industry. This has moved us more and more to shorter fishery openings. This has caused a problem that I would like to talk about. The intensity of the catch, the intensity of the season is a concern that we have for a number of reasons: the effect it has on the industry, the effect it has on conservation, and the effect it has generally on our ability to produce good quality fish considering the focus of the opening of the season and the intensity that follows from that.

We have seen a huge improvement in technology and larger boats and this enables huge quantities of fish to be caught in very short periods of time. In mere hours, the catch limits are caught. That, in itself, causes a problem. When we catch fish very quickly, we run the risk of not only overfishing but there is a risk of underfishing. The risk of overfishing is very clear because obviously it is in the interests of no one that we catch more than our quota and that is something to be concerned about. At the same time, it is not in the interests of fishermen that we leave fish in the water, that resources be left uncaught, when the allowable catch would have allowed that they be caught and fishermen who depend on every fish that they can catch could have had fish that was left in the frenzy of the season.

Conservation of halibut stocks is particularly important. We have talked about that here today and I think everybody would agree that there has to be a clear focus of a government department responsible for fisheries and this government department is no different. One thing that is a problem is the several millions of pounds of halibut every year which is lost as a result of abandoned gear or of juvenile or under-sized halibut that have to be put back into the water as a conservation method but which we all know is a fairly ineffective conservation method. From time to time there is illegal prospecting going on, where there are catches taken out of season. One of the biggest problems is the short, intense fishing period which heightens all of this.

The current management system reduces the opportunity for fishermen fishing other species. There are many other species that are fished in British Columbia such as salmon, sable fish, Pacific cod, and rock fish. There are halibut catches in those fisheries. There are by-catches and incidental catches. It is important that we and our friends south of the border know that we are managing that, that we are minimizing some of that and ensuring that we do not allow that incidental by-catch and do not maintain those fisheries at the cost of the fishery, generally.

There are some serious marketing difficulties that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is involved in and which result from this high-intensity season. Clearly, one problem is the availability of high quality fresh fish. Because of the huge numbers of fish caught quite quickly, it is frozen, and with the freezing of fish there is not the availability, at all times, of fresh fish and frozen fish, whether we like it or not, does not make as good a product. As a result, we lose the optimization of the value to fishermen and those in the industry, generally.

Harvesting costs go up as more and more equipment is bought to ensure that the individual fisherman can be as competitive as possible and more crews are hired. One of the other short season problems is the risk that it provides for a fisherman, who perhaps for reasons of ill health, weather, or a breakdown of gear, cannot get into the fishery and prosecute it in that intensely short period of time and he or she may be left out totally. It is also important to recognize the safety concerns.

We have some experience in British Columbia and particularly on the east coast with enterprise allocations. Hon. members are well aware that in the mid seventies the enterprise allocations program in the eastern Canadian cod fishery was developed so that we would avoid this highly competitive and highly intensive attack on the stocks. Frankly, it is in the interests of those in the industry, those who fish and those who work in fish plants. If we can spread the work out over a greater period of time, there is an interest in doing that.

Obviously, what I have said is not going to be supported by everyone. There is much controversy about moving into a limited entry fishery or a more specifically managed fishery. It is something that changes the way things have developed. Obviously, it will affect some enterprises and some fishermen. I do not think the Minister of Fisheries intends to move immediately or quickly on any of these issues. They are issues that are important to discuss as we look at the conservation.

Mr. Milliken: He never moves quickly on anything. I don't know why he would move quickly on this one.

Mr. Reid: My friend opposite, who not 10 minutes ago admitted he knew nothing about the halibut fishery could not keep himself quiet for more than 8 minutes. But I think that is a great credit to him.

I do want to allow what I think is a very important speech. One of my colleagues is very anxious to say a few words on the halibut fishery. Those of us from one coast or another tend to dominate discussions on the fishery. One of the things we have tried very hard to do is to raise the profile of the fishery, particularly the Atlantic fishery. I know my friend opposite is keen to see the Pacific fishery become of interest to Canadians from all parts of the country.

Mr. Milliken: Get the Minister of Fisheries working.

Mr. Reid: My friend from Calgary Southeast is very keen to contribute to this debate. I think it speaks well of my colleagues who are interested in the industry and the problems. I, like all members, perhaps except for the member for Kingston, am very anxious to hear what he has to say. I know he will get the full attention of all members. I am very pleased that he is participating in this debate.

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Like the hon. member for St. John's East, we are most anxious to hear the next speech. In fact, I can indicate on behalf of the opposition that we would be prepared to have Your Honour not see the clock so we could complete discussion on this motion. It seems that everyone is in agreement. I know the hon. member who is about to speak and I would like to hear his speech. I am prepared to give consent to sit here later if we could conclude the debate. I will sit until nine o'clock if it would assist. I just want to make that clear.

Mr. Reid: Perhaps it would be inappropriate for me to comment on such silliness, Mr. Speaker, but I thought it would help you. I cannot comment on how unanimity is determined across the way just now, but I would like to thank my hon. friend from Kingston. I think my friend down from Calgary can carry on and we will see how it goes. A wink and a nod, even to a blind member of Parliament and we might get somewhere.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I quite enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East. I listened with interest to the concern he expressed for the west coast fishery. Here is a member from Newfoundland expressing his concern and sharing our concern as westerners with our west coast fishery. The member knows the problems of fishermen. We in this house are all aware of the tireless efforts of the hon. member for St. John's East on behalf of the fishermen of his province. Now he is expressing his concern for the fishermen on the west coast as well.

Mr. Milliken: He is trying to get the Minister of Fisheries to do something.

Mr. Richardson: Well, if he does it will be to the credit of the hon. member for St. John's East who has always had the interests of fishermen at heart.

As a matter of fact, last summer, the hon. member for St. John's East invited me to his riding and around Newfoundland to visit the fisheries. Together we went to visit fishermen to hear first-hand their interests. He thought it was important for a fellow from the prairies, from the Rocky Mountain province of Alberta, to understand first-hand the concerns of fishermen. It was a great insight for me, as I think it would be for all members. If the hon. member for Kingston who has entered this debate in part today would take the opportunity, I am sure at the invitation of the member for St. John's East, would go and visit the fishery, he would not be so flippant in his remarks about the difficulties the fishermen are experiencing.

I would like to express my pleasure in speaking on the Pacific halibut fishery. Conservation of halibut stocks has been a priority in the administration of the Pacific fishery and will continue to be a priority as the abundance of halibut stocks decline naturally and as the capacity of the fleets to catch halibut grows.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity again to condemn the government for its savage and unthinking cuts to aboriginal communications. Ordinary Canadians throughout the country have reacted with shock and dismay. Aboriginal Canadians are outraged.

What makes these cuts so offensive is the way they were announced, with no warning and no time provided for the aboriginal communications societies to find alternative sources of funding. In addition to the suddenness of the cuts are the inevitable comparisons to what did not get cut in this budget.

The government will be spending millions of dollars on goods and services tax advertising, or propaganda. It bought some stripes for the National Gallery for over $1 million. It wrote off millions in Third World nations' debts but slashed and eliminated funding for aboriginal political organizations and communications.

The government does not comprehend the vital importance of aboriginal communications to aboriginal people. It has blinders on when it comes to languages other than the country's two official languages.

The Prime Minister promised, in 1985, that programs for aboriginal people would not be cut back. Let me quote from the Prime Minister's press release of April 18, 1985:

> Current funding levels of programs designed to correct the serious inequities which exist for native people in native communities will be maintained.

He went on to say:

> Policies regarding aboriginal people will be made after open, public consultation, especially at the grassroots level.

The Prime Minister also said in the same statement that "the special relationship between Canada and the aboriginal people should be strengthened".

All of these beautiful sounding promises and commitments have been broken in the recent budget.

The serious inequities that the Prime Minister mentioned still exist. They have not gone away since 1985. In fact, many of them have been made worse by the government's actions. The rate increase by Canada Post on food mail shipments to northern and remote communities is but one example.

The government's own documents attest to the continuing disparities. Last summer the government released its aboriginal economic development strategy. I will quote some figures from the government's own strategy paper:

> By all measures of socio-economic disparity, the 600,000 people who identify themselves as aboriginal continue to be the most disadvantaged group within Canadian society. Employment rates among the aboriginal working-age population have been about 45 percent compared with 63 percent for the non-aboriginal population. Of those employed, incomes are up to a third lower than levels for employed non-aboriginal people.

> Almost 30 percent of aboriginal individuals aged 15-24 have less than a grade 9 education, compared with 7 percent per cent for their non-aboriginal counterparts. More than 76 percent have neither completed high school nor pursued post-secondary education, whereas the corresponding percentage for non-aboriginals is 44 percent.

Despite these low education and employment statistics, the government capped post-secondary education funding.

In the area of health, serious inequities persist. A recent report of the Canadian Institute of Child Health confirms the continuing problems.

The aboriginal mortality rate from injuries and suicides, hospitalizations due to respiratory diseases and pregnancy complications remain much higher than the national average. Life expectancy for aboriginal people is still much lower than for non-aboriginal people. Aboriginal children born in the late 1980s will live, on average, 68 years. Other Canadian children can expect to live 76 years.

• (1805)

The aboriginal infant mortality rate is double the national average. Aboriginal children have consistently higher death rates due to injuries. Aboriginal teenagers have a suicide rate seven times higher than the total Canadian rate. Tuberculosis and other infectious conditions disproportionately affect aboriginal people.

The Canadian Institute of Child Health report states that "we have a Third World problem within our society" in terms of the health disadvantages of aboriginal children. The pattern of disease among Canada's aboriginal people resembles the main killers of the developing world.

The Prime Minister and the government can hardly argue in the face of all of this evidence that disparities no longer exist between aboriginal people and non-aboriginal people. So why was the funding cut for aboriginal communications and organizations?

As for the consultation promised by the Prime Minister—open public consultation at the grassroots level—there was none. Instead, the government has set up a task force after the cuts were announced. The task force is to assist aboriginal communications societies to diversify their funding and revenue base.

The government totally eliminated the $3.5 million Native Communications Program in the February 20 budget. It slashed funding under the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program by 16 per cent or $2.2 million. A broadcast distribution fund of $800,000 was suspended. All this means a potential loss of 180 jobs, aboriginal jobs in a communications field which is unique and cannot be replaced.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission last year said that Canada's treatment of aboriginal peoples is a national tragedy. Today the Canadian Human Rights Commission said it has no reason to alter its judgment. The commission's press statement of today states:

> If there is any single issue on which Canada cannot hold its head high in the international community, any single area in which we can be accused of falling down on our obligations, it is in this area of aboriginal relations.

The minister would be well advised to read the human rights report which was released today.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since there has been criticism of the budgetary cuts in the native programs administered by the Department of the Secretary of State, I would like to remind members of other quite substantial funds still being made available from that quarter.

Even after a cut of 5 per cent the 99 Friendship Centres serving native people in urban areas will be receiving $17.4 million.

The Aboriginal Representative Organizations Program will still receive $8.2 million in the form of sustaining grants to organizations representing aboriginal people.

The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs which, already gives considerable funds to status Indian organizations, has seen its budgets increase from $1.4 billion in 1984–85 to $2.3 billion in the current year. Another 32 native organizations will still be receiving sustaining grants from the Secretary of State. The funding these organizations receive will be reduced by between 7.5 per cent and 15 per cent. The department will still be providing $11.3 million under the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program to enable native organizations to produce and broadcast on regional radio and TV in the north.

In addition, the department has provided over $1 million in transitional funds to all organizations whose funding was eliminated under the Native Communications Program. This money is to assist the native communications societies in diversifying their funding base.

Finally, the Secretary of State will continue to provide $2.2 million for aboriginal women's programs and $1 million for social and cultural development. These programs are not affected by our restraint measures.

There is no question that the decisions about funding reductions have been difficult ones to make in the Department of the Secretary of State as well as elsewhere, but programs have been preserved which served the neediest client groups. That seems to be the fairest possible way to handle the reductions we must make in government spending.

• (1810)

This principle can be seen at work in other departments. Money and social services goes up $77 million in one year. There will be $59 million more for education. Health services for native people are being given an additional $35 million. The economic development program in Indian and Northern Affairs will get an increase of $93 million, which is 40 per cent in one year. In total, other support is increasing by more than $200 million in a year when government services elsewhere in the country are holding the line or being cut.

Finally, when we look at projected capital expenditures on behalf of native people, we see even more strikingly the high priority given to their needs. As one example among many, the budget allots $592 million for on-reserve facilities and related services, an increase of $28 million over the current year. The government's sustained commitment to the well-being of our aboriginal community and culture is clearly evident. All together, government funding for aboriginal programs will rise to more than $4 billion in 1990-1991.

To conclude, difficult decisions are sometimes needed to solve our deficit problems, but the handling of native programs has been as fair and as a balanced as possible. I am sure we would not want it any other way.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity to elaborate on the question that I posed the Minister of Fisheries on Thursday last, March 22.

The question had to do with the dumping at sea of large quantities of fish by offshore fishing trawlers. I had made reference to the minister's visit to Canso soon after he assumed his portfolio in late February when he met with a group of trawlermen from Canso, Nova Scotia. The trawlermen presented him with tangible evidence of fish being dumped at sea.

I am not talking about the discarding the fish at sea. That is a current practice in offshore fishing activities, of taking a load of fish in and culling the catch that is brought on board by a trawler. I am talking about another practice, which is dumping the fish at sea. That is the practice of releasing a large quantity of fish caught in the large trawler net. That is a much more wasteful practice and that is the practice which the trawlermen were bringing to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries. They had photographs and other evidence to demonstrate their case.

This is a controversial issue. The offshore fishing companies like National Sea have been denying that large-scale dumping occurs. The government officials of DFO have been denying that large-scale dumping occurs. While they admit that there is some form of discarding that takes place, they say it is a limited degree of high grading, that it is controllable, and that is not happening at an unreasonable rate or at least that they cannot get a handle on it.

We have to understand the position of the trawlermen. These trawlermen go out for nine days with the cloud of the closure of their community and the loss of their jobs over their heads. Their whole livelihood is at stake. The government and the companies are telling them that there are no fish. They are catching vast quantities of fish and are obliged to throw those fish overboard. These are the same fish that could be processed in their community. At the same time, the plant that they fish to is closing its doors.

You can understand the frustration of the trawlermen in Canso, Mr. Speaker, when they brought this to the concerns of the minister. They were frustrated even more when the minister seemed to shuffle-off their concerns after a month.

• (1815)

I am glad to bring this matter to the attention of the House. I want to advise the House that it is not only the trawlermen at Canso who have raised these concerns. The report of the Senate committee on the marketing of fish in Atlantic Canada recommends that "statements made to the committee by many fishermen indicated that large but unknown quantities of potentially valuable fish were being caught and routinely dumped at sea because they were either too small or incidental to the species sought." These are trawler boats travelling at sea looking for one species, such as cod and get a large quantity of another species. They do not want it so they pitch it overboard. As a result, this fish is wasted.

To give you an example of the extent of this practice, it is as if we finally started bringing oil from Hibernia and dumped two-thirds of the oil back into the ocean. That is the degree of the practice we are talking about.

This is a controversial issue and we need more information. First, it is very important that we recognize, as the Senate recommends, the potential seriousness of the issue and we take steps to get the facts.

The Minister of Fisheries should take the matter seriously enough to be willing to get facts to determine the extent to which this is happening. What are the causes? What are the incentives to the companies and to the trawlermen who are allowing this practice to happen.

Second, we have to take a new attitude towards commercial fishing as we have towards other activities such as forestry or manufacturing and view this activity as an environmental activity. Its profound concerns for the environment, commercial fishing and the practices of commercial fish companies have to be subordinate to the broader issue of the environment and the status of our resource.

We will have to bear the cost of taking all the fish we catch and not leave some at sea because that fish is not particularly valuable at that point in time given the market situation.

I will close now and I welcome the response of my colleague opposite to this very important issue.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to respond to my hon. friend because he knows of where he speaks and raises an interesting concern.

I am sure he does not suggest that the habit of culling or selective dumping is one that we should encourage. It is abhorrent to dump any resource. There is no question that it goes on. To say that two-third is dumped is a bit out of whack.

I was with the Minister of Fisheries when he was in Canso, Lockeport and Gaultois. I travelled across the country with him. It was clear that the trawlermen who make their living on trawlers are very conscious of conservation. They are very conscious that they are a part of a system that from time to time abuses the resource. They are very specific on that matter.

My friend opposite is right to the extent that officials in the Department of Fisheries say that when there are observers on the ships the discard level is between 2 per cent and 5 per cent. The trawlermen said that when the observers are on the ship the discard levels are about as observed, but when the observers are not on the ships it is significantly higher.

The Haché Task Force made very clear and the government has agreed that there must be much greater—and I would suggest 100 per cent—observer coverage on the trawlers. My friend talks about information. It is important that the Department of Fisheries and the industry has information on the catch, rapidity of catch, the bi-catch and the times. Those things are important.

The Haché report makes very clear that that is important. I think today on the Scotian shelf, observes cover about 50 per cent. In the North Atlantic fishery it runs about 80 per cent. Northern cod are running 100 per cent. So it balances itself out.

• (1820)

It is incumbent upon the Department of Fisheries—the industry and others will have to be involved—that we move to 100 per cent observer coverage. I hope that addresses the problem.

The minister was very moved by what he saw in Canso. He went to his department as soon as he returned and asked what is going on? He is very conscious of it. I think you will see that in his actions over time as we come to grips with this sort of problem. We cannot under any circumstance condone the waste of this resource, particularly when we are in such difficult situations as we are now.

TOURISM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, on February 14 I asked a question of the Minister of Tourism to the effect that the new GST would have a detrimental effect on the tourist industry in this country.

The minister answered that it was not an additional tax facing the tourist industry but the replacement of the old tax.

The fact of the matter is that I could have brought to the House this afternoon countless letters which I have in my office and could table if necessary. These letters concern the difficulties the tourist industry will have with the GST.

I have had calls from travel agencies that tell me it will be very difficult to package tours from the United States into Canada because each individual tourist from the United States or from other countries in the world who come to Canada will have to make out individual rebate slips. People who come to visit this country do not want to do paperwork.

I would like my hon. friend who will answer these questions if he has elaborated the special rebate? It was supposed to be a global rebate rather than individual tourists filling out a rebate slip. I would like to know if there are any developments in that regard.

Some of the letters I have received mention the fact that if a tourist comes to Canada and does not spend a minimum of $300, be it in restaurants or buying a gift, they cannot have a rebate. Statistics have shown that the tourists coming to this country from the United States when adding up their restaurant bills and money spent on small gifts or souvenirs may not reach the minimum because people who watch their spending are going to be very sensitive to the additional 7 per cent tax.

[Translation]

I will be brief, Mr. Speaker, because I do not wish to make the question too long for my hon. colleague opposite who has to answer it. He will understand that the tourist industry has had rough times in the last two years. Let us not get into the causes. There may be many reasons why tourism has gone through some difficulties in Canada.

I would submit that the Minister of Tourism should make the Minister of Finance aware of the fact that this tax, as its stands, will certainly cause problems for the organizations and the people who organize tours of our country for visitors from all over the world, which are commonly called package tours.

• (1825)

You will therefore understand the concerns expressed by the Tourism Industry Association of Canada in the letter I received from them, among others. As a matter of fact, they came here on February 11 or 12, or was it the 14. I do not remember the exact date. They have voiced numerous times their concerns regarding this tax and were not satisfied with the answers they were given.

Essentially, based on all the letters and all the phone calls I have received, the tourist industry is asking if it would be possible to get a rebate. The businesses would like to know if the companies organizing tours, be it in a given province or across Canada, for a week, two weeks or a month, could themselves apply an overall rebate. That way, each visitor from outside the country could benefit from that rebate. If that were allowed, the package tours from all over the United States would not be affected by the tax. That is perhaps one of the concerns expressed by the industry. There are many more, but this is one of them.

I will have the opportunity, in the weeks to come, to elaborate further on the questions I asked the minister of Tourism. However, for now, I would appreciate it if my hon. friend could explain to me if there has been any new development regarding this special rebate. Will tour companies in Canada be able to claim the rebate collectively for the tourists? Will the government eliminate the $300 minimum required in order to be eligible for the rebate?

[English]

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and the Liberal party do a disservice to the tourism industry by misrepresenting the impact of the GST on the tourism industry.

Every single study on this subject supports the findings of the Tourism Research Institute of the Conference Board of Canada. The facts are that tourism in Canada will continue to grow every year under the GST. After the third year of implementation, tourism will grow faster with the GST than without it. Those are the facts.

[Translation]

Two major reasons support these optimistic projections. First, the fact that Canada will become more competitive as a result of the GST and will allow industrial sectors to secure and maintain their share of the market. Therefore, the GST will ensure economic growth.

[English]

Second, and most important for the tourism sector, the Minister of State for Tourism working closely with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have designed the GST in a way that recognizes the importance of tourism to the Canadian economy.

We will have a GST rebate for international visitors which will extend to both accommodations and purchases. We are the only country to offer a rebate to international travellers for accommodations. Except for transport or air services to the continental United States, inbound and outbound international passenger transportation will also be zero rated.

Other measures being looked at to ensure the rebate system is user friendly include simplifying the administrative aspects for tour packages, as the hon. member had mentioned, and conventions where accommodation is offered as part of an all-inclusive package of services.

In addition, tourism operators will for the first time be able to claim input credits on business purchases which will reduce the price impact of the GST by 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

In designing the GST, the government has recognized tourism as an export industry, an industry with enormous potential for expansion and job creation. We have worked hard with the industry to ensure that tourism is in the best position to benefit from the new tax system. We have succeeded, and the hon. member should recognize that.

SUPPLY

ALLOTED DAY S. O. 81—THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its lack of a sincere commitment to the environment and for its vacuous discussion paper which completely fails to offer the concrete action that all Canadians would like to see implemented and, therefore, call on the government to end the rhetoric and to introduce a truly substantial environmental action plan.

She said: Mr. Speaker, as you know, we as members of the opposition tend to make political speeches and indulge in political rhetoric from time to time. However, when the Minister of the Environment was appointed by the Prime Minister, we had high hopes that he would be able to further the cause of the environment within the Conservative Party.

In 1984, the Prime Minister claimed to be concerned about the environment, but between 1984 and 1988, he started slashing funding—as much as 95 per cent in the budget for alternative resources.

[English]

We had a lot of hope for the Minister of the Environment when he was chosen by the Prime Minister. He was supposed to be a great friend of the Prime Minister. He was supposed to be close to the Prime Minister. He was supposed to be the minister who could put environmental action on the map in so far as this government is concerned.

In actual fact what we have seen is not only a first term chequered by environmental cuts, hatchet jobs and axes but we have seen a year and a half in the second term of a majority Conservative government in which the new Minister of the Environment has done nothing more than talk about what he might do for environmental change.

He started off with a 200-page document which actually had some teeth.

[Translation]

This particular document mentioned some real solutions for dealing with PCBs and proposed a new energy consumption policy for Canada. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of the Environment is trying to cut back on garbage, because today, what we have is a mere 30 pages that are more or less garbage, don't mean a thing, and demonstrate that we Canadians are the most wasteful country in the world and the country that consumes the most energy. Whether we are talking about electricity, water or any source of energy at all, Mr. Speaker, Canada is one of the most wasteful countries in the world, and I think it all starts here in the House. We know that words are wasted, because we just saw a member who was afraid to speak himself because he didn't want his own comments and environmental issues to be on the record. He is ashamed of his government's record on PCBs.

• (1010)

[English]

He is ashamed of his government's record on PCBs. He is ashamed of his government's record on oil spills, particularly oil spills off Vancouver Island.

I am sorry if his government has made Canada the dumping point of American refrigerators. You can walk through any—

[Translation]

—dump in the province of Quebec and you will see refrigerators full of CFCs in Canadian dumps, because the Government of Canada thinks it is good business to bring garbage from the United States to Canada.

An hon. member: Shame!

Ms. Copps: Not only are we the Americans' dumping ground when it comes to our foreign policy, but now we are literally their garbage can.

What we expected from the environment minister, Mr. Speaker—and I know that it is very hard for the hon. member to face facts, because the hon. member for Abitibi is really caught now; the GST has 17 per cent support in the polls and 17 per cent is very low. I know it is hard when you have an "environmentalist" government.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker—the Prime Minister himself said so last week and again yesterday in the House—I was shocked to hear him say that he had created the policy to clean up Hamilton Harbour.

Mr. Speaker, I had something to say about that, because as you recall, Mr. Speaker, the Hamilton Harbour issue dragged on for three years. The Prime Minister did not want to do anything. It took a by-election to get something done. It would be good if we could have by-elections in all ridings every year—then we might have an environmental policy. But we cannot wait for the government to make little promises during election campaigns.

For example, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Listen to this if you want a chuckle, Mr. Speaker. Thank God it is printed on recycled paper because it is going to be used for many other things.

> Canadians need to explore the ways governments, industry and individuals can best contribute to a 50-per-cent reduction in waste.

Do you know what they want to do to reduce waste in government? They want to open an office of waste management so that they can put out more paper.

They are actually talking about opening an office of waste management to examine ways of how we can cut down on our waste.

In this document national regulations to control packaging and to require recycling are an option. On an issue as important as over-packaging, which is something that every consumer understands and every consumer is revolting against, why do they not introduce national regulations on the controlling of packaging and then let the public have a discussion?

[Translation]

We are not against a public debate, Mr. Speaker. Since 1984, the Conservatives have been promising a debate on it, but they do not have the courage to take a position on such an important issue as packaging.

[English]

The issue of the controlling of packaging is only one of the elements that has been raised in this document. Once again, they talk about, for example, the greenhouse effect. They ask themselves whether or not we should be developing on a national basis greenhouse gas emission targets.

We do not have time to ask ourselves that question. Of course we must establish greenhouse gas emission targets. We must set them in regulation so that Canadians can then have some input into what level they might be set at. But this document is nothing but a stall tactic.

[Translation]

I can see very clearly that the government will hold public hearings across Canada from now until June, while the debate goes on. But what will it do next fall? It will bring in an environmental policy that will take effect after the next federal election.

But the people of Canada believed the Prime Minister when he went to Burlington—

[English]

When the Prime Minister came within breathing space of my riding—he did not dare go into my riding—he actually went to the Canada Centre for Inland Waters and said that he was the environment Prime Minister for Canada. He promised that he would bring forward a green policy that would make Canada proud in the international arena for having a real green policy. Instead, what he has dropped with this document is a green bomb which does not give a single substantive piece of action on issues like greenhouse gases, global warming, old growth forests, national parks, water or energy.

This government does not have the guts to come forward with a single substantive policy because all it wants to do is talk out the clock. It would be amusing to watch the government talk out the clock if it were not for the fact that the global clock is ticking.

Friends of the Earth, along with a number of environmental groups across the country, put forward a document called "The Green Print for Canada". It has some teeth in it, although it is not a perfect document. There are some additions, omissions and addenda, but it is the basis for real environmental discussion, which should have been the basis for the document tabled by the Minister of the Environment.

I am not surprised that the Minister of the Environment was afraid to come into the House to defend his policy. It is an embarrassment. It is a recycled bunch of old promises that could verily be characterized as a green bomb for the Minister of the Environment and the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

You remember, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister appointed the environment minister, we talked about "mini-bouche" and "maxi-bouche". We know that "maxi-bouche" changed places and became transport minister—You know, Mr. Speaker, this document actually talks about a transport policy at the same time as the government cut VIA Rail!

[English]

They cut VIA Rail only a few months ago. Now they have the audacity to suggest that we should have a national transportation policy that reflects a clean environment. If anybody had seen the environmental assessment that was allegedly an addendum to the VIA Rail analysis, one could see quite clearly that they went ahead with the VIA cuts with absolutely no consideration for the environmental impact.

If any Canadian has had the displeasure recently of motoring between Windsor and Montreal in the so-called corridor area, they will know that with the increased traffic in the Toronto-Niagara belt alone we are choking in our own carbon dioxide fumes. We do not need more talk. We do not more questions. We need some specific emission reductions. We need some specific targets.

This document should not be a document asking questions. It should be a document providing answers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I think that any Conservative whose heart is in the right place, because there must be some—

Mr. Gauthier: Not many.

