much attention both in scientific cir-cles and from the general public. Set forth by Darwin in the 'Origin of Spe-sics,' it has been largely developed in a series of interesting publications by Sir John Lutinek and Mr. Grant Allen. now been thrown on it by a series of experiments recently carried out by Professor Plateau of the University of Ghent. Professor Plateau has arrived at the conclusion that insects are indifferent to the colors of the flowers they visit, and that they are guided to them in a very subordinate way by sight. The experiments on which the Belgian professor bases his farreaching conclusions are briefly these: Having covered the brightly colored flowers of single dahlias in his garden with bits of green leaf, he found that they were still visited by insects. This seemed so much at variance with the generally received view that insects are attracted to flowers chiefly by their color that Professor Plateau instituted a prolonged series of experiments and observations to put the matter still further to the proof. The result has been to confirm and strengthen the conclusions drawn from the first experiments. Cutting off the brightly colored corollas of such flowers as lo belia, evening primrose, foxglove, etc., be found the remaining green parts were still visited. Again there are some brightly colored flowers which are seldom or never visited by insects owing to their lack of honey. Notable among these is the scarlet geranium of our gar-den. But when a little honey was placed on geranium flowers bees came to them at once, those blossoms which had not received honey being passed over. "Other conspicuous flowers were tried in a similar way with like results. The experiment of removing the honey bearing parts of a flower and leaving the brightly colored part, which was sup-posed to be attractive, was also tried with the single dablia. Its inner florets outer ones, a piece of yellow leaf being placed in the center. No insects went to these honeyless flowers. But as soon as a drop of nectar was placed on them they visited them as freely as before. Again, Professor Plateau made artificial flowers with pieces of green leaf, each furnished with a little honey. These were freely visited by insects. But artificial flowers made of colored material were neglected, even when supplied with honey.

"In further support of his views Prorieties of the same species growing together in our gardens; they visit a great number of green and greenish colored flowers; there are many small and in-bearing on the theory of the insect origin of flowers is obvious."-London Times. Worked the Wrong Way. Mr. Dooley, a Mobile ship carpenter, elates an amusing incident connected with the blockade of Mobile harbor during the civil war. Some ship carpenters had been put to work by the government to manufacture floating mines and had taken a number of heavy pieces of square timber and placed them in the form of a triangle, three pieces being used to each. At the end of each of the sticks-that is, on the three points-was placed a torpedo. A few days after this the wind came out strong from the north, and the torpedoes were taken and placed in position in the bay so that they would be driven by the wind against the United States gunboats. The plan was apparently to be successful, the torpedoes being driven rapidly in the direction of the enemy's gunboats, and great damage might have resulted to Uncle Sam's ships had not the wind suddenly changed, and the torpe-does were brought back and carried in a bunch to the bay opposite Frascati. Here the torpedo mines met in an eddy, and there was suddenly a great explosion, followed by another, and yet another, completely tearing the rafts to pieces and producing at the same time a panic among the people resident on the shore, who went to Mobile city and reported that the enemy was bombarding Frascati.

The Naval Captain In Battle. Writing of the perils of naval warfare, Park Benjamin in The Independent says: Nobody now believes that a captain who finds his vision through the slits of the conning tower cut off by smoke will stay thus shut up. It is extremely doubtful if it will be physically possible for him to remain there after the shells ommence to hammer its sides and burst against it, and in any event the intense anxiety to see and know clearly what the enemy is doing will inevitably lead him to take his chances in the open. Conning tower or no conning tower, his duty is to place himself at whatever point he can manage his ships to the best advantage, and this he will certainly do. Lord Charles Beresford, with grim humor, has suggested that the captain's safest place is not in but behind his conning tower, "because then he has two thicknesses of steel between himself and the enemy, don't you see?" But while coming tower armor may resist penetration it is by no means certain that the whole structure will not be swept away by the first heavy projectile which squarely hits it.

Electric Propulsion of Ships. Up to the present electricity has scarcely been thought suitable as the scarcely been thought suitable as the principal motive or propelling power for the larger type of vessels. This is undoubtedly owing to the fact that for a given horsepower a triple or quadruple expansion steam engine would take up less space and probably weigh less than an electrical installation of equal power. Storage batteries are out of the question for such uses, although persons not well up in electrical subjects frequently wonder why our ocean greyhounds are not propelled by some such method. It may interest some of our readers to know that a vessel requiring an average of 10,000 horsepower to propel it across the Atlantic, and displacing 5,000 tons, would be obliged to carry, were storage batteries alone made use of, 324,480,000 pounds of such batteries, or, in other words the motive power alone. other words, the motive power alone would weigh 162,240 tons, or 30 times as much as the ship. - Electricity. A teetotal lecturer at West Bromwich, in order to illustrate the horrors of drinking, told his audience a story of a wooden legged toper who was so drunk one night that he took off his wooden leg to wind the clock. The story was told in all simplicity by the lecturer as he had heard it in his childhood.

