Why, since 1957, has monetary policy not made the contribution required by our legislation to mitigate recessions, and why does the governor feel that there is no special obligation in this respect, as he said recently in his speech in Newfoundland?

Those are the words of the Leader of the Opposition four months ago. Later on that same page he is reported as follows:

It is most regrettable indeed that the Bank of Canada has become the centre of the present controversy because it may weaken seriously the prestige and the authority of a most essential institution whose prestige and authority in this country since it was established have been strong and which has commanded the highest respect.

Then he went on to say the following:

I am quite sure that all hon. members in this house will agree that in our system of responsible government the general direction of monetary policy should not be turned over to any public servant.

That represents the wisdom of February which I ask the opposition to adopt as the wisdom of July. Then on August 10, 1960 the Leader of the Opposition, speaking in the house, again summarized the position of the governor vis-à-vis the government of the day, as reported at page 7926 of Hansard:

The minister indicated to us a few moments ago that the fiscal and monetary policies of the government are above reproach, indeed almost above criticism. Perhaps he will not be surprised if we do not take exactly the same view of them. He said also that not the government but the Bank of Canada is responsible for monetary policy.

In saying that he said in 1958, 1959 and 1960 what Mr. Harris had said in 1956 and 1957. Then he continued:

Of course that is written into the Bank Act and in a technical sense is undoubtedly true.

Well, if it is true in a technical sense under the law, what is the difference between something which is technically true in law and that which is actually true? Then the Leader of the Opposition went on to say this:

But the Bank of Canada can only operate in discharging its responsibility for monetary policy within the fiscal policies laid down by the government.

I underline these words because I am sure the opposition have not read them lately:

If there is any difference between the bank and the government on such fundamental matters then it has been made clear that the governor of the bank should resign or, less likely, that the government should resign.

These were the words of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: They are still our words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are his words on August 10, 1960. The alternative is there, Mr. Speaker; and we are staying. The Leader of the Opposition made a speech in Montreal on the question of responsibility of the government. This was a non-political speech delivered to the Canadian club and entitled "The Anatomy of Challenge". Let us look into this anatomy.

The government must take the responsibility in a time of financial crisis, not only for monetary policy but also for fiscal and trade policy.

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

In my view it is damaging and dangerous for the government to relegate all responsibility for monetary policy to a central bank, while accepting full responsibility for debt management.

That is Mr. Coyne's exact position. In fact he goes further than that and says "I cover the whole field", by the kind of speeches he made and, forgetting the speeches, by that torrent of vituperation that has come to all of us in recent days through the medium of those letters. Then the Leader of the Opposition said:

If the bank, in monetary matters cannot operate within the broad policy laid down by the government, then, under this principle of responsibility, the governor of the bank would naturally expect to give way to someone who could conscientiously carry out the policy.

I stayed out of the debate because it seemed so absolutely apparent to me that the declarations of the past on the part of the opposition would not justify the evasions of the present. Indeed, when I place the former views of the Leader of the Opposition before the house, and the ones that he expresses today, all I can say is that the trumpet has an uncertain sound. They are different, diametrically opposite. I am not going to refer to the press clippings except one that may be of interest to the hon. member for Essex East. He is a little annoyed at the moment; he has not been referred to. I should like him to hear what the Windsor Star had to say about this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a very good paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A very good paper; does the hon. member approve of what it says?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said it is a very good paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It contains an article on the supremacy of parliament. The issue is dated June 29.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was it by Mr. Clark?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

Whether or not a person agrees with the economics of James E. Coyne, the outgoing governor of the Bank of Canada is now questioning the supremacy of parliament.

Oliver Cromwell did that in England in 1649 and in 1653 he became the Lord Protector, which was just a fancy name for dictator.

The commonwealth lasted from 1649 to 1660. Then, the people were fed up with dictators and the monarchy was restored.

Mr. Coyne defies the parliament. In so doing he has revealed things that went on. Ordinarily, it is doubtful if these so-called secrets ever would have been told publicly.

Then it goes on:

In our system of government, parliament is supreme.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have favourable support now for something the opposition have been denying for days. What members of this government were not able to do with the hon. gentlemen, the Windsor Star has done. Then the final words:

If Mr. Coyne is greater than parliament, then he becomes a dictator. Whether or not Canadians agree with Mr. Coyne's theory, are they ready to do away with parliament?

There is the simple issue. All the other matters which are dragged in are not relevant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall come shortly to the spurious argument of the opposition. When parliament acts, and the board of directors have acted, then the opposition take the position that of course the governor should not be there. The hon. member for Essex East said "a lot of things he stands for I do not agree with". He said the governor should have a further opportunity to give some additional reasons, following the deluge of propaganda that has been heaped on parliament and the people of the country. However, before I go into that field I do want to refer to the press conference at which the Leader of the Opposition appeared. If only the Leader of the Opposition could be himself, what a great man he would be. It was very obvious that the image of the man I know was subverted that evening to the demands of those who sit around him. I want to read from this document, and I turn to page 1:

I have already stated in the House of Commons that the usefulness of Mr. Coyne as the governor of the Bank of Canada has been destroyed by this unhappy and sorry controversy.

This was on June 22. Then he was asked this question:

Won't this only drag the unhappy business out to greater lengths and maybe drag on a controversy which will further damage the bank and the position of the governor?

The Leader of the Opposition answered:

I would hope not. I would hope that if this controversy is to go on, the air should be cleared. But I do agree that it should not have happened and that it should be ended as quickly as possible and I certainly don't want to say or do anything which would add to the controversy or extend it or prolong it because Canada's prestige has been damaged by this controversy.

Then he said:

We on the Liberal side have been, along with some C.C.F. members, the only persons who have in the House of Commons criticized some of Mr. Coyne's statements and some of Mr. Coyne's policies.

They criticized. The governor placed before the country certain representations that he made to the minister on February 24. On February 24 he set out his views, and I will refer to them and allow hon. gentlemen opposite to try and disentangle themselves from the position they are now in, that they stand behind the things for which Mr. Coyne stands.

I want to make that very clear. This question was put to the Leader of the Opposition:

Mr. Pearson, you said that if Mr. Fleming could demonstrate to you or to the Liberal party that his policies and those of Mr. Coyne were in conflict that you would not support the governor.

That has been done by Mr. Coyne, and he has done it by publishing those letters that passed between him and the Minister of Finance.

I think that is in essence what you said in the House of Commons.

Then the Leader of the Opposition went on to say:

Why didn't Mr. Fleming take this action on behalf of the government two or three years ago—

That is not the attitude today. The hon. gentleman says that we should have acted two or three years ago; and there is no question about it that the continuing process, as revealed by the letters improperly brought out by Mr. Coyne, indicate that division most clearly and definitely. I am sorry; I have not given the names of the press men involved and I must mention who they were. Mr. Arthur Blakely was the chairman and the members of the panel were Mr. Clark Davey, Mr. Michael Barkway and Mr. Tom Gould. This question was asked:

Isn't it a fact there is really a greater gulf between Mr. Coyne and the views the Liberal party has been expressing—I am thinking particularly of Mr. Walter Gordon's speeches about expanding the money supply and deficit financing and bringing down interest rates—than there has been between him and the government?

Then the Leader of the Opposition said:

Indeed, we have criticized Mr. Coyne's policies . . . Indeed, I have taken that position—

The question was:

Are you then saying, sir, that the government must take responsibility for monetary policy and must be in a position to dictate monetary policy to the governor of the Bank of Canada?

The answer was:

Indeed, I have taken that position in the House of Commons. I have got my statements here—that the government must take ultimate responsibility for monetary policy but not for the administration of policy and that if there is a dispute between the governor and the government, the governor should resign.

I ask the Leader of the Opposition to speak in the House of Commons as he spoke at the time he confused Mr. Barkway.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, of course the Prime Minister is reading selected pieces from my statement. Perhaps he would go on to read this bit which I have already put on the record, that Mr. Coyne "should have his day in court and by in court"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the Prime Minister who has the floor yields it, the hon. member should not interrupt but rather can make his explanation at the end of the speech.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this, and I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor, sir.

Mr. Pearson: —is selecting—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is no point of order, and the hon. gentleman knows it. At the end he may bring in any portion of the record that he wishes. I am reading from his answers. I am reading fully and completely from page 6.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: —the Prime Minister now states that he is reading fully and completely. That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that hurts the hon. gentleman like the revelation of the truth. I am reading every word on page 6 with not one deletion.

Are you then saying, sir, that the government must take responsibility for monetary policy and must be in a position to dictate monetary policy to the governor of the Bank of Canada?

This was the answer:

Indeed, I have taken that position in the House of Commons. I have got my statements here—that the government must take ultimate responsibility for monetary policy but not for the administration of policy and that if there is a dispute between the governor and the government, the governor should resign.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue:

I have said that in the House of Commons and when I said that I remember Mr. Fleming once intervened and said, "No, no".

Mr. Pearson: That is right, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not omitting one word, not one omission.

Mr. Harkness: Try to keep quiet over there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall come to the day in court in a moment and will show exactly the position of affairs in that connection. At the moment I am reading from the record, page 6. This question was asked:

Who is to be the judge of whether there is or is not a dispute? If the government says yes, there is a dispute, and the governor of the Bank of Canada says he knows of none, whose judgment—

The Leader of the Opposition replied:

Oh, the government's views must prevail in these matters, the government of course.

Mr. Pearson: Read on, read on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I could read forever.

Mr. Pearson: Do; go on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will come back to that because I am going to deal with that particular phase.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I sit here day by day and there is never an interruption from me. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about interference with free speech, but they have organized, apparently; and if they have not organized they are just as successful as if they had.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will you sit down?

Who is to be the judge of whether there is or is not a dispute?... You take the position then that if the government asserts that there is a dispute the governor of the Bank of Canada must resign?

This was the reply:

I think that if there is a dispute of that kind the governor of the Bank of Canada should resign, of course.

Mr. Pearson: Read on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I am going to read on and I am coming back to this, too.

Do you think he should resign now, Mr. Pearson?

Watch this answer.

I say his usefulness is over as governor.

If his usefulness is over, why not pass the legislation?

Mr. Pearson: Read on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to read on because this is the only part that the hon. gentleman wants me to read. But I am going to come back to this. The Leader of the Opposition want on to say:

But Mr. Coyne apparently is determined to defend himself against certain charges which he believes reflect on his integrity and that's why, surely, Mr. Coyne should have his day in court, and by in court I don't mean issuing statements which he feels are necessary because he isn't permitted to appear before a committee and which he states in one of his statements that he has not been allowed to appear before the banking and commerce committee to discuss the Bank of Canada report for four years.

Then the question was—

Mr. Pearson: Don't let anybody hear that part.

Mr. Chevrier: Read a little faster.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall be returning to this portion.

Mr. Pearson: Read a little more slowly, please.

Mr. Harkness: Try to be quiet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before we are through with this we are going to have you all lined up with Mr. Coyne's thinking. That is the position you are putting yourselves in, and that is the position I want you to put yourselves in. Then somebody said:

He had his day in court before the Senate banking and commerce committee and had absolutely nothing to say. He evaded every direct question which was thrown at him on his views on what should be done for Canada right now.

The Leader of the Opposition said:

That was before this dispute broke out into the open. But I do want to repeat—

Hon. members opposite have been talking for days, and the hon. member for Essex East issued a threat of ten days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Weeks; weeks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman said:

But I do want to repeat that surely it is in the interests of all Canadians to get this matter settled, to get it settled quickly, and to get it settled decisively.

Mr. Pearson: And fairly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what we are asking. I am not going into the other equally interesting portions of this interview, but I must say that I listened to it with great interest and enjoyment and also with the realization of how helpful it was to us. I followed this very carefully. I do not think there is anything more at the moment, and I will come back to the "day in court" question.

Those are the references to the necessity of action. It should be done now. He said it should have been done three years ago when he spoke in February, I think it was. Now when we are giving parliament the right to do it, what does he say? "Oh," he says, "there is something else I want to bring up. Mr. Coyne says he has not had the opportunity to clear the slur on his reputation that he got a pension". I am going to come to the pension question after I have dealt with the policy matter. There is no question here. It is a simple bill. It does not say there is any cancellation of the extraordinarily ample increase in the pension over which he had a veto—

Mr. Pearson: Given by a Tory board of directors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I repeat, over which he had a veto. Does the bill of rights apply?

Over and over again we have heard that question. Legally there is no application of the bill of rights.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On June 26 the Leader of the Opposition spoke of this procedure as a denial of the bill of rights. I am not going to rehearse what was said. It simply revealed the utter hypocrisy of the stand that is taken now in relying on the bill of rights which they spurned even as late as a year ago. He proceeded to invite the Minister of Justice to inform the house whether he had examined this bill in the light of the bill of rights, and whether it, in the light of the refusal of the government to permit a hearing by a committee, is consistent with the letter or the spirit of the bill of rights.

This bill was examined. I propose to show that it is consistent both with the letter and the spirit of the bill of rights. The hon. gentleman was obviously referring to section 2 (e) to which reference has been made on previous occasions:

> (e) Deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principle of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

I underline "rights and obligations". This provision clearly applies in indicating what a person's rights are not to the change of any rights by parliament. We took that stand in connection with the judiciary when we provided for retirement at 75 years, and there were some who argued at the time that in doing so we were interfering with rights. There is no inviolable right to continue to the end of any term in any position that comes under parliament.

Mr. Habel: Even for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman accepted that a few months ago I think, in connection with the judiciary. New tax laws, new amendments to the Criminal Code, as well as other acts of parliament may and do from time to time operate to modify or affect rights of persons; but it is never said and it cannot be said that a person is not bound by such laws or such statutes unless he is given an opportunity to come before parliament.

This idea is based on the distinction between the functions of parliament and the functions of the courts. These functions are different. The legislative function is concerned with the making of laws, a function which can be performed only by parliament or by bodies to which parliament has delegated authority. The judicial authority is performed by the courts and other tribunals established in accordance with laws passed by parliament.

When Mr. Coyne was appointed governor it was for the purpose of providing an efficient operation within the ambit of the Bank of Canada Act. The duty and right of parliament is to act when any responsibilities undertaken are not carried out; and it is obvious that they have not been carried out. One just has to read those letters. If the governor had not written any letters he would have been better off. I remember, Mr. Speaker, as a young lawyer, at the conclusion of my term, I said to my senior: "Would you give me some advice?" He said, "Oh, well, this is quite a thing. I will tell you what I will do. I will give you the advice I received when I got through. This advice was, do right and fear no man. Don't write and fear no woman." I simply say, "Don't write unless you intend to have used against you what you have written"; for that moving finger that has written these letters has itself made necessary the enactment of this legislation.

The duty of the courts is to ascertain the facts of a case and apply the laws as they exist at the time for the determination of the rights and obligations of the individual. It is in the course of this judicial process—and it is to the judicial process that the bill of rights refers—that a person who claims his rights or his fundamental freedoms have been adversely affected is entitled to have what he had not had previously, namely a fair hearing in accordance with the principle of fundamental justice.

Any rights in the case of the governor exist by virtue of an act of parliament. The amendment to the Bank of Canada Act passed in 1953-54 provided that the appointment should be for a period of seven years during good behaviour. The answer to the behaviour is in the letters.

Mr. Pearson: You threw him out before the letters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Leader of the Opposition say those letters are proper?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister asked me a question. The answer to the question is that they threw him out before the letters were written.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is not out yet.

Mr. Pearson: You tried to throw him out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I confess that I made a misstatement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should have said that they tried to throw him out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if only the hon. gentleman could revise all the statements he made.

Mr. Pearson: You are still trying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can just imagine how he would like to be revising some of the statements he made in February, a year ago and otherwise. Any rights in the case of the governor of the Bank of Canada exist by virtue of an act of parliament. I mentioned that there is nothing in the bill of rights to suggest that there is any limitation on the power of parliament to change or repeal a law enacted by parliament. The tenure of office of the governor has been created by that act, and I underline and emphasize this fact.

There is another act that helps us in appreciating what the provision in the bill of rights means, namely the Interpretation Act. Section 18, subsection 1 of this act reads as follows:

> Every act shall be so construed as to reserve to parliament the power of repealing or amending it, and of revoking, restricting or modifying any power, privilege or advantage thereby vested in or granted to any person, whenever such repeal, amendment, revocation, restriction or modification is deemed by parliament to be required for the public good.

I ask this question. Was action ever more necessary for the public good? The Interpretation Act provides that such revocation can be undertaken whenever parliament deems it to be required for the public good. It has been made very clear. Members of parliament, newspapers and radio stations across this country and officials everywhere are inundated with explanations. The volume increases daily. One wonders when the end will be.

I think the general summary is this. If there is any right, which there is not, I would refer the matter to the committee. But what would hon. members opposite do if it was referred to the committee? What would the committee do? Again I call on the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, because he always gives the answers. At page 7085 of Hansard the hon. member asked himself a question and he got this intelligent answer:

> Why do they not want this inquiry? The fact of the matter is that there is nothing substantial to inquire into.

Those are the words of the hon. member himself.

Mr. Pearson: Wait till a little later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have had a tissue of fantasy conjured up by the opposition. The hon. member for Essex East demands a committee hearing for only one reason; he is opposed to the pension. That is clear. I do not know whether that is the only reason. Other Liberal members say there is nothing wrong with the pension. What would a committee hearing achieve, in view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition says that Mr. Coyne has outlived his usefulness?

Mr. Deschatelets: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask this question. Would it result in his reinstatement?

An hon. Member: You do not want the answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members opposite held the view months ago that his usefulness had passed its zenith. I ask whether a committee hearing would bring about his reinstatement. We have had all the evidence that the mind of my hon. friend has been able to bring forth.

An hon. Member: We want the truth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend over there has gone through all the documents, apparently; documents that had been laid away, never to be used, but they have been dug up. Has he missed anything?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister should talk about digging up anything.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister talks about digging up documents.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to answer that at the moment.

Mr. Pearson: I wouldn't.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the hon. member was surprised when I dug up something about Mr. Pitt and himself. It is inconceivable that a hearing be held under such circumstances in an effort to advise the government and parliament that its responsibility and supremacy in this connection shall not be discharged.

Then we heard that massive exaggeration when hon. members opposite referred to this bill as a bill of attainder. I was quite interested in the matter of a bill of attainder. A bill of attainder provided, of course, for the death of the individual and the loss of his civil rights. There was no pension involved in those days under bills of attainder.

Let me make one other reference to what Mr. Coyne has said. He says he has been slurred, that his honour has been impugned and there has been a slander upon his integrity arising out of the fact that his pension was increased. True enough, and I admit this; the pension was approved by a board of 12 directors, four of whom were appointed by the previous government and eight by this government. We have here a pension of $11,900 a year which was increased to $25,000 a year. Why was that done? It was done in order to increase his independence.

There is nothing whatsoever in the bill about the pension. The governor had the right of veto in that matter. Is it impugning a man's integrity to say that he sat, knew, listened and took? Where is the impugning of integrity there? This matter is of interest on this whole question. The number of letters I am receiving on this question indicates that the people are beginning to think that these vast, swollen pensions deserve to be looked into.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a man who gave devoted service to his country for the greater part of nine years as prime minister and who is today practising law, receives a pension of less than $3,000 a year. That is because he was a member of this house. Here we are considering a pension of $11,900 a year which was increased to $25,000 a year within the last two years of the term the governor was going to serve.

Mr. Pearson: It was increased by action of a Tory board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And at 51 years of age. The less I say about that, the better.

Mr. Pearson: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply say this is put forward as the slur upon his character. I wonder whether the slur is the fact that in one of his speeches, the one delivered in Calgary on October 5, 1960 he said, "We should be living within our means by expanding our means to live better". Is that the meaning of that?

I have simply pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that the slur can only have been that, because there has been nothing else except the suggestion of disagreement. How many people in public life receive a pension of that size? I have been in public life longer than Mr. Coyne. When I retire, no matter how many years from now it may be, I will be in the same position as Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, that is the reason.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Now we know.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true. I am glad the hon. member mentioned that, because he has given years of devoted service and I am prepared to admit it. I ask him not to answer this question. Does the hon. member think $25,000 a year is a fair pension?

Mr. Habel: It was up to the board to decide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member says it was up to the board.

Mr. Habel: A Tory board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He had the power of veto.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): He would not accept the board's decision when they told him to resign.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He did not ask for it, hon. members opposite say. It is better to receive than to ask. He had the power of veto.

Mr. Habel: The Prime Minister should know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are now behind this pension. They have been against it all along.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister asked me a question and then proceeded to answer it. He asked me whether I thought this pension was excessive. In the first place, I am not worring about my own pension, as is the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know.

Mr. Pearson: I say, Mr. Speaker, that this pension was excessive and the Tory board of directors should never have allowed it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to answer that question, Mr. Speaker, because the Liberal members of the board approved it also. I am pointing out that this man had the right of veto. What did he do? Until 1956 there was provision that all these matters had to be approved by the governor in council. It was on the occasion of the last amendment that some alteration was made to that provision. However, the provision still remained that it was to be published in the Canada Gazette. They hid if from the government, and when I say "they"—

Mr. Pearson: What a cheap insinuation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I refer to Mr. Coyne. He did not mention it at any time, nor did anyone on his behalf mention it.

An hon. Member: Incredible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He not only maintained silence, but he did not publish the order in the Gazette until when? Until the information came out; and then he rushed to the Gazette about two weeks ago and made sure that he would get it, and that there would be no slip up in that connection.

An hon. Member: Slurs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are you talking about? Slurs? I really thought he would have disavowed this action and would say "I don't want that". But instead of that, two weeks ago or three weeks ago—I can give the exact date if required—he proceeded to have it put in the Gazette to be sure it was legal after it had been revealed that he was in receipt of it. Then they talk to me about slurs.

Now I come to the last part of my observations. I intend to be brief, because I wish to conclude before one o'clock. Mention has been made of a document which was attached to one of the governor's letters, a document dated February 15, 1961. These are his proposals, and I shall have to read them in order that we may understand whether there is disagreement between the policies of this government and Mr. Coyne. As I said earlier, the opposition is increasingly placing itself in the position that it is behind these proposals. They are trying to evade it; they are talking about one subject and another, but that is their position. They, by taking a stand on this purely legal matter, this purely parliamentary matter, are placing themselves in such a position that I should point out what some of these economic recommendations were.

He is going to raise tariff walls a 10 per cent surtax on all imports. He is going to disavow international trade agreements; he is going to continue tight money whatever the consequence. I ask the opposition, do they want a governor who is going to insist on the prerogative right to impose these things from his position? Are they going to ask the government to have a governor who says that these are the proper courses to follow? Well, I might even quote from Maclean's magazine with regard to one of the lesser deities, Mr. Lamontagne. I did not mean lesser; I mean one of the greater. He said this:

> The direction Mr. Coyne would like the Canadian economy to take would lead our country to a dead end.

They sit over there and take their advice from him, the advice they got from this dirigisme conference at Queen's. I ask them who is right, Coyne or Lamontagne? I ask the hon. member for Essex East when he replies, because he is getting ready—he is going to speak for ten days—whether he believes in a restriction on the free import of automobile parts up to 40 per cent of their value. That is what Mr. Coyne believes in.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Prime Minister asking me a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does he believe in the restriction of the free entry of tourist purchases and the imposition of a Canadian sales tax and the imposition of customs duties on tourist purchases? I only hope we hear from the hon. member about these things, because Essex will be interested. Do members opposite believe there should be a restriction on Canadian travel in the United States, and a restriction on automobile mileage by a federal sales tax on gasoline and diesel fuel in order to finance a highway policy? Do they believe there should be toll charges on certain highways and bridges? These are some of the things about which Mr. Coyne says "This is the course to follow; behold, the road". This is the road he pointed out to the government.

Furthermore, do they believe in restricting the consumption of various luxury items by newer and higher taxes? Do they want an increase in the income tax and the corporation tax? That is what he suggests. Do they want the restriction of the "present indiscriminate three years' exemption of new mine operations from income tax", or a restriction of the present standard depreciation schedules?

These are the courses he would have us take. This government will not take many of his recommended courses, I can assure hon. members of that; and as long as we take that stand, this government intends to govern and not to have its direction determined by one who follows a course which we cannot and shall not accept.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In the half minute which remains I simply want to say this. The Prime Minister is, of course, a great talker. He can almost make you forget what you are supposed to be talking about or, if you are a visitor, what you came to see him about.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister began this morning by quoting the oath taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada. I wish to begin what I have to say this afternoon by quoting the oath of members of the privy council which is as follows:

Governor of Bank of Canada

You ... do solemnly promise and swear that you will serve Her Majesty truly and faithfully in the place of her council in this Her Majesty's Dominion of Canada, you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in privy council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by word, writing, or any otherwise to any person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council, and yet if any matter so propounded, treated and debated in any such privy council, shall touch any particular person, sworn of the same council upon any such matter as shall in any wise concern his loyalty and fidelity to the Queen's Majesty, you will in no wise open the same to him, but keep it secret, as you would from any person, until the Queen's Majesty's pleasure be known in that behalf.

The oath then continues, Mr. Speaker, but I do not intend to quote the remaining part of it. I will content myself at this stage with the recital I have given.

I do not rise to defend any disclosure made by the governor of the Bank of Canada, which may after proper determination be regarded as a violation of an oath taken by senior government officials. What I do say is that if the governor of the Bank of Canada was looking for a precedent for what he did, he has that precedent in the disclosure made in this house by the Prime Minister of Canada in January of 1958 when he unfolded a secret document which had been prepared for the use of members of the government. I refer to his tabling of the secret "Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957". Let there be no question as to whether that was a secret document.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Here is the document that was tabled by the Prime Minister which as a privy councillor I have in my possession. I hold a copy in my hand. On the blue cover for everyone to see is marked the word "secret".

The Prime Minister this morning in his speech, which was full of diversion, which did not address itself to the point at issue, said that we had agreed that this legislation was no longer necessary because of the position we have taken in our statements that the usefulness of the governor had been impaired, and that his usefulness had been destroyed.

I say this to the Prime Minister. If the government had acted when it should have acted, when it first had a disagreement with the governor of the Bank of Canada, along the lines mentioned by the Prime Minister this morning it would not have been necessary to bring this legislation forward at this time. Moreover, this whole regrettable incident—an incident which touches the very essential character of our finance structure—should have been avoided, and there would not have existed this increasing measure of disquietude over financial policy, or over the relationship of the central bank to the government of this country. All that could have been avoided if the government had taken, what the Prime Minister at long last acknowledged this morning, the proper course in the event of a dispute between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government, not only in the field of monetary policy but in matters that touch fiscal, debt management and financial policy as well.

I say now that in view of the disclosures made yesterday by the governor of the Bank of Canada—and I am not now seeking to defend the method by which those disclosures were made—one would have expected the Prime Minister of this country, not to have to be asked to agree to the setting up of a committee for the purpose of examining this matter, but to have joined with the rest of us, in giving this house the lead, in demanding that an examination be made in a committee of this house of the disclosures, and particularly those mentioned by Mr. Coyne yesterday. No, Mr. Speaker, there was not any mention at all of the substance of the governor's statement of yesterday and of the three letters which accompanied that statement and which were made available to the public.

The Prime Minister has asked why all this fuss by the opposition at this time when the usefulness of the governor has ceased. He suggested that was what members of the Liberal opposition had affirmed. I say to the Prime Minister that the governor's usefulness now may have ceased, but we contend that his rights as an individual in Canada have not ceased.

We are not arguing, as the Prime Minister sought to suggest in the introduction of a red herring, that the supremacy of parliament is involved. No one questions the right of parliament, under section 91 of the British North America Act, to exercise whatever power, whatever act, whatever judgment, whatever disposition it wishes to make. Of course parliament is supreme, supreme over every emanation of the crown, supreme over the governor of the Bank of Canada. Parliament's word is final. There is no dispute about that.

The issue is a simple one. It is simply whether or not in a matter so complicated as this, where statements made by the Prime Minister are so diametrically opposed to those of the governor of the Bank of Canada, we are going to have a proper determination of that issue, not by the vote of a strong majority, but by the vote of a committee which conscientiously and objectively wishes to examine all of the facts.

We have based our contention upon the inalienable right that has been recognized in this country and in all countries of the commonwealth, as well as in most countries of the western world, now for many centuries, and which has now been confirmed in the bill of rights introduced by the Prime Minister on July 1, 1960. The Prime Minister says that the bill of rights does not apply to non judicial processes. I have before me a copy of the bill of rights which bears the signature of the Prime Minister and a quotation from one of his speeches. This is the printed copy which is distributed throughout the country for the price of $1. This statement will be found in the copy of the bill of rights. It says nothing about judicial process; it says nothing about being confined to matters involving criminal law. It says:

> No law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to (e) deprive a person—

And the governor of the Bank of Canada is a person.

Are we to say that the bill of rights, this document which I hold in my hand, is something which applies only to those, as I said the other day, who are charged with a violation of the criminal law? If that is so, what we are saying then is that the bill of rights applies only to those who are charged with crimes, but it does not apply to those who are in the eyes of society guilty of something less than a crime; it does not apply to one who has served his country, as has the governor of the bank. Perhaps we will not all agree with his policies. We do not, but nevertheless he stands as a citizen honourable and fearless in the position that he takes. Are we to take the position that the bill of rights applies to a criminal and not to one of our top officials, namely the governor of the Bank of Canada? Are we to say that in this country, this free country, with our bill of rights? Are we to say with regard to the governor of the Bank of Canada that we cannot accord him the kind of treatment that is applied to other individuals in other countries? In Israel today, Mr. Speaker, a man is being tried for having done away with 6 million human beings. He is being accorded and afforded the right of a trial that is being denied in this instance by the government of Canada.

Apart altogether from matters that involve the position taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada there are others about which I am going to say something today and which I believe require further elucidation. I believe that the only way that elucidation can be provided is by the processes employed in a committee where the instrument of examination is afforded in a manner, not normal to our practices in this chamber, to find out, for instance, what are the circumstances surrounding this pension which, as the Leader of the Opposition said this morning, is excessive, to find out the circumstances that caused the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, a majority of whom were members of the Conservative party and appointed by the government to provide that pension.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the end of my speech. We are entitled to ascertain why a close friend of the Minister of Finance, a man of character and integrity, took the initiative in providing this pension. Should this house be denied the opportunity of knowing what are the circumstances attending the initiative which he took in this matter? That and many other questions are involved in our request that through the instrumentality of a committee of this house an opportunity should have been provided to examine witnesses—something that is open to members of the other place. The Minister of Finance is a member of the House of Commons. He is a member of the banking and commerce committee. In any event, as the Minister of Finance, he would have the right to come before that committee and be accorded the fullest rights. This house composed of ladies and gentlemen elected by the people is the place to provide that committee. It is a right that should have been accorded, a duty that should have been recognized at once by the government of the day. That is the issue, not all these side issues that the Prime Minister has introduced. The main issue in this whole affair is that the government of this country, for some inexplicable reason, has refused to give us an opportunity to go before the banking and commerce committee so that we could have the fullest possible disclosure of all of the facts involved in this matter.

Yesterday the governor of the Bank of Canada issued another statement. I do not comment on the wisdom of that act except to say that we have the document before us and with it copies of three letters sent out, two by the governor to the Minister of Finance and one by the Minister of Finance to the governor—

An hon. Member: Confidential letters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —marked "private and confidential", just like the secret report to which I made reference a moment ago. We have had no comment by the Prime Minister on the substance of this statement or of these letters. I now wish to examine them.

During the course of the debate, particularly on July 4 and July 5, the Minister of Finance led us to believe that there had been only one meeting with the governor on the question of liquidity reserve assets of the chartered banks, which is the major cause of this whole dispute and without which, unless there is a full understanding, there cannot be a full appreciation of the problem involved in the dispute between the governor of the Bank of Canada, on the one hand, and the Minister of Finance, on the other. He said that the governor was flatly categorical and rejected his request to him with respect to the bank liquidity reserve requirements. The minister said that after that he referred to the act and to his surprise found that the government had no authority in the field of monetary policy. These words of the Minister of Finance will be found, first of all, at page 7523 of Hansard, where he said:

I had my talk with the governor in this respect, and I have told the house about the discussion which we had.

The minister's remarks continued in this vein at page 7524 of Hansard. Then, as found at page 7525, he said:

They were always prepared to explain it and to defend it. But, Mr. Chairman, the stage had been set at the very beginning at this meeting of 1957-58.

Not "in these meetings" but "in this meeting". The contention of the Minister of Finance, as I have revealed and will continue to show, was that there was one meeting between himself and the governor with regard to this matter of the liquidity assets ratio of the chartered banks. Then, at page 7554 of Hansard for Wednesday, July 5, the Leader of the Opposition said in the course of his speech:

Now the minister has told us there was one time—and he does not give us details of the time, place or circumstances—away back in the winter of 1957-58 when the governor angrily and firmly refused such a request.

The Leader of the Opposition said:

—he does not give us details of the time, place—

Not "times" and "places" but the time and the place. Then the Minister of Finance followed and said:

I shall not attempt to fix the date precisely.

He did not say "dates"; he said "date". Then he continued:

It would be November or December of 1957, and the occasion—

Not "occasions".

—was one on which I conveyed to the governor a request of the government for a reduction in the liquidity reserve requirements with reference to the chartered banks—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

On the words of the Minister of Finance alone we have the suggestion that there was one meeting—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —when in fact we know that there were more meetings and the Minister of Finance now confirms it by saying "no".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One where this incident occurred.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask my hon. friend to deny that there was a meeting on October 30, 1957, to deny that there was a meeting on November 12 of the same year, to deny that there was a meeting on November 14 at which not only was the governor present but also Mr. Beattie and the deputy minister of the Department of Finance, Mr. Taylor, and another meeting which took place on November 18 when there were present Messrs. Beattie, McKibbin, the Minister of Finance and the deputy minister of finance.

So that we have on this one point a contradiction between what the Minister of Finance said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no contradiction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to us in this house and what are the real facts as revealed by this further disclosure through the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada and now confirmed by the uttered acknowledgement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no contradiction there at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend says that there is no contradiction. Before I have completed what I have to say my hon. friend will find that there are other contradictions in which he has misled this house. Then the minister said, as found at page 7555 of Hansard:

No communication in writing passed between the governor and myself in relation to this incident.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This incident.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I continue:

Any communication of such a nature would, of course, have been confidential.

No communication passed between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada regarding this question of liquidity asset reserves of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no. Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When I have finished my hon. friend can reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a passage and now he completely changes it when he goes on. The words were:

> No communication in writing passed between the governor and myself in relation to this incident.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: Why don't you do it straight for a change?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there are statements which in the opinion of other hon. members require explanation, unless the member who has the floor yields it they should be deferred until the end of the speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let there be no question that the incident is the incident of the meeting which the minister acknowledged took place in November, 1957, and which I say also took place on three other occasions—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are just twisting things.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —having to do with the question of the liquidity reserve position of the chartered banks. That is the incident to which we are referring, and there were communications—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are just twisting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance said and now seeks to say when he is caught in this particular predicament. First of all there is the letter of the governor dated November 19, 1957. There is the letter from the governor dated December 5, 1957. There is also the letter of November 21 of the Minister of Finance himself dealing with this incident, the issue involving the question to which I referred a moment ago, the liquid asset ratio of the chartered banks of Canada.

An hon. Member: Signed by?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is signed by the minister, "Donald M. Fleming". In his letter of November 21 the minister acknowledges the letter of the 19th and goes on to point out the following to the governor of the Bank of Canada. First of all I quote from the minister's letter part of a paragraph used by the minister based on the letter written to him by the governor of the Bank of Canada and which sets out what the true position of this matter was. The particular sentence from the governor's letter reads as follows:

> If the banks were to suggest dissolving their agreement or changing it in a way that did not appear sound to the Bank of Canada then I would feel it to be our duty to urge the chartered banks to continue to adhere to what the Bank of Canada regarded as sound practice.

The important word there is "urge". The Bank of Canada took the position that the question of the liquidity position of the banks was a matter arranged for by the banks themselves and with regard to which the president of the Royal bank, Mr. Muir, said that he would regard it as being an arrangement from which he could voluntarily withdraw if the circumstances justified. It was not a policy arrived at by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, it was.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is true that the Bank of Canada in 1955 had suggested to the banks the desirability of this course but it was an act involving the banks themselves, and this was acknowledged by the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend says it was not. Let us see whether it was not. On April 28, 1959, here is what the Minister of Finance said in this house as found at page 3111 of Hansard when he spoke against reducing the 15 per cent minimum liquidity ratio. Here are the words of the Minister of Finance:

> That is the statutory obligation of the banks, to maintain a cash reserve of 8 per cent measured in terms of deposit liabilities. In addition to that figure the banks of this country have for the past three years maintained an additional reserve of 7 per cent which has been held in the form of treasury bills and day to day loans... If the 7 per cent reserve that the banks hold in terms of treasury bills and day to day loans were reduced it would result in a liquidation of treasury bills and more pressure on the treasury bill rate in this country. But hon. members opposite did not have the frankness to face up to that fact yesterday or even to acknowledge it.

Yet the Minister of Finance said that this was a matter determined as the result of a statutory imposition by the Bank of Canada on the chartered banks when—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was an imposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —his own statement is proof of the fact that this was an arrangement to which the banks voluntarily committed themselves. Here is the letter of the Minister of Finance and yet he said there was no communication that passed between him and the governor in this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In relation to this incident.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yet there are the two letters of December 15 and November 19.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said, in relation to this incident.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the only situation with regard to this question as to whose responsibility it was. My hon. friend will recall that at page 7556 of Hansard of July 5 he had this to say:

> I have to say that this is a matter of the clearest kind of dispute between Mr. Coyne's version of what happened and the version of the chartered banks, because I had occasion in those days to confer with a number of the chartered banks on this question, and the answers I invariably received from them were that this was imposed upon them by Mr. Coyne and they did not agree to it. They firmly disagreed with the statement which appeared in the report of the governor of the bank which the Leader of the Opposition has read.

Notwithstanding that, I challenge the Minister of Finance to deny what the governor of the Bank of Canada said yesterday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do deny it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not even made the statement, so how can the minister deny it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I know what he said in this respect yesterday, and I deny it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The suggestion to reduce the liquid asset reserve was supported by the president of the Dominion bank, Mr. Ashforth. Mr. James Muir of the Royal bank did not think the suggestion of the minister of lowering the figure from 15 per cent to 13 per cent was desirable. He did not think it was necessary. We know that at that time it was not 15 per cent. It had gone over 15 per cent. It was as high as 17 per cent on some occasions.

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We know that Mr. Gordon Ball, president of the bank of Montreal had taken issue with the desirability of reducing the liquidity position of the reserves of the chartered banks in this particular. We know that Mr. McKinnon, president of the Canadian bank of Commerce had taken a similar position. And so the Minister of Finance who says that the bankers supported him in the position he has taken, is of course, denied by the disclosures made yesterday showing that the bankers, outside of Mr. Ashforth, did not believe it was a desirable thing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I disagree.

Mr. Pearson: No wonder the minister did not want a committee of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the Leader of the Opposition said, no wonder the Minister of Finance did not want a committee of this house. It was not only the bankers. We know from this document given out yesterday by the governor of the bank that the deputy minister of finance did not agree with and support the position taken by the Minister of Finance. He did not think it was desirable. He did not believe that this was the responsibility in the primary instance of the bank. He thought that the position the bankers themselves concurred in at the suggestion of the bank in 1955 was a good one to maintain. So we have this further contradiction of the statements made in this house by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They are state ments that show a difference on vital points. After these disclosures there can be no justification for the government taking the position that this whole matter has been properly gone into when we have these contradictions, as well as contradictions to the facts as stated by the Minister of Finance, showing conclusively that what the Minister of Finance told us on July 4 and July 5 was not in accordance with the facts. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the only question where there is a contradiction. This is not the only matter involving the credibility of what the governor of the bank said and the credibility of what the Minister of Finance has said in this house. This is the issue, and it is one which involves the determination as to which of these two gentlemen is telling us what really were the facts in all these matters.

In our suggestion that there should be an examination of this matter by a committee, and when we urged that the governor of the bank be called before a committee, it was suggested at one time in our argument that perhaps the governor on some occasion had asked for the opportunity to go before a banking and commerce committee in order to outline his views about the desirability of lowering this 15 per cent figure down to 13 per cent. The minister took the position that it was psychologically embarrassing to him at a time when there was a complaint about tight money for the banks to have this figure of their reserves at 15 per cent. The governor said, "Well, I should like to help you. I do not believe that this is a contributing factor to tight money. I should like to go and help you before a proper committee of the House of Commons." That is what the governor of the bank said. Yet the Minister of Finance told us that at no time was any offer made by the governor of the Bank of Canada to go before a committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would ask the hon. member to quote the actual words I used.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have before me here the minister's letter—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Quote from Hansard the words I used.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have before me—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will you quote from Hansard the words I used.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend can quote them. I am giving the statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are misconstruing them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Give me the page and I will quote them for you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You should have the page reference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All right. I made the statement. I said that the minister did say in this house that there was never any offer made by the governor of the Bank of Canada to go before a committee of this house. Let us see who was telling the truth in this situation. This is a copy of a letter sent by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance on December 5, 1957, and I read from the second last paragraph of that letter:

> If you feel it would be helpful I would, as I told you earlier, be glad to appear before the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons to explain the facts of the situation or to discuss any matters on which you felt parliament should be informed.

Mr. Speaker, the only way in which the Minister of Finance can controvert the substance of what I have said regarding this letter is to say that he never received such a letter from the governor of the Bank of Canada dated December 5, 1957; and I invite him now to deny that he received it. If he did receive that letter, then the information that he gave this house when we were about to take a vote was not in harmony with the facts. It was not a statement made in accord with the truth. That is the fact and no amount of forensic talent will be able to disturb that fact.

So we have this situation. The governor of the Bank of Canada has successfully indicated that there was not only one meeting but that there were four meetings at which the deputy minister and others were present. He has further contradicted the Minister of Finance who said that there was no communication between himself and the governor of the bank. He has successfully established, from the action of the presidents of the banks themselves and from section 71 of the Bank Act, that the decision with regard to the percentage of liquidity asset reserves of the chartered banks was a decision which arose not out of any power residing in the governor under the Bank of Canada Act but as a result of a decision voluntarily entered into by the chartered banks themselves, first in 1955, and then continued on into subsequent years.

Then we have the further contradiction of the statement of the Minister of Finance by the governor who pointed out that the governor had offered to go before a committee of this house.

Are we not now faced with an unfinished situation, Mr. Speaker: The matter was not concluded with the final observations of the speech of the Minister of Finance the other day because since that time, as I say, we have further material before us, and it is material that takes serious issue in points of substance involving the credibility of two Canadian citizens, one the governor of the bank and the other the Minister of Finance. Are we now to take the position that this matter is over? Are we to take the position that this house is going to resolve this matter finally and send it to another place without having taken into account the circumstances involved in the further disclosures that have been made by the governor of the Bank of Canada?

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the information given the committee of the whole by the minister on July 4 and 5, information which has clearly been shown to be inaccurate, misleading and untrue, there is no course open now to the Minister of Finance under our system of government, if we want to live up to the traditions of the parliament in the United Kingdom, other than to turn in his seals of office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the minister does not take that position, that will be up to him; that will be up to the government as a whole; that will be up to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister, in the face of this situation, now fail to not only join in the request but actually take a lead in seeing to it that this house, through the proper committee, is given an opportunity of hearing the governor, of hearing the deputy minister of finance, of hearing the Minister of Finance and of hearing the board of directors of the Bank of Canada? Then at long last we can settle once and for all the questions involved in this complicated and regrettable incident created as a result of the reluctance and the failure of this government at the proper time to exercise the privilege which a government should exercise, instead of abdicating its responsibility and not letting the governor of the Bank of Canada know three years ago that it was master in this house and in this country.

That is what the government should have done. It is because the government has not taken this course that we have this whole incident before us. So the two courses that are now open are clear. There is the one I have suggested with regard to the Minister of Finance himself and there is the other involving the right of this parliament, through the proper procedures and instrument, to arrive at the facts involved in this matter. To take any other course will be to leave this house, a year after the bill of rights was passed, saying that we were proud on July 1, 1960 to pass this measure confirming, as it does, the basic freedoms and human rights accorded to all Canadians. While we were proud to place this measure on our statute books, we regret that the government of the country, a government with a great majority behind it, was not prepared to take a step consistent with the implications of that bill of rights and afford the fullest hearing in this matter, thereby giving one individual the right —and giving the Minister of Finance the right —of having his side of the case properly exposed for final judgment before we pass this measure in final form on third reading.

Is that not the situation, Mr. Speaker? Hon. gentlemen opposite may not accept that course. If they do not, whatever red herrings they introduce they may be sure of one thing. This is now being echoed all across this country. While they feel that the governor's usefulness has ended; while they feel that perhaps some of his actions were unwise; while they do not fully agree with all his policies, the Canadian people, dedicated to freedom as they are, will hold this government accountable for having denied him the inalienable right of being heard by those who pass judgment on him.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have no right to speak in this debate on third reading, having moved the motion for third reading. Under previous rulings of the Chair there is no right of reply accorded to the mover of the motion for third reading. But I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is concerned about that, my disposition would be this. As he did not speak in moving the motion, and as I have permitted earlier in this session. I would allow him to speak, but of course not to close the debate. The same course was followed in a previous debate this session. If there is any contest about that of course the matter can be discussed, but the principle of the deferred speech of a mover has been recognized from time to time.

Mr. Pearson: On this point, Mr. Speaker, you may recall that last session, I think it was, I was in a position technically the same as the Minister of Finance, having moved a motion. You said, and quite rightly, because the matter was brought to your attention by hon. gentlemen opposite, that I had no right to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Then I will hear the minister on his question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I may say on that point, Mr. Speaker, that I do not want my remarks to be interpreted as suggesting that the minister should not be given the right to speak.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Shut up.

Mr. Pearson: If the ruling which applied in my case is the correct one, the minister will not have the right to speak, but all the house leader has to do is move the previous question, and the minister can then speak to his heart's content.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Essex East has made some very strong statements. He has said that I misled the house in certain statements I made in recent days during discussions on this particular subject. He has attributed to me statements which have been read out of context and twisted in their presentation. Therefore I shall deal with these several matters.

I think it is not unworthy of note, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has drawn his whole speech today from an editorial appearing today, as I am told, on the front page of the Toronto daily Star.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I never even saw it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I should like to see it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then there is some amazing telepathy going on here. There are other ways of learning about the contents of a newspaper than reading it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has asked to speak on a question of privilege. We have asked to speak on a question of privilege. Your Honour has always been very precise in asking us to state specifically what the question of privilege was and making us stick strictly to the question of privilege. I suggest that the same rule should apply to both sides of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: From what has been said I think the situation is rather that of an hon. member rising to make a personal explanation and to challenge what has been said about the veracity of his statements. During the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East I did indicate that there would be an opportunity at the end of the speech for the minister if he would refrain until that time, to make his explanation. But it should be relevant to the remarks made and should certainly not be a speech in the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there were, as I gather, about three elements in my previous statements in this debate upon which the hon. member for Essex East has based charges that I misled the house. I shall be glad to deal with those.

In the first he says, in effect, that I said there was one occasion of my discussing with Mr. Coyne in late 1957 the question of the tight money policy. He now says there were, according to Mr. Coyne, four such meetings and there was correspondence. Here is a fine example of the way in which the hon. member for Essex East has twisted and contorted what I said. My statement is at page 7040 of Hansard of June 26, where I am reported to have said:

> In the winter of 1957-58 I conveyed to him a request for an easing of the requirements respecting the liquidity reserves of chartered banks. That request, which was designed by the government to ease tight money, was rejected by the governor firmly and angrily.

The hon. member has undertaken now to say there were other occasions. Mr. Speaker, there was no occasion other than the one I referred to here where I conveyed to the governor the request of the government for a reduction in the liquidity reserve requirements of the chartered banks and where he at that meeting firmly, flatly and angrily rejected it. That is what we are talking about when we refer to this incident, and it is about that incident that I was asked this question by the hon. member for Essex East, or someone else. It was following the observation of the Leader of the Opposition as reported at page 7555 of Hansard of July 5, and here I should like to read, so that the house may understand, exactly what the Leader of the Opposition was saying:

> Mr. Pearson: Well, until this incident—

Please note the words, "this incident".