Ms. Copps: There are very few, but there are some. The right-minded Conservatives who are, for example, actually against the GST, who are against the government's policy of giving everything to the big cities—

Mr. Langlois: Like Hamilton?

Ms. Copps: —and nothing to the small towns of Canada. Those who are against the policy of——killing small town Canada. I am sure that all those members want to support our motion which calls upon the government to bring forward a substantive environmental policy with real teeth.

[English]

This is not a sincere commitment to the environment. It is a completely empty, vapid, vacuous discussion paper. We have had too many discussions. It fails to offer the concrete action that was promised.

Do you remember the great dreams that we had for Lucien Bouchard, the Minister of the Environment? He came in and in the first week he said he was going to sweep the federal House clean.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Clean, Mr. Clean.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Lucien Bouchard was able to overturn the decisions of any department.

[English]

He claimed that he had the divine authority of the Prime Minister to act on every single environmental dossier in the government. In fact, when the test came on the Rafferty-Alameda, who proved to have the guts and the capacity to uphold our laws? It was not the Minister of the Environment. It was not the Prime Minister. The Canadian Wildlife Federation had to take it to the courts on two occasions. It was not the Minister of the Environment who defended the right of Canadians to have a real environmental assessment before any megaproject of that nature was to be proceeded with. That particular right, that responsibility was totally abdicated by the Minister of the Environment and it became a responsibility for the courts.

• (1020)

Now, in this document, the Minister of the Environment says that he is going to make sure that future federal laws are respected and are strong enough to withstand the test of time. What we believe, and it was alluded to yesterday in the very excellent question by the member for Davenport, is the reason he wants to revise the requirements under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is because he wants to make it easier to flaunt the law, to get around the law, to find the loopholes in the same way—

Ms. Campbell: Flout, not flaunt.

Ms. Copps: Flaunt, not flout. You may be a floutist. I say he is flaunting.

Ms. Campbell: If he is flaunting it, that means he is brandishing it.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: It is incredible that she is more interested in words than in real ideas. That is more or less the problem with the ministers in the Mulroney government: they are not even prepared to accept a court ruling as in the Rafferty-Alameda case that they have to abide by their own laws which they adopted so that there is at least an environmental assessment of all big projects.

[English]

It is not too much to ask. I am sure that all of those on the other side of the House who believe in a green Canada would realize that if we truly endorse the concept of sustainable development, if we truly recognize the meaning of Brundtland, then we must believe that the federal government must have the power of environmental review in every major megaproject of the nature of the Rafferty-Alameda. It seems to me that in the Rafferty-Alameda dossier we have a very good example of how the Minister of the Environment talks a very good game when it comes to the environment but is unprepared to act.

I think it is a tragedy that in the Rafferty-Alameda decision it was not the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada that protected the rights of the people to a full and fair environmental assessment, it was the courts. Now the Minister of the Environment is coming in with a proposal to water down the provisions of the law that require the federal government to undergo a full environmental assessment. He is parading that under the guise of strengthening the law, when in actual fact the two successive decisions of the court have shown that the law provides the protection. It is the government that is not prepared to act when it comes to truly carrying out the responsibilities it was given under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act is one way of ensuring that Canadians' rights to a clean environment are protected. But we need to go a step further.

Absent from this discussion paper—this vacuous discussion paper—is the capacity of Canadians to sue the government. I think we have to examine the possibility of class action legislation which will permit any Canadian to be granted intervenor status. When the air we breathe is poisoned and when the water we drink is full of toxins to the point that in the latest report of the International Joint Commission for the first time a direct link between neurological damage in human beings and the poison in the water we drink has been discovered, then we have the right and a responsibility as a society to make sure that every Canadian can pursue the government with the full intent of the law when the government fails to respect its own laws.

We recreate in the forests that absorb the greenhouse gases. Every time a tree is felled it does not touch one person, it touches all Canadians. We have a right and a responsibility as a society to make sure that every Canadian can pursue the government with the full intent of the law.

I can understand why this Conservative government would not want to move with an environmental auditor, in the same way as the Auditor General has shown himself to be independent of government.

[Translation]

I think that if we had an auditor general for the environment, like the auditor general we have for financial matters, we would have something specific that would give Canadians an opportunity to complain about the departments without dealing directly with the government.

[English]

We need some very specific legislative changes to reduce waste, not only in the disposing of waste or in finding ways of dealing with the toxins that we create but also to reduce waste at the input level. We need to develop solutions to the crisis that makes Canadians the most wasteful people in the world. The solutions do not revolve around more questions.

We know that we are over-packaged in Canada. We know that when we pick products off the grocery shelf, in many instances there is a box within a box within a box. It is very simple to introduce regulations which could be subject to a broad range of public discussion. They should be real regulations to see not only recycling but reduction of waste at the input level.

One of the shocking omissions in this document is that there is no very specific plan for waste reduction at the federal government level. I commend the Speaker of the House of Commons who, in a very non-partisan way, has embarked upon the most progressive form of energy analysis in the House of Commons. Working in tandem with the environment committee the Speaker of the House has shown himself to be very green.

We are sitting in a green chamber. Is it not about time that the good will and the forward thinking that was demonstrated by the Speaker of the House be translated into action in all federal government departments?

We are not only talking about regulations that must be brought forward to deal with garbage and waste at the private sector level and at the community level. We must lead by example. That example is not in recycled promises, or what I would refer to as the green bomb of Lucien Bouchard, but rather real solutions to the real problems that are facing Canadians and for which the clock is ticking.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my compliments to the hon. member for Hamilton East. The hon. member said earlier that perhaps we weren't allowed to talk about the environment, so I have a comment. I have here some of my remarks made in the House in April 1989: objections to transfers of toxic waste in Abitibi.

Mr. Gauthier: Who wrote that one for you?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Another one on September 1988: the importance of setting up a national program to deal with PCBs.

Mr. Gauthier: Lucien wrote it, and he isn't even here to listen.

Mr. Saint-Julien: All my statements on hazardous substances: PCB storage sites in Abitibi—Témiscamingue; the need for more protective measures in Abitibi; hazardous substances—people are asking for action to prevent storage of PCBs; the environment—another statement, Mr. Speaker. Another one: spill of viscous liquid in Abitibi. And there are many more. The concerns of Canadians.

The hon. member for Hamilton East said ealier that nothing was being done in Abitibi. I have another one here: transportation of hazardous substances. And last but not least, I have decided to send only one householder a year to save Canadian taxpayers's money. The one I sent this year was about a global perspective on local environmental issues, in English and in French.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment to the hon. member for Hamilton East about PCBs in Canada. The only government that let PCBs enter the country were the Liberals—for 20 years. As for the Green Plan—

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I can see that this is Friday and that it is going to be a very wonderful debate. I think the hon. member should have at least a couple of minutes for comment and then he will put his question. But I will listen to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier first.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: The debate must be genuine debate, so the Speaker must be firm. He did not ask his question. He is making a speech. He only has 10 minutes and he is wasting his time, and I wish he would put his question. He doesn't know what he is talking about. He doesn't even have his text in front of him.

• (1030)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. member please put his question, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton East.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: I don't need a text to tell you that for 20 years, the Liberal government sent us nothing but "b.s".

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. member for Hamilton East whom we haven't seen in the House for months.

Mr. Gauthier: Who?

Mr. Saint-Julien: The hon. member for Hamilton East who, I am glad to see, is in the House this morning.

Mr. Gauthier: She was here yesterday but you weren't.

Mr. Saint-Julien: I hope I get a chance to put my question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: The member knows the rules require that you not allude to the presence or absence of members in the House. I want to remind the hon. member that yesterday the member for Hamilton East was here. Where the heck was he?

Mr. Boudria: Where was the Minister of the Environment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member would please put his question, we will try to get an answer for him.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, at last. Actually, I haven't seen the hon. member for Hamilton East in a long time. In any case, is the hon. member for Hamilton East—

Mr. Gauthier: Can't you ask questions that make more sense? You should come here more often.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Is the hon. member capable of travelling across Canada with a list of proposals for every provincial Environment minister? The hon. member makes her comments here in the House, but it would be nice if she could meet with every single provincial Environment minister within the next two months and come up with some sound proposals for the provinces.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I wasn't here because I was very busy in Abitibi, convincing them to replace the hon. member with a decent member in the next election.

Mr. Saint-Julien: You never went to Abitibi.

Ms. Copps: When we look at the major environmental issues the hon. member for Abitibi has been pursuing, it all goes to show how much clout his comments have within the Conservative Party. He has made a lot of proposals. He told us earlier that he spoke on a variety of subjects. So it is unfortunate that his government did not see fit to consider at least one of his many proposals.

Mr. Saint-Julien: At least I made some suggestions.

An hon. member: Nobody listens to him! He has no clout!

Ms. Copps: Nobody listens to him, not even his own caucus. And incidentally, if he is so knowledgeable about PCBs and other issues, he should know that in 1985, the former federal Environment minister proposed a national strategy on PCBs, to be launched by the federal government, not by the provinces. This was almost five years ago, and the government has not moved on this issue. He wants to blame us for a policy that was promised by his government in 1985, and now it is 1990 and we are still waiting for a policy on PCBs. I think the hon. member for Abitibi should work a little harder and work on his ministers, since the Minister of the Environment just isn't listening to the hon. member's demands.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Sure. What about PCBs? PCBs are "b.s".

Mr. Edmonston: I realize that pollution is a problem that worries all Canadians, and I also realize that the Green Plan is a lot of garbage, to avoid the term used by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Saint-Julien). Since the hon. member for Hamilton East refered to what should be done, she must be aware of a problem faced by all political parties—donations and the companies that finance political parties.

Mr. Saint-Julien: And the unions.

Mr. Edmonston: The hon. member seems to think it's funny, but I am serious—

Mr. Saint-Julien: So am I.

Mr. Edmonston: —because it causes a conflitct of interest for political parties. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton East for raising this issue during her leadership campaign—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Edmonston: —where she said that to request a maximum of $1.7 million was absolutely shameful, especially for the Liberal Party, and I agree wholeheartedly.

My question for the hon. member is as follows: Since corporate donations may cause a conflict of interest for your party, is there a possibility that all your plans and ideas which theoretically are quite good might lead to a situation where you would be powerless to act, as you were before 1984?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I don't know whether the question is in order, but I think it is good question, because if anyone is hypocritical about the issue of donations, it is the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: My brother, as a worker in the steel mills in Hamilton, had to give his pay directly to the New Democratic Party—

Mr. Boudria: Whether he wanted to or not!

Ms. Copps: —which was campaigning against me in my own riding, although he knew perfectly well that I was supporting the workers.

So if the New Democratic Party does not want to dirty its hands with anyone's donations—

Mr. Gauthier: Donations from the workers.

Ms. Copps: —either from a big union or any other big corporation, I am quite ready, and I will be delighted to follow in the footsteps of a New Democratic Party that would refuse all donations from the union and corporate sector.

Since you mention being influenced, it is true the possibility exists just about everywhere in politics, whether we are talking about individuals, corporations or unions. But if we really want to see a change in party financing at all levels, it will also have to include corporations and the unions.

Let me tell you just one thing: in my campaign, I receive personal donations. Two days ago, I gave a benefit dinner at $125 a plate for 1,000 people in Toronto, because I prefer to collect $100,000 from 1,000 people—

An hon. member: Right on.

Ms. Copps: —instead of collecting it from two or three or four corporations. That happens to be my policy.

Mr. Boudria: Or two or three unions!

Ms. Copps: I am prepared, as a leader of the Liberal party and as Prime Minister, to make the changes so we can have this policy.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to start off, as I am sure you would like me to, by congratulating my colleague for her excellent speech. Such substance and eloquence has seldom been heard in this House of Commons.

The people of Canada wanted a green environment; they got a Green Paper. They wanted clean water; they got watered down commitments from the government. They wanted recycling programs; they got recycled promises instead.

Does my colleague not think that it is hypocritical for the Tories across the way to have shut down VIA Rail, at least in part and probably will eventually kill the whole thing, an environmentally friendly system of transportation at the same time as they are pretending to be in favour of a greener environment?

Ms. Copps: At page 21 of the recycled document it states:

> Transportation is a major source of carbon dioxide. The Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation will be examining environmental issues as part of its own work on the future of transportation in Canada.

Is it not a little late? It is incredible that this promise comes out just months after they have already nailed the last spike in the coffin of the great Canadian railway.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is now over. Debate. The Hon. Minister of Forestry.

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate on behalf of my colleague, the hon. Minister of the Environment, who is absent today keeping a long-standing commitment to make a speech to the Inter-American Development Bank. We all know that is something very important because the issue we are discussing today has many international dimensions.

I want to start by welcoming the hon. member for Hamilton East back to the green chamber. I appreciate very much her plea for a non-partisan, rational, compassionate approach to the issue. I want to welcome her back with all her enthusiasm and partisan venom. She stated that she has been travelling in areas where environmental situations have caused neurological damage. It should suit her very well to be a leadership candidate, if that is the approach the Liberals will introduce to this critical debate.

• (1040)

Ms. Copps: That was the International Joint Commission.

Mr. Oberle: She wants goodwill. Her speech hardly had any phrases that would bear any relationship to goodwill. The Liberals had been in power for 25 years and, if we are truly in such a mess, how can they stand up today and blame it all on other people?

Yesterday, on behalf of the Government of Canada, my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, invited all Canadians to participate in the reshaping of our future. Judging from the speech we have just heard from the hon. member for Hamilton East, there is a clear indication that more Canadians have to get involved in the debate if we want this debate to have any substance.

I am pleased to speak on behalf of the minister today. The goal of the federal government is quite clear, and that is to make Canada by the year 2000 the world's most environmentally friendly country. That would be in keeping with the image that we still enjoy throughout the world. It is not one we have particularly earned, but one that we inherited because of the vastness of our land and the pristine mountains, waters, streams and forests.

Let us take a look at what is proposed. The next steps are equally clear. The Green Plan is a national challenge, a framework for achieving this goal. It has four parts.

The first step is to inform Canadians about the challenges we are facing and the imperatives that must be addressed. Between mid-April and mid-May there will be information sessions in 30 cities across the country. We are hoping to engage every Canadian in every part of our country.

The second phase involves seeking the views of Canadians on specific issues raised in the framework for this discussion paper. This phase will last from May 21 to the end of June. We will be asking Canadians in groups or as individuals to make their submissions to us.

The third phase will involve the final formulation of the action plan which will be tabled in the House of Commons this fall.

Finally the plan will find implementation.

A clear goal, a clear timetable and a clear commitment to action, the plan is designed to position the federal government in a leadership role, to bridge the gap between those who have old fashioned views about development and those who say that all development must stop, that we must reach back to the dark ages and even beyond that where all of us could afford to live in a hunting and gathering economy.

This issue crosses political lines. It requires the co-operation of all Canadians. It requires us to put aside our partisan views about these issues and to engage ourselves in this dialogue.

All of us on this side of the House share the desire of Canadians, indeed the impatience that Canadians feel for action, but as the framework for discussion paper makes clear, the achievement of sustainable development requires more than the series of react and cure actions by government. If sustainable development is to become a reality we need a blueprint for lasting and long-term change.

We must also realize that going it alone as Canadians is not the solution. We are just now learning how inextricably our resources, the life sustaining systems, and the ecological zones and regions over which we claim sovereignty ourselves are interrelated with all the ecological zones of the planet; how Canadians will be affected by the destruction of the rain forests in the Amazon; and how other people on the planet could be affected if we do not improve our custodial practices over our own resources.

At the turn of the century there were 1.5 billion people on the planet. By the end of this century there will be 6 billion people, and that figure will perhaps double by the year 2020. What a daunting challenge: all these people will lay claim to some of the scarce resources, the scarcity in what the planet can produce for its human species.

Everywhere we look we see the symptoms of a planet under stress: the thinning of the ozone layer, the threat of climate change, environmental emergencies, and the disappearance of plant and wildlife species. They make us wonder about our relationship with our environment and the future we are creating for our children. They make us raise fundamental questions about whether the living standards that we have worked so hard to achieve can really be maintained.

As Canadians we are blessed in both material and environmental terms. Much of our material well-being has its basis in our endowment of renewable and non-renewable resources. More than four million Canadians, one in every three working Canadians, are employed in our five main resource based industries: agriculture, forestry, fishing, mining and energy. We are a product of the environment, a participant in its evolution, and a significant factor in its present character.

Canadians are the heaviest users of energy per capita in the world. In the process of burning fossil fuels, Canadians are the world's fourth largest producers of carbon dioxide on a per capita basis. The average Canadians produces almost two kilograms of solid waste per day, more than any other citizen of the world, and less than 10 per cent is recycled. A Canadian family of five produces, on average, more than 2,000 litres of waste water every day.

Canadian governments, business and individuals have not been indifferent to environmental issues. Over the past decade there has been a strong and a steady record of achievement in the environmental field, despite what the hon. member for Hamilton East says, yet the symptoms of environmental degradation continue to multiply.

Clearly we have to change some of our most deeply ingrained assumptions and habits if we are to live up to our responsibilities as stewards of a large portion of the world's environment and continue to enjoy the quality of life to which we have become accustomed. Perhaps we have to liberate ourselves from that part of our North American culture in which only big is beautiful: big cars, big homes, big plants, big mills and factories, big corporations and big cities.

In the area of Canada from where I come, most people do a day's work by the time people in the large cities get to work, spending up to one and a half to two hours a day smelling the exhaust fumes from the automobiles in front of them. Can we really sustain this kind of senseless development?

We already know that it will cost billions of dollars—and no one has found a source for the money—to rebuild the municipal infrastructures, the sewers that discharge into our rivers, our lakes and our oceans. Can we really sustain that kind of culture, that kind of habit, that kind of lifestyle? It means nothing less than the restructuring of our everyday lives and our families and our homes from the time we get up in the morning until we retire at night.

I do not anticipate it to be much different in Canada, but I have a chart which shows the annual release of dioxins in the United States by various sectors.

In the United States municipal solid waste incineration makes up 60.3 per cent of all dioxins discharged into the atmosphere; fuel combustion, 15.4 per cent; secondary copper furnaces, 11.2 per cent; forest fires, 4.5 per cent, and I would think that it is a much higher percentage in Canada; publicly owned treatment works, 2.6 per cent; magnesium production, 2.4 per cent; hospital waste incineration, 1.4 per cent; and pulp and paper mills, 0.8 per cent. Of course multinational corporations operating pulp mills are easy targets for the environmentalist. The truth is that all of us as individuals in our collective activities, in our cumulative human activities in the large cities, are perhaps the biggest polluters. That is the nature of the environmental challenge we face.

We cannot afford the costs of environmental degradation and mismanagement, nor can we afford the costly react and cure approach to dealing with environmental problems.

The government firmly believes that sustainable development can only be achieved through fundamental changes in the way we make decisions at all levels, including our personal lives as individuals managing households and choosing lifestyles, as working people making choices about production processes, energy uses, waste disposal and packaging, and as elected officials setting the rules for economic activities and environmental management in pursuing our international agenda.

This government understands that environmental problems are the result of the failure of all of us to make decisions that fully take their environmental consequences into account. It is the countless day to day choices we make that shape our economy. In turn, the flow of energy, materials and waste set in motion by these decisions determine the impact of our actions on the natural environment and ultimately on our own well-being.

This is not wilful irresponsibility. Choices are often made without adequate knowledge or understanding of the ways in which we interact with the environment every day, but sustainable development requires that our decisions reflect the true value of our scarce environmental resources and the fragile ecosystems on which we depend for our health and well-being.

It is not good enough to point fingers every time a new discovery is made, every time we learn to measure in even more minute quantities. Back in the 1930s and 1940s we measured in parts per thousand or parts per million. Of course anything that was not detectable was safe as far as the environment was concerned. Then we began to measure in parts per billion and parts per trillion. Today we can measure in parts per quadrillion, and we can trace harmful agents through to living organisms. We do not yet understand the health effects in total, but nevertheless every time a new discovery is made a finger is pointed at someone asking why it has not been corrected.

There is more to it than that. Improved decision making is at the heart of the government's long-term strategy for sustainable development. Improved data, improved information, improved science will be the basis of this decision-making process.

We need to forge and strengthen new partnerships. We all share the environment, and we need to work together to preserve and to protect it. Co-operative efforts are essential at the international level and domestically. We need to co-operate with the provinces that share and have most of the regulatory and legal powers to make some of the changes and the corrections that need to be made.

Of course action is also required to address immediate environmental problems related to the health concerns of Canadians, and action has been taken. In the House the Prime Minister gave us a very impressive list of some of the things that have been done over the last five years in the Great Lakes, in dealing with our air quality and with acid rain, and even in cleaning up the Hamilton harbour.

The government believes that action on environmental problems should be targeted at five broad areas: the key stresses on the environment and human health associated with toxic substances, waste and environmental emergencies; our shared environmental resources, air and water, including issues such as global warming, ozone depletion, acid rain, toxic air pollutants and local air and water quality; managing our renewable resources of agriculture, forests and fisheries on a sustainable basis. This is perhaps our biggest challenge because we are so dependent on these prime resources for our economic well-being. We are aware now, all of a sudden, that we cannot decouple the economy from the environment, one in every three Canadians being directly or indirectly involved with these resource industries.

The fourth target is preserving and protecting Canada's unique ecological heritage resources, parks and wildlife. We are now learning that in Canada we have roughly 39 ecological zones, and they do not neatly fit within the artificial political boundaries within which the federal and provincial governments exercise jurisdiction. Here again there needs to be federal-provincial co-operation. In every one of the ecological zones we need to set aside areas that are critically important in protecting their natural features.

Canadians and indeed all citizens of the world are at a critical stage in the evolution toward sustainable development. The Government of Canada believes that sustainable development offers the promise of a lasting solution to environmental problems. To bring about sustainable development, Canadians and their governments must proceed to develop an action plan that removes obstacles for better decision making. The government is prepared to bring forward a comprehensive national framework for implementing sustainable development.

If The Green Plan is to succeed, however, it will require the commitment of Canadians both individually and collectively. It will require us to participate in an over-all global effort to make sure that other countries are making the same decisions. If Canadians are to be called upon to make that commitment and to pay the cost, then they have a right to expect to be involved in defining the problem and developing the solutions. This is why we have chosen this course of action. That is why the government and I urge all Canadians, including all the members of the opposition, to join us in this necessary exercise of consultation.

The Green Plan is this government's strategy for the environment. It is a strategy with a clear goal, a clear timetable and a clear commitment to action. We invite all Canadians to participate in the national challenge of reshaping our future for ourselves, for our children and for all future generations.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, on listening to my hon. colleague, the Minister of Forestry, I am impressed by his eloquence, but I am less impressed by this government's environmental record. I want to ask him more or less the same question I just asked my colleague from Hamilton East, the question about donations, the money that political parties receive which often places them in conflict of interest. I want to ask my colleague, the Minister of Forestry: Does he not see that the millions and millions of dollars that the Conservative Party receives every year put it in a direct conflict of interest with the program they want to launch? Incidentally, I want to say that I am not criticizing only the Conservative Party, because I think that all political parties have the same problems and the same opportunities for conflict of interest. But we, our party, do not form the government, and secondly, the Lortie Commission is studying the problem. My specific question for the Minister of Forestry is: Does he not see a conflict of interest and is that the reason his government has not acted until now?

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is fairly new to the political process and to the Chamber. I would ask him to reflect on whether his environmental agenda would include a restriction on which political party a Canadian citizen or a shareholder in a corporation can support. Should we place restrictions on what political party a union can support, a member of an environmental movement, or any kind of corporation? We have no intention of depriving Canadians of those kinds of choices that need to be made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

WORLD HUNGER

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, while many of us are occupied these days with constitutional and other issues facing Canada in the 1990s, there is a growing population whose day to day challenge is to find enough to eat.

Hunger continues to be a major problem today. Each day it claims 35,000 to 40,000 victims around the world. Whether in Ottawa or in Africa, it is not hard to witness the wasted potential of people because there is insufficient food.

In one year in the national capital alone, from September of 1988 to September of 1989, the Ottawa Food Bank distributed 585 tonnes of food to people who were in need.

On the evening of April 6 and all day on Saturday, April 7, we in Ottawa South are organizing the Stop Hunger Fast, a non-partisan hunger awareness event that features a 24-hour liquid only fast. Over those days we hope to collect food, pledges and volunteers for the Ottawa Food Bank and UNICEF. Stop Hunger Fast will be held at the local Charlebois High School in Ottawa and we are hoping that our residents will take time to learn and find out about the problems of hunger in the world.

Hunger need not exist. Children should not be prevented from academic success because of malnutrition, and senior citizens who made our success in the world possible should not have to live in poverty today.

SKILLS TRAINING PROGRAM

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to bring you a success story, one in which the federal government is playing a major role.

In November 1988, through Jobs Innovations, a part of the Labour Force Development Strategy, a pilot project in Simcoe Centre was funded to assist a Skills Training Program in high schools and colleges to meet the demand for more skilled workers.

A partnership was formed between industry, business, educators, government and the community. They deserve a round of applause for their effort and dedication to this cause. From such a small beginning, we now have 55 secondary schools from 14 school boards and nine colleges, a total membership of 1,400.

I had the honour of participating in their awards night, March 27. Winners will compete in skills Olympics in Hamilton on April 21. Winners from this round will go on to Tulsa, Oklahoma for international competition. I strongly support their continued efforts and say, well done.

WOMEN'S PROGRAM

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, last month's budget may well spell a disaster for countless women in Canada. The fact that $1.6 million has been slashed from the women's programs of the Secretary of State means the end of many centres throughout Canada.

One of the centres is the Women's Resource Centre in Antigonish, which has long been a refuge and a strength for women in northeastern Nova Scotia. The Women's Resource Centre provides referral services, interim counselling, educational materials and programs for women who are otherwise often isolated and abused. The centre serves rural women and women in small towns such as Canso, where the crisis in the fishery will add to the family stresses which many women in rural areas already face.

The centre lost $43,000 in federal support through the Secretary of State with the last budget, a meagre sum which would have helped contribute to a valuable service in my constituency.

COMMONWEALTH LAW CONFERENCE

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Anne Caron, Marie-France Chabot, Danielle Pelletier and Claudia Prémont, four law students at Laval University in Quebec City, will represent Canada at the moot court competition of the Commonwealth Law Conference in New Zealand from April 16 to 20.

These students qualified by winning the Gale Cup in Toronto in 1989.

The financial support given by the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec and the Laval Alumni Association for this important event is a tribute to the excellence shown by these students and their professors.

I am sure that, thanks to our team of francophone students pleading in the language of Shakespeare, the Commonwealth countries participating in this international competition will see that Canada's legal system is bilingual and includes both civil law and common law.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to wish them bon voyage and good luck with their case.

FRUIT INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the fruit industry in British Columbia's Okanagan valley is in serious trouble.

A recent royal commission into the B.C. fruit industry found that the $675 million industry is on the verge of collapse. In the Okanagan Valley alone, the industry is worth $130 million. With this region's unemployment rate at 13 per cent, every dollar and every job is needed.

B.C. fruit growers and those in other provinces are lobbying the government to establish a national apple marketing board. A marketing board would stabilize the industry by controlling prices and quality, and by halting the apple imports pouring into Canada because of world-wide over-production.

I urge the government to act now on the establishment of a national apple marketing board by speeding up the process needed to put this board into effect. The survival of a major industry and a way of life are at stake.

DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, this week, representatives of Carrefour Tiers-Monde came to Ottawa to meet members of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on External Affairs and International Trade and explain to us the urgency of giving substantial support to the democratic process in Haiti.

The Conservative government must respond positively to this request which is unanimously supported by such important organizations as the Association québécoise des organismes de coopération internationale, Development and Peace, Canada World Youth, the Haitian Christian community office of Montreal and the group to promote respect for the Haitian Constitution.

I must say that the emergency assistance sought for Haiti includes medical, food, security and immigration components. One of the greatest concerns for those who are interested in the situation in Haiti is to have a country like Canada that could act now to help the authorities there prepare for democratic elections which could be held in early 1991.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the Minister of the Environment for his renewed commitment to the environmental imperative for Canada, announced yesterday as The Green Plan: A National Challenge.