Strange to say, it applied exactly to the husband of a lady who happened to be the amount. You get a shave at your They Fertilize Plowers For Strictly Utillone of the audience. A Clever Draftsman. The slickest draftsman in our office at this kind of work is a little, dark complexioned fellow who sits in a corner and says never a word. He has a glass eye and three wooden legs. His name is Camera. He takes his cap off at a drawing for only a minute and says to the foreman: "I have made a more accurate copy than any tracer in the office could have done. Every line is exact, every circle is true and all your figures are correctly copied. If you are using your drawing for constant reference, I will only delay you a minute, and your copy will be ready for printing in an hour." To any intelligent man such an appeal will not pass without a careful exam-ination.—American Machinist.

Where the Pecan Grows. The pecan is a near relative of the hickory nut. It does not thrive in all lands that the hickory nut will, but the hickory nut will grow well wherever the pecan will. The home of the pecan is the low, rich bottom land that lies along the Wabash, Mississippi, White and Big Bend rivers, while they seem to grow equally as well in the Indian Territory and in the best watered parts

The Moult.
The Russian calendar is full of saints' days and of holidays of every kind, and Ivan would sooner see his hay or his stroke of work upon any day which offers the smallest canonical excuse for remaining idle. Then there is "the drink." This is the darling vice of the country and the real cause of the poverty of the peasant classes and of half the misery that exists throughout the

Such is a brief outline of Professor Plateau's observations and experiments, from which he believes himself justified in drawing the conclusion that sight plays a very subordinate part in attracting insects to flowers. Made up complexions are on the increase in New York. The fashionable or would be fashionable New Yorker who does not today make up a little is a rare bird. A dab of rouge for evening has never been considered criminal by her, but she now uses it for daytime as well. As always happens when a habit becomes more universal, much of the present make up is very badly done. The few did it, as a rule, artistically, but the many lay it on with a heavy hand. Without wishing to go into the ethics of make up it is safe to say this—the fact that so much of it is done badly is one reason why we object to

One must always have a sneaking appreciation of the story of the father who when told that his daughter used rouge called her to him and asked if it were "It is," replied the girl. "For heaven's sake," said the father, 'go straight up stairs and wash it off.''

The Philadelphia Record tells this story of the late President William H. Allen of Girard college: On one occasion a business matter called Mr. Allen to a small sown in the central part of the state. While sitting in the parlor of the country hotel in the evening after ransacting his business he was taken in hand by the wife of the proprietor, who was extremely inquisitive and wanted to know all about his private affairs. Mr. Allen took it all in good part and for a time was rather amused Finally she asked, "Have you got much of a family?' "Oh, yes," said he, and he smiled as his mind reverted to his hundreds of pupils.

"How many children?" she persisted.
"Well," said Mr. Allen, with great earnestness, "I have 500 and all boys!"
The good old lady was speechless for a moment. Then she arose and hurrying to the door called to her husband: "Oh, John! Come in here! We've got Brigham Young stoppin with us! A London Lad's Prayer. W. Pett Ridge, the London writer, Pain and Payn. Barry Pain relates that he once sent for Comhill. Payn accepted them, but there was a difficulty. One of them was parody of an author, X., who was a onal friend of Payn's and a very sensitive man, who would not take the sincerest form of flattery in the spirit in which it was offered. Now, it happens that there is a considerable resem nce between the style of X. and that of another author of the same school, Y. Payn suggested that Pain should take out X.'s name from the title of the parody and substitute that of the school of fiction to which he belonged. "Then," he said, "X. will think that it's mean

"But," Pain asked, "what about Y.?" "That's all right," he answered.
"Y. will know that it's meant for X."

JAS. F. CONNORS,

London and the Frenchman was absent the feeling wore away, but as the time for the return to Walcote approached it came back again, and could she have had her choice she would have taken Sir Jaffray right away out of Europe for another long tour, such as that which had made their honeymoon so

But Sir Jaffray would not hear of it. He was anxious to spend the late sum-mer and autumn at Walcote. He longed to see Lola at the head of his splendid old home, and he was keenly anticipat-ing the shooting. Thus he left Loudon full of the most pleasurable anticipa-

Sir Jaffray and Lola were alone in the house for two or three days before any of the guests came, and during that time Lola struggled against the pre-sentiment of evil which depressed her. But she could not shake it off, and as to leave him."