> —the minister had thought he had some authority in this field. It was not very long before this meeting that he was very clear and certain about the authority of the government in this sphere. When this meeting took place he was of the opinion that he might have some authority, but then he discovered he had no authority or responsibility in the field of monetary policy, at least until last evening.
> May I ask the minister whether this clash—and we certainly have the right to call it a clash in view of the terms of the minister has used, because this was a request which was firmly and angrily rejected by the governor—took place before or after November 13, 1957? Hon. members may recall that on November 13, 1957 the minister, replying to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano as reported at page 1063 of Hansard said he was not aware of anything that could be called a clash between the government and the bank.
> I should like also to ask the minister, while we are on this basic incident, whether a record of any kind was made of this meeting, the conclusions of which were so important in the minds of the government that three and a half years later, based largely on those conclusions, they decided to introduce an act of parliament to discharge the governor of the Bank of Canada without giving him the right to be heard. This obviously was an important meeting. This is the incident upon which the government builds up its accusation. It was years ago, but it is on this basis that the government decided that the governor had to go. As I say, this was obviously a very important meeting because of the important and responsible people who attended it, and I ask if any record was made of this meeting, which the minister thinks may have taken place in December, 1957; whether there is anything which he could disclose from such a record.
> I should also like the minister to deal with the other question I have asked him. I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us whether any further requests of this nature were made of the governor or of any servant of the bank, or of any of the banks; and if so, what was the result of any such request which was made subsequent to this meeting which took place some time in the autumn, presumably in December of 1957.

On that, I made this comment which appears in the second column of page 7555:

> I am not sure that I followed all the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition, but if I overlook anything perhaps he will draw it to my attention. No communication in writing passed between the governor and myself in relation to this incident. Any communication of such a nature would, of course, have been confidential. I have drawn attention to this matter because it established very clearly the fact that the governor held a different view from the one I had entertained and had expressed while in opposition as to the relationship of the government to monetary policy.

There was no correspondence between us with regard to that incident. The governor has now released copies of correspondence—confidential correspondence—throwing aside the restraints which hon. gentlemen observe with regard to confidential communications. He has released letters. The hon. member for Essex East now says: oh, look at these letters. These letters related to the subject of easing the liquidity and reserve requirements. But, Mr. Speaker, the incident is what I refer to here. It was the incident that the Leader of the Opposition was speaking about in the observations which preceded my reply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was an incident—an incident which occurred in my office in the presence of the deputy minister of finance, in the presence of the governor and other representatives of the Bank of Canada. That was where I put that proposition to him, and where he angrily rejected it. That occurred at a particular meeting and there was no correspondence about that incident. The Leader of the Opposition asked me to produce records to determine the particular date. I did not keep records of the kind the governor was evidently keeping, records in which he has apparently sent down his version of communications which passed at a meeting of the most confidential nature and which he has now chosen to disclose according to his version of those communications. But when the member for Essex East undertakes to tell this house that I misled the house in making the statement I did, as recorded at page 7555 of Hansard, that no communication in writing passed between the governor and myself in relation to this incident, I say he is wrenching my remarks and that the misleading is not on my part, but on his.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I was going to deal with two other charges of the same nature made by the hon. member for Essex East.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has had a lengthy time in which to answer the accusations that he misled the house. He has dealt with the incident. If there is another episode of the same kind I trust that the hon. member can make his explanation briefly, because it would, in effect, be participation in the debate were he to continue at length.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall endeavour to be brief, although these are grave things which the hon. member for Essex East has said this afternoon. I shall be very brief, then.

The second question is this. Taking statements of Mr. Coyne—and he takes them as truth—the hon. member sets them against what I have said in regard to the views that had been conveyed to me, as I stated to the house on July 5, in relation to the attitude of the chartered banks concerning this matter of liquidity reserves. There was this difference of statement on Wednesday, July 5 when I was asked this question by the Leader of the Opposition and others. Mr. Coyne has said that the banks accepted this 15 per cent liquidity reserve requirement by voluntary action. I said, based upon the information conveyed to me by the heads of chartered banks, that it was imposed upon them by Mr. Coyne. I stand by the statement that I have made and I do not care if Mr. Coyne chooses to disagree with it.

An hon. Member: You don't care.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has denied the statement as he is entitled to do, but I think it would be out of order to debate the matter. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Pitman: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I still have one of these charges to deny, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly would not refuse the hon. member the opportunity to make a personal explanation when he has been accused of misleading the house, and if there is a further incident of alleged misleading I will certainly hear it.

Mr. Pearson: I think the minister should of course be given an opportunity to reply as a matter of personal privilege to any accusation which has been made which he considers not to be accurate, but when the minister replies in the terms in which he has spoken, and when he quotes in the course of his explanation at length from things I said as reported at page 7555 of Hansard in support of his case, I have the right to point out that if he had turned to page 7554 he would have had to quote himself in contradiction to what he said on the next page.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member would state the other item before he proceeds with it perhaps I could come to a conclusion, but it does seem to me now that we are verging on a debate rather than personal explanation, although the line is not an easy one to make clear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The other charge which was made by the hon. member for Essex East was that I had misled the house, as he said, in relation to the fact that Mr. Coyne, as he says now, contrary to what I said to the house, never made any offer to me to come before a committee of the house. That is a statement he has attributed to me.

If you will refer to page 7047 of Hansard of June 26, 1961, you will see I was there dealing with the statement made by Mr. Coyne earlier, which reads as follows:

> He has also for four years refused to allow the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons to study my annual report or to examine my views as to whatever extent might be desired by members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, at that time I said the statement was not true; as will be seen on the same page as follows:

> When the governor of the Bank of Canada makes this assertion that for four years I refused to allow the banking and commerce committee to study the annual report, what he is saying is not true.

I said further, as appears in the second column of that page, after reviewing the record of Hansard in that regard, as to my standing in the way of calling a meeting of that standing committee on banking and commerce, the following:

> To what I have already said in reference to debates in this house, let me add this further comment on what the governor has said. Never once in all these years did the governor say anything to me about wishing to appear before the banking and commerce committee or wishing his annual report to be referred to the banking and commerce committee or to any other committee. This statement of June 19 is evidently calculated to give the impression that he was telling me he wanted to appear before the banking and commerce committee to discuss his annual report and that I did not let him.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is on that statement that the governor of the Bank of Canada undertook to say that I misled the house, and his words have been parroted in the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East. He bases his charge that I mislead the house on a statement appearing in a letter of December 5, 1957, written by Mr. Coyne to myself in which he talks about tight money and discusses the 15 per cent minimum liquid asset ratio of the banks. Perhaps I ought to read the paragraph from the letter. It is as follows:

> You have referred to the erroneous belief, which you feel is held by some people, that a condition of "tight money" was brought about by the adoption of the 15 per cent minimum liquid asset ratio by the banks and that it is necessary to change to a lower liquid asset ratio arrangement in order to convince people that monetary conditions have changed. I would hope that if there has been any public misunderstanding on this subject it is rapidly disappearing. If you feel it would be helpful I would, as I told you earlier, be glad to appear before the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons to explain the facts of the situation or to discuss any matters on which you felt parliament should be informed.

You will observe that the letter relates to the question of the liquidity reserves of the bank and does not refer to the kind of statement on which I was commenting on June 26 when I said—

Mr. Pickersgill: Pure quibbling.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Habel: Just a play on words.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. minister has made his position clear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I at no time denied that there was an offer, as has been stated by the hon. member for Essex East. What I was dealing with on June 26, as clearly appears, was the question of the governor wanting to appear—wanting to appear—before the banking and commerce committee to study his annual report.

Mr. Habel: Get a flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe that the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I think he has had an opportunity to make his explanation and that I should now proceed to hear the hon. member for Peterborough.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, this morning we witnessed a most incredible performance in this chamber.

Mr. Habel: You should get a flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The charge was false in every respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not what the public thinks now.

Mr. Chevrier: Your statements are incredible.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pitman: I should like to deal with that speech of an hour and a quarter and particularly the three sentences which are of concern to this group. First, it is completely at variance with the facts to suggest that we have ever questioned the supremacy of this parliament. This government rose to power on the coat tails of Coldwell, Knowles and the present hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who really fought the battle of 1957.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drysdale: Where are they now?

Mr. Pitman: Second, we have never condoned a $25,000 pension. The Prime Minister's statement about not making a personal attack becomes rather ludicrous in light of the statement which struck at the honesty and good faith of a servant of the people in that particular regard.

Third, we have never associated ourselves with the proposals of the governor of the Bank of Canada. However, it is rather interesting that one of the proposals to which the Prime Minister did not refer this morning was the one in which the governor suggested that unemployment insurance payments be raised. If there is one thing that this government will not attack it is unemployment.

Those are the only three things to which the Prime Minister referred this morning. I repeat the issue is not whether parliament is supreme or the governor of the Bank of Canada is supreme. That question has been agreed upon by all of us in this house, as the Prime Minister himself indicated while spending most of his time reading portions from speeches made by the hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition. The question is whether this parliament can deal with a situation without sufficient facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pitman: The real issue does not even concern Mr. Coyne but concerns what will be the relationship between the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance of this government. Eventually this parliament will have to deal with that question and we will be dealing with it on the worst possible basis because of incomplete information, prejudiced statements and emotion packed news releases.

All through the speech of the hon. member for Essex East the Minister of Finance shook his head and said, "No, no, no". I suggest this parliament will never know at what point there was a variation of opinion. Indeed in his question of privilege which soon became a speech the minister did little more than make a play on words and stated, in effect, that the correspondence which dealt with the subject of the incident had no relation to the incidence. Mr. Speaker, I do not have a legalistic mind but that is hair splitting to an extent I have never before seen in parliament.

We have reached a point now where we cannot get the information in this house but must go to our mailboxes every day in order to find out what is going on. I suggest we can only deal with the relationship of the Bank of Canada to this parliament with knowledge which can be gained solely by questioning in a committee of this house. That is the only means by which we can gain knowledge which will allow us to come to a sensible conclusion. The issue is not a question of the supremacy of parliament, but one of the intelligent conduct of parliament. Perhaps Mr. Coyne as the governor of the Bank of Canada is not covered by the bill of rights, but Mr. Coyne as a man should be heard because he is a citizen of this nation, and the bill of rights applies to him as a citizen.

We have been washing dirty linen in this parliament now for three days. We have now discovered that for four years the Minister of Finance has been sulking in his office because of an incident which took place in 1957-58. I suggest this whole problem could have been avoided or at least solved properly if we had amended the Bank of Canada Act. For four years we have had indecision and lack of co-operation during which the Minister of Finance refused to set his own house in order, with the obvious resulting disorder.

I am sure the people of this nation are going to wonder to what extent policy at the top has meant suffering at the bottom. We have had the highest unemployment rate in the western world this past winter. Families have been suffering and we are led to ask to what extent this has occurred because of chaos and confusion in this government, and its incompetence in putting its own house in order. Maybe after the names of Fleming and Coyne have disappeared the effects of what has been going on during the last few days will still be very much felt in this nation.

We have had this issue finally brought before parliament. Along with the hon. member for Essex East I would expect that on the other side of the house there would have been an even greater desire than on this side to have this thing aired, because we have had damning accusations and disturbing allegations which will remain on the record. What is going to happen to the confidence of the business community under these circumstances? How will the business community view the conduct of the affairs of this nation especially in terms of conditions over the past year? Referral of the bill to the committee will clear the picture of indecision and incompetence within this government. Surely it is in the interest of all those or the other side of the house to have this problem aired.

Probably never has the confidence of the people of Canada been at such a low ebb with respect to the government as a result of the debate in this house. Let us take this out of the realm of personalities completely. We remove the man whose good behaviour is not in any way in question. We are doing nothing in this same bill to improve the relationship of the bank, its governor and the Minister of Finance. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the monetary success of this nation is based upon a delicate balance of power among the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and the government. We realize that the final, overwhelming responsibility is in the hands of this parliament; but the day to day balance must be there. As one member has said in the house, the road to totalitarian power begins with the exercise of irresponsible power over the day to day business of the Bank of Canada. We might well say that under the Conservative administration the balance of power has been allowed to rest to too great an extent with the governor over the past four years; but if this bill is passed the pendulum will swing to the other side. There will be no man who will take over the governorship of the Bank of Canada; that is, no man of courage or integrity—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame on you.

Mr. Pitman: —no man who will speak what he believes, who will take over the governorship.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is character assassination in advance, of the worst kind.

Mr. Pitman: It is not character assassination, I suggest, because I do not know what character I am assassinating. What does this minister want, a minion with his hands on the machine to print the money?

Mr. Churchill: Don't copy the hon. member for Essex East in your own speeches.

Mr. Pitman: I am not quoting him.

Mr. Churchill: I said "Don't copy him".

Mr. Pitman: Does the minister wish a boot-licking slave who will have the power to print whatever money this government wants? We still do not know where that money is coming from. Is it going to come from abroad? No, because the exchange rate is going to rise. Is it going to come from the government's own people with the result that interest rates will go up? No. How is it going to come? The feeling of the people of this country must be that the government is going to print its own money with all the serious consequences that have taken place throughout the world when this irresponsible method has been used.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to this government, on a non-political basis, to somehow or other put in a safeguard. The government has destroyed the delicate balance which should be maintained. I say to the government. What are you going to do between now and the time when the royal commission has brought down its suggestions for changing the Bank of Canada Act? Perhaps now, even more than in 1957, the opposition should carry out a filibuster in this house until the royal commission has brought down its report and the legislation has been put through because this country has never been as close to totalitarian power before as it stands today. Before this bill goes through this house, this parliament and this nation should receive some indication of what the safeguards will be because parliamentary democracy has been weakened. To use the words of the minister, it has been eroded.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is not the governor of the Bank of Canada who will be in the greatest danger when this bill goes through, but the people of Canada whose freedom will be in jeopardy.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was speaking this morning I was interested in trying to catch in a personal way the thrill and the reaction in the public galleries and in the house to what was said. There is no question about it: He made the kind of speech that impresses people and moves them along a certain line with him, persuading his listeners that somehow this parliament had a case and that somehow the governor of the Bank of Canada had got in the way and was impeding the whole role of the elected representatives as reflected in this parliament. I wish to enter one caveat or reservation and say this from the point of view of an individual member.

I think it can be put in this form. There is a great deal of misunderstanding or, if you wish, nonsense talked about the responsibility of parliament and the supremacy of parliament. What is supreme in this particular parliament or in any Canadian parliament? Is it the Prime Minister? It seems to be that this is what it is; that the Prime Minister as the peak figure in the executive that is marshalled in this House of Commons feels that he is supreme in a sense and the rest of us, those of us who may not disagree, really cannot have or should not have in this forum, if he disagrees, the opportunity of finding out what parliament really means. It seems to me that what parliament really means is that each one of us has the right to examine and hear someone who is in power and carrying out his job as a result of the pleasure of this parliament.

I and many of my colleagues have felt on election night when the final totals are computed, that an incredible amount of power immediately falls upon the shoulders of the Prime Minister. I thought, in the campaign fought in the previous two elections, that the government were cognizant of this as a result of the stand they took in the debates in 1955 and 1956 but apparently they have very quickly taken over the conception of the supremacy of parliament which means the supremacy of the Prime Minister. This is one side of the Coyne-Fleming controversy. It seems to me we need some political thought and some political theory with relation to whether parliament as such, including all of us, is a legal fiction or not, or whether parliament really means the supreme power, not of all of us but of the Prime Minister.

The other aspect of the Coyne controversy, Mr. Speaker, that is most intriguing, is the comic opera aspect of it. When I think what a small place Ottawa is, when I think that the Minister of Finance has an office just across the street from the governor of the Bank of Canada—with a strong throw you could easily pitch a rock over—when I think of the social milieu and the milieu of the officials and executives in Ottawa is not a tremendously great one; we are not like New York and Washington where hundreds of people are surging in all directions. These people are constantly meeting and bumping into each other, both in the executive and in the public service side of Ottawa. How we could have a situation going on as it is now revealed through the correspondence is nothing but comic opera. The Minister of Finance who really does not care for the governor of the Bank of Canada does not really do anything about getting rid of him until he is almost clear of him just through passage of time. This seems to me almost incredible. After 3½ years, almost four, in this small world of Ottawa, where all these clashes are taking place below the surface the Minister of Finance never got together with the governor of the Bank of Canada and worked out either some rapport or some rapprochement between them or worked out some way of having his say in so far as monetary and fiscal policy is concerned.

I think there is confusion on the part of all of us with respect to this issue, and unlike some of the speakers on both sides of the house I do not know that the Canadian people have much of a clue as to what is involved in this issue. I think they are tremendously confused by it all. I do not think they are able to conceive of the confusion that must exist in a government that for 3½ years will put up with a public servant who is going around the country talking on issues that quite obviously affect public and government policy. To wind up after all that with this kind of hassle involving letters being posted and confidences being broken in public means that the situation is simply a ridiculous one.

The only thing I can suggest as an individual and on behalf of our party is that perhaps the one way to get rid of the confusion, although for a time the situation may be made more confusing, is for the government to go to the people at once on this issue or on like issues that it feels are associated with it and we will get the matter cleared up once and for all whether Canadians want to go on with a government that is so incompetent and so much given to procrastination.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair could I ask the house leader whether the government would consider a proposal I should like to put forward. Last night the house leader gave us a certain order of business. I was wondering, if it is our intention to adjourn at the end of this week, whether the house leader would consider postponing discussion of the civil service bill in particular, and possibly the dominion-provincial tax relations resolution, not because the civil service bill is contentious but because those hon. members who have spoken on this matter have indicated that it is not an immediate problem.

This bill contains 85 clauses, which will take some time to discuss. If the government wished, I think an arrangement could be made in this regard. I can only speak for myself, but I would be prepared to extend the hours of sitting tonight and Saturday if the house leader is not going to ask us to handle any other business. I think we could make an arrangement for this Saturday night.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion sounds very reasonable and perhaps we could have a few minutes to think it over and confer. We could then make a decision a little later, before six o'clock. If there is a possibility of adjourning on Saturday night it would be wise to sit this evening.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can come to any decision on this matter. It is worth considering, but there are activities going on in the other place which may determine the length of our sitting.

Mr. Speaker: I am informed that the other place has adjourned until three o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, July 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada —Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, last evening when we began the discussion on this bill I pointed out that one of our major concerns still remained unsolved and that we were not alone in speaking of this problem. Most of the associations are in agreement with us that there are two main reasons for changing the Civil Service Act. The first is that the act should be brought up to date and the wording changed so that the changes which have taken place over the years since 1919 in departments, in the organization of government and in the relationship of civil servants may be incorporated in the act.

It should be pointed out that in 1919 approximately 70 per cent of the employees of the United Kingdom government were classed as civil servants. Today less than 41 per cent of government employees are civil service employees. These figures were taken from the experience of the mother parliament. I am not aware that any figures are available for our own civil service, but there is a similarity between the two situations. This has resulted in most of these associations asking for one civil service; that all employees of the government should be brought under the terms of the Civil Service Act. This would bring our civil service numbers into a much higher percentage ratio than is the case at the present time.

The second point worthy of consideration is the fact that although the bill has been amended several times it does not point out, and the government has failed to point out, what the arrangement will be for negotiation such as would allow the establishment of a much better contract for civil servants. In this connection I should point out that the committee was informed on a number of occasions that we should not look on Bill No. C-71 as an agreement covering civil servants in their relationships with the civil service commission and with the government, but that these conditions, which would be normally reserved for a collective bargaining agreement, would be contained for the most part in regulations which would apply to the operation of this measure.

I feel that this is not a desirable situation, because I believe that civil servants should know with whom they are negotiating. They should know how far they must go before they can learn what the decision is to be in relation to requests made to the government and what appeal is possible from that decision. My personal opinion is that the civil service should deal first through their pay bureau and through the relationship with the civil service commission. They should decide on the rates for a particular classification. Of course, in the initial stages the associations will make their submissions and the departmental heads will, I presume, make counter submissions. But the full submission will be carried to the treasury board by the commission itself. Once the commission has taken the proposals to the government, and by government I mean either the governor in council or the treasury board as representative of the government, the commission should, in my opinion, step out of the picture as having fulfilled its function. It is in this relation that I think we have to make some improvement if we are going to have a satisfactory method of continuing associations.

The requests that are made, when they are presented to the government, will have to be considered of necessity in the light of the financial structure and financial condition of the treasury and of the government, and any requests which come from the civil service will have to take into consideration the ability of the government to pay the increases in salaries which are requested. It is in this field that I think we should have an impartial tribunal, possibly on the same lines as the arbitration tribunals in England, which would be able to make a final arbitration between the employee and the employer, in this case the civil service associations and organizations and the government or the treasury branch on the other hand. I believe that this decision should be conclusive because I am of the opinion that a strike is unlikely and is probably going to be unduly costly if it takes place in the civil service as a method of reaching a final decision. We have been learning in the last few days that the decision of parliament is final in all instances, but I think that rather than go to parliament, which would probably, in some cases, involve an action of the kind we have just taken in another field, there should be a more orderly manner of handling the final appeal and negotiations.

The civil service association recently indicated its views on this bill. It made it known that the association and its members are disappointed that certain basic principles of their position could not gain acceptance in the committee or from the government. The association stated:

> We are as concerned with too rigid legislation as is the government. However, we do not feel that the position we took before the committee requesting negotiation, consultation and arbitration implied any rigidity whatsoever. We viewed these principles as minimum safeguards to the rights of civil servants.

The statement went on:

> Our major area of concern is the lack of definition of what constitutes consultation and whether it is synonymous with negotiation as we view it. We are also concerned that there is no means whatsoever in the legislation to solve fundamental points of disagreement which must, from time to time, arise regardless of how much good faith is evidenced by the parties concerned. We thus feel that the refusal of some constitutionally acceptable form of arbitration will inhibit the staff associations in their representations.
> Our other major concern is the government's belief that after so many years we can in effect only now begin to evolve a satisfactory system of dealing between it and its employees on matters concerning salaries, wages and working conditions.

They go on to point out that they do not think we should not, as in the present bill, leave this matter to evolution and the development of something which may arise from evolution. They think we should decide how we are going to arrive at a proper method of handling the matter of negotiations. They think that this should be implied in the bill and a date set for revision, if revision is not possible at the present time.

Most organizations were concerned also with the delegation of authority. The bill, unlike the previous measures, gives to the deputy heads considerable authority which they did not have before, and arguments were put forward on both sides of the question. Some said this would result in a much faster method of handling problems arising in the department, that it would allow a much closer examination of problems than might be undertaken by an impartial body not familiar with the particular problems in the department. On the other hand it was argued that this would allow for the delegation of authority down through the department and that this would in most cases prohibit any appeal from decisions. It was felt that the commission itself, which would be delegating its authority, does not exercise as much influence through this bill as the Heeney report suggested it should, and that this, its worst feature, could mean a great increase in what has been considered to be departmental patronage—patronage which may take place because of the likes and dislikes and the close working relationship of people within a department. This, of course, has happened in the past under the act and I presume it will happen again. There are two or three very good examples. I do not wish to go into these now. They have been brought to the attention of the commission and of the department concerned and they indicate that what I am saying is true and that some change is needed. This was a problem in England on a number of occasions. The act there was changed to make the type of operation which we are considering today a possibility for a number of years, and then it was decided to go back to the system of Whitley councils and eliminate some of the delegation of authority.

I was interested to learn that a number of members of this committee were interested in continuing to give more than lip service to veterans preference. This preference in my opinion has been abused over the years not because it is not believed in but because other factors have been given more consideration. Where two equal individuals apply for the same position the preference is to be given to the veteran. I hope this situation will continue in order that those individuals who have served in the armed forces will have some advantage.

I was very interested in the speech made last night by the hon. member for Hull regarding bilingual training. This country is bilingual by constitution and I suggest there is a decided advantage generally to the Canadian people as a result. I feel that if an opportunity were provided to civil servants to become bilingual through a government implemented training program we would gain a tremendous advantage. I suggest such a training program should be adopted by the federal government so that individuals serving in government service could during working hours take advantage of learning the other language. Once those individuals have become bilingual they should be given a preference in regard to jobs, promotions and salaries. This program should be paid for and implemented by the federal government. Many individuals will not take advantage but there should be some preference given to those who do.

It is almost impossible to take an English speaking person from Ontario and place him in a job in the northern part of the province of Quebec where the English language is not spoken. The reverse of that situation is also almost impossible. I suggest if we are going to have a bilingual country we should think in terms of true bilingualism. If this were attained we would achieve the benefits of a real bilingual culture.

One of the clauses of this bill which did not seem to create much interest is that clause having reference to political participation. Individuals in this country have a right to belong to whichever political party they desire. In countries such as England where pride is taken regarding protection of rights of individuals there has been adopted a system of declaring certain parts of the civil service as sensitive and non-sensitive areas. I think that is a reasonable and fair system. If a similar system had been adopted by this government much of the present problem with which it is faced would have been eliminated.

The political party to which I belong is supported by membership. All citizens have the right to belong to parties so supported just as individuals have the right to belong to churches of their choice and are not penalized by other churches which do not require their members to subscribe.

We should divide our civil service into critical and non-critical or sensitive and non-sensitive areas. Individuals working in areas classed as non-sensitive would then have the right to belong and support political parties. I am not suggesting that they should be allowed to take overt political action, as a number of civil servants in Ottawa have done on occasion. I do not agree with that at all and can state that on the occasion with which I am familiar when such overt action has occurred it has not been on the part of individuals who support the party to which I belong. Many of these individuals have taken this overt action in order to get jobs in the civil service.

While discussing the bill in this particular context we should give consideration to the freedom and rights of individual citizens, whether or not they are members of the civil service. They should be allowed to participate and support any political party they choose. They should also be allowed to vote in any provincial, dominion or municipal election. There should be a clause included in this bill allowing civil servants time off in order to do that. I believe they should also be allowed under this bill to enroll in a political party if they desire. I believe that the political affiliation of civil servants has little or no effect on the jobs they have and little or no effect upon the government. I suggest, for instance, a secretary in the pool carrying a membership card of a political party causes very little concern on the part of anyone. I hope the government will give consideration to this situation.

It might be interesting to note the changes which have been made in this regard by one of our provincial legislatures. Before referring to that particular change I should like to read the "Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952", chapter 48, which is an act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member begins the quotation I regret to have to advise him that his time has expired. Is the hon. member the first spokesman for the C.C.F. party?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to abuse this concession but I should like to read from that portion of the revised statutes to which I have referred, the following:

(1) No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the civil service shall be debarred from voting at any dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election or contribute, receive, or in any way deal with any money for any party funds.

(2) Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the civil service.

Part V—Exceptions and special cases

(1) The provisions of this act do not apply to positions in connection with the government railways or any railway owned or controlled by Her Majesty, or to any position on any ship of Her Majesty, until parliament otherwise enacts.

(2) In this section the expression "ship of Her Majesty" includes every description of vessel, however propelled, that is used in navigation or in the improvement of navigation and is the property of or chartered or employed by Her Majesty, or the cost of which, or any portion of the cost of which has been defrayed out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The provisions of this act do not apply to the position of postmaster of any revenue post office the revenue of which does not exceed three thousand dollars per annum; but the preference provided by section 28, in favour of the persons mentioned therein, shall be applied in respect of appointments to such positions.

It is interesting to note that Saskatchewan in 1953 revised its statute in this regard. I should like to quote a portion of that revision. Chapter 7, part IV (i) reads as follow:

No person in the public service shall:

(a) be in any manner compelled to take part in any political undertaking, or to make any contribution to any political party, or be in any manner threatened or discriminated against for refusing to take part in any political undertaking; or

(b) directly or indirectly use or seek to use the authority or official influence of his position to control or modify the political action of any other person; or

(c) during his hours of duty engage in any form of political activity; or

(d) at any time take such part in political activities as to impair his usefulness in the position in which he is employed.

(2) Any person in the public service who desires to become a candidate for public office shall be entitled to leave of absence for 30 days prior to the date of the election.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

I think we should reconsider this section and include in the federal statute some of the protections that have been adopted in Saskatchewan. This is a real threat, Mr. Chairman. Under the federal statute, people are prohibited from taking part in an active way in politics; but in Saskatchewan protection is given against making civil servants take part in electioneering in a way in which they may not wish to do. I do not wish to go into a discussion of how that sometimes happens but I should like to mention just one case. In the last provincial election in my area—I give this only by way of explanation—the civil servants who worked in the liquor control board stores, in the department of highways, and in the department of lands and forests were all given the very broad suggestion that it would be appreciated if they would spend some time in seeing that the good work being carried on by their departments was furthered by the re-election of the government candidate. At that time the premier of the province went so far as to say to some of the leading people in that riding that if the government candidate was not elected he would resign as premier of the province of Ontario. I suggest that not only should we have the protection but people should not abuse it. I am completely in agreement with this. I do not want to see government officials going around in an official capacity and speaking on behalf of the government or working for any party. I think protection should also be given against those who may be forced to do this not of their own volition. I think this particular matter should get some further consideration, Mr. Chairman. I hope the government will not be influenced by the fact that the party to which I belong has always been financed by membership fees, which are a contribution and which would probably be illegal under this legislation.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, my first words on this most important bill are to thank the Minister of Finance for his remarks last evening about the careful and intensive work done by the committee in considering the bill. I think all members who served on the committee can say with modesty that we worked many long hard hours both in committee and outside on the bill, learning of the problems of the civil service and of the administration, to bring to this house as good a bill as we possibly could.

In the course of our meetings—and there were some 23 of them—we made about 30 amendments to the bill and have brought these forward for the consideration of this committee.

I should also like to thank the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Timiskaming for their very pleasant remarks to me as chairman of the committee, in opening the debate on the bill last evening. I should like to express to them and to all members of the committee my thanks for the serious way in which they tackled the job of consideration of this civil service bill and for their co-operation at all times with me as the chairman, and with each other in the work of the committee.

I think one of the most important things about the committee, Mr. Chairman, is that it approached its task with a non-partisan attitude. All of us worked together to try to draft the best possible bill we could for the civil service and to assist the work which the civil service does for our nation.

On behalf of the committee, I should also like to express our thanks to the civil service commissioners, the Hon. S. H. S. Hughes, Q.C., Miss Ruth Addison and Mr. Paul Pelletier, who came in day after day, and attended hour after hour, giving us so much of their time and their special knowledge and ability to assist and guide us in the work which was before us. We were also very ably assisted in very many meetings by Mr. Charles Mackenzie, the assistant secretary to the treasury board, whose advice and experience on the work of the civil service was very valuable to us in all of the months that we were working on this bill.

The briefs put forward by the civil service associations—every major civil service association in Canada brought forward briefs —were appreciated very much by the committee. The briefs were well prepared and in most instances were serious and responsible attempts to improve the working conditions of the civil service and to improve the administration of the service.

In particular I should like to compliment the members of the committee who came from the Ottawa area, the hon. members for Carleton, Hull, Ottawa East and Ottawa West, who gave considerable time and study to the bill.

While I realize that members of the committee would like to see the bill proceeded with as soon as possible, to see the improvements and advantages which flow from it made available to the civil service and to the country, I should like to take a moment to discuss a few of the improvements which will be made by the bill.

First of all, may I refer to the fact that this bill differs from the old act of 1918 in that it provides in clause 65 the right of the civil servant to his pay. This is a departure from the previous act and indeed from the general concept that the crown has no obligation to pay any of its employees, that they receive pay as a matter of grace. As a result of this bill the civil servant has the right to go into court, come to this parliament or anywhere else to ask for his pay as of right for services rendered.

There was some commentary by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Hull on the widening of the powers of the deputy heads of departments. One of the purposes of the bill was to streamline the administration of the civil service and of government departments, and it was to this end that the Heeney report very strongly recommended that the powers of the deputy heads should be widened. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that coupled with the widening of the power of the deputy heads is a new provision not to be found in the old act which is there to protect the rights of the civil servant. I speak, of course, of the new appeal provisions which are to be found in the bill now before the committee. Under the old act there was no provision at all for the right of appeal except in the case of a suspension where the commission might review the situation and perhaps decide that the punishment inflicted was too severe. However, in this legislation a wide range of appeals is authorized from administrative decisions within the department and the security of the civil servant is much enhanced thereby.

A third improvement provided by this bill is in the fact that the distinction between temporary and permanent employees, which heretofore existed, has been removed. Now, even where appointments are not permanent, the employee who is in fact perhaps temporary enjoys the status and the advantages of a permanent employee of the civil service.

Another improvement which I think is noteworthy is the new clause which provides that people in the public service of Canada, in the armed forces and in the R.C.M.P., may now have the right to compete and transfer to the civil service. This was a recommendation of the Heeney report and is purposed toward the utilizing of the investment of the taxpayer in many public servants who could not otherwise follow careers in the civil service. This is an important change both for people in the R.C.M.P. and the armed forces who now have the right to transfer to the civil service and, indeed, for the people of Canada generally.

Moreover the new provision in respect of bilingualism is, I think, a very important one. When the hon. member for Hull was speaking last evening I noted that he said that he was not entirely satisfied with the provisions with regard to bilingualism. He referred to the French speaking people of Canada as poor relations. That is a phrase I have never heard used before in speaking of the very large French speaking population of Canada and I do not think it should be accepted. He said that some preference should be provided for bilingual civil servants. The bill does in fact provide this, inasmuch as a new test has been introduced by the bill whereby when a person is to be appointed to an office he must have a knowledge of that language which is required, sufficient to serve the public of the area where he is to perform his duties. Apropos of that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw your attention to the comments of the Hon. S. H. S. Hughes, Q.C., chairman of the commission in speaking on this matter. He said:

> Clause 47 of the bill lays upon the commission the responsibility of seeing that this consideration—

That is the consideration that people working in an office where they will be serving both elements, French and English, should be bilingual, or in any case sufficiently so to serve the public whether French or English. I continue:

> —is borne in mind not only in local positions but in head office positions of departments and not only in the language of the majority but in terms of the use of both languages where it is considered that their use is necessary to give effective service to the public. This will enable the commission in practice to give preference to applicants for positions and existing employees who are bilingual as circumstances may require.

There is in fact therefore a preference for bilingual people incorporated for the first time by the bill before the committee this afternoon.

Another change that is proposed to be made by this bill is to remove the prohibition against persons who have not been resident in Canada for five years serving in the civil service. While preference is given to Canadian citizens under the bill, where there are not persons available to fill positions within the civil service who have been in Canada for more than five years the commission can very properly turn to new Canadians who have the qualifications for the work.

I should like to turn now to what has been considered as one of the most important new provisions of the bill, and that is the construction of a new relationship between the government represented by the Minister of Finance and civil service employees. The civil service associations came before the committee asking that some form of direct consultation or negotiation should be set up between the Minister of Finance and the various staff associations so that the Department of Finance and the staff associations could gather around the table, without any intermediary, to discuss matters of pay and so on. They also suggested that some form of arbitration should be established so that where disputes could not be settled under this new consultative process an arbitration board would be available to the parties concerned.

I am very pleased to say that at the request of these associations clause 7 of the bill was amended by the committee to provide for direct consultation between the Minister of Finance and the staff associations. It has been said that instead of using the word "consultation" the word "negotiation" should have been used. That was the position taken by the hon. member for Hull when he spoke last evening. Frankly, I see very little difference in the use of the two words. The most important thing is that clause 7 as now before the committee provides that, and I quote from clause 7:

> The commission, and such member of the public service as the Minister of Finance may designate, shall from time to time consult with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees with respect to pay—

And so on. In other words, the staff associations have the same right to come to the minister as the minister has to go to them to discuss pay and, through the commission, other terms and conditions. This is a very important step and I feel it meets the wishes of the great majority of the civil service in that regard.

As to the matter of arbitration, while the committee did not agree that an amendment should be made to the bill which would provide for an arbitration procedure by legislation, we are satisfied with the statements of the Minister of Finance that arbitration can be developed as it has developed in England along the lines of normal evolution.

I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that there is no need for words in the bill to establish the right of arbitration or the fact of arbitration. The bill is permissive. There is no reason why the staff associations and the Minister of Finance as parties to a dispute at any time cannot call upon an arbitration board to find a solution to their problems.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, at this point I wonder whether I could give our answer to the question that was raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming, I believe about 45 minutes ago with respect to whether we might meet tonight and tomorrow evening with the intention of attempting to adjourn tomorrow night. We are prepared to do so and we have reduced to a bare minimum the items which we think might be considered by the house before adjournment. They consist of four items, the C.N.R. financing bill, the Income Tax Act to the extent of passing second reading but not consideration of the bill in committee stage, an appropriation act, as I mentioned last night, to appropriate funds in respect of the 11 departments which have passed the committee and then interim supply to carry us on during the course of the adjournment. A fifth item might be a report from the committee on rules and procedure. As far as the government is concerned, those are the four matters that we consider could be dealt with today and tomorrow, and adjournment tomorrow night.

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret to say that I have not any mandate to make any commitment as far as we are concerned. I am quite prepared to consult with my friends and to give an answer at six o'clock. However, I would have very grave doubts about our willingness to sit this evening. It seems to me that there are enough people having enough heart attacks around this place now without having any addition to them. I should just like to make sure that I understand correctly what the proposition is. As I understand it, the proposition is to take only the second reading of the income tax bill and the appropriation bill about which we had been given no notice until last night, I believe, something which is a very unusual procedure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has been done before.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may have been done before but I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that it is a very unusual procedure in the years I have been observing this house since 1938. We should want to know why this unusual procedure was being followed. I am not quite sure of the items. There was the C.N.R. bill. Is that the suggestion?

Mr. Churchill: The C.N.R., income tax bill second reading, appropriation bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: The appropriation bill and interim supply. I may say that I am not in the least sanguine about this proposition, but I do not feel I am competent to say yes or no at this stage.

Mr. Peters: I thank the house leader for his consideration of this proposal. I believe we are all anxious to get out. I am sure that I can speak for our group in this respect. If this is the business—and I agree that it is important business that is of necessity before us—we would be agreeable to a proposal to extend the hours tonight until 10.30 and we would be willing to sit tomorrow until this business was finished.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wish to be absolutely sure about the matter before I talk to my friends. I wish to be absolutely sure that the government has no intention of going beyond second reading of the income tax bill; in other words, this great expansionist budget is so unimportant that it does not matter whether or not we pass this Income Tax Act amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: If the decision should be reached to go on tonight, Mr. Speaker, we would take up the C.N.R. bill this evening at 7.30. I judge that at about five minutes to six o'clock we shall be able to get a response from the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: May I inquire then what the proposal is, in view of the discussion back and forth? Is it proposed to proceed with public and private bills?

Mr. Churchill: As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to continue with the discussion of the Civil Service Act during this hour.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think we should not abridge the ordinary rights of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Then the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY AND METHOD OF EXECUTION

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-38, an act to amend the Criminal Code (Capital Punishment).—Mr. Drysdale.

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the majority of the suggestions contained in my private member's bill have already been adopted in government legislation I would ask the consent of the house that it be withdrawn at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite entitled to withdraw his bill before it has been placed before the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It will therefore be noted as dropped.

Bill withdrawn.

Private Bills

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPLICATION BY TRUCKERS TO TRANSPORT BOARD ON COMPETITIVE RATES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-39, an act to amend the Railway Act.—Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Stand.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there is not unanimous consent to let this bill stand. It stands in the way of other bills that are on the order paper. If the hon. gentleman does not wish to proceed, it should take its place in the queue.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to explain that there is a technical matter that has arisen in the procedure on the bill. Hon. members will recall that a similar bill having to do with the Transport Act went through the house a short time ago and is now before the other place which has taken the position that it is doubtful to proceed with this bill until the royal commission have completed their hearings. I believe this could very well be cleared up before next week when it would arise again and that I would then be in a position to go ahead with the matter.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member does not wish to proceed, he is not obliged to do so, as I understand the rules; it is only where the debate is proceeding and the motion has been proposed and is in the possession of the house. Is the government prepared to let the bill stand?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Howard: There is another matter with which I should like to deal, perhaps on a point of order. I am not objecting to the government request that this bill stand but it is a new departure from the procedure the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) announced a few weeks ago with respect to private members' bills, in that the government would not request that they stand merely for the convenience of the member. If the house leader is changing the rulings and decisions he made some months ago with respect to the hour devoted to consideration of public and private bills, that is one thing; but, if it is merely a question of playing favourites, it is another thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on that point, Mr. Speaker. There are some of us who have private bills on the order paper and who have been waiting patiently all session. It seems quite unreasonable that certain hon. members who are not prepared to proceed at a certain time should keep priority and thus prevent others from getting their bills before the house. It certainly would not be very agreeable to us to have the government seeking consent for the bills of its friends and not doing so for the bills of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. I think that usually these things have been done by agreement. When they are done by agreement and the government gives the technical consent, that is fine. However, I agree completely with the hon. member for Skeena that there should not be one law for one side of the house and one for the other side.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, there is not one law for one side and one for the other. This is a whole bunch of nonsense that we are hearing again. If the record is examined, it will be found that far more bills emanating from the other side of the house have been allowed to stand during the course of this session than bills sponsored by government members. At this stage of the session, as the very reasonable request put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway means only a delay of perhaps one week, I asked that it stand. It was for that reason I suggested that this bill stand.

Mr. Speaker: No. 2 stands.

Mr. Howard: Does that not show that you have played favourites?

Order stands.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-41, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters)—Mr. Racine.

Mr. McIlraith: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member not prepared to proceed?

Mr. Habel: Stand.

Mr. Howard: I would point out if I may, Mr. Speaker, that a bill attempting to do the same thing has already been entered for second reading and debate has started on it. It is a bill that stands in my name. Second reading was moved some months ago and it is down here somewhere for resumed debate. I cannot pick it out right at the moment. However, it deals with precisely the same subject matter.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of the hon. member and in the absence of a request by the government that it stand, the bill is bypassed.

Order stands.

FRASER RIVER

LEGISLATION TO SAFEGUARD NAVIGATION AND FISHERIES

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-43, respecting navigation and salmon fishery on the Fraser river.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move second reading of this bill there are two things with which I wish to deal preliminarily. I have been asked why the hon. member for Victoria should be so greatly concerned about the Fraser river which, after all, is some distance from my own constituency. If the geography and habits of the Pacific salmon are understood, the reason I am concerned is readily apparent. In addition to that, I have a great many fishermen in my constituency; and I am a British Columbian and I am very proud of our Pacific salmon fishery.

Every fish caught by the fishermen who reside in my constituency is on its way to the spawning grounds of the Fraser river and its tributaries. With regard to federal jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, some hon. members have said the Fraser river is entirely within the province of British Columbia and have asked how the parliament of Canada can have anything to do with it. There again the answer is very simple. At the time of confederation and for many years before that the Fraser river was a navigable river. Under the terms of the British North America Act the parliament of Canada has control over rivers that were navigable rivers at the time of confederation. Also, the parliament of Canada has control over the deep-sea fisheries off our coasts and the attendant inland fisheries which result from those deep-sea fisheries. Therefore on two counts the parliament of Canada has every right to deal with the Fraser river and what goes on in the Fraser river, both from the standpoint of navigation and fisheries.

The average value of the Pacific salmon industry is approximately $90 million per annum. In 1962, when there will be the great Adams river run again—Adams river is a tributary of the Fraser river—the industry will be worth a great deal more; but it averages $90 million. This is to say nothing of the huge investment in fishing vessels, nets, equipment and all the money paid out in wages for building those ships, nets, equipment and paying all the people employed in the fishery.

There is something else, Mr. Speaker, that I think this house should know if it does not know it already. The Fraser river of British Columbia is the greatest salmon river in the world. Prior to the industry on the Fraser river there had been a salmon fishery on the Columbia river in the United States, on the coast of Oregon and in the upper regions of that river. It was not as large an industry as ours; it was not nearly so valuable, but it was valuable earlier. The Fraser river fishery was developed and the techniques existing on the Columbia river were followed.

I know that when I was a boy the term "Columbia river boat" was commonly used. This was the type of boat that nearly all our gillnetters used and was a boat that had been developed in connection with that fishery on the Columbia river. It is common knowledge that the fishery on the Columbia is ruined. It is true that a few fish spawn in the Priest river, one of its tributaries. However to all intents and purposes the great fishery on that river is ruined. It was ruined because of the construction, at the time of the late President Roosevelt and his new deal, of two new dams on that river, the Bonneville dam close to the mouth of the Columbia and the huge Grand Coulee dam which is very much further up the river.

At that time the president of the United States was worried about it, and I will deal with that later. But we had a procession of professors and engineers who assured the president of the United States, "There is nothing to this. Salmon and dams can exist on the Columbia river". I have every respect, and always have had, for professors and engineers, but when it comes to a spawning river I have a lot more respect for the Pacific salmon.

In the case of Bonneville, because of the treaty signed many years ago between Canada and the United States, the United States agreed that they would not interfere with navigation on the Columbia river and a ship canal and lock were built on the Bonneville dam. Would you believe, Mr. Speaker, that some of the professors and engineers said, "Well, that is how the salmon will get up. When the canal gates are open to let a ship in, the salmon will swim in with it; and when it is taken up, the salmon will swim out"? They did not know much about the Pacific salmon, because that certainly did not happen.

I have a work here which is really the only work on this subject in the form in which it is written. It is a book written about the Columbia river fishery by Anthony Netboy entitled "Salmon of the Pacific northwest. Fish v. dams". I am indebted to the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) for bringing this work to my attention. In effect this book is an apologia, because Netboy was one of the men who thought this thing could be accomplished on the Columbia river and he afterwards wrote a sort of apologia. At page 10 of the foreword—which was written by the late Senator Neuberger of the state of Oregon, who was a great proponent of the maintenance of the fishery in that river—there is found this passage:

"Go and investigate the fish v. dams question," Mr. Netboy was told by Henry Alderman, then the assistant to Dr. Paul J. Raver, Bonneville's administrator.

So Mr. Netboy did go and make some investigations, but regrettably he came up with the wrong report and is now apologizing for it. At page 42 of this work, under the heading "Enter the federal dams", there are a few excerpts which I should like to read:

The diminishing runs of salmon, resulting from numerous and complex causes, had long worried the fishery industry when a new and potentially adverse factor entered the picture—start of construction in 1933 on Bonneville dam, followed shortly by ground-breaking for mammoth Grand Coulee dam. Bonneville was located on the Columbia 145 miles from its mouth, Grand Coulee 597 miles from Astoria.

That is a city at the mouth of the Columbia.

Bonneville was to have a 60-foot head, Grand Coulee 316 feet. Never before had a major salmon run been required to hurdle an obstruction as formidable as Bonneville.

The first barriers constructed in the Columbia river watershed were primarily irrigation dams. They were not the massive structures that came into being with the development of the river's hydroelectric potential. Some of the earlier dams built on the tributaries for power and irrigation diversions did not include facilities for passing fish migrating upstream. Consequently, a terrific toll was exacted at these points on certain races of Columbia river salmon. In fact, entire runs into several tributaries were almost completely wiped out.

In addition to dams without fish passage facilities, many other dams were built in the Columbia river basin that had provisions for passage of adult fish, such as the low dam at Willamette falls (Oregon City). But even here no safe passage was provided to the downstream migrants—the tiny fish.

That is the fingerlings that have to come down:

When the Bonneville project was authorized by President Roosevelt as a public works project, Frank Bell, U.S. commissioner of fisheries, was requested to find some way of getting the salmon over the dam. "I wrote to every civilized country in the world," said Mr. Bell, and "at no place... could we find where they had passed fish over as high a dam as Bonneville would be."

Naturally there were widespread—almost hysterical—fears that Bonneville would spell the end of the Columbia river salmon runs and confine the fishery to the lower river, thus wiping out part of an industry then valued at some $10 million annually. In an article in the Saturday Evening Post in November, 1937, when the dam was nearing completion, Richard L. Neuberger wrote:

That is the late senator I mentioned before.

"Prevalent throughout the principal salmon-producing region of the world today is the almost unshakable opinion that within a few years the fighting fish with the flaky flesh will be one and the same with the dodo bird—extinct". Not only were commercial fishermen, anglers, and the salmon industry generally apprehensive, but scientists and conservationists from distant parts of the country felt obliged to voice their fears. For example, Arthur Newton Pack, president of the American nature association, declared that the dams being built on the Columbia would kill a fishing industry providing employment to more than 25,000 people annually. E. D. Clark, secretary of the association of Pacific fisheries, claimed that the dams would be disastrous. He foresaw the end of the runs of the giant chinook.

The Indians were equally pessimistic. According to Neuberger, George Red Hawk, aged chief of the Cayuse Indians, who was spearing salmon on the river before the railroads had even reached the Columbia gorge, "looked grimly at the surging river. 'White man's dams,' he said, 'mean no more salmon.' "

Such strenuous objections were raised by fishery people to the blockading of the river by Bonneville dam that the corps of engineers was forced to include fish passage facilities in the plans for this structure. At first they were to consist of only four conventional ladders of moderate size—like those at Oregon City—estimated to cost $800,000. When fishery biologists demonstrated that they would be palpably inadequate to handle the large fish traffic using this stretch of the river, an elaborate system of traps, locks, elevators, canals and ladders was devised which added $7 million to the cost of the dam.