In particular, I want to commend the minister for the process of specific and intensive national consultation which he has introduced as a prelude to final publication of The Green Plan. In so doing he recognizes that the first step toward sustainable development must be a clear and informed consensus about where we want to go. The real challenge is to develop the national consensus as well as we possibly can.

The minister states clearly that environmental considerations, as with economic ones, must be forethoughts to decision making, not post mortems as has so often been the case. In the debate which he is now initiating, Canadians will have the responsibility and the opportunity to reflect upon the difficult balance which we must find between mutually compelling goals for economic development and environmental sustenance. The Green Plan will show the way, but first all Canadians must help to find the destination.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I know it is unfair to quote the Minister of Finance using his own words but let me do it anyway. On May 1, 1984 the Minister of Finance said, who was then the opposition member for Etobicoke Centre, said the following:

> —the only response the minister has made to that is to increase interest rates. That in itself led to further weakness in the already weakening economy over the past six months.

On March 13, 1984, the member for Etobicoke Centre said:

> It does not make any sense at all for us to have this situation in Canada where interest rates are allowed to rise. Is the minister telling us there is no alternative, that the government has no flexibility and no other options but simply to follow the policy of the United States lock-step, and watch our economy fall into the doldrums again?

The member for Etobicoke Centre said on December 13, 1982:

> The inflation rate in the marketplace, the non-government control part of the economy, is between 5 per cent and 6 per cent. The current interest rate at 13 per cent or 14 per cent is simply too high.

The member for Etobicoke Centre was right.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, recently the GVRD, representing 50 per cent of British Columbians, passed the following resolution:

Canada was created by the federation of two linguistic groups from an English or French heritage;

It is important to work toward the goal of a country in which all Canadians, irrespective of their origin, can feel comfortable in every region. This requires respect for minority language rights;

Whereas we live in a period characterized by sharp and sometimes rancorous debate on constitutional language questions which threaten the unity and very existence of the nation;

And it is vitally important at this critical time that all Canadians in positions of leadership speak up in support of those principles which underlie the unity and character of Canada;

Therefore, the greater Vancouver Regional District, the third largest urban community in Canada, strongly supports the linguistic duality of our nation and urges all Canadians from coast to coast to display the tolerance and understanding necessary to the building of Canada as a unified nation and constructive member of both the English speaking and French speaking parts of the world community.

THE AMOS ÉLITE GALA

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, one of the goals of the Amos Élite Gala is public recognition of entrepreneurship, at a gala event. The first gala was held recently, attended by more than 400 guests who were unanimous in calling this event an unqualified success for the Amos Chamber of Commerce.

I would like to congratulate the winners and especially Les Serres de Guyenne who ranked first with the Élite award for manufacturers and for the year. The Élite for retail and wholesale businesses went to Gyva's La Boutique du bureau. A. Bergeron and Son received the award for a service business and the Town of Amos the award for public and semi-public enterprise.

Congratulations also go to the Amosphère Hotel Complex, awarded the Élite for new businesses, and to Ginette Larochelle and Yvan Rose who received, respectively, the Élite for businesswoman and businessman of the year.

SEED PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on February 8 the federal government cut $41.8 million from the Summer Employment Experience Development Program. This program provided almost 72,000 summer jobs for students in the past year, thus giving students the opportunity to gain valuable work experience and to earn money to help fund their education.

By slashing $41 million from this program, a total of 17,000 fewer students will obtain jobs this summer. Once again the Tory government is abandoning a federal role in post-secondary education in this country. It is abandoning the students by cutting the program. It is abandoning the provinces by slashing billions from its contribution to post-secondary education. In short, it is abandoning the youth of Canada and jeopardizing the very future of our country.

Surely Canadians deserve better than the short-sighted, penny-wise, pound-foolish policies of this Tory administration.

SEED PROGRAM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we have now seen just how committed the government is to the future of Canada and the education of our young people.

Documents obtained through Access to Information show that because of cuts to the Summer Employment Experience Development Program, more than 17,000 employment opportunities for students will be lost, even though this program has proven to be successful in the provinces with traditionally higher student unemployment.

But, should we be surprised at this government's abandonment of students with its dismal record of supporting those seeking further education and training? The Tories have slashed $41 million from the over-all student employment program.

It have proposed a 3 per cent user fee for students receiving Canada student loans.

It will, if it gets its way, institute for the first time almost anywhere in the world, a tax on books and supplies, further pushing up the costs of an education. As it has placed limits on transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education, this will result in tuition fee increases.

It is time that this Conservative government recognize that the most important natural resource of this country is its young people. Rather than slashing programs to assist students in their education and training, we should be investing in our future and putting more money into summer job programs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how pleased I am with the tabling of The Green Plan by the Minister of the Environment.

My riding of Cumberland—Colchester in Nova Scotia is made up of people from all walks of life who are very concerned about the environment and related issues. They want to work toward maintaining and improving the best area of Canada in which to live.

It is exciting and refreshing for me to receive letters, ranging from elementary school students to seniors and all ages in between expressing this concern for the environment. We are all concerned that Canadians are the highest users of energy in the world, that Canadians are the world's fourth largest producers of carbon dioxide and that the average Canadian produces almost two kilograms of waste per day, more than any other country.

The Green Plan lays out a direction, but also gives Canadians the opportunity to speak their points of view in 35 information sessions scheduled for across Canada. In every issue, be it GST or government cuts or the environment, people want and, in fact, are demanding the opportunity to be involved. I urge Nova Scotians to attend the session scheduled for Halifax on April 27, less than one month away, and express those views, make their recommendations and be a part of the process.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in December of last year the government forced through back-to-work legislation against certain Public Service workers, including ships' crews and hospital workers.

Part of the package was that there would be a report of the conciliation board within 90 days. The 90 days is now up. The Conciliation Board has asked for an extension.

The ships' crews and the hospital workers in Halifax, as well as in other places across this country, are waiting and they are losing patience. The ships' crews workers on the east coast have been waiting for parody. They have been waiting for a report. They have been waiting for some sign that this government realizes the incredible work they do for the people at sea, for the mariners and for the fishermen.

The ships' crews deserve better from this government and they deserve an answer soon.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, after the Minister of the Environment, who still is not with us today, released not an action plan but what he called, "simply a framework for discussion on the environment", the reaction of environmental groups was uniformly negative.

For example, Janine Ferretti of Pollution Probe said: "The Canadian public has a right to ask, 'Where is the beef?'. This is the number one issue and there is absolutely no leadership in this document".

A respected environmental activist, Daniel Green said: "—we need incredible changes to be the cleanest. That will cost money and the fact that Mr. Bouchard refuses to tell us how much his government is willing to spend makes me very leery."

Yet, yesterday and again this morning on television, the Minister of the Environment said: "Yes, we have a commitment on the level of funding".

Will the minister tell us today exactly what that commitment is, exactly how much money the government has put aside for further environmental action? Does he not realize that if he will not give us that exact figure today, he is telling Canadians that the exercise of consultation which he wants them to take part in is nothing more than a sham, a smoke screen to hide the fact the government does not intend to do anything meaningful on the environment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would refer my hon. friend to the passage in the budget speech where I clearly state that the Minister of the Environment would be putting forward a major document in an agenda for sustainable development. That document was put forward by the minister yesterday. It is a statement of consultation. It states that we want to listen very carefully to what Canadians have to say, be they other levels of government, members of the private sector, both from the NGOs and the industry, from individual Canadians. We want to listen to Canadians before we make these final decisions.

I think it is very clear from what I have read from a number of observers of the environment scene that consultation is desired, consultation is needed. There are changes that we are going to have to undergo in our lives, there are changes that industry will have to undergo. It is important that we have a degree of consultation so that we get the right environmental agenda package put together. That is leadership on the part of this government.

If he checks the budget papers he will see that we have set aside reserves to take account of emergencies that are facing us today in the fishery and agriculture. There are also very real needs in the environment. So we do have reserves set aside to take account of the expenditures which will have to be made.

• (1120)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Michael Manolson, Executive Director of Greenpeace Canada, said the paper is, "an excuse for inaction". Kai Millyard, of Friends of the Earth, talking about the paper, said, "What a lot of baloney. They look like they are trying to buy time."

The reserves the minister is talking about have been already committed to dealing with the crisis in the fishery, the crisis in agriculture, and now he is saying that same magic amount is going to be used to deal with the needs of the environment.

I do not see how Canadians can take that statement seriously, unless the Minister of Finance gets up today and gives us a specific amount. If Canadians do not have a specific amount I do not see how they are going to feel that the opinions the government is soliciting are going to be meaningful or taken seriously.

I ask the Minister of Finance, why the secrecy? What is the government hiding, or is it really trying to hide the fact that the government has no intention of doing anything new and meaningful on the environment?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have an article here which talks about what Ottawa's green plan must include. It is an article by Mr. Donald Gamble, a leading expert on Canadian water policy. His final point is on consensus building: "Confrontation on environmental issues must not continue to frustrate progress toward a sustainable future. Consultation processes point the way for industry and government and how industry and government can co-operate."

Sustainable development means that there must be co-operation on the part of industry with government, with other interested parties in the private sector, so that together we can move ahead and make some real progress to build on the progress that was clearly in place in our efforts to improve the environment in our last mandate.

Now the hon. member is saying he wants to have a precise figure. If we have a precise figure, that can constrain what the consultations will actually provide. We want to listen to these consultations, respond to them in an effective way, and in that way build the consensus that will allow us to move forward in a strong future of sustainable development.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the article from which the Minister of Finance quoted was written and published before the government's framework for discussion came out. It would be interesting to know what the author had to say about this meaningless document now that he has had a chance to read it. I doubt if he would have anything slightly positive to say about it. So, quoting it is not too useful for the purpose of this House.

The Minister of Finance says he wants to hear from Canadians before making decisions on the financial commitments. Yesterday in Montreal at his press conference the Minister of the Environment said, "Cabinet has already committed a specific dollar amount to the program."

The government cannot have it both ways with, the minister saying today that they are going to listen to people and then make up their minds, and his colleague, the Minister of the Environment saying that cabinet has already committed a specific amount. Which is it? If it is a specific amount, give us the figure.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the well-known environmental activist in Quebec, Daniel Green, said, and I quote: "It is high time the government put its money where its mouth is where the environment is concerned". Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether the government could tell the House today how much money it intends to spend. Doesn't he understand that without a public announcement today or the government's spending commitment, the whole consultation process will be just a big joke?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our commitment to the environment in the past mandate was not a charade, nor is it a charade in this mandate. It is a very real commitment of action.

I refer the hon. member to a number of things that were said in the House yesterday by the Prime Minister, setting out very clearly the specific actions the government has taken over the past number of years in dealing directly with the environmental challenges that we as Canadians face today.

The Prime Minister also referred to the statements by Mrs. Brundtland on the clear leadership that we have been demonstrating to the world on environmental matters. This commitment will continue. It is very clearly demonstrated in the consensus seeking document that the Minister of the Environment put out yesterday. The fact that people might not agree with certain aspects of environmental policy does not negate in any way the need for consultation.

We are committed to consultation, so we can bring people together to be fully in support of an environmental action plan which will be announced by the Minister of the Environment after the consultation process has taken place.

I repeat that we have set aside reserves for this. Those reserves are significant. They are significant enough to support a strong environmental plan which will be announced after the consultation process.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Previous reports of the Human Rights Commission have called the situation of native people a national tragedy. The commission, in releasing its 1989 report, stated that it had no reason to alter that judgment.

What immediate action is the government prepared to take to turn this tragedy around?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada and certainly the people of Canada would agree with Commissioner Max Yalden when he says that the situation confronting aboriginal people in this country needs to be vastly improved. In fact, Mr. Yalden points out in his report that substantial improvements have been made in important areas of health, education, social status and economic opportunities available to native people.

He also points out that further improvement is required. The government is working diligently in these areas through the review of land revenues and trusts, through the completion of important and historic comprehensive agreements and through the implementation of provisions of Bill C-31. There is also the fact that the government has chosen to increase funding in significant ways to our aboriginal, especially Indian and Inuit, programs for which my department is responsible.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the commission's report calls for a new deal for the aboriginal people of this country, based on a commitment by non-aboriginal Canadians to meaningful political and cultural autonomy and much greater economic self-sufficiency for aboriginal Canadians. Will the government commit itself today, as a first step in this new deal, to reinstate the funding it recently cut to aboriginal political organizations and communications societies?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the decision to cut any program was very difficult. In particular, I and many other Canadians know how important these societies have been. We wish them well and know that most likely they will continue to survive. They cannot get all their funding from the government because my department does not have the funding available that it had before.

We have a task force in place to bring together all departments of the government that have an interest in this particular area. We are carefully examining any way in which we can be helpful.

Yesterday, I raised the very important conversations I had with the minister for the Northwest Territories, Titus Allooloo, and how beneficial those were. We are now bringing forward an agreement which will provide some interim funding for the organizations. But in the long run, as Mr. Titus Allooloo says:

> Now that the immediate funding needs of the communications organizations have been met, we must not rest with our satisfaction. The challenge ahead is to determine alternative methods of supporting native communications in the NWT in order to ensure their future viability.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should proceed. The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. He knows by the letters I sent to him Wednesday and Thursday that the southern Ontario regional air transportation system is under study by the federal Environment Assessment Review Office. The Toronto Harbour Commission, over the objections of Toronto residents, Toronto council and even the royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront, is preparing to begin on April Fool's Day to expand the number of flights by eight times from Toronto Island Airport starting next week and to build a new terminal five times the size of the previous one.

• (1130)

Knowing that transportation is the chief cause of carbon dioxide pollution and that airplanes contribute five to 10 times as much as trains do per passenger, will the minister direct the Toronto Harbour Commission to halt its expansion until the environmental assessment review is finished in 1991?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the House will know that the island airport is operated under an agreement with the city of Toronto, the Toronto Harbour Commission and Transport Canada.

In an effort to meet the existing demand by passengers and to reduce the operating deficit of the airport they are taking steps to augment the services that are already there. As far as we understand those are entirely within the agreement and they are operating in such a way.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, there is a more urgent matter, that of pollution of the atmosphere. I ask the minister to consider his powers as the Minister of Transport which overrides the matter of the agreement that the Toronto Harbour Commission is violating.

Will the minister act now not only for the sake of restricting more global warming by the airplane carbon dioxide pollution but also to protect the recreation areas, the industries on Toronto Island and the mainland, the Toronto core area traffic flow and the thousands of waterfront residents who built on the basis of that now-violated agreement? Will you intervene by ordering a freeze on increase of carriers, increase of flights and construction of that new terminal?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are several areas of my friend's question which could be corrected. As far as I know there is no industry on the Toronto Island. That is for sure, certainly not in the winter.

I am prepared to ask that violations be corrected if my hon. friend would be prepared to be specific—very specific—in actually what violations he alleges are taking place.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, in the absence of the Prime Minister, the deputy Prime Minister, the energy minister and the environment minister, I fear I must direct to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is for the finance minister. He is here.

The government's environment discussion paper highlights the need to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide, echoing previous statements by the Prime Minister. Last fall the energy minister himself noted that: "The greatest reductions in carbon dioxide can be obtained through energy efficiency and conservation"—funding for which this government has cut by 92 per cent since 84.

Will the government now preclude otherwise justifiable charges of stunning hypocrisy by restoring funding for these programs to not less than their 1984 levels, which would almost immediately prevent energy waste and ensure Canada a competitive edge in tomorrow's more sustainable world?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the leader of the New Democratic Party, the party has sunk to new lows in trying to find some quality in its questioners.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I think that the paper released yesterday by the Minister of Environment set out a number of ways that can be considered in dealing with influencing better environmental behaviour. There are some things that involve taxes, while other things involve regulation, user and polluter pay. These are a range of policy instruments that can be used that will improve the activities, actions and behaviour of Canadians, whether they are individuals or businesses, in dealing with things that relate to the cleanliness of our environment. These are all things that will be subject to the environmental discussions that will arise out of the consultations.

I am sure that we will have a very successful result from this consultation, and arising out of that we will have a strong action plan.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I would like to ask the minister very directly if he would respond to the previous, clear question which pointed out that over the last six years his government has cut the alternative energy budget by 93 per cent.

In a show of faith today, if he truly believes in this recycled document, will the minister order the reinstatement of the full budget which was cut 93 per cent by his government? Will he restore the full budget for alternative energy studies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, both this questioner and the previous one have focused in on one element of environmental policy. Our environmental policy covers quite a range of elements.

The resources that we are committing to the environment have increased since 1984 and they will continue to increase. As I indicated to the hon. member's leader, there are reserves in the budget that will allow for us to respond to the consultation process and develop a strong environmental action plan but that action plan will arise after we have gone through this consultation process.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister's own document says that Canadians are the heaviest users of energy in the world. By what possible skill could he justify a 93 per cent cut in alternative energy budgets by his government?

[Translation]

I looked around in this garbage for a couple of hours, trying to find solutions to environmental issues. What I found, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Does the minister believe that we are actually going to control waste by the creation of an office of waste management as he is proposing in this document?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in a previous answer, there are a range of ways that you can influence the behaviour of people. Taxes are one. Regulation is another. Information that is provided to consumers is the third way. Polluter pay is another way and user pay is another yet way. All of these things are ways that are important elements, but they have to be combined together. They have to be effectively integrated into an over-all action plan.

We believe that we have made good progress over the last five years in improving the protection of the environment. We believe we have also made good progress in raising the awareness of Canadians to the importance of the environment. But this is going to continue through the consultation process. Arising out of the consultation process, there will be very real decisions taken as to precisely how we can continue this major progress, just as we have had over the last five and one-half years.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, in the last couple of years, we have had an explosion in the population of seals off the north and east coasts of Canada. Together with the foreign fishing that is licensed by this government, we have seen the problem that we have in our fishery today. The Harris report, if it is ever released by this government, will prove those two points.

Is the Minister of Fisheries aware that this year the price to fishermen for seal pelts has dropped by 50 per cent? They have been waiting on this government for a response to their request for price support. Why doesn't the government support these fishermen with the request that they have made to this minister?

• (1140)

Do the fishermen have to go and jump into Meech Lake in order to get support from this government?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am not advocating that these people jump into Meech Lake, but maybe the member should.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Valcourt: The seal issue is a serious one. Our basic approach in this area is in line with the long-term development strategy that focuses on research and development activities rather than short-term solutions in the form of subsidization. I am quoting the provincial minister of fisheries in Newfoundland. The hon. member is, today, contradicting his good Liberal friends there.

Is the member telling me that—

Some hon. members: Come on.

Mr. Valcourt: Well, we know what happened after the Malouf report —that we have stuck to a policy?. Right now, I view the seal issue as a serious one. Proposals have been received by the fisheries price support board. The application is under review and no decision has been made. As soon as one is made, I will make it public.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, that is a cowardly answer. There soon won't be any—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is a very experienced member and I know that he would not want to proceed that way, and I ask him to put his question in a more appropriate manner.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the seals now outnumber Atlantic Canadians two to one. It is the fishermen who have become the endangered species.

[Translation]

Does the minister realize we have seals here, there, and everywhere? Where is the government? Seals eat fish, not pizza!

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is true that seals do not eat pizza but the Hon. Member seems to eat more than his share.

[English]

The member seems to have discovered this new word in French, Mr. Speaker, but I want to warn him—you had to warn about a word he used previously— that this word is only parliamentary en français.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It is usually up to the chair to issue the warnings that are needed in this place.

Mr. Valcourt: But seriously, Mr. Speaker, the seal population issue—

[English]

It is, indeed, a serious situation there, and I intend to intensify the research program initiated in 1988, in co-operation with the industry and the universities, to ensure that we can get rid of what people say is a fléau there, but we need much more scientific evidence and we are going to try to get it.

In the meantime, my parliamentary secretary has been very active on the seal question for a long time, and I would hope, within the next few days, to be able to give an answer, one way or the other.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The Canadian Human Rights Commission's annual report tabled yesterday criticizes very strongly the Conservative government's indifference in this regard, which has contributed to a dangerous rise in racism, sexism and homophobia and to the marginalization of natives and the disabled.

My question is this: given the Commission's statement that further delay in proposed amendments to the legislation will surely bring into question the federal commitment to human rights principles, will the Minister assure this House that she will table these basic amendments this spring, as her predecessor had promised? When will she move toward equality?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to promise the hon. member that I will table those amendments this spring.

I will repeat what I said the previous time he asked this question, that the Canadian Human Rights Act is under comprehensive review in the Department of Justice, which has an enormous workload at the moment, and we are attempting to bring forward a number of pieces of legislation for consideration in this House.

I think it is important that the hon. member remember that it was this government that instituted the process that came forward with the report called Toward Equality, and we are proceeding to act on those recommendations. I believe that the House will be pleased with the recommendations that we bring forward for the amendment of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice.

For the second straight year, the Human Rights Commission chairman has described the status of aboriginal people as a national tragedy. He criticizes the cuts to post-secondary education, native media, and representative organizations as harsh and inappropriate. He says that, if there is any single issue on which Canada cannot hold its head high in the international community, it is in the area of aboriginal relations.

My question for the Minister of Justice and the former Associate Minister of Indian Affairs is this: This year, will she take the commissioner's recommendations seriously? Will she act on his recommendation for a royal commission? In the absence of any useful action on the budget cuts that came from the Secretary of State, will she act to reverse those funding cuts which have been characterized as a setback to equality and human rights for natives?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, would also like to address this question.

But I would like, first of all, to correct a statement made by the hon. member that there were cuts in funding for post-secondary education. That is absolutely false. The post-secondary education budget was increased—

Some hon. members: Come on.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): If it is in the report, then it is an error and I am sure my colleague will want to address himself to that.

The issues raised by the Human Rights Commission are, of course, serious and, as I have mentioned in this House before in response to questions on the Donald Marshall inquiry, for example, that there are a number of departments in the government that are addressing the question of aboriginal rights, and concerns for aboriginal people.

It is not up to me to institute a royal commission. It should be a decision of the Prime Minister and the government. I think it is important to point out that many of the departments of this government are working now on the issues that have been identified by the Human Rights Commission; the Ministry of the Solicitor General, the Ministry of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and my own ministry.

I think it is important that these policy initiatives be developed and acted upon, and that we choose the mechanisms that are most effective and will bring changes forward.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Immigration.

In January 1990, 11 per cent of all immigrants to Canada came through Gander, Newfoundland. In February 1990, 56 per cent of all immigrants to Canada came through Gander, Newfoundland. It is costing the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador $2.5 million per month. It is clear that this is an extraordinary situation. It is also clear that it is a national responsibility.

Why does the minister allow the cost of a national responsibility to rest on the shoulders of the province with the least capacity to pay? Why is she doing that?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, we are very well aware of the situation and are following it very closely. As minister responsible for immigration, I must say that we have asked for a staff increase and we are working in close co-operation with Newfoundland officials to strike a fair balance and to ensure that the people are processed as quickly as possible. We have speeded up the process and we are aware that, under an agreement with the Government of Newfoundland, we assume some of the responsibilities. Our department pays all the costs of the services of an adviser for refugee claimants. The federal government shares equally with the provinces the cost of housing and the cost of keeping the applicants for refugee status while their claims are being considered. In short, we always try to abide by our first criterion, which is to deal with the applicants fairly and equitably and in close co-operation with the province.

• (1150)

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is paying 50 per cent of this cost but it is equally clear that this is an extraordinary situation placed on the shoulders of the province which has the least capacity to bear that burden. Eighty per cent of all hotel rooms on the island of Newfoundland are full right now. We want tourists but we did not expect them to come this way.

Is the minister prepared to recognize that this is an extraordinary situation, accept her responsibilities and take extraordinary measures in the form of cash now?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, we have been sharing some of the responsibilities and are continuing to do so while taking into account the economic benefits this situation could bring to the province.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The discount rate increase announced yesterday by the Bank of Canada will be another blow to Canadian consumers. The new 13.51 per cent rate is the highest since the 1982 recession and will surely lead to a general increase in mortgage rates. I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs what he intends to do to protect Canadian consumers from the ravages caused by his colleague, the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for giving me this opportunity to report on the meeting I had this week. Contrary to what my hon. colleague said on interest rates, in the case of credit cards for instance, the Consumers Association of Canada has always been opposed to controlling interest rates, as you were advocating.

What Canadian consumers want is healthy competition among financial institutions, as they would benefit from competitive interest rates. We are very happy with this.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): That is all very interesting, Mr. Speaker. Opposition members are usually accused of having prepared questions. This minister had a prepared answer for a question that I did not ask.

I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs the following question. While accepting some of the recommendations of the committee earlier this week concerning consumer credit cards, why did the minister refuse to adopt the most important recommendation, namely to put a cap on credit card interest rates? Is this not proof that the government across the way is interested only in bankers and not consumers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. colleague had listened, I said that the Consumers' Association of Canada told the press and the people of Canada that it is not in favour of capping those interest rates because it is not in its best interest. We as a government must ensure that the benefits to consumers are the best we can obtain. In the specific case, we must have competitiveness in that sector which is in the best interest of consumers. I think that is what we have done and the Consumer's Association of Canada is on our side.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday, Canada's environment minister announced a wide-ranging consultation on the Canadian Green Plan. My question is: Since all Canadians are concerned about the deterioration of their environment, when will the Canadian government take specific action to restore and protect the environment, following the tabling of this Green Plan?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the document made public yesterday indicates, there is a four-stage process now in place and a process which will involve all interested Canadians in being part of the solution. During the course of the next six weeks there will be information sessions taking place in 30 communities across Canada. That will be followed by consultations with provincial governments in all of the capitals with interested bodies, including environmental groups. Following that there will be a specific plan put in place which will be announced to Parliament early in the fall.

In addition, and very important, there will be new EARP legislation, environmental assessment legislation introduced to this House within the next few weeks that will replace the very inadequate EARP guidelines that have been such a barrier to this government during the course of the last two years.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of the Environment announced an environment plan that we see from the previous question is all talk and no action. In Canada the backlog of unplanted areas continues to grow. Despite this, the government has not renewed forest agreements with Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. Tomorrow, British Columbia's agreement expires.

My question is to the Minister of Forestry. Will the minister use this occasion today to announce that he will sign those agreements? Will he announced today that he will sign a joint $700 million tree planting agreement with British Columbia?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question because it does point to the very significant achievements that have been made as a result of the action we took five years ago, not only in terms of restoring and rehabilitating some of our forests, but also in terms of the environmental impact such actions have.

I can tell my hon. friend today that we are one day closer to signing the agreement than we were yesterday.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, those are the kinds of answers that the people of British Columbia and the other provinces do not accept.

I wonder if the minister could confirm for this House, in light of his negligence and the negligence of the Social Credit government in British Columbia, that they started the shut-down and slow-down of FERDA forest activity in British Columbia and the cancellation of advisory committee meetings, and also confirm to this House that in his view, with the cancellation of these agreements, we will see the amount of wood supply to industry from our forest communities decline and we will see layoffs in forest communities throughout British Columbia and across the country.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that these agreements will not be cancelled. They will be in place before another planting season starts.

I have an interesting article that I came across this morning, where the head of one of the major environmental committees says this about the NDP stand on the environment and some of the important issues in British Columbia.

An hon. member: Who is it?

Mr. Oberle: I will tell you in a moment. I just came across this. It is the chairman of the Western Wilderness Committee. He said:

> I am really disappointed that the NDP have not formulated any policy at all on how to deal with old growth forests and how to deal with wilderness areas or parks, or how to deal with the Carmanah, specifically.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the court has asked the government to review all the bids for the goods and services tax data centre. Instead, the government has changed the contract requirement by abandoning its policy for awarding the contract to the lowest qualified bidder. This has created a serious mistrust of the process.

Why has the government acted so unfairly?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the government has always acted in a way that tries to get the best value for the government. The best value does not necessarily mean the lowest price. There are a number of other factors that are also important.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the minister agree that by changing the rules half way through, his government decision has caused chaos for the bidders on the data centre? Will the government in light of that investigate allegations of unfairness and subjectivity in the bidding process? Also, will the government make its finding public?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the government has followed what the court has suggested. We have gone back and opened up the tendering process and gone back to retender. We have set things out very clearly in the requests for tenders this time and there should be no more problems. People have what they requested.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): In the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, my question is directed to the Acting Deputy Prime Minister.