"What a very conventional creature!" exclaimed Mrs. De Witt. "She was, of course, a woman of the middle classes."

"Searcely conventional, madame," said M. Turrian. "She geaded him with some hot, bitter words—that was conventional, of course—and when he the day approached on which Pierre Turrian was to arrive she grew dull and moody and even irritable. She had done all that she dared to prevent his coming to stay in the house, and the idea of it both angered and dis-justed her. She had entered on the depeption without at all realizing the constant association with lies which it

She shrank from having the two men under the same roof. She had expected under the same roof. She had expected that Pierre would have taken her money, and, after staying perhaps a short time at Walcote, would have gone away to the continent, back to that disreputable, roaming life which he had always lived. She could have borne that, but this constant association with him, his presence in the house and the life of continuous deceit and lying which it forced upon her made her sin which it forced upon her made her ain against the man she loved so patent, so "But you say h flagrant, so ever present and pressing that she began to repent that she had ever chosen the path of deceit.

Sir Jaffray caught her in one of her fits of moodiness on the day when Pierre Turrian arrived. Mrs. De Witt and Beryl were also in the house. Sir Jaffray had surprised Lola with her mask off

"Is that all?" There was something in his tone which made her feel he did not quite accept the answer, and he took his arm away from round her waist. "You are a creature of moods, Lola," he continued thoughtfully, "and I sometimes think that some of the things in your past life which you have never told me depress you."

"Why do you think there is anything

I have not told you?" "You have told me very little."
"There is only little to tell," she replied, surprised at his words, for he had never pressed her as to any incident of her life with her father, "and cer-tainly nothing not to tell." Her quickness to read in his words a suggestion of doubt roused her into an attitude of

He noticed the change, and he stooped

"When I doubt you, child, I will tell you so openly. I am with you and for you against the world."

She answered his caress impulsively and threw her arms round him and, kissing him passionately, exclaimed:
"Ah, Jaffray, I think sometimes I should be a happier woman if I did not love you as I do."

"Happier if you did not love me?" he questioned and smiled. "That is a puzsle I can't read. Would you rather that I did not love you, then? "Ah, no, no! I would rather you killed me by the cruelest of deaths."

And she clung to him. "Then you are a problem I can't which it solve," he answered, laughing, "but a his life. problem that is very dear to me, solved

While they were thus lovemaking the first of the dinner gongs sounded, and they had to hasten away to dress.

Then at dinner an incident happened which disturbed Lola profoundly and marked the beginning of the end. "And what did he do next?" "It is the story of a friend of mine," said the Frenchman, pausing a moment to emphasize his next remark. "Do you know the Devil's rock in the Swiss mountains? Do you, Lady Walcote?" he asked when the others said nothing.

Something in the tone made Beryl Leycester look up, and she saw that Sir Jaffray's wife was on the defensive. "The Devil's rock, the Devil's rock," replied Lola, repeating the words as if waiting for the name to strike some chord of recollection and speaking very naturally. "I seem to have heard of it, and yet—you know how one's memory will play tricks—I really can't say."

And she smiled very sweetly.
"It is well named at any rate," said M. Turrian. "Imagine a semicircular background of rough, steep orags, with there and there thick, dark firs and pines on them, and in the middle a sharp pinmacle rook standing sheer and grim and solitary, joined to the background by a I? And when I say friend I can't mean "He's no friend of mine," replied

Lola indifferently. "He's here because Jaffray asks him." "Well, my dear, of course he is." And she laughed significantly,
"I mean that I do not want him here," said Lola rather warmly, resenting her companion's tone.

"Oh, it's that way, is it? He is the snarer, is he? Has it been that way with him long? How long is it since you refused him?"

Lola laughed in her turn.
"You think there must always be that kind of tie, eh?"

"Not always, but in this case yes. Else why is he here, my dear? But he's precipice stretching down hundreds of feet to the bottom of the gorge. "It's just as easy for 20 people to make a mistake as one," returned Lols woman's faithlessness?" asked Mrs. De Witt, with a smile. "More than usual," returned the Frenchman, laughing dayly. "There was murder done on that very spot—again warmiy.