Notwithstanding that expenditure the Columbia river fishery has been ruined and that great source of food no longer exists. That, as I say, appears in this author's book, which is an apologia for his previous advice which he now admits was faulty.

Today in British Columbia we have engineers coming up again with the same sort of applesauce as they fed to President Roosevelt. I have an example right here. This is from the Canadian Press of June, 1961 under a Vancouver dateline. It appeared in just about all the papers in British Columbia and, I think, throughout Canada generally. The heading is: "Both Power Systems and Fish Possible in B.C. River System" and the article reads:

British Columbia can have both fish and power from its fast-flowing river systems, the engineering institute of Canada was told today.

Papers presented at the institute's annual meeting indicated that the baffling problem of building power dams and at the same time allowing salmon to get to their spawning grounds, has at last reached a stage of solution.

The papers indicated, too, that with proper measures the salmon yield can be substantially increased. At the same time, continued and increased research was urged.

Val Gwyther, Vancouver consulting engineer, stated:

"The present policy of retardation of power development in a watershed, due to our inability to produce the answer to beneficial fish migration, is in the past, and these watersheds now are open in development of both fish and power."

There is no doubt, Mr. Gwyther said, that we now can produce salmon species in great quantities, jointly with other resource values, and with economy.

Mr. Gwyther's paper went at length into the problems of fish propagation. Rearing capacities of natural and impounded lakes should be utilized by artificial fertilization and incubation of eggs to give a yield far in excess of that from natural spawning grounds.

There again, all we have is a pious statement from this engineer that everything is now all right. But you never see any concrete statement as to how it is going to be done. What bothers me at the present time, because of the difficulty existing in British Columbia, because of the attitude of that government in British Columbia, the trouble with the Columbia and the Peace river, is this: I am fearful that we are going to wake up one day and find that the premier of British Columbia has given a water licence on the Fraser river. The British Columbia Electric Company is ready now and has been ready for years. They have all the plans ready. They can jump on the Fraser tomorrow and build two dams. That is what faces us, and that is why I think, now, that the parliament of Canada has a right to put an end to this thing forever and keep this great source of food, this great river and the industry which depends on it safe for Canadians now and forever. We should do that now before we lose it. I bespeak the support of hon. members for the passage of this bill.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE OF JULY 7

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should like to rise on a question of privilege in connection with the blues of today, page W-5. I shall have to read this statement I made and then the interruption. I am reported to have said:

I have simply pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that the slur can only have been that, because there has been nothing else except the suggestion of disagreement. How many people in public life receive a pension of that size? I have been in public life longer than Mr. Coyne. When I retire, no matter how many years from now it may be, I will be in the same position as Mr. St. Laurent.

Then there was an interruption by the Leader of the Opposition:

Oh, that is the reason.

The record continues:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Now we know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true. I am glad the hon. member mentioned that, because he has given years of devoted service and I am prepared to admit it.

What I understood the hon. gentleman to say was: "I am in the same position".

Mr. Benidickson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I speak to a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. Benidickson: I rise on a point of order with respect to the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point of order would intervene; if the Prime Minister would allow me to deal with it—

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with a question of privilege, it always does.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. gentleman please resume his seat? In my view, where a point of order is taken on a question of privilege it should be dealt with before the question of privilege is completed.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that not all hon. members of the house have the privilege of looking at what the Prime Minister refers to as blue sheets. I certainly do not.

An hon. Member: You can get the white ones, though.

Mr. Benidickson: No.

Mr. Speaker: What is the hon. member's point of order?

Mr. Benidickson: My point is that I have never known an occasion when during the day while a debate was taking place any member has risen in his seat, in my experience, to change something that he has found in the text of Hansard on the blue sheets.

Mr. Speaker. Order. I do not see a point of order there. If the hon. member disagrees with the question of privilege he will have the right to comment afterwards.

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to say, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I have found no point of order and would ask the hon. member to allow the Prime Minister, who has the floor, to complete his statement.

Mr. Benidickson: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member.

Mr. Benidickson: No. My point of order is that we are dealing with private member's legislation during this hour.

Mr. Speaker: That is true.

Mr. Benidickson: The Prime Minister has interrupted the ordinary proceedings of debate.

Mr. Speaker: That is another point entirely. It is true, but if the hon. member will refer to the rule he will find that a question of privilege which is immediate may be raised at any time when an hon. member can get the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not fear the interruptions. I thought the Leader of the Opposition said: "I am in the same position." Reading it that way, the house can—

Mr. McIlraith: May I raise a point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but there is another point of order intervening.

An hon. Member: The hon. gentleman has just come into the chamber.

Mr. McIlraith: My only point is this. The Prime Minister was in the chamber a few moments ago when the Leader of the Opposition was here. Surely, since the Leader of the Opposition is being referred to in this way, and a correction made on account of his interjection, he should be sent for. I see that since I have risen on this point of order the Leader of the Opposition has taken his place, and perhaps the matter should be restated. I think that is a fair procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have said I thought the Leader of the Opposition said "I am in the same position" instead of "Oh, that is the reason". The record shows the following exchange:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Now we know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true.

I paid a tribute to the Leader of the Opposition which clearly indicates that I misapprehended his interruption, because I then said:

That is true. I am glad the hon. member mentioned that, because he has given years of devoted service and I am prepared to admit it.

Mr. Benidickson: What has this to do with the private members' hour and the Prime Minister's intrusion upon it?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Keep quiet and be sober for a change.

Mr. Benidickson: This is not a sober judgment on your part.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please allow this matter to be dealt with in an orderly manner. The Prime Minister has drawn attention to a misunderstanding of an interruption and has made his explanation as a question of privilege, which he is entitled to do at any time of the day. If any hon. member wishes to comment or discuss the question of privilege, particularly the Leader of the Opposition whose intervention is the one concerned, I am prepared to hear him.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I feel that if a change of this kind is to be made—and I am not quarrelling with the Prime Minister's right to suggest a change—it should be made after Hansard has appeared when hon. members who are concerned, as well as the Prime Minister, have had a chance to see it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the matter has arisen let me say this. The Prime Minister made a statement this morning, which I should like to correct as a question of privilege of the same kind, in which he—I was going to use the word "charged"—me with using certain words, and he gave the page in Hansard. I found it very difficult to believe that he had actually used my name, but when the blues were sent to me, because I had intervened, I found not only that the Prime Minister was mistaken in attributing these words to me but that they were words of the Minister of Finance. I was going to rise on a question of privilege tomorrow morning after Hansard had been printed to bring this to the attention of the house. I think the Prime Minister could have followed the same course.

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the Prime Minister he was making an explanation of his comments and not asking for a change to be made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not making a change, I was simply saying, Mr. Speaker that—

Mr. Benidickson: You were interrupting the routine proceedings of the house during private members business hour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I had paid a tribute to the Leader of the Opposition on the basis of what I thought his interruption was, namely, that he was "in the same position" and would not receive any more than $3,000. I then went on to pay a tribute to him for his great service to the country, and that fact is true. As it is worded in Hansard it is obvious that is what I had in mind.

FRASER RIVER

LEGISLATION TO SAFEGUARD NAVIGATION AND FISHERIES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McPhillips for the second reading of Bill No. C-43, respecting navigation and salmon fishery on the Fraser river.

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising I hope I am referring to the right bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Are you referring to the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. Drysdale: Are we dealing with the fisheries bill?

Mr. Speaker: We are dealing with second reading of Bill No. C-43.

Mr. Drysdale: I just wanted to make sure that I was referring to the right bill. As the seconder of the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Victoria I thought perhaps I should indicate what my interest is in this matter.

My constituency, and particularly the Richmond portion of it is situated at the mouth of the Fraser river. It should also be obvious to all hon. members present that I am interested in this particular measure because of the existence of the community of Steveston, which is a fishing community located very close to the mouth of the Fraser. At the peak of the fishing season approximately 10,000 fishermen actually base their salmon fishing activities in that area.

First, I felt I should point out that although I am the seconder of this bill and approve of the principles enunciated therein, I do not think it goes far enough. When I spoke earlier in respect of this bill, actually in 1959, I said at that time that although I endorsed the principles I felt that the bill did not perhaps go as far as I should have liked.

In the first part of the bill the sponsor has drawn attention to the fact that there should not be any hydroelectric power dams or other navigation dams which would obstruct salmon fishing. However, in the second part of the bill it is suggested that this would not apply to any project of the government of Canada dealing with navigation, flood control, river bed erosion, current control and so on.

During one of the meetings of the fisheries committee the sensitivity of this salmon fishery was very forcefully drawn to our attention. The only point that concerns me about the hon. member's bill is that the government of Canada, despite how well meaning it is, may nevertheless create the very difficulties which the sponsor of this bill is attempting to obviate.

The second report of the fisheries committee of 1959 at page 85 states as follows:

> Your committee held seven meetings, one of which was devoted to the consideration of a preliminary report on flood control and hydroelectric power in the Fraser river basin in British Columbia, particularly in respect of fisheries and certain relevant aspects referred to in the said report.

This report then states:

> Your committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of hastening the re-appointment of the Fraser river board in conjunction with the government of British Columbia in order that the said board achieve its aims, specially with reference to the protection of fisheries in all its aspects.

The committee went on to make this further important recommendation unanimously:

> Your committee expresses the opinion that no dams should be built on the Fraser river, or any of its tributaries, where such dams will, in the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries, interfere with, or be detrimental to anadromous fish runs.

I think the very important point raised there is that the control and supervision should be in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) and his departmental officials because it seems to me that there is a patent loophole in the second part of this bill which would make it possible for irreparable damage to be done to these particular fish runs.

I think that the sponsor of this bill indicated the legislative justification for the amendments contained in this bill when he drew attention to the fact that it came within the British North America Act. This particular phase of the situation does specifically come within section 91 (2) of that act which deals with coastal and inland fisheries. The matter of jurisdiction in this regard is recorded in the Canada Year Book for 1960 at page 630. I should like to read a portion of what is stated there, as follows:

> The British North America Act gave the federal government full legislative jurisdiction for the coastal and inland fisheries of Canada and under this act laws are made for the protection, conservation and development of the fisheries throughout the country. However, the provinces have, by agreement, assumed administrative responsibilities in varying degrees. Consequently, though all the regulations governing fishing are made by the federal government, the work of administering the fisheries (enforcing the different laws and regulations, inspecting fish products, issuing licences, etc.) is done without duplication of staff either by federal or by provincial officers, according to arrangements.

That is further supported by the contention that the Minister of Fisheries and his department must have very strong supervision, which is referred to at page 631 of the Canada Year Book. The responsibilities of the Department of Fisheries are set out very succinctly there. I should like to quote a paragraph which deals with these responsibilities, as follows:

> The chief responsibilities of the Department of Fisheries throughout Canada are, in brief: to conserve and develop Canada's primary fishery resources; to encourage the development of the fishing industry in the national economy; to inspect fish products, establish standards of quality and promote the optimum utilization of the resource; and to develop a proper public understanding of the resource and the industry.

We had indications during the hearings of the fisheries committee that the value of the fishing industry on the Fraser river was some $34,500,000. This is a very important industry and every effort should be made to maintain it properly. I believe the fact that we have two other great rivers in British Columbia—the Columbia which has a potential of some 3 million horsepower and the Peace which has a potential of some 4 million horsepower—should warrant the protection of salmon fishing on the Fraser. The enactment of legislation such as is before us now would force individuals in British Columbia who are interested in developing power, first of all, into using the potentialities of those two rivers. I would suggest that by that time we would possibly not require any further development or utilization of a river such as the Fraser. We have seen the tremendous developments that have gone on in atomic research. At the recent hearings of the research committee it was drawn to our attention that they expect very soon to have the CANDU power unit installed at Rolphton which will be producing some 200,000 kilowatts. First of all I think we should exhaust those rivers, the Columbia and the Peace, and then see what progress is being made on atomic power. At that time it might be possible to take a further look at the Fraser river.

During the proceedings of the committee in 1959, in dealing with this matter of research and what can be done, I was interested in the statements we had from Dr. Pritchard. On questioning him I was particularly interested to find out whether it would be possible to hurry up the process by concentrating perhaps more scientists on this particular problem. He indicated to me that there was in total in the neighbourhood of some 75 scientists and engineers working on the problem and they are spending approximately $3 million on research alone. I think it is fair to say that despite all the engineers, biologists and so forth working on this particular project there had been developed to date no clear-cut and adequate solution to the problem of getting the fish up over the dam and then getting them downstream safely. That, of course, is simplifying the problem.

There have been some statements and arguments that the fisheries people in British Columbia are opposed to the development of hydroelectric power. I think it would be only fair, Mr. Speaker, to reiterate the remarks in the brief that was put out by the fisheries association of British Columbia, dated February 1, 1958. On page 2 of this brief we find the following:

The fisheries association of British Columbia takes this opportunity of stating unequivocally that it is not opposed to the development of hydro power but rather believes that the sources of electricity should and can be developed under careful and judicious planning so that the runs of fish in the salmon bearing rivers will not be obstructed or otherwise harmed. If it could be shown conclusively by the fishery engineers and biologists that those biological problems which will result from the development of hydro sites on fish bearing rivers could be overcome with certainty then, and only then, would we have no objection to the construction of power dams on such rivers. Today, the best advice available from the fishery biologists is that the construction of dams on the diversion of rivers into salmon bearing rivers will create consequential physical and biological problems which will destroy the fish.

In this same brief they go on to make several specific recommendations which I think might be of interest to hon. members. At page 4 they say:

In order to ensure that there will be an ever increasing supply of power available to the industrial and domestic consumers in the province of British Columbia, it would appear advisable that the responsible public authorities should ensure that the following steps be taken to utilize all the natural resources of this country in an orderly, considered program of development:

(a) The development of hydro sites on non-fish bearing streams should receive the first attention of those parties engaged in the production and distribution of electricity. In addition, the public utility companies should ensure that presently developed sites are brought up to maximum production.

(b) The fact that western Canada is endowed with a great wealth of gas, petroleum and coal, thus ensuring an alternate source of energy for the production of power, should be recognized and such alternate sources of energy should be utilized to the fullest in conjunction with the development of hydro sites as previously mentioned.

(c) A responsible agency should cause a province-wide power grid system to be developed with connections to Alberta and the United States, the purpose of this grid system being to enable a local region having a surplus of power, and such a situation exists today, to conveniently transmit such surplus to another region having a shortage. This exchange of surplus power back and forth would ensure that those hydro and thermal sources already developed would be utilized to their fullest advantage.

We believe that if these complementary steps are taken we will find nuclear and atomic sources of power available and feasible in time to meet growing needs for power and avoid destruction of the fishery resource.

I think it is particularly timely that the hon. member has brought up his bill at this moment. Because of the many discussions of power sites in British Columbia, I think the bill, if it should pass, would do an exceedingly great service to British Columbia by serving to concentrate power development on the non-salmon bearing streams, thus ensuring that the fish runs of the Fraser river will be maintained through perpetuity.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am sure not many members of the house will find themselves in disagreement with the principle of this bill which is that nothing should be done by way of placing obstructions in the Fraser that shall damage this great food source. In view of the ever increasing world population and the shortage of food it becomes more important with the passage of time. I think also we should not look at it entirely from the point of view of the value that is there at the present time because this is not only a renewable resource but one which can be vastly increased. A fairly intensive study has been made of this subject by the Fraser river board which was set up for the purpose of studying flood control and hydroelectric power in the Fraser river basin. I should like to refer to two or three statements in that report. At page 142, in dealing with the value of the fishery on the Fraser river—and I think perhaps it may be of interest to the house to have on record something of the value of the British Columbia fishery as a whole and the position of the Fraser river in relation to it—we find the following:

> In addition to the fish taken by Canadian fishermen there was a catch by United States fishermen of salmon of British Columbia origin which at 1957 prices had an average annual value of $15,525,000, of which $13,651,000 was of fish originating in the Fraser river. Therefore, the average annual value of the salmon catch originating in British Columbia waters (1952-55) at 1957 prices was $68,665,000, of which the Fraser river contributed $34,574,000, or 50.3 per cent.

That is, 50.3 per cent of the total fish production of British Columbia. To go over something of the history of the Fraser river it should be noted that it is only in very recent years that we have got anywhere near the potential of the river, because back in 1913 during the construction of the transcontinental railroad, there was a blockage of the stream which to a large extent prevented the fish from getting up to spawn. It is only in very recent years indeed that we have made a little headway in overcoming that problem. The report to which I referred previously reported on that matter as follows:

> The rock obstruction in the Fraser canyon at Hells Gate caused by the construction of a transcontinental railroad in 1913 resulted in a serious blockage to the passage of salmon at certain water levels which decimated the early migrating sockeye runs to the Chilko, Quesnel, Stuart and Nechako systems in subsequent years. The pink salmon run in 1913 was also seriously affected by the obstruction—

The paragraph goes on in that vein. I simply draw it to the attention of the house to show what any obstruction in this river can do to the runs of salmon. In 1945 and 1946 this was partially corrected by fishways which were constructed at Hells Gate where the river had been blocked. The board had the following statement to make in regard to it:

> Since 1946 the commission has been responsible for regulating the commercial fishery for sockeye so as to obtain adequate escapement consistent with the commission's objectives and at the same time divide the allowable catch equally between fishermen of both nations. After removing the obstructions, scientific principles were applied to managing the fishery, the results of which have been outstanding. In two cycles following the completion of the Hells Gate fishways the commercial catch of sockeye increased from 6,478,000 in the period 1947-50 to 18,246,000 in the period 1951-54.

I am sure the house will appreciate the record increase that took place in the production of fish from that river after the obstruction was removed. The report goes on to state further:

> It is expected that the total cyclic catch can be increased to at least 46 million fish when all the runs are fully rehabilitated.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, these runs cannot be rehabilitated if there are going to be obstructions placed in the Fraser river. For that reason I am fully in accord with the bill. I wish to refer to the report made by the fisheries committee in 1959, which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, because I think that the suggestion made by the committee might have been taken into consideration in the bill. The report reads in part as follows:

> Your committee expresses the opinion that no dams should be built on the Fraser river, or any of its tributaries, where such dams will, in the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries, interfere with, or be detrimental to anadromous fish runs.

I think that provision might well have been incorporated in the bill. That could be done, of course, if the bill were referred to a committee for study. However, whether or not that provision is added I certainly am fully in support of the bill and I would recommend it to the house.

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that previous speakers have pointed out the fact that the Fraser river, one of the three great rivers in the province of British Columbia, the other two being the Columbia and the Peace, is the only one of the three that is completely within the province of British Columbia. One feature of the bill that has not been mentioned is the diking or flood control of the river.

As I see the situation, there are three problems, the protection of the salmon, prospective power use and the control of flooding, the last problem being connected in every way with the other two. Hon. members will recall that in the 1948 and 1950 floods very great damage was done in the lower Fraser valley. When I refer to the lower Fraser valley I mean the area from Hope to Vancouver or to the coast, a distance of 100 miles.

After the flood of 1948 work was immediately started to put the dikes into proper shape and it was considered as being completed in 1950. Since then, however, the dikes have been eroded. The current has cut under some of them and at the moment the people of the Fraser valley are very much concerned about what will happen during the next flood.

The boards of trade of Hope, Chilliwack, Agassiz, Mission and Abbotsford are all concerned about this matter and these boards are all represented in the associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley. A great deal of damage was done in that year and the boards of trade, as do many of the residents, feel that now is the time to put these dikes into proper shape. If the dikes go out the Fraser will run rampant and do damage again.

Hon. members may not know that every year there are two dredges working all the time between the mouth of the Chilliwack river where it empties into the Fraser about 12 miles west of Chilliwack and the town of Hope. These dredges work continually year in and year out which is an indication of how much damage is done by rubbish, trees, stumps, sand bars, gravel bars and so on in the river. The river has to be kept open for the transportation of logs from Hope right to the coast. Several companies are involved in this business and it is a great industry in the Fraser valley.

The Fraser river flood control report has suggested dams in places where they will not interfere with the salmon. I believe that the one location that is most suitable for flood control is at Clearwater north of Kamloops on the Thompson river. Apparently this would not damage the fish in any way.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this would be a convenient time to interrupt the hon. member, as it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: I made a suggestion at five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the business of the house. I suggested then that in the view of the government we would like to adjourn tomorrow some time, perhaps tomorrow night, if the house sees fit. We have reduced to a bare minimum the items which we feel should be considered before an adjournment should take place. In answer to the hon. member for Timiskaming, I also said that we on this side were prepared to sit tonight.

With these propositions before the house, the order of business for tomorrow would be as follows: The C.N.R. bill, which it is necessary to complete, the Income Tax Act, which would be carried to the completion of second reading but would not be considered in the committee stage, an appropriation bill for the supply which has already passed through the committee, and interim supply. I said that there might also be a report from the procedure committee, which has been sitting under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker, dealing with certain matters pertaining to divorce. I should like an expression of opinion from the other side of the house with respect to whether that report might be tabled and considered tomorrow or whether under the circumstances non-contentious divorce bills would be considered and passed by the house tomorrow.

I put three propositions before the house for consideration: First, whether or not we should sit tonight; second, whether on the basis of attempting adjournment tomorrow night we might consider the four items of business I have outlined and, third, whether or not the divorce bills should be considered and the non-contentious ones passed or whether the report of the rules committee on that matter should be brought before the house for consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think the second suggestion should be taken first. In so far as that is concerned, I think we would have to say to the house leader that I do not see how it would be possible for the other place to deal with the three matters that are now before us and to complete them by Saturday night if they sat until twelve o'clock. I understood His Honour, the Speaker, to say that the Senate had adjourned until three o'clock tomorrow afternoon. That would leave a very short time in which to deal with (1) the Senate amendments, (2) the industrial development bank bill, and (3) the Coyne matter—

Mr. McIlraith: And the C.N.R. bill.

Mr. Chevrier: —and other matters such as the C.N.R. bill and the bills that would go through the house tomorrow. It is therefore rather difficult for those of us who sit on this side of the chamber to see how they could dispose of those important items of legislation in such a short time. I think that deals with the second item, namely the matter of sitting tonight. I do not think we could give consent to sit tonight.

So far as the non-contentious divorce matters are concerned, I presume that matter would be taken up tomorrow and I would rather rely on the opinion of my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on matters of divorce than give my own opinion on it. But in so far as the items mentioned by the house leader are concerned, namely the C.N.R. bill and the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, may I say that I can see no reason why we could not deal with those tomorrow. However, I should like to get an explanation of two other matters, namely why it is thought necessary to bring in an appropriation act. It has been the custom to bring in an appropriation act when all the estimates have been disposed of, but not when only a portion of the estimates have been disposed of as is the case at the present time.

Finally, in so far as interim supply is concerned, can the house leader indicate how much would be required?

Mr. Churchill: I have just one or two comments to make. As to the activities of the other place, may I say that I am not entirely familiar with their course of procedure. However, I assume that their adjournment which was reported to us this afternoon was based on an understanding of the business which would be coming before them, and I reached the conclusion that they had considered that they would have sufficient time tomorrow in which to deal with these matters. They have no automatic adjournment and can sit just as long as they wish to sit.

The two questions with regard to the appropriation act and interim supply could more appropriately be answered by the Minister of Finance. As I understand it, the appropriation bill is simply to deal with supply which has already been approved by the house for 11 departments. They have gone through committee. The total amount of money there would be summed up in an appropriation bill and would be voted. As to interim supply—and there again the Minister of Finance would be able to give the answer to that question—may I say this. It has been normal for us to ask for two months' supply at a time. Perhaps the house might consider it to be wiser to grant it for a longer period than that. I do not know; it would be up to the house to determine that matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I might accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Laurier that I should make a reference to this matter of divorce, may I say this. It is a well known fact that in our party we regard this matter as one of individual conscience. Any proposition that may be put before the house I am sure will be treated respectfully in that way. I think perhaps I need say no more about that matter.

I have had a word with my hon. friend, while the house leader was speaking, about the proposed appropriation bill. This is an unprecedented suggestion or, while there may be some precedent somewhere, it is certainly an unusual suggestion. I suggest to the government that they should not proceed with this idea for this reason. This appropriation bill will preclude any possibility on the part of the opposition of raising on a subsequent appropriation bill any of the matters connected with all those departments of government where supply has been voted. It seems to me that, after all, the most sacred of all our rights in the opposition is the right of airing grievances before we grant supply. The government will be in no better position after having passed this bill than they were before it was passed. They will have interim supply to last them until such time as we come back. We would feel that the more urgent business of the country should be given priority over a measure of this sort that does not seem to serve any purpose whatsoever. As for the interim supply, when the Minister of Finance indicates what his desires are in that matter I am sure my friend the Leader of the Opposition will be prepared to give his views on the matter.

Mr. Churchill: With regard to the appropriation bill may I say this. I will take into consideration with my colleagues the suggestion made from the other side. It may be possible to meet their wishes in that regard. May we hear from the C.C.F. with regard to these proposals or certainly with regard to the divorce bills?

Mr. Howard: I think the thoughts of the C.C.F. were expressed by the hon. member for Timiskaming with regard to sitting this evening and looking towards recessing or adjourning tomorrow. That possibility of sitting in the evening does not exist now.

As to the question of divorce, this is a latter reference of the minister and I understand it involves a report of a committee under your chairmanship, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be unwise now to make any comment on the contents of that report, as it has not yet been presented to the house. Perhaps this is something we can approach tomorrow.

It being 10 minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

R.C.A.F. EXPENDITURES AND PERSONNEL, LOWER MAINLAND, B.C.

Question No. 276—Mr. Regier:

1. What have been the expenditures of the Royal Canadian Air Force for the lower mainland of British Columbia for each of the last four fiscal years?

2. How many members of the (a) regular, (b) reserve, R.C.A.F. were stationed in this area as of March 31 of each of the past four years?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. 1957-58, $7,752,640; 1958-59, $6,721,990; 1959-60, $7,654,425; 1960-61, $7,422,400.

2.	(a)	(b)
1957-58	1,100	789
1958-59	910	659
1959-60	941	577

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, July 8, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present in English and in French the first report of the special committee appointed this session to consider procedure. This committee, in accordance with the recommendations of a similar committee appointed last session, has considered the procedural problem involved in bills for the annulment and dissolution of marriage and presents for the consideration of the house its unanimous report on this subject.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCES TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JULY 7

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday, in criticizing the position of this party with regard to the Bank of Canada Act the Prime Minister, and I quote from this morning's Hansard—this is the first chance I have had to read Hansard—said as recorded on page 7687:

> When this matter was discussed on February 21, 1961, the Leader of the Opposition said on that occasion:
> "There is nothing a government is in a position to do . . . except to ask parliament to change the legislation or await the expiry of the term."

Those words were used on that day, and they will be found on page 2264 of Hansard. But they were used by the Minister of Finance, not by myself.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I rise at once to say to the hon. gentleman that in the course of reading the quotations I made that mistake. The hon. gentleman has been very reasonable about the matter, but if he was disturbed by it he ought to realize how much more disturbed the Minister of Finance was to see words spoken by him ascribed to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to make reference to some errors in Hansard of yesterday and to refer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in particular. Errors happen when Hansard is pressed, as it is at this time. At page 7686 of Hansard for yesterday I am reported as having said:

> Hon. members may wonder what I was quoting from. Well, I was quoting the immoral words of the member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the Prime Minister quoted those words with approval.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am making reference to the word "immoral".

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the occasion of my remark.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to make it clear that the word should be "immortal".

I refer now generally to the portion from the beginning of the paragraph immediately preceding, which in part reads:

> I think it is always of interest to know what are the principles which should actuate a public servant—

Down to the words:

> —one way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard.

Those words were, of course, quoted from the hon. gentleman's speech but have not been placed in quotation marks, as will be appropriately done in the corrected Hansard.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister leaves that subject I wonder whether he could tell me—I have not had time to look and am asking merely for information—whether he was quoting a press report or the text of my speech. I am not quarrelling with it, as I have not had time to read it, but I doubt if it is "immortal".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I think it is now. I was quoting from the Ottawa Citizen of that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the Prime Minister would think it is now immortal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is one reference I should like to make to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, a good and long time friend of mine, because I would not want anyone to misunderstand my words as they appear at the bottom of page 7720 of Hansard for yesterday. That hon. gentleman had been interrupting me—

Mr. Benidickson: I had risen on a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and at the bottom of that page I used the word "sober". I should like to assure the hon. gentleman and anyone else reading this that the significance of the word "sober", as I used it, is in the sense—I have to be careful now that another matter is before the Senate—of sober second thoughts, and with no other connotation in mind. Immediately following my use of that word the hon. member is reported as having said:

This is not a sober judgment on your part.

That indicates that he understood my use of that word in the way I meant it. I want it generally understood that is what was meant, as I would not want to say anything to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentleman or any other member of this house.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the consultations which he announced some days ago he was having with the government of the United States in respect to the recommendations of the O'Leary commission report are completed, and whether the government will soon be in a position to make a decision in regard to those recommendations.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house will realize that in the last ten days or so all of us have been very pressed. I have not had the opportunity to look into that matter in recent days. However, I shall do so and will let the house know.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, or in his absence to his parliamentary secretary. Can the minister or his parliamentary secretary inform the house whether there are any new developments in the T.C.A. dispute? Is the labour department doing its utmost to prevent discontinuance of the service?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday in reply to the hon. member for Skeena.

(Translation):

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF BILINGUAL SIGNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that new bilingual signs have recently appeared at various places in the House of Commons building to replace the former unilingual signs, could the minister inform the house whether it is his intention to have such work completed in all government buildings.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane for giving me notice of his question. Following a suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, instructions were given for a revision of all signs in the parliament buildings. My department is now in the process of replacing all the former unilingual signs with bilingual ones, thus correcting an anomaly that the Liberals had never noticed in their 22 years of office.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I be permitted to ask the Minister of Public Works a supplementary question. On whose authority was the word "men" translated "messieurs"?

Mr. Walker: That is an interesting question. I knew the hon. member would think along the lines of the wash room. This has been recently corrected, and if he will notice he will find that the French sign on the door of each of the wash rooms is correct. That should satisfy even the sensibilities of the most precious flower of the House of Commons.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOLIVIA—REPORTED BOMBING OF CANADIAN CHURCH PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if his attention has been drawn to the bombing of certain church and other property in Bolivia owned by the Canadian Oblate fathers. Can the minister say whether any representations are being made in this matter by the government, and if the diplomatic mission of any other country, possibly that of the United Kingdom, is being used on Canada's behalf in this regrettable incident?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, according to press and radio reports a radio station operated by Canadian Oblate missionaries in Bolivia was bombed during labour troubles three days ago. The Canadian ambassador designate to La Paz, Mr. Alfred Pick, who is our ambassador to Peru, will be presenting his letters of credence next week and will be in a position to report on this incident. In the meantime the Department of External Affairs has communicated with the British embassy in Bolivia to ascertain the facts. Until now there is no evidence that the lives of Canadian missionaries have been endangered.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether the report is correct that the bombing has taken place at the insistence of and by groups who are supporters of the communist party in Bolivia?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to comment on that at the moment.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries a question, notice of which I sent to him a few minutes ago. Can the minister advise whether he is yet in a position to inform the house if an extension of the lobster season is to be granted in district 6B? I may say such extension has been requested unanimously by the fishermen concerned.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the situation in this district is being watched carefully. By Monday or Tuesday I hope to have up to date figures on the production in that area available to me, and at that time a decision will be made whether or not there will be an extension.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF VISITING BOY SCOUTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. No doubt the Prime Minister has noticed in the gallery a large number of Scouts from Canada and the United States, and I wonder whether he would care to say a word of welcome to them.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more than that those who belong to that great organization, the Boy Scouts, do much for the building of good citizenship in all the countries in which scouting has a place. We are indeed happy to have with us the representatives of scouting in these two countries who have come here on the occasion of this general gathering. To them and through them to their respective groups I extend the warmest of greetings and the appreciation of all Canadians for what being a scout does toward the making of that type of citizenship which is the aim and purpose of all of us.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope we on this side may be permitted to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister in the welcome he has given. There is no organization, national or international, which does more for the production of good citizenship.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in extending greetings and a hearty welcome with a full appreciation of the work that this organization is doing on a world-wide basis for youth everywhere.

FINANCE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO TERMS OF REFERENCE AND MEMBERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance based on his announcement in the budget of the decision of the government to appoint a royal commission to examine Canada's financial structure and institutions. Has the government settled the terms of reference, and when may we expect an announcement of the membership of the commission?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): In due course, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR LIST OF OUTSTANDING RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as we are coming, we are told, near the adjournment of the session, I wonder if I could ask the Secretary of State whether he would be good enough to see if it would be possible to furnish us in the next day or two with the usual list of orders for returns to which returns have not yet been made, so that it would be available for the convenience of hon. members in their work?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I will try my best, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PREMIER BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the member for Kootenay West had the opportunity for a conversation with Premier Bennett of British Columbia during his visit to Ottawa, did the premier extend the same opportunity to the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I had no conversation with Premier Bennett during his recent visit to Ottawa. I understand he was kept rather busy, being otherwise engaged and having come to Ottawa for rather different purposes than to discuss Columbia river financing.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. Is the minister yet in a position to table, as I believe has not been done so far, the most recent correspondence he has had with the premier of British Columbia?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the tabling of that correspondence. I have not been asked to table it previously. Consequently I have no consent to table from Premier Bennett. If the house wishes that consent to be obtained, I certainly have no objection.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir, many hon. members would be most interested in seeing the rapid progress that is being made in these Columbia negotiations, and I would hope that on this occasion the minister would take advantage of the facilities of the telephone or telegraph instead of the post, so that we may hope to have this correspondence before we adjourn.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the matter is regarded by the hon. gentleman as one of such urgency perhaps I may be permitted to express surprise that he has not put a notice of motion for the production of the papers on the order paper in these recent weeks, because I announced to the house some weeks ago that this correspondence had occurred.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the minister has chosen to make this observation, I might point out that if he will look back in Hansard he will find the question was raised by one of my colleagues the other day, and I understood at that time the minister was seeking permission of the premier of British Columbia.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I point out that I was not asked to obtain it. A question was asked about the correspondence and I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, that no hon. member had seen fit to ask that the necessary consent be sought in order that the correspondence could be tabled.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

GHANA—REQUEST FOR ENGINEERING ASSISTANCE ON VOLTA DAM CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the President of Ghana requested Canada to provide engineering assistance in connection with the building of the Volta dam?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I believe a couple of days ago the President of the United States, in a letter to Mr. Nkrumah, expressed the view that the financing of this great project was now in such a position that there was hope it could proceed shortly. Some days ago, I would say to the hon. member for High Park, President Nkrumah communicated with me and asked whether there was available in Canada an outstanding engineer whose qualifications would fit him to head the Volta river authority in Ghana. This was quite a tribute, I thought, to the international reputation of Canadian hydro engineers.

At the present time, as the hon. gentleman knows, the high commissioner for Ghana is meeting with various persons with a view to ascertaining whether or not there is available such a person as might meet the needs of Ghana. I hope he will be successful. We have some engineers who would be only too glad to undertake the responsibility provided they could be freed of their Canadian responsibilities, if only for the period necessary for the construction of the dam.

NATIONAL PARKS

TERRA NOVA—INVITATION TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC TO ATTEND OPENING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might put a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and in doing so thank the minister for his courtesy in inviting me to attend the opening of Terra Nova national park next Saturday. The question I want to put to the minister is, has he thought of sending an invitation to his predecessor, who is now the premier of Quebec, and who was the founder of that park which has been such a blessing to Newfoundland as sources of employment and for the amenities it has provided?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that we have given consideration to inviting all the persons who are presently interested in Terra Nova national park.

(Translation):

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR PAID HOLIDAYS TO PART TIME EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General? Did the Postmaster General discuss recently with the Secretary of State the question of granting part time postal employees annual leave with pay, and, if so, would he care to inform the house of the results of the discussion?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker, there were no discussions recently on the matter. However, I answered a quite similar question ten days ago, I think.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-121, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of July, 1961 to the 30th day of June, 1962 and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think there is probably little that I can usefully say concerning this measure on this motion for second reading. The matter was considered in committee at the resolution stage on July 6, and I think the necessary explanations were given at that time.

Bill No. C-121 follows precisely the terms of the resolution. That resolution was in what has become something of a standard form. It is the same form as was used last year, with the addition of one clause which becomes necessary this year for special reasons which I explained at the committee stage. Since the resolution was reported and the bill given first reading the report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government was tabled in the house yesterday and is available to all hon. members.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made another short statement in connection with the second reading of this bill, but neither he nor the Minister of Transport has answered the questions which we put to them at the resolution stage. At that time we made it quite clear that we would object strenuously to the passage of this measure until we knew who the new directors of the Canadian National Railways were going to be and what was the status and position of the president.

After all, sir, the bill to increase the number of directors of the C.N.R. from seven to 12 was passed many weeks ago, and I think the house is entitled to know, by virtue of the doctrine enunciated by the Prime Minister in another debate yesterday, who these directors are going to be, when parliament is being asked to authorize the expenditure of vast sums of money by the Canadian National Railways. Notwithstanding the statement made by the Minister of Finance, no information has been given to us in that regard.

There was another complaint made from this side of the house. It had to do with the custom and practice concerning this refinancing bill for the C.N.R., namely that it should not have been introduced until the report of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping had been made. When the resolution was introduced that report had not been made. It has now been tabled. Again I repeat, this only points up the disorder and the delay on the part of the government in organizing the business of the house. The business of the house with reference to committees has been so badly organized that it was not possible for this important committee to meet until the dying days of the session, whereas the custom has been over the years for the committee dealing with the annual reports of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. to meet much earlier. As I indicated on a previous occasion, the committee has met in March and April but rarely, in my recollection, has that committee met as late as June, save and except when the parliamentary session was late in beginning its deliberations. I shall come to that matter again at a later stage.

The bill which is now before us and for which second reading is sought seeks to authorize the Canadian National Railways to meet certain expenditures for the period January 1, 1961 to June 30, 1962; next, to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities issued by the Canadian National Railways. That provision was broken down into six parts by the minister when he introduced the resolution. I will not go into all of those, but I should like to make a general reference to them.

The first purpose sought by this measure is to authorize the C.N.R. to incur capital expenditures not exceeding $179 million, roughly speaking, during the calendar year 1961; next, to authorize the company to make prior to July 1, 1962 such capital expenditures as may be necessary to discharge obligations incurred under the 1961 act. Third, the purpose to be served by the bill is to authorize the railways to enter into contracts prior to July 1, 1962 for new equipment.

There are also three other provisions in the resolution which have been referred to by the minister. They have to do with the capital revision of the Canadian National Railways. They have to do more particularly with extending provisions which were contained in enactments recommended by the previous royal commission on transportation way back in 1950, the Turgeon commission. They deal first with the intention on the part of the government to proceed with the re-examination and revision of the capital structure of the railway company prior to December 31, 1961. I should like to quote the minister's words, which are to be found at page 7640 of Hansard of July 6, 1961:

> However, since the complete report of the royal commission on transportation has not yet been received it was considered advisable to make provision in the 1961 act for a one-year extension of the present capital structure.

The minister went on to say:

> As the president of the C.N.R. indicated in the recent hearings before the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, the capital structure is at present under study. This review will be continued in the light of the complete report of the royal commission once it has been received.

The report of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, which was tabled yesterday by the vice-chairman of that committee, contains one passage which I think should be brought to the attention of the house in this respect. It is the one entitled "Deficits", and it reads as follows:

> The committee noted with concern Mr. Gordon's evidence to the effect that consideration was given to asking the government of Canada to take over from $700 million to $900 million of the railways debt structure.
> This proposal has two unusual aspects: (1) the royal commission of 1950 dealt at length with debt problems of the C.N.R., recommending an alleviation which was carried out in 1952; (2) a most recent royal commission has completed its hearings without any evidence by the C.N.R. on the need for another debt revision. In the light of this, the committee suggests that the government examine such a proposition with great care.

There seems to be a difference between the statement made by the minister on the resolution and the recommendation made by the committee, and I wonder if the minister when he closes the debate would deal with this aspect of the matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder if the hon. gentleman would be good enough to enlarge on that point so I might follow him more clearly. I should be glad to comment on it if I can, but I am not too clear as to where he finds any difference.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to do so as I go along. I am a member of this committee, but because of the debates on other matters which took place in this house I did not attend the meetings at which this report was prepared and drafted. Incidentally, in passing, I think those members who sit on this side of the house would wish to extend to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) our commendation for the manner in which he carried on as chairman of that committee. Not only did he deal objectively with a committee which might well have brought in recommendations which could have caused serious concern to the national railways, but he dealt with the affairs of the committee in an orderly and efficient manner.

I should like also to say a word of felicitation to the vice-chairman, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) who, when the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe unfortunately fell ill, carried on, particularly with the meeting having to do with the report. I am sure the members on this side of the house would wish me to extend to him our commendation. I should also like to say to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that we hope he will be quickly and completely restored to health.

Having said that, I come to the matter of the revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. The house will remember that in 1951 the Turgeon royal commission made certain recommendations, most of which were afterwards adopted by the government of the day, dealing with the capital structure of that company. These recommendations may be found at page 196 of the report and I have no intention of reading them, because they are lengthy. They can be seen by anyone who is interested. The Canadian National Railways had asked for these recommendations, or at least had made representations directed towards these recommendations, and the government saw fit to implement them.

I gather from the statements which the minister made during consideration of this matter on July 6 that the revision of the Canadian National Railways capital structure was under consideration by the government at the suggestion of the C.N.R. and, further, that the matter was also under consideration by the royal commission on transportation. The committee report indicates, in a statement which I have already put on the record, that no evidence has been submitted to the royal commission by the C.N.R. on the need for another debt revision. While I take it that the terms of reference of the present royal commission, the MacPherson royal commission, are broad enough to deal with capital revision, I take it also that the commission would not deal with this subject unless representations had been made by the Canadian National Railways.

That is why I have indicated to the minister that I think there is a difference, slight though it may be, between the statement made by the minister and the recommendation which has been made by the committee, and I would ask the minister to clarify the position. Has the Canadian National Railways (1) made representations to the government having to do with this capital structure because of the loss of traffic and the debt position? (2) Has the government come to any decision with respect to a capital revision and, (3) has the government asked the royal commission on transportation to deal specifically with this matter on behalf of the Canadian National Railways? Since the royal commission has not yet handed down its second, and probably third, reports it may well be that if the government gives some instruction to the royal commission it will want to bring in a recommendation.

It is true, or I take it that it is true from the statement made in the report of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, that no evidence was submitted by the C.N.R. to the royal commission, so I think the house should have from the minister a statement in connection with the whole matter. In the committee the Canadian National Railways made it clear that the position of the railways was very serious, and that the government was giving the matter consideration. Thus I think in the light of the report by the committee, and in the light of the reports of the royal commission still to be handed down, we should be given some indication by the minister of what the over-all picture is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister for that interjection. I pass on to another matter which I think is of importance to the house. The other day when I spoke on the resolution I said the government had no right to bring in a measure of this nature until we in this parliament knew who the directors of the Canadian National were going to be, and until parliament knew who the president of the C.N.R. was going to be.

Now, sir, for more than nine months the president of the C.N.R. and some of the directors of the C.N.R. have been carrying on from day to day with their services being continued on sufferance and, to use a brutal expression, not knowing when their heads were going to be chopped off. This is a situation which I do not think should be allowed to continue under a free parliament such as we have in this country. How can any enterprise be well managed amid such uncertainty? There is no group of shareholders in any corporation who would stand for this kind of conduct for one moment. How can the affairs of any corporation, whether it be a private corporation or a public corporation, be properly administered and carried on if the shareholders do not know what kind of directors it is going to have, what their competence is and what their business ability—

Mr. Benidickson: With $700 million expenditure.

Mr. Chevrier: —is in administering, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River points out, the affairs of a corporation, particularly this one having to do with the expenditure of some $700 million or more? I submit hon. members of this house are entitled to have that information.

Backbenchers on the government side of this house have sniped and snarled repeatedly at the president of the Canadian National Railways when he was not here. The president of the Progressive Conservative association in the other house has suggested, and it has been repeated by the press all across the country, that the Canadian National Railways management is going to be divided into two parts, one head having to do with the management and the other having to do with the chairmanship of the board of directors. If that is going to be the policy of the government; if one half of the responsibilities of the C.N.R. is going to be taken away from the president of the C.N.R., we should know about it.

The friends of the government have sought to undermine the management of the C.N.R. They have called the president a dictator and many other names, yet the government has put up no defence. The Minister of Finance is not chiefly responsible for the administration of this corporation and I shall leave my reference to him to one side for the moment. However, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport have not at any time risen in this house to defend the president or the directors of the Canadian National Railways. The only member who did so was the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who at one time rose to say that he was not going to sit in his seat in the light of his experience in this house and allow those charges to be made without any answer.

The Minister of Transport, I regret to say, is not in his seat at the moment. I am sure he is busily engaged on matters concerning the affairs of the country. However, he or the Prime Minister should have risen in this house to give some indication of the position of the government, and in defence against the charges of arbitrary conduct and dictatorship on the part of the president and directors of the C.N.R.

However, yesterday in another debate the Prime Minister said there can be only one sovereignty in this country. No one for a moment would disagree with that affirmation. We on this side of the house agree that there can be only one sovereignty in this country. The Liberal party takes the position that parliament alone is sovereign in matters of this kind, and that the will of parliament must in the last analysis prevail. The Prime Minister seems to think that he is parliament and that parliament must accept his say so, because we are refused information, at the moment we are being asked to vote huge sums of money, as to who the directors are going to be who will spend and administer this money, and who the president is going to be who will be responsible for the direction and administration of this corporation. It is suggested that we must accept the Prime Minister's say so because he refuses to tell parliament who the head of this institution is going to be and who its directors are going to be.

The Prime Minister asks us in effect, and this is the long and short of it, to rubber stamp and authorize unknown men to spend millions of dollars of public funds. No doubt when parliament is adjourned he can then thumb through the long list of defeated Tory candidates and other friends of the party and hand out these kinds of plums, such as the C.N.R. directorships.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is not as long as the Liberal list.

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as the Canadian National Railways is concerned, I need not repeat what I said the other day when I put on the record the Conservative list; but if the same practice is going to be followed in the appointment of the new directors as was followed in the appointment of the old, there is no doubt that the Prime Minister is going to take out his list and make use of it on this occasion.

Even more important than that is the fact that here we have the president of a large corporation who is still on sufferance and does not know from day to day what is going to happen to him or to his position. I say that parliament should be told what is the position. Let this government remember what it used to say when it was in opposition. When it was in opposition it used to say that government is the servant of parliament, not its master, and that parliament should not be asked to vote large sums of money—or sums of money no matter how large or small—without knowing who is going to spend it. We have a position exactly similar to that which was taken by those individuals who are now in the treasury benches, who said when on this side of the house that they wanted to know who was going to spend this money. We say that we should not authorize the expenditure of one cent of the public's money until we know who those individuals are who will spend it.

If the government has lost confidence in the president of the Canadian National Railways it is not obliged to reappoint him, but it should let us know. The government should tell us whether his successor is to be a competent person who has the business ability to run a railway. The government should also tell us whether the directors who will be appointed as a result of the increase in number from seven to 12, as well as those present directors who will be reappointed, are men who are competent and capable of administering the millions of dollars of public funds which will be spent for the railway.

What is the attitude of the Prime Minister, sir? His attitude is that this is not the business of parliament, and that all we are here to do is to rubber stamp the government's bills and then go home. Why can the government not make up its mind in this regard, as it has not been able to make up its mind in regard to so many other matters? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this cat and mouse game, this treatment of public servants, is what is demoralizing the public service of this country more than anything else. That is why there has been such an exodus of public servants from Ottawa since 1957. I do not suggest, sir, that all of them have left exclusively because of the way the government has treated them, but there is an amazing list, and I should like to put on the record some of those individuals who have gone.