• (1200)

Last month the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced a $41 million cut-back in the student employment experience development program. We now know that these funding cuts will cost Canadian students over 17,000 jobs. How can this government justify the decision forcing 17,000 more students on to the unemployment lines this summer?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I would like to tell the hon. member first that there has been no reduction to the government's expenditure on youth. What we have done is to redirect funds from post-secondary students to high school students, a substantial number of whom we feel are at risk. We have set up a new initiative which is a stay-in-school initiative. Over all the budget for youth has increased from $198 million to $218 million.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister is hoping that there will be fewer students to study this government's programs. The 2,000 students demonstrating in St. John's, Newfoundland, understand this government's policies very well.

On February 9 the Minister of Employment and Immigration told this House that the student employment program will remain "regionally sensitive in areas where there is higher unemployment among students." The truth of the matter is these cut-backs will affect precisely those areas where unemployment is at its highest. At a time when the government is pushing Canada even closer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will please put the question.

Ms. Guarnieri: —does the minister not think it unfair to make students the cannon fodder of a misguided poorly planned policy and how can this government treat students in the poorer regions of this country with such callous disregard?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the member says that we are not sensitive to those areas of the country where students have the most problems. I would tell her that SEED money, which is what she was referring to, has been shifted to areas where the need exists the most, such as the example that she has given, Newfoundland. In 1988 they received a 90 per cent increase in SEED funds. There will be increases, not decreases. On top of that the unemployment rate for students has been reduced by more than five points since this government came into office.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT RESPECTING E. HERBERT NORMAN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table, in both official languages, an independent report commissioned by the Department of External Affairs on the loyalties of former Canadian diplomat E. Herbert Norman.

This report was prepared by Professor Peyton Lyon, a prominent Canadian political scientist. Hon. members will recall that his terms of reference were explained in this House last January 25 during Private Members' Business.

Its conclusions, insofar as they relate to Mr. Norman's loyalty to Canada, are unequivocal and should lay to rest any lingering doubts. They confirm that as a distinguished Canadian public servant, Herbert Norman acted consistently in loyalty to Canada.

The views expressed in this report and the methodology employed are entirely those of Professor Lyon.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 137 separate petitions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AUTHORITY TO BROADCAST

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, discussions have been held respecting the following motion. I think you will find there is agreement to the following motion:

> Further to the order of the House made on Wednesday, March 28, 1990, respecting the plenary session and joint sessions of standing committees on the subject of global climate change, televised broadcasting of the sessions of the forum be authorized and that such broadcasting be according to established House of Commons principles and practices and the expenses of the forum be met from the block of funds assigned to the liaison committee for standing committee activities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. minister have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Andre) agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between the parties and I think you would find there is unanimous consent of the House in respect of Private Members' Business on Monday to treat the order of dealing with the measures to be discussed in Private Members' Business as follows:

Item No. 1 on today's Order Paper standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan–Shuswap would go to the end of the list.

Item No. 2 on today's list standing in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo would be No. 2 on the list, and No. 1 on the list would be the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Accordingly, that motion would be called for debate at one o'clock on Monday. I would ask that the appropriate adjustments be made in the Order Paper for Monday. I believe there is unanimous agreement that that be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Hon. members heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Milliken) agreed to.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might just take this opportunity on a point of order to ask a question relating to House business. I would ask the Government House Leader when the government intends to return to the House with the proposals with respect to changes in the Divorce Act affecting the Jewish Get.

As the House Leader knows, these proposals are strongly supported on all sides of the House. I am certainly prepared to undertake our commitment to facilitate speedy passage. I wonder if perhaps he might indicate willingness to bring them forward early next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that that bill and a considerable number of other bills are very important to Canadians and to the government as well as Canadians who await the passage of these bills. It is for that reason that I meet with the House leader of the Official Opposition and the House leader of the hon. member's party to sit and plan in a reasonable way the efficient conduct of business of this House.

I appreciate the hon. member's suggestion that he will be talking with his colleagues to facilitate those kinds of discussions and I look forward to that.

ASSOCIATION OF FRANCOPHONE PARLIAMENTARIANS

SIXTH REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table the sixth report of the International Association of Francophone Parliamentarians.

ASSOCIATION OF FRANCOPHONE PARLIAMENTARIANS

SEVENTH REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 34, to present to the House, in both official languages, the seventh report of the activities of the Canadian Section of the International Association of Francophone Parliamentarians.

This report deals with the planning for a meeting of the International Association of Francophone Parliamentarians to be held next fall on a topic submitted to a parliamentary committee that I have the honour to chair. I hope that this meeting next fall will be a major event for parliamentarians. The purpose of the meeting is to set up a parliamentary documentation network which is very important for countries in the South, and northern countries are invited to take an active part in this conference.

FINANCE

TABLING OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Finance in relation to Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, with amendments. The report culminates over two years of work with over 70 amendments.

In doing so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the committee clerk, Marie Carrier, the table officers and the committee officials for their tireless efforts. On behalf of all the parties of this all-party committee, I would like to thank also the hundreds of witnesses from all across Canada, from every province and region in Canada who appeared before the committee, as well as those thousands who offered submissions and briefs to the committee over the past three years.

• (1210)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is no surprise to you or to the House that I want to rise at this moment to draw to your attention our serious reservations about the receivability of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-62.

On Wednesday, March 21, the Speaker very kindly provided us with an opportunity to raise our concerns about the proceedings in the finance committee on the previous evening. I do not think a more detailed information from my point of view at this point needs to be given about that particular series of events, but I would like to ask for your generous time, Mr. Speaker, in order to make a very critical point.

I do think, however, now that the bill, the committee's report, and the failure of the committee to pronounce itself on the chairman's conduct are all before the House, that we must address what happened and get some guidance from you, Mr. Speaker, as to what this means for all future committee proceedings.

The finance committee held hearings and meetings on the goods and services tax both before the bill was introduced and after the bill was introduced. Many things have happened in that committee, many things which would make a procedural purist shudder, I might add.

Today, I think we can afford to ignore virtually all the procedural hiccups in that committee, with one exception: the ruling by the chair to impose time allocation in committee.

I do not think we can have an easy decision, as the chairman made it, in terms of something that we can accept.

I admit that he was faced with an extremely trying and tiring circumstance at that time, but I do not think that the provocation was justification for this extreme step. I do not think it is particularly relevant to the question I am asking you to review. Can a committee chairman invoke time allocation or closure in committee? Frankly I consider this to be one of the most important procedural questions that all members, including yourself, will have to consider in our term of office.

The finance committee chair mentioned last week the dilemma that faced Speaker Brandt before he invented closure more than 100 years ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has brought another point to this debate, but I think the Speaker did rule on it previously. If there is something different, we could have a look at and then we could come back and rule on it.

I would hope that the hon. member would bring it to a conclusion right away.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, if I may make the point, the Speaker indicated that while the matter was before the committee, it was a matter for the committee to resolve. This matter is now before the House.

Mr. Andre: No, it is not.

Mr. Riis: The report has been submitted and accepted by the House. The point being, now that it is before us, it is an item on which we can comment. My view is that I ought to have the opportunity at least to be heard in terms of the procedural acceptability of the House receiving this report. It is the first opportunity we have had to make the point.

I look now to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not you will hear me for a few moments while I make the case, not to reiterate, I might add, what was raised in the House the other day but on a new point of order.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of the New Democratic Party appears to be referring to citation 821 of Beauchesne's sixth edition which reads:

> (1) All rulings of the Chairman may be appealed to the committee.
> (2) There is no appeal to the House from the Chairman's ruling except by way of a report from the committee.

If the committee were to report to the House in respect of some matter; in other words, if the committee were to ask the House for a ruling, then it would be appropriate for the House to rule.

To suggest that in fact we could now go back and somehow annul the decision taken by the committee chairman, approved by the committee under a vote, because the general subject matter of the committee, namely the bill, is now back in the House is to distort the meaning of citation 821, very clearly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I want the hon. member to know that I appreciate what the government House leader and the hon. member for Kamloops are saying.

He cannot re-argue what he has argued before. I would like him to state whether there are new arguments and, if so, I will give him the opportunity to present them.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, let me make it perfectly clear that I am not asking that what was done in the committee be somehow undone today. As I indicated, I am not suggesting a repeat of the previous day's arguments.

I have a single point of order I wish to make. I want to take a few moments to make it because I believe this is a most important matter. I would suggest that the chair of a committee has no authority to invoke closure in that committee the way it was done in this instance. What is being used by the chair of the committee as a precedent ought not to be accepted as a such. That is the point I want to make in some detail with the Chair at this point. I do not want to take up much time, because I recognize it is an opposition day and I want to keep my comments very brief.

As I said, I consider this matter to be one of the most important procedural questions that we will have to consider, including yourself, Mr. Speaker, in our term of office.

As I indicated, the chairman of the finance committee mentioned last week that Speaker Brandt raised this issue 100 years ago. Whether Speaker Brandt's solution was a service or a disservice to parliamentary democracy is a very debatable point. What is not debatable is that it changed forever the balance in the House of Commons. If the solution of the hon. member for Mississauga South as chairman of the committee becomes precedent, there is little doubt that it will leave as profound and long lasting a change to the equilibrium of this House as did Brandt's decision in Westminster.

For this reason, I think it is imperative for the House to reflect carefully on the proceedings of this committee and I hope you, Sir, will permit me a few moments to express our concerns.

I do not think we can in any way consider the proceedings in the finance committee last week to be merely a series of events and decisions, as you, Mr. Speaker, described the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs back in June 1984. I must say, like it or not, a precedent is now being set.

First,the chairman of the finance committee used the Lachance incident as a precedent. It was repeatedly referred to as such in the finance committee, even after the Speaker's caution last Monday that "neither this House nor the Speaker gave the incidents any value whatsoever in procedural terms."

The point is that the chairman of the finance committee on numerous occasions, as I sat in on that committee proceeding, repeated time after time that this was the precedent he was quoting: the Lachance decision back in the justice committee in 1984. If this incident is now used as a precedent, what then will two such incidents become? They will obviously become tradition and convention that will be used by chairs of committees from now on.

Because I do not think the attempted birth of a closure procedure in committee can at this time be reviewed as an isolated incident, I want to say that as a minority party in this Parliament we can only see it in concert with what has been to us an alarming increase in the use of closure and time allocation and a severe diminution of the ability of minority voices to be heard.

Six years have passed between the Lachance ruling and the ruling of the hon. member for Mississauga South, just as six years used to pass between one closure in this House and the next. In today's parliamentary environment we can expect that this tactic, if it is allowed to become a precedent, will be used again, again and again.

The question I would like to address is whether or not you as Speaker and the House have an obligation to review what transpired in the finance committee during the review of Bill C–62, the act to implement the goods and services tax.

You, Mr. Speaker, and previous Speakers have repeatedly decided that "matters and procedural issues that arise in committees ought to be settled in committee unless the committee reports them first to the House". It has been quoted time and time again by yourself and other Speakers.

There are countless precedents where complaints and grievances arising from committees have been brought to the attention of the Chair, and the decision of the Chair has remained always to remain disengaged from whatever the dispute may be.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, I think there are important distinctions between this particular incidence and many of the precedents and compelling reasons for the Chair and the House to reflect and decide upon this particular case.

• (1220)

You have rarely been asked, Mr. Speaker, to rule on the actions of committee chairmen which were as serious or as irregular as those which we saw in the finance committee last week.

The unfortunate ruling by the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in 1984 was one occasion.

Another was a case in 1919 when the House considered the second report of the "Special Committee appointed for the purpose of an inquiry forthwith as to the prices charged throughout Canada for foodstuffs, clothing, fuel and other necessities of life".

When concurrence was moved in that report in 1919 an hon. member raised his concerns about voting irregularities in the committee. Specifically, he was concerned that while he had the utmost confidence in the chair and did not mean to do anything which would denigrate the reputation of the chairperson, he pointed out that the chairman actually voted twice. He voted during the proceedings and again once to break a tie.

The member argued that "the report which purports to be the report of the committee on the cost of living is not the report of the committee, and that it should be sent back for further consideration". I am quoting from his comments in Hansard.

In other words, the member argued that the process was flawed, and that the committee should be told to go back and do it again.

On that occasion the Speaker in the chair did not buy that argument and permitted the House to concur in the committee report. Because that 1919 incident has like the 1974 incident become cited as precedent, I would like to point to an important distinction between the situations that faced the Speaker of that day and what faces us today.

On that occasion back on July 1, 1919, the Speaker ruled, and I quote:

> The House is only seized of the proceedings of the committee from the report that it gets from the committee. There is no reference in the report whatever to any question having been raised in committee and therefore my ruling is that it is not competent for this House to go back of the report which is in its possession now.

The difference is that today this House is seized of the proceedings of the finance committee. They have just been tabled. There is reference in those proceedings to the question having been raised in the committee.

Therefore I submit that it is appropriate for the House to "go back of the report which is now in its possession".

Those in your chair, Mr. Speaker, have usually maintained that they can only deal with committee issues when a report is made to the House or when a report on a given issue is made to the House. I suggest that that has now happened. The chairman of the finance committee has through one of its members presented to the House not only Bill C-62, in its amended form, but also the minutes of the committee meetings in which the bill was studied. The House now has in its possession, referred to it, if you like, all the evidence presented to the committee, as well as a detailed report of how the committee's decisions were made.

Included in the evidence attached to the report is the ruling made by the chairman on Tuesday, March 20, which has been the focus of so much concern. Also included are the minutes which show that this ruling was sustained when it was challenged and the minutes which show that a motion of censure was put in the committee but never decided upon.

This motion of censure was debated for several hours. No member of the committee attempted to amend it or soften it in any way. The meeting was adjourned by a committee member before the question was put, and the committee decided to adjourn without having made a decision whether or not to censure the chair.

Where does this leave the House? The committee has failed to report formally on the chairman's unusual actions, either endorsing them or censuring them. The committee has failed utterly to reach a decision on whether or not the actions of the member for Mississauga South should be censured. We all recognize the importance of a decision being made on his actions, particularly the controversial ruling of March 20.

The committee may not have made a decision, but the House in some manner must now.

If you accept the argument, Mr. Speaker, that a decision must be made at this point either to ratify the process by which this committee arrived at its report and make it a precedent or nullify it to preserve the rules as they were applied up until last week, then I would like to make a few closing remarks on just how that decision could be made.

Some months ago, when ruling on a question of privilege raised by the former Leader of the Official Opposition, the Speaker referred to a difficulty familiar to those on this side of the House. Chiefly, if the government has made a mistake, even inadvertently, if a motion is put to the floor of the House which reflects poorly on the government, that motion will invariably be voted in the negative.

For example, Mr. Speaker, if I could have convinced you to accept a prima facie case of privilege had been established and you had permitted me to move a motion of censure in this House on the activities of the committee or the chair of that committee, you and I both know that that motion would have been defeated. And the precedent would have been firmly established that committee chairs when faced with circumstances they do not know how to handle can resort to unilateral and arbitrary rulings.

That is why most procedural points are not decided by the majority. Either the rules are followed as governed by the Chair or the House decides unanimously to suspend the rules. The majority has the right to govern and the right to control the House but reasonable limits are placed on those rights. Some things cannot be done by a simple majority as they were done in the committee. They must be done unanimously.

I think that this issue as to whether or not a committee chair can invoke closure cannot be decided by a majority of one committee late one night after a marathon sitting. Nor can it be decided fairly by this House when such a decision would be clouded by the circumstances surrounding it, a highly controversial money bill, a mistaken sense of it being a confidence issue, and an extreme sort of atmosphere of hostility between the parties.

Members of the House and, I would submit, Mr. Speaker, all parliamentarians maintain that the House is by tradition and law a court, a very high court. We claim the right to oversee our own procedures and internal operations and take considerable measures to resist any infringement of our authority.

However, I am not convinced that we should maintain that authority—and I am sure many of those who elected us might agree—if we do not exercise our powers and authorities responsibly. If we are court, then we should act like a court. If we are masters of our own procedures and rules, then we must ensure that these are mastered, not mutilated.

I am not a lawyer but I hope others here who are will at the appropriate time tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in our justice system a natural justice is always enforced. If a process is followed in our courts that is seriously flawed and demonstrated to be unfair to one side, then the result of that process is appealable to a higher court.

I think of the recent examples Canadians have witnessed when the courts turned to the government and said: "The way you conducted your environmental assessment was flawed. You did not follow the rules. You did not play fair. Go back and do it again properly".

Similarly, if in a court of law witnesses are prevented from being heard or evidence is withheld in a manner which is not consistent with legal traditions and precedents, then the outcome of that proceeding is appealable. In the justice system a mandatory instruction can in fact be issued. A decision can in fact be overturned.

I suppose the question is: Is a lesser standard of justice then applied in this House? Will a lesser test be put in the process to decide to impose a tax on virtually every good and service than was applied to the process to decide on dams and pulp mills?

I am asking for your guidance, Mr. Speaker, on the following questions: Has a precedent been set by the chairman of the finance committee in his ruling of March 20, 1990? Does a committee chairman have the right to impose closure or time allocation without debate or without decision by the committee? Has the review of the finance committee of Bill C-62 been tainted by the chairman's March 20 ruling? Last, if it has been tainted, is the report of the committee still receivable by this House?

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I am also going to make a request. Your panel of chairs for legislative committees has been developing a code of conduct. In this House we notice that the chairs are voluntarily restraining themselves from even voting at second reading on bills and are taking other steps to ensure that they not only act impartially but are seen to act impartially. It would be most helpful, Mr. Speaker, to all members of this House if this protocol could be more formally codified, printed and distributed to all offices, to enhance all of our understanding of the role of chairs when legislation has been referred to committees. I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, your willingness to hear me out.

• (1230)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the member for Kamloops has made a masterful presentation to the House, and I congratulate him on the points that he has raised.

I think the fourth question that he put to Your Honour is the crucial issue in this case. It goes to the very root of parliamentary democracy and our sense of justice, our rules of natural justice, as they are referred to in the courts, and our sense of fairness. I suggest to Your Honour that the report from the committee has been tainted significantly by the actions of the chairman, who in my submission has acted beyond the proper bounds of a committee chairman in this case, or at least that is what it appears.

I have not had the opportunity to review the evidence in the detail I would like in order to assist the House today. I think that the activities of the chairman have tainted this report, and have rendered it one that perhaps ought not to be received by the House. It may be that the proper course to follow in this case is for Your Honour to review the facts and refer the entire bill back to a new legislative committee for detailed study.

As I say, the hon. member for Kamloops has raised this most interesting point and I prefer to have some time to look at the precedents that may exist. I would like to review the evidence of the committee in some detail, and I wonder if Your Honour would not consider taking this matter under advisement for the moment so that we could continue the discussion on Monday when there would be some time for preparation. I would invite the House to adjourn the discussion at this point so that we could continue it on Monday.

Then I will come back with proper arguments. I am prepared to advance some now, but I prefer to wait so I have had an opportunity to review the committee's work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would appreciate that very much, if that is at all possible.

I will also recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and the hon. member for Essex—Windsor if they have other arguments to present. I would think that the hon. member for Kamloops has brought forward a very documented argument in regard to what it is we are discussing here today.

I think if we left it at that, I would take it under advisement, and then at the same time, let us review what the hon. member for Kamloops has brought forward today in this Chamber and continue the argument again on Monday, at a more opportune time so we could allow the opposition day to go forward. Is that agreed?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be a fairly straightforward point of order, and to have the whole issue set aside for the weekend would seem to me to put in jeopardy the process that the House has launched upon where we have gone through a process of first reading, second reading, committee stage. The committee has now reported to the House.

This is one more example of the NDP and their jackboot tactics, their tyranny of the minority, coming up with a situation whereby they will not let the House continue on with the normal stages of the bill, that is, the stages that are to come, the report and the third stage.

That would be my reason for saying that I think that members can make their arguments today if they choose. The Speaker should hear which arguments it wants to, and then the Speaker can ponder on it and rule over the weekend. But to set the whole thing aside, to me would be just another example of using the tactics that we have seen in the last few weeks in this House to derail this particular issue.

Mr. Speaker, at the appropriate time, if you choose to hear the arguments today, I would like to make a few comments.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think it is very evident that the government does not want to hear the very long points of order that we are going to have on this particular issue.

It is a very complicated matter. Most of us have not been in a situation actually to have the report from the standing committee. It was just made a few minutes ago, and I would submit that there is ample precedent for hearing arguments again or later, when notice is given.

On many occasions the Speaker has allowed arguments to be made one day later as long as notice is given. I would suggest that, under the circumstances since the Liberal party has asked for that, since there are a number of our people who would like to actually look at the report and because I am sure the Speaker would like to have a chance to examine the report himself, this would be very logical and helpful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think there is ample time to go ahead and present the arguments today.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I think you just made a great suggestion to the House that indeed it is an opposition day. We do not get many in a year. This is a very important opposition day dealing with environmental matters, dealing with a document that was tabled outside the House yesterday by the minister but, nevertheless one that touches every Canadian.

We would like to ask members of the government to concur with us. Indeed, the argument before the House touches on a report tabled by a committee which studied Bill C-62, the goods and services tax. We have asked, reasonably, that the debate on the procedural matters be put off until Monday so that we can proceed with our opposition day. I think this is a reasonable request to make since the report has just been tabled and none of us have had a chance to read it, as yet. I think it would be reasonable for us to read it. It would be good, logical procedure to have the arguments by the members for Kamloops and Kingston and the Islands put forward to the House. I would accept and we would agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that this debate should be put off until Monday.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short intervention to make.

I thought that it was important that some remarks on this one issue be made today. What we are asking you to rule on, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not the procedure that occurred in the finance committee is now a precedent and can be used to allow chairs, forever in the future, to use similar procedures.

The point I am making is that we ought not to endorse that type of procedure. Because of the ruling that you would be required to make, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it would be in your interest to hear thoughtful remarks by members prior to making your decision.

As my hon. friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has indicated, perhaps we would all do well to reflect on this over the weekend, come back on Monday, or whenever appropriate, and simply have a chance then to assist the Chair in what I submit would be the making of an historic decision to set a precedent which will judge the behaviour to be followed by committee chairs forever in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think there is agreement to keep this over until Monday. Therefore, I will listen to the arguments of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, one of the components that I wish to add to the evidence that my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, has presented, I do not think is a component that should be decided this afternoon. That component is that in the very committee that the member has raised these questions about, the chairman of the committee moved a motion himself in the middle of debate.

If we do not carefully deal with this process, then we could have a precedent established in the House whereby the chairperson of a committee could move motions at any single time, not wait for seconders, and rearrange the agenda by his or her intervention. We would then have the precedent that in any committee, at any time, the chairperson could just move a substantive motion, not one to adjourn or not even to ask for a motion, but just move a motion and that is it.

I do not think that we want to rush into a quick answer on this. I understand the government's need for urgency. I understand the agenda. I am not suggesting that the majority need be compromised by that urgency, as they see it. The danger and the argument that invalidates the minister's reference to Beauchesne's is that we are here at the time of report on the precipice of establishing a principle that could be referred to by succeeding Parliaments that would hamper important decisions being made properly.

To quickly move into a decision that would encompass an experience that we have had, that may or may not have been intentional, of a chairperson actually moving a motion that would become an integral part of the business could mean that the Chair itself could use that reference in the House someday and the Chair's authority could be extended to absolute rule.

I was profoundly moved by the detailed presentation by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops. I was very, very interested in seeing the support from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the Liberal House leader. I think this kind of decision, albeit we have important matters in front of us, is the very foundation on which eastern European countries are examining parliamentary democracy.

• (1240)

These kinds of small, separate things begin to build up as precedents and erode and evaporate the power of the total House are matters of grave concern. A 48 hour delay to allow intelligent, thoughtful analysis, not only by the opposition, but by the government, is absolutely essential.

Some day the Tories may be in opposition again, and we do not want a repeat of Tories running down the centre of this Chamber yelling at the Chair with rule books in their hands because a motion overtook their reason and logic because the rule was not clear.

I am not suggesting that anybody would be as irresponsible on this side of the House and behave the way that group did at that time. But if we allow this kind of precedent to be established, then that benchmark of terrible behaviour as evidenced by the Tories could be emulated. We want to save the House from that kind of behaviour happening ever again. No one should behave like the Tories did at that time, ever again.

Mr. Speaker, I urge you, we need the 48 hour delay. We need caution, prudence, wisdom and thoughtfulness before we allow this to slip into a precedent and allow ourselves to be bound by that precedent.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, this place always needs caution, prudence and thoughtfulness. If the members of the opposition had been a little more cautious, a little more prudent and a little more thoughtful, they might have been more satisfied with the process. Instead, they chose to be obstructionistic. The world knows, and it is all on the public record.

I do not believe there is a point of order here. I suggest that the report which was tabled today is the return of a bill as amended, period. That is the committee report, the bill as amended.

This discussion is not about the bill as amended. This discussion is about what went on or did not go on in the committee. It is a discussion which was held about a week ago. If there was a point of order about the report, then it would be proper to entertain it. I suggest that this discussion is not about the report which was tabled in this Chamber today.

The whole premise on which these arguments is being built is a false premise. The arguments should be dismissed. We should get on with some very important business.

I am sitting here waiting to present the report of the Striking Committee related to the special committee to examine the New Brunswick proposition.

There is other important business. I agree with my friends from the opposition that the topic of the environment is important.

I suggest that either we have a point of order about the report, or we do not. If we do not, and I suggest that we do not, then this argument is irrelevant. If hon. members want to raise at some other point something about committees and the way they should function, then that is a different argument.

This report is simply a report from a committee that has amendments to a bill. It has already been received by the House. They could have raised these arguments before reception. They chose not to. It was received. It is in the hands of the House. There is nothing hon. members can do about it and there is no point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will hear the hon. member for Essex—Windsor and then the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I think that—

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize for interrupting my friend.

This whole thing started with the member from Kingston and the Islands asking the Speaker if he would rule today and if we could not put this matter off until Monday.

At that time the member for Kingston and the Islands had the floor. He had not finished his arguments. He was seeking direction from the Chair as to whether the Chair felt that we could possibly put this whole debate off until Monday, because of the importance of the opposition motion dealing with the environment. I can understand the government not being interested in the environment. But I do think the opposition is very much interested in the environment.

I want to ask if you would not go back after the next speaker to the member for Kingston and the Islands so that he could get his chance to finish his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take everything under advisement. I will listen to his argument. I am going to take all of the arguments under advisement so that I can rule on it Monday, or as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, you say that you will take the arguments under advisement and rule perhaps on Monday. That raises another point.

The point of order that is being raised is with respect to the fact that this finance committee report which was tabled should not have been tabled because, in our view, it is not proper to table such a report.

Does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that we can take it for granted that you have not accepted that report and that you will wait until Monday when you render your ruling before you accept that report? If that is what you are saying, Mr. Speaker, then I agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not say that at all. The hon. member did not hear what I said. I said I would take all arguments under advisement, that I will hear arguments and give my ruling as soon as possible.

Mr. Gauthier: You said Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I said as soon as possible.

The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I speak as a member of the finance committee which was engaged in the study of this bill.

The points that I want to put in front of you, in addition to those which my House leader has so ably explained, are points which refer to the effects within committee of the ruling which was placed to control committee activity by the chair of the committee. It was a ruling which, certainly in our view, made it extremely difficult for there to be valid and full consideration of Bill C-62 to be given within the committee, as was required when it was referred to it by this House.

The points that I want to refer to are four in number. The first is to buttress the point which my House leader has put forward.

It should be quite clearly seen by you, Mr. Speaker, and by the House that after the statements referred to by which the chair imposed a certain order of procedure, which he thereafter referred to as the Lachance rule, the Speaker in his ruling on the matter this week made it quite clear that there was no precedent to be attached to what took place in the 1984 committee. In fact in his ruling he made it absolutely evident that one should attach, as he put it, any "procedural flags" to what should only be regarded as an incident which had occurred within a committee.

Despite this, there was continual reference by the chair of the committee throughout the period of consideration of the bill to this as a precedent and, indeed, to the Speaker's ruling as a ruling which supported him as chair of the committee in determining that it was a precedent.

He also pointed out, and I say this simply for purposes of your information, Mr. Speaker, that he had been told of the Lachance incident by the clerk of the committee and that it was on that basis that he moved forward. Despite the fact that the Speaker quite clearly indicated to the House that the affair in 1984 should be considered simply an incident, it was clearly taken as a precedent by the chair of the committee and consequently imposed throughout the remainder of the considerations.