"I only speak for your guidance, Lola," said her companion, not noticing the interruption, "and you can be very angry with me if you like. Never have an affair with a man who wants to blurt it out right in the teeth of the world. That man was looking at you world. That man was telling that cock and bull story with an expossion in his eyes which said as plainly as possible, 'You and I understand one another.' And you are so inexperienced—don't be angry, my dear; you'll grow out of it -that you even turned a shade na time—that you even turned a sande pale and bit your lip hard when he did look at you. Of course I don't doubt you a bit about having no understand-ing with him, but in that case I wouldn't have him in the house an wouldn't have him in the house an hour if I were you, for he acts just as if you both did understand one another very thoroughly. And one has to be very innocent nowadays before one can afford to be suspected for nothing. It's had enough when it's for something." And Mss. De Witt laughed again and shrugged her plump white shoulders.

"You find it hard, I dare say, to look through marked classes and see what face with the parasol she was carrying, and he stumbled back and fell over."

"Oh, that's not murder! Much more like suicide," said Mrs. De Witt. "If he knew what sort of a woman she was he might have known what to expect if he tried force on such a spot." "Wait," resumed the Frenchman.
"In falling he caught hold of a point of the rock with one hand and would have saved himself, but she, seeing what had happened, stamped on his fingers with all her strength, bruising and crushing them and causing him to lose his hold. "That may be as you like," replied the other curtly, "but in any case I'm not such a fool as to let a man cry 'Fire! Fire!' very loudly and plainly in order that other people may amuse themselves by speculating whether there's smoke or not." And Mrs. De Witt coughed a "I say it was murder in intent. What think you, Lady Walcote?" And he stopped and looked boldly into Lola's little aggravatingly. "But tell me who is he? Where did Magog pick him up?"

Lola told her shortly.

"An old papil. Oh!" And she coughed again. "You knew, Lola, you are very pretty and—well, I have heard of such a thing as a music master falling in love—yeu know what I mean. Of course you know best, and it's not for me to say a werd. But if I were you I shouldn't encourage Magog in that in-

"I tell you what I'll do," she said,after a moment's pause. "I'll lend him

Mrs. De Witt looked a little pumiled at this. at this.

"No, thank you. I have a graver mission than that. I mean to bring back Magog himself to his lost allegiance," she said audaciously. "You've monopolised him quite long enough. But I'll give your Frenchman any time I can spare from the more serious business of my visit."

"Very well," said Lola, smiling.
"I'll give you all of Sir Jagray that—you can take." "You're very predigal with your gifts," said Mrs. De Witt in a rather waspish tone. She was irritated at not quite understanding Lola.

At that moment the two men were heard laughing, and directly afterward Lois, mindful of Mrs. De Witt's words, was especially guarded in her manner teward the Frenchman.

The two men sat down close to Mrs. De Witt, who held them in conversa tion, and Lela, sitting a little apart, grew thoughtful. She was beginning to realize more and more clearly how the lead that she was bearing would gall and wound with its weight and how difficult it might be to carry it at all without its crushing

She had noticed Beryl's tone and look when the girl had asked that question about Montreux, and she saw instantly that from that side there might develop

Lola had never understood Beryl. She could not gauge the strength and possi-bilities of a nature that seemed to her so indifferent, so cold and so hard to wound. She knew that Beryl had loved Sir Jaffray, probably loved him now and possibly might never again feel a spark of love for any other man. Such, she thought, was sometimes the persistence of these self restrained women. Yet there had never been a sign of hostility or resentment on Beryl's part at the breaking of that old tacit engagethreateningly, half jeeringly and all audaciously, at her, and through the flowers and ferns Sir Jaffray, upright and handsome, listening with the rest, as unconcernedly as if it were a tale nent and the wrecking of her life.

Why was this? Lola had puzzled over that problem more than once, and the episode of the dinner table showed her now that the How would he look if he knew who the murderess was? answer to it might be the hinge on The thought flashed across Lola's brain just as she forced herself to speak which the whole future of her life at Walcose manor might turn.

Given that Beryl harbored any sus-picion and that by any freak of fortune she could get at the truth, how would her old leve for Sis Jastray prompt her

'I should strike at any cost,'' thought Lola, "but we are very different. She may have that power of self sacrifice which I have not, and it may be that if I could control other things," and she glanced in disgust at Pierre Turrian, "she would even do nothing. I wonder what she thinks." "But what was the end,

"You seem very quiet, Lola," said Sir Jafray, coming to her side at this moment. He had glafted several times at his wife and had noticed how unusaally preoccupied and silent she was.
"Yes, I was listening for once," she answered, smiling.
"Where is Beryl? Turrian is going to sing, and I know she would like to hear and then he will strike, choosing his "She went away with the mother.