There is Mr. Clarence Shepherd, former chairman of the board of transport commissioners; Mr. Hector McKinnon, former chairman of the tariff board; Mr. George McIvor, former chief commissioner of the board of grain commissioners; Mr. Davidson Dunton, former chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Mr. Allan Jarvis, former director of the national gallery; Mr. W. J. Bennett, former president of Eldorado and Atomic Energy of Canada; Mr. Mitchell Sharpe, former deputy minister of trade and commerce; Mr. Charles Gavsie, former president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority; Mr. Jean C. Lessard, former vice-president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, and Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, who while he has not been affected or has not gone has certainly been slapped in the face by the recommendation of the committee on broadcasting. Is that the way, sir, to treat public servants? Is this the way in which to deal—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Laurier is going a little too far in this respect, because this could easily turn into a completely irrelevant debate if we were to discuss the number of public servants who have left the service. I appreciate that the hon. member may mention it in passing, but he is now doing more than that.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I say to you with deference that I am building up an analogy with the position of the president and directors of the Canadian National Railways, and I am saying that the manner in which the president and the directors of the C.N.R. are being treated is analogous to the manner in which 10 or 12, in fact 20 others that I could put on the record have been treated. I am not dealing with the others, save to mention them in passing, and I submit to you with deference that I have the right to do that. What about the position of the under secretary of state? I asked questions of the Prime Minister on that and he knew absolutely nothing about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May we have the rules of order observed?

Mr. Pickersgill: More gagging of parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member tried yesterday to prevent me from making a proper statement in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier indicated that he wanted to establish an analogy between the case of the directors of the C.N.R. and other public servants who have left the service or who are going to leave it, but now he discusses each case in detail. This is what he has been doing with regard to the president of the C.B.C. Now he is discussing the case of the under secretary of state. This is where I think he is going too far.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing each case. I disagree with you respectfully. I have put these 12 names on the record and I was going on to build up an analogy between them and others. If I were to discuss the cases seriatim I could spend many minutes on each one but, as I said a moment ago, I do not intend to do that. But what I do intend to do is to draw an analogy between the treatment of the president and directors of the C.N.R. and other public servants, and to establish a fact which I think is unchallengeable, that there is great uneasiness in the public service today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just a reign of terror.

Mr. Chevrier: I had stated a moment ago the position—

Mr. Hellyer: A terrible reign.

Mr. Chevrier: —of the under secretary of state and the reply—

An hon. Member: Talk about the seaway.

Mr. Chevrier: —which the Prime Minister gave to me on that occasion. This prompted Le Droit to write an editorial on July 5, a very recent editorial, entitled:

(Translation):

An alarming exodus.

(Text):

The first sentence reads as follows:

(Translation):

Mr. Charles Stein's resignation from the Secretary of State department is most unfortunate.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In defiance of your ruling the hon. member is proceeding now to try to make something out of the resignation of Mr. Charles Stein. His letter was read in this house some days ago, and the reasons for that resignation were given by him in his own letter, indicating that he considered he had been well used and was leaving to enter private practice. Is the hon. member now to be permitted to discuss this case? What has the resignation of the under secretary of state to resume the practice of law to do with a bill relating to the financing and guaranteeing of the financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways? We could go around the whole spectrum of the public service if that were the case.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order which the Minister of Finance has smuggled in, to use his own word, for the purpose of making his own speech about this matter and indicating the government's point of view, that, of course, is just what we have witnessed for days in this house when the minister alone was allowed to give evidence. But I am not dealing with that; I am dealing with the minister's point of order. Before he heard whether or not what my hon. friend had to say was relevant to the matter, merely because someone's name was mentioned the minister presumed to anticipate his arguments. Now, surely in this free assembly it is for us on both sides of the house to decide what arguments we consider are valid to make our points, and no hon. member should be interrupted by the most arrogant of ministers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that he is doing exactly what he is reproaching the minister for doing.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am considering a point of order now. I indicated my view previously, and I think really that the hon. member for Laurier is going too far. I do not mind him mentioning cases, but now he intends to go on and discuss each case in detail. When he started to discuss the case of Mr. Ouimet he added something which to me was irrelevant, and he was proceeding to do the same thing with regard to the under secretary of state. I do not mind his building up an analogy, as he said, but to discuss each case in detail is certainly not necessary for his analogy, nor is it relevant to the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order for two purposes. First I should like to say that I think the treatment—and I say this to you with great respect—having to do with the application of the rules of the house should be meted out to hon. members on both sides of the house with equal fairness. I am not saying that is not the case at the moment. What I am saying is that when a point of order is raised by a minister there is a tendency not to give those of us who sit on this side of the house an opportunity to deal with that point in the manner in which it should be dealt with.

The next thing that I should like to deal with is the minister's statement when he raised his point of order to interrupt my mention of the under secretary of state. He said that the matter had been settled because—

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say it had been settled.

Mr. Chevrier: All right. Let me put it this way, that it had been dealt with—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: —by the Prime Minister reading into the record the letter of resignation of the under secretary of state. He said he considered he was well used. Well, I am not going to sit in this house and accept that statement. I do not believe that such letter, any more than many of the other letters that hon. ministers on the other side of the house have received, is necessarily an indication at all of the good treatment which those public servants have received. But I do believe this—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do believe that when distinguished public servants have to leave either because of the treatment that is being meted out to them—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Chevrier: —because of the fact—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier: I have the floor, and unless I am told by the Speaker I will not sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think a question of privilege may intervene when a point of order is being discussed, but I will hear the hon. member later on. However, at this point I just ask the hon. member for Laurier not to discuss at too great length the facts when dealing with the point of order. I should like him to point out exactly what is his point of order in relation to the point that he is now discussing, because he will realize that we are going to have a debate within a debate if we continue in this way.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, the second matter with which I was dealing and which goes to the root of the point of order is the right of any member of parliament to make a comparison between the treatment of one public servant and the treatment meted out to another. I was proposing to do that by indicating that notwithstanding the letter showed that the public servant was—

An hon. Member: Happy.

Mr. Carter: Well used.

Mr. Chevrier: —well used, as the minister stated, there is a reason for such a letter being written, and I know it too well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the point which the hon. member for Laurier is making, but I think he is discussing the ruling of the Chair. I will agree with him, however, that the Minister of Finance should not have taken the opportunity when he rose on the point of order to explain why the under secretary of state is leaving, but I must say with all due deference to the hon. member for Laurier that he had started to discuss in detail the case of the under secretary of state and now he is continuing to do so. That is exactly the danger in a case like this. If the hon. member for Laurier wants to build an argument he does not need to discuss each case in detail, because if he does that the result will be that we will be discussing this problem which is a side issue to the present bill. There is no doubt about that.

I am not telling the hon. member that he cannot make a comparison. I am not saying that these matters cannot be discussed in the house, but the most difficult problem for the Chair recently and in fact throughout the whole session has been that hon. members seem to want to discuss things when it is not the proper time to do so. If the Chair has no co-operation from all sides of the house, and I am not pointing to any side in particular, I think it is going to be very difficult to conduct an orderly debate and be fair to everybody. I assure the hon. member for Laurier that the Chair has only one intention, to be fair and to give equal treatment to all. But the Chair will not be able to do that if there is no co-operation.

Mr. Valade: On the point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Mary will agree, I think, that the Chair has made a ruling now and that this point of order has been sufficiently discussed.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, this arises from another issue which the hon. member for Laurier mentioned before. He has referred to a list of civil service employees who have left the employ of the government. As you have just said, Mr. Speaker, if this latitude is granted to one member advantage could be taken of it by other members. Will we also be allowed in this debate to mention the names of civil servants who left—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair will make a decision when the time arises.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rose on a question of privilege because after you had made your ruling the hon. member for Laurier proceeded to bring out the argument that he had ready in the first place. It seemed to me that it was an infringement of the privileges of the members of the house that he should depart so far from the ruling with irrelevancies of the nature he was discussing.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely sorry that I have offended the sensibilities of the Solicitor General and prompted him to rise on a question of privilege. Apparently the Solicitor General is a little embarrassed by this list. Apparently the Solicitor General is embarrassed not only by the list but by the treatment that is being meted out by himself and his colleagues to prominent members of the public service of Canada. Otherwise he would not have objected. It seems to me that the Solicitor General should not be nearly so sensitive. After all, if there is no objection there is nothing to hide, and surely the government should have no objection to allowing me to make a comparison between the treatment meted out to the C.N.R. directors and president and that meted out to some of the members of the public service.

Mr. Pickersgill: They do not like to be reminded of the heads that have rolled.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Tell the truth, do not be a hypocrite.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: It appears, Mr. Speaker, that what I am saying is not very palatable to those who sit on the other side of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is so unfair.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: We find hypocrites amusing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have heard a term which is certainly not parliamentary. I do not know whether it was directed at a member of the house, but if that is the case, or in any event, I would ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) to indicate that he was not referring to an hon. member of the house.

Mr. Johnson: There are many hypocrites who criticize when they are in the opposition but do worse things when they are in office. The little brothers of the hon. member for Laurier in Quebec are an example among others.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Johnson: They are hypocrites and pharisees.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the other day when I used a similar expression with respect to the Minister of Finance I was called to order at once and I had to withdraw it. I think the inference here is quite clear.

(Translation):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I asked the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to make things quite clear, and he answered that he was not referring to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). But I do not know whether he was referring to other hon. members, and in that case, I would ask him to make it quite clear that the term did not apply to any member of this house.

Mr. Johnson: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should return to my seat, because I am not now at my regular desk. If you will allow me, I shall return there. Otherwise, I might be called to order.

If Your Honour will allow, the hon. member for Laurier, with his usual and acknowledged ability, tried to relate the discussion to Ottawa. I was speaking of pharisees and hypocrites in Quebec, not in this house. I was speaking of the Liberal hypocrites in Quebec, not in Ottawa.

Mr. Deputy Speaker. Order.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, this is a diversionary tactic such as we have become accustomed to in the house. I now return to the article which appeared in Le Droit on July 5, and I should like to read one paragraph having to do with the resignation of the under secretary of state.

(Translation):

The resignation of Mr. Charles Stein, the under secretary of state, is most unfortunate. Not only does it cause consternation but it increases the unrest which was already great following the recent resignation of high public officials.

The present government should do a serious self-examination. It should ask itself whether it is not at least partly responsible for that exodus, and if all the changes that have been made or which are forthcoming are likely to reinforce government administration and serve the interests of the Canadian people.

(Text):

What I want to do, Mr. Speaker, is to compare the attitude taken by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport in connection with the directors of the C.N.R. and the attitude taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he was minister of public works. In 1957 and 1958, when it was suggested repeatedly that heads were going to roll in the Department of Public Works, he rose in this house and without the slightest hesitation made it quite clear that in so far as he was concerned the officers of his department had his confidence, that the heads of the officers of his department were not going to roll, that the officers of his department were administering the affairs of that department with efficiency, and that he had perfect confidence in them. I think he even went one step further and said that in so far as he was concerned all government servants were of the same calibre.

Why can we not have a repetition of that now? What has happened in the period between 1957-58 and 1961 to bring about such a change of attitude on the part of the government and its supporters? We feel it in the air. We see it in the reports of committees. We see what goes on in this house. On the part of those who sit on the other side of the house there seems to be a tendency to challenge the efficiency and loyalty of those men and women who are in the public service of Canada. The time has come to obtain a fresh outlook—

Mr. Macdonnell: What evidence is there of that?

Mr. Chevrier: What is that?

Mr. Macdonnell: Can you adduce any evidence of any kind for what you are saying?

Mr. Pickersgill: Look at the heads that have rolled.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me deal with the statement of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). He says, what evidence is there? Why did he rise in the House of Commons the other day to defend the president of Canadian National Railways after members of his own party rose and attacked him? The hon. member did so because the government did not have the courage or the decency—the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport —to support these public servants who have rendered a great service to Canada.

There are other very clear indications. When I am asked to produce evidence, I may say there is a difference between evidence that is produced in a court, as has been said so often from the other side of the house, and extraneous evidence. There exists a good deal of extraneous evidence to the effect that members of the public service feel themselves thwarted and frustrated, and feel uncertain in so far as their future position is concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: To show how unfair it is to adduce the names in this list, I point out that included in the list is Mr. Hector McKinnon. Mr. Hector McKinnon, as is well known, reached the end of his service, retired and had to be persuaded by the Minister of Finance to come back into the service to assist in the negotiations at Geneva. Second, we are asked to believe that a letter which was read in this house the other day from a public servant, giving a reasonable reason for his going back to private practice, was not true. Does this make sense, all this kind of talk?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member has asked me a question, and I am going to answer his question. The first question had to do with this long list. I did not say that all those people were dismissed or fired.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell: That was the innuendo.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, now, my hon. friend either was not in the house or he did not hear what I had to say. I have the notes of what I had to say right here. Here is what I said. That is why there has been such an exodus of public servants from Ottawa since 1957. I do not say that all of them left exclusively because of the way the government treated them, but listen to the list of those who have left. Then I read that list without any comment whatever.

Mr. Macdonnell: Including the name of Mr. Hector McKinnon, and in his case the hon. member had every opportunity of knowing that there was no reason for his inclusion in that list.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not believe I need to add anything, save and except to say that it was quite clear that Mr. Hector McKinnon, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said, was maligned on more than one occasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, to say that is utterly untrue. No member of this house, either in this present parliament or any previous parliament, has ever spoken in more glowing terms of praise and admiration of Mr. Hector McKinnon than I have.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has risen on a point of order, but I would say we have heard this same hon. gentleman malign Mr. McKinnon by accusing him of disregarding the law of Canada for ten years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has never been a more false statement made in this house than that one.

Mr. Pickersgill: We listened to it over and over again.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to deal with the other point, having answered the first question asked by my hon. friend. I should like now to deal with the point he raised with regard to the letter of the under secretary of state. Hon. members know very well that when a public servant leaves the service of the government of Canada, either to go back to private practice—and particularly in order to go back to private practice—or to go into some other field, he is not going to write letters other than of the kind which was written by the under secretary of state; because he has to practise law in his community, and he will probably have to come back to Ottawa and deal with the government. What the under secretary of state did, I think, was the right thing to do under the circumstances, as many others whose names I have mentioned in this list did when they resigned from public office.

But I do know, and many of us on this side of the house do know, that public servants are not being treated in the manner in which they should be treated by this government. The greatest proof of this lies in the treatment of the directors and president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the hon. member for Laurier suggest that the under secretary of state has been driven out of office?

Mr. Chevrier: The Solicitor General did not listen to what I had to say, otherwise he would not have asked that question; because it is not even pertinent to the issue.

Mr. Drysdale: Translated, that means you have not got an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I say, sir, that there is a great change of mind on the part of those who sit on the other side of the house from the days when the former minister of public works used to rise in this house and repeatedly state his confidence in government officers and public servants, and the conduct of the government in connection with the president of Canadian National Railways and the directors. Surely, sir, before we pass this measure, before we vote on this measure if that need be, we are going to be told and we are entitled to know, in a free parliament, whether the president and directors of the Canadian National Railways are going to remain in their positions or who are going to replace them. We are entitled to know who these men are who are going to spend these hundreds of millions of dollars so we can determine for ourselves whether or not they are competent and efficient and possess the necessary business experience.

If we do not, then it is not parliament that is sovereign. If we do not there was no meaning whatever in the words of the Prime Minister in a former debate. If we do not, then it is one man who arrogates unto himself all the powers of parliament, and I hope that day has not yet arrived.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can get through my remarks without points of order such as those that have been flying around here recently. The railways, air lines and shipping committee report has been tabled, and this gives us an opportunity to both use the evidence that was presented before that committee and to speak with more information with regard to this measure.

Let me say that we support the measure. We think it is a routine financial measure, and we support it. There are a considerable number of comments, however, I should like to make.

The report that was tabled yesterday took cognizance of a number of points that came up. First, there was a mild—at least it is my interpretation—slap on the wrist of the president for his attack in the committee on members of parliament. Second, there were some general remarks about the financial position of the Canadian National, and there was critical comment about the way in which Canadian National Railways got into trucking operations. There were some suggestions with regard to the United States operations of the C.N.R.; there was a paragraph on pensions and a suggestion how that particular problem should be handled, and there was a brief paragraph relating to the morale of the employees.

The position of the C.C.F. party with regard to the Canadian National Railways might be worth stating again, since as our party spokesman in the house on the C.N.R. I have read and heard the accusation in certain places that I have been out to chop down or destroy the Canadian National Railways. We support the Canadian National Railways as a public institution, and will go on supporting it. I have here G. R. Stevens' book "Canadian National Railways". In the introduction to this book there is a brief paragraph that I think covers the great value of the C.N.R. and all railways in Canada. It says:

> The economic value of a railway to the community is determined not by the railway's income account and balance sheet, but by the social dividends the community receives from the reduced cost of transportation. The primary dividend is the money saved by using rail transport rather than any other kind. In the middle of the last century the difference in cost was astounding, at least twenty times that of providing railway service. Even in these days of motor vehicles, this dividend is still a vital force in our economy; money that is saved for the community by the use of rail transport is at least three times the total expenses of the railways, including interest on capital. Not infrequently the income account and balance sheet of railways indicate something less than financial success; but they scarcely reveal the impact of railways on the economy of the country.

We know there is a great necessity for the Canadian National Railways. In the part of the country which I represent there is a tremendous amount of C.N.R. mileage. That mileage is not only an integral part of the whole economy of our region, but it is part of that bridge that links the west and the east together. The Canadian National Railways as a crown corporation of the 1960's is the kind of organization that we support. We only expect from that organization that it is run on the best possible basis in terms of both business efficiency and public service. When those two factors come into contradiction—that is, efficiency and public service—then we believe it is the responsibility of the government which owns the corporation to indicate just how we are going to deal with the problem.

One issue that always comes up in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and it has been brought to the fore by the Financial Post recently, is whether we are ready in Canada for an amalgamation or what is sometimes called a rationalization of the two major class 1 railways. Our party position in regard to this matter is that it is a subject that is so pertinent and relevant at the present time that I want to make it perfectly clear that if the matter is to be studied, we feel it should be studied with the emphasis on the Canadian National Railways taking over the railway lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Speaker, I now want to talk in much greater detail about the appearance of the president of the Canadian National Railways before the committee, because as an individual member of parliament I was involved in a way that was in some ways unique so far as members of the committee were concerned. I should like to make one point in contradistinction to what has been said by the hon. member for Laurier. Mr. Gordon had his period, if one wants to call it that, in court before the shareholders, if one wants to call them that. Mr. Gordon is not in a similar position to Mr. Coyne in this regard at all. It would seem to me that with regard to the argument that public servants are frightened or scared at the present time, the hon. member for Laurier may be able to make that an issue in certain areas, but I believe that in the area of the president of the Canadian National Railways this does not apply.

I would go along with the hon. member to a degree, that we need to know whether the president of the Canadian National Railways is going to be reappointed. I think he knows our views on whether or not this should happen. But I feel, as an individual trying to judge the situation, that it is perhaps one of the best things possible for the Canadian National Railways at the present time to keep Mr. Gordon in some kind of suspension, because I think it will result in a better job of management of the Canadian National Railways. I would not advocate it as a permanent feature.

The performance of the president of the Canadian National Railways before the committee was to quite an extent in marked contrast to his previous appearances. If I could make some kind of a simile or metaphor it would be that this time it was as though he was appearing at a cocktail party rather than in the locker room. He was much milder and much more informative than ever before. I think all hon. members who sat on this committee in other years will agree that in the past Mr. Gordon did not give the impression of having a team working with him. He dominated all the evidence; he gave almost all the evidence, and we had to search very far to find evidence from other people who supported him in his so-called management team.

This year we had many more people in the committee in support of the president of the Canadian National Railways. It was quite apparent that they were being encouraged to give more evidence, to fill in more background and so give the members of the committee much more information. They had this information at their fingertips for us. To me this was a victory in the sense that this year we got both a more informative presentation and a wider presentation from the president of the Canadian National Railways. It seems to me this change is all for the good, and I certainly had the impression that the members of the committee were impressed with the fact that we received more information.

I should like to deal with the fact that during the committee hearings we were all aware that Mr. Gordon's position had been attacked in this house. I suggested, and other members of the committee also suggested, that he be given a full opportunity to state his case. He did so, on a number of aspects of the work, and he spoke particularly in relation to charges of members of parliament relating to him. I wish to touch on a number of these, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me they affect all members of the committee and all hon. members of the house.

One of the things Mr. Gordon said was that McCarthy-like tactics had been introduced. I should like to make this point, that McCarthy-like tactics usually relate to indicating that someone is a subversive. I received a letter yesterday from somebody by the name of Pat Walsh suggesting that I am a subversive because I sent letters to hon. members of the house advertising a nuclear radiation hazards meeting. This, it seems to me, is a McCarthy-like tactic.

Mr. Gordon felt he had been treated with McCarthy-like tactics. I do not know of any hon. member of this house who is critical of Mr. Gordon in the sense of thinking he is a subversive. I do not believe Mr. Gordon is a communist. I am certain he is not. I am certain he is not even a C.C.F.'er. I do not know what his politics are. I suspect them, but I do not think it has anything to do with the job he does. If Mr. Gordon is a Liberal, I do not think that is a factor which is at all relevant to the job he may do as president of the Canadian National Railways. It seems to me this was a most unfair, gratuitous way to come back at criticism, to suggest that people who criticize him were using McCarthy-like tactics. It seems to me his politics were never called into question at any time.

I now wish to deal with the matter of Mr. Gordon being called arrogant, haughty and dictatorial. I went to the trouble of reading what I had said about Mr. Gordon in the House of Commons. I have never at any time called him arrogant, dictatorial or haughty, as has been suggested. The strongest words I have ever used in this house about Mr. Gordon were that he was a man of brutal candour. But what I did suggest—and this seems to have caused a reaction on the part of Mr. Gordon—was that he should be fired. Perhaps this is a vicious criticism; but surely, Mr. Speaker, when you reach the stage that you think someone who has had 12 years to do a job is not doing it very well, there is nothing wrong in getting up and quite fairly saying that you think the man should be fired.

Apparently Mr. Gordon felt I was the central figure in the attacks upon him, because he came to the committee well prepared, I think, to take several rounds out of me. I want to comment upon a couple of these; because while I will not say that Mr. Gordon was untruthful in a couple of his charges, it does seem to me that he did not give all the factors in the situation. I should like to point out to hon. members—I hate to bring up this individual matter—that I was accused in this committee of being a lawbreaker, which is a fairly serious charge; of being a braggart, which is more of a political charge than a serious charge. I was accused of conniving at thievery, and of being a smearer. I should just like to analyse the charge of lawbreaking first, because to me this is typical of the inability of the president of the Canadian National Railways to react to criticism.

It all arose from a statement made by the president in the committee last year. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River brought up a very difficult situation which had developed in a community in his constituency, one which was causing a great deal of dislocation. We were given, I understood, an undertaking by Mr. Gordon that if such a situation threatened to develop again as a result of changes in the railway which were really going to dislocate a community, he would see that the community concerned was informed well ahead of time. Well, last year a group of men representing several railway communities came down here and showed that they had nine days' notice of the introduction of a form of service which would vitally and drastically affect the population and the well being of one community in my constituency and one community in the constituency of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin). The hon. member for Nickel Belt and I talked the matter over with these men and asked them what could be done. They had been to the Minister of Transport. Their general chairman had been to see the management, and the management intended to go ahead with its plans.

Mr. Benidickson: You talked it over with me, too.

Mr. Fisher: No doubt. The men were in a great deal of distress over this, and they kept insisting that they just could not go through with this change in service which meant running through two divisions. They felt that from the point of view of safety it was unsound, and having regard to their own personal positions they did not have time to straighten out their affairs in these communities. They felt so strongly about this that I said "Well, what can you do? What can you do if you have got to accept this?" And they said "We just will not go to work". I said, "Well, you cannot pull a wildcat strike". The general chairman there said "If they pull a wildcat strike they will go to jail". At that time I noted these words very well. I said "If you feel so strongly about it you should be prepared to go to jail. After all, I do not think there is any greater test of your feelings about something than whether you are prepared to go to jail about it".

This, apparently, is the lawbreaking that I did. This is the advice which Mr. Gordon feels is lawbreaking. Well, what happened as a result of the fact that the men announced that they were going to pull themselves out of service was that the railway postponed for a short while putting its plan into operation and accepted the compromise which the men suggested. Here is the irony. Mr. Gordon accused me of costing the C.N.R. money because of my role in this matter. He accused me of lawbreaking. I was up in those communities last week in order to get all the particulars of the situation and talk it over with the men. They do not think I am a lawbreaker. They do not think I cost the C.N.R. any money. As a matter of fact they pointed out to me that right in the bulletin books of the divisional point at Capreol there was a letter from the management of the C.N.R. congratulating them on the wonderful way this service, as it had been introduced according to their compromise, was going. The letter said they were making better time and giving better service than other places on the Canadian National Railways system. Now, the management of the C.N.R. does not go to those lengths to compliment its employees if something is not working well, and in the light of this fact I think Mr. Gordon's charge that I had cost the railway a great deal of money and am a lawbreaker was nonsensical.

There is one other aspect of this which is much more important to me than to anyone else. Mr. Gordon accused me of conniving at thievery. I think all members are aware that they get communications from people in many diverse forms. During the committee hearings I received long distance telephone calls; visitors came to my office; I received several hundred letters. A great deal of information comes to us, and in almost every aspect of our work a great deal of this information comes to us in confidence. I had been presented by a person, who at one time had a connection with the trucking operations of the Canadian National Railways, with a statement regarding the performance of these operations in the year 1960. Because this document was given to me in confidence I had no intention of revealing the source, and I was not using the document in any other way except that I just kept asking the president of the C.N.R. whether it was not true that his truck lines lost money in 1960. I suggested an estimated figure.

Well, as you probably know, Mr. Speaker, he wanted to know where I was getting this information, and when I suggested that I had this paper here it wound up on the table. We had a little bit of a wrestling match over it, and that document became part of the record. Mr. Gordon identified the document as a document stolen from the files of the Canadian National Railways. I doubt very much whether it was a stolen document in any very real sense in relation to the way in which I got it. I still feel that I am privy in not revealing the name of the person who gave it to me. Anyway, the document was recognized as part of the record.

Now I should just like to suggest to hon. members that if one is going to be informed with regard to the many matters which arise, one must accept, with a certain critical approach, the various people who come to one and give information in confidence. If this led me to being in possession of what was said to be a stolen document, I have no support or flattery to put forward to the person who provided this to me, but I take strenuous exception to the suggestion that I either connived in obtaining a stolen document or, knowing that it was stolen, used it in any vicious or nasty way.

There is one other criticism which the president made. He said he did not feel that the head of a $3½ billion corporation should have to stand the kind of criticism that he received in the House of Commons from members of parliament. I asked him to make a statement in this particular regard because I felt he should have his day in court, as one says. He took off, and the committee has noted that he did and questioned his wisdom and propriety in doing so.

It seems to me, despite the talk the hon. member for Laurier gave about the treatment of civil servants and so on, that it is sometimes difficult for civil servants and public servants to recognize that we as members of parliament have a certain responsibility. Although I disagreed with the hon. member who succeeded the late secretary of state for external affairs in some of the remarks he made about Mr. Gordon, what was there wrong about his standing up here in his place, to which he has been elected, and giving his opinion in this respect? I see nothing wrong with it; and the charge that this has undermined the morale of the Canadian National Railways by calling the management into question is a substantial charge, but I wonder if we should accept it. Each of us, through our constituents and the public organizations which work in our constituencies, becomes aware of certain opinions, certain views; we come to certain conclusions about the work of government organizations. I cannot see anything wrong in this particular case with a responsible member getting up in the house and stating what he thinks about how a government organization is run, and expressing his opinions about the individuals who run it.

One of the unfortunate things in regard to the appearance of Mr. Gordon before the committee—this has nothing to do with him personally—occurred because of the rather juvenile attitude taken by many members of the press. I was telephoned on at least five occasions one day by a newspaperman who was attempting to determine my height, chest measurement and so on apparently in an effort to write a story comparing me in size with Mr. Gordon, almost as though there was to be some kind of a Patterson-Johannson bout.

Mr. Drysdale: A bout of overweights, not heavyweights.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member may be right, that this was a bout of overweights, but I suggest it is this kind of wrong association in respect to committee meetings which causes the kind of criticism which we certainly do not deserve.

I should like to make one final point in regard to the personal charges against the president of the C.N.R. by myself. I reiterate that all my questions directed to the president of the C.N.R. were direct questions and not criticisms. The only criticism I made in the house was that he should be fired and that he possessed a certain brutal candour. If the president of the Canadian National Railways cannot stand up to that type of criticism that is all the more reason why he should go.

Mr. Speaker, I should like at this point to say something about what I think are Mr. Gordon's failures as president of the Canadian National Railways. The irony of the situation is that we have a banker as head of the railway. He is a man who was going to bring to the railroad a great understanding of financial matters, such as bonds, capital, and so on. This is a man who is a great financier with great experience, particularly during the last war; and who did, as we have been told, a magnificent job in respect to one aspect of government operations. He has been head of the railway for 12 years and now comes up with a $900 million bombshell. It apparently has taken him almost 12 years to discover that the financial picture of this railway does not look good because there should be a shift in bookkeeping entries of $900 million from the debt structure to the government of Canada. He suggests that once that has been accomplished he will be able to present a very good financial picture.

As the hon. member for Acadia said, I am a simple boy from the bush, and this does not quite make sense to me. He was referring to this great banker spending 12 years with the railway and then coming up with $900 million bookkeeping shift to put the financial picture of the Canadian National Railways in a wonderful light. That is the capital revision that the Minister of Finance is going to have to consider.

The point I should like to make to the hon. member for Laurier is that the reason the committee said in its recommendations that in the light of this suggestion the government should examine the proposition with great care is that we have already had two large capital revisions in the Canadian National Railways. We have had a royal commission which sat for a year and a half, with evidence piled quite high, at which the C.N.R. was well represented by a capable solicitor, and on some occasions more than one; yet during all that time there was not one word said by any representative of the Canadian National Railways regarding this $900 million shift. As a matter of fact we have not as yet received a complete report from that commission, although we have the first volume. It seems to me that this royal commission had the responsibility of studying the whole railway transportation picture, yet Mr. Gordon did not find it necessary to mention this $700 million to $1,200 million difficulty at any time during its sittings.

Mr. Gordon, the man who, as I have said, was a banker with some experience and who has now been in charge of the railway for 12 years, at this late date has decided that the explanation for the Canadian National Railways deficit lies in a bookkeeping shift. I suggest there has been irresponsibility here in this regard, because the royal commission has suggested that subsidies be paid in the amount of $100 million per year. What is the relationship between those subsidies and the fact that if Mr. Gordon is successful in his suggestion something between $40 million and $50 million of the C.N.R. deficit will disappear? Surely in that event there will be created a completely different picture. Perhaps if we allow this bookkeeping change we will not need to adopt the royal commission's recommendations as to subsidies. I do not know the answer, but suggest that because Mr. Gordon has only at this stage come to this conclusion, this is a failure on his part.

One other point I should like to touch upon has regard to the tremendous management reorganization of the Canadian National Railways. By this change completely new areas and regions will be created. The results of this change may be excellent and responsive to the needs, but it is coming only now after an 11 or 12 year occupancy of the president's position by Mr. Gordon. This change is being made, as the president himself admitted, without adequate preparation and information, particularly in regard to employees, with the result that morale has been demoralized. Employees have not been adequately informed or prepared in respect to this proposed change. Mr. Gordon himself seems to oscillate between the position of not informing the employees, because they just get their backs up and get excited, and working out better public relations.

Mr. Gordon has already begun to use his public relations resources. Not long ago on his return to Montreal, according to the press, he was greeted by a crowd of 800 employees. Hon. members will remember the picture of him coming through the door being greeted by this crowd of 800 employees. I received a letter from an individual who was in that crowd, informing me that he had received notice from his supervisor to be in attendance at this spontaneous welcome. As a consequence of this information I asked that individual how big the crowd was, and received information that it was not more than about 300. I do not know which newspaper reporter made the estimate but I am surprised, because I thought newspaper men were quite able to make accurate estimates.

Mr. Drysdale: Maybe a train had just come in.

Mr. Fisher: I asked that individual how many employees attended this welcome, how many were employed in this magnificent headquarters of the C.N.R., and how they were all crowded into the lobby. I was informed that not more than one sixth of the employees of that building were present at this welcoming demonstration. It is obvious that the public relations program is beginning to work again, and I suggest that similar operations be commenced in my part of the country where the employees are in fear of losing their jobs and have very low morale.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this would be a convenient place to break.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that I was so discursive earlier that I did not have time to deal with a number of points. I should have liked to touch on the glowing messages that Mr. Gordon read into the committee proceedings from such men as Mr. Smith, the head of the Canadian brotherhood of railway and general transport workers. The irony is that if one compares this sycophancy with the old magazine produced by that gentleman's union and their strong editorial criticism of Mr. Gordon, coming at the very same time, plus their very complimentary remarks about the views of the member for Port Arthur on the railway situation, one sees that perhaps that union is not as solid as it may appear to be. It is a pity that we could not go into what was revealed about the Canadian National Railways trucking operations, because here you have a situation where one year after going into the business of these trucking operations you seem to have a couple of them that are in very bad financial straits.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, there is going to be an end of calling for Mr. Gordon's resignation. We feel it is apparent that the government is not going to get rid of him at this time because of other circumstances that are occurring. This is the government's decision and it is the government's right, but we shall follow with care how Mr. Gordon performs in the next year. I personally think that this king of all the Canadian cabbages will be much less wrapped up in himself as the result of what has taken place. I think out of it will come a better deal from the management for the employees and those many good, fine people who work on the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question? I was very interested in his reference in the earlier portions of his speech to the welcome home reception staged by employees of the Canadian National Railways for Mr. Gordon. Will the hon. member explain whether he thinks it reflects the attitude of the railway unions toward Mr. Gordon?

Mr. Walker: We cannot hear this Mr. Gallagher and Mr. Sheen dialogue.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. minister like to have it repeated?

Mr. Churchill: No; I heard it.

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member another question which he could answer at the same time. Is it the old party asking a question of the New party? Or is it the New party asking a question of the old party?

Mr. Fisher: Let us put it this way in answer to the question. This is the Hazen Argue wing of the New party working in concert. In answer to the hon. member's question about the reception, I should like to say I am not in a position really to comment on whether the fact that 800 people allegedly arrived in the lobby so fortuitously at the same time as the cameraman and the president is an indication of complete union support for Mr. Gordon. All I can tell the hon. member is that I was in two railway divisional points last week; while the employees did not sing "For He's A Jolly Good Fellow", the reception was very warm and friendly.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to put a few comments on the record in regard to the operation of the United States lines of the Canadian National Railways. The total deficit of all United States lines in 1960, after other income is added but before fixed charges, was $6,856,583, as reported at pages 182 and 183 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the sessional committee. On the same basis there was a deficit of $6,473,732 for the entire C.N.R. system, including the United States lines. Therefore, if the United States operations had been excluded from the C.N.R. statement, the C.N.R. would have shown a profit before fixed charges.

The deficit on the U.S. lines after fixed charges was approximately $11 million, as against a total system deficit of $67 million. These are rather fantastic figures when you take them in the context in which I am placing them, because the total investment in United States lines is $186 million against a total system investment of approximately $3,767 million. The United States investment is therefore 5 per cent, but it contributed over 100 per cent of the deficit before fixed charges and 16 per cent of the deficit after fixed charges.

The contention of the railroad is that onward freight received from these United States lines is so valuable and so lucrative to the C.N.R. that it not only wipes out this deficit but provides a profit in the over-all C.N.R. operations. This argument is made on the basis, I assume, that if the C.N.R. did not own these lines it would not have any chance for that freight. Since they have the only tie-in with the United States lines and since they should be somewhat equivalent to the C.P.R. in the efficiency with which they solicit freight and with which they service their customers, I cannot see the validity of that statement.

Furthermore, in the evidence given before the committee one of the chief complaints of the president of the C.N.R. with regard to the difficulty of operating the C.N.R. system in a profitable manner was the fact that the system is a conglomeration of bankrupt railroads and was not built as a single economic entity in the same way as the C.P.R. and that because it is a conglomeration of half a dozen railroads it did not really make economic good sense in many respects.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these pseudopods stretching down into the United States, these United States lines owned by the C.N.R., are part of the polyglot system and that there has been no effort made by management really to streamline this system in the way of getting rid of these particular lines to which I have referred. It seems to me that it would have been good wisdom to have tried to sell those lines and if they could not be sold then a study should be made of their abandonment and the recapture of whatever can be recaptured from the sale of equipment and real estate because the figures have shown that if we actually gave these lines away the Canadian taxpayer would be in a better position inasmuch as these lines are to all intents and purposes foreign companies that do not contribute anything to the Canadian economy except by way of the onward movement of freight about which the president talks. We are asking and the management have asked the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize to the extent of many millions of dollars a foreign operation. I would say that the management must be prepared to prove what they say. They were asked to give proof and they did not do so. Supposedly there is a report of 150 pages covering a study of this problem, and the key figure in that study must be how much revenue the C.N.R. in Canada derives from the operation of the United States lines. We could not get that figure.

I say that the management should take a good look at the report of the sessional committee and that they should be prepared next time to be able to answer that committee's questions with regard to management. I do not apologize in the least for what somebody criticized as interference with the function of management because I think this loss on United States lines was so glaring and so obvious that it should have been studied a long time ago and the answers should have been clear cut and equally obvious to the committee when the committee members asked these questions.

I do not wish to take any further time except to comment with regard to Trans-Canada Air Lines. In no place have I noticed the fact highlighted that $6.8 million in the surplus account disappeared down the drain because of the rush the air line was in to convert to an all-turbine fleet. We have the first all-turbine operation of any major air line in the world and we have to pay a price to be in that position. That price is the elimination of $6.8 million of a surplus and a deficit of $2 million. This is the real story behind the deficit of T.C.A. Very high depreciation charges have had to be taken. There was the purchase of two Super Constellations for approximately $5 million with a life of seven years but a use under the plan to convert to an all-turbine fleet of only three years. These are the things that are behind the statements and which result in the end in a red figure.

[Mr. Broome.]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to be fair to the Minister of Finance. When we were discussing what was involved in the measure at the resolution stage we had a little controversy about the wording of the resolution. I wish to say to my colleagues in the house that I was wrong, that the changes in wording of the resolution were at the end of the resolution and not at the beginning.

The point is that this year we have come to the time when we have to take into account some of the decisions made by parliament a long time ago. I refer to the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952. In sections 4 and 6 there were intimations that after a ten-year period parliament would be asked to review the capital set-up of the C.N.R. I think those features account for the change in the resolution which I criticized the other day.

Hon. members will recognize that this very important measure has been brought before us unduly late in the session. I believe that the resolution only appeared on the order paper on July 6. When we were at the resolution stage the other day I said that I had not been a member of the committee although I had read the relevant portions of the committee's proceedings. I said that the C.N.R. was a key industry in Canada and that, despite what the Minister of Finance might have said in his budget speech, I continued to be alarmed about the C.N.R. because it had not been estimated that in 1961 its revenues would even increase at the rate of 3 per cent. Those of us who are called upon every year to examine this legislation are obliged to look forward to what was forecast by the president of the railway, a deficit very little less than last year, a deficit of $64 million compared with a deficit of $67 million last year.

Last year at this stage of the debate in the House of Commons I said that the Minister of Finance was unrealistic. The last word that he gave us, up to the presentation of this kind of bill, was that the deficit of Canadian National Railways would be between $24 million and $25 million. I said this was wholly unrealistic, having regard to the experience that any one of us sitting here could have observed in the published statements relating to Canadian National Railways and if we were to use as a yardstick the earnings up to that time of Canadian Pacific Railways, I said then, having regard to the earnings of Canadian National, that the deficit would prove to be about three times $24 million. I may have exaggerated a little, but the end result was that the net earnings of Canadian National Railways in 1960 resulted in a deficit of $67 million. I was not too far out a year ago when I said that, having looked at the first four months of operating revenues and expenses of the railroad.

Yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur referred to something he called a bombshell, and I think that word is worth repeating. I was not a member of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, government owned, this year. In that committee, as the hon. member for Port Arthur has stated, the president of Canadian National Railways indicated that there might be another write-off of the borrowings of the Canadian National to the extent of perhaps $700 million or $900 million. This follows the very important capital revision of this national asset which was made in 1951, and the legislation introduced in 1952. I wonder if the Minister of Finance has advice to give to his colleagues in the House of Commons on this point, as we again have a bill before us to guarantee to this crown corporation a very substantial debt that the corporation might incur in connection with further capital expenditures.

I, of course, have complained, as has the hon. member for Laurier, that this legislation which is an annual item has come to us late in the session, later than I can ever remember as a member of parliament. Because of the lateness we are entitled to expect from the minister, and from the Minister of Transport an up to date report as to the net earnings of this important crown corporation for the first half of 1961. I should like to know whether they are better or worse than the earnings for 1960. When the committee was assembled, we were told the deficit would be $3 million or $4 million less than in 1960. However, I believe that when we are dealing with a bill of this kind we should be told whether or not the earnings for the first six months of this year are better or worse than those of 1960.

I said last year that the Minister of Finance had completely miscalculated or ignored the Canadian National when he told us in parliament that he would have a surplus of $12 million. His calculation at that time was based on a Canadian National deficit of $24 million. Hon. members can see how wrong he was, because the deficit in 1960 proved to be $67 million. I am following in this debate the representative of a neighbouring constituency of mine, the hon. member for Port Arthur, who has taken a great interest in the affairs of Canadian National, just as I have in the past. He is not in his seat, but is apparently hearing what I am saying. I was not a member of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, government owned, this year, but I was a member of that committee last year for the reasons to which the hon. member for Port Arthur referred, namely the introduction of lay-offs by the Canadian National which were being inaugurated in my constituency and in particular in the town of Sioux Lookout.

I wish to know where the hon. member for Port Arthur stands in connection with some of these matters because they refer to the requirement for capital murder under the bill before us. When I was a member of the committee last year I asked the committee to hear, not the Sioux Lookout representatives of labour unions and organizations, but regional representations from western, eastern and other areas. This can be confirmed by looking at pages 19, 20 and 22 of the report of the hearings of the committee last year. As I have said, I was not a member of the committee this year, but apparently the hon. member for Port Arthur wished to hear union representations in connection with turnaround rights and pension rights. He wanted these people to be heard by our House of Commons committee. Last year, as is indicated by reference to page 19 of the committee report, he voted against the motion that I made asking that unions be heard with this matter in mind.

A great many suggestions have been made with regard to improving the efficiency of the Canadian National Railways. There was a suggestion from the government that we should have another write-off of capital obligations. According to the evidence of the president of the C.N.R. before the committee, this might involve $700 million or $900 million. At a rough guess, with tight money this might involve an annual income responsibility of $40 million. Therefore when the committee was asked to consider a deficit of $64 million for 1961, in the future they might be able to write off $40 million of debt because the capital obligation had been transferred from the crown corporation to the Minister of Finance. I ask the Minister of Finance to speak about this. There was a large write-off in 1951. Is there in contemplation another write-off of this volume?

I have here a sessional paper which was produced in the House of Commons when the present Minister of Finance sat on this side of the house. It was moved by Senator Pouliot, the then member for Temiscouata. There are many questions on this sessional paper but I propose to read only one or two. Question No. 1 reads as follows:

> Did the cancellation of capital stocks and certain indebtedness of the Canadian National railway system to His Majesty, in virtue of chapter 22 of 1 George VI (1937), amount to more than $1,200,000,000, and what was the exact amount of that cancellation?

The answer provided at that time was that indeed it did; it amounted to a reduction of

What is the answer to this question? Does the Minister of Finance agree with the hon. member for Port Arthur that perhaps, as was suggested by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett years ago, we should have amalgamation of these two railways? Certainly it was clearly the view of the hon. member for Port Arthur when he said on February 27, 1961, as reported at page 2479 of Hansard:

> —the whole railway operation in Canada should be consolidated under a government corporation.

What is that going to do with respect to employment? Are we going to eliminate competition between railways in this country? Is that what the hon. member for Port Arthur had in mind when he said that what we want is consolidation of the two railways of this country under a government corporation?

I say that is tantamount to accepting what was turned down by the electorate in 1935 when the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett proposed the same thing and was voted out. When we read the minister's remarks in introducing the resolution we have what I call an apology, a procrastination, a deferment that is typical of this administration. The minister points out that under the decisions of parliament in 1951 or 1952 we decided there would be deferment of certain debt obligations of the Canadian National Railways, but parliament said that they would start to bear interest after ten years. Those decisions like the proverbial chickens have come home to roost this year.

What the minister is proposing in this bill is that he should have another year to procrastinate and not make a decision. I say that must be considered before we approve the bill before us. This means another year of procrastination. I refer to section 3 of the Canadian National Railways Refunding Act of 1955. This refers to the matter the minister mentioned in his resolution speech with respect to the $200 million opportunity of the railway for freedom in this field.

In addition I refer to the $100 million item to which the minister referred in his speech on July 6. There again is an extension for one year of freedom from any obligation on the part of the Canadian National Railways to pay interest on the $100 million item. This is typical of this government. They are just procrastinating and deferring, until after an election, decisions that I suggest have to be made now.

I ask the minister, this government and all supporters of this government whether or not they have looked or are continuing to look at the balance sheets of these two competing national railways, C.P.R. and C.N.R. I pointed out last year that the capital expenditure asked by the competitor to our national railroad was $83 million, including $25 million for their air arm, which would bring down that amount considerably. I asked how the cabinet, which must approve these things, compared that with the requirement for which we were asked, which I think on a comparable basis, including T.C.A., was $197 million. Are we getting results from decisions of this kind which have to be approved by cabinet? I know that this crown company has certain opportunities. I also know the minister has said in this house that any crown company must be treated in the same way as any other corporation. On that basis, is this capital being generated and provided under intelligent and careful supervision by the cabinet of this country? This information would be interesting to all members of this House of Commons and of particular interest to those who support this government.

We hear that within a year there may be a possibility that the obligation to subscribe for preferred stock of the Canadian National Railways based on the act of 1951 and based on the company's annual earnings may be discontinued. I hope the minister will make it clear what kind of careful study has been made with respect to this. The statutes are clear. It is now ten years since the statute was enacted in parliament, and two or three at least of these chickens have come home to roost. The minister is taking an attitude which, I say, is typical of this government. He and his colleagues are deferring a decision. They have nothing to tell us, except that in the last three or four clauses of this bill they ask for another year in which to make up their minds.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I just wish to make a few brief observations in view of some remarks made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and in fairness to the hon. member for Port Arthur.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River charged my hon. friend for Port Arthur with inconsistency during the hearings of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping last year inasmuch as he did not support the proposal that certain representatives of the employees of the railway should appear before the committee. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the request of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that certain employees from Sioux Lookout—

Mr. Benidickson: I referred to regional representations.

Mr. Herridge: —and other points, was not, as I am informed by my hon. friend from Port Arthur, a very practical suggestion at that time because it was not possible during the committee's consideration of the report of the Canadian National Railways, in the time allowed, for all those employees from the various communities concerned to arrive and to be heard and to have their proposals given consideration.

Mr. Benidickson: They were sitting in the committee room at the time.

Mr. Fisher: Just those from Sioux Lookout.

Mr. Benidickson: No. Regional and national.

Mr. Herridge: I was not a member of the committee but I understand that this year the committee gave consideration to pensions and other benefits and that it was strictly within the terms of reference for these employees to be heard. The hon. member for Port Arthur was very anxious that they should have this opportunity.

In conclusion I may say that knowing the great interest which my hon. friend has taken in the welfare of the employees of the Canadian National Railways and other railways, as well as in the welfare of employees in industry generally, one could not fairly accuse him of not taking any course of action which would in his opinion be to the greatest advantage of those employees concerned.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable the C.N.R. to meet certain expenditures. As it happened on several previous occasions this bill, and it is an important bill, is introduced in the dying days of the session.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) rightly observed this morning that never did a committee sit so late in the session.

The government likes to boast about the work done in the committees. It certainly has no reason to rejoice in the fact that the report of this committee was tabled so late in the session, to the inconvenience of everybody.

The hon. member for Laurier mentioned that a bill to increase from seven to 12 the directors of the C.N.R. was passed by both houses.

I feel it is quite normal to inquire about the names of those who will be appointed to the C.N.R. board of directors.

On that point, I find the following on page 7644 of Hansard for July 6:

(Text):

There are many other things I should like to inject into the debate, but I should like to conclude on the note with which I began. It is that before we are asked to vote these huge sums of money the house should be taken into the confidence of the government and parliament should be told who are going to be the directors of the Canadian National Railways and, by inference, some of the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines also. Until we are given that information the house, in all decency, should not be asked to adopt this resolution.

(Translation):

I strongly support the remarks the hon. member for Laurier made in that regard. I find it most extraordinary, indeed, that the minister should not have given us any information yet concerning those appointments.

I should like to touch upon another point connected with this bill. Not too long ago, the Prime Minister stated that at the next election—which, we hope, is not too far off—the voters will be faced with this alternative: private enterprise versus socialism.