• (1250)

The second point which I want to make is that as a consequence of this order—and here we come to some of the rights of members of the House being undercut by what took place—a motion was moved by one of the Conservative members of the committee, Mr. Couture, to amend Bill C-62. That amendment was not permitted to be put before the committee, despite the fact that there was considerable interest in it on the part of a number of members of the committee representing all three parties.

Thus the consequence of the ruling has been to prevent a specific amendment from going forward to the floor of that committee despite the interest of all three parties in the amendment itself.

The third point I want to make to the Speaker is that as a consequence of the way in which the order was set out by the chair of this committee, it was not possible for the clerks of the committee and the clerks' branch to put in front of us as members of the committee prior to the start of clause by clause consideration of the bill the set of amendments which had been presented by all members of the committee to the committee clerk.

I raised this question in committee and the clerk was not able to give me a satisfactory explanation. Despite my request and that of other members that the amendments should be in front of us on Monday at the start of clause by clause consideration, the clerk was not able to give me any explanation as to why these amendments were not in front of us except on the day of the actual consideration of the group of clauses to which the amendments themselves referred.

Mr. Speaker, you can recognize that with the incredible complexity of the goods and services tax bill to have simply received at the last minute these amendments and to have to peruse them virtually as they were moved was not a satisfactory and acceptable way for members of this House to seriously perform their duties as members of Parliament and as members of the committee.

I could expand on that point, Mr. Speaker, but in view of the time I will not.

The fourth point that I want to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is this. It has become clear in further detailed perusal of the 1984 decision of Mr. Lachance, which the member for Mississauga South claimed as a precedent for his actions as the chair of that committee, that it was not in fact followed in the case of the actions of the hon. member for Mississauga South. I refer specifically to something which bothered me particularly. As my colleague for Edmonton East indicated in the discussion of this matter last week, one of the particular points which comes to be important is whether a chairperson of the committee can take action when that action is something which is already covered by the rules set down in our Standing Orders.

In the case of the particular action taken by the member for Mississauga South, his action was to deem withdrawn the motion which was on the floor of the committee. That, as the member for Edmonton East indicated, is something that is covered in the Standing Orders. For such a withdrawal of a motion to take place, unanimous consent is required. The member for Mississauga South claimed that the preceding incident as I will refer to it and as the Speaker referred to it, was, in fact, a precedent which permitted him, as chairman, to deem such a motion withdrawn. In fact, in further detailed checking the so-called Lachance incident in 1984, we find that no such action was taken by chairperson Lachance. Chairperson Lachance instead suspended the motion which was in front of the committee, and then announced his ruling with respect to the further points of importance to the committee's further activities. At that point, he put forward his intention to resign. What we find, Mr. Speaker, with further perusal of Mr. Lachance's decision is that the decision was not followed by the member for Mississauga South with respect to his procedures within this committee.

Therefore, we have without doubt a clear precedent, a clear breaking of the ice made by the chair of this committee, something which he claimed in committee when, following the suggestions of the Speaker, we raised these questions on Monday in committee and the chair of the finance committee claimed that it was Mr. Lachance who had broken the ice.

In fact, the chairman of the finance committee himself had taken a procedure with respect to deeming a motion withdrawn, something which is quite clearly set out in the rules that we have to follow in this House and in committee. He took that position without any previous incident or event to which he could refer.

All of these questions have been raised in committee, so this is not the first time they have been raised. Having raised them in committee, I feel I must raise them here now because the only protection for the minority and ultimately for the majority is that the democratic rules which are set down for Parliament must be followed. They cannot be picked and chosen on the part of committee chairmen or the Speaker of the House. They are rules which govern us all. That is what the rule of law is about in my view and, as a member of the finance committee, that is why I feel that this is such a crucial issue to bring before the House of Commons itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East and then the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands.

I would just like to state for hon. members that the Speaker has already stated in his ruling that neither the Lachance incident nor the Blenkarn ruling should be treated as a precedent. The Chair has already stated that, so I concur with the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I raised that point simply because even after the Speaker's ruling, the chairman of the finance committee continued to insist that in fact the Lachance ruling was a precedent and that the Speaker's ruling in this House on Monday had supported the chairman of the committee in making that point.

This is why it is especially important that this be dealt with in the Speaker's ruling on this further point of order.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, before briefly considering two aspects of the question before you, I wish to summarize the central contention, which is that the process by which the standing committee arrived at its report was so flawed and irregular as to render the report inadmissible in this House at this time. That is the central contention.

The report that is now to be laid before the House comes here solely by virtue of the clear violation of Standing Orders 64 and 67. That in itself should, I submit, be sufficient to deem the report inadmissible.

Further, there is the matter of the non-resolution of a privileged motion placed before the committee by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville this week. That that motion has not yet been resolved leaves hanging the question of the committee's procedure within the committee. This is a further irregularity of substantial and significant proportions.

Finally, neither the violations of Standing Orders 64 and 67 nor the non-resolution of the privileged motion were accomplished by unanimous consent. To the degree that they were regularized at all, they were regularized solely by virtue of a vote by the majority on the committee when clearly it has been established through centuries of practice that the only way the Standing Orders can be varied, save on substantive motion, is by unanimous consent. Within that committee that consent was never sought and certainly never granted.

The bizarre procedural irregularities through which the committee conducted its business are, in our submission, sufficient by themselves to render the product of those proceedings inadmissible in this House.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention two considerations that may govern your decision in this regard. In delaying your decision fully to consider some of the extremely intricate arguments that have been made here today, you should as well rule that until your decision is made the report itself cannot be admitted. First, if your ruling is that it can be admitted, I submit that that will raise for the House these incidents in this committee to the level of precedent because it will put the stamp of approval both of the Speaker and thereafter of the House on the procedures whereby this report was brought forward.

I would ask you Mr. Speaker, to consider that very closely, very closely indeed, as you consider the merits of the case itself.

If you cause to be held off the introduction of the report in the House at this time, it will leave you unfettered in the reaching of your decision, free of considerations of having in a sense to retract this, what would at the very least be, implicit endorsement.

As well, Mr. Speaker, if you do not delay the receipt of this report and allow it to proceed at this point, thereafter consider your ruling and find yourself in agreement with the submission of the hon. member for Kamloops, the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, you will then be placed in the extremely difficult position of having to devise a way to cause the retraction of the report that has already been received.

I stand to be enlightened in this regard. I confess that I am a new member here and certainly am by no means familiar—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I can listen to members of the NDP all day. I understood you to say that you were taking all these points of order under advisement until Monday. I wonder if we should go on to the very important subject of debating the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must listen to arguments before I take it under advisement. Therefore, I will allow the hon. member for Edmonton East to finish.

Mr. Harvey: Mr. Speaker, I actually agree with the hon. member. I am trying to wrap this up as quickly as I can.

Mr. Dick: Long-winded, aren't you?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Well, I suppose some would deem me such. I don't.

I would again call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the problem that you may present to this House in allowing the report to be received now, should your ruling later today, Monday or whenever, be that the report is inadmissible. Therefore, I strongly urge you to hold off receipt of the report in this House at this time, until such time as you have a chance fully to consider the arguments presented to you and reach a considered ruling.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I had the floor some time ago and I asked a question of whether the matter could be deferred. Your Honour, instead of making a ruling on that, seems to have gone on with the other arguments. I feel that I have been undermined somewhat in my ability to do this now, because of the numerous arguments, some of them very able, that have been advanced by other members, particularly the hon. member for Edmonton East, who I think has quite succinctly put the points that Your Honour needs to decide.

I want to say right away that it does not require consent of the House for Your Honour to decide to defer hearing this matter. Your Honour has that full power on your own volition to make that decision. It does not require unanimous consent or agreement of the parties.

I made a suggestion that Your Honour do so, so that you could be fully versed in the facts and that the members who are putting arguments forward could also get the facts.

As I have indicated, we have not yet seen the report of this committee. It has been tabled, but copies are not yet available to me. I understand it is quite lengthy, but I do not know what it contains. I would like an opportunity to review the report so I can comment on it in making these submissions. I want to know if it says something about what went on in the committee. I want to know if it points to the procedural irregularities that make it such a repugnant document. We are not being given that opportunity before we advance arguments on it to your Honour.

• (1310)

If that is so, I will be raising more arguments on Monday, and if I discover other irregularities, I will raise more arguments whether or not Your Honour has ruled. I will bring another point of order and raise it on a separate point.

I suggest that it is unfair to require us to proceed today with this when there are other documents in existence which we have not seen. In addition, the proceedings in the committee have not yet been printed. I understand the committee finished its work yesterday, if I am not mistaken, and I do not know why members could not be allowed the courtesy of an opportunity to review those proceedings before they have to make submissions. It may be fine for the members of this House who are members of the committee to say what they know went on, but for those us who are to make procedural arguments on the basis of the improprieties of the chairman of the committee, it seems to me that we ought to have an opportunity to review those improprieties in detail.

That is being denied by the fact that I am now compelled to make arguments based on the evidence I hear from members who happened to be there and who give their versions of what happened. I am not disputing the accuracy, but anyone who has listened to witnesses know that people's recollections differ, people's view of what is important and unimportant differs, and various people will make various comments and will remember different things; memory is slightly selective.

We are hearing bits and pieces of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Finance, which studied this bill. It would have been better had we waited until we had in hand the transcript of the proceedings so that we could discuss it intelligently and with all of us on an equal footing. But that is not to be the case, apparently. I am sorry that Your Honour feels compelled to hear this argument today rather than to defer it, since the ruling is going to be deferred, in any event.

Having said that, I want to deal with some of the substantive arguments that have been put forward. I suggest, as I did earlier in my submissions, that the important thing in this whole proceeding is whether or not this committee report is non-receivable by the House. I suggest that that is exactly what has happened.

The principle of the common law, Mr. Speaker, is quite clear, and that is that there is a requirement for natural justice, and this committee has been bulldozed by its chairman, who used bully tactics on the opposition. From the evidence we have heard, if you can call it evidence, but certainly from the witnesses who were there, on his own volition he chucked out some motion that was currently being debated before the committee, without seeking the consent of the committee, and the committee was seized with the motion.

Your Honour knows perfectly well that once this House is seized with a motion it cannot be withdrawn by the mover without the consent of the House; it has become, in some sense, the property of the House. I understand in this committee the motion that was the property of the committee and was being debated in the committee was withdrawn by the chairman, unilaterally.

That is highly improper and contrary to all of the traditions of this House. And then, this same bully chairman apparently on his own volition from what I am hearing, introduced a motion, not moved by any of the members of the committee, as I understand it. He simply introduced it on his own and said that the committee was now going to have to vote on this motion.

Mr. Hawkes: He made a ruling.

Mr. Milliken: The chief government Whip indicates that this is not correct.

Mr. Hawkes: He made a ruling and it was challenged.

Mr. Milliken: He indicates he made a ruling. Whether he made a ruling or not, he introduced the motion. That is all I am saying. Whether he did it by ruling or how he did it, he apparently put a motion before the committee and then said: "Now we are going to have a little vote, ladies and gentlemen", and he proceeded with the vote.

Of course, the group on his committee that supports the government acted as they always do when the government Whip cracks the whip and tells them to do this. They do it. They snap to it, except for a few free-thinking members like the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and I note that he was not on the committee. But had he been there, I am sure he would not have voted with this group.

The majority in the committee voted and supported the chairman in his ruling, upheld his ruling, and then in comes this closure motion, in effect, in that committee.

That was, in my view, an entirely improper exercise. We have discussed that before. The Chair has indicated that without a report from the committee, the Chair is unable to deal with it.

We now have a report from the committee. I do not know what it says, but I would hope that it has some words of censure of the chairman for these improprieties in the report. As I say, we have not had an opportunity to review it. If it does not, they should be there because clearly there have been things going on in the committee that, in terms of fairness, in terms of procedural fair play, in terms of the right of people to be heard, are improper. They were wrong and they should not have gone on. There was, as I say, a bully tactic. The members of the committee were denied their rights of free speech and that is one of the privileges of members of this House, Mr. Speaker, enshrined in all the authorities. In Erskine May and Beauchesne's freedom of speech is one of the privileges of members of Parliament.

I suggest to Your Honour that it was denied to the members of this committee by the actions of its chairman. He is supposed to be the servant of the committee not the whip, not the bully-boy. He is supposed to be the servant of the committee and he was obliged, in my submission, to act in accordance with the wishes of the committee, not just the majority, but in fact to ensure fairness as between the various parties who were participating in the proceedings in the committee.

I submit there was a failure on the part of the committee to come to a conclusion, to do a study on this bill that was in accordance with the rules of natural justice, that was in accordance with our privilege of freedom of speech, that was in accordance with our rights as members to debate fully and discuss intelligently these things and that was in accordance with the public's right to participate in the proceedings by coming and giving evidence.

The Minister of Supply and Services is mumbling from his seat again. I know that he would liked to have been a member of this committee.

An hon. member: Was he mumbling or was he growling?

Mr. Milliken: The parliamentary secretary says it was a growl. The Minister of Supply and Services is not a lion that terrifies this particular lamb I can tell him. I think that the Minister of Supply and Services should have got on the committee and participated in its proceedings. I am sure he would have made a very worthwhile contribution, and chances are if the minister had been there he would be voting against the goods and services tax because he would have heard the—

Mr. Dick: Peter, you waste more time in this House of Commons on these stupid things than everybody else put together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would hope that we could finalize this. This is an opposition day and I am sure there are other members who would like to speak. I would hope that the hon. member would come to the finality of these arguments so that the Speaker could at least have an opportunity to review some of this and come back with a ruling. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the point I was trying to make, Sir, was that this committee report ought not to be received. I suggest that Your Honour review the report, the proceedings in the committee, the submissions that have been made by members in this House, and then reject the report. I suggest that the Chair then has the authority to refer this bill back to another committee, a new committee that will do a proper study on this bill and then report it in due course, one way or the other, to the House.

I think that the procedural irregularities that have plagued this committee to date have rendered this report nugatory and I suggest it be refused in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Churchill on a further argument. I am sure he has heard all the arguments here. Does he have something new to add?

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do. As you know, when I entered the discussion earlier it was basically to ask for The Speaker's indulgence which has been given earlier on previous occasions when there is a complicated matter before us in order that the parties, including the government, would have the opportunity to make further argument on Monday, which is an appropriate measure and a measure which has certainly been bound and recognized in the traditions of this House.

As the previous speaker on behalf of the Liberal Party put it, there are number of things that happened in that standing committee of which members of the House are just becoming aware. We all know about the ruling that insisted that the committee in six hours would review clauses 13 to 66 of the bill and then vote on them and any amendments. We all know that the Chair in his order, in his ruling, a ruling that was not asked for by any member of the committee, ruled that the debate must finish by Thursday afternoon and that the committee must report today. We all know that he said that opposition parties would be allowed one minute per amendment and that other members of the committee would be allowed one minute per amendment.

I just discovered this morning that the Chair did not enforce that rule when he did not wish to enforce that rule. In other words, sometimes he would enforce his own ruling and force members of the opposition to speak on an amendment for less than one minute on an issue of this importance. Can you imagine dealing with Clause 12, or Clause 13, or Clause 14 of the goods and services tax bill and be told by a ruling of the Chair —unsought after as that ruling was, interrupting the debate on a motion put forward in a legitimate process —that you are allowed to speak for only one minute, and to have that enforced by the Chair. And that same Chair, himself, on the next amendment, spoke for more than five, or six, or seven, or eight minutes. What kind of a rule of law, what kind of rule of precedent was that committee operating on? The Chair can tell other members that my ruling stands when you speak, but when I speak it does not matter, it does not count.

We had an intolerable situation in the committee. We are just finding out some of the things that the Chair did. There was a privilege motion. The Chair allowed himself to speak for more than one minute. He would not allow others to speak, except when he chose to let them speak for more than one minute. It was draconian. It was completely without precedent in the way that this House and the committees of this House have acted. I would submit that since the committee itself has not dealt with the privilege motion, the motion to have the member removed from the chair, that there are many things we have to worry about with regard to the conduct of the Chair, with regard to whether or not this report is admissible, whether or not the House can feel any confidence that we followed the process set out in the standing orders to have a report stage which is preceded by clause-by-clause study in a committee.

How can we go into report stage now when the document that is going to be submitted to this House is flawed? It did not follow the standing orders with regard to how a committee works. It did not follow the rules of the House in terms of how motions are made. It invoked rules which do not exist anywhere in the scope of the parliamentary practice and that those rules were not enforced in any uniform manner for all members of that committee.

We are making very serious charges against the conduct of that committee and the Chair of that committee. I would ask and request that the Speaker make sure that all members of this House and members of that committee have a full opportunity on Monday to explain their grievances against the Chair and against the committee and to explain why they believe that the committee report on the goods and services tax is inadmissible to this House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say to the hon. member for Churchill that the Speaker has already stated in his ruling that neither the Lachance incident nor the Blenkarn ruling should be treated as precedents.

However, the Chair will take the hon. member's comments under advisement and return to the House at a later time on points of order raised.

I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for Edmonton East, and all other members for their contribution in this particular debate. I will come back with a ruling as soon as possible.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments but as my hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands also indicated since the report has only been tabled we have not had a chance to examine it. If there is new information or evidence that we feel would be helpful in the Chair's ruling we would certainly feel an obligation to raise that on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If there is something further after the Speaker has made a ruling and if the hon. member does have another point of order or point of privilege that he would like to raise he may do so.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take overly long to intervene on this point of order because certainly this is an opposition day, the day provided for the Official Opposition. It is unfortunate that the NDP has decided to take up so much of that time but I think we as government members must respond to this point of order.

I have heard a lot of talk here this afternoon indicating that we are dealing here with fundamental principles. I agree with that. We are dealing with fundamental principles, but the fundamental principle that is being forgotten in this process, and the one that I think has been very clearly abused by the NDP members is this: There is a fundamental principle that the opposition has a right to oppose but the government must, in the end, have the right to govern. It must be able to proceed with its legislation.

That is the very fundamental and probably the most important principle of a parliamentary democracy. I think that is the question that we really are looking at here today. It is not what happened with the chairman's ruling in the committee. It is why the chairman had to rule as he did. Because, Mr. Speaker, if we look at the point of order that has been raised before us today, I think, first of all, there are a few things that have to be said.

First, as you have said several times, the Speaker has already ruled on the substantive part of this issue. The Speaker has clearly said that he does not accept this as a precedent of any longstanding. It is not a precedent with which this House is seized. I understand that argument and I am not prepared to argue that.

But the NDP members continue to insist that even after the Speaker has ruled, and even after that process was completed in the finance committee, somehow they should once again be allowed to derail and throw off the tracks this whole process. Of course, that is what this whole thing is really about. It is really a way of the minority once again acting in a tyrannical fashion or to use their own words, "putting the jackboots to Parliament". That is essentially the kind of activity that we are seeing.

You know, Sir, as Speaker, that one of the very important, fundamental roles of the Speaker is the obligation to maintain order. Of course that same principle applies to the chairman of a committee. The chairman must try through whatever means he or she has to maintain order in the committee.

What we were dealing with here in this particular committee was not your run of the mill committee behaviour. In fact, what you are dealing with, Mr. Speaker, was very extreme behaviour by the NDP party. Extreme to the point that I am not sure any of us, certainly in my memory, in my 10 years here in the House, have I seen that kind of behaviour of people running around with little pink pillows, slippers on their feet and bells on their toes! I mean, Mr. Speaker, surely, if ever there was an example of extreme childish behaviour, that certainly was the case.

Now, if my memory serves me, the committee had sat in a marathon sitting for something like 36 hours. Thirty-six hours of non-stop sitting simply because the NDP members were not prepared to deal with substantive debate to allow the House and committee to proceed. They wanted strictly to play games, not only as they had demonstrated in this committee, but as they had demonstrated previously here in this House. That is what we have been living with now for several weeks, to the point that the third party have themselves so pumped up that they now think they are the Official Opposition. They now think they have the right to tie up the House of Commons, to tie up the committees, to do whatever they choose and totally frustrate the government from its right to govern. And I might add, Mr. Speaker, the right of the Official Opposition to perform their role. We see by the very fact that the NDP members have raised this point of order today that this is a demonstration of their arrogance and their callousness.

We have an issue which we consider important. It is an issue on the environment which has been raised by the Official Opposition. But what has happened? The NDP member chose to raise a point of order. They have now used up almost one hour and a half of time that could have been used to debate that issue. They chose to do that, I argue, not because of what happened in the finance committee but because they have chosen to demonstrate to this House that they are going to derail, threaten, intimidate and do whatever they have to do to delay this House, the government and even the Official Opposition from performing their roles.

Let us return to that basic fundamental principle of a government being able to govern, and a chairman being asked to maintain order. One of the things that I think we have to remember is that we were dealing with a very extreme circumstance. The behaviour of the chairman of the committee was not something that is done every day.

Why was it done this time? Because the circumstances in which the committee found itself was a circumstance that was in itself extreme. It required an unusual approach by the chairman. The chairman had to take some very unusual approaches in order to maintain order and decorum in that committee. The chairman had to keep order. The point we are making is that order had to be maintained with extreme actions.

One other point I want to make is that we have a very fine balance of rules in this House to protect the rights of the majority and to protect the rights of the minority. We had in this committee a demonstration of those rules working. What happened is the chairman took a very unusual action to solve a very unusual problem caused by the childish behaviour of the NDP. What followed is what should happen. Immediately there was a challenge to the chairman's ruling. The question was put to the committee and the committee sustained the chairman. The rules were being followed in exactly the way that they should. There was the check and the balance that was necessary to make sure that the chairman did not in any way abuse his or her authority.

Not only have we got a ruling in the House on this particular issue, we also have a decision of the committee sustaining the role of the chairman and the action of the chairman because the chairman was dealing with extreme childish behaviour on the part of that third party, which was disrupting all of the rights and opportunities of both the government members and the Official Opposition members.

The House leader of the NDP, in raising his original point of order, asked four questions. Is it a precedent? If he had read the ruling of the Chair he would know that the Chair had already said no. It is not a precedent in this House.

Second, he asked whether the chairman can introduce closure. The chairman could do it, did do it and was sustained by the committee for having done it.

The third question was whether the report had somehow been tainted by this behaviour. If it has somehow been tainted, can it be accepted? No. The report has not been tainted. I will tell you what has been tainted in this process. What has been tainted is the reputation of the NDP party. They have gone beyond—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River has referred to the NDP party. That reference does not make any sense. The letters NDP refer to the New Democratic Party. To refer to the NDP party means he is referring to the New Democratic Party party. That does not make any sense. I ask the hon. member to think when he is talking and think about what he is saying. To refer to the NDP party, granted, some of my colleagues were taking moments of that committee rather lightly but I would not call it a party that they were having. It was not an NDP party, it was the NDP attempting to bring some sense to that committee so that the people of Canada could be heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has really heard wonderful arguments today.

I think we should lay it to rest so I may assess the matter and come back.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, my apologies for referring to the NDP party. I do keep referring to the NDP party, and it is because I think of the New Democratic People's party. The fact is that, whatever you call it, they have been acting in a childish and tyrannical fashion, and really have been abusing the rights of both the government and the Official Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I want to leave you with three questions that I think need to be considered, since you are considering the four questions that were put on the floor by the NDP House leader.

I think there are three questions that need to be examined because they go to this fundamental principle. First, were the NDP exceeding acceptable standards of behaviour by not allowing debate but instead grandstanding, filibustering and delaying, not only in the committee, but in the House previously. I think they have been doing that. I think the answer to that question is yes.

Second, if their behaviour was abnormal—as it certainly was— then did it not require an unusual response? I think the answer to that question is also yes.

The third question then, is: Does the third party have the right to filibuster, delay and prevent the real opposition from debating, or the government from governing? That is the question that goes to the fundamental principle that the Opposition does have a right to oppose, but the government has a right to govern. That is the very fundamental principle that these characters, in their childish, jackboot tactics and approaches, have forgotten.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I made the statement not too long ago that I felt there really was not a point of order here.

I have listened now to interventions by very many people, and I would just like to spend a minute or two to deal with the substance of the issue. When I first was elected to this Chamber some 11 years ago, I read a lot about it. I read a lot about the precedents of the House of Commons.

It has been a longstanding practice, going back to the beginning of the parliamentary system, that Speakers from time to time make rulings that are not covered in any kind of exact way by the Orders of the Day. The House then can divide on whether or not to uphold the Speaker. Speakers, going back for hundreds of years, have ruled that the tyranny of the minority must be brought to a close, and have submitted that ruling to the Chamber and the majority in the Chamber rules.

That is what happened in committee. It is not the first time it has happened in committee. I suggest to you it will not be the last time. The minority cannot be allowed to hijack the business of the people, to cause extra expense for the people, and on and on and on.

We have dealt, in this Chamber, with the provision of two rules that have to deal with the issue before us today. We have had for many years a closure rule that is put without debate or amendment, and the House divides. That could have been done. We have another form of limiting debate called time allocation. Members will know that this Chamber decided that the maximum length of time for debate on time allocation is two hours in the Chamber.

That party, with its pillows, blankets and bells on their toes debated a time allocation motion for better than 31 hours, 15 times the allowable time in this Chamber, at great cost to the taxpayers of this nation.

• (1340)

Perhaps the Chamber should entertain a motion of appreciation for the chairman of the finance committee for his tolerance as a chairman in protecting the third party, the NDP party—

Mr. Riis: Order.

Mr. Hawkes: —for as many hours as he protected them in their decision to blockade this Chamber and the business of this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will entertain another point of order but I think the Chair has heard enough arguments in regard to this and I think that we should carry on. I will listen to arguments, but I feel that members are taxing the Chair a little today. I would hope that members would come to a conclusion so that I can make a ruling on behalf of the Chamber. The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, just to add one additional point to the debate. A member who spoke indicated, in directing a comment to you, Mr. Speaker, that the chair of the finance committee referred to the Lichens precedent and that the Speaker in this House indicated in his ruling the other day that the Lachance circumstance would not be considered a precedent.

He said nothing about the Blenkarn incident. I just want to make that clear that he was referring to the Lachance justice committee circumstance when he said this must not be considered a precedent. The hon. member for Mississauga South indicated that he considered it to be a precedent but the Chair indicated that it ought not be and he certainly said nothing about the Blenkarn incident. That is the point we are trying to make. We do not want that to become a precedent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am not going to argue with the hon. member but I think that when he referred to the Lachance committee he knew who the chairman was in the committee. I would suggest to the hon. member—I may be wrong—that he might have referred to Blenkarn.

In any event, was the hon. member for Chambly rising on this point or was he going to ask the hon. minister a question or comment?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I was going to make a comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A comment in regard to this point of order?

Mr. Edmonston: Addressed to one of the principles that were raised by the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think I have heard enough arguments today in regard to the matter here today. I think we should carry on. I will listen to the hon. member's point of order. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): I will be very brief. I have also been very patient listening to the arguments raised on both sides of the House but I find that one of the principles that has been overlooked is the principle of audi alteram partem. I would appreciate if you take a look at that principle, Mr. Speaker, which means that all parties should be heard.

The opposition, whichever party we are talking about in opposition, argues that this principle of audi alteram partem has to be respected. If we take away the tools of the opposition so that the parties be heard, we cannot be in opposition. It is a farce.

We hear the argument that might makes right, that we have to govern, but one of the principal ingredients of governing correctly is listening to all parties. One of the reasons for this situation is that the parties were not listened to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will now conclude by thanking hon. members: the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. Whip, the hon. parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Edmonton East, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, all the hon. gentleman who have contributed. I appreciate all the arguments that have taken place here today and I will take everything under advisement and come back as soon as possible to make a ruling.

STRIKING—THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, now that the important committee has been struck and the members identified, at an earlier House leaders' meeting there was an undertaking by the government House leader that there be consultations between the parties as there normally is when we are appointing such an important committee regarding the chair of the committee.