I'll go and tell her." And Lola, glad to be alone for a moment, went out of

She did not go directly to Lady Walsole's rooms, but when she reached the long, broad corridor which led to them she staid and walked two or three times the full length of it, pursuing the train of thought which had been interrupted. While she was thus occupied Beryl came ont of one of the rooms and stood in astonishment watching Lola, who was so absorbed that she did not hear the door open. When she reached the end of the corridor and turned, Lola for the first time noticed Beryl and thought that the girl was watching her.

"'Aren't you well, or is anything the natter, Lola" asked Beryl.

"What should be the matter?" remrned Lola a little irritably, for Beryl's cold manner always seemed to ruffle her, and she was annoyed now at hav-ing been found doing what was unusual, "I was coming to ask you if you would not like to hear M. Turrian sing. He is going to sing now."

"It is very good of you to think of it," said Beryl. "I'll come. I should like to hear him. He interests me." "It was not I who thought of it, but Jaffray," answered Lola. "I mustn't claim credit that belongs to him."

"Well, you came to fetch me at any rate," replied Beryl, with a smile that warmed her face and lighted it. Then in a different tone she said as they went down stairs together: "M. Turrian is a strange character. He seems to show a new side every time I see him. I have not heard him before in the role of stery staller."

"Have you not?" answered Lela in-differently. "I am rather surprised at that. He prides himself on his powers a good deal, and Jaffray thinks much of him on account of them." noted throughout the country.

Then the Frenchman went to the piane, where Lola and her husband stood together, and sang to Lola's ac-When he sang, it was difficult to think of him as connected with any-thing evil. He had a marvelously rich and sweet tenor voice, which he used with consummate skill as the vehicle of Beryl sat listening half in a dream, leaning back in her chair and drinking in the intoxicating sweetness of the man's voice as it swept at will the underlying chords of her nature,

But though Lola had answered lightly she had an instinct that there was something behind the remark which menaced mischief.

As the two entered the drawing room together Lola glanced round her rapidly, with a carious sense that in some way a crisis was at hand; but, meeting her husband's eyes, which rested upon her with an expression of warm love, she smiled him back a signal and went apple," said Mrs. De Witt, leaning across to whisper to Beryl and ending with a raspy, jerky laugh of shallow cynicism, which she much affected. The words broke up a reverie in which Beryl was castle building.

"He sings magnificently," she assented, with a slight frown at the interruption.

"Whe is he, my dear? Do you know?"
asked Mrs. De Witt, who was very tired asked Mrs. De Witt, who was very tired of listening in silence even te the singing and was, moreover, very curious to know more about the Frenchman.

Beryl thought of it all it dased and confused her, and she wondered if what she thought or rather what she believe she knew could possibly be true, and as often as her eyes rested on Sir Jaf-fray, knowing his honest, sterling honor and mindful of her old unshakable love for him, she was filled with a deep pity for him on account of the blow which might fall at any moment, glooming his

But her face hardened and her hear steeled when she looked toward the woman who had come between her and her cousin, filling her life with the blight of loveless One step she resolved to take, and that at once. She would speak to the Frenchman, and this resolve she put in force the next day. After breakfast on the following morning she waited for an opportunity of finding the Frenchman alone and then joined him.

"M. Turrian, there is a subject or which you can help me. Oan you spare me five minutes?" she said. "Will you come to the conservatory?" "I will give you five hours, Miss Leycester," he said, with his exagger-ated gesture, "What is it?" And the air of surface indifference which he assumed did not blind Beryl to the quick, questioning glance which he shot at hee. Beryl said nothing until they were

"I was in Montreux this summer," she continued, "and in the course of my stay I visited the Chapel of St. Sulpice and examined the register there. I painful puzzle to me. It is that of the marriage of a certain Pierre Turrian with Lola Crawshay. Here is a copy, Can you tell me what it means?"

As she said this Beryl looked him steadily in the face and held out the paper for him to read. He took it from her and read it, holding it with fingers which with all his efforts he could not keep from trembling violently, while his face turned to the ghastly ashen color which she had seen nce before when she had told him in their first interview that Lola was married to Sir Jaffray.

She recalled that incident as she stood watching him steadily with eyes that pever left his face and waiting for the enswer, which he seemed absolutely un-able to force from between his lips. And with every moment of silence