Now, we have further proof of the government's lack of sincerity, especially as regards what it claims to be its concept of and regard for private enterprise.

Indeed, all hon. members received yesterday a telegram protesting against the C.N.R.'s interference with private enterprise, namely with the trucking industry.

To avoid any mistake I should like to quote in full the telegram the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) received.

Mr. Ricard: What about the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile)?

Mr. Deschatelets: No, no, I am speaking of the telegram which the Minister of Transport received here. I will have something to say about the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane later on. As it appears on page 7726 of Hansard of July 7, the telegram reads as follows:

Are informed C.N.R. is asking Quebec provincial transport board to acquire trucking companies stop We protest against railway interference in field of private enterprise stop On behalf of our members urgently request your intervention in favour of private enterprise against state monopoly.

That was part of a question asked by the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane. This is what the Minister of Transport replied:

Canadian National Railways

Mr. Speaker, that is a decision for the authorities of the C.N.R. However, I should like to assure my hon. friend that I will pass on to the C.N.R. officials the representations he has made in that connection.

The hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Loiselle) asked the following supplementary question:

Mr. Speaker, could the minister take that opportunity to impress upon the C.N.R. that it should not enter a field which belongs to private enterprise, especially the trucking industry?

This is how the Minister of Transport replied:

The final decision as to whether or not the C.N.R. will be allowed to purchase or operate a trucking business in the province of Quebec, rests with the Quebec transport board.

The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) rose then to ask another supplementary question:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

If the C.N.R. takes over that trucking company, would it be possible to request the management not to indulge in a price war with private enterprise?

The Minister of Transport replied:

Mr. Speaker, my information is that the C.N.R. does not engage in a price war with private enterprise but rather in a fair competition with other carriers.

Well, if an election were called and our hon. friends, especially the Prime Minister, had the gall to choose as their electoral platform "private enterprise versus socialism", especially after the position taken by the Minister of Transport, I hope the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane would support us when we hold this government responsible for the competition private enterprise has to put up with in the province of Quebec and which is made possible by the subsidies or moneys voted in this parliament.

Mr. Speaker, did the Minister of Transport come to the defence of private enterprise yesterday? He dodged the issue. He preferred defending the trucking business in the province of Quebec.

I wanted to bring out this fact which, I feel, is most important: the government claims to be the promoter of private enterprise; yet, at the first opportunity, it abandons private enterprise, leaves it defenceless and the hon. member cannot even rise and blame the Minister of Transport and the government for having let such a fine opportunity go by without helping private enterprise in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to say a few words about the dismissal by the C.N.R.

of the people who worked in the international aviation building.

It will be recalled that the C.N.R. sold its property on McGill street in Montreal, dismissed most of its cleaning and maintenance staff and awarded a contract to a private company which immediately employed other people, at better conditions, to look after the maintenance of the new building.

I have blamed the C.N.R. for that action. I have also blamed the minister for not having taken his responsibilities, for failing to insist that the C.N.R. company keep at its service those old employees who have given it the best years of their lives.

I was most disappointed with the results we obtained from the C.N.R. and I should like to say here that the Minister of Transport has not given us the support we expected from him in the matter.

At all events, like in many other instances where the government failed to bring help to those requiring it, all that will be settled in due time, and I hope it will be soon.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to touch on a rather delicate subject. It has to do with the French speaking citizens' representation on the staff of the C.N.R. and especially among the vice presidents, of which I think there are 17. I must admit that this situation has been the same for 22 or 23 years. But a time will come when a definite stand will have to be taken in order that the French speaking Canadians may be adequately represented on the board of directors and more particularly among the vice presidents of the C.N.R.

I have here an article published in La Presse on May 25, 1961, which brings out this problem. It says:

—why is it that a French Canadian was never appointed among the numerous vice presidents of that crown corporation, for the maintenance of which French Canadian taxpayers, as well as the others, through the taxes they pay Ottawa, have often made good substantial deficits.

And the article goes on to say:

Are we going to be led to believe that, in the whole history of the C.N.R. since 1923, there has never been an engineer or other expert with the required qualifications to become one of the numerous vice presidents of that government service?

Mr. Speaker, the answer we get from the C.N.R. authorities on this matter is always the same. It is a case of promotions. If ever French speaking citizens are appointed to higher positions in the C.N.R., it is quite obvious none of them will ever get any such promotion.

A superb opportunity was lost recently. It was a case of appointing a vice president, following the death of Mr. W. H. Kyle. I understand there were at the time three excellent candidates: Mr. Eugene Gauthier, director of the Quebec division, Mr. Omer Boivin, of Montreal, vice president Kyle's assistant, and Mr. J. A. McDonald, general manager of the St. Lawrence region. Mr. McDonald is said to have been selected. I do not want to play politics with that matter—

Mr. Ricard: Oh, no.

Mr. Deschatelets: —as I said a moment ago. But, after all there is one thing that must be taken into consideration. In 1957-58, our hon. friends were telling us: "We shall do better than you did". That is what they said—

Mr. Ricard: And that was not done?

Mr. Deschatelets: —"We shall do better than you did."—

An hon. Member: Today, there are more unemployed.

Mr. Deschatelets: We are now in 1961, and the situation is not the same, it is indeed worse than it was before—

Mr. Ricard: You were in office for 20 years and you did nothing.

Mr. Deschatelets: —I am talking about the Canadian National Railways. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I did not want to talk politics or to criticize anyone in particular, but I say this: The day will come when definite steps will have to be taken by the authorities—

An hon. Member: Sit down, you have nothing to say.

Mr. Deschatelets: —so that we obtain in the higher positions of the C.N.R. the representation to which we are entitled. That is what I had to say—

Mr. Ricard: That is what the Conservatives are doing.

Mr. Bourque: The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has no importance at all.

Mr. Deschatelets: The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Bourque) spoke ahead of me; I was to say about the same thing. In any case, I have put on the record my views on that matter.

Mr. Speaker, we should be fair about this and recognize that C.N.R. vice presidents are appointed by the C.N.R. board of directors.

I must confess that it is not possible to criticize directly any former minister, no more than it is to criticize the present minister, for not having done what is in fact a responsibility of the C.N.R. management, the matter is entirely different as far as the directors are concerned.

Appointments to those positions are purely political matters. I am now referring to the vice presidents. I am of the opinion that something should be done as soon as possible so that our people may have a fair representation on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway, and I put that responsibility mainly on the shoulders of those who told us three or four years ago: "We shall do better than you"—

Mr. Valade: Which we actually did.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, that was all I wanted to say at this stage.

Mr. Denis: For example, the forestry department.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deschatelets: Certainly.

Mr. Valade: A moment ago, the hon. member suggested that the C.N.R. was competing with the private trucking industry. Does he know that the president of the C.N.R., Mr. Gordon, is the one responsible for this policy, and that Mr. Gordon was nominated under a Liberal administration?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the decision came from the management of the C.N.R. But, on the other hand, there was the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and also by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), who stated that the present government is the defender of private enterprise. My comparison, therefore, is between these two absolutely contradictory stands, and my conclusion is that if the present government cannot solve this problem, it has not the right to proclaim itself the defender of private enterprise. This is what matters really.

(Text):

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations on this legislation and deal with some of the basic contradictions that appear in it. Not only are there contradictions but to some extent there are confusions. It is possible that these confusions appear in other pieces of legislation. No doubt when the minister replies he might be able to deal with some of these contradictions that I shall point out.

In clause 3 of the bill—I am not dealing with the clauses directly but only with the general spirit of the contradictions—and also in clause 9 there are some very glaring contradictions. In clause 3 there is a statement which fixes the limit of the funds which are made available to the C.N.R. for the purposes of this legislation. Peculiarly enough, subclause 6 reads:

> No amount shall be spent for a purpose mentioned in this section in excess of the amount authorized by this section in respect of that purpose,—

And so on.

We see that this subclause fixes the limit which is also fixed by the explanatory notes opposite page 3. In the explanatory notes there appears a statement listing the amount requested and the reasons for the request. Yet we find in clause 9 of the bill that the lid seems to be lifted off the limitations that are fixed in clause 3. I should like to read clause 9 to reinforce my argument.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is this not a matter for the committee stage of the bill? There will be ample opportunity in committee to discuss the clauses of the bill. It is not a matter for second reading.

Mr. Crestohl: May I point out that if I wait until we get to clause 9 we shall then have passed clause 3?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but on clause 3—

Mr. Crestohl: I will not be able to read clause 9 when we are discussing clause 3.

Mr. Speaker: If there is difficulty in reconciling the clauses in respect of the amount that is authorized to be spent, guaranteed or lent, I think the hon. member would be able to deal with it more effectively at the committee stage. The same thought occurred to me, but I allowed the hon. member to proceed because I thought he might have a general principle that is applicable to the whole bill. If there is a problem of inconsistency in the clauses which does not affect the principle, the principle being support of the C.N.R. by voting money, then I think he should leave it until the committee stage and deal with it there.

Mr. Crestohl: I was under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that in dealing with the thing in its ensemble, we should find out whether there are basically any inconsistencies or contradictions which interfere with the principle that the bill intends to establish. The government seeks approval of the right to vote this money, but we are entitled to point out contradictions; that is why I am—

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's difficulty. The contradictions are verbal and do not have to do with the principle. I think the hon. member will find a better opportunity to raise these matters in the committee, particularly as he seems to have to quote the precise clauses to support his argument. I think the point is well taken. Unless the hon. member has other matters to bring up he should leave this until we reach the committee stage.

Mr. Crestohl: All right. I shall certainly bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and reserve this for the committee stage.

Another point which strikes me is the reference in the measure to Trans-Canada Air Lines. I point out that nowhere in the long title of this bill is Trans-Canada Air Lines referred to or mentioned, nor is it referred to in the interpretation clause of the bill.

Mr. Speakman: It says "Canadian National Railways".

Mr. Crestohl: But it does not say this includes Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Speakman: It is not included.

Mr. Crestohl: Trans-Canada Air Lines are referred to in the bill. Why is there not a separate measure to finance Trans-Canada Air Lines in the same way as the C.N.R. is financed by a bill which comes before the house?

Mr. Drysdale: It is a wholly owned subsidiary of the C.N.R.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder why T.C.A. is brought into this piece of legislation by the back door method and not directly. For example, in the statement filed permission is asked for to make investment in affiliated companies, Trans-Canada Air Lines and others. I presume that "others" means other affiliated companies. Why are they not directly referred to? I think the house is entitled to know—probably the minister will inform us—exactly what other affiliated companies are referred to? Why should they not be set out in the measure?

I should also like to refer to the fact that advances to Trans-Canada Air Lines are to be without any limit or ceiling whatsoever. I would have to refer to the section of the act to deal with that more fully, but I would point out that we are being asked to vote on a measure authorizing the advancing of funds to Trans-Canada Air Lines with no limit whatsoever whereas in the case of the C.N.R.

the advances are limited. As someone has very properly said, parliament is being asked to grant authority for the issuing of a blank cheque. We are authorizing the payment of amounts without any fixed limit to what is referred to as an affiliated company. We fix a ceiling in the case of loans to the C.N.R. but we provide no ceiling with respect to one of its affiliated companies.

I think it is somewhat unfair that parliament should be asked to grant authority to advance funds to an affiliated company without any ceiling whatever especially when a limit is imposed in respect of the principal company involved. I cannot see myself voting in favour of the measure without the amount in the case of T.C.A. being fixed and properly authorized. I certainly cannot see why parliament should be called upon to issue a blank cheque.

I have one further observation to make with respect to the head of the C.N.R. I hold no brief for him but I think it is very difficult to expect anyone to do a thorough job and discharge his responsibilities properly with the sword of Damocles hanging over his head. A man who is expected to do a thorough job should be quite fearless and should not be in a state of terrorization for fear that tomorrow or the next day the sword of Damocles will fall upon him.

I think the government should declare itself in one way or another and inform the house who the new directors will be. As honourable as these gentlemen may be, it is unfair to expect parliament to pass a measure granting them authority to spend such vast sums of money without parliament being taken into the confidence of the government with respect to who these men may be. No doubt the government already knows who they are. Why should parliament not be given the information to enable it to judge, on the basis of the experience and knowledge of its members, whether in its opinion, right or wrong, these men are competent and able?

When parliament is asked at times to vote on measures involving different departments we know who the people are who are in charge of the administration but here we are being asked to vote vast sums of money which will be administered by men whom we do not know. Parliament knows nothing about them and the government refuse to take us into their confidence and give us the opportunity at least to voice an opinion on the matter. From the point of view of the best administration of any organization, any crown corporation, I say that administration cannot be as efficient if the head of that crown corporation is living under a cloud and, as I said a moment ago, possibly living in an atmosphere of terrorization with no idea of when the sword of Damocles may fall upon him.

Our public servants and civil servants have to have a feeling of security so that they may be able to carry out their responsibilities fearlessly and with frankness and honour. Of course, it may be that it is the intention of the government, as the hon. member for Port Arthur said, to follow a policy that will keep public servants in a state of suspense. The hon. member said that at times perhaps it might be wiser to keep a public servant in a state of suspense because it will keep him on his toes and he will do a better job. That is a matter of opinion, a matter of philosophy, of study, of approach. Certainly I am not of the same opinion. When you keep a public servant or a civil servant in a state of fear—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but this bill deals with Canadian National Railways and does not deal with the civil service generally. It seems to me that he is wandering afield a bit in making his point about the railway.

Mr. Crestohl: I was addressing myself strictly to the position of the president of the C.N.R. and I referred to him as a public servant. However, I think I have made my point. Whether the president of the railway is to be Mr. Donald Gordon or someone else, for the sake of efficient administration I urge the government to make a permanent appointment. In my judgment the situation would be improved if a determination were made because the head of that organization would not be in a state of suspense.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I was not able to participate at the resolution stage of the bill and although I am a member of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping I took very little part in the proceedings of the committee because there were a number of members of the committee who had already voiced severe criticism of the C.N.R. and its management. I thought that they should be given every opportunity to carry out the kind of questioning that they wanted to and for which they were prepared so that they would be able to satisfy themselves and the public as to what the real facts of the situation were. Although there were many questions I should have liked to ask involving matters of special interest to my own constituents and to my province due to the fact that the committee hearings lasted several days longer than usual, I refrained from taking part for the reasons I have given.

I should like to take this opportunity to make a few comments which under other circumstances I would have made either on the resolution stage or in the sessional committee. I should like to begin my remarks by joining with those who have paid a tribute to the chairman and vice-chairman of the sessional committee for the excellent job they did. One can appreciate that the committee met under circumstances which in some respects made for more difficulty than in previous years and which perhaps meant a more trying time for the presiding officers of the committee. I think every member of that committee came away with a feeling that he had had every opportunity of exploring whatever questions he wished and securing as full information as possible. As some hon. members have already testified, on this occasion they did succeed in getting much more information than before. The committee, in my opinion therefore, was an eminent success. This fact, I believe, was in large measure due to the two hon. members who presided over it, and I should like to pay my respects to them at this time.

While I am on this subject, I think I should take advantage of the occasion to pay tribute also to Mr. Gordon, the president of Canadian National Railways. If hon. members will refer to the committee proceedings they will find that from pages 299 to 306, most of the space is taken up with comments and observations by members of the committee by way of congratulating Mr. Gordon for his attitude toward the committee. I believe these words can be regarded as an expression of confidence in Mr. Gordon. I would have liked to have joined in these expressions at that time but six o'clock arrived and the committee had to rise so I was again prevented from having that opportunity. I should like to repair that omission at this time by expressing my accord with what was said and that can be found, as I have already mentioned, at the pages of the committee proceedings to which I have referred.

Mr. Gordon has been severely criticized during this session. I can recall that I have had my own differences with Mr. Gordon. There have been times when I, too, have not found myself in agreement with him on certain points. However, I believe that on this occasion the criticism has been quite unfair.

Mr. Drysdale: Are you referring to the hon. member for Port Arthur?

Mr. Carter: No, I am not referring to any hon. member in particular. I think my remarks apply equally to all, and if you will bear with me for a few minutes I will try to explain why I say that. We all acknowledge that it is the duty of every member to represent his constituents in this house and to put forward their grievances and their requests. We should do that, I think, in a reasonable manner and we do not portray a reasonable picture to the public when we place on Hansard a picture of a small part of the situation without projecting that against the background of the whole picture. We all receive letters from our constituents which set forth certain grievances as they appear to our constituents. Very often these letters present only part of the evidence. If we are going to present a picture to the public, I think it is only fair to the C.N.R. and to the public as well to place alongside of that the picture as it appears to the management.

We all know that Canadian National Railways face very severe problems, and these problems are rooted in history. In the eastern part of Canada, the maritime provinces, these problems go right back to confederation because one of the terms under which the maritime provinces agreed to confederate with Upper Canada was that a railway should be built. It was envisaged that that railway would link up central Canada with the eastern seaboard to transport the products of central Canada to the east coast. In this way the eastern seaports would be built up, and this would be beneficial to all. However, that did not happen. It was ten years before the railway was built, although that was one of the terms of confederation.

When the railway was built, it was not built in accordance with economic requirements, but mainly for military purposes. The railway did not serve the economic needs of the area. Various other lines came into existence which could not possibly be operated economically and so, in time, they went bankrupt. Pressure was put on the central government to take them over. Finally, these bankrupt lines, with their overhead and their debts, became part of the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways. Before things could be straightened out, wars intervened. During the last war when steel was scarce and could not be spared to build up the railway lines, these lines became rapidly exhausted. After the war, the Canadian National Railways was faced with broken down lines and with all the problems arising out of the accumulation of these bankrupt lines. In addition, the railway was faced with increasing demands from employees for better wages, better working conditions and the demands that we, ourselves, make in this house from time to time.

It is too much to expect that any human being could overcome all these difficulties, modernize all the broken down equipment, meet the wage demands, and still operate without a deficit. I think the fact that this was done in some years is in itself a testimony to the efficiency of the C.N.R. management. I say that because when we consider that the C.N.R. comprises nearly 35,000 miles of track, 104,000 employees and an expenditure of over $700 million per year, the very vastness of that organization is almost beyond the average person's comprehension.

The Canadian National Railways is a vital part of our communications system. It is a part of our lifeline. In my own province it is our lifeline. Transportation problems are difficult in every country, but in a country like Canada, with such vast areas to be served and with such a small population distributed in a very thin line along the southern border, those problems are much more difficult than we perhaps find in any other country of the world with the exception of China.

We must endeavour to find the best solution we can to these problems. The solution found must be fair to other segments of the transportation industry. I am thinking particularly of the truck lines. Canadian National Railways has been more or less forced into the trucking industry, in the public interest, to keep its deficits as small as possible and to meet the competition of the trucking industry. I do not think anyone wants the C.N.R. to get into the trucking industry and compete unfairly with the private segments of that industry. That was a major concern of some members of the committee.

In this connection I wish to say that our leader has received a number of telegrams from the trucking industry on this subject. We thoroughly agree that there should be no cut rates for the sake of unfair competition which might endanger the private sector of the trucking industry. Mr. Gordon himself gave an assurance in this regard, as recorded at page 271 of the report of the proceedings of the committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) said:

> I want to bring to your attention that I have had some concern and have had a number of representations from employees in the trucking industry who have expressed the feeling that in some circumstances some of the firms, who knew they would be acquired by the railway, were quoting low rates.
> Mr. Gordon: I think I can give you this positive assurance that it is no part of our policy to engage in unfair competition, or unfair competitive practices in the trucking industry. It is my own belief that the entry of the railways, and particularly the Canadian National Railways into the trucking industry, will have a most salutary effect in regard to the ethics of the business. I am talking about maintenance of rates, overloading, the observance of franchise requirements, and so on. I can certify that the Canadian National does not in any way break the law and will not. We have already found some practices which we could not countenance and we have changed them. I would repeat what I have said, that our entry into the business will have a very beneficial effect on the whole standard of the industry.

Some hon. members may hold a different opinion, but I think we have here a clear statement of policy on behalf of the management of the C.N.R. It is not only a statement of policy but an assurance that there will be no unfair competition in the trucking industry. If evidence accumulates to the contrary, then of course there will be another opportunity at the next committee hearing to pursue further questioning on that point.

The second question which concerned the committee a good deal was the morale of the employees of the C.N.R. I believe everyone will agree that morale is important in every industry, but in no industry is it perhaps more important than in the Canadian National Railways. The morale of any industry is certainly the duty of the management, but it is no less the duty of the employees. Particularly it is the duty and responsibility of the leadership of the employees and employee organizations. It is no less our duty in this house to contribute to that morale. We do not contribute and in fact I think we tend to undermine morale in the Canadian National Railways when we make attacks based on faulty or incomplete evidence and when we speak in an intemperate manner. We are not contributing to the morale of the Canadian National Railways by the way in which we are now treating the present president and the board of directors.

As was pointed out this morning by the hon. member for Laurier, we are being asked to vote large sums of money without knowing what is going to happen to the present president; without knowing who will be in charge of the spending of this money. We do not know who will be on the board of directors, directing the management and the affairs of the railway. I do not think any conscientious person can say that is contributing to the morale of the employees of Canadian National Railways.

There is also another aspect of this matter. It is an affront to parliament itself. We have heard much in recent days about the supremacy of parliament, but parliament is not merely the executive; it is not merely the Prime Minister. Parliament is all of us in this house and the other place. Hon. members on the other side of the house have just as much responsibility as we in the opposition to see that the rights of parliament and the supremacy of parliament are preserved. Therefore if we really believe in the supremacy of parliament, certainly the information as to who is going to be the president of the railway and who are going to fill the extra seats on the board of directors should be made known to parliament before this bill is passed.

I think the morale of the Canadian National Railways could make a great contribution to the morale of the country as a whole, because the C.N.R. is in a very special position in that it extends right across the country from east to west; it serves all sections and all districts of our country, and if we had in the C.N.R. a high level of morale, that would be an example for other industries to follow and it would also, I think, inspire and uplift the morale of the other parts of Canada.

Mr. Drysdale: You mean, Mr. Gordon should be fired?

Mr. Carter: No, I am not saying that Mr. Gordon should be fired. I rather took it from the testimony given by the members of the committee and particularly from the testimony given by the hon. member for York North—

Mr. Drysdale: You said morale was important, and I was wondering whether you were backing the hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Carter: I think morale is important, but I think we all have a responsibility for it. The attitude of the hon. member seems to be that Mr. Gordon is responsible for low morale.

Mr. Drysdale: No. I was just trying to get some clarification of your views.

Mr. Carter: The point I wish to make is that it is not only Mr. Gordon who is responsible. The leaders of the employees organizations and we ourselves, as members of parliament, are also responsible. I would judge that the tributes recorded at pages 299 to 306 of the committee's report constitute an expression of confidence in the management of the Canadian National Railways. As far as morale is concerned, the employees themselves could do more than they are doing.

Mr. Drysdale: Do you think Mr. Gordon should be retained? Is that the stand?

Mr. Habel: Is this a private conversation?

Mr. Carter: We learned from Mr. Gordon in the committee that very often the employees themselves neglect to act in their own interest, particularly with respect to pension contributions. It was only a few years ago, after trying all voluntary methods without success, that Mr. Gordon and the management found it necessary to make pension contributions compulsory. As long as contributions were not compulsory a large percentage of the employees neglected to make their contributions, though it was clearly in their own interest that they should do so.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the former employees of the C.N.R. and, indeed, for all civil servants who retired at a time when pensions were small. We are now faced with a problem in this respect and I believe parliament will have to deal with it, particularly in connection with those who retired on $25 a month. Some 40 years ago, $25 a month might have been a significant sum, but today it is not even pin money and it is clearly not possible for people to exist on such a pittance; it must certainly be supplemented from charity. I think we have an obligation in this direction, but in many cases these situations arise out of the failure of the employees themselves to act in their own interest.

I said that the Canadian National Railways was of particular importance to my own province because it is the only railway we have. Transportation is the greatest problem we face with respect to the industrial development of our province. We have many small, secondary industries, which are capable of competing in the mainland market as far as their operating costs and efficiency are concerned, but when the freight rates are added the picture is changed and it is made impossible for them to compete. We know that this problem of freight rates is under study and we hope that this study will produce a solution which will replace the present system of horizontal increases in freight rates. That practice, which has been carried on, now, for many years, has practically destroyed the original benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. We are also in need of increased services in my province although, as the manager of the C.N.R. pointed out to us, considerable debt is incurred on the services we already have. But our population is increasing. When we became a part of Canada in 1949 our population numbered approximately 350,000 people, and now it is nearly 500,000. That means more services and we must depend on the C.N.R. for those services. Not only must those services be improved, but they must be made available at a much lower cost than at the present time.

We learned from a question asked in this house a couple of days ago that the William Carson is now unable to handle all the traffic between the port of North Sydney and Port-aux-Basques. I examined that situation myself last summer and something will have to be done about it. We are trying to build up our tourist industry. We cannot expect to develop a tourist industry unless we are able to bring tourists into our province and look after them while they are there. This necessitates not only increased rail and transportation facilities but better hotel accommodation as well. The Newfoundland hotel operated at a profit last year and we hope the management will appreciate the necessity of expanding the facilities of that hotel. Mr. Gordon promised to have a hard look at it, but he appeared to be very non-committal in his references to that problem.

Then there is the question of an east coast ferry. We have been waiting now for two years—

An hon. Member: Since 1949.

Mr. Carter: An east coast ferry? I have never heard anything about an east coast ferry before two or three years ago.

Some hon. Members: The last election.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was before the electorate in 1959. The Tory leader said it was before the treasury board.

Mr. Carter: That is right. I remember it was promised in 1959. But it has not materialized, and as I say, with the increase in our population it is becoming a necessity. So I hope that this will receive consideration in a favourable light both from the government and from the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Before I sit down I should like to direct to the attention of the government and through it to the attention of the management of the Canadian National Railways the need for improved services between St. John's and Argentia, which is the terminal for coastal services that serve my home riding. I think that is the worst piece of railroad in Newfoundland if not in the whole of Canada. It is only 80 miles in length but it takes six hours to traverse. There are no meal facilities on the train and few rest rooms along the route.

Mr. Hellyer: What do you do if you have to go?

Mr. Carter: Well, it is a very poor service which should receive priority of attention, and I ask the government to bring this situation to the attention of the management in an attempt to get action as quickly as possible.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, we are being asked by the government to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January 1961 to the 30th day of June 1962. As this is a crown corporation, we must of course give full consideration to the matter.

In considering the problem, we should take into account the plans of the C.N.R., as well as the situation of the trucking industry in the province of Quebec and in the whole of Canada.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram on July 6—I think a copy was sent to all hon. members—signed by Mr. Romeo Blouin, secretary general of the Quebec trucking association incorporated. The telegram reads as follows:

> Are informed C.N.R. is asking Quebec provincial transport board to acquire trucking companies stop We protest against railway interference in field of private enterprise stop On behalf of our members urgently request your intervention in favour of private enterprise against state monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, after receiving this telegram, a member on the government side asked a question on the subject to the Minister of Transport, and here is the minister's reply, as recorded on page 7680 of Hansard for July 7 1961:

> Mr. Speaker, that is a decision for the authorities of the C.N.R. However, I should like to assure my hon. friend that I will pass on to the C.N.R. officials the representations he has made in that connection.

Mr. Speaker, following that reply from the minister, I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, could the minister take that opportunity to impress upon the C.N.R. that it should not enter a field which belongs to private enterprise, especially the trucking industry?

And the Minister of Transport answered:

> The final decision as to whether or not the C.N.R. will be allowed to purchase or operate a trucking business in the province of Quebec, rests with the Quebec transport board.

So the Minister of Transport promised the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile) that he would make appropriate representations to the Canadian National authorities, and I very much hope that my brief remarks this afternoon in connection with this matter will prompt him further to communicate with the Canadian National authorities to make them understand the need of that industry, of which all hon. members are aware.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National Railways Company has already started to acquire some trucking companies in the country. The trucking industry is apprehensive of its fate at the thought that the C.N.R. will become, if it is not already, a competitor in that field.

That association worries the more about the present situation as it is made up of representatives of the whole trucking industry in this country.

The Canadian trucking association incorporated last June presented a brief to the Prime Minister and to the members of the cabinet. In the introduction to this brief can be found the names of the various member organizations throughout the country. As the brief says:

> The provincial trucking associations comprise over 6,000 trucking companies, including interprovincial and extra-provincial trucking firms.
> Those companies provide every imaginable service with regard to renting local and long distance transportation for goods.

The total volume of commodities moved from city to city by renting transportation companies, according to the brief, and as indicated by the dominion bureau of statistics, amounted to 140,504,000 tons in 1958. Those figures mentioned in the brief were supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics.

I need not add, Mr. Speaker, that the industry receives no assistance whatsoever either from the provinces or from the central government. A subsidy is granted to the crown corporation which operates a railway service and now wants to buy out trucking companies. The government is thus being prejudicial to the trucking industry. Let nobody in the government tell us that they are promoting private industry. The Prime Minister may voice high sounding statements to the effect that the next election platform will be the protection of private enterprise against socialism, but he is only misleading the people.

Unfortunately, I do not have before me that newspaper item containing the statement I just quoted. But he publicly stated that the next election would have as its theme: "private enterprise versus socialism."

If the Prime Minister is ready to defend private enterprise, the members of his cabinet, and more particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) should not wait until election time to set an example.

I remember a recent letter from a transport company in Winnipeg, complaining that another carrier, the east-west company, transported goods at prices which might mean bankruptcy for other carriers. We should not only help these firms not to founder, but we should protect them against those who, for some reason or other, are willing to work under conditions which others could not afford. Moreover, the government has the responsibility to protect private companies against crown companies or even against the Canadian National Railways, who want to interfere in the trucking industry.

I should like to draw hon. members' attention to the following view which is to be found on page 3 of the brief:

> —it has already been suggested that the trucking industry did not pay its fair share of road costs, and consequently, that it is subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. The trucking industry does not travel free of charge on Canada's highways. And the industry is not subsidized, whether directly or indirectly. In registration and licensing fees and gasoline taxes, the commercial road carrier contributes much more, proportionately, to the revenues of government treasuries than the private car owner. And contributions will continue on such a scale, as all informed Canadians know.

The members of this association, Mr. Chairman, do not object to the C.N.R. authorities doing business in transportation. They accept competition, but want fair competition. On the other hand, they claim—and I support this contention—that crown corporations should not try to cut the throats of those who pay taxes in order to pay for the deficits of crown corporations.

Mr. Chairman, mention is also made in the same brief of a statement of principles made by the province of Quebec. It appears on page 6 of the brief, and also in the official record of proceedings of the royal commission on transportation, volume 124, page 20664. I quote:

> We believe that the problem facing the people of Canada and the people of Quebec is not a matter of favouring one method of transportation at the expense of another. Rather than that, we should ask ourselves what is the most efficient means of providing useful transportation services, on a long range national basis, and what is the best way of providing the services at the lowest possible cost to the consumer without adding to the load of the Canadian taxpayer. We therefore believe that each of the five main types of transportation are the instruments of national policy, and that economic and national interests should be the guiding criteria.

I shall not delve further into the subject, hoping that the Minister of Transport, who promised this week to bring the situation to the attention of the C.N.R. management, will take the necessary action and perhaps will be able to persuade the C.N.R. to change its policy in this field.

Now just a few words on another subject. Under the bill now before us, we are asked to vote something close to $179 million, including $19,700,000 for the financial needs of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

This morning, I asked a question of the minister to find out how things stood with regard to the work stoppage at T.C.A., which is to take effect on July 21.

I hope, as I mentioned this morning, that the government will do its utmost to prevent this strike, which would deprive thousands of citizens of this transportation service for an indefinite length of time.

I hope the government is giving serious consideration to this matter and will be much quicker in providing a solution than it has been in fulfilling its promise to tackle the unemployment situation which is now plaguing the country.

(Text):

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in speaking of the terms of this bill one of the earlier speakers referred to the necessity of government making up its mind. These past four years of drift have been years of sharp decline. Now we have the president of our greatest business in Canada living on day to day sufferance. I think one member spoke of the cat and mouse game being played by this government. I am too new here to know very much about the merits of Mr. Gordon's reappointment. I do know Donald Gordon. I see him as a giant of a man who in 1946 was offered the office of president of the international bank of reconstruction and development, the world bank. At that time nations such as the United States, France, Germany and India were among the large subscribing members but throughout all the world one of the people first sought for that high office was a Canadian, Scot-born but Canadian by adoption. This man held international confidence and respect. If the government do not want Donald Gordon they should let him go. Those who have been released by this administration have managed to go far, and often their release from the public service of Canada has been to their immense material advantage.

In my view Donald Gordon is a giant in thinking ability, administrative skill and integrity. We do not really need to worry about his future. His only reason for staying in Canada has been great devotion to this country of his adoption.

An hon. Member: At $50,000 a year.

Mr. Matheson: I greatly appreciate the language used by the universally respected member for Greenwood in his remarks which can be found in Hansard of May 13, 1961. He said, as some other hon. members did, it is unfortunate that our committee members are so sensitive about a president on occasion speaking back to the members of this house. Whoever we have in this important office—and the appointment should not be delayed—should be a man and not a mouse. If that kind of man is appointed I am sure that after the next election the new administration will be very happy to work with him, just as former Liberal administrations were able to work so co-operatively with outstanding men such as Clifford Clark and Graham Towers who were appointed by a Conservative government. We want a man of courage and independent judgment. This is the type of person we want right throughout our public service and heading all our crown corporations.

I should like to quote a few words that Adlai Stevenson used on television a few months ago. He said:

> More important than winning the election is governing the nation. This is the final test of a political party, the acid final test. When the tumult and the shouting die there remains the stark reality of responsibility.

I feel, sir, that governing a country, with problems as complex as those of Canada, calls for skills and ability on the part of key public servants probably exceeding those that are necessary even to preside over ministries.

May I turn to a matter of historic interest, namely the Brockville railway station. This is a subject that has commanded the attention of this parliament in years past. George T. Fulford and my predecessor, Hayden Stanton, both expressed themselves in strong terms about our station. While it is of considerable interest to local historians we feel that this building erected I think in the month of June, 1856, as the terminal of the Grand Trunk Railway, has perhaps outlived its functional usefulness. Now we would like to present it to Upper Canada Village.

I was able to find in the library of parliament a book entitled "A Souvenir of Brockville". Judging by the costumes, the bicycles, the hoop skirts and so on depicted in the illustrations I think it was probably produced about the time of Queen Victoria's jubilee. I see parasols in sailboats, paddlewheels and things of that kind. The only thing in those photographs of early Brockville that really reminds one of the Brockville of today are the islands and, of course, the post office which the Minister of Public Works has so recently promised to replace very shortly and our station.

I spoke to a telegrapher who went to Brockville in 1901. He tells me that in those days the station looked exactly as it does today. I think that is not quite correct because, fortuitously, between July 26 and August 3, 1910 there was a Grand Trunk strike during which some damage was done to the station. I say fortuitously because after the windows and the doors were repaired our station was smartened up just a bit. Since that time, except for the addition of flush toilets, there has been no change for the better.

Now we see certain changes that are disturbing. We find that the yard office, which is being discontinued, now occupies a corner of the old station. In place of two waiting rooms we now have one. The express depot at the station is being shifted to a freight shed. The car repair division of the Manitoba yards and the brake inspection department are being cut down and the operation of shops curtailed.

We do recognize that certain things must give way to progress. It may be that there have to be fundamental changes affecting our railroad families, but there was a time when in Brockville there were 700 to 800 railroaders. These were great people. They are the people who laid the foundation of my Thousand islands city, and their descendants have contributed very largely to the progress of this country. We now have fast diesel freights going right through Brockville, and whatever happens in the future earnest regard must be given to what will happen to the railroaders of Brockville who are involved.

In 1854 Brockville was the end of the line for anyone travelling to western Canada from Montreal. People then took a boat and travelled by water up the river past Kingston to Belleville. But now the situation is different. Brockville is almost midway between the two great metropolitan areas of Montreal and Toronto. I put it to the house earnestly that Brockville is in the most exciting area for new industrial development in Canada. We have the facilities in eastern Ontario for far reaching industrial expansion. If any part of Canada is bound to go forward in the next decade, it surely is this part, I urge the administration to please give us a new station and very soon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Levis.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You will soon run out of members.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): It does not not look like it. A couple more are going to speak.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) are most surprising, considering that we are discussing a bill which involves an expenditure of over $200 million. I find it strange that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, whose department is directly responsible for ensuring that the funds voted by this house are properly spent, should object to our taking a few hours of the time of the house to scrutinize this bill, as members conscious of their responsibilities should do.

In addition, I find it strange that he takes exception to the fact that we look fully into a bill which represents an expenditure of almost one quarter of a billion dollars. I suppose that the hon. member for Carleton made his objection without thinking and that now he regrets it.

(Text):

Mr. Denis: Shame, shame.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the matter at hand involves public funds exceeding $200 million to enable the C.N.R. to make capital expenditures during the calendar year of 1960 in the amount of $178 million and at the same time to authorize expenditures of $76 million for 1962, in addition to other expenses of $44 million.

Those amounts include expenditures with regard to road property and, if I am not mistaken, this means the maintenance of many miles of railway tracks owned by railway companies, including the C.N.R., as well as the bridges scattered over thousands of miles of railways belonging to that company.

Well, I have a point I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and, in this matter, he would want to relay our suggestions and recommendations to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) who is more directly responsible for consulting with C.N.R. authorities. It is a most important matter which I think has not been raised in the house. It has to do with passenger safety.

I had the oportunity, in 1958, to remind the house that in my district alone, that is the Levis district, there had been 80 section gangs and that, in the autumn of 1957, their number was reduced from 80 to 50. As an engineer and one with some experience in the construction of bridges, I am well aware of the dangers of leaving bridges in such a condition that they constitute a threat for the travelling public. In fact, each year there are millions of persons travelling on our trains, trusting that railway authorities do their best to keep bridges and railways in good repair.

Well, when you find that a division comprising 80 sections or 80 gangs looking after the tracks, has been reduced, you wonder whether passenger safety is being adequately provided for today. It is a known fact and I know it in my capacity as an engineer that, particularly in the spring at flood time, the water in a river will often erode the abutment piers of a bridge. That is why I find it deplorable that the number of these maintenance gangs has been reduced.

You know by experience, Mr. Speaker, what care is taken by air lines and how everything is checked before the plane leaves.

I wonder why the same precautions are not taken in the case of railways on which, as I say, millions of passengers are travelling each year. I draw once again the attention of the minister to this point for I believe it is an important one. It may be said that there has been no serious accident so far. That may be so. But, on the other hand, who knows what the future holds? That is why I ask the minister to get in touch with the management of the C.N.R. and to make them understand that if they must cut down some expenses they should not however endanger the security of the travelling public.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to another aspect of the question. It concerns a recommendation in the report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping—unfortunately, I do not have the French copy with me—to the effect that continuous efforts be made in order to increase the corporate feeling and the confidence among employees. I believe that this is an important aspect of the question. I do not intend to belabour the point for it seems to me that the relations between management and labour have their importance in a company which numbers nearly 100,000 employees.

I am glad to see that the committee has particularly drawn the attention of the railway authorities on this subject, and I will not deal with it any longer. I have had the opportunity in the past to prove that the morale of the employees is low at the present time, for the simple reason that when statistics tell them that each year 4,000 or 5,000 railway employees with 15, 20 or 25 years of service are fired, they have reason to fear, for they live in uncertainty, not knowing what tomorrow holds for them.

Well, as I said, I am glad that the committee has drawn that problem to the attention of the railways, and I hope that the management will not only read the report, but that they will carry out its recommendations.

I believe that all companies today have their personnel division. Well, I think steps will have to be taken in order to give railway employees the feeling they are doing a worthwhile job and that they are in no danger of losing their jobs at a moment's notice. Because we know that there are not many railways here in Canada, and when a railroader loses his job, it is quite difficult for him to rehabilitate himself in another company.

There is another point with which I should like to deal, sir, that of the administrative system reorganization. I mentioned that in January and I mention it again today because, apparently, nothing has been done about it.

In the past, we had three regions: the Atlantic region, the Central region and the Pacific region. Today, we have five: Atlantic, St. Lawrence, Great Lakes, prairies and mountain.

In January I pointed out—I cannot repeat all I said then—that due to management reorganization, a section in the province of Quebec was attached to the Atlantic region.

I make that remark because the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Creaghan) seemed to think at that time that I was opposed to the headquarters for that region being in Moncton.

Such thoughts were far from my mind because in my opinion the place I just mentioned is truly the logical center of operations for that region.

However, there is a fact I oppose, and I am not the only one who takes that position.

Mr. Speaker, you had an opportunity yourself to see in the newspapers of our district representations made by the municipal councils and various public bodies concerned giving the reasons for their action. Those reasons had nothing to do with matters of language nor were they inspired by fanaticism.

The matter was only of an administrative nature which could bring more benefits to the district extending from Riviere du Loup through the Matapedia valley, to Campbellton and Gaspe. I hope that even though the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is not here, my remarks will reach the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer).

I hope that this matter will again be taken up with the railway authorities so that this section I mentioned earlier may become a part of the St. Lawrence rather than of the Atlantic region.

Those Mr. Speaker, were the few remarks I wanted to make. I tried to make them as short as possible.

And as they usually say on the government side, I hope those matters will be duly and seriously considered by the government.

(Text):

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): This afternoon we are considering in this bill the requirements of Canadian National Railways, a great national enterprise. It is an enterprise, however, which has operated under great difficulties for a number of years. It is a federation of many companies put into business for various reasons at various times, and has assumed liabilities which put it in a uniquely difficult position to compete, not only with the other major railway system in this country but also with other forms of transportation. Canadian National has a capital structure which is complicated and, in the opinion of many people, onerous.

To those, Mr. Speaker, who are interested in state planning, the growth and development of the railway systems of this country makes an interesting story. The technical changes which we have seen throughout the years were impossible to foresee. Not only do we have in many places an excess of rail capacity, but new modes of transportation have arisen to provide competition which could not possibly have been anticipated during the period when the railway systems were inaugurated. Who could have foreseen, at the turn of the century, what the future would hold? Who could foresee what the advent of the airplane would do to travel concepts?

In 1959, Mr. Speaker, we celebrated the 50th anniversary of powered flight in Canada. From a time when an airplane was able to fly only a few yards across the ice, we have now come to the point in the evolution of this miraculous machine where airplanes can travel thousands of miles at very high speeds. May I say in passing that I regret the recent death of the pilot of the first aircraft, Air Commodore McCurdy.

Air transportation has undergone a gradually explosive evolution. I remember as a boy on the farm those beautiful silver winged aircraft, the DC-3's, as they passed over en route from Buffalo to Detroit. I recall the glamour that they had and the spirit of adventure which seemed to lay behind them. I watched with great interest the evolution which has taken place in the aircraft industry since that time. The DC-3 was the first great workhorse of the air lines, the aircraft which really put modern air line companies into business. It has just recently been retired from service on our major air lines in Canada but is still in service elsewhere throughout the world. Each successive aircraft has been more comfortable and faster. We have had in this country a succession of aircraft designs to the point where Trans-Canada Air Lines now boasts the position of being the first all-jet air line.

We have all heard the stories from the second world war of those hair-raising flights across the Atlantic ocean in bucket seats, with oxygen masks. We have heard some of the interesting and exciting tales of dangerous and unforgettable flights not only into danger in the service of this country in the pursuit of winning the war. Since then aircraft have been designed and put into service which make those aircraft seem like antiques of another age. Turbo jet and pure jet engines have made a tremendous contribution to the development of not only safe but comfortable air travel. Trans-Canada Air Lines main fleet of turbo jet aircraft is capable of flying at speeds in the range of 285 to 350 miles per hour. This reduces the air travel time between points in Canada very substantially indeed.

Then of course with the advent of the pure jet engine more recently—the DC-8's with speeds of approximately 550 miles per hour—the travelling time has been almost cut in half from that of the turbo prop aircraft. Today we have very comfortable air travel at very high altitudes. This, again, is a departure from previous days and has only been made possible with the pure jet engine. When flying at altitudes of approximately 35,000 feet one usually flies above the weather on a smooth course and with all the luxury and comfort of home or the club.

Of course, the end is not yet in sight. Supersonic aircraft are on the drawing boards which will triple the speed of existing jet air-liners. Aircraft with speeds of 1,500 miles per hour are now in military service and it is only a matter of a few short years until aircraft of comparable speeds will be introduced into commercial air line service. When that becomes a reality it will be possible to fly from Ottawa to Europe, for example, in two hours, or from Ottawa to Vancouver in a comparable time. We will have a two-hour flight from coast to coast or from one side of the ocean to the other side of the ocean. It is almost unbelievable, and yet this has all taken place within a period of a few decades.

As the speed of aircraft increases the ground time due to inadequate planning and traffic congestion is becoming an increasing proportion of the total travel time. But notwithstanding this confusion on the ground it is still possible to travel very great distances in relatively very short periods of time. All this has a direct bearing on rail transport. People who in previous times travelled by train now prefer to travel by air. Just as the automobile and the autobus have provided great competition for trains on short runs, so the airplane has largely supplanted long range train travel. As wages and salaries rise time becomes more valuable, and time saved by air travel on long hauls more than compensates for any small difference in the fares.

In addition to air travel the trains are now subject to another form of competition. With the opening of large sections of the trans-Canada highway the casual traveller who is not in a great hurry can enjoy the flexibility of scenic highway travel in the luxury of his own auto. This great Canadian achievement inaugurated, as most great Canadian achievements have been, under the previous Liberal administration is adding tremendously to the flexibility of Canadian transportation. We hope it will not be too long before it will be possible to drive from coast to coast on the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Inaugurated by you people.

Mr. Hellyer: We started it and I would not be surprised, bearing in mind the speed with which the present government is progressing, if we are able to open it also. With the completion of large sections of this highway it is possible for truck transport to compete more favourably with other forms of transportation. The net result of these various forms of competition is a falling off of passenger traffic for our railroads and the occurrence of heavy losses. Indeed, we have been told that the day of the trans-continental passenger train may be near an end. This raises a feeling of nostalgia for anyone who has ever travelled across the country by train. It also raises the very real question as to whether or not in the national interest it is desirable to maintain at least a minimum rail service on the main routes.

There are many questions involved. For example there is the question of weather. As any air traveller knows, there are sometimes periods of days, sometimes stretching into a week or more, when the weather at a terminal point is not satisfactory for air travel and when landing conditions are such that air travel is not allowed because of safety requirements. During these periods it is often necessary for travellers to avail themselves of train services regardless of their usual travelling habits.

There is also the question of national safety and survival. What would we do in the case of nuclear attack, for example? Would the railroads be required to move personnel and supplies? Just what precautions should be taken in the national interest in order to keep a minimum service available in case it is required? This question should be investigated and a decision made with all the factors in mind. If a subsidy is necessary to maintain a service, the cost will have to be equated with the benefit. At least at the outset the question of whether or not a minimum service should be maintained on the major national routes should be determined. If it is considered in the public interest that such a service should be maintained, then the financial aspect should be taken into consideration. If it requires subsidies, this is something that would have to be done as a result of the national policy.

In their freight services, too, the railroads are subject to much competition. It was not long ago that many of us had the opportunity of travelling to Montreal to witness the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway. It was a grand occasion, with Her Majesty the Queen and the President of the United States in attendance. Visiting dignitaries from both sides of the border joined hands in a great international transportation project. It was a day which will long be remembered in the history of this country. But it was not just the day which will be remembered. It was the work which went into that great project, the culmination of a dream of decades—the culmination of an engineering project which taxed the imagination of the whole world. Now the St. Lawrence seaway ranks as one of the great engineering marvels of the world and contributes to a great internal waterway as part of the Canadian transport system.

In addition, there has been phenomenal growth in the trucking industry. This has proved to be a very flexible form of cargo handling. It has many advantages. A truck can be loaded and unloaded at the points of origin and destination without the cargo having to be transshipped. On many types of haul it is cheaper as well as more flexible to use this type of transportation. With the opening of large sections of the trans-Canada highway, the growth of the trucking industry will undoubtedly increase, and as it does so competition between the trucking industry and the railroad will become keener.

I have received a number of complaints with respect to subsidies granted by parliament to the railroads. But it should be remembered that the railroads are not the only form of public transport to have been subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. Almost since the early days of this country it has been necessary for the public to subsidize one form of transportation after another beginning, first of all, with the canals. The canals of this country were built at great expense. For example, until the St. Lawrence seaway was opened no tolls were charged on the Welland canal even though its construction had involved a considerable initial capital outlay. Even since the opening of the seaway the recovery from tolls on the canal has been designed to recoup only the additional cost of making that canal suitable for shipping of deeper draught which is now able to use the canal. By and large, throughout the history of this country, tolls have not been collected on our canal system. In addition, dockage charges have in no respect been sufficient to recover for the federal treasury the large capital outlays which were required to build them in the first instance. The fact is that the whole of our canal and shipping facilities, which have required a tremendous capital outlay, were in the first instance provided as a public service to contribute to the growth and development of our transportation system to serve all the Canadian people.