I have been reading news reports that presumably a chair has been decided. Because we had these discussions in the House leaders' meeting that indeed there would be consultations, I want to ask the Whip whether there have been consultations. I am not aware of consultations but perhaps they have been going on around me and I am not aware of them.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader convened a meeting with the member for Ottawa—Vanier who is both House leader and Whip, and the Whip of the New Democratic Party last Friday. The meeting took place around four o'clock, shortly after the Chamber had shut down last Friday, where we discussed the motion and so on.

There was no undertaking. I was present at that meeting as the Whip of the government party, and there was no undertaking at that point to discuss specifically the issue of chair. We talked about the substitution principle, the number of members, the allocation of members, the 72 hours for the striking committee to meet and those kinds of things, but there was no formal undertaking. I was not at Tuesday's House leaders' meeting of this week to know if there was an undertaking made on Tuesday of this week. Because of business in the Chamber I was not there.

I see my friends opposite indicating that there was no such undertaking made at Tuesday's House leaders' meeting as well. Certainly, as the Whip of the government party, if I could bring the House up to date, I have asked the clerk responsible for committees to consult with all three parties about a suitable time to hold an organizational meeting and I have suggested that Monday or Tuesday would be appropriate, if that was agreeable to the other two parties. I made that suggestion to the Table.

When we are dealing with a special committee we do not have the same sense of process laid out as we do with a legislative committee or a standing committee, but I thought the standing committee process of the clerk chairing the election of a chairman would be appropriate in this circumstance and that is the advice that I provided to the Table. But I asked the Table to consult with the other two parties and if there is a problem we will be glad to meet. If the leader of the New Democratic Party would like to meet with me to discuss possible chair people, I would be glad to do that as well.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Whip misunderstood my question. In an earlier House leaders' meeting, the government House leader gave us his commitment that there would be consultations regarding the chair of this important committee. Because of the nature of this committee it is not following the normal channels. I think that the process being followed has been appropriate.

However, I was given an undertaking by the government House leader that there would be consultations. There have been no consultations and that is why I say, when I was reading in the media reports that a Chair had been selected or would be appointed, I thought that perhaps there had been consultations that I was not aware of. However the Whip has said that there really had been no consultations. My concern was that a commitment had been made by the government House leader and it appears not to have been kept.

• (1350)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the House that Tuesday was the day the Prime Minister made his speech on the McKenna proposition, the companion resolution, which is the object of discussion in this committee. There were no regular House leader meetings because we were interested in the comments by the Prime Minister.

There were two ad hoc meetings. They were not regular patterned meetings of all the people present. We had a meeting later in the afternoon around five o'clock with the House leader. If there was an undertaking given to the House leader of the NDP, I was not aware of it, as I was not there. I think that the process would be much better served if there were consultations with the opposition parties in chairing such important committees. I think there has been a tradition for House leaders to consult with other House leaders as to who should be the chair.

We do not object to the government wanting to chair that committee, but we would like to feel that the subject matter is so important and of such great interest to Canadians, that all parties will agree to a consultative process before the chair is named or elected by the majority. Whether the government likes it or not, it is going to have its way. It is going to win this debate because it has eight members; we only have four and the NDP only have two.

What we are pleading for, Mr. Speaker, is understanding, co-operation, reasonableness, intelligence and possibly some wisdom.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think one thing we all understand is that the choice of chairperson is limited to the 15 members who were just named and approved by the House. That happened about 10 minutes ago. I would be quite happy myself, or my House leader, to meet and consult with the opposition. I see it as an electoral process which will take place no sooner than Monday, and maybe not until Tuesday or Wednesday of next week, but there will be a normal organization meeting when the election of a chairman will take place.

I would assume some vice-chairman will be glad to talk about that. I think it serves the nation well if we are all comfortable with the way that that committee proceeds and with the chairmanship of it. We would be pleased to try and facilitate it with our colleagues.

We have only known the entire membership in any kind of an official way for about 10 minutes. Maybe we are not behind time yet in terms of consultations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Petitions.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing under 36 to present—

Mr. Hawkes: Was the motion carried?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Yes, the motion was carried.

I do not wish to argue with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, but I recognized the hon. member on a point of order after it was carried. The hon. member for Edmonton East on petitions.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the last thing I would want to do is disrupt the proceedings of the House.

I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a pride of petitions signed by a total of 1,452 Canadians, most of whom are Albertans and most of whom are Edmontonians who sort of call into question the assessment of the hon. member for Mississauga South, as reported in today's papers that popular opposition to the GST has died. It has not. That popular opposition is still out there and growing every day. These papers are testament to that.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition from my province, the province of Quebec, indicating as my colleague from Alberta has said, the popular opposition to the GST is not dying down, in fact it is increasing.

I have 3,639 names here from places such as Matane, St. Hyacinthe, Chambly and elsewhere in the province of Quebec.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Lebel-sur-Quevillon, in Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Lebel-sur-Quevillon is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient with regard to the purpose of the Northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have five petitions today. This is among the hundreds that I have tabled over the last few months dealing with this very unacceptable and intolerable GST, the government's proposal to impose the goods and services tax on all goods and services that Canadians purchase, starting in January 1991.

These petitioners say that the federal government's imposition of this 7 per cent sales tax will virtually apply to everything, will be unfair to low and middle income Canadians and will create an onerous burden on small businesses.

The people who have signed this petition strongly oppose this goods and services tax which is in their opinion an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians. They will be hit not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from students in my riding at the University of Ottawa. It is a petition I have tabled in the House many times before, in which your petitioners beg the House of Commons to do something for postsecondary education and improve the quality of and access to our universities, colleges and educational institutions for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the petition is rather long, but basically it argues in favour of a federal-provincial conference between the federal government and the provinces that would clearly establish the financial responsibilities of both levels of government with respect to postsecondary education and would end the present shameful neglect of postsecondary education in this country.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present. One is from 1,000 residents of Canada who point out that, ever since Confederation, the Government of Canada has applied a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers which it now proposes to include in the goods and services tax.

They also point out that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application. Therefore they ask Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in free tax status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations for the printed word.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from 200 Canadians who join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing use of their lands for NATO and NORAD attack training.

They ask this Parliament to oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, especially at Goose Bay, and to redirect funding used for this toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and for promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from 140 Canadians concerning VIA Rail who oppose the reduction or elimination of VIA Rail service.

They ask Parliament to modernize the existing equipment so that VIA Rail can provide a world-class service to Canadians and to build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

CANSO FISH PLANT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to table five separate petitions.

The first one is a timely one. It concerns the closure of the fish plant in Canso. It has the signatures of over 200 persons who are calling upon Parliament to intervene wherever necessary to ensure this fish plant, which is now closed, is re-opened on an urgent basis to provide employment for the more than 700 fish plant workers and 140 trawler workers from this community.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition to present on behalf of the students of St. Francis Xavier University, as well a separate one on behalf of the town and county of Antigonish.

It concerns the closure of the VIA Rail trunk between Sydney and Truro. I would like you to know, Mr. Speaker, that the citizens of this area have not forgotten and are still calling upon Parliament to insist that this government reverse this wrong decision.

ABORTION

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the third petition bears upon the question of abortion. It is from constituents who join with many other constituents who have signed their names on previous petitions to call upon Parliament to uphold the sanctity of human life from conception onward.

• (1400)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Finally, Mr. Speaker, the last petition concerns the onerous and unfair goods and services tax.

My constituents are in solidarity with the rest of Canadians who oppose this tax and call upon the government to withdraw this measure urgently.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here signed by a number of people from the Halifax—Dartmouth area. This petition was given to my very distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, who represents the people of his area so well in this House.

These people are asking the Parliament of Canada to reject the federal government's proposed GST, which of course stands for the grief and suffering tax of the Conservative Party. They call upon all of us to oppose vigorously this most unfair measure of the government across the way.

Obviously it is very timely to present this petition today when the government is trying to ram this unfair tax through the House of Commons. I am proudly in solidarity with the people who have signed this petition.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, again it is my privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from Kamloops, British Columbia; Chase, British Columbia; and Logan Lake, British Columbia, all of whom point out that the government's goods and services tax is a mean, cruel, brutal, uncaring, undemocratic, regressive tax with a special bias against western Canadians. They ask the government, for those reasons as well as others, to rethink it and abandon it.

I have other petitions but I will leave them for another day. I would like to get on to the opposition day.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition signed by residents of Windsor who are represented in this House by my hon. and learned colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West, the Leader of the Opposition. I can say he is responsible for gathering the signatures on this petition through his diligent work in his riding of Windsor West.

These Canadians object to the goods and services tax being introduced by this government. To use the adjectives applied by the hon. member for Kamloops would be putting it mildly. These residents are outraged that the government is proceeding with this tax and call upon Parliament to reject it.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally will be indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 240 and 250.

[Text]

SHOAL LAKE—FOOD CHAIN AND TRANSPORT OF HAZARDOUS MATERIALS

Question No. 240—Mr. Harvard:

Does the government intend to take any action (a) to ensure that cyanide complexes of mercury and other heavy metals have not entered the food chain on Shoal Lake (b) to stop the transport of hazardous materials across the lake on ice roads over which no authority has designated jurisdiction and on unmanned barges which do not require a certificate of inspection and, if so, what action?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): I am informed by the Departments of National Health & Welfare and Transport as follows:

(a) At the present time, no.

(b) There was some preliminary drilling exploration at Shoal Lake, but the exploration was stopped when the site was designated as requiring an environmental assessment by the Ontario Ministry of the Environment. There is no transportation of dangerous goods taking place at the moment.

The Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act is continuously under review; some of the amendments being considered would ensure that all transportation of dangerous goods would be covered, including transport on ice roads.

MR. HUGH D. SEGAL

Question No. 250—Mr. Comuzzi:

1. Is Mr. Hugh D. Segal, who has been identified on recent public affairs programs on Canadian and United States networks (CBC and PBS) as "communications and strategic advisor to the Prime Minister of Canada", in the employ of the government and, if so (a) is he on the Prime Minister's exempt staff (b) is he an indeterminate employee of the (i) Privy Council Office (ii) the Prime Minister's Office (c) is he at present, or has he recently been, under contract to either agency (i) individually (ii) through any firm of consultants or lobbyists (d) what are the terms of his employment, including (i) duration (ii) remuneration (iii) definition of tasks or duties?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

BRITISH COLUMBIA FOREST AGREEMENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have an application under Standing Order 52. I will hear the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. As you so rightfully said, I wrote to you this morning, under the provisions of Standing Order 52, essentially to draw to the attention of Parliament and to call for an emergency debate on the expiry tomorrow of the forest agreement between British Columbia and the Government of Canada.

Other forest agreements in this country expired a year ago as of tomorrow and have yet to be renewed. It is most critical that this Parliament, on the last sitting day before that agreement expires, has an opportunity to debate this agreement and to debate how critical it is to British Columbia and to this country.

In light of indications I have that the lapse of this agreement is causing concern within government, we have the senior Forestry Canada official in British Columbia and the senior administrative official in British Columbia meeting to cancel meetings. In light of the question around this agreement, I think it is important that this Parliament debate the renewal of that agreement today.

I ask that you rule favourably on this matter. I hope you will consider it so that we can indicate that we really care for our environment and our forests.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have had an opportunity to review the hon. member's request. Although I consider it to be very important, I really feel that at this time we just cannot have a debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ENVIRONMENT

The House resumed consideration of motion of Ms. Copps:

That this House condemn the government for its lack of a sincere commitment to the environment and for its vacuous discussion paper which completely fails to offer the concrete action that all Canadians would like to see implemented and, therefore, call on the government to end the rhetoric and to introduce a truly substantial environmental action plan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there were nine minutes left in the hon. minister's questions and comments, and I think the hon. member for Chambly had the floor on a question or comment.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to carry on. I was addressing my question to the hon. Minister of Forestry. The Green Plan on the environment released by the hon. Minister of the Environment yesterday seems to indicate that the government is long on rhetoric and short on action.

I was asking my hon. colleague, the Minister of Forestry, whether that lack of action is not directly related to the funding by the huge corporations that we know the Conservatives have been receiving for quite some time. That funding seems to present a conflict of interest. Even The Globe and Mail has come out with reports that Environment Canada has been given special lists of those companies which it should really not go after for pollution infractions and environmental problems that they have created.

Does this not present a logical response to the question that many Canadians are asking: Why is the government not doing anything for the environment? Could it not be because the corporate interests are more important to the Conservative Party than Canadians' interests?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I answered my hon. friend's similar question just before the end of the debate.

First of all, these people make up their minds before they actually read the documents that are before them. The more objective observer is somebody who writes, to be honest, on the staff of The Ottawa Citizen. A staff report says: "Environment minister Lucien Bouchard's Green Plan makes several specific proposals which include a safe drinking water act, national standards for all industries, regulations for biotechnology, a promise to complete at least five new parks by 1995 and complete the entire park system by the year 2000", which I spoke about in my comments.

The hon. minister announced in the House that there will be, even before this action plan is put into place, strict regulations on pulp mill emissions which will be announced shortly.

These are firm commitments, strong commitments, that are celebrated throughout the country, and, speaking of action plans, I made this reference earlier and the Speaker cut me off.

We talk about the commitments members of the NDP had to the environment. Of course, they jump up and down here and put on a great show, but Mr. Derek Young who is the director of the Western Canada Wilderness Committee had this to say. This is from this morning's press. There are reports like that every day. He said: "I am really disappointed that the NDP has not formulated a policy on how to deal with old growth forests, and how to deal with wilderness areas or parks, or how to deal with the Carmanah Valley which has become such a focal point for the environmental movement throughout the country." This is what Mr. Young said, and he is no stranger to the NDP.

Being in politics in a political party, as the hon. member will discover since he has joined this particular political party, is like a religion. You cannot choose the people who want to join. At least this party is open to everybody who wants to join, everybody who feels strongly about the commitment that a particular political party has, its philosophy and its ideology, and who from time to time, makes a contribution, either in terms of a personal commitment in time, or knocking on doors, or a financial contribution. That is the essence of our British parliamentary system.

I am sure there are people who join the socialist party and cause them embarrassment. Luckily, in our party we do not have people like that. We have Canadians from all walks of life who want to join us. Of course, that is reflected in the numbers of people who represent these kinds of people in the House of Commons and who are spilling over even onto the other side. You have enough seats for these members. They want to join us and they want to contribute and they want to celebrate and support the kind of things we are doing, which, in the long run, will prove to be very, very positive for the future of all Canadians and the future of our children.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, maybe the last member who spoke for the government has not quite kept track of what the Canadian public has to say in reference to the party that is spilling over to this side of the House.

I would like to refer to last night's Journal, if I may. I believe it was one of the representatives of Friends of the Earth who said that the report of the minister yesterday was really inadequate. It had not gone anywhere near far enough. In fact, he said it said very little, and certainly said very little that was new.

The questions the government asks in there have already been answered. To do anything along the lines that the government is proposing is simply to delay. That is obvious. The answers to the questions are already there. There are technological improvements already in existence which go far beyond, for example, the energy needs of the nation, if they would only be implemented. These range all the way from energy efficient light bulbs to other forms of illumination, transportation and energy use.

It is hypocritical of the government and it is hypocritical of the minister yesterday, and I might also add, arrogant, not to have presented the paper in Parliament. But it is hypocritical for them to come out with a paper claiming to be so innovative and so consultative, when they had the opportunity previously to do consultation, when there were previous opportunities to listen to what the people of Canada were saying, and when they had the opportunity to listen to the experts in the fields, which the paper is supposed to address. Most of the information that is available has already been supplied. They ignored that and came out yesterday to say that they are doing something new. They say they are going into the 21st century, making Canada a leader in care—

An hon. member: Having just arrived in the 20th.

Mr. Fisher: Precisely, leading the world into the 20th century. The same old rhetoric, when really less is more, from their point of view. In the context of more is less, less is more. It does not matter what it is; it is always the best. This government is doing the best that has ever been done in this nation.

This paper is a prime example of how that is exactly not true. I ask the member opposite who just spoke: Why on earth have you not listened previously to the people who are experts in the field of the environment? Pay attention to the information that is already available.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member is not a speed reader. This thing just came out yesterday. But, if he had read it, he would probably discover that we are laying out some very specific questions here that Canadians need to address, questions around very specific propositions that this paper concludes. I just read them out. Do you want me to read them again?

Instead, it would tell him that some of the questions and some of the propositions that are in this paper relate to the cost, in human terms, potential job losses; the cost in giving up some of the lifestyles that many generations of Canadians have become accustomed to. There are real dollar costs in some of these things. The potential of a designated carbon tax. My hon. friends over there, 10 minutes ago, defended with their lives the principle of allowing people to be heard. We are giving six months to allow the people to be heard on some of the very specific propositions that are laid out in these papers. In the fall, we will have an environmental agenda and we can only assume and hope that, by that time, even that party will be enlightened enough to support these initiatives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I have to interrupt the minister.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add that I did read the report, and I would like to direct my remarks to the Minister of Forestry. The report is not that difficult to read. It is 30 pages long, and there are two pages for notes in French and there are two pages, which are blank, for notes in English. I suppose that is if you want to write in English or in French on the notes pages.

Frankly speaking, this is a very disappointing document. I understand the hon. minister's discomfort in having to defend such a document. It is almost a document that should be carefully examined by the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department, for misleading advertising.

The real question here is how can the minister respond to the question that many Canadians are asking: is more consultation not a substitute for action when we already know the answers?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has used up three minutes of his debate. I wish he would carry on with the debate.

Mr. Edmonston: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was in debate stage. Now I know better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member now has the floor on debate.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I will try to make it perhaps not as profound but at least as educating as I can. I believe that the document we are looking at is a document which should be examined not only for misleading advertising but for the only relationship it has to the environment, that is it uses recycled rhetoric. On the solution to environmental problems, it essentially takes an approach which is garbage in itself. The reason I am saying that is that 16 years ago the other government, the Liberal government, said essentially the same thing: that we need to be consulted before action is taken. It is a bit much, after 16 years, to have a Conservative government, two years after being re-elected on an environmental platform, coming out with the same need for consultation. Many people expected the government to put the accent on action. A number of consumer groups and environmental groups have criticized the government, and I respect the hon. minister's response that there were a number of groups which have supported the government's lack of action. There are also a number of groups, such as Friends of the Earth, which say that there is no action at the moment but just a way to delay action in the future.

There are people who expected action from this government. The people from Saint-Basile-le-Grand expected action from this government. I have a letter here from the mayor of Saint-Basile-le-Grand who is still waiting to see the government show leadership on the treatment of PCBs. There are two resolutions from the city of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, asking the government to act. Unfortunately, the document that has been given to us in The Green Plan has nothing that would benefit the people of Saint-Basile. It has nothing that will benefit the people of Saint-Amable, where there are problems with mounds of tires.

• (1420)

I know that whenever we are uncomfortable with the response on the government side, we can say that it is provincial responsibility, but even then we are coming into a serious situation because the province is not accepting this. I can tell you that even in dealing with James Bay, Phase II, the government is faced with a serious problem and that it cannot even get its act together with the provincial Government of Quebec as to how to hold hearings.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I may add that I was very disappointed in the Green Plan released by the Minister of the Environment yesterday. I have known the minister for a long time, and I know him as a man of integrity, and a very competent man, who is not being used to best advantage by this government. I am sure he was very disappointed to see the action plan's initial 250 pages—whose contents were no secret—reduced to 30 pages with four pages of notes, two in French and two in English. I think it is unfortunate to see an Environment minister reduced to endorsing lack of action on the part of the federal government.

All I can say is, we have no answers to the questions the government wishes to raise—because basically, the document contains only questions—we have only questions. These questions have been asked before, and I have the paper here. They were asked during a CROP poll, and I am referring to the one in May 1988, which is a good example.

[English]

I would like to bring to the attention of the House and particularly to my hon. colleague, the Minister of Forestry, that the questions he is asking in this Green Paper have already been asked two years ago, and the answers were very surprising.

For example, the willingness to pay is a very major question: the willingness of Canadians to pay. What is it? Well according to this survey, a national survey, 8 out of 10 Canadians are willing to pay extra for environmental protection. How can my hon. colleague, the Minister of Forestry, say that that question has not been answered? It has been answered. In fact it seems that Canadians across the country are more in favour of paying for controlling pollution than polluters themselves or even the government. It is not the time to re-ask the question.

But I just want to bring to the minister's attention several points here about willingness to pay. Not only 8 out of 10 Canadians, approximately 78 per cent, said they were willing to pay extra for increased spending on environmental protection, but when Canadians were asked to choose between alternative mechanisms for this contribution, almost one in two, almost 50 per cent, said they would be willing to accept a 1 per cent surcharge on their income taxes. Canadians are willing to pay extra to clean up the environment. Is the government doing its part? Not by re-asking the question it is not.

In addition, Canadians have expressed themselves very clearly about toxic chemicals, another question which is asked in the minister's Green Paper, and is being asked again after two years. In the survey that was done two years ago, toxic chemical pollution came out as being at the very top of the list of environmental concerns, along with clean water supply. It even surpassed acid rain as an issue in 1988, and only one-third of Canadians believed that the mechanisms now in place to control toxic chemicals are adequate to ensure public safety. Over two-thirds of Canadians feel that in the toxic chemical area the government is not doing its job.

Environmental health is one question that concerns most Canadians. The concern about environmental health is one to which Canadians responded most emphatically, and that is another question being re-asked two years later. Asked about how concerned they were about environmental pollution, eight out of ten Canadians again said they are very concerned about human health and safety. Their second major concern is for future generations. Further questions on possible impacts of pollution reveal that nine out of ten Canadians believe that many peoples' health has already been affected by existing pollution levels. That means that they feel that the cancer that is going to be caused, and the people who are going to be affected have already become affected. What a sad thought, that we are already at the point of no return. No wonder that this is one of the major concerns of Canadians because of the health aspects.

With respect to the role of government, and this is what I would like to put the emphasis on, Canadians want government to get tougher with polluting industries, not as this paper seems to indicate and to enforce the law. In a poll two years ago, Canadians said obviously we want you to get tough. We want you to apply the law to polluting industries. Seven in ten Canadians currently believe that governments usually side with the industries that pollute rather than siding with the affected public.

Let us look at this. Over two-thirds of our citizens believe that the government is on the side of the polluters. Does that have any relationship to the Conservatives' low standing in the polls? The government does not have the confidence of the people on the question of the role of government and pollution control.

I would just like to close here by saying that I think the government had a choice. It could have done better. I have tried to raise the point that because of its corporate donations, its corporate ties, it has a tendency to side with polluters. Everybody knows it. Rather than coming out with actions, it comes out with recycled rhetoric. It is unfortunate. I suppose the only way that that problem can be addressed is through the ballot box. Therefore I would just like to present my opinion that the government has a chance. It has another chance. It has three years perhaps left in government. It can do a better job. The people of Quebec and the people of Canada are expecting the government to do a good job. It is awfully unfortunate that our friend and colleague, the Minister of the Environment, would be so badly used by this government and abused when he was brought into this government to do a good job.

In conclusion I would like to I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of considering the motion standing in the name of the member for Hamilton East.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places?

And less than 15 members having risen:

• (1430)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There not being 15 members rising in objection to the motion, the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion (Mr. Edmonston) agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions and comments. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I thought the question was—

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Technically speaking, Mr. Speaker, a motion was put by the member for Chambly. It was carried. Therefore, that motion makes it impossible for us to ask him questions, although we would like to ask him questions. He has now lost the floor. Unless there is unanimous consent to do that, I would hesitate to break the rules and neither would he.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Technically, we will allow the hon. member to answer questions or comments if we get unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by quoting from Hansard. I hope these words sound familiar to the members of the government. I think they should re-read them.

> The ozone layer above that protects the earth from the sun's ultra-violet rays is diminishing. Twenty-two billion tonnes of carbon dioxide from fossil fuels are being pumped into the world's atmosphere each year. This CO2 is heating up our climate, with hazards we are only beginning to understand. Moreover, forests which process carbon dioxide are disappearing at a breathtaking rate: Twenty-five million tons of sulphur dioxide fall every year in Canada and the United States in the form of acid rain that is destroying our lakes and rivers, damaging our forests and monuments, and threatening our health.
> It is well past the time that these issues be not only addressed but resolved.

Those are the words of the Prime Minister as reported in Hansard for April 6, 1989.

What do we have as a result of all that deep understanding of the seriousness, the urgency and the immediacy of the problem and the need for action now? What we have nearly a year later is still no environmental protection legislation or environmental assessment legislation. There is still no action plan on the environment. We have instead cuts to environmental programs and cuts in budgets.

It is a great pleasure today to rise and expose this green plan for the sham it is, for the contradiction it presents to every action of the government since it took office in 1984.

This green plan is a litany of broken promises. That is what it is. It is going back five years. It is contradicting everything the government has said it is going to do. It is full of words like "could consider", "might consider", "could consider proposing", "should we", "could we". It is too late for all that. The Prime Minister knew that a year ago. He said it clearly. Yet what has he done about it?

Yesterday, we had a litany of the supposed accomplishments of this government on the environment. I want to go through a litany of failures—not only of failures, which implies lack of action, but actions damaging to the environment.

The Green Plan talks about the preservation of wildlife. Yet the government cut $3.8 million from the budget of the Canadian Wildlife Service.

We have lots of discussion about parks and expanding our national parks system. This is the government which weeks ago voted against a motion to expand the parks system to make a real firm commitment to parks consistent with our international commitments.

The report talks about shipping and disposal. Can I remind the government that it was five years ago that the spill of PCBs at Kenora occurred, and that for three years following that nothing more was heard about PCBs except promises of action? There was no action taken until weeks before the 1988 national election when suddenly disaster hit Saint-Basile-le-Grand and PCBs were again a problem and suddenly they were on the public agenda. This time it was right before an election and there was some interim action.

But do we have a comprehensive plan for handling the disposal and transportation of PCBs? No, we do not—five years after the spill at Kenora.

There is talk in this report about toxic substances and protecting the health of Canadians. This is the same government that is now saying that the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety should become a self-supporting income-generating institution and that in fact it should not be available to Canadian workers to give them information on toxic substances and other health hazards in their workplaces.

This report talks about research. Yet we have seen virtually the decimation of research at the National Research Council. In fact, we have seen the breaking down of that institution that has been fundamental to the progress of science, research and technology in this country for decades.

The government appears not to be aware that in fact Canada's environmental work—indeed the space program—started with atmospheric research by the National Research Council in the mid-thirties when we started looking at what was happening in the Arctic and began studying the aurora borealis. Now, about 55 years later, this government is systematically dismantling the National Research Council. How dare it publish a document like this and talk about improving science and research?

The document talks a lot about information and the importance of it. This is the very government that suppressed a major report on toxic substances called "Storm Warning". It suppressed it for over a year, keeping it from the people of Canada.

This government talks about better environmental assessment. I have heard comments in Question Period today and yesterday, as well as the debate today, about the weakness of the current legislation and the current environmental assessment process. If it is weak, it is weak because the government and its ministers refuse to meet their legal obligations under that legislation. Those legal obligations have been spelled out by the courts, not once but three times. It is about to happen again. Once again, the government is not fulfilling its responsibilities for the environment, responsibilities it has been reminded of three times by the Federal Court. Instead, it is leaving it to voluntary organizations with their own resources and on their own initiative to do what the government is legally obligated to do.

It is over two weeks since the decision of the court on the Oldman River dam which said, first, the federal permit allowing that construction was cancelled; and, second, that two ministers of the Crown were obliged to conduct environmental assessments. The government has done nothing. It is still considering the implications of the decision.

I will tell you the implications of the decision. It is this simple. A multi-million dollar project in Alberta with severe environmental impacts has gone ahead for an additional two and one-half weeks and this government has done nothing about the fact that it is proceeding absolutely illegally without a permit that it is required to have under the Navigable Waters Act.

If the government was serious it would look at that decision on the Oldman River dam. It would say what the courts have clearly said, that it has not only the right but the responsibility to carry out an environmental assessment on every project that touches an area of federal responsibility. It would be environmentally assessing James Bay, II, if it would stop fooling around with discussions that are going nowhere with the province of Quebec and get on with its responsibility and its job. It would be environmentally assessing Point Aconi. It would be looking at its options for the Carmanah Valley.

• (1440)

Actions speak louder than words. Thirty pages of words do not say much against four years of not only inaction but negative action against the environment.

The plan purports to deal with the question of CO_2 emissions. Members of the government may not be aware of this, but the environment committee of the House has been looking intensively at global warming. There is one clear message—and it is not new—the single, most efficient, most effective, most cost effective thing we can do to stop global warming is to cut the emissions of CO_2.

Action on that front is clear. By conservation alone, we could cut 52 per cent of CO_2 emissions. This government has known now for five years what needs to be done. It is not doing it.

Instead, it has cut wind energy research at the National Research Council. It has cut the environmental secretariat at the National Research Council. It has, over-all, cut money spent on alternative energy and conservation—the single most effective thing that we can do to save this planet—from $500 million to a miserly $50 million.

The Minister of Finance can get up and talk about the financial reserves all he wants. That is window-dressing. There are no financial reserves. The reserves in this year's budget, as he knows perfectly well, have but cut and not increased to accommodate the environment or anything else.

The Green Plan talks about biological diversity. Just this past week, 10 people at the National Research Council, including five senior research officers in the biological section, were laid off.

We have broken promises. We have had repeated promises over the last year, and I am sure before I entered this House, to table environmental assessment legislation. We have repeated promises that we will have a strong action plan by this spring. March 21 was over a week ago. That was the beginning of spring, and this is all we have.

It is also important to talk about what is not here. What is not here is any strong commitment by the government itself to act on its own, to ensure that all governmental practices are in accordance with the principles of sustainable development. What minister has said to his department: "Before you produce your budget, I want to know everything you are doing that has an impact on the environment. Where it is a negative impact, I want you to change it. I want to know how we are using the world's resources. Where it is excessive I want you to change it. I will not approve a budget until I have those answers." Not one minister has said that to his or her department. That is the way this government needs to operate.

We have the Minister of the Environment saying: "Environment is the responsibility of every minister". Then we have the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology saying instead: "The environment is nice. It is like poetry and flowers, kind of fun to have but it has nothing to do with the economy".

This is the government that says it believes in sustainable development. What does it do instead? It votes down, in this House, a motion that would have made the Department of Industry, Science and Technology responsible, among other things, for sustainable development.

Obviously, it does not understand the question. How can the government, at this stage, say: "Should Canada commit itself to targets for the emission of carbon dioxide?" How can it even ask that question? How can we have the Minister of Energy out in Vancouver saying: "Should Canada act before the rest of the world acts, or should we wait for everybody else? Should the government seek to establish agreements with the western provinces on emissions?" How can those questions even be asked when we know how urgent and serious this situation is?

This report does not at all address sustainable development. It does not address the problems of the Third World. We know that one of the greatest causes of environmental degradation is poverty. Does this plan talk about what kinds of aid we provide to the Third World, ensuring that that aid is done in an environmentally compatible way, in fact, specifically directing our aid towards projects that assist Third World countries to avoid environmental damage?

Does it talk about the millions of dollars that we provide through the Export Development Corporation to do major projects abroad in China, India, Indonesia and Thailand? Does it put any limits on how we spend that money and make sure that we are not exporting environmentally damaging technology? It does not. In fact, one of the things holding up environmental assessment legislation is that the Export Development Corporation, for the purposes of aiding business clients, is specifically seeking to exempt itself from that legislation.

It does not talk about what we import and whether we encourage pollution in the Third World by importing goods that perhaps we would be better off not importing. It does not talk about how we control our exports to ensure that we are not exporting damaging goods or goods that can be used in a way that is damaging to the environment.

It does not talk about aboriginal rights. A small country like New Zealand can bring in comprehensive environmental legislation which gives prime importance to the rights of aboriginal peoples, their land rights, their treaty rights and their cultural traditions and a country like Canada cannot. It is appalling that that is not even discussed in this paper.

The report talks about consultation. The minister who spoke this morning said consultation is desired and needed. Consultation gets off to a bad start when the report on which it is to be based ignores the consultation, ignores the thousands and perhaps millions of words of input this government has received over the years it has been in office from environmental groups. Options which they have developed and put forward are not in this plan. How can they expect the consultation is going to mean anything?

The report said: "Women are a real key to decision-making. Aboriginal peoples need to be involved in our discussions. Youth need to be part of our solutions." Just look at what this government has done to those groups. It has diminished the ability of women's groups to participate in society as groups. It has cut funding to women's organizations. It has cut funding for conferences. It has cut funding for women's centres. It is undermining their ability to be informed, to communicate with each other and to communicate with government.

What has it done to aboriginal peoples? A year ago it was cutting its commitment to meet the educational needs of aboriginal peoples and it is still true that a native person in Canada has a much better chance of going to prison than to university. That is a crying indictment of our society. Now it has cut broadcasting, it has cut newspapers, it has cut the means by which natives inform themselves and communicate with each other. It has cut their tools to participate in the democratic process. How dare this paper then say that we want the involvement of aboriginal peoples.

It has cut NGOs' budgets and yet it is saying that they are the crux to our doing something about this problem.

What has it done to youth? Oh, yes, the minister wants youth employment for summer employment programs, he says, summer employment programs on the environment. I am sitting in a riding where summer employment programs this year are one-tenth of what they were last year; $23,000 for a community of 70,000 people for summer employment. How do we expect youth to feel a part of this society when money that could have employed them for the summer and sent them back to school this fall is being pulled out of summer employment for them?

This is a new kind of consultation. I think the normal process, when there is a discussion paper, is for the parliamentary committee to hold hearings and report back to Parliament. I really want some answers on why that is not being done. Is it that these are going to be secret consultations? Why is the environment committee not being asked to take this document, to consult and to report to Parliament?

• (1450)

I want to close with one final point. Yesterday, the Prime Minister referred to Madam Bruntland's comments about Canada and the leadership role we have played. That was a nice comment from a lead speaker at a conference to the host country. What the Prime Minister failed to say is that Canada essentially holds great conferences, exercises great rhetorical leadership. But what she went on to say was that it was time for Canada to get on with action and demonstrate that its leadership is more than words. This plan is a betrayal of that call to action for Canada and the world.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague and friend for Ottawa West on an excellent presentation.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: It was a well thought-out speech and given with the usual seriousness she attaches to these questions as our critic for environmental matters. I want to thank her for the work she has done today.

There is, indeed, a serious problem with the environmental issues in Canada today. There is little commitment from the government in the framework for discussion on the environment in the discussion paper. The leadership is lacking. There is, as the member said, no ministerial leadership just to clean up our own act.

I can remember asking questions of departments of this government, Public Works and others, about dumping toxic wastes into the Ottawa River. We had to rise in this place and push and push and repeatedly bring them to their senses until they acted. Today there are still wastes being dumped by the federal government into the environment. If we are going to start preaching to Canadians, we had better start practising here in our own jurisdiction. That is the federal jurisdiction—federal government departments.

The paper, the framework for discussion on the environment, proposes, and I quote from page 17:

> Canadians need to explore the ways governments, industry and individuals can best contribute to a 50 per cent reduction in waste.
>
> One mechanism is an Office of Waste Management—

I repeat—

> —an Office of Waste Management to expand the national waste exchange program and to promote waste reduction and recycling.

Some of us believe we have an office of waste management here in this administration of the federal government right now. I think the Prime Minister's office is a good example of waste management. So is the Minister of Finance, in the way they manage the economy of this country.

I take exception that they set up an office, another bureaucracy to manage their own waste programs when the government shows little leadership.

An hon. member: Look at all the waste at 24 Sussex, for instance.

Mr. Gauthier: We know that they want to talk about a new transportation policy. They have just cut VIA Rail, one of the most environmentally friendly systems there is. They just cut VIA Rail.

I want to talk about the green environment we are supposed to be looking towards and The Green Paper we got. The recycling program has not been put by this government to Canadians yet. We have paper recycling projects. And clean water. Well, this is a watered down set of promises.

I want to ask the member, since she has knowledge of government and knowledge as the spokesperson for the environment: Does she not believe, as I do, that it is about time this government put its money where its mouth is and practised environmentally friendly things such as waste management in its own federal government buildings. Should that not be under control?

Mrs. Catterall: That is exactly why I put the challenge to all ministers opposite or all those who occasionally speak to them, because I think that is exactly where it has to start. We cannot preach to Canadians what they should be doing in their homes, offices or factories, until we have our own house in order. This is the largest employer in the country. It employs a quarter of a million people directly, and another quarter of a million people indirectly. We use more paper, more of everything that can be used in an office or laboratory environment than any other employer in Canada. We use more vehicles, we use more energy and, therefore, we should be leading the way.

This also gives me the opportunity to talk about costs. The Minister of Forestry and the Minister of the Environment have said we have got to talk about trade-offs. We have got to talk about costs.

The reason it is so important for the government to act as a leader and as an example is to demonstrate the fact that when things are done in an environmentally sustainable way, money is saved. If factories are built that use fewer resources and less energy, they operate more efficiently and are more productive. Innovative companies that have taken these steps are proving exactly that.

I challenge the government to prove that as a major corporation in this country, the largest corporation, we can demonstrate that it is cheaper and not more expensive to do things the right way. I will challenge that it is going to cost more money. We keep saying that to people and we keep scaring people with it. We keep pretending that we cannot act because it is going to cost too much money.

There are many ways in which it is cheaper. So let us stop pretending.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, in her eloquent speech the hon. member identified a very important element in our common efforts to achieve the very worthy environmental goals that we have in Canada.

Specifically that very important element is the relationship between the federal government and the governments of our provinces and territories. The hon. member knows that it is this relationship that is fundamental, not only for success in environmental policy development, but in determining the degree of success in other policy areas.

Would the hon. member share with this House and with Canadians her vision and the vision of her party, with respect to a workable, reasonable and effective framework that would ensure co-operative federal-provincial policy development in the very important area of Canada's environment.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, obviously I do not have time left to deal with that. However, as the municipal politician who was involved with provincial governments all over the country, I certainly think I have some very valuable ideas to bring not only to a bi-level approach but a tri-level approach to the environment. It was that experience at the local level of government that led me to propose one useful suggestion which I note the minister has adopted for a participaction program on the environment.

To stand aside, do nothing and absolve oneself of any responsibility for the environment is not at all helpful to federal-provincial relationships, or to public confidence in government at all levels. I certainly do not think that the federal government should be dithering around asking silly questions such as whether or not we should reach agreement with the provinces on emissions. Of course we should. Where is the leadership in this country? Who speaks for the nation any more? What are we? Do we just sit here in this House to let the provinces go off and do exactly what they want no matter what the risk to the world, to the helpless Canadians, to the future survival of humanity? Where is the leadership?

You want an answer to your question. Step aside and let me show you.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that most Canadians and probably many citizens throughout the world have concluded that environmental issues should not be partisan issues. They believe that the importance of preserving our future is one which must go beyond the lines of party politics.

I am not so certain, however, that the introductory speech by the hon. member for Hamilton East today furthered the cause of trying to keep environmental issues within this House in as non-partisan a manner as possible.

I believe that most members of the House and most Canadians very much share the common objective of wanting to ensure that the environment upon which we are dependent for our very life itself is conserved and protected. The challenge of finding a means to direct society to the road of an environmentally sustainable future is the most important challenge of our lives. At stake, as Madam Brundtland said, is our common future. A challenge is evident. What is less evident, however, is the question of how we should collectively meet that challenge. The behaviour and assumptions which have contributed to the environmental crisis which is very much a part of our life are deeply ingrained in our society's most cherished institutions and values. Consequently, there is no simple change, no single change that will set matters right. What must occur instead is a renaissance of awareness with respect to the restraints that must be respected if our society is to continue to evolve and to progress on an environmentally sustainable path.

• (1500)

A sustainable future is not within the powers of the Minister of the Environment alone, nor is it within the powers of the federal government alone to achieve and to deliver. The scale of the challenge which is before us dwarfs the abilities of any one actor to resolve. All of us, at all levels of government, in all walks of life, wherever we may live in this country and throughout the global community, have a role to play and we are seeking to play that role to the best of our abilities. We, as a government, are committed to doing what is in our power to move Canadians onto a sustainable path.

Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment released a document called "A Framework for Discussion on the Environment". This framework summarizes issues which will be addressed in The Green Plan. It outlines a range of possible solutions which could contribute to the national objective of ensuring the effective integration of economic and environmentally sustainable decision-making, of ensuring that we have sustainable development. Through this document, we hope to engage all Canadians in a national dialogue on our common future.

Throughout the spring, we will be holding consultations with Canadians, in 30 or 40 communities throughout the country, to allow them to express their views on the policies and priorities which should be contained in The Green Plan. It is our hope that through this process of establishing a national dialogue we can achieve the broadest possible consensus on the key elements of this national action plan to ensure a sustainable future for Canada. There will be a full action plan by this fall. It will be substantial, meaningful, and will build on the solid record of achievement of this government. In addition, it will be constructed as a result of a process of consultation with Canadians, the likes of which has not occurred before in this country.

In this national green plan we will seek creative partnerships with the provinces, with interest groups and with industries. We are willing to consider participation in any arrangement which will set an example to others or which will promote collective progress. We will continue to work internationally through whatever means that are available to us whether it be the G-7, the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the Francophonie, NATO, the World Bank, or in co-operation with the Inter-American Development Bank to whom the Minister of the Environment is speaking today. We will do all of this in order to promote the need for environmentally-sustainable development.

Our environmental destiny here in Canada is tied to the global environmental destiny. We must recognize the essentiality of that fact. All Canadians must adopt the principle of thinking globally while acting locally. In a global sense, Canada has not only been an active participant on the international scene but has been a leader in that international environmental arena. Canada's leading role in the development of the 1987 Montreal Protocol on protecting the ozone layer is well known to all parliamentarians and to most Canadians.

In the following year, Canada hosted an international conference on "The Changing Atmosphere, Implications for Global Security". While addressing that conference, the Prime Minister was the first to call for an international convention to protect the atmosphere to be held by 1992. The concept of the need for that convention is now supported by President Bush, Prime Minister Thatcher, President Mitterand and many other national leaders.

Last March the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment represented Canada at the Environmental Summit at The Hague, where world leaders agreed to develop within the United Nations an enhanced authority to combat global warming. Also in March of last year, this government was one of 34 signatories to a landmark United Nations convention, which controls the trans-boundary movement of hazardous waste.

Last July in Paris, Canada joined other economic leaders in placing the environment at the top of the international agenda.

In Kuala Lumpur, in October, leaders of all 49 Commonwealth nations endorsed the concept of sustainable development.

Looking ahead to 1992, the world will gather for what is probably going to be the most important environmental conference held since the landmark Stockholm conference of 1972. That conference will be the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development which will be held in Brazil and of which a distinguished Canadian, Maurice Strong, will be the chairman.

It is expected that world leaders will meet at this conference to conclude a landmark convention on climate change, if indeed that convention is not concurred with prior to the meetings in 1992. Scientific and legal work for this convention has been under way for some time and good progress is being made.

We want Canada to set an example for the world, but we must be realistic and recognize that our efforts alone cannot achieve worldwide change. We must work co-operatively with other countries and also through all international organizations that can mobilize actions on a global scale. We recognize the need as well to work co-operatively to protect the environment of the North American continent. One example of such co-operation between Canada and the United States is the establishment of the North America Waterfowl Management Plan, a plan which provides for $1.5 billion over 15 years to protect almost 4 million acres of wetland habitat in Canada.

Canada is also working closely with the United States to clean up the Great Lakes. Our share of that program is $125 million to be spent over the next five years to protect human health, to clean up toxic contamination and to prevent future pollution of these important shared resources.

I am encouraged by recent news stories coming out of the United States with respect to the progress which the American Congress is making towards the passage of President Bush's Clean Air Bill. This government has worked closely with our counterparts in the United States, encouraging them to pass that bill. I hope that that will not only be a reality in the near future but it will be followed as well by an accord between our two countries.

Closer to home, despite what you may have heard earlier today, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that this government has a solid record of achievement on which to build.

In June, 1988 the Canadian Environmental Protection Act was proclaimed, the strongest piece of environmental legislation ever sponsored by a federal government in Canada. CEPA, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, establishes very stringent controls for chemical substances manufactured in or imported into Canada and provides for a "cradle to grave" mechanism for managing such substances from their manufacture to their disposal.

In addition, the federal and provincial governments are working co-operatively on a number of environmental issues through the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment. That group met last week at Globe 90 in Vancouver. Last October, the council established the creation of a $250 million fund based upon a 50-50 federal-provincial cost sharing formula to clean up high risk abandoned contaminated land sites, the sites that we refer to as orphan sites.

At the same time, the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment announced a joint decision to implement standards to control automobile emissions of oxides of nitrogen and gasoline fumes, which will match, by 1994, the toughest standards in North America. We generally refer to those standards as the California standards.

Another example of federal-provincial co-operation which is noteworthy is the agreement to clean up the St. Lawrence River. In June, 1988 this federal government announced a $110 million action plan to tackle industrial pollution in this major waterway.

Throughout Canada and the world, national parks have proved to be one of the most effective ways of protecting wilderness, wildlife and other important heritage resources. Since 1984, this government has added greatly to that national park system. Three new national parks and park reserves have been established: Ellesmere on Canada's most northerly lands; Bruce Peninsula near the heart of Ontario and within easy reach of millions of Canadians; and South Moresby on the spectacular Queen Charlotte Islands.

In addition, park establishment agreements for two other areas were renegotiated so that the parks could realize their full potential, helping to consolidate the system: Grasslands, protecting a remnant of the wild prairie ecosystem in the western part of Saskatchewan; and Pacific Rim, preserving an unspoiled example of the west coast on Vancouver Island.

In addition, a policy for establishing, developing and operating national marine parks has been approved, and Canada's first national marine park, Fathom Five, was established in Georgian Bay, Ontario. One of the most important aspects of the document which was tabled by the minister yesterday was the commitment that five additional national parks should be created during the course of the next five years.

I would hope in passing, Mr. Speaker, although it is too early to tell, that one of those additional parks might indeed be in my own home province of Manitoba near the community of Churchill.

• (1510)

Much remains to be done and this government is committed to doing it. For example, the federal government will be introducing shortly a regulatory package that will limit pollution from pulp and paper mills. These new regulations will achieve the virtual elimination of dioxin and furan discharges in mill effluents.

If there is a special role for the federal government in environmental protection, I would suggest it is the development of national standards and practices. This is clear from our current efforts to reform the federal Environmental Assessment Review Process, or what we commonly refer to as EARP.

The objective of EARP is to enable the government to encourage environmentally appropriate development. That objective, however, cannot be achieved if the process is flawed and unclear, as has now been demonstrated to be the case. New EARP legislation, as I indicated earlier in the House today, will be introduced this spring. I know that members of the House will look forward to supporting that legislation because they understand that there is a very real need for clarity and certainty in the vital matter of assessing the environmental implications of government decisions especially on major projects.

Environmental stewardship is not only an individual effort. Partners, by working together, can achieve great results. I think, for example, of the $50 million Environmental Partners Fund whose goal is to tap the creative talents of Canadians and establish community-oriented environmental projects, with up to half of that fund being provided by the federal government. Some $3.6 million has already been approved for 76 projects across Canada, and I am delighted that one of them is my own constituency of Brandon—Souris which is enabling members of the Virden community to expand the recycling project that they have had in place for some time.

Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment released a framework for discussion on the environment. We are inviting all Canadians to participate in the challenge of developing a long-term action plan for Canada's environment. The goal is to translate the concept of the sustainable development into a concrete reality. The Green Plan must be based upon a comprehensive policy which will be taking tough decisions on sensitive issues. The Green Plan will provide a decision-making framework for planning so we can anticipate and prevent problems before they occur. It will alter the federal government's own day-to-day environmental behaviour.

The Green Plan is based on the knowledge that balancing economic and environmental concerns will without a doubt be the greatest challenge of our time. Moreover, if sustainable development is going to work, then all sectors of society, governments, business and individuals must work together.

The achievement of an environmentally sustainable economic development will require change by all Canadians, acting individually or collectively within governments or the business community. It will require new attitudes towards the environment and its relationship to our own day-to-day activities. It will demand a commitment to take action.

The Green Plan for Canada will provide the basis for that change. It will enable Canadians to make wiser decisions about the use of the environment through better science and technology, better information and education and tougher regulations.

The Green Plan will be developed as a result of a process of consulting together. All sectors of Canada are invited to be a part of that process. We will achieve a broad consensus on what should be done and we will have the support of Canadians when we bring that plan into this House in the fall.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. Seeing the paper that the government came out with concerning the environment, the protection of the environment, and toxic waste, I am not going to try and pretend that I have a great knowledge of the different kinds of systems we need for the environment. When I was in the Quebec National Assembly, I lived through many problems of the environment that arose, such as toxic wastes that created a crisis that used to last for weeks and then subside.

It seems that it is only the government which can have the political will and the power to show to all Canadians that the environment is our number one issue. The paper that came out seems to be very vague. It seems to me that the federal government, of all the governments in this country, should be the first to have the most stringent rules of all and there should be nothing vague. The message should go out to all industries as clear as a bell that protecting the environment 100 per cent is the cost of doing business in this country. That might sound idealistic, but because of the way the environment is being affected, we are going to face that inevitability very soon.

Why can the federal government not take it upon itself to send the message out across this country that we want an environmental policy that is virtually foolproof?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I very much agree with my hon. friend's objective that indeed there should be a message sent to all Canadians not just to business, because business is only a part of the process, where the rules are very clear, where there can be no confusion whatsoever as to which level of government has which responsibility. Quite frankly, that is part of the difficulty right now with the EARP process.

It is exceedingly important that Canadians feel comfortable with the result that they are part of the process. When The Green Plan, which will be the by-product of this consultation process, is tabled in the House this fall, if it does not meet the objective which the hon. member has stated, then he will have every right to be on his feet complaining. In the meantime, what we have developed in the framework announced yesterday is a process by which we hope to achieve that end. We hope to work with both levels of government because the natural resources are a part of the prerogative of the provinces, according to the constitution.

They have responsibility themselves for protecting the environment. The classic example is the debate which is occurring right now between the federal government and the province of Quebec with respect to our desires that James Bay be assessed according to federal regulations as well as provincial regulations. The two levels of government need to work together in co-operation with business and with interested groups, but the final result must be that clear signal so that we all understand what our responsibilities are and where the powers are very clear. I truly believe that that will be the end result.

In the meantime, I would ask the hon. member to be a part of the process of developing that end result. I think that is what this framework is asking of Canadians. It is providing them with an opportunity to be a part of the solution. All governments have been guilty, but what has happened too often in this country is a government or perhaps bureaucrats who have tried to lay a solution on to other people, perhaps without their understanding of what is required and often without their co-operation.

The environment is something which is of vital importance to all of us. Surely we all understand that and surely there will be a willingness to work together towards a common solution, if we can achieve a broad national consensus on what needs to be done. I would readily concede that many environmental groups have led the way in demonstrating the need. Governments are often slow to respond. I would suggest that previous federal governments have been slow to respond, and some provincial governments are slow to respond.

I think the most important question is, what is on the table when we are finished? If we work together in this House and throughout the country and participate in the consultation process, I honestly believe we will have The Green Plan in place in the fall in which we can all share some sense of pride in being a part of what I hope will be a good solution.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, if we are to have a good consultative process, it is important not to put out vague questions, which the plan does, but clear alternatives for action within some analysis of the pros and cons. Then communities, business and whoever else is a stakeholder in the situation has something to respond to. Clearly, the paper does not do that, even though those possible solutions are well known. Others will come forward, but it has been a mistake to withhold from Canadians the debate that needs to happen between one solution versus another.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to answer two questions. First, the consultative process is extremely unclear. We start with a series of information sessions. Then it is not clear who is consulting with whom. What is going to be the result of that? The normal process of consultation is the parliamentary committee. It conducts hearings and reports to Parliament, so Parliament knows the views of the people. Then the government responds. If that is not the process at this stage, if it is intended that that will be the process when the action plan is tabled, could we have a commitment on that?

Second, are we going to wait for that action plan for the government itself to act? Has the Minister of the Environment, much less, have all ministers directed their officials to look at the environmental impact of their own operations to correct those operations where they have negative impacts.

• (1520)

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make two or three points in response to what I think are very appropriate questions.

I would suggest to the hon. member that it is important to understand that the questions asked in the framework provided to Canadians yesterday need not in any way be an exclusive list. I would hope that one of the results of the consultation process will be the establishment of additional questions. What will be provided by way of questions need not in any way preclude any other form of discussion.

I would remind the hon. member that the standing committee is entirely a power unto itself. The standing committee can certainly study the process. It can study the action plan, The Green Plan when it is tabled in the House at any point in time. One of the traditions of this place is that standing committees are masters of their own destiny. They determine their own agenda.

One of the important things which I hope the standing committee will be addressing in the very near future is new EARP legislation. It is up to the House to determine whether or not that EARP legislation goes to a special legislative committee or to the standing committee. I have a preference that it go to the standing committee rather than the legislative committee, because I happen to be one who is not wildly enthusiastic about legislative committees. I simply say that in passing, Mr. Speaker. I would assume that that legislation will be introduced in the House in four or five weeks. That is a very concrete response on the part of government.

In addition, I can advise the hon. member that as a result of the Oldman decision, even though I believe that the Government of Alberta has requested leave to appeal to the Supreme Court, there has been no decision on that request according to my understanding. However, assuming the Oldman decision stands, I do know that departmental officials are very closely examining all of the federal projects for which we have some responsibility to determine the implications of that particular decision for our own ongoing projects. The federal government is very active at the moment. The department is very active. Even at the same time as it established the framework for consultation with respect to The Green Plan, other activities are carrying forth.

For example, the announcement at Globe 90 last week by the council of ministers to reduce packaging by 50 per cent by the end of the decade. There is a very important meeting coming up in London in June with respect to the extension of the CFCs of the Montreal Protocol, of vital importance.

Mrs. Catterall: Where Canada is taking a lesser position than the European Community.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): I think we are taking a very important role with respect to the Montreal Protocol because we have already made a commitment. Although the process is not in place, we have understood that as part of the industrial world, we have a financial obligation to assist the developing world with either transfers of technology, or whatever the case may be, to permit them to ensure that CFC emissions will in fact be virtually eliminated by the end of the decade. There is a series of ongoing steps. What was released yesterday is a very important part of the whole package.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my colleague for Chambly earlier said that the minister was a good and sincere man, a minister of the environment who finds himself in a very bad environment.

It seems to me it is clear that we are faced with this almost ridiculous situation by virtue of the fact that those on the government side who should have provided him with the support in putting forth the kind of environmental strategy that we expected did not give him that support. We are left with a document that we could be trite about and say that it is fatally flawed, but in fact its structure is not substantial enough even to exhibit flaws. It is incomplete. It has not hardly begun the process of a strategy. As a matter of fact, considering all of the resources that are available to a government, all of the resources that ought to have been provided to this minister, given the urgency of what is at issue here, the document The Green Plan for Canada, a federal agenda prepared by voluntary organizations, would have been a far superior document to present to the Canadian people even within this context of consultation because at least they would have had some meat with which to deal as they have not here.

Many have cited the fact that a lot of questions have been posed for which answers have already, at least in large measure, been provided. But there are some questions so ludicrous that no one in his right mind would have asked them in the first place.

Let me give you an example. I want you to pay attention to this, Mr. Speaker, because there are no subtleties in this that would make it sensible to ask this question: Should Canada commit itself to greenhouse gas emission targets? Should we or should we not? Should we allow the earth to warm up over the next two or three decades? Do we want those dramatic changes in weather and climate that have been predicted by all of those who have been engaged in the study of the earth's atmosphere? I do not think there is a single Canadian who would not say that this is a silly question.

Then there is the question: What role should alternative energy and energy efficiency play? Give me a break. This is a question posed by a minister who is supposed to be in charge of Canada's environmental policy. Should there be alternative energy? I suppose that there is only one basis for the government asking this question. Having already closed down research on alternative energy, the government is now scratching its head and saying, "should we have done that?". Of course this is one of those questions the answer to which has already been provided. The people have said that there should be a commitment to alternative energy and efficiency and the government has said, no there should not be. We have the Minister of the Environment hastening back, puzzled altogether, not knowing what to do, the two sides having different responses so he is going to pose the question again.

I can tell him right now that there should be an emphasis on alternative energy and there should be greater investment in energy efficiency. My goodness, it is not more than a year and a half ago that all sides of this House approved a motion to have a hydrogen technology project in this country. That is one example of alternative energy, the research into which has been cut by this government.