The second major development was the railroads. Here again, millions of dollars have been involved in subsidies from the time when the railroads were first built. It was a deliberate decision based on national policy that the Canadian people should make capital and land available in order to permit and encourage the development of railroads in order that there might be a Canadian nation. This remains national policy. It is part of the price of Canadian nationhood.

Now I turn to the trucking industry. Here again, highways from coast to coast have been built at public expense. There are few, if any, toll collections on Canadian roads. There are some, as you know, Mr. Speaker, in the United States. They have a number of toll "thruways". It has been suggested that it might be a good idea if we were to follow their example and build some toll roads. But the Canadian temperament thus far has been of contrary mind. Thus far it has provided roads as a public service and made them available to all the citizens of this country as well as to visitors who come here from other countries. But in so doing, the Canadian taxpayers, through their various levels of government, national, provincial and municipal, have been obliged to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in order that an acceptable network of roads and highways through our various provinces, and now from coast to coast, might be built. It is true we do have a few bridges, including international bridges, on which tolls are collected, but these are an exception rather than the standard practice. Hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies are involved in the roads which are a foundation of the trucking part of our transportation industry.

Finally, I turn to air travel. Again, very heavy public subsidies have been required. These subsidies, if they have not already done so, will soon run into hundreds of millions of dollars. One need only examine the cost of new terminal facilities at our great travel centres, such as Montreal, Toronto and the other great cities across the country to realize this and to realize also the cost of building and extending runways to meet the needs of modern jet transport.

I remember Mr. Justice Abbott when he was minister of finance talking of the very heavy public participation in the building up of an air transportation system in Canada. Again, this was a matter of national policy. It has always been a matter of pride that our national air line, Trans-Canada Air Lines, has been able to pay its way, having many surpluses during the course of its operation. This has been a matter of pride to the shareholders, the Canadian nation, but it must be realized that in order that this might be done it has been necessary, first of all, to give Trans-Canada Air Lines the privilege of a monopoly arrangement in serving the major traffic areas of this country. At the same time, no effort has been made to collect tolls which would be sufficient to pay for the terminal facilities and runways at our Canadian airports. These have been paid from the public purse.

It is not conclusive for any one form of transportation in Canada to complain about the subsidy of any other. In order to be able to consider these complaints with some objectivity it would be necessary to have some basis for comparison. To the best of my knowledge transportation subsidies have usually been treated on an ad hoc basis. Perhaps this has been inevitable as our country grew and developed from infancy. However, I feel now the time has come when we should seek some over-all comparative standard.

I am not suggesting it is desirable or necessary to try to equate the subsidy in each. I do not know; it may be desirable to try to do so, then again it might not be desirable. At least it would be helpful to have some sort of standard at which to look. I would, therefore, recommend that a royal commission be appointed to examine into the history and development of the major forms of transportation in Canada, and in particular to determine in so far as possible the extent of public subsidy involved in each existing major form of transportation.

I realize that such a study would not be easy. The difference in purchasing power of currency from time to time, for example, would have to be equated, but I am convinced that would be a worthwhile exercise and that the result would act as a guide to parliament and to the Canadian people when considering public transportation policy. It might also provide some interesting information to those persons engaged in the transportation field who believe that each of the competing systems is subsidized unfairly to the detriment of their own particular position.

In recommending the appointment of a royal commission I would say that I should not expect it would make a report before the next general election, and that after the election it would report to a new government not only capable of benefiting from the information but capable of taking action if action seemed to be necessary following the report.

This bill before us today also involves an ad hoc measure. It commits the government of Canada to very sizeable obligations and the question arises as to where the money will come from. The Minister of Finance in his very interesting budget speech of a few days ago outlined to the house not only a budgetary deficit of some $650 million arrived at on the basis of a growth potential which the minister declined to make public, but in addition to that, the further need of several hundreds of millions of dollars for other requirements such as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the industrial development bank, the exchange fund, this bill before us and other measures. The minister has not yet, however, satisfied this house as to where the capital can be obtained. The minister knows full well, as has been disclosed, that the generations of savings on the part of the Canadian people is not sufficient to meet all of the demands. It is not sufficient to meet the demands of private development when added to that figure is the public capital expenditure, the public current deficit and the other cash requirements such as those I have just mentioned, including those set out in the bill now before us.

Mr. Speaker, you shake your head with incredulity—

Mr. Drysdale: I do not blame him.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not blame Mr. Speaker either because there is simply no source from which this money can come. There is, of course, the possibility that it may be made up by the inflow of capital from the United States of America as has been happening in the past, but as the minister has said, it is no longer of the policy of this government to encourage capital inflow and control—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I just indicate to the hon. member that I am glad he mentioned the movement of my head because I should not want the record to show that I approved of the relevancy of his remarks.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your interest in this scintillating debate. If capital inflow were encouraged perhaps that would make up the difference between the savings generated and that amount of money required to meet not only the private but public capital expenditures. Even at the old rate of inflow, let alone at the lesser figure, it will be insufficient to meet all of these various needs. How is the gap to be closed? The minister has yet to tell us. Is he going to print money and inflate the Canadian currency? Is that how he is going to make up the difference between the savings generated by the Canadian economy and the requirements of public and private investment in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it going to be made up by further capital inflow from the United States? Surely the minister should explain to the house just how the difference is to be reconciled.

An hon. Member: He already has.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I hear from the benches opposite that he has already explained, but that is not the case. He has not indicated how he can reconcile the discrepancy between the savings available in Canada for investment both public and private, and the requirements for investment both in the public and private sectors of the economy. That is the great mystery behind this current budget, and that is the thing which has not been explained to the satisfaction of the financial world or to the satisfaction of this house.

There is little wonder that, under the circumstances, we hesitate to agree without considerable objection to these measures put before this house by the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you going to vote against this bill?

Mr. Hellyer: This is a matter of the utmost urgency.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you going to vote against it?

Mr. Hellyer: Where is the money to come from? By what sleight of hand does the minister intend to make it available? By what measure of hocus pocus can he reconcile figures which are hundreds of millions of dollars apart? How is he going to pile on top of the savings generated by the Canadian economy the hundreds of millions of dollars necessary to meet the difference required by his budgetary deficit?

Mr. Drysdale: Are you against it or in favour of it?

Mr. Hellyer: The Minister of Finance completely refuses to make this information available; he completely refuses to tell the Canadian people how it can be done. Is it any wonder that we have a financial crisis in this country unprecedented in the history of the Canadian nation? Is it any wonder that people all across the face of the earth are losing confidence in the Canadian economy? Is it any wonder that there is a push on the Canadian dollar? Is it any wonder that we have reason to ask the minister to explain to us where he intends to raise the money required to meet the obligations set out in this bill? This has not been explained and the minister has made no attempt to do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am full of explanations if I can get a chance to make a reply.

Mr. Hellyer: You are full of something but I am not sure it is explanations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You do not want them.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is full of this cold invigorating Ottawa air which comes down from the north.

Mr. Drysdale: It is better than hot air.

Mr. Hellyer: Regardless of which it is, the government has plenty of it.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Talk about the bill.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, to come back to the bill, let me say this. We are asked to incur obligations here involving many millions of dollars. As has been so brilliantly pointed out by those who have spoken on this side, we have not yet been told who is going to run the railroad.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is this the first time or the twelfth time?

Mr. Hellyer: We have not yet been told who the board of directors will consist of. Surely the minister has terrible gall to come before parliament and ask for this commitment when he refuses to say who the chairman of the board will be.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Drysdale: Do you feel Mr. Gordon should be fired?

Mr. Hellyer: Will the chairman of the board and the president of the railway continue to be one and the same person, or does the government intend to separate these two functions and have two persons, one the president and the other the chairman of the board? Is the minister willing to answer these questions for us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, as soon as you sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: I will sit down in a moment. I hope you will answer these questions and all those asked by my honourable colleagues. Will the president continue to be the chairman of the board? When will his reappointment take place? When will the appointment of the other members of the board take place? I refer to those who have not been reappointed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member sits down I will answer the questions.

Mr. Hellyer: If I really believed the minister, if I thought my sitting down would speed up the reappointment of the chairman of the board and those of the directors who have not been reappointed I would quickly do so. I do not think it really would. I do not think this government is capable of meeting any of the real commitments which face it. I think it is so involved in the web of its own chaos that it does not know which way to turn and this bill we have before us is just one more example.

Mr. Chevrier: Procrastination.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): After this filibuster?

Mr. Hellyer: Chaos and financial crisis; that is the situation in which we are placed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't talk about procrastination.

Mr. Hellyer: A deficit of hundreds of millions of dollars on current account; cash requirements of hundreds of millions of dollars on other accounts; tens of millions of dollars required for the Canadian National Railways and no indication of what the deficit of the Canadian National Railways is likely to be in the year ahead.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is evidence on that.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the minister read the latest figures that show that freight car loadings are away down in the first six months of this year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did the hon. member not hear the evidence before the committee?

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has refused to tell us the rate of growth that he expects in the Canadian economy. How then can we judge for ourselves the accuracy of the figures? What was the figure the minister used to work out his anticipated deficit of $645 million? Was it 5 per cent? Was it 6 per cent? Was it 7 per cent? Am I getting hot?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You never were hot.

Mr. Hellyer: How close am I? Is it twice the figure of 3 per cent? What is it? On what basis does the minister arrive at the conclusion that his current deficit will be only $650 million?

Mr. Drysdale: After all, it is only five minutes to six.

Mr. Hellyer: How does he intend to reconcile the cash requirements with the savings available to meet them? These are the great unanswered questions of today. These are fundamental to the controversy raging in the country. These are fundamental to the loss of confidence in the minister and these are the reasons which prompted the hon. member for Essex East and others to call for the minister's resignation.

Mr. Drysdale: Your finest hour.

Mr. Hellyer: Surely we are entitled to know the anticipated growth in the Canadian economy. Surely we are entitled to know the figure the minister has used. How else can we determine what is likely to be the requirement for rail service, how else can we tell if it is wise to put this further capital into our transportation system?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't you know?

Mr. Hellyer: We do not know what the minister is doing; we have doubts whether the minister himself knows what he is doing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't you know whether or not it is wise to put this money into the system?

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has not yet made it clear whether or not the growth of the Canadian economy is going to justify the expenses he has in mind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You want to stunt the system?

Mr. Hellyer: The thing that is stunted is not the system; the thing that is stunted is the growth of this country.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Do you think it is unwise to do this?

Mr. Hellyer: This is a sad commentary—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member realizes it, too?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How right you are.

Mr. Hellyer: I am full of sadness for the minister when he has to come before parliament without any answers to the real questions of the day and, with the gall that only the minister has, ask hon. members on this side of the house to vote for a bill without any of the real questions being answered.

Mr. Drysdale: Are they going to do it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought hon. members wanted some explanations and some answers, Mr. Speaker. I am ready to give them. I cannot speak until all the other members have spoken. Therefore, I will give way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then just sit down and don't take up time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought they wanted an explanation.

Mr. Hellyer: We will give you a few extra minutes to get the answers ready.

Mr. Chevrier: He would not answer the questions anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister did answer, what credence would we place in the answers?

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): There remain but a few moments to discuss on behalf of those in the Niagara riding the bill now before the house. I have the honour to represent a riding which at one time contained a large railroad town namely the town of Fort Erie; but in the past few years there has been an increasing cut in the services which are provided and a concomitant cut in the number of individuals employed in the railway yards at Fort Erie. Unhappily this state of affairs has not been confined to Fort Erie, since it has extended also to the other end of my riding of Niagara Falls and indeed all across Canada.

All hon. members appreciate, as do most people in the country, the necessity of conversion from steam to dieselization, the necessity to speed up service in order that the people of Canada will be obtaining for the vast sums which each year they vote an efficient and economic service. But, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion we are again being asked to vote an immense sum of money for which it is difficult to see a return to the Canadian people.

This afternoon I do not intend to discuss the cessation of service in my riding. I have mentioned this before, both in committee and in the house. I do, however, wish to bring to the attention of this house a matter with respect to the Canadian National system as it affects my riding and areas close to it. It has been referred to in the committee also and previously it was referred to in this house by my colleague, the hon. member for Welland. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Lincoln is not in his place, since this has considerable reference to his constituents, at least those who work in his riding although many of them live in my riding.

I am referring to pensions, although I almost hesitate to use the word because of what the Prime Minister said in the past two days and what the Minister of Finance has been saying. However, I dare now to say I wish to speak this afternoon on pensions, Mr. Speaker. I will admit that the question of pensions of the type to which I wish to refer arose previous to the question of those to which we have been referring lately. I hope that this government which already has, through the Minister of Finance, indicated that it is interested in the portability of pensions by setting up a commission to study the matter, does not mean by "portability", as we might have gathered in the last few days, doing away with pensions. Indeed, those individuals to whom I wish to refer have had their pensions abolished.

Last night I watched television and I heard Mr. Richard Jackson of the press gallery speak. He is often said to be a fair man and one who has the Prime Minister's ear. This afternoon I saw his article in the Ottawa Journal in which he indicated that, because of a reference made yesterday by the Prime Minister, top civil servants in this city, in my riding and in other places have need to fear the loss of their pensions because of the remark of the Prime Minister when he said not this pension but "these vast swollen pensions deserve to be looked into". I refer to the Prime Minister's remarks as reported at page 7694 of Hansard. To those who might say—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is quite improper to refer to what has been said in another debate this session which has been concluded. The house has concluded that debate and it is quite against the rules of the house to make reference to something said in that other debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: More closure. More gagging.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The closure is from this irresponsible member who stopped a member on this side from speaking.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Miss LaMarsh: I bring in this matter because it has relevancy to the pensions of the Canadian National to which I wish to refer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may make reference to but she may not discuss the problem which was raised in the other debate. I hesitate to give any direction to the hon. member because she is not much more out of order than most of those who have already spoken.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is the other point too. It is a matter of relevancy. The Prime Minister was speaking about something entirely different. The hon. member now is attempting evidently to apply what the Prime Minister said on an entirely different subject to the matter of C.N.R. pensions. The Prime Minister was not talking about C.N.R. pensions or anything resembling them.

Mr. Chevrier: Why don't you accept the ruling of the Speaker?

Miss LaMarsh: I was seeking to point out that in the case to which I am referring pensions were done away with and this appears to be what the Prime Minister has indicated he intends to do in the case of civil servants.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is total nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: By his favourite press man.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is preposterous misinterpretation.

Mr. Pickersgill: By Jackson of the Journal. You had better read your favourite press man.

Mr. Brunsden: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, is it in order for an hon. member to quote local newspapers and the C.B.C. as authority for statements?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, the pensions to which I have reference are those which have been done away with lately involving 75 individuals in St. Catharines. Within the last few years another 150 employees of the Canadian National have been unjustly deprived of their pensions. These three groups of individuals, one located in the riding of the Minister of Labour, one in the riding of Lincoln and one in Niagara Falls, were employees of street railways originally and then street bus lines which were operated by the Canadian National. The employees were included in the pension plan as is every other employee of Canadian National Railways.

About two years ago Canadian National decided to abandon its franchise in the city of Oshawa. It gave notice to this effect and a private bill had to be enacted in order that the municipality could take over the operation of the buses. The same thing happened in Niagara Falls and in Stamford in the riding of Niagara Falls last year. At that time, before I came to this house, I drafted a private bill which incorporated the greater Niagara transit commission and I dealt in some detail with the matter of the pensions of the employees who were suddenly thrown out of work by the actions of the C.N.R.

Very shortly, Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of September the same thing will occur in the riding of Lincoln where the city of St. Catharines has received notice from the C.N.R. of the abandonment of its franchise. That city is now required to seek special legislation to set up its own transit commission and, if possible, to employ those who are no longer employed as bus drivers by the C.N.R.

Under the provisions of the pension plan there are two types of pensions. One is payable by the C.N.R. in the amount of $25 a month whether or not there has ever been any prior contribution and each of these employees is, of course, entitled to that. This is a maximum of $300 a year. There have been other pension plans set up, however, and that most recently in effect is a contributory one. I should like to refer to the pension plan booklet which is issued to employees coming under the plan and which contains questions and answers with respect to the rules. I have reference to rule 11 and in the booklet there is the following question:

What do I receive if my service is terminated?

This is the answer:

If your service is terminated and you do not qualify for pension benefits, your own contributions will be refunded, together with interest to the date your service is terminated if that date is a year or more from your last entry into service. Your service will not be considered terminated if you are laid off but only when you leave or are discharged.

There is no provision within the pension plan for service which is discontinued and is not replaced. Because the C.N.R. has no comparable service anywhere else in Canada, it is not possible to retain these people in service, and only a very few out of the three groups in Oshawa, Niagara Falls and St. Catharines have been retrained and used elsewhere.

The problem is, of course, that when a municipality is called upon to give a bus service and sets up its own transit commission it does not do this as a profit making venture. Indeed, no municipality would go into the field if there were any way of avoiding it. The ground upon which Canadian National has abandoned these services is that they are uneconomical. Although the municipalities have tried very hard, they have been unable to find anyone who will undertake the service or incorporate a new company and operate the service unless it be done under a subsidy. Because it is not considered a good proposal, all three municipalities in question have in fact set up their own municipal corporations to operate these bus services. They are asked to take over the employees of the C.N.R. who, at a time of great unemployment in southern Ontario, are without employment and without any hope of employment. Some of these people, Mr. Speaker, as of the time they are laid off are only a matter of weeks away from regular retirement on a full pension.

I think everyone in the house knows what the problem is, how are these people to retain the benefits of the pension to which they have contributed for many many years? When they are retired they receive payment of their contributions with interest, of course, but they are not able to take this amount and enter into a brand new pension scheme with their new municipal employers and obtain the same benefits at the same date of retirement.

Representations were made in Oshawa and strenuously in the Niagara area and have been going on for months now. In fact, solicitors on behalf of the unions and solicitors on behalf of the city have attended on the Minister of Transport and the president of Canadian National Railways with requests that some consideration be given in this regard. I raised the matter in the sessional committee and I was told at that time that it was being considered. In fact it had been considered on two prior occasions and both times the portability element was rejected.

At this time there is only a matter of a few weeks remaining in which some action may be taken in order that the pension portion paid by C.N.R. into the fund or at least credited as a bookkeeping entry shall be transferred to a new pension scheme to be operated by the municipality. If not, Mr. Speaker, the result will be that another set of taxpayers, the ratepayers in the communities of St. Catharines and Niagara Falls, will themselves through their taxes be required to subsidize the new pension scheme. This means, of course, that the subsidy principle which Canada has adopted and which we are furthering in this bill, whereby the cost of C.N.R. services across the country is borne by all Canadians, will have been breached for there will be a shifting from all Canadians to individual Canadians in a particular limited area. The position taken by the union, and I respectfully suggest to the house it was a proper one, is that the amounts paid in on behalf of the employer, the Canadian National, are amounts which were in effect fringe benefits to the employees, and having been paid in they are part of the wages to which those employees were entitled.

The minister said in his budget speech that he approved of the principle of portability. I ask the minister to consider that here is perhaps the first place within the government service that portability might be applied. There is, Mr. Speaker, little more that I can say in respect of this. These requests have been taken to the Minister of Transport, to the house, to the committee and to the president of Canadian National. This is a matter which applies to a limited number of people and which has worked a very great injustice. It will further work a great injustice upon these people in the community who may now have to take on these former employees in a new service. I ask the Minister of Finance to consider the appropriateness of this subject since he, and the right hon. gentleman who shares his seat, have already taken a position in respect of other pensions, and about getting rid of these other pensions.

Is the fact that the government stood idly by and allowed these 75 people to have their pensions taken from them, some indication of what the government intends in respect of the governor of the Bank of Canada and other senior civil servants, as was reported in this evening's Journal? If so, not only are these railway employees now without jobs in my area to be frightened that all the money they have paid into the pension has gone for nothing, that their contractual rights are disregarded by the government, but other senior civil servants in the service of Canada must also fear whether what they have paid in by way of contribution in the past will be, by this government which has paid lip service to the bill of rights, disregarded in the same way.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the position taken at the beginning of the day on this measure by the hon. member for Laurier. I refer to the disgraceful attitude of the government with respect to Mr. Donald Gordon and the directors of Canadian National who, for nine months and eight days, have been kept in suspense as to whether or not they are to retain their positions.

Yesterday in this house we watched the leader of the government wield the axe. Today, we are discussing a genlteman who has given long and great service to this country, who for nine months and eight days has been kept under suspended sentence, not knowing upon which day the axe will strike his neck or whether he may get another reprieve. How anyone can expect the greatest railway on the North American continent to be run well under circumstances of that sort, I cannot understand and neither can any other reasonable person in this country. It is just more evidence, if any more were needed, of the total incapacity of Her Majesty's present ministers to come to any decision on anything except when the Prime Minister gets into one of those hysterical rages and makes a decision, as he so obviously showed yesterday had happened in the case of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The position on which I rest our case is the position of the hon. member for Laurier. It is this parliament that is sovereign and not the right hon. gentleman. It is this parliament that is in final control of the affairs of this country and not the right hon. gentleman and his messenger boy colleagues. It is this parliament that has a right to know how all these affairs are going to be carried on before money is voted. It is this parliament that has the right, before hundreds of millions of dollars are committed to a company, to know who is going to be the head of that company. As the hon. member for Laurier has said, we only know who will be the head perhaps until Monday. I do not suppose the government will have a cabinet meeting on Sunday and change the head of the railway, although they might. If they act in the way in which they usually act, they will wait until parliament is out of the way before they do this. They will show the respect for parliament which they have shown in every other matter, and which they showed when the Minister of Finance tried to go behind the back of parliament on another occasion about an officer who was responsible not to him or to the government but to parliament, and tried to subvert the rights of parliament.

The president of the Canadian National is in a different category. The president of Canadian National is the head of a crown company, but not an officer of parliament. The government, it is quite true, has the right, under the statute, to appoint the chairman; but we, sir, this sovereign parliament, have the right to know who that chairman is going to be, and whether or not we should give confidence to a government that appoints that kind of chairman before we are asked to vote this kind of money. This is the principle of responsible government. We heard language yesterday in this house, and if we had closed our eyes, it would have sounded like language that was heard before 1939 in the Reichstag.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making about as many references to the debate of yesterday as he is to the bill. By doing so he invites reply in connection with yesterday's debate which has been concluded. I would trust the hon. member would confine himself to the Canadian National Railways, its direction and management of affairs.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, to bring to your attention the fact that this morning, on an earlier occasion, the Speaker who occupied the Chair permitted a number of references in order to draw a parallel between what was happening in this case and what was happening in other cases. There was a long harangue in connection with the point of order, but it was allowed. I bring it to your attention now so that there will not be two rulings on the subject matter. I submit with deference to Your Honour that—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: —the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is in order, and is doing exactly what I was allowed to do earlier today.

Mr. Speaker: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: I may call it six o'clock, now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what the business will be on Monday?

Mr. Churchill: On Monday we will start with the income tax bill, followed by the one we are on now, the Canadian National financing bill; then, the resolution concerning dominion-provincial tax-sharing arrangements. If that is completed, then we have the Civil Service Act and interim supply. I propose moving, either Monday or Tuesday, if we are still here on Tuesday, concurrence in the report on procedure which was tabled today.

May I just add that when I mentioned the Income Tax Act, this is not now under the restriction which I mentioned for today, which was on the basis that if we adjourned today we would go only as far as second reading. Not having adjourned today, we shall continue with all stages of that bill.

Mr. Chevrier: On that point, Mr. Speaker, I would bring to the attention of the house leader the statement which he made during the course of the debate yesterday when he rose on business of the house to say that all stages of this bill would not be taken, but to indicate that second reading only would be taken and it would not go into committee.

Mr. Churchill: It was dependent on adjournment tonight, and the adjournment did not take place tonight for reasons which are well known to the entire house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An all-day filibuster here.

Mr. Chevrier: The adjournment did not take place tonight for the very simple reason that this house had a perfect right to deal with the measure before it—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An all-day filibuster.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I submit, with deference, sir—

Mr. Harkness: The Speaker is on his feet. Can you not observe the rules?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: I intend to—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Ricard: The Speaker is on his feet.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member permit me. A debate is not permissible at this stage of the day. The house leader expressed an intention with respect to the income tax bill. If there is further discussion of the matter I suggest it be taken up when the bill comes before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, surely I have the right to ask a question—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: —and indicate to the leader of the house—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: —that he is saying today the exact oposite of what he said yesterday, because yesterday he said that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harkness: Order. The Speaker is on his feet again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought the hon. member had commented on the position taken by the leader of the house that the arrangement announced the day before referred only to the possibility of adjourning today. If the hon. member wishes to say something further about that, I shall hear him; but I understood him to be arguing in order to justify something else that had nothing to do with the business of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I was asking the house leader—and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will ask him now—why he has reversed his position from yesterday, wherein he stated that we would not take all stages of this measure but just second reading, and would not go into committee.

Mr. Churchill: I have given the reason. It was based on the supposition that we might adjourn today. We have not adjourned today. Therefore that business does not hold for next week.

Mr. Chevrier: You cannot make your mind up on anything.

Mr. More: We can make up our mind when you make up your mind. You do not know what you want to do. You are waiting on the Senate.

An hon. Member: Run by a bunch of senators.

It being four minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 10, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-120, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I need make no more than a very brief statement on this motion for second reading, because the bulk of the discussion on this bill will no doubt occur in the committee. I have already given the house notice of four amendments which will be introduced at the committee stage. I should like to mention one other that I am sure will greatly shorten the committee's labours.

One matter which has occupied a prominent place in the bill is a proposal to amend certain sections of the Income Tax Act in relation to personal corporations. To facilitate further study of the subject and the passage of this present measure, when we reach the committee stage I shall be proposing that the provisions of the bill in that regard be dropped. There have been some representations respecting this subject indicating that various groups would like further time to study the provisions in that regard; therefore I shall be proposing that they be eliminated from this bill. At the same time I shall be asking interested groups, the usual professional groups and others, to study these clauses and make their representations and suggestions based thereon after a careful study of the subject. Those representations will be welcomed and will be made use of in the future for the guidance of those concerned in considering proper legislative amendments affecting our present act.

Mr. Chevrier: What clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clauses 23 and 24 of the bill. There are one or two incidental amendments which follow.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that these proposals will facilitate discussion of the bill. I may say the bill was introduced in the house a week ago. We have had the benefit of the usual conferences with representatives of the legal and accounting professions. We are always grateful to those groups for the assistance of their skilful examination of these legislative proposals and the benefit of discussion of them with such persons.

I think, Mr. Speaker, all other matters that are dealt with in the bill can more properly be discussed at the committee stage.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the announcement just made by the Minister of Finance is something of a shocker, because when he introduced his budget resolutions on June 20 he indicated that among the considerations that had had most careful review were those that related to personal corporations. I would have assumed that because the amendments proposed in the bill before us relating to personal corporations cover many pages, the department would have given all the implications a great deal of study before bringing forward the amendments introduced on June 20.

In addition, we know that since June 20 the minister has announced three or four further amendments that will be before us when we are in committee today, all of them indicating changes of mind. But this one which involves many pages of this 36-page income tax bill apparently is the result of a decision that has been made over the week end. I say this is typical of the lack of preparation on the part of the government in the presentation of legislation to this session of parliament.

Apart from the very extensive legislation with respect to personal corporations, I take it that the amendments in the bill before us are chiefly concerned with proposals in respect of profit sharing plans. This, of course, is another matter upon which the government have delayed. They introduced a bill in 1960 and asked the public and those concerned to make comments upon the draft bill in the intervening period. We do not have a separate bill before us with respect to deferred profit sharing, but rather that matter is incorporated in amendments to the Income Tax Act this year. These appear to be desirable and acceptable, and a great many of the amendments in the bill appear to relate to changes consequent upon that decision. Apart from that, I must say that there is very little in the bill, lengthy though it is in text, that is argumentative.

I think the most significant thing is that in connection with incentives to industry, there is nothing in the bill particularly pinpointing incentives to exporters. In my opinion this is one place where anyone who was predicting what the minister might do this year might well have been disappointed and, indeed, distressed.

We know that the government appointed a productivity council this year. We have heard very little from that council with the exception of some speeches that have been made by the chairman, but we know that the chairman has been emphasizing the necessity of giving special tax incentives to those engaged in the export industries. There is no provision here for those producing for external consumption that goes beyond the depreciation available to them as well as to producers for internal consumption, and which would appeal to us as satisfying the statement made by Mr. de Young in London, Ontario, on May 29, when he said that Canada should seriously consider adopting tax amendments that would provide incentives to our export industries on a basis comparable with what we know is enjoyed by our competitors in other parts of the world, particularly in western Europe. What is the purpose of setting up this new organization, the national productivity council, if this government in a long delayed budget is not going to take advantage of advice of this kind, which is among the immediate advice that so far has been made public arising from the setting up of the council?

In addition, we had a valuable study in a committee of the other place. I refer to the special Senate committee on manpower and employment. In a summary of their long and excellent work they place very heavy emphasis upon the importance of taxation incentives, in particular to encourage exports. I refer to page 5 of the report, where the following is found:

> Because of the immediate importance of such a new emphasis in industrial policy urgent consideration should be given to the possibility of establishing effective and practicable tax reliefs or tax incentives for the achievement of increases in the export of manufactured goods.

This government in its budget, rather than adopting a pinpointing effort such as has been prominently suggested for a long time particularly for export industries, has decided that its chief instrument in this field will be the exchange control fund. What have we to lose by giving special tax concessions to the export industries such as were suggested last year by the Leader of the Opposition, such as have been suggested by the Senate committee on manpower and employment, and such as have been suggested by the national productivity council? What have we to lose if the tax concessions relate simply to an increase in exports, something we have not experienced in the previous tax year?

In my criticism following the presentation of the budget on June 20 I indicated that we had had an instrument that had proven successful in the expansion of our resource industries, namely a three year tax exemption applicable to industries that were to be established. What have we to lose in this kind of incentive if we are encouraging industry that has paid no tax up to now and has received no encouragement to become established?

In his budget speech the minister referred to the depreciation allowances that were to be provided to the so-called depressed areas under the terms of his baby budget. I remind hon. members of the house of the comment published by the Financial Post to the effect that this did not involve very much incentive. Hon. members will remember the pertinent statement that it was felt that the only labour that was likely to be created by anything as insignificant as the incentives involved in the baby budget would be labour created in the civil service in connection with the examination of depreciation allowances of this highly involved and complex type offered to new industry.

In the recent budget an increase was made in the depreciation allowances extended to persons who are investing in machinery and equipment beyond their norm and beyond what they did last year. I commend the minister for that. In addition, special advantages are now allowed to encourage research. Again I commend the minister for that. However, I say this. After so many people seem to agree almost universally that some very carefully directed incentives should be provided to those who might increase their exports, to me it is very striking and very distressing to find in the budget no reference to this matter. Having regard to the very well known activities of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this field in recent months, this omission indicates to me that he apparently lost a fight with the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no fight.

Mr. Benidickson: —in cabinet. The Minister of Finance, facing a deficit, apparently won in the desire to hang on to dollars in tax revenues and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has wanted to increase exports from this country, has apparently lost in that internal fight. I say this is very significant.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no fight.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister then, in so far as export industries are concerned, is depending simply on what I call the main item of his budget, namely his decision to flip flop and somersault; to say that what he said last year was invalid; and to say that this year the proper thing is to gamble or speculate on the exchange fund and to depreciate the Canadian dollar, and that this is a policy to be preferred to that of some special tax incentives to the export industries.

I say that again we are in the dark. Last week's press indicated that this agency of the Minister of Finance, namely the exchange fund, seemingly is not operating in a complete spirit of harmony with the language of the budget when the minister said he wanted the dollar to go to a significant discount. There is evidence that the administration is doing the very opposite, that it is trying to prevent the dollar from going to a significant discount, and that it is using the funds of the exchange control board for that purpose. Inasmuch as we have not in the Income Tax Act the kind of amendments we were expecting for the encouragement of exports, I say that we are entitled to hear from the Minister of Finance some reference to this matter.

Then I think there is across the country great concern about the publicity that has been given to the administration of the Department of National Revenue in relation to assessing the proper deductions for church gifts. As recently as last week, on July 6, it was indicated in Le Devoir—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is in this bill nothing to which that subject is related. That surely is a matter for the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, if my hon. friend wishes to raise it. This bill has nothing to do with the Department of National Revenue. It is simply a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Benidickson: As Your Honour knows, when we receive an amending bill we are certainly entitled to consider those suggested amendments that are in the bill, but surely we are also permitted to comment upon the things which should be in the bill but which are not in it. It is in this respect that I say what is being done administratively, without an amendment to the act, which might be changing practice under cabinet order in council or otherwise gives ground to this kind of press comment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member continuing his speech, or is he discussing the point of order now?

Mr. Benidickson: I was discussing the point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member has something to add I will hear him.

Mr. Benidickson: That is my point of order; that this is very important in connection with the revenues which might be raised as a result of our income tax statute. I suggest to Your Honour that when we find significant comments across the country—I could quote from a great number of newspapers which have been asking about this subject within the past two or three weeks—this is a time for the House of Commons to ask the minister what will be realized in tax revenue under our income tax statute by reason of the regulations which are passed by order in council under the act, and by reason of the policy of those who collect income tax for us in the Department of National Revenue. If there is to be a significant change in the maximum allowance with respect to gifts which will be counted as charitable donations, I say this is the time when the minister should be asked about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say at once that there is nothing in this bill which touches on that subject at all. This is a bill containing certain amendments to certain clauses of the Income Tax Act. My respectful submission is that such subjects as the hon. member now proposes to discuss are altogether outside the realm of relevancy in this debate. The hon. member will have his opportunity to raise such questions on the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an observation or two before you make your ruling on this important point. My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River put the whole matter in a nutshell when he said that on an act to amend the Income Tax Act following the budget it is surely not to become the doctrine of the minister and certain hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches that we are not to be allowed to point out deficiencies, any kind of deficiencies, we think there are in the amendments that are being offered. The suggestion that the scope of our debate in this house should be limited to what hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches think we are entitled to speak about and nothing else is preposterous.

I have in my hand, sir, something which I happened by sheer chance to have, and it is relevant to this very point. This is a report which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 22, 1957 of a speech made by the present Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition. It is headed "Parliament Puppet of Few Cabinet Ministers". The Minister of Finance, by saying we can only discuss what he in his wisdom thinks we should discuss and what he has chosen to put in this bill, is trying to make parliament a puppet of one cabinet minister and to abridge our freedom of speech. It is just another example of that same kind of dictatorship—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate realizes, I suppose, that he is not addressing himself to the point of order at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Precisely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has not discussed the question of relevancy. He has discussed the attitude of the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a few words to say on the point of relevancy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to hear the hon. member on that.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend sought to say—and I was listening to him with care and attention—that certain administrative changes with regard to income tax appear to be in process without any legislative basis. He was contending that if such administrative changes were to be made there should be a legislative basis for them, and that this basis should be in the present bill. Surely nothing could be more relevant than that.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I believe it has long been accepted in this house that at the resolution stage which in most cases precedes a bill such as this hon. members have the right to propose matters which in their opinion ought to be contained in the bill when it is brought down. I believe, also, that hitherto it has always been accepted that on second reading of a bill, the stage in which we are now engaged, members are permitted wide leeway to express their regret at the exclusion of matters which in their view ought to have been contained in the bill but which in fact are not contained in it.

As I understood the tenor of the comment of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, it was an expression of regret that measures which in his opinion ought to have been contained in the bill are not to be found in it. I agree that when we reach the committee stage we are usually tightly tied to discussion of what actually appears in the bill itself, but if hon. members will recall such occasions as the famous pipe line debate, and many other occasions, they will realize that while we were discussing the principles of the bill we were also permitted to express our regret that certain other matters were not included in the measure before the house.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to say a word or two on this point of order. It is perfectly obvious what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is trying to do. He is trying to drag in something which has absolutely nothing to do with the bill now before the house. Now the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam tries to drag in the pipe line debate in support of the hon. member's contention that he is in order. I suggest this is going from the sublime to the ridiculous.

The house is now considering a particular bill, and if it were permissible for hon. members to raise any other points they pleased with regard to income tax, dealing with subjects not dealt with in the bill, there would be absolutely no limit to the scope of the debate. To allow a discussion of that kind would be to reduce the rules to a farce, and I submit to Your Honour that the statement made by the Minister of Finance in this regard is absolutely correct.

I do not know whether it is because at one time he was secretary to the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King or whether it is because at one time he was clerk to the privy council, but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate considers himself to be a great authority on the House of Commons, on the rules and on everything else in public life in Canada. I suggest that today he is going much too far, and that he would be wiser to get back in his proper place and not make such a show as he has made of himself today and on previous occasions in the last few weeks.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): On the point of order, it certainly would be reducing the rules to a farce if those rules were interpreted in the way in which the hon. gentleman has suggested they should be interpreted, namely in a way which would prevent the discussion, on an income tax bill, of those matters which have traditionally been the subject of discussion on the second reading of such a measure. I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen opposite should be trying once again to limit and prohibit discussion of subjects which are appropriate for discussion on a bill of this kind.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): I think the Leader of the Opposition and those supporting him would agree that if we were to follow their suggestion that the introduction of a bill containing, say, one clause dealing with the Income Tax Act would open the whole of the act to a general, wide ranging discussion, the house will be left in an impossible position. That has never been our practice. Certainly the rules of relevancy are being breached here, and I submit that only the items in this bill are capable of being discussed.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is true in committee.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not true of second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before dealing with this point might I just mention that there is a tendency, when discussing a point of order, for hon. members to discuss extraneous matters. Also, I should like to indicate that it is the duty of hon. members to raise points of order so that the rules may be applied. I do not think it is appropriate to criticize hon. members for bringing forward points of order assisting the Chair to apply the rules.

In connection with the point of order which has been raised, I have been attempting to find some reference in May which indicates that on second reading amendments are admissible to a bill which introduce matters which are relevant to the bill. Reversing that principle, I think hon. members will agree that a discussion in relation to matters which cannot be the subject of amendments would be out of order.

The principle of the bill before us is to be found in the various clauses of the Income Tax Act which are proposed to be amended. It has been decided on several occasions that an amending bill does not open a discussion in respect to the full act to be amended, but only a discussion in respect to the sections of the act to be amended.

Hon. members may feel that they would like to discuss other problems, but I should like to remind them that during the debate on the budget, for instance, there was occasion for such a discussion in relation to subjects which were not touched upon. When a problem arises as to the administration or insufficiency of an act, a further opportunity for discussion is afforded when the estimates of the particular department concerned are before the house.

While I do not suggest one should use a knife to draw the line, I would say that in respect to matters of relevancy such as this —I am not enunciating anything new—I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is going somewhat outside the scope of the bill in discussing provisions which are not proposed to be amended, but which he would like to have amended. I refer hon. members to a decision by Mr. Speaker Macdonald on November 14, 1949, as reported in Journals of the House of Commons for that year at page 237, which reads in part as follows:

> On the second reading of an amending bill—(honourable members will notice that this is an amending bill)—it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration". The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill.

The principle of an amending bill may not be found in a section of the act which is not being amended. I also refer to a decision by Mr. Speaker Michener on December 13, 1957 during the consideration of a motion for second reading of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act, as reported at page 2313 of Hansard for that year. It reads in part as follows:

> This is an act to amend the Income Tax Act and it is relevant, as I understand the precedents, to discuss the sections of the Income Tax Act which are to be amended by this bill but not to review the act as a whole.

I therefore do not feel I need add anything further to indicate the general scope of the bill to hon. members, and I think the discussion should be limited to those subjects found in the bill proposing amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address myself to your ruling, with all respect, in respect to the principle of the bill. I should like Your Honour to indicate to the house what principle can be found in the bill which is amending, helter skelter, a number of sections of the Income Tax Act. I remind Your Honour that this amending bill was preceded by a resolution presented on budget night, and as a preliminary to the introdution of this resolution there is a statement which reads:

> Resolved,—that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things—

It has been traditional that among the other things we will find when the bill comes forward, as we did only two weeks ago, there are items not exclusively connected with the enunciations made in the resolution on budget night. I find it impossible in this amending bill to find anything to which Your Honour refers as the principle. While I realize Your Honour's purpose, sometimes in an amending bill we find there is a principle involved, but can Your Honour indicate to us now any principle involved in this amending bill other than the principle that the Income Tax Act has to be amended once a year? When the act is being amended surely it is proper for us to comment upon those things which are not referred to and not being amended, particularly when there is no striking principle among the multiplicity of amendments that appear in the bill amending a statute which involves nearly 100 sections?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Supposing we had a bill with only one clause amending only one section of the Income Tax Act. Does the hon. member suggest that would entitle hon. members to range over the whole act asking questions about and suggesting recommendations to every section? That seems to be what he is arguing.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to answer a specific question by the hon. member for Greenwood. Perhaps he might define the principle contained in this amending bill. I suggest that we have never, to my knowledge at any rate, under the universal requirement of amending the Income Tax Act and making a great number of changes, many of which are not simply in respect to tax rates but relate to administration and interpretation of law with respect to the Income Tax Act, been prevented from discussing such matters. I suggest the hon. member's question is irrelevant because he knows, as a result of his experience during all the time he has been here, that there never has been an amendment to the Income Tax Act after a budget speech which has been confined to one section or could be regarded as involving one obvious principle. I suggest the bill presently before us involves a conglomeration of amendments. If the hon. member can tell me what the principle is which is involved, I should like him to do so.

For the reasons I have given I submit that omissions should be referred to. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue has intervened. I am glad to see that he is in the house, because he will have an opportunity to speak on second reading today in the absence of the minister, who we all regret is away due to illness. I think it is very important that when we are considering ways and means of amending the Income Tax Act, which affects our ultimate revenue, opinions as to how revenue should be raised should be considered in fairness to us all. When a statement is made indicating that the administration is proposing something new, which I think is consequential, and when it is reported in the press that income tax inspectors have set a maximum of $300—

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is now going to make the speech he commenced to make, on which you made a ruling. I suggest he is now ignoring your ruling; that he has attempted to have you change your mind and has now reverted to his main argument. I submit that upon your ruling the point of order was dealt with, and that the hon. member has no right whatsoever to go ahead now dealing with this subject. Surely when Your Honour makes a ruling that should be final.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: The hon. member should not be allowed to continue arguing about the point of order after your decision has been made.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has now raised a new point of order. It is interesting to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs say that he remembers what happened in 1956, when his party was in opposition, and that the Speaker's decision should be final. That is a view I have always held, but it is not the view that hon. gentlemen opposite have held.

On the point that my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River made as to the principle of the bill, which was the point Your Honour was considering in the statement Your Honour made for the guidance of the house—and I did not understand Your Honour made a ruling; Your Honour simply indicated the lines on which he thought the debate ought to proceed—it seems to me that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made a conclusive case that the only principle in this bill, and the only possible principle one could find anywhere, is that the Income Tax Act is not perfect as it is now and ought to be amended in a number of particulars which are set out in 36 pages. Surely the opposition, if it is to have any rights, has the right to say on the principle that these are not the right amendments, that there are other amendments which are more desirable than these. Otherwise, sir, what is debate? If we have simply to niggle about the clauses of the bill on second reading, why do we not just go into committee and have no second reading? Surely the purpose of second reading is to debate whether the bill itself is adequate. My hon. friend is seeking to show that in one particular respect this bill is inadequate, and shockingly inadequate; and the Minister of Finance, as is his habit in this house, is seeking to gag him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member speaking on the point of order?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I sat here very quietly but I could not resist rising and saying something in support of the previous speaker. I do not think in fairness the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs should try to narrow the discussion on second reading of the bill at this time, which is quite out of keeping with the practices of the past.

I agree with what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said with respect to the principle. You, sir, made reference to the principle of the bill, but there is no specific principle. This bill amends the Income Tax Act. I want to bring to your attention the fact that surely we must have the opportunity, in dealing with this legislation, to suggest that there are deficiencies here and there.

For instance, clause 9 provides certain exemptions for a spouse and dependents. Surely we have the right to say that aunties should be included as well. Certain business expenses are permitted to be deducted. I should like to see the travelling expenses of certain employees included. Surely we have the right to make suggestions as to further additions and amendments, and are not restricted to saying "amen" to each clause as it comes before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his assistance. I think he has said something that is true, and I shall come back to this later, but I should like to deal first with the points raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who asked what is the principle of an amending bill. Well, there may be as many principles in an amending bill as there are clauses amended or new clauses inserted in the act. For clarification of the point I would venture to say that it is not necessary to enumerate them all. For instance, there is a clause which would allow a deduction on account of expenditures for scientific research up to 5 per cent of the taxable income. That is a principle. There may be another one in the amendments which provides a new manner of taxation of shareholders of personal corporations.

In connection with these matters, the hon. member for Kootenay West has said that the house does not have to say "amen" to each clause. For example, in dealing with clause 25, if he said that we should allow up to 10 per cent instead of 5 per cent for scientific research, then he would be in order because he would be dealing with something which is in the act. But the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River wanted to discuss clauses which are not amended, and say he is disappointed because the amending legislation may cover more subjects than the resolution did.

The subject matter before the house is certainly this bill and nothing else. There will be other occasions to discuss other matters. Only on Saturday I said the main difficulty is that hon. members do not want to discuss the problems at hand but always want to discuss something other than the business before the house. I think I have made myself clear, and I should be understood by all hon. members.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I think that is rather a narrow decision. However, I will confine myself to it at the moment. I simply make the observation that this certainly was not the practice in the past.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It certainly was the past practice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not discuss a decision of the Chair. Since he has brought up the point may I remind him that I quoted a decision of Mr. Speaker Macdonald.

Mr. Benidickson: Not on income tax bills.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Are you questioning it?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. I will say that here is a Minister of Finance who has said that he had not, when he was on this side of the house, adopted the style of debate that I have adopted. I say that is wrong. I recall very clearly when on an income tax bill he protested very vigorously that it did not include the exemption from sales tax of boots and shoes for children; that the exemption for married people should be $3,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member will come back to the bill. The point of order has been dealt with.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I continue to say that certain other matters should be included. Before the minister concludes the debate on second reading we should hear from him about those matters.

In his budget speech the minister referred to a tightening up of certain exemptions, and I approve of this course. The reference was to the tightening up of certain exemptions that may have been claimed for business expenses and so on. Inasmuch as the minister dealt with these things in his budget speech, I would hope we might hear from him about them, because there is nothing in this bill relating to them. This is administrative.

The crown is employing legal agents to prosecute people for tax evasions, and this is vital to every clause of the bill. We have to know the type of enforcement that will be applied to make sure that the law that is passed by us here is going to be enforced in a certain manner. In connection with tax evasion in an important case—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot discuss the problem of tax evasion unless the amendments bring new problems in this respect. I do not know whether I am correct, but it seems to me that the hon. member is referring again to the problem which brought on the point of order and the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not referring to the previous item. I am referring to an administrative application and enforcement of tax laws which will relate to every clause in this bill. Some of these clauses impose new taxation. We all know in connection with these matters that in a small percentage of the cases there is tax evasion. We want to know whether there is going to be something new in the matter of investigation, prosecution and other relationships connected with all the clauses of this bill which impose new taxation. A representative of the crown in a recent prosecution said it is very likely that prosecution by indictment, which carries with it a mandatory jail term on conviction, will be the procedure in the future in cases of tax evasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Benidickson: I think we are entitled to know whether that is going to be so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —there is nothing in this bill that relates to that subject, and the hon. member is talking about something that was said in the budget. Everything that was said in the budget does not become relevant to this particular bill. We have already disposed of three bills that arose out of the budget. They cannot be discussed again, and there is nothing in this bill that touches on the subject that the hon. member insists, in defiance of your ruling, in trying to smuggle into this discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was listening to the hon. member to see if he was going to be able to relate his remarks to any of the amendments but, as I think I indicated before, unless there is a new problem concerning evasion of tax which is brought in by the amendments, it would not be relevant.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I submit with respect that my comment is relevant with regard to every section of this bill which imposes a new tax. We want to know whether the method of enforcement is going to be different. Is there going to be prosecution by indictment with a mandatory jail sentence in connection with tax evasion? Again you have ruled that is not in order, but I think it is something that the minister should very properly explain to the house when he replies to the general debate on second reading of an omnibus bill to amend the Income Tax Act. This is our best opportunity to get information on a subject of this kind.