To give you another example of the absurd, Mr. Speaker, is the proposal that additional assistance should be given to developing countries to adopt sustainable forestry practices. I do not know whether the Minister of Forestry is here. He was a little while ago, but I guess he could not stand the heat. Now we are going to help the Third World nations do something to enhance sustainable forestry and we have a question in this document that is as follows: How should Canada move towards sustainable forest management? It certainly cannot be by allowing forestry agreements to lapse tomorrow. This document holds not only itself up to ridicule, but the government which authored it, and it is an insult to Canadians.

My colleague next to me says that the Government of Canada must lead by example. This gives me an opportunity to draw to your attention a situation in which the government has not provided a very good example.

• (1530)

This is an example that comes out of southwestern Ontario, in Windsor, where the government has not provided a very good example in the way it has confronted the issue of the incinerator in Detroit which still, after four years, is a problem which has not been confronted by our government. I note that the document talks about the need for negotiating a trans-boundary air pollution agreement with the United States. I am glad to hear the government is finally getting the message. We have been asking for that for four years. It is the only tenable way of attacking that issue.

We have the issue of the FERMI nuclear plant, and we have been trying to get the government to negotiate some kind of general agreement in recognition of the fact that this government has apparently just learned that pollution and environmental damage knows no national boundaries. But not much has been happening there either.

We have been trying to get the Minister of Transport to address the fact that barges will be going back and forth between Detroit and Windsor, carrying railway cars with hazardous substances. But he does not know anything about that. He does not know what he is supposed to do about that, nor does he know who is supposed to do anything about that. This is government by example.

I want to tie this business of government by example in with its proposition that innovative science and technology must be supported. I would just like to say in passing that one of the things that this document suggests is to put some emphasis on research into the environment, into the programs of the granting councils which provide funding for basic research in the universities.

The government has already ignored recommendations for vastly enhanced investment in that. Now, I suppose it is going to cut that by half, turn that over to environmental research with no net increase in research, and announce that it has put that $200 million into environmental research whenever it gets around to it. That is the kind of example, that is the kind of innovative science and technology we have.

In 1981 Environment Canada reported the dangers and risks involved in a contamination of the Great Lakes by biota from European waters. It was noted that if one looked in the ballasts of ships coursing the Atlantic Ocean, they were a virtual zoo of aquatic animals which might adapt to the Great Lakes environment, but constitute a severe disturbance to the ecological balance. That is the ecosystem which is the Great Lakes. They warned particularly of the zebra mussel. They said that there ought to be imposed strict regulations on the emptying of ballast tanks from sea-going vessels from Europe into the Great Lakes. That was in 1981.

By 1986 those mussels were found. In the meantime, in 1985, at the behest of this government the scientists who made the recommendation were let go. The first of these mussels was detected in 1986. In 1988 there were indications that there was going to be a problem. Now, when each of these little critters produces 40,000 eggs a piece, it is possible to find in areas of the Great Lakes and in some areas at the bottom 700,000 of these sharp shelled, ugly, sticky little critters. Now they are fouling the water intakes of towns such as Leamington, Sarnia and so on.

In Leamington they are spending a million dollars in order to make it possible to bring water into the water supply system so great is the fouling of the intakes by these precocious multipliers. Their numbers will double again by next year.

It is not just a matter of the inconvenience of fouling the water intakes. They affected Lake St. Clair first because apparently the emptying of the ballast occurred in the neighbourhood of Sarnia, just previous to a delivery to Sarnia. Now they are found in Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair.

One of the things one notices as a result of the infestation of these lakes is that the lakes have become more clear. They have become clear because these critters eat algae in copious quantities. The food of commercial fish in Lake Erie is being consumed by these foreigners and it is likely that the economic value of the fisheries in Lake Erie will be halved as a consequence of the invasion of these mussels.

I do not want to give the impression that the emptying of ballast tanks in the Great Lakes has only led to zebra mussels. That is a serious enough problem. But there is also a little perch-like fish that will replace the perch, a fish of commercial value, in Lake Erie. Again they were introduced by the emptying of ballast tanks. What has been the response of the government that governs by example? There has been a refusal to impose any regulations or voluntary guidelines that we are told are 85 per cent effective.

Ninety-nine per cent adherence to those voluntary guidelines could still lead to the introduction of one critter into the Great Lakes of similar damaging characteristics and that would be all that is necessary. It must be clear to you as it is clear to any sensible person that there must be something more than guidelines. There must be stiff regulations to ensure that no other foreign critters can be introduced to the Great Lakes which will destroy the Great Lakes ecosystem.

In addition to this being the example of government by example, you should note that it is the IJC's role to ensure the quality of the Great Lakes. Of course we know, as many environmental groups have pointed out, our government has failed, as has the American government, to do its job.

The Americans are not standing still. Senator Glenn has introduced legislation to provide $40 million in research to help those municipalities that have to pick up the costs of the changes in the water intake systems which are going to be imposed upon them by government failure.

There should also be an intensive research program on Canada's part, jointly with the United States, to deal with this problem. We will never rid the lakes of zebra mussels but we can do some things to decrease and control their population.

Diving ducks such as the canvas back and others feed on these things. It may be that controls on the hunting of these birds would be helpful. There may be other techniques.

The point is that we have not got time for questions and answers or any similar games that the government imposes on the minister rather than action. We want action whether we are municipal taxpayers or commercial fishermen in the Great Lakes. We want action if it be only because we love the Great Lakes and the ecosystem in its balance, which presents so much beauty to us.

• (1540)

We do not want a government which, by example, does nothing. We do not want a government that talks about the necessary research to address the problem instead of doing something about the problem. I have set out only example of the failure of this government and of the previous government. The people are getting tired of it.

In Windsor, where there is a particular environmental consciousness, we are sick to death of questions. We want answers.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to make a few comments on the speech of my hon. colleague. I know that the government ministers sitting across the way were listening attentively to this speech. I am surprised that none of them rose at that moment in order to challenge our colleague. No minister rose just now in the House of Commons to challenge the speech of the member for Windsor—St. Clair.

The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair represents a constituency on the St. Lawrence river system as I do in the riding that I represent. My riding is east-south-north, everything but west of the city of Cornwall.

He will know of course that there is a tremendous ecological problem there on the St. Lawrence River. We have in my constituency the Akwesasne Indian reserve or the St. Regis Indian reserve for those who still call it that way. There is a community of our aboriginal peoples living there and, apart from all their other problems, they have had to pay the cost, literally speaking, of some of the mismanagement of our ecology. When I say "our" I mean Europeans who came later, and I refer more particularly to the damage caused by some of the factories on the U.S. side of the St. Lawrence River.

There are three plants across from Cornwall Island, one of them being an aluminum plant, Alcoa. The others are Reynolds and General Foundry, which is a part of General Motors.

From one or more of these plants chemicals, dioxins and other such products have been leaching into the St. Lawrence River. From another plant emissions have been coming out of the smoke stacks and falling on the island, damaging the ecology to such an extent that the cattle on the island some years ago were so contaminated that their milk was no longer suitable for human consumption and neither was the meat. Imagine what that did to the citizens living there.

Does my colleague not think that the way in which we have negotiated with the United States, particularly over recent years, to try and encourage or force them to reduce some of that horrible emission is totally inappropriate or severely lacking in light of that kind of devastation that I have just described? I hope such devastation does not occur in my hon. colleague's riding as well. I hope no other Canadian has been subjected to what the Akwesasne people have been subjected to there.

In the event that he has problems of that kind does he not feel that our government is lacking and that we generally, as a society, have been extremely derelict when we allow this kind of thing to happen to some of our people?

Mr. McCurdy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member said he was surprised that there are no ministers on the other side to challenge me, I thought he was going to take the government side for a moment. It looks as if there are no ministers on that side who would challenge. I suspect, with what we have left over there, there will be no rise unless the mussels wear turbans. But that is okay.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCurdy: Now, in answer to the question. Of course, I agree with what the hon. member says. I do not think that I could say it any more eloquently than he did. What he emphasized was the impact upon people as a result of failure to care for the ecosystem.

I could not help but think of what is one of the most potent television commercials that has ever been made. It is the one that shows an aboriginal person with a tear running down one cheek as he looks at the devastation brought to an environment, the care of which is such an inherent part of his religious culture.

I agree with the thesis that, yes, we have failed to negotiate appropriate cross-boundary pollution control agreements with the United States. That, of course, suggests that the fault lies exclusively with the United States. Down our way, my colleague from Essex—Windsor called attention to the gross pollution that was put into the Great Lakes from the chemical valley in Sarnia, demonstrating that on the Canadian side we are just as bad.

We should not distort the issue either by placing exclusive responsibility upon government because each one of us has become used to a lifestyle that does severe damage daily to the environment. No, I do not omit those considerations. Indeed, I hope that in the course of this and subsequent debates on this document we will shed light on all of those areas of responsibilities that must be addressed.

I chose today, in the circumstances, to bring attention of the House to a particular example that shows how a little bad decision can lead to great catastrophe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a very brief supplementary comment only to indicate to my colleague that the purpose of my intervention was not to shed blame exclusively on the governments of other countries, but indeed to highlight the fact that collectively, and individually, I suppose to a degree, we have all been negligent in that regard.

I was using that example to illustrate how in the case of Akwesasne the damage was indeed created by those factories on the U.S. side. I accept that there are likely regions of our country in which we have probably done similar things which have affected U.S. residents or Canadian citizens as well. The situation could very well have happened in reverse.

I want to stress again that this particular situation here is largely, if not totally, caused by factories which are only a few hundred feet away, but in another country in that particular case. It is just a comment I wanted to make.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member want a rebuttal on the comment?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, it occurred to me that because my hon. colleague from Essex County is sitting beside me, I wanted to reiterate that we are only a few hundred yards from Detroit. Detroit has a grossly inadequate sewage disposal system.

Just a few months ago they started dumping millions of gallons of untreated sewage into the Great Lakes. Yes, there needs to be a concerted effort along the Canadian-American border to have an arrangement that ensures that we respect one another's environment. This can only come through a coherent trans-boundary environmental control agreement that covers many areas, including air pollution, water pollution, the installation of nuclear plants and the like, because there are no limits that are drawn by any border or any boundaries.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed by the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair and his grasp of the problem. I too have questions for the government about the Green Plan released yesterday by the Minister of the Environment, and my constituents are also anxious for more information.

I would like to ask a question about pesticides because I realize the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair has a background in science, Mr. Speaker. According to an article published in le Journal Vert, it seems a very-well informed source in the Union des producteurs agricoles, who prefers to remain anonymous, has revealed that certain onion and apple producers use pesticides that are not approved by Ottawa. A representative of Agriculture Canada, Mr. Jacques Audet, seems to have said that although they were not able to prove it, there was every reason to believe, on the basis of field samples, that the unlawful use of non-approved pesticides was in some cases taking place on a large scale. So my question for the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair is: Is he aware of the problem? And does he think the government has really dealt with the problem in its Green Plan?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member for Windsor-St. Clair would reply very shortly, in a very succinct manner, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St-Clair): The answer, of course, is no, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, as leader of the opposition in the House and as Whip, I want to thank the members of the House for allowing this debate to continue today. It is an important debate but, nevertheless, it is Friday and a lot of members would like to get home for the weekend. It is difficult sometimes for members to catch planes. With the storm out there it may be difficult for some of us to get home.

Given the weather and other circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition would like to split the the following 20 minutes into two 10 minute periods where the member for Halifax will take the floor for us and the member for Nunatsiaq would also speak. After that we will fold our tent.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon. I guess it was the encouragement of the government members earlier that we were anxious to get into the debate and encouraged us to suggest that perhaps we could extend the debate somewhat into the afternoon to allow those members who have remarks on this important issue to have ample time to complete those remarks.

We will support, certainly with enthusiasm, the suggestion of our hon. colleague. I think, however, that we would just as soon prefer to continue with the 20 and 10 format. We have a number of people who wish yet to speak and we have lots to say but, again, we have no hesitation to support the Official Opposition's request for tens and fives.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we are certainly quite willing to support the Official Opposition in its position to split its time.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks on this extremely important motion, I would just like to pay a compliment to our newest colleague in the House on his maiden speech, the hon. member for Chambly, although I warn him his last remarks were so long that I almost changed my mind about the compliment. However, I do offer it in good faith and good spirit.

This is a crucially important motion. It is a crucially important matter. This is possibly the most important matter facing Parliament and the people of Canada today as we enter into the last decade of the 20th century.

As most people know, I represent the city of Halifax in the Province of Nova Scotia. The Province of Nova Scotia is known and acknowledged far and wide across this country as one of the most beautiful places, not just in this beautiful country of Canada, but one of the most beautiful places on earth.

Our licence plates proclaim us as "Canada's Ocean Playground". We are almost an island. We are connected to the rest of Canada by the isthmus of Chignecto, a scant 12 miles wide, and we are surrounded almost completely by the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, the Bay of Fundy and the Northumberland Strait. We have within our province the beautiful Bradore Lakes, a number of rivers that once, and I say sadly, were teaming with Atlantic salmon, and the wonderful chains of lakes that make up part and parcel of the Kedgemakooge National Park in the southern part of our province.

When Europeans first came to the shores of Nova Scotia in the year 1603, they knew what a beautiful and magnificent country they had settled in. When the first Europeans, the French, came to Nova Scotia, followed soon after by Scots, Irish, English, Germans and many other nations, they settled in this province and they farmed, fished and did some logging.

In the northern part of the province they began the coal mines that go three, four, five and six miles out under the sea, and the steelworks. Even in those early days when they began the steelworks and the coal mines, they were concerned about the environmental reaction, about the way the land, the sky and the water would react to the industrial development in that most beautiful of provinces, Nova Scotia.

To a degree, we do not have so much to worry about from our own home-grown industry any more because the coal industry is almost dead and the steel industry in danger of dying. The beauties of Nova Scotia are imperilled on a daily basis and the change over the last few years has been frightening to those of us who live within this province.

My family has a house 30 miles outside the city of Halifax on the shores of St. Margaret's Bay, very close to one of the most famous landmarks in Nova Scotia, and I refer to Peggy's Cove. Those of you who have not been there, I invite you to come. But I invite you to come fairly quickly while its beauty is still evident to all.

I tell you that on the shores of St. Margaret's Bay, for years people from Halifax and the surrounding area and tourists who come to our province, have used the beaches, gone swimming, sailing, fishing and all the various recreational activities that can be done in Canada's Ocean Playground. Those days are dying because of what is happening to those waters.

Last summer, on one of the few days when I had a chance to spend some time at this house, I came out early in the morning to look at the harbour in front of my house and I saw, washing up with the tide, milk cartons, garbage and the detritus of every day life in our over-packaged, garbage-choked society.

Our hon. colleague from Windsor—St. Clair talk about the ad with the aboriginal North American with the tear running down his face because of the damage to the environment. That is a very moving advertisement, I agree.

• (1600)

The one I was reminded of is one that is equally familiar to many Canadians. That was one for which a former CBC broadcaster, Stanley Burke, did the voice over. You saw the earth, garbage being poured on the earth, garbage being thrown at the earth, and I think the final visual was a cigar butt being put out on the side of the globe. I remember that ad from when I was a university student which, in spite of my youthful appearance, was not yesterday.

The knowledge that the protection of the environment has to be and must be the A-1 priority for government's world-wide is not new. It is not something that was born in the minds of politicians and governments yesterday. It certainly is not something born in the minds of only Canadians, but of people world-wide.

The environmental movement has been a moving force on our earth for many years. In the last couple of years many involved in the environmental movement began to feel a greater sense of accomplishment, purpose and enthusiasm because suddenly we realized that politicians, elected officials and governments recognized the fact that environmental questions were of major concern.

The framework of the government's discussion on the environment is a blow to the sense of light, purpose, accomplishment and hope. We do not need a framework for discussion. That is fine. It is all very well and good. It is printed on recycled paper, which we applaud. But, what we need is action. We do not need to discuss any longer. We know what the problems are. We know what we have to do. We know what is necessary to stop poisoning our lakes, rivers and oceans.

We know what is necessary to end acid rain. We know what is necessary to stop oil spills. We have the answers. Environmentalists have told us time and again that we also have the technology. What the framework for discussion on the environment manifests to all Canadians today is the lack of political will.

I see my colleague and my friend from Cumberland—Colchester has come into the House. I know he would agree with me because just two weeks ago I drove through his beautiful riding of Cumberland—Colchester with the wonderful rolling hills and waterways and the beautiful Bay of Fundy. But, the garbage is rolling up on the beaches in Cumberland county, just as it is rolling up on the beaches of Halifax county, just as it is rolling up on the beautiful beaches within the riding of the member for South Shore, the member for Halifax West and the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants.

The Conservative members from the province of Nova Scotia know what pollution, over-packaging, acid rain and oil spills are doing to what was once a pristine environment in the province of Nova Scotia. We were given this land to nurture us and to nurture our children. What we are doing by refusing to create the political will that will preserve this land is committing long-term suicide for ourselves and for future generations. When the planet is laid waste, if we do not take action now, today in 1990, there will be no one else to blame but the men and women who sat in the House today and proceeded to do nothing more than discuss.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow my colleague, an outstanding spokesperson from the maritimes, who has expressed herself most eloquently on this question. I would like to know from her what kind of readjustment schedules will be necessary in her region as it move towards more sustainable growth in developing alternate uses of fuel, alternate methods of local and indigenous economic development.

How can it be possible when the government is cutting back on regional programs? How can it be possible and what kind of problems are going to be faced when this paper asks you to meet this challenge with talk, talk, talk and no action. I would like to hear from you, Madam Member, through the Chair, exactly how you are going to deal with this when the government has a double standard. One, they talk, but two, no action.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. I realize that in his own experience as a provincial premier he knows the difficulties in dealing with federal governments. One of the things I mentioned in my speech is that the former industrial strategies in the province of Nova Scotia had perhaps less than full environmental approval. I am referring of course to both the steel plants and the coal mines. That, as I said, is no longer a problem.

The ideas of alternate energy sources in Nova Scotia at the moment include coal. As the hon. member is aware, there are several coal mines running in the province. Unfortunately, they are running at a loss. The products from these coal mines are firing a number of electrical generating plants in the province of Nova Scotia, but sadly these plants have to be subsidized because there is no real plan for alternate fuel other than fossil fuel. There is no real commitment from either the provincial government in the province of Nova Scotia or from the federal government to assist hard-pressed, economically depressed provinces like Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

These are some of the most beautiful places on earth and we are throwing them away because there is no political will and there is no plan. Those before such as Nova Scotia's Ecology Action Centre have long and noble service in giving advice to government, which is virtually ignored. As the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was saying, those people are ignored both by provincial governments and certainly by this federal government. We have various environmental strategies but nothing but deaf ears do they fall on, here with the Mulroney government and back home with the Buchanan government.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to compliment my hon. colleague for a most important discourse on this important subject of the environment. It also taught me a few new things about another part of the country with which I was not that familiar. But I would like to ask my hon. colleague a question dealing with how Canadians see the role of government which was touched upon throughout The Green Paper. I would like to begin my question by referring to a poll that was taken two years ago. They discovered that, if a company repeatedly pollutes at unsafe levels, over nine out of ten Canadians want corporate executives held personally and I emphasize that, personally responsible. Sixty three per cent favour fines but a whopping 19 per cent of Canadians say corporate executives should be jailed. I would like to ask my hon. colleague if she agrees with the assessment of two out of ten Canadians that corporate polluters who flout the regulations on a federal level or on a provincial level should go to jail?

• (1610)

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I think the responsibility of board members of corporations should be more serious than merely a financial burden. With jail sentences we get into jurisdictional problems vis-à-vis criminal law and civil law. Should there be criminal sanctions for environmental infractions? I think the answer is most definitely yes. Whether it should be jail or not, I think would depend on the infraction and what happened exactly.

I think we should have a section of the Criminal Code relating to environmental crime. I think sanctions should not merely be in the form of fines against a corporation but the people who run the corporation should be held liable personally. I am not prepared to go as far as jail. We will have to see the individual situation.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I find myself a little puzzled by the contradiction that appears here. Perhaps the hon. member can help me out.

Ms. Clancy: With pleasure.

Mr. Casey: I am sure it will be. On issues such as the GST, VIA Rail and government cut-backs, the opposition insists on consultation with the people. It wants hearings across Canada. It wants the public to have its say.

The Green Plan does exactly that. It gives the people in my riding an opportunity to have a say in what can be done to address environmental problems in our area. There are 35 meetings scheduled and more may be added. I find it a contradiction that the GST is important enough to let people voice their opinions as is VIA Rail cut-backs, but the environment is not important enough to let people have a say.

Some areas in my riding experience 40 per cent unemployment. If the government were to impose environmental regulations without consultation, there could be detrimental effects which hurt a lot of people.

Is the member in favour of hearings across Canada and why are they not as important as hearings on the GST and VIA?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, first, in answer to the member for Cumberland—Colchester, the people of Canada have been telling governments for 20 years their opinions on the environment. Unfortunately, the people of Canada did not have an opportunity to tell the government their opinions on the GST because it was sprung on them a scant two years ago in embryo.

With regard to the environment not being important enough, that is not worthy of the member for Cumberland—Colchester. He knows we all feel the environment is important. I do not deny that. What I deny is the way they go about working it through.

This is similar to a suggestion that we hold more hearings on child care. Clean out your ears, gentlemen. The people of Canada have told you, and told you, and told you, what they want the government to do about child care. They have told you, and told you, and told you, what they want the government to do about the environment. They want it cleaned up. They want it cleaned up now, and they want it clean for their kids. They do not want a 7 per cent goods and services tax, but you brought that up, I did not.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: member spoke in Inuktituk.]

Mr. Speaker, as an aboriginal person, I would just like give some ideas of what the aboriginal peoples in the north have always maintained about themselves and the environment.

The concern for the environment has been around for years. All of a sudden it has become a buzz word in more recent days. The aboriginal people have always been concerned about the environment. We have always considered ourselves true environmentalists. We have posters that say: "Take care of the land because it takes care of you". We have always maintained that we are very much in touch with the environment and our surroundings.

Although environmentalists and the public have shown that they are willing to do something about the environment and are willing to suffer some inconveniences, the government has been slow to react. One good example is the Green Paper that just came out. As my hon. colleague from Halifax said earlier, people have been concerned about the environment for some years but nobody has been willing to do anything.

While we have been waiting for some policy directions from the government for over a year, all of a sudden we are told that it has to do a study and consult. It could have been consulting for the past year and we could have been a little further ahead. Over the past year, maybe the ozone layer has become bigger. It is getter bigger. Now is the time to do something about those kinds of things.

The aboriginal peoples have always shown that they care about the environment. They object to some developments that did not have proper environmental safeguards. I will give you some examples. One is James Bay. The Quebec government was prepared to go full steam ahead to build a dam and basically did not really care about the concerns of the Cree, Inuit and the environmentalists from around that area. We are going to get into the same problems that we are getting into now in James Bay. For example, take the people from the South Moresby and Temagami area and now the Innu people in Goose Bay.

In my own riding of Nunatsiaq, there is a proposal for a uranium mine. Last Monday the people of Baker Lake showed that they are overwhelmingly against the mine starting up in Baker Lake. The government has not taken a stand one way or the other as to whether it is willing to approve it or not. It has not decided whether it should give more money to those people that want to make presentations to the Federal Environmental Assessment Review organization. What the people of Baker Lake are saying is that they want the government to give them some funding so that they can adequately and ably argue or debate the issue of whether there should be uranium mine in Baker Lake. They are not being given that chance because they are being told that there are time and funding limits to the whole question of the proposed uranium mine.

I would also like to say that on The Green Plan the government says it wants to consult with the aboriginal people. It is good that it finally wants to do that. However, we have been waiting for that for years. We have been waiting for somebody to ask us what we think of the environment because we are intimately involved with the environment. They should have been asking us when they were debating the Oldman River Dam, the Rafferty-Alameda, James Bay and the proposed pulp mills in Alberta. We have just been waiting to be asked.

Another issue that I would like to touch on is the issue of the Inuit people and the environment. Some years ago, a French movie star started the whole thing. Brigitte Bardot, with the help of Greenpeace, destroyed a livelihood that the Newfoundland people had as well as the Inuit people in the north, without asking us, without asking us what we thought about whether there should be seal hunts in Newfoundland, never realizing that it was going to destroy two livelihoods—the Inuit and the Newfoundland people.

Again we could have given them some advice on how to go about dealing with the environment, but they did not choose to do that. Now, in retrospect, they say: "Well, we did not mean to destroy the Inuit way of life". Generous, very generous after the fact. So what do we say to people like the environmentalists? We have no problems with the environmentalists as long as we can work with them and the government is willing to listen to us. But to people like Greenpeace and others, what we would say to them is: "Don't call us we will call you".

Now the same thing is happening with the anti-fur movement. What really bothers me is that these people think they know best, either environmentalists or anti-fur movement, animal rights people. All these guys are saying is: "We do not want you to hunt; we do not want you to trap". The animal rights group think, I am sure, that steaks come from the supermarket. I mean that is how they think, that chickens come from the supermarket, that they do not need to be killed or plucked or skinned, and all that. It boggles the mind as to how insensitive, for lack of a better word, these people can be.

In terms of the anti-fur and animal rights group, what they do not realize is that we do not contribute to the damage to the environment. In getting the fur or the seal skin there is very little damage if any to the environment. However, I should say that those people who are animal rights groups should think about what they are wearing in terms of manufacturing, what it did to the environment in manufacturing their jacket, their shirt, whatever, their rayon, nylon, whatever. I think they should be thinking more along that line.

I would just like to touch on the contamination of food. In the north, which I have mentioned previously, the people of Broughton Island, a small community of about 450, are concerned about PCBs and other chemicals in their food chain. They have absolutely nothing to do with the contamination of that food chain. This food chain was through the polar bear or other animals. They got contaminated from the fall down of chemicals that do not know any international boundaries. PCBs do not know that they are not supposed to fall in Canada. They are not supposed to, but they do not know that. Meanwhile, more contamination is happening because there are not enough environmental programs being instituted in various governments, whether it is the federal government or other governments.

I would like to touch on the tanker traffic proposals in the north. When they are talking about the environment in the north, people have to realize it is a very fragile ecological system. We call it Nunatsiaq, the good land. However, Mr. Speaker, if I were to describe Nunatsiaq to you, I would say the beautiful land. I say the good land because it gives us life. That is the difference in how we see the land. We use it and call it the good land.

It is always an honour to address the people here about various issues. I am glad that I had this opportunity to say a few things about the environment.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Nunatsiaq on his remarks. In particular, I want to raise the fact that last summer, when our colleague hosted our caucus in his riding on Baffin Island, we were told about some other environmental dangers up there such as the dumping of leftover machinery belonging to American military personnel. I am wondering if he would like to make any comments about that this afternoon.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

We have had promises from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I must admit that I am not sure which minister made a statement about those abandoned Distant Early Warning sites, but the minister said that they would be cleaned up. I do not want to give credit to the wrong minister. It was either the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who said: "We will clean these sites up until only our footprints are left". I am waiting to see that happen. So far nothing has happened in that regard. Unfortunately there has been a change of ministers in one department so we will wait.

I would like to carry on a little further concerning the issue of how environmentally cautious we are in the north. The Inuit Circumpolar Conference, which is the international arm of the Inuit, received a Global 500 Award from the United Nations Environmental Program for: "Outstanding achievements, protection and improvement of the environment".

The work of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference was cited as an example of the world conservation strategy in action. I would hope that measures are taken to clean up the sites that my hon. colleague mentioned, and that they will be taken soon. This will give us our beautiful land back to its natural state, once it has been used as a Distant Early Warning site or by any other group.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am delighted to have an opportunity this afternoon to speak to this motion. It has been some time since we read the motion. Perhaps it would be worth while to take a moment or two to read what the motion is all about. It states:

> That this House condemn the government for its lack of sincere commitment to the environment and for its vacuous discussion paper which completely fails to offer the—

Mr. Hawkes: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe I see a quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not either. Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will ask the Deputy Clerk to count the members present.

And there being only 13 members present including the Acting Speaker, the names were taken down and the House adjourned at 4.45 p.m.