I have indicated that we deplore the fact that many changes that we expected would have been made are not in the act. These relate chiefly to the export industries. I have indicated, and the minister took no objection to this, that as an alternative he was relying on a reference to the exchange fund. I want to say that the exporters association has gone on record as saying that the uncertainty of reliance on an exchange fund that has no fixed rate is something of which they do not particularly approve. They approve, as we do, of a depreciated dollar which will give them some advantages in the export field.

I say that we could have had amendments in tax rates which would have applied to new businesses, just as we have depreciation rates changed with regard to greater than normal new plant purchases. I say that there is great alarm and uncertainty in the country about the future of the exchange rate, and it is rather distressing that the bill contains nothing to afford assurance to our exporters along the lines urged by the Senate manpower committee, by the Leader of the Opposition last year, and even by the chairman of the national productivity council.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the light of your ruling all I can say at this time is that this is the first time in my memory that in the debate on the bill to amend the Income Tax Act we have been unable to propose alternative ways in which we think the Income Tax Act should be amended. I must agree with the opening contention of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the amendments now before us are going to have a very limited effect indeed. I rather doubt the propriety of our even discussing the bill before us when I look at order No. 9 on today's order paper. That resolution is very closely connected in essence, if not in detail, with clause 13 of the bill now before us, and in my opinion we are being asked to approve a bill before the house has given its approval to a resolution that at least in essence is very pertinent to the measure now before us.

Under the particular circumstances in which we now happen to find ourselves, all I can say is that we will have to reserve our comments until we come to the discussion of each of the clauses of the bill in committee. However, the minister should know his own history well enough to appreciate that it is a rather unique situation that he should now ask us to abide by the rule he is seeking to have enforced, particularly on second reading of a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. I recommend that he read again all the speeches he made when he was the leading financial spokesman of the official opposition in debates on second reading of proposals of this kind.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a few observations of a rather different character to make about the bill, the most striking of which is that on Friday evening in this house the house leader invited us to co-operate in concluding this stage of the session with a view to adjournment on Saturday evening, and said that if that co-operation was forthcoming the government was prepared not to go beyond second reading of this bill.

Let us consider what that really means. Let us consider what is involved. Here we have a government that started this session of parliament on November 17, 1960, a government that seven months and three days later finally got around to bringing down its budget, seven months and three days after the beginning of the session.

An hon. Member: Because you talk so much.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen talk about those who talk so much. I suggest that they read their leader's speeches and those of the Minister of Finance in a certain debate in 1956. Where are these great champions of the rights of parliament now? They are sitting here day after day trying to gag parliament. That is where they are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say, sir that seven months and three days after the opening of the session, an unprecedented period of time, they brought down the budget.

Mr. Fulton: The record is cracked and the needle is worn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Never before in the whole history of confederation have seven months and three days gone by between the opening of a session and the presentation of a budget so often expected and so often not presented for reasons that nobody could ever discern until long after other events had happened.

An hon. Member: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then what are we told? We also had an advertisement of the budget for this year, something that has never happened before.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I doubt very much that the hon. member is addressing himself to the bill at all, because he is discussing the budget and the time at which the budget was presented. If he could relate his remarks to the bill I think it would be more in order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I could quote May and I could quote Beauchesne but I am sure my paraphrase will be acceptable to you; that it is competent—I follow Your Honour's example given to us this morning —for us to debate anything which could be moved in amendment. I am discussing the circumstances surrounding the introduction of this bill into the house and its progress in the house, about which I could offer an amendment, about which I wish to make some observations and about which I may offer an amendment before I conclude. In order to lay the foundation for a possible amendment which I may or may not move, I feel I am perfectly entitled under the rules to discuss the attendant circumstances.

It is a practice of the house that amendments to the taxing laws are not made until after a budget, so that the budget is one of the circumstances attendant upon the introduction of any tax bill in normal circumstances, and certainly in this one. What I am talking about at the present time are those attendant circumstances, the circumstances which brought this bill before us. Surely, sir, nothing could be more relevant than that, particularly since Your Honour has ruled that we cannot discuss the principle of the bill, which is that the Income Tax Act is not perfect and ought to be changed.

What I am saying is that a week before the budget, on June 14, we were given an advertisement of the budget, also an unprecedented act. The minister came into this house and said that he was going to bring in an expansionist budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes; the hon. gentleman had better look at his words. He said "I am an expansionist and Mr. Coyne is a restrictionist; that is why Mr. Coyne has to go". That was what he said. This statement aroused the highest hopes, I think, that have ever been aroused in respect of a budget. This great balloon was inflated for a week. It was inflated after that statement; and as the Leader of the Opposition said, when the grand act was performed—and it was the longest, most tedious ever performed by any minister of finance—what happened? We found that the expansion was in wind, in words and in debt; that was the expansion we were promised.

Mr. Aiken: You are not helping it now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nobody could help it; nobody could help this budget. It has sunk almost without a trace.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is not doing badly at expansion himself.

Mr. Aiken: Since the budget debate has been concluded, I think the hon. member should return to a discussion of this bill. I realize he has nothing to say about it, but surely he should try to relate his discussion to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was precisely going to say that the fact that the government was willing to go on a two months' holiday before passing this bill, as the house leader told us on Friday, is clear evidence that the budget has sunk without a trace. They were so ashamed of it they did not even want to proceed with this bill until they were taunted into doing so. When they were taunted about it they realized how silly they would look in the country if they did not pass the main tax bill arising out of the budget. I suppose it is the main tax bill. I do not suppose their king size cigarette bill is their main tax measure. Certainly there was not very much in the other two tax bills to give the Canadian people any comfort, except the one item that was forced upon them by the hon. member for Essex East, the removal of the tax on automobiles.

This is the main bill, the main vehicle for expansion, and what were they going to do with it? They were simply going to let it lie on the order paper while the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the other exponents of this new expansion took a two months' holiday; that is what we were told on Friday. This illustrates the faith, the confidence hon. gentlemen have in their own proposals. This illustrates how important they consider this bill to be.

This is the income tax bill. It is not a customs bill or a customs tariff bill which in most of its features comes into operation on budget night. There might have been some faint excuse, not much but some faint excuse, for delaying one of these other bills, because the things such bills would do would be going on in any case. However, the provisions of this income tax bill cannot come into effect until it is passed. They are so ashamed of it, they think it matters so little, that they were quite willing to take a two months' holiday before bothering to get it passed, until it was pointed out to them how ridiculous they would make themselves look. This is the reason we are called upon to consider it now.

When we seek to point out how puny, how inadequate, how unrelated to the great problems of the day this bill is; when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River seeks to do that and point out how the really important things should have been tackled in this income tax bill, the Minister of Finance got up and said, "You have no right to say our bill is not a good bill. This is against the rules of parliament as we lay them down now. You have to talk about the things we have done and not the things that are not done."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may not have intentionally reflected on the Chair but that is, in fact, what he did when he said the Minister of Finance was making the rules for the house. I can assure the hon. member that the Speaker is able to do his job in this respect, and I would ask him to clarify that remark.

Mr. Pickersgill: When my words are examined, sir, I do not think it will be found that I made any such suggestion or insinuation as Your Honour has indicated. If I did, I of course will abide by the rules. I can remember great ministers of finance in this house. I can remember Mr. Ilsley; I can remember Mr. Abbott; I can remember Mr. Dunning; I can remember Mr. Harris, and I have watched the debates during the period all those gentlemen were ministers. Never, during all the time there was a Liberal government in this country which believed in free speech, did I hear a minister of finance get up on the second reading of a tax bill to try to throttle discussion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have. I heard Hon. Mr. Abbott raise the same point to the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the hon. gentleman is great at assertions, but he finds it very hard to prove his assertions, as recent events have shown, particularly when incontrovertible evidence of the hon. gentleman's failing recollection is brought to the attention of the house. If the hon. gentleman can find one such passage in Hansard I will apologize to him. However, I will be very surprised indeed if he will find that on the second reading of a bill, any of his great predecessors sought to prevent members from criticising the bill in respect of its inadequacies or deficiencies or those things that were left out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are hedging now.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not hedging. What the hon. gentleman has sought to do has been to say we have to confine our debate within the ambit of those things which he thinks are the proper subjects of amendment to the income tax law. We are not entitled to say what we think should be proper. It is not surprising, sir, because on Friday of last week we—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hysterical member.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member talks about hysteria. This, of course is just another of these attempts to smear people and divert attention from their arguments. I am not going to waste any time in discussing that.

Mr. Fulton: Any more time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hear the Minister of Justice, for whom I have rather more respect than I have for many members on the treasury benches, talk about wasting time.

Mr. Fulton: You were.

Mr. Pickersgill: I remember the Minister of Justice when he was on this side of the house, and he did not talk that way then.

Mr. Fulton: I did not talk the way you are talking, either.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I am saying is, surely it is an affront to parliament to suggest that only the Minister of Finance can tell us how the Income Tax Act ought to be amended, and that our debate must be confined strictly to the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should realize that this point of order has been disposed of and that we should not revive that discussion. He is not guided by the Minister of Finance in the matter of relevancy but by the Chair, and so far as the discussion which took place is concerned, it is finished. The hon. member should now discuss the bill in accordance with the ruling of the Chair and not intimate that the Minister of Finance has decided what scope would be allowed in the discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must respectfully protest against any such suggestion. I did not criticize the decision of the Chair.

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Pickersgill: I criticized the Minister of Finance for raising the point of order which may have obliged the Chair—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And the Chair upheld me.

Mr. Pickersgill: —to make a ruling with which I respectfully disagree.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why do you not appeal it?

Some hon. Members: Appeal the ruling.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not appeal the ruling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it now suggested that because we do not appeal every ruling of the Chair, we must agree with it? We must, of course, submit if we do not appeal, but that does not mean that we must agree. We are now to have from the Minister of Finance thought control added to the other attributes of dictatorship.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hysteria back again.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say it is not surprising that we should have from the minister the attitude we have had. We heard enunciated in this house on Friday a doctrine that those of us who heard it will never forget, namely the doctrine that the government was sovereign in this country, not parliament. That was the doctrine that was enunciated on Friday by the right hon. gentleman who heads the government, namely that the government of this country is sovereign, not parliament. It is no wonder they seek to gag us when they enunciate that kind of doctrine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that we have and have always had in this house a perfect right to point out that bills are deficient, and the reasons why they are deficient. That is the proper function of an opposition.

Mr. Aiken: In the budget debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: When you have not even seen the bill? Really, Mr. Speaker, as to this trend to absolutism, to quote something the Prime Minister said in 1955, how rapidly it develops when hon. gentlemen get a taste of power. I would remind the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka of one of the Prime Minister's favourite quotations, although he nearly always misquoted it. I refer to a famous quotation from Lord Acton that all power tends to corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely. That, Mr. Speaker, is what we are witnessing in this parliament in this session.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again I invite the hon. member to address himself to the bill. He has been discussing points of order and he has even been discussing rulings of the Chair. This procedure is out of order. The hon. member knows it very well. I should not be obliged to remind him so often of how the rules of the house apply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am saying that this bill is deficient, that it is not in any respect adequate to deal with the economic problems of the day. Yet this is the only tax bill that could have any really important and serious effect upon the economy. Surely even the Minister of Finance, who perhaps has no direct knowledge of the subject, does not think that the promotion of the king size cigarettes is going to end the recession and bring about full employment; although I should not be surprised if, in his disturbed state of mind, he may think—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member talks about a disturbed state of mind. He is hysterical.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just did that deliberately, Mr. Speaker, in order that we would have an example of how disturbed was the state of mind of the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hysterical person is the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I offered a little bit of bait there and it was snapped up, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that the changes in the tariff are surely not of a character to give us full employment. Let the minister say that they are. Let the minister who professes to be a great exponent of the expansion of trade say that these changes in the tariff—these little bits of protection, as he calls them, here and there—are sufficient to give us full employment. The tariff bill was not a very important bill.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Speak to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Apart from the repeal of the 7½ per cent tax on automobiles, neither was the excise tax bill.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now discussing the tariff.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not discussing the tariff, Mr. Speaker; I was discussing this bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are not discussing this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been obliged to intervene several times. I must refer the hon. member to standing order 34, paragraph 2, which reads as follows:

(2) Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech—

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not applying this rule, but I am warning the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I submit, and again with respect, that all I was doing was pointing out that this bill must be the main instrument of the expansionist policy expressed in the budget, and that was my first sentence. In order to prove my point about this bill I was indicating that even the minister could not possibly argue that any of the others was the main instrument. If that is irrelevant, it is hard for any ordinary mind to understand what would be relevant.

This is just a little mathematical proposition. We had four bills coming out of the budget, of which this is one. I say this must be the one that expresses the expansion because obviously the other three did not do so. I was merely making a casual reference to each of them, and very briefly, too, in order to show that they could not do it and that therefore by subtraction, by simple arithmetic, this must be the one that does represent expansion.

Yet what does it contain? It apparently contains nothing of sufficient importance that the minister himself can even find a principle in it. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this bill is so disappointing to the country and so puny that the government itself is willing, as I said at the outset, to leave it lying here on the table and go off for a two months' holiday before asking us to bring it into effect. That is the kind of bill that we are now supposed to be debating, although what we can debate about becomes increasingly unclear.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to disappoint the hon. member who has just interjected a remark, but I suggest that what I have to say about this bill is just as serious as what he may think of it.

I have some remarks to make following the introduction of Bill C-120, as well as some suggestions to offer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), suggestions that could help stabilize our country's economy, which is shaky since the presentation of the last two budgets, the baby budget and the one recently introduced.

I want to discuss a theory to which I referred in a speech I made last December, and which has to do with a profit sharing plan. I had dealt rather at length with this matter but, unfortunately, neither the minister nor any member of this house has told me whether they approved or disapproved of that theory. I would have liked to know their views in order to be able to discuss it further, because I referred to it precisely in view of arousing the minister's curiosity, as well as that of all the hon. members of this house.

The profit sharing plan has been—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Could the hon. member indicate to which section of the bill he is referring, or how he relates his remarks to the bill before us?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, reference is made in paragraph (a) of section 1 of this bill to a deferred profit sharing plan. Besides, it is referred to all through the bill. Well, I want to establish the relationship which exists between the profit sharing plan and the consequent tax. So, I believe I am not out of order in dealing with this.

In my opinion, a deferred profit sharing plan is a concrete form of a middle course theory between egotistical materialism, which is generally condemned, and exaggerated unionism, which is often the cause of trouble in our economy. In fact, such a middle course for employers and employees would help solve many of the problems we have to face nowadays.

It is a co-operative formula which enters in the solution of many a conflict. It ensures the welfare and security of the worker, on the one hand, and increases industrial production and improves the economy in general, on the other.

We are looking for new theories which deserve consideration, and very often the ones we adopt are ill-suited to our needs. For instance, various parties preach economic theories. Last week, we heard the Social Credit party state its own theory, the implementation of which would be just as difficult, in my opinion, as it would be for me to go to the moon on a bicycle.

There is also the theory of the party which sits on our right, the C.C.F. party, the Socialist party, the New party—the name under which it hides itself is of no importance—which advocates a socialist theory not far from that of Marx.

How can this deferred profit sharing plan apply? As I have already indicated, it is not, of course, the government's responsibility to impose this plan to Canada's economy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was just awaiting this moment to make sure. Here the hon. member is suggesting or promoting a profit sharing plan, but not under the Income Tax Act. He is discussing a general problem which has no connection at this time with the amendments to the act. While the subject may be of interest, it would certainly have been much more appropriate in the budget debate, because the hon. member must realize that we are only dealing here with problems relating to the computation of income tax, and the hon. member has just mentioned that it is not for the government to take position on the matter.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to mention that point. I was saying that it is not the responsibility of the government to apply such a plan, but that the government might co-operate by granting tax concessions to industries which already have such a plan, and also to workers who contribute to a pension fund. The point I wanted to make is the matter of tax concessions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will allow the hon. member to discuss the matter inasmuch as he relates his remarks to the provisions of the bill. If he wants to indicate that this should have been provided for in the bill, the hon. member must realize, in the light of the previous ruling I have made, that this would not be relevant. If he wishes to discuss certain relevant provisions of the bill, then I will certainly allow him to proceed. However, if he wants to deplore the absence in the bill of provisions on this matter, it is obviously irrelevant.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to discuss this deferred profit sharing plan without saying a few words on its principle and operation before adding our remarks as to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker, I know that many representations were made to the minister by some industrial and employers' organizations in view of obtaining tax concessions for industries which operate such a plan. I know that the minister has received a lengthy brief from the council of profit sharing industries of Toronto. I am not qualified to discuss it in detail, because I have not the same knowledge as the Minister of Finance. Yet, I must say that the recommendation of the council of profit sharing industries has been studied by renowned experts. I therefore have no doubt that when the various clauses of this bill are discussed, the minister will move the necessary amendments so as to include the point of view of those experts. They more particularly recommend the exemption of a greater part of the contributions paid by companies in view of creating a pension fund for the workers as well as of the share paid by the worker into this fund.

If we want to promote free enterprise and encourage the worker, we should give them a chance to effect savings, and the way to do it is to grant them reasonable tax concessions.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to make. I would have liked to deal at greater length with the theory of profit sharing, but I shall limit myself to quoting these few lines from a speech made in this house by the worthy member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), on January 27, 1960:

> Surely the government cannot possibly and will not refuse the invitation extended to it by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress to attend a meeting of government, labour and management. I am sure that the government can usefully use this opportunity offered to it in order to make a thoroughly objective and exhaustive study into the general causes of and possible solutions to our high cost economy. Also, Mr. Speaker, in this meeting the problems that are now facing those industries whose very existence is jeopardized by foreign competition might well be studied. I do not feel that the solution to the problem of these affected industries will be found among the traditionally accepted solutions of the past, high tariffs, quotas and restrictions which, to my mind, under present economic trends will become as obsolete as economic isolationism itself.

This reminds me of certain recommendations made not only by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, but by union leaders to the effect that the government should bring together labour and management representatives with a view to looking into this new theory on profit sharing which could not but improve the economy of our country.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. member before he resumes his seat. Did he suggest that hon. members of this group are opposed to this method of tax sharing?

Mr. Boulanger: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Peters: I was of the opinion that the hon. member did not suggest that, but I wanted to make sure.

I am particularly interested in this matter in respect to profit sharing. I am interested in the application of this profit sharing to pension plans generally. The government on a number of occasions has similar types of problems. The government was faced with this problem when Mr. McCann was the minister of national revenue, and also in 1959 at a time when the present Minister of National Revenue was actively in charge of this department. The problem to which I refer involved the workings and application of this procedure because of the inability of the government and different companies to arrive at a suitable vesting proposal. In most cases—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will permit me to suggest that he is referring to an entirely different subject. This bill refers to the introduction of provisions for a deferred profit sharing plan. What the hon. member is refering to is a question raised in respect to the portability of pensions. That was discussed in the budget speech but is not touched upon in this bill. This bill concerns only the introduction of provisions for deferred profit sharing plans and has nothing to do with the portability of pensions at all.

Mr. Peters: It seems to me there are certain problems involved here in respect to the effects of certain clauses of this bill, particularly clause 39, in relation to the vesting of profit sharing arrangements to the extent that they involve the Income Tax Act. I suggest the problem which faced the income tax department in relation to vesting is very similar.

Mr. Speaker, in some of our plants—I am not speaking of the extensive use being made of this profit sharing arrangement—there is co-operation between management and labour in the implementation of profit sharing programs, but these programs have involved serious difficulties because of the fact that employees have no control over the operations of the company, particularly in regard to the increase in capital. There is a serious difficulty in regard to the amount of money available for a profit sharing program. If the provisions of the present bill offer a solution, as apparently they are considered to do, I suggest there will be a problem similar to that which faced this and previous governments in arriving at vesting rights of employees participating in the fund, as well as the obvious inherent problem involved in the present change in the Income Tax Act.

I suggest the government should consider this matter very carefully, because in my opinion it involves an undesirable feature. The government is introducing legislation which I suggest it will have to withdraw because of the difficulties which will arise at the time it is put into effect. An example of this can be found by reference to the difficulties which faced the income tax department in 1959 in the operation of the accumulation fund of the pension program. It was found at that time to be unworkable, and I suggest the same difficulties will be experienced in regard to these present changes.

Mr. Speaker, if what I have suggested is not applicable to the present measure I am opposed to it, because I think this should apply to a portable pension program rather than strictly to a profit sharing one.

I hope I am not out of order under your ruling, Mr. Speaker, when I suggest there should be an amendment included in this bill increasing personal exemptions for the purposes of income tax during the current year. I believe such a measure would accomplish at least some of the things the minister is attempting to accomplish by these changes. Presumably the minister is attempting to place as much money as possible in the hands of as many Canadian people as possible with resulting advantages to the economy as a whole. I suggest an amendment increasing these personal exemptions would have much advantage in that regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, so far as anything that has been said in the course of this debate is relevant to the bill, and there was very little that is, I think it can best be dealt with during our clause by clause consideration of the bill in committee. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose to reserve to the committee stage anything further that it might be desirable to say in that connection.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, will you call the yeas and the nays?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against the motion please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we enter into any discussion on the specific content of the clause I think I will take advantage of what I described as the Howard Green rule, which was given an odour of sanctity by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs when he sat on this side of the house and which provided for a certain amount of general discussion on the first clause of a bill. You, sir, may not have been following what was going on this morning. This is a very peculiar bill. We have been told by a number of persons it is a bill without a principle and, apparently, without much purpose.

Nevertheless it does contain provisions that are going to change the Income Tax Act, and if some of these changes are carried through they will have varying effects upon the Canadian people. This is provided the government does not change its mind, and perhaps in a few minutes the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River will give us the statistics to indicate how many times they have changed their mind about this bill since budget night. If the government do not change their minds many more times, when their majority has dealt with these changes in the income tax they will have varying effects upon the Canadian people. We will, as we always do, consider each of these clauses strictly on its merits and the effect each of them will have on the Canadian people.

Notwithstanding the minister's great desire for a holiday, which the government leader expressed on Friday evening by saying the minister would be content to stop at second reading of this bill; notwithstanding that fact, the minister chose to take up the time of the house by having a recorded vote on second reading of the bill, we, of course, could do nothing else but vote against this bill, because we consider it hopelessly inadequate in ways we were not allowed to explain to deal with the present serious economic condition in this country. I do not want to attempt to revive the debate on second reading, but I want to point out that we regard this as a very puny expression of the great expansion that was heralded in this country on June 14 and is really ending in a whimper.

Mr. Benidickson: As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, there is nothing very devastating in the amendments here which involve the average taxpayer of Canada. When we are looking at clause 1, perhaps the minister could explain the benefits that accrue under the deferred profit sharing plans. I think the minister would want to go beyond the explanation he made on June 20, and I invite him to do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the main provisions of this bill concerning deferred profit sharing plans are to be found in clause 27. Clause 1 of the bill simply is consequential upon the introduction of a new class of profit sharing plans provided for by clause 27, which would bring within the provisions of section 5 of the act any contributions made on account of a profit sharing plan.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister will agree that he has had some hesitation in introducing a bill into this House of Commons with respect to deferred profit sharing plans, because he introduced such a bill during the 1960 session and allowed it to lapse. I ask him to indicate to the committee the result of negotiations or discussions that might have taken place during this period. I hope he will do that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we received quite generous consideration from those to whom we appealed for their views with regard to amendments to the Income Tax Act in relation to such plans. It is in the light of the representations which we received in response to that appeal, following the draft bill which was introduced in the 1960 session, that our study of the matter has gone further and that, in accordance with the resolution which the house approved, Bill No. C-120 now contains extensive provisions in relation to deferred profit sharing plans.

The provisions of this bill, of course, are not the same as those of the draft bill of the 1960 session. The provisions of this bill have been prepared in the light of the representations that have been made to us. We think it is a very good and workable scheme that has been put forward. Whereas previously the only provision the act made was in relation to other classes of profit sharing, now we have provision made for the deferred profit sharing plan. Under this measure the contribution of the employer on behalf of the employees to such a plan is given exemption in relation to the employer's income. The benefit that will be payable to the employee on retirement—and this is the purpose of the deferment that is contemplated in the deferred profit sharing plan—will be taxable like any other income at that time. As I pointed out in the budget speech, there are special provisions in cases where the employee in such a case has chosen to take up residence outside of Canada. This we consider to be a well balanced scheme to give encouragement to deferred profit sharing plans. We think there is a great deal of social benefit in such plans and that the Income Tax Act should be so revised now as to encourage employers to establish such plans so their employees may benefit substantially at the time of retirement.

Mr. Benidickson: I have no over-all quarrel with the minister's objectives, but I remind the committee that last year he even introduced a bill which was supposed to take account of the opportunity for deferred profit sharing plan operations within a corporation as between employees and employers. The minister wanted a year of reconsideration for his officials. In this bill I find nothing that indicates to me that the year has brought any useful information. I think we in the opposition, small as we are in numbers, are entitled to the complete consensus of the advice that has been given to the Department of Finance on that bill introduced by the minister a year ago. What were the objections to amendments of statutes that are suggested here? To what extent has the government changed its mind since it introduced its pilot bill a year ago in 1960? I think these things should be discussed with respect to the plan for deferred profit sharing of employees and the corporations concerned in Bill C-84 compared with the plan that is involved in clause 1 of this amending bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We had a score or more of representations from different sources. The professional groups made their representations. One organization that is particularly interested in these problems made representations. We had representations from the Canadian Labour Congress and from a wide variety of sources. The hon. member has had an opportunity to compare the provisions of this present bill with those of the bill introduced in 1960, and he will have had an opportunity to observe the differences that have been introduced. We think that with the assistance of these representations, as I said previously, we have an improved bill in this regard.

Mr. Benidickson: I have listened to the minister, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think he has indicated to all of us the differences between the opinions he had as expressed in the bill introduced by him last year and any action that is required by us in parliament a year later on this bill amending the Income Tax Act. I ask the minister to review for us what has taken place between March, 1960 and the present time. We would normally expect a budget, of course, in March 1961. We did not get it. There were three further months of indecision. However, I want to ask the minister whether he can tell us in summary just what has been the benefit of the advice he invited a year ago. I ask him to tell us what the changes have been as a result of the advice he received a year ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think you will find, Mr. Chairman, that can most suitably be done when we come to page 22 of the bill, as that is where we find the detailed provisions in this regard. At that time I shall be glad to point out the differences between the provisions of this bill and those of the 1960 bill.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with clause 1, subclause 3, subparagraph (VIII) which has to do with the honorarium or payment to volunteer firemen, I might say that I brought this matter up on behalf of our party earlier this session—

An hon. Member: You are not the first one.

Another hon. Member: You voted against it.

Mr. McMillan: Somebody says I was not the first one. I think I was the only one who brought it up on the floor of the house.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): He says you voted against it today.

Mr. McMillan: I wish to thank the minister for including this $300 as an exemption from income tax. I know a number of fire companies in which volunteer firemen receive some $50 to $250 as an honorarium per year. Some contribute the whole amount, others part of this amount, toward the maintenance of quarters either over the fire hall or in close proximity to it. My question to the minister is this. Would these contributions made toward the maintenance of these quarters be exempt for income tax purposes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I presume the hon. member is referring to contributions made by companies and not by municipalities?

Mr. McMillan: A municipality might pay each individual fireman an honorarium of $200 a year. If the fireman contributes $100 of that toward the maintenance of a club or rented quarters near the fire hall, will he be allowed to consider that $100 as an exemption for income tax purposes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If this $200 is part of his earnings the $200, of course, is exempt. He is exempted up to $300 of earnings. What he does with that is, of course, up to him.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that the minister is asserting in a general way that the underlined words in clause 1 amending this subsection of the Income Tax Act would put a deferred profit sharing plan reasonably well on the same basis as a pension plan and the the plan that was introduced by his predecessor, Mr. Harris, in 1957, a mutual fund opportunity for investment as a private enterpriser. I take it the minister has in mind that this is an ordinary change, in conformity with what has been provided by the statute to date; it is not a radical change.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is in conformity with the provisions which will be found on page 22. It simply brings the exempting provisions of clause 5 of the act into conformity.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister would agree that this perhaps has the approval of people who have given leadership in this field, such as the Simpsons-Sears organization and others who have taken an interest in deferred profit sharing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would say so.

Mr. Habel: On subsection 2 I should like some information. I must admit that I am not a lawyer, and I am asking the minister for information. The amendment provides, in underlined words, that travelling and living allowances need not be included in income. Would that mean that a gentleman travelling from either Ottawa or Montreal to Quebec for lobbying and getting compensation for it would not have to include in any amount which he might receive, as a total amount his travelling and living expenses while he was lobbying in Quebec?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause, as I am sure the hon. member will realize on examination, relates to something altogether different. It relates to the expense allowance provided for any person whose services are engaged pursuant to the Inquiries Act. This clause is introduced for the purpose of clarification. It provides that per diem allowances paid to members of royal commissions to cover travelling or living expenses need not be included in income. These allowances have not been regarded as taxable income in the past, but in view of the fact that some doubt has arisen because of the language of the present act it is deemed advisable to ask parliament to clarify the law.

Mr. Habel: As I said before, I am not a lawyer. The minister will admit that my question was a fair one. I think it is only fair that we should know exactly what we are supporting.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with subclause 2 of clause 1, I take it the minister is saying that the administration has up to now observed the law in a way which is in accordance with what was stated to the hon. member for Cochrane. The minister is saying there is no change in the law as far as this wording is concerned. I take it this provision means that we are rectifying or rationalizing what we have been doing for some time. Is that possible? We have had a large number of people appointed to commissions under the Inquiries Act in recent times. This government cannot make up its mind itself. The process involves the appointment of royal commissions all the time, and these are just delaying tactics before a decision is reached.

That is what is involved here. These people who are appointed by the government to royal commissions will receive certain concessions under this income tax bill. I do not object to that. I think we need inquiries of this kind at times. However, I want to ask the minister specifically whether this implies anything different from what was allowed to those who sat on commissions appointed by this government in the last two or three years. Are commissioners now to receive benefits additional to those which were received formerly by reason of this subsection and, if so, why? Who is going to be appointed under the Inquiries Act to make for this government decisions which the government should make for itself? Will the minister give us a record of the per diem allowances which have been provided to those acting on royal commissions set up by this government under the Inquiries Act? Will he give us, per person and per inquiry, figures showing what will be involved if we pass this clause concerning travelling and living allowances which may be deducted from income for taxation purposes?

I believe this country owes a great debt to people who are ready to take the time to look at some of the economic, social and other problems which we face today, when invited by their government so to do, but we must regard this matter carefully. Twenty years ago we used to think that somebody of my profession, a lawyer, had no particular advantage if he was appointed a member of a commission under the Inquiries Act to perform services for which he received a per diem rate of pay. He was sneered at because he received a per diem rate of pay. I want to make sure we are doing nothing here which will be in any way a departure from a new attitude which is growing up, namely that people who are asked by their government to serve on inquiries are not likely to be profiteers. I hope we have reached the point where nobody who is required by his government to give his time to the tremendously important concerns which parliament may refer to a commission under the Inquiries Act may be challenged and told he has served there to his advantage in dollars and cents. I hope this amendment to the bill does not provide that opportunity.

As a young man, years ago, I had an idea that it was advantageous to serve in the depression of the thirties in one capacity or another for $100 a day. As I have matured I have grown to understand that this country can enlist and command the services of the most important people in this country if we make sure that we do so on the basis of personal sacrifice and national advantage. I question clause 3 because I do not want political heelers any longer to become connected with these national inquiries and commissions.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, without delaying the committee, in connection with subclause 3 I wonder whether the minister has any figures readily available which would indicate the average annual allowance volunteer firemen receive from municipalities.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman. I do not think there are any authentic or adequate figures available to indicate what is the average across the country. In many of the representations we have received it has been indicated that the sum received by volunteer firemen who are interested might be in the neighbourhood of $250 per annum. We have gone a bit beyond that in proposing a $300 exemption.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask the minister to explain why clause 13 has been included in the bill now before us, when there are references to the same topic in other clauses of the bill. As I understand it, there may be amendments to the existing arrangements under the dominion-provincial tax sharing arrangements act, and there is a possibility that this act may be allowed to expire, and that the provinces will take whatever is decided by the federal government they will be allowed to take.

As I mentioned in my earlier remarks this morning, it seems a little inappropriate for us to be dealing with this bill when we have item No. 9 on the order paper, which deals with very much the essence of the subject, or at least with the very same topic. I have been given to understand that none of our ten provincial premiers, while recognizing the need for a revision of the existing dominion-provincial tax sharing arrangements act, are willing to accept the discontinuance of some of the basic principles underlying the existing act which has reference to the tax sharing arrangements as between the federal government and the provinces. In spite of that fact we have before us a bill which, under the terms of clause 13, as well as other clauses, is going to radically effect the levels of revenue of the federal government in years to come.

Does the minister not believe it is a little presumptuous on the part of the government to ask parliament to approve these amendments, regardless for the moment of the opinions of each of the ten provincial governments, until at least the house has agreed that there ought in fact to be a discontinuance of one of the most basic principles of this act; because I can see a difficult situation arising—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be very glad to deal with that subject when we reach the appropriate clause in the bill, which is No. 13. There is nothing in clause 1 which touches upon that question at all.

Mr. Regier: I think this situation is involved in a number of clauses, Mr. Chairman, and that it is most appropriate that I speak in respect to the over-all principles in clause 1 and that the minister should reply—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, none of the clauses before clause 13 have reference to that question.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the possibility of a recess before very many hours have passed, and I should therefore like to appeal to the minister to reply to this basic contention of mine, which is that it is a little presumptuous for us to be endorsing on second reading the principle of even clause 1 of the bill, which would affect very greatly the existing dominion-provincial tax-sharing arrangements act, and which would interfere with our decision in respect to resolution No. 9 as listed on the order paper.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this clause carries I have a very specific question I should like to ask the minister in respect to paragraph (B) in subclause 2. The minister has indicated, and I think I am representing correctly what he said, that there is no change in the practice, and that this is merely a clarification of the practice and the law as it now is. I am sure the treasury board does not like to recommend changes in the law unless there is adequate reason for doing so. What kind of situation or situations arose which brought this matter into question? It does seem to me that before we venture to change a section of the act which apparently has stood for some time we ought to know if there is substantial reason for doing so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this matter has not arisen from any decision but arose out of a question that was asked of the Department of National Revenue. That is how the question arose. It was thought desirable that there should be clarification. There is no intention to depart from what has been the practice followed up to the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that these payments which are made under the authority of the treasury board are what might be called equations of the probable costs? If it involved accountable travelling or living costs the question should not have arisen at all. What the treasury board does from time to time, as I understand it, is to say that rather than having accounts submitted, so much money per day may be paid and that will be deemed to be an expense equated to what the expense would otherwise be.

I might say that I am not criticizing this, as I am strongly in favour of the practice and was when I was a member of treasury board. I think there is a lot of waste of time and the taxpayers' money spent in checking small expense accounts, and it would be very much better and more simple to have a recognized per diem as an appropriate expenditure made in these circumstances so that it could be done quite automatically, saving a great deal of time, money, energy and bureaucracy. I am strongly in favour of this view and in favour of anything that clarifies it, but I just wanted to be sure that is what this is. If that is what it is, whatever comfort the minister can get from it, I am quite in favour of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what it is.

Mr. Benidickson: Having regard to the answer given by the Minister of Finance to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Minister of Finance has received representations from those engaged in railway and highway transportation, as well as other methods of transportation, to the effect that the average cost of a meal today is $1.50, including gratuities and so on. It has been suggested in those representations that the administration requires the individuals to produce, for 365 days in a year, a long list of individual receipts covering meal purchases.

What is the present practice in the Department of National Revenue with respect to those union employees who complain that they do forget? They are not businessmen. They have not got secretaries, and so on, and they do not take chits at all times. They forget about it, but on the average they are good eaters; they are entitled to be. They are husky men on the trucks and on the railways of our country. On an average they find that they spend not the arbitrary figure which the Department of National Revenue has in mind, which at the present time is $1.40, I think. They have investigated this and they say that on the average they spend perhaps $1.50 per meal per day when they are on the road. They say that the Department of National Revenue disregards this. The department has its own figure. Perhaps this could be referred to a parliamentary committee. Could we find out what the senior officials of the Department of National Revenue spend when they are outside of Ottawa on business for the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Pickersgill: When they visit Jean Talon hospital, for example.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps they could indicate whether this is out of the way, having regard to what I call these big expenses for a transport worker which must, of course, include the tip.

Regardless of the protestations of the Minister of Finance, the cost of living has gone up. I say that the decision made by the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue four years ago with respect to the expenditure of $1.25 per meal for transport workers was standard and adequate in the absence of individual vouchers. I say that has been outdated by the increase in the cost of living which has developed during the time this administration has been in power. I would think that perhaps $1.50 would be a better figure for transport workers on the highway, on the railway, on the seaway or any place else. They have made representations to the government. There is nobody in this House of Commons—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This has nothing at all to do with this clause. It is not involved in this clause nor is it related to it in any way. If the hon. member is asking about rulings in the department, we shall have an opportunity to deal with that matter when the estimates of the Department of National Revenue are up for discussion. It has nothing at all to do with this clause.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, will you look at subclause 2 of clause 1 that we are discussing, and will you look at the words—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It relates to per diem allowances.

Mr. Benidickson: The paragraph refers to travelling or personal or living expense allowances. Does the minister say that I and other members of the committee are out of order when we say that this should be reviewed?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The Minister of Finance has raised a point of order. In reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, if he can bring his remarks within (A) which deals with travelling or personal or living expense allowances expressly fixed in an act of the parliament of Canada, or those that are fixed under (B), he will satisfy the Chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I know you are very fair, but I suggest you do not know the opportunities that are available outside the statute, the opportunities that are really pertinent and the opportunities that prevail with respect to changes that are made by order in council, and they are made from day to day. This government used to complain about orders in council, but they pass more orders in council than any government I have ever known. In this respect I say there is jurisdiction, there is authority under the Income Tax Act to make decisions with regard to travelling or personal or living expense allowances. It was on that subject that I was speaking. I say that those engaged in the transport industry, who are under consideration at this time, have made representations to the minister. He has not indicated to us—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the kind of allowances that are spoken of in this clause. This relates to:

(i) travelling or personal or living expense allowances

(A) expressly fixed in an act of the parliament of Canada, or

(B) paid under the authority of the treasury board to a person who was appointed or whose services were engaged pursuant to the Inquiries Act—

This applies to royal commissioners. The hon. member is talking about a subject that does not arise under this clause of the bill, or under the section of the act to be amended by this clause of the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I would ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River whether the allowances to which he refers are expenses which come under an act of parliament. How do they arise? If he answers these questions it may help the Chair.

Mr. Benidickson: I can understand that an amendment to paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 5 of the Income Tax Act would be advanced by a Tory government to concern people under the Inquiries Act, but not the transport workers for whom I was just speaking. I conclude my remarks on that point in this way. In clause 1 of this amending bill we have reference to refunds. I should like the Minister of Finance to tell us—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where?

Mr. Benidickson: I am thinking of the reference to refunds to volunteer firemen. I should like the Minister of Finance to tell us what other refunds have been made in the past to other taxpayers. He wants to go back to 1958. What refunds have been made to taxpayers whose taxes deducted at the source are in excess of their ultimate liability? Has the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue a better record in lower deductions at the source, monthly or weekly, or whenever the tax is deducted, than has heretofore proven to be the case? What is the record of the volume of dollars paid back to poor taxpayers rather late in the game because there is not an adequate judgment of their responsibility for deductions, and so on, at the source?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing in this clause dealing with refunds. That is an entirely different subject. If the hon. member wants information about refunds it can be obtained by putting a question on the order paper. What we are dealing with here is the matter of exempting honoraria of volunteer firemen.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will forgive me for referring to something again but I have a very important engagement later in the afternoon, and I am afraid that clause 13 and subsequent clauses may be passed when I am not here. In order to bring myself really into line with clause 1 I should like to ask the minister this question. Is it the wish or hope of the government that the bill now before us be passed before a mutually acceptable agreement has been arrived at with the premiers of the provinces with respect to the revision of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to take note of the hon. member's question and put an answer on record for him when we reach clause 13.

Mr. Regier: In that case I will have to make my observations. They may have to be made in haste, but I can blame no one but the minister for that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is asking a question not dealing with anything in clause 1 of the bill, but a question having to do with clause 13 of the bill. Having regard to his engagement, if he is not here when we reach clause 13 I shall be glad, of course, to answer then the question he has asked now. I do not think it would be proper, however, to launch into clause 13 now when we are dealing with clause 1.

Mr. Regier: If I may say a brief word on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss clause 13 specifically. The minister—and I appreciate his offer—is willing to give me a reply when clause 13 is reached, but as I have indicated I must be absent from the house. I would not be able to make my argument at that time, so I will have to make it now. Under the rules I can do so under clause 1, because I am referring to the bill as a whole.

It would appear that the government is hoping that the bill now before us with all its clauses will become law before a mutually acceptable arrangement as to tax sharing has been arrived at between the federal government and the ten provincial governments. This is a most amazing thing on the part of a government which had as a major election plank the ending of this business of centralization, which was going to recognize the intent of the British North America Act and was going to work in harmony with the provincial governments.

Now we are faced with a bill which, if it becomes law, will create a situation whereby the ten provincial governments will be confronted with a fait accompli. The federal Income Tax Act will have been amended. I should like to ask the government this question. What are they going to do if the ten provincial governments refuse to accept the offer of the federal government with regard to this matter? Are they then going to say to the provincial governments "Regardless of whether or not you buy our offer, this is it"? The situation now has all the appearances that the government may be faced with a very embarrassing and difficult situation that might even require a special session of the House of Commons to reverse a decision taken now; or in effect it may mean that the attitude of the government will be, the opinions of the provinces be damned; no matter what they say we are going to amend the Income Tax Act as if the whole proposition had already been mutually agreed upon. I recall the minister's own words as a member of the opposition about co-operation with the provinces. This is not co-operation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. member has another engagement I know the committee will wish to be as accommodating as possible, but he is launching into the question of whether this bill should be proceeded with. The house has given the bill second reading and has referred it to this committee for clause by clause consideration. It seems to me that the remarks he is making now would have been out of order at any stage in the committee even without waiting for clause 13.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order that the hon. member has raised, may I say that for once I am afraid I have to agree very reluctantly with Minister of Finance. I am afraid that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has been out of touch with the developments lately, because it was made perfectly apparent some weeks ago by the leader of the government and by the Minister of Finance that this proposition to the provinces was not take it or leave it; it was take it or else. Therefore the point that the hon. member has raised rather skilfully under the guise of a point of order does not arise at all because there is no question of the provinces being asked to agree. They are to take it or else.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Regier: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I have been looking at subclause 4 of clause 1, which reads as follows—

Mr. Speakman: Do it with a straight face.

Mr. Nixon: It reads:

> All that portion of paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 5 of the said act that follows subparagraph (vii) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor: "minus the deductions permitted by paragraphs (i), (ib), (q) and (qa) of subsection (1) of section 11 and by subsections (5) to (11), inclusive, of section 11 but without any other deductions whatsoever."

I wonder whether the minister could explain that. It seems very confusing to me, and I am sure it does to others.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The only change made by this clause is in the insertion of the letter "(ib)" in the provisions of section 5 of the act. That is all it does, and the effect is as stated in the note on the opposite page.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the clause the hon. member for Algoma West has just questioned is a triumph of clarity in drafting. It is pretty evident that the minister himself does not understand it, because he merely refers us to the explanatory note. Certainly no one can tell from the explanatory note what this means. When we are told that the only change in the clause is something involving the addition of "(ib)", how the taxpayer who is supposed to abide by this law is going to know what it means without hiring half a dozen Philadelphia lawyers is hard to understand. As the committee is composed mostly of laymen like the hon. member for Algoma West and myself, I think we are entitled to hear from a great lawyer like the Minister of Finance an explanation of what is really involved and what the "(ib)" really is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member will see what the "(ib)" means if he will turn to page 3 of the bill. He will find it in the middle of the page. It has to do with legal expenses of an employee. Section 5 of the act deals with the definition of income, and section 11 of the act sets forth certain deductions. The provisions are to be amended so that, in conformity with budget resolution No. 7, expenses incurred by an employee in collecting his wages or salary will be deductible from his taxable income.

Mr. Pickersgill: What does that mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member may know what salary means. He may know what earnings are of an employee who is earning salary or income. If the employer does not pay him he will have to sue the employer, and if he sues the employer he may incur some legal expenses. If he incurs legal expenses this clause proposes that he should be entitled to deduct those legal expenses in determining his taxable income in respect of those earnings.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Deferred profit sharing plan.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had a pertinent point with respect to clause 1 just a few minutes ago when he referred to section 1 (k) of the Income Tax Act, because it had a very great bearing. I think the minister should explain this particular amendment. I must confess I have not given this amending bill the attention I should have liked to give it. I would say, however, that this clause is important in connection with the addition of the new section 79 (c) which, in my judgment, might very well involve a change in the language of the Income Tax Act.

Despite what we hear, the clause relates to references to the word "and" and paragraph "(m)" as well as paragraph "(n)". It really refers to an important introduction in the budget of this year, namely a decision of the minister to advance legislation related to deferred profit sharing plans. Last year he was timid. All he did was to introduce his bill which enabled employees and employers throughout the country to criticize this proposal. We have no bill before us this year. We have here the result of that year's inquiry. We have amendments to the Income Tax Act. I assume that clause 27 of the bill is going to add section 79 (c) to the permanent law of this country which involves something new with reference to the pension laws and annuities for the self-employed, introduced in 1957 by the previous administration. I ask the minister to put on Hansard a full explanation of his intent under clause 2 of this amending bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the full provisions in relation to deferred profit sharing plans are in clause 27, which we will be considering shortly. This clause simply has the effect of bringing into taxable income the benefits received by a taxpayer under the deferred profit sharing plan. This means that in the ordinary course, when he retires, the benefits he receives become income and consequently taxable.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I believe it was in March 1960 when the minister introduced the budget he said he intended to introduce a special bill in respect of deferred profit sharing plans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not this year.

Mr. Benidickson: No, 1960 I said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did then, but I did not say the further provision this year would be in a separate bill.

Mr. Benidickson: My statement was that the minister wanted the advice of the country, so he introduced in 1960 a special bill related to deferred profit sharing plans. I say that those of us in the opposition are not likely to receive too much advice on these matters, but there might be people adversely affected. Our duty relates to them at all times. I think the minister has been too cursory in his examination of this problem. I say that this is the heart of the new program, in statutory form, which relates to deferred profit sharing on the part of employees. I think we should have from the minister at this time his objective review, having received from the country representations on profit sharing legislation consequent upon the introduction of the bill in 1960. We are entitled, therefore, to a little more information from the minister than he has given to us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated earlier, when we are dealing with clause 27 we will have the provisions before us and we can see what are the differences between the provisions of this bill and those put forward in the draft bill of 1960. There is no difference in respect of this particular matter. It is quite clearly indicated at all times that when the employee retires and then receives benefits from a deferred profit sharing plan, those benefits will be taxable income.

Mr. Chevrier: Why not give us the explanation now?

Mr. Peters: Before clause 2 carries, I should like to say a few words. There are many references in this bill to profit sharing programs. I think the minister should give us an indication at this time what he is going to do with these accumulations which, if they related to pensions, would be called vestings. Many companies declare a certain amount of money available for profit sharing, and this may take two or three forms. Some companies put it in the form of shares in the company, other companies in the form of cash. In some companies, the money to which the employee is entitled is paid to him somewhat along the same lines as compulsory savings, that is paid to him on retirement.

I believe the minister should give us an indication of his thinking in relation to the charge that is made by the department when these funds are in the form of shares or accumulated savings for retirement. One of the questions that will be asked, of course, is what happens when the man is fired? Is his share in that year, if it is near the end of the year, given to someone else? What protection is to be given in order to dispel fear that will be in the minds of many Canadians who are directly interested in the welfare of the workers through union activity? There seems to be some reference to the elimination of the anti-union aspect in this which indicates that companies, rather than giving increases in wages will introduce profit sharing plans.

I think before we pass the first clause that refers to these plans, we should know what the minister's thinking is in regard to this aspect which would be mainly involved in vesting if we were dealing with pensions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This has nothing to do with pensions or the vesting of pensions. That is a different subject altogether. This clause refers to deferred profit sharing plans, and when we come to clause 27 we will have the provisions before us.

Mr. Regier: I think without a doubt the minister will go down in Canadian parliamentary history as the outstanding man in the field for not answering questions by raising points of order and having other members ruled out of order when they attempt to obtain legitimate answers to their questions. The hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out, most adequately, that this was the first of many amendments contained in this bill. Before we signify our approval to even the very first item, we should know what the intentions of this government are with regard to protecting the interests of these workers in Canada who will agree, in preference to ordinary pension agreements as we know them, to participate in profit sharing arrangements.

As the hon. member pointed out, in the final analysis, as to its extent, this is always at the discretion of management at the end of the year. If the company have made a net profit of $100 million, they may decide to share $10 million of it with their employees or they may desire to share only $1 million with their employees. We are now beginning to grant concessions to the companies and these are not concessions being granted to the workers. Let us be very clear about this matter. This is the beginning of granting to companies the right to declare such profit sharing arrangements as part of their regular wage bill or as a substitution, if you like, of a regular wage bill which ordinarily would be exempt under the terms of the Income Tax Act. Before we are prepared to begin granting this right to companies, and it involves millions of dollars in the case of a goodly number of companies I might name, I believe we are entitled to ask the government what are its intentions under this act with regard to protecting the rights of the workers. Far too many workers have had most regrettable experience when it came to a lack of vesting rights as far as their pensions were concerned and companies have repeatedly taken advantage—legally it is right, but morally most wrong—under the Income Tax Act. I feel that the minister owes us an explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This, of course, is a first class example of the confusion that arises when we do not deal with the clauses of the bill seriatim in accordance with the rules. The clauses of the bill in relation to deferred profit sharing plans and the tax treatment of those plans and all questions associated with them are to be found in clause 27 of the bill. When we reach that clause there will be an opportunity for an orderly discussion. All that this clause does is to say that any benefits received under such a plan are taxable income and there is every reason why they should be so. To pass this clause does not preclude discussion.

Mr. Regier: On that very point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the minister has just made it very clear that any benefit received under such a plan is taxable income. What I should like to know is this. Any benefit under such a plan accrues only to the company in that the companies now will be, as he has indicated, in subsequent sections granted very great concessions. I should like to know what concessions are provided in this bill for the protection of the legitimate interests of the workers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer to that is in clause 27 when we reach it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said something which caught my interest. He said this was simply a provision that these benefits should be taxable income. Have they not been taxable income hitherto?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There has not been provision in the act up until the present time for a deferred profit sharing plan. Where there are profit sharing plans under which profits are shared at the time, then obviously they become taxable income in the hands of the employee recipient. We are now introducing provisions which will be found later in the bill and which contemplate a new kind of plan, a deferred profit sharing plan, whereby the employee does not take out the profits at the time they are declared; instead they go into a fund and they will be accumulated there. He is not to be taxed on them while they are accumulating, even though payments are made into the fund on his behalf by his employer. There is a deferment of tax, because there is a deferment of enjoyment under the plan, until he takes out the proceeds. When the time comes under the terms of the plan to take them out, then of course they become taxable income just as they are now. Any profit sharing benefit now is taxable income.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would that not be the case under the present law even if this provision were not made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. That is what I am speaking of now. In relation to any benefit that is now drawn, the employee is taxable in respect thereof as taxable income. The purpose of the deferred profit sharing plan is to relieve him of any tax in respect of contributions made into the deferred profit sharing plan by his employer on his behalf. He is not going to be taxed on those while they are in the plan and accumulating there. When he takes them out on retirement, then under this clause they will be taxable.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not sure that I have this thing quite straight and I will try to put the point as simply as I can in order to see whether I have it straight. Is it the case now—if I may have the minister's attention—that even though they are paying into a deferred plan, they are taxed now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. That is the whole point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I see. That is what I was seeking to get at. What this does is to treat them in the same way as contributions to a pension fund are treated—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There will be a deferment in respect of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it would be a little bit easier if the minister would let me finish my sentences. I am really not seeking to make difficulties for him; I am seeking quite the reverse. What I am saying is this. As I see it now—and it is beginning to be quite clear—

An hon. Member: It is beginning to dawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; that is quite right. It is beginning to dawn. I do not apologize for that for unlike the minister I am not an expert on these matters. As I understand it now, if an employee receives a benefit under a profit sharing plan, even though he does not get it in cash but it goes into a deferment which he will receive at some future date, he has to pay income tax on it in this tax year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just as at one time I believe it was true that even though you put money aside in a pension fund, before a change was made some years ago in the income tax it was taxed. This is just treating profit sharing in the same way as contributions to pension funds are now treated with approved pension plans.

Mr. Benidickson: If it is deferred.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pensions, of course, would be deferred. That is the situation if this is deferred, as the pensions are.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Anybody who draws a present benefit under such a plan will continue to be taxable, in other words, if there is a profit sharing plan effective now. But if there is a deferred profit sharing plan that comes within the scope of the act and is approved in accordance with the provision of the clause to which we will come later, then tax liability thereon becomes deferred too.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite right; that is sensible.

Mr. Benidickson: I understand that the minister would prefer to make his statement when we come to clause 27 of the amending bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member asked for a comparison of the provisions of this bill with those of the 1960 bill. I would suggest we could do that when we come to the provisions of this bill in clause 27.

Mr. Benidickson: I am satisfied with that suggestion. I know that, in a statute that has more than 100 sections, even an amendment of this kind involves consequential amendments to a number of paragraphs. However, I take it that when discussing clause 27 which adds a very consequential new item to our Income Tax Act, namely section 79C, we shall have from the minister an explanation that is worthy of the new law that he is introducing in this amending bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Certification fee paid to bank.

Mr. Herridge: I have just one question to ask the minister on this clause. On page 2, at the top of the page, the paragraph reads as follows:

—by a volunteer fireman from a government, municipality or other public authority for expenses incurred by him in respect of, in the course of, or by virtue of, the discharge of his duties as a volunteer fireman, as does not exceed $300;

Would that include volunteer firemen—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we passed that clause. We are on clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. Herridge: I ask your pardon, Mr. Chairman. May I ask the minister this question just at this time? I was waiting for this clause. It mentions government or municipality. I know a volunteer fireman who is serving unorganized districts, with fire brigades with $50,000 worth of equipment and so on. Would the tax exemption apply to volunteer firemen not working for a municipality or a government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If he is working for a public authority, it would apply.

Mr. Herridge: These are purely unorganized districts without any incorporation whatever, villages inside provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If he is working for a public authority, the clause covers it.

Mr. Herridge: They would be working for the community?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If he is working for a public authority he is covered.

Mr. Herridge: What is a public authority?

An hon. Member: An incorporated town.

Mr. Benidickson: I draw the attention of the committee to clause 3, subclause (1) where reference is made to (cd). We see in line 35 reference to "not more than 90 days". As I understand it, this is a change in determination by the government. Why is this limited to 90 days?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because that is ample scope for the nature of the acceptances which are in contemplation here. This deals with bankers acceptances—acceptances by the banks of drafts. This provision will result in a situation where a taxpayer who sells a bankers acceptance at a discount will be able to deduct the amount of that discount when computing his income. This period is the ordinary limit on the period during which these drafts may be deferred until the due date of payment.

Mr. Benidickson: This is an amendment to the Income Tax Act. We had a discussion earlier about amendments to the Income Tax Act about which we had advance notice either in the budget speech or in the budget resolutions. This was not considered to be one of those in respect of which advance notice should be given—or am I wrong in that?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no specific resolution with regard to this provision of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. You sat higher up earlier this afternoon when I indicated to you that we had before us a great number of amendments to the Income Tax Act which we had no opportunity to debate during the general budget debate, having had notice thereof by presentation of resolutions which are normally presented by the Minister of Finance after he makes his budget speech. That is significant and I hope Your Honour, now sitting at a lower level, will take notice of it. I do not intend to press the point, but I am going to say that in subclause (2) of clause 3 there is a reference to the individual. If you will look at the explanatory notes, Mr. Chairman, you will see that it appears that this amendment might have reference to personal corporations. We heard the astonishing statement from the Minister of Finance this morning, 20 days after the presentation of the budget that he intended to delete from this amending bill to the Income Tax Act all references to personal corporations. I indicated then that references to personal corporations occupied a substantial part of this amending bill. I wish to ask whether or not the minister has in mind making an amendment, now that we are discussing clause 3—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The first of the amendments will be reached—

Mr. Benidickson: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. If I look at the explanatory notes on the righthand side of the copy of the amending bill, in the first line, referring to (da) I see that there is reference to a personal corporation there. I hope—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no reference to a personal corporation here.

Mr. Benidickson: There is, indeed. The statute is recited—(da), the former one, the existing one. The first line says:

(da) Where the taxpayer is an individual, such part of any loan—

And so on. It is on that basis that I ask the Minister of Finance, having regard to his statement earlier today that he proposes to withdraw about one third of the amendments in this bill which relate to personal corporations, whether there is any readjustment that we should make in committee now, having regard to the fact that we are dealing here with the relationship between an individual and a personal corporation as referred to in the explanatory notes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The paragraph (da) in the present bill refers to individuals or personal corporations. This is now being broken down into two parts. (da) will relate to individuals and (db) to corporations.

Mr. Benidickson: Irrespective of the withdrawal of the changes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could give some explanation of the first subclause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): About bankers acceptances?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is familiar with bankers acceptances. They have not been dealt with specifically in the act hitherto, but they are a form of short term borrowing which is coming increasingly into use in Canada. This is the point involved here. A businessman draws a bill on a bank payable in 30, 60 or 90 days. The bank accepts it and certifies that it will be paid when it falls due. The taxpayer sells the bill to a lender at a discount. In this way, the businessman obtains the equivalent of a short term loan and the discount is in place of interest. This particular subclause provides that where a taxpayer sells a bankers acceptance at a discount the amount of the discount may be deducted when computing his income.

Mr. McMillan: What is meant, in clause 3, by the phrase "dealing at arms length"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a well accepted expression. The definition appears in the act itself and the expression appears in various sections of the act. Broadly speaking, it signifies that there is no relationship between the two corporations or persons in question. It is a well established concept.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman thought about drawing that definition to the attention of a certain school board?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Limitation re contributions under deferred profit sharing plan.

Mr. Benidickson: On clause 4, my inquiry would be directed to the phrase "an amount paid by an employer". What is the difference between an amount paid by an employer as contemplated in this amending bill and an amount paid by an employer hitherto?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question. This clause is consequential on the introduction of the provisions for the new class of deferred profit sharing plans under clause 27. It provides that no deduction shall be made for an amount paid by an employer under a profit sharing plan which is not a recognized profit sharing plan or a registered pension plan. There is no interference here with the present provisions of the act in relation to pension plans.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Indirect payments.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since we have heard very little discussion in the committee I do not think we should carry any of these clauses without having a very brief explanation from the minister as to what actually is involved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a very simple change involved in clause 5 which is set out in the explanatory note. This amendment simply substitutes the word "property" for the expression "money, rights or things" in order to include real property.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in regard to clause 6 I must confess that I have not properly followed up a concern which has arisen in my mind on reading the explanatory note in regard to the expression "benefit under a deferred profit sharing plan". It is suggested in the explanatory note that this expression is defined by clause 39 to mean that portion of any amount received by a beneficiary under a deferred profit sharing plan which must be included in computing income.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is referring to the wrong clause. We are considering clause 6 which simply concerns the sale of depreciable property where the sale price consists of a mortgage. It has nothing to do with deferred profit sharing.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps the minister will refer to page 3 on the right where it—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are dealing with clause 6 as it appears at page 5.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I thought I might save a little time by not repeating my request in respect to each clause that the minister say a brief word explaining the clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this amendment is related to the amendment provided in clause 3, subclause (7), concerning the sale of depreciable property where part of the sale price consists of a mortgage. This clause covers the situation where a mortgage is sold in the same year as the depreciable property. It will be noted, Mr. Chairman, that provision is made here that where the principal amount of a mortgage or hypothec was included in the proceeds of disposition of depreciable property, in respect of which there are capital allowances, and in the same year the mortgage or hypothec was sold at arm's length for less than the unpaid balance of the principal amount, then the loss may be deducted from the proceeds of the disposition.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, here again we see the expression "at arm's length". It appears a great number of times and sounds quite amusing to me. Is it a legal expression, and what is the definition of it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, section 139, subsection (5) of the act defines the expression. It is a well established one and has been used throughout the act for a long time. The expression appears in various sections of the act so the controlling definition applies to them all.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Bond conversion.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, could the minister explain this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a provision covering the situation where one bond of a debtor is exchanged for another bond under a conversion arrangement which was provided for in the terms of the original bond. The new bond will be regarded for tax purposes as if it were merely a continuation of the original bond.

Mr. McMillan: Will the minister say how income tax is computed in connection with earnings from treasury bills? For instance, I understand that treasury bills bear the value that is to be received at the end of 90 days. Is that capital gain or is that earnings?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, that is the equivalent of interest. Let us say that a treasury bill is sold at 99 cents, and when due, 100 cents are paid. That difference which really was a discount is the equivalent of interest on the 99 cents and accordingly is income.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this clause has reference to family assistance payable to immigrants which could be related to family allowances. What are the amounts payable under the other statutes relating to the children of immigrants which might be related to this amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is an annual clause which has been included in the income tax amending bill each year since 1956. I think the hon. member himself piloted the first clause of this kind through the house in 1956.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to have stated for the record the amount available to the children of immigrants.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, it is the family allowance that is payable after—

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is family assistance of $5 per month, and this clause, which has become standard now, simply carries into 1961 the same provision enacted first in 1956, that children in respect to whom such amounts are paid as family assistance to immigrants and settlers shall be classed as children qualified for family allowance for income tax purposes. In other words, the allowance is $250 for children under 16 years of age and $500 for children 16 years of age and over.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, if an immigrant arrives in September, shall we say, and receives this family assistance for three months of the taxation year, would he then deprive himself of the normal deductions for an allowance for a dependent child? Is that the effect of it? Would the minister relate to the committee the mathematics of this situation? What would the immigrant gain or lose if he arrived in Canada in September of 1960 and became taxable on December 31 as a taxpayer in Canada had he not received family assistance as an immigrant?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The taxpayer would have the option in that case. If he thought it was to his advantage not to take the childrens' assistance then obviously he would decline it and claim the benefit of the higher deduction on account of dependent children when he pays his income tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the same option, is it not, that the recipient of family allowance would have?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, there is a difference.

Mr. Benidickson: It is obligatory in the case of family allowance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the case of family allowance there is a provision that the parent is deemed to have received the family allowance. My understanding is that there is no option extended to him. However, that does not apply in the case under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have this cleared up. With my customary modesty I remind my colleague, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that I was the minister responsible for establishing family assistance, and I certainly have no apology to make for that. The only thing I regret is that this government, which has done so much for social justice, according to its own claim, might have brought family assistance up to the same level as family allowance the next time it is considering doing anything about social justice, which I wish we could have done in the first place, but we were trying not to have deficits. The thing I wished to get clear is this. Does a person in receipt of family allowance, if he receives it for only one month of the year, thereby have to take the lower allowance under the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it in the case the hon. gentleman is putting the child is born—

Mr. Pickersgill: On December 1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —on December 1. Well, the provisions in the act are based on eligibility of the child for family allowance. Now, what the parent may lose in the one case he will make up in the year when the child moves off family allowance. There is equity in the long run.

Mr. Pickersgill: But in the case of family assistance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Section 139 (1) (f) reads:

> "child qualified for family allowance" means a child who, in the last month of the taxation year in respect of which the expression is being applied, was or might have been qualified by registration under the Family Allowances Act, so that an allowance under the said act was or might have been payable in respect of that child for that month or the immediately following month.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that fairly explains the point. The minister has said that in the case of family assistance it is at the option of the immigrant. If the immigrant does not in fact apply for and draw family allowance the income taxpayer in respect of that child would be qualified for the higher allowance under the Income Tax Act rather than the lower one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the higher deduction.

Mr. Benidickson: In the case of a child of a Canadian resident, I take it whether or not the parent has announced the birth of the child and has applied, on the statement that he makes in his income tax return, whether he has received family allowance or not, he will be presumed to have received the allowance. Is that the present effect of the law?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not quite that; rather the act says that the right to the deduction in respect of that dependent child depends on whether the child is qualified to receive family allowance. That is the test. If the child is qualified to receive family allowance, then the parent cannot have the benefit of the larger deduction in respect of the maintenance of that child that he otherwise would have.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister has somewhat evaded my question. I take it the child would be qualified by reason of the fact of birth and the date of birth. Is that not right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course, there is more than birth involved; there are birth, residence, and the residence of the parents as well.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9.

Mr. McMillan: I am glad to see that the minister has included laryngeal speaking aids. I wish to ask the minister a question about certain orthopedic beds. I really do not know whether or not they are covered. I have in mind orthopedic beds for patients who are paralysed generally owing to motor accidents. I know one or two cases where they have to buy those expensive beds and they will be in bed for practically the rest of their lives. These are cases where the cord is cut. I wonder whether beds of the type I have mentioned are included?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer is no, Mr. Chairman. As the hon. member will see by looking at the present clause, provision is made for a rocking bed for poliomyelitis victims but not for other kinds of beds.

Mr. Benidickson: I have read and reread the remarks of the minister on June 20 when he in effect took off the ceiling on the expenses of a taxpayer for medical purposes. He certainly aroused our sympathy by some of the illustrations he mentioned on June 20. However, I recall that this was resisted in the past by those who had some regard for the revenue of the crown, not on the grounds of inhumanity at all, but on the grounds that it might give a special privilege to people who might misuse this right of tax deduction if there were not some regulations. I am getting a little aged myself. Can I be assured that I would not be permitted to go down to Florida with a nurse, in the interests of my health, and that after certification the expenses of the beautiful nurse and, of course, the doctor's expenses that might be attributed to my requirements would not qualify under this clause that removes the ceiling? I think that was the attitude in the past.

I have regard for the fact that the purchasing power of the dollar has decreased considerably in recent years. The wages of those whom we employ and need for our medical health continue to go up. In the past our reason for having a ceiling here was to make it impossible for the ultra-rich to get a special benefit in so far as tax deduction was concerned by, as I say, going to health homes that were not open to the ordinary person but were open to the wealthy taxpayer where he could go with all the accoutrements that might be called specialized services. I wish to know whether the minister has looked into this and why he has departed from the judgment of his predecessors? I know that his predecessors had sympathy for those who had very high medical expenses but there was some justification for having a limit on the amount that could be deducted from taxable income. I wish to have the minister's assurance that he feels that abuses cannot be committed under a clause of this kind, abuses such as I have facetiously presented to the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no change in the definition of what are admissible medical expenses. The clause simply removes the ceiling. As I suggested in the budget speech, one man as a result of misfortune may incur as large medical expenses in one year as another man may incur in a lifetime. Last year we invited the house to increase the permissible ceilings and the house responded. I think I may say that there was quite a measure of warm approbation of the proposal voiced in all parts of the house. This year we are asking the house to go a step further and remove that ceiling and, I think, to do so in the interests of fairness for all taxpayers who may have this misfortune.

Mr. Benidickson: I have the utmost sympathy for all taxpayers who have a very heavy burden of expense in connection with ill health, accident or otherwise. I just want to make sure that we are not creating here an opportunity for inequality in the tax advantage that is possible under our law in respect of this provision. I recall that in the past I supported a ceiling on the maximum amount of deduction that would be possible. I would support today a spreading or averaging of legitimate, unavoidable and unfortunate medical expenses in one year over perhaps three or four years.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

I simply raise the question here whether this provision does not give people in a very high income bracket an opportunity deliberately denied them in the past whereby such people were not able to deduct as a medical expense the cost of a qualified nurse or somebody else to push around a sick person in a wheel chair in Florida. I raised this matter in past years simply on the ground of fairness in our income tax structure. I quite agree with what the minister said on June 20 with respect to the catastrophic results in the case of a taxpayer involved in an automobile accident, let us say, who has expenses going away beyond the maximum deduction that has been allowed up to now. Having regard to our progressive tax rates I simply raise the question of whether or not in fairness the amendment would not have been better if we had allowed, in the case of an excessive amount of medical expenses, a carryover from one year to the next so that a taxpayer having an excessive amount of medical expenses in 1961 could average them over the years 1961, 1962 and 1963. I am solely concerned with the facts of life here. This is a matter to which I paid a great deal of attention when I was on the other side and I was persuaded that such a move was not desirable because the complete removal of the ceiling on deductions with regard to medical expenses could result in unfairness between the rich and the poor.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question on clause 9, subclause 1. The amendment adds the underlined words "laryngeal speaking aid" so that the cost of such a speaking aid can be included in medical expenses. Can the minister inform the committee whether there are other types of speaking aids than laryngeal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This refers to speaking aids for those who have suffered cancer of the throat.

Mr. Herridge: It does not provide for other types of speaking aids?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I am not aware of other kinds that enable individuals to speak. This speaking aid is one that is attached to the larynx in some way to enable someone who otherwise would not have the power to speak to be heard and understood when the apparatus is turned on.

Mr. Herridge: Can we take it that it means any speaking aid that is required to aid a person to speak?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is a laryngeal aid, yes. It would not apply to a microphone or horn that somebody used to make himself heard in the great outdoors. It is one that is related to the larynx in the sense that otherwise the larynx is not functioning in an audible way. The kind of speaking aid we are thinking of here is well known and it has brought back the power of speech to many who have suffered loss of speech through cancer of the throat.

Mr. Herridge: I asked the question because there are other names used for different types of speaking aids and I wondered whether they were included.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is involved here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Subsection 2 of section 31 of the act is repealed because it is no longer required. The matter is dealt with under the Canada-United States income tax convention.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Income from duties performed in Canada.

The Chairman: I understand there is an amendment to this clause.

Mr. Benidickson: On clause 11—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I might deal with the amendment first. On page 7 in clause 11 we come to the first of the amendments. I might say that the amendments are to be found in Votes and Proceedings of July 5, on page 1 of the appendix and in Votes and Proceedings of July 7, page 1 of the appendix, and then there are the further amendments which I have indicated today in relation to personal corporations. They are all set forth on the sheet which has been made available to the Chair and to hon. members. The amendment now proposed is that indicated as "(a)" on the sheet which you have, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to move that amendment.

Mr. Comtois: I move:

That Bill C-120, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by striking out lines 41 and 42 on page 7 and substituting therefor the following: "the year in which it was received, from duties that shall be deemed to have been performed by him in Canada in that year, unless it can be established, by subsequent"

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I might say a word about the significance of the amendment. It adds the words "that shall be deemed to have been" after the word "duties" and it adds the words "in that year" after the words "in Canada". The words are added for clarification.

Mr. Benidickson: I direct myself at the moment exclusively to the new amendment. Does it result from any representation from any other government such as that of the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: I look at the explanatory notes—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I might say that this did emerge out of discussions with representatives of the tax foundation last week.

Mr. Benidickson: I go to the end of subclause (d) and I refer to the words:

... unless it can be established, by subsequent events or otherwise, that the payment was made as part of a series of annual or other periodic payments payable throughout the lifetime of the payee.

I direct my inquiry to those words although there is a much longer part of the new section 31A preceding them. Does that mean that in the opinion of the administration it must be almost on the basis of a perpetual income, a lifetime basis, if a person receives a benefit of this type for performance of a service in Canada and then resides elsewhere?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision draws a line of distinction between lump sum payments and pension payments. This clause 11 of the bill, Mr. Chairman, deals with lump sum payments to former employees. It is designed to close a loophole.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister is endeavouring to assure that a longtime resident of Canada who has earned his income in Canada is not going to get from his employer, on conclusion of his employment, a substantial lump sum and then vanish to another country. I am referring to a capital sum, a lump sum.

I am concerned with the qualifications in the last part of this clause which refer, as I described a moment ago, to taxable lump sum payments when he leaves the country, and that is all that we can regard as his reward. I am concerned about the periodic payments. Do they have to be regular or are they only periodic to qualify under the provisions of this clause? In other words, is it going to be necessary, to avoid this impost, in the case of a person who has earned an entitlement from his company to a lump sum payment or some form of retirement award, that that reward be paid regularly up until the time of the death of the employee or does the word "periodic" have reference to a series of annual or other payments, perhaps for two or three years and then we forget all about it? What has the administration in mind in introducing this protection? I am in sympathy with what the minister is trying to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will look at lines 44 and 45, I think he will see the answer to his question. There is reference there to a series of annual or other periodic payments payable throughout the lifetime of the payee.

Mr. Benidickson: I saw that, and I just wanted confirmation of the fact that the reward payable after retirement to someone in Canada, before leaving Canada, would not be an undue amount, but it would be related more or less to an annuity. Would it be related more or less to an averaging out through his lifetime of a benefit, as is the case in connection with a pension fund? Why does the act not state that?

Perhaps I have not stated it too clearly. Why is it not clear here that it must be what I, in my ignorance, would call a pension or annuity rather than periodic payments payable throughout the lifetime of the payee? I raise this question with the minister. Would it be possible for a senior executive of an important corporation to receive, at the termination of his employment, a very large lump sum payment, with the other part of the recognition of his lifetime service still payable in annual or periodic but nominal payments throughout his lifetime? The language disturbs me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am doing my best to follow the hon. member, but I am having some difficulty. This language, a series of annual or other periodic payments payable throughout the lifetime of the payee, clearly means a pension for life. It may be payable in annual instalments or it may be payable in quarterly amounts or in some cases in monthly amounts. These are periodic payments and they are payable throughout the lifetime of the payee.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, I would imagine it was the intention of the draftsman that if there was a capital value, let us say, of $50,000 of a retirement benefit it would not be possible in the contemplation of the department for the retiring employee who left Canada to receive $40,000 in cash and then receive an additional $10,000 in cash on the basis of annual or other periodic payments payable throughout the lifetime of the payee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the case put by my hon. friend, I think there is no doubt that the lump sum would be taxable, but the pension that is payable on a true life basis, of course, would escape taxation.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 12.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister anything to say about clause 12?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again, Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment that is consequential upon the introduction of the provision for profit sharing. It simply provides that a benefit under a deferred profit sharing plan shall be classed as earned income and in that way it is in complete harmony with clause 2 of the bill of which we have already approved.

Mr. Benidickson: In clause 12 we are dealing with a matter which relates to another amendment we had when we were dealing with the supplementary budget in December. It relates to section 32 (5) dealing with earned income. I do not believe the minister has properly indicated to us the relationship of this amendment to what was contemplated then. We had the deferred profit sharing introduced, of course, in the spring of 1960, and I think the minister should explain what is involved in this clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause is simply the counterpart of clause 2 which has been approved. Clause 2 provides that the amount received by a taxpayer under a deferred profit sharing plan shall be included in computing income. Clause 12 proposes to amend section 32, subsection 5 (a) of the act so as to make it quite clear that a benefit received under a deferred profit sharing plan shall be classed as earned income. It is a consequential amendment.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Deduction from tax when resident, etc. in province.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I told the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that on clause 13 I would answer the question he asked when he was here and explained that he would not be able to be here when this clause would be reached. As the note indicates, this clause is to provide for a reduction of the personal income tax for the years 1962 to 1966 inclusive in accordance with new fiscal arrangements with the provinces commencing April 1, 1962.

The present Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act will expire or its operation will not extend beyond those payments provided for at the end of this present fiscal year. Clause 13 is designed to lay the groundwork for certain reductions that will be provided under the federal income tax. The purpose will be to enable the provinces which desire to enter this tax field to occupy it to whatever extent they wish to occupy it. When we reach item No. 9 on the order paper I shall have something to say about the proposal made there by the federal government for the benefit of the provinces in relation to collecting provincial personal income tax and corporation tax. However, the purpose of this clause is to provide—and we have to do it this year in order to make it clearly applicable to next year and so that the provinces may make their plans this year accordingly—for the deduction from the basic federal tax. This could be done by way of an amendment each year in advance. We could have an amendment this year providing in 1962 a deduction of 16 per cent. We could have an amendment passed next year to provide that with respect to the year 1963 there would be a 17 per cent deduction and so on throughout the five year period. But it was in keeping with the wishes of the provinces that they should know clearly in advance by federal statutory enactment what the percentages would be, and so we are asking parliament to make this provision for the rising percentage of deductions from the federal income tax in favour of the provinces year by year for the next five years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to embark upon a debate upon item No. 9 on the order paper at this time. I do not think that procedure would be appropriate. However, we cannot possibly let this clause go by without pointing out what it is really seeking to do. If I sought for one word by means of which to describe this clause, I would call it the repudiation clause. We all remember that at the federal-provincial conference, not the last meeting but the one previous to the last one, the Prime Minister spoke and gave an unqualified undertaking that the principle of equalization would be maintained. This clause is a clear repudiation of the principle of equalization.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister wishes to provoke a lengthier discussion, he can go ahead. However, I intend to say what I wish to say about this matter regardless of interruptions.

The principle of equalization is the principle that the revenues of the provinces from the three direct taxes shall be brought up to the level of the two top provinces—that is to say the two provinces with the highest per capita return from the income tax—in respect of the rate that is allowed to the provinces as an abatement or a reduction from the federal rate. That is not expressed as felicitously as it is expressed in the statutes but I think the meaning is very clear.

The effect of what is being done here will be that those provinces which have the highest per capita income, particularly Ontario and British Columbia and really in fact only Ontario, will get a larger and larger share and the national treasury a smaller and smaller share of the total income tax collected in this country. That is what is going to happen. The principle of equalization is not totally abandoned. However, the principle of equalization is not being carried on in the way in which the Prime Minister in quite unqualified language to the premiers said it would be carried on.

When the minister said that this was to carry on the new arrangement with the provinces, that is certainly stretching the word "arrangement" far beyond any definition that the minister could find in any dictionary. An arrangement suggests at any rate some understanding between the parties. Anybody who has read what the premier of Manitoba, a supporter of this government, has had to say about this subject, to say nothing of some of the things that are said by the premier of Saskatchewan and some of the other premiers including the premier of New Brunswick will have no doubt that there was no arrangement whatsoever. There was a "diktat" which was called a suggestion. But these soft words do not change the real nature of things. The provinces were told this: "You can go and collect your own taxes. If you fix them on our scheme without any deviation, and if your act is a direct copy of the federal act, we will collect the taxes for you, but you have got to impose them yourself and that is final. If you make any variation whatsoever in your scheme, then you collect them yourself too."

Of course there were two purposes in doing this. The hon. gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches, and particularly the leader of the government, had promised Mr. Frost $100 million, and they could not find $100 million to give him by the front door. This is an attempt to give him an instalment of it by the back door without giving anything comparable to the other provinces. That is what it is. It is making a large area, which will ultimately be 20 per cent in the case of the present income tax available to Ontario and also, it is true, available to Newfoundland, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick as well but without any equalization to those provinces. Ontario will get indeed as a benefit into its treasury more than the amount under equalization, as it does now, of course, because equalization is based on two provinces, not one. But even in Ontario it is a great deal less than Mr. Frost was promised in those happy days of long ago in 1957.

Mr. Benidickson: Everybody was let down.

Mr. Pickersgill: But Mr. Frost has been discounted only by 50 per cent or 60 per cent. Some of the other provinces are being discounted by 70 per cent or 80 per cent or more of what was promised in those days. However, as I say, I am not going to enter into an extended debate at this stage. There is another stage when that can be done. However, I just wanted to be sure that nobody in the committee was under any illusion about what this is. Of course, it is going to look good. The federal tax is going to go down; although the provincial tax will go up at least as much. But then they will be able to say, "Look at what we did for you". Then they will say "that wretched fellow out there in Alberta" or in Saskatchewan, perhaps they will not say "wretched fellow" in Manitoba but they will say "unfortunate fellow". Of course, the person whose body is really laid on the altar by this proposal is the premier of Manitoba. I imagine that every time the premier of Manitoba thinks of that slogan he used, namely "What Dief did, Duff will do" he undoubtedly wishes he had never said it because what Dief has done to Duff, Duff will never be able to undo. And this is where it is being done—right here in this repudiation clause of this bill to amend the Income Tax Act. Everybody in Manitoba knows it. Of course, it is being glossed over by various other provisions which would be beyond the scope of this bill, and I am not going to cause you any pain, Mr. Chairman, by dealing with those other things. The plain fact is that no concession is being made to anybody by this, not even Ontario. It is true that Ontario will receive a larger share of the personal income tax than the province is getting now. That is true. The share will be a little larger. But it will be nothing like what was held out with great hope and without requiring any action of the Ontario legislature four years ago.

Perhaps I was rash. Perhaps I should not have said that one word would describe this clause. This clause can be described as the repudiation and disillusion clause. It means disillusionment for Mr. Frost and deeper disillusionment for the premier of every other province in this country. Everyone knows that I am not normally a tremendous admirer of the premier of Saskatchewan but he has a capacity in this particular field, which he understands very well, to express things exactly, and he says this is just a return to the tax jungle of the thirties. Well, we seem to be returning to the thirties in a great many ways in the sixties, and this is just another example.

There is one very important question which arises. These reductions are to come into effect on January 1. That means that unless every provincial legislature in this country meets later this year and imposes additional taxes there will be a period early next year when the total tax will be lower. Then the provincial governments, in order to get revenue, will have to increase their taxes and incur that onus because of this totally unnecessary and totally retrograde measure and because of the repudiation of the word given by this government to the premiers. The result is that we are going to have confusion, we are going to have a tax jungle, and we are going to see a great deal of unnecessary public misunderstanding.

Let no hon. gentleman on the other side say the government is decentralizing and returning to the provinces their rights. The provinces have always had their rights. The province of Quebec exercised its right and still exercises this right. One respects them for doing this, because they want to do it that way. But surely, when the government of Newfoundland and the government of Nova Scotia, the government of New Brunswick and the government of Manitoba do not want to have to go to the expense, trouble and annoyance of having a separate income tax and are quite satisfied with the arrangements which have brought order into our national finances out of the chaos which Mr. Mackenzie King found when he came into office in 1935, the government of the day should not be considering so retrograde a step as this. Surely, this is a terrible thing to be doing now—to try to plunge this country, and particularly the poorer provinces, back into that chaos from which the wise and courageous policies of the Liberal government have carried us in the years between 1945 and 1957. We had reached the point where even the intransigent premier of Quebec, the late Maurice Duplessis, said, after the system of equalization was substituted for the system of tax rentals four and a half years ago, "It is still not what I want, but it is much better than anything we have ever had before." He said that, and, what is more, he took the money. He took the money and he was very glad to get it, because if he had not taken it the province would have been bankrupt. Those are the facts. They are incontrovertible, and notwithstanding the money which the province took in those last few years the provincial treasury was more or less bankrupt when, finally, his successors were defeated.

I say this is a retrograde step. It is a repudiation of the principle of equalization which has brought order into our national finances and into federal-provincial relations. This alone, if there were nothing else in this bill, would merit condemnation of this measure.

Mr. Argue: Members of the C.C.F. group over the years have been strong supporters of federal-provincial tax agreements and the equalization which has flowed therefrom. We feel that the tax agreements, if continued, will enable the federal government to co-operate with the provinces to bring a greater measure of equality into the financial resources of the various provinces which make up our country.

We think this is a backward step. We think the government has not endeavoured in any way to get taxation agreements as heretofore but has gone to the provinces on a take it or leave it basis. The government, by this measure, is saying that it is ceasing to discuss with the provinces any alternative proposals. The premier of Saskatchewan, in correspondence with the Prime Minister, has asked that before a measure of this kind is undertaken there should be another federal-provincial conference—a final conference as he put it—to deal with the matter, the precedent for this being the 1956 arrangement of the St. Laurent government.

We are being asked to pass this particular clause before having had a general debate on federal-provincial financial agreements. We think this is putting the cart before the horse. We should have had an opportunity to debate the general agreements before being presented with this measure which, when passed, will be a fait accompli. It will mean that the provinces have no alternative but to accept it and that the debate on the general taxation agreements will take place after the government and parliament have committed themselves to a particular course.

We think this measure demonstrates that federal-provincial relations in Canada are at an all-time low. The provinces across this country have registered many objections to a proposal of this kind. The province of Ontario will, of course, be placed in a position to make a substantial gain, but the whole principle of equalization is being repudiated. People in certain provinces will have definite advantages, but the principle of equalization has gone down the drain.

Mr. Chairman, we shall have further speeches to make when we are on the resolution itself, but we state now that this is a retrograde, a backward step.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what allocation will be made of this income tax to the provinces. I refer to a taxpayer who might live in one province and earn his living in another. Subclause (3) of clause 13 appearing at page 9 of the bill says "income earned in the taxation year in a province". Should that read "in the province", or what is the meaning of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, so far as this clause of the bill is concerned, we are dealing here with income that is subject to federal taxation. For this purpose it does not matter in which province the money is earned. The matter determining the time and place of the earning of the income as among the provinces is something we will be dealing with in another connection.

So far as this particular clause is concerned we start with federal tax, and there is provision for a reduction corresponding to the kind of abatement we have under the present tax rental system. It will be available in the case where the income is earned in the taxation year in a province, the purpose being to enable the provinces—those which wish to do so—to legislate for the purpose of applying a provincial income tax on the said income.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have been told and I have learned on more than one occasion that the longer one is a member of parliament the less one should be amazed at what goes on. I must say I am somewhat astounded that we should now be discussing a clause such as clause 13 of Bill No. C-120. I have learned from reading clause 13 and the explanatory note what the minister has in mind, and I say bluntly that I think it is the height of audacity, hypocrisy and impudence for us to have before us now a proposed taxation change before we have discussed the principles of the resolution dealing with new dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements. Surely, Mr. Chairman, the procedure is to pass the principles first and then to proceed with the arrangements. This fiscal policy began in 1941 and continues until the end of March next year. A change is proposed in the contractual basis of the fiscal arrangements which surely should be made before we actually deal with the Income Tax Act, this week, next week, or at some future time. In other words, this is accepted now as a fait accompli without our having discussed the principles of the new agreement. I say that is wrong.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, with all respect, the hon. member is mistaken. That point was discussed earlier. The house gave approval to the principle of this bill in adopting second reading at noon today. We are now in the committee stage dealing with the clauses of the bill. There is on the order paper a resolution dealing with the proposed federal-provincial fiscal proposals for the ensuing five years. I hope we will be discussing that very shortly. I intend to make a statement in regard to that subject as soon as the item is called.

By this bill we are simply carrying out an undertaking given to the provinces. The provincial governments all understand that they will have to call sessions of their legislatures this fall in order to enact the necessary legislation, and it is highly desirable that the provincial governments know precisely what parliament has enacted. There is no question here of jumping the gun or anything of that kind. There will be a full opportunity to discuss the principles of that proposed federal-provincial proposal. The principle of this bill was approved today by the house when second reading was given and it was referred to the committee.

Mr. Winch: I understand that, Mr. Chairman, but I say that the basic principle of this clause is dependent upon the passage of that resolution and the resulting bill which we still have not before us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is well aware that under the existing system legislated under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act there is provision for abatement in the case of a province which chooses to collect its own personal or corporation tax. The provision contained in clause 13 is the counterpart of that kind of abatement. It provides for the counterpart of that kind of abatement which will exist under the proposed new system.

Mr. Winch: It is dependent upon the other bill being passed, is it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member is attempting to preserve his right to discuss the other measure fully, I might say that by the adoption of this clause his right to debate or discuss the other measure will not be abridged at all. Parliament can approve this provision and still decide not to approve the other resolution. It is dependent upon the will of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, clause 13 deals with income tax arrangements. Where is a reference to that to be found in this bill? Where is there any reference to corporation taxes, because that too is involved in the arrangements between the federal and provincial governments.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we will be dealing with that subject when we reach clause 19 appearing at page 12.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, does the minister realize that if he continues the formula he is now putting forward, by the year 2046 we will no longer be in this field?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision runs up to and includes the year 1966.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. Was the hon. member for Welland rising?

An hon. Member: Get up and get on with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I intended to pursue very briefly the question which the hon. member for Welland asked in respect to which the minister suggested it could be settled effectively when the other measure is before us. Surely these abatements which are laid down in this bill are going to be based on some appreciation of what province the tax is attributed to. I suggest there are going to be problems in this context. The federal parliament can say what its view is as to whether the income is earned in Quebec or in Ontario—that is taxable in Quebec or Ontario—but so long as the legislature of Quebec or Ontario puts on a direct tax, it can be put on any basis it likes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It still has to be constitutional.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, but the province can put on a direct tax in respect to anyone subject to its jurisdiction. There is no question whatever about that. It does seem to me that although it will not be as great in the case of individuals as in the case of corporations it is going to be a real problem in the determination of how much of the federal tax was in fact collected from taxpayers in Quebec, how much from taxpayers in Nova Scotia, how much from taxpayers in Ontario, so as to know what the value of the—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not a new problem. We have that problem today. There are two provinces which collect taxes wholly or in part. This problem is not a new one.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in respect to this matter, the minister seems not to have dealt with the charge made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that this was an attack on the principle of equalization. I should like to confirm what the hon. member has said by putting a statement on the record to that effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact is this does not touch that matter at all.

Mr. Chevrier: It does.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect to the hon. member, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister allow me to complete what I have to say and perhaps he could then comment on it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is really out of order here; it does not apply to this clause at all.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not out of order here. You say clearly that this new section provides for a reduction of the personal income tax for the years 1962 to 1966, inclusive, in accordance with new fiscal arrangements with the provinces commencing on April 1, 1962. Therefore there is of necessity a reference to the fiscal arrangements made between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not the equalization; this has nothing to do with that.

Mr. Chevrier: It has been said that the principle of equalization has been abandoned and I simply wish to confirm that by reading a statement made by the premier of Quebec following the last meeting which took place and which is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of February 25, 1961 in an article entitled:

Premiers' reaction mixed to P.M.'s new tax proposal

This is the statement:

The equalization formula, of which Quebec is currently the biggest beneficiary, has been changed in such a way that it is no help either. Not until the fourth or fifth year of the new tax-sharing agreement, by finance minister Fleming's estimate, will the government of Quebec qualify for anything more than the guaranteed floor equalization payment.

On the same subject the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 24 carried an article under the heading:

Lesage calls plan smokescreen

The article reads in part as follows:

"We are offered a so-called national formula which is applicable only to Ontario," he said.

This is the premier of Quebec speaking: I continue:

The other nine provinces must rely on special guarantee clauses in order to prevent equalization income from falling, he explained. The guarantee clauses have become necessary because the proposed formula would include provincial revenue from natural resources and use the national average as a base instead of the average of the two richest provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nothing in this—

Mr. Chevrier: The article goes on to say:

The Quebec premier accused Prime Minister John Diefenbaker of laying down a smokescreen by telling the provinces to assume their constitutional responsibilities and collect their own taxes. Quebec has been denying corporation and personal income taxes for some years.

"This is a smokescreen to allow his Tory members to come into Quebec claiming that they saved the constitution," he said bitterly.

Mr. Diefenbaker's insistence on constitutional responsibilities is startlingly reminiscent of the objections raised by Maurice Duplessis as regards fiscal proposals of the St. Laurent government.

There are other quotations from statements made by the premier which I shall not put on the record but those do give a clear indication that the principle of equalization, if it is not being entirely abandoned, is certainly being watered down to the point where it is of little or no use to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not the place for a debate on the question of federal-provincial fiscal proposals with respect to the coming five years. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and now the hon. member for Laurier are bringing in arguments about the equalization principle. There is no equalization principle involved in clause 13. This is where there is confusion on the part of hon. members opposite. Equalization, the matter that they have been discussing, is based on potential provincial revenue from the standard taxes; it is not a matter depending upon federal revenue, as they seem to think. This clause now under discussion simply deals with the federal tax and provides for an abatement, the counterpart of the abatement that exists under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. We will have an opportunity to discuss these broader questions soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree with the minister that the proper place to discuss these other matters is on the resolution dealing with the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreement. I also agree with what was very well said by the hon. member for Vancouver East. This particular clause takes two things for granted; it takes for granted first that parliament is going to pass the other legislation. No doubt it is because of the majority that the government has behind it. But this clause if it is adopted in its present form really leaves us no room for discussion of the other because the two things fit together as a single piece. That is the whole point. Not a single provincial government has expressed satisfaction with this plan—this "suggestion", I think, to use the Prime Minister's delicate word—this take-it-or-else scheme. Though none of the provinces has expressed satisfaction with it hon. gentlemen opposite are just going ahead and legislating and the provinces can accept the consequences.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to know from the minister whether any arrangement has been made with the provinces as to the allocation of money. I am thinking now of the question of abatement of personal income tax covering a company such as Imperial Oil which operates all across the country. I think also of the Bell Telephone Company which operates in only two provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are corporations. We come to those in a later clause. This is personal income tax.

Mr. McMillan: I am thinking of personal income, the dividends which will be received by individuals on which they have to pay income tax. I am thinking of abatement in those cases.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is all covered in the present arrangement. This is not a new question at all. This clause does not deal with that matter. We will have that question before us when we come to the other measures.

Mr. McMillan: There is no agreement with the provinces as to the allocation of such moneys? Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A system of allocation has been worked out. It has been in existence under the present system and we made some progress last year at the dominion-provincial conference in arriving at a better understanding with respect to the allocation of corporation taxation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I trust that the minister is not presuming to tell us that there has been any system of allocation worked out with respect to personal income tax in respect of any province except the province of Quebec. No other province in this country has levied a personal income tax since the year 1941 and therefore there could not possibly be any understanding with any other province because there has been nothing about which to have an understanding. If I remember rightly, the province of Quebec has levied this tax only since 1951 or 1952, so that there may be some arrangement between the federal authorities and the province of Quebec; I assume there is. Has the minister any assurance that that arrangement is going to be acceptable to the other provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has completely overlooked the fact that under the present system there must be allocation as among provinces both of personal income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. It is very necessary under the present system.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

That has been worked out. This is not a new system at all and it does not depend upon a province collecting its own taxes in such a situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the minister is saying is that there is a notional arrangement at the present time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is more than that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): A real one.

Mr. Pickersgill: How can it be more than that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a very real one, to determine the provincial share in any situation of the yield from personal income tax or corporation tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate at once that there is a notional system; it is not based upon the actual collection of the actual taxes. While it is quite easy to agree upon a notional system which is what we have now, I suggest to the minister that there are going to be a lot of problems that have not been foreseen when he tries to fit a notional system into an actual system and he begins to get disputes about these matters, as he will.

Mr. Benidickson: To follow up what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, I direct the attention of the minister to his proposed amendment in the bill and in particular to subclause 3. Have the provinces agreed to a definition that income earned in the taxation year in a province and income earned in the taxation year outside a province mean amounts determined under rules prescribed for the purpose by regulations of the federal government? That means orders in council of the federal government. Have these orders in council been prepared? Are the provinces aware of them and are they agreeable to what would be involved in the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course there cannot be any order in council until this legislation has been adopted.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we all have respect for our provinces and when there are two parties to an agreement I imagine we would think that the definition of income earned in the taxation year in a province was very important to each of our provinces. This gives the federal cabinet power to make regulations to define something as important as income earned in and outside a province. So far as the provinces are concerned, is this a case of take it or leave it or take it as you have it, or was this discussed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This does not depend upon an agreement with the provinces at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I say it is essential to the amount of money that will subsequently be paid to the provinces or forsaken by the federal government under this clause of the bill. Then we look at paragraph (c) of subclause 3 which relates to the Old Age Security Act. Was this matter discussed at the last federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, this whole matter was discussed at the last two conferences. In particular, the graduated withdrawal of the federal government from the personal income tax field in favour of the provinces was specifically discussed at the last of the conferences. The reference to the Old Age Security Act alludes to the 3 per cent payable into the old age security fund. The 16 per cent deduction next year relates to the balance of the federal tax, the true federal income tax.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Repeal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why is this clause being repealed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is consequential upon clause 10 of the bill which we have already approved by which section 31, subsection 2 of the act is repealed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15.

Mr. Benidickson: This clause really relates to an obligation under the Canada-United States tax agreement. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 and 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—Idem.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we are on page 12, and clause 19—

Mr. Pickersgill: Clause 18 is not carried. I would ask the minister to explain it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 18?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a relieving provision dealing with associated companies. We had legislation at the last session of parliament in relation to associated companies. By that 1960 legislation we introduced new rules to prevent companies splitting themselves up into many small companies in order to obtain the benefit of the low rate of tax on the then first $25,000 of taxable income, now $35,000. It has since been found that one of these rules might result in two companies being associated merely because they were controlled by a single trust or estate upon the death of an individual, and this relieving provision is intended to provide that in the described circumstances the companies shall not be deemed to be associated.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing here with matters that have been before us recently but I refer the minister to line 42 in clause 18. The minister has referred to two corporations. Possibly I have not given this matter adequate study but it occurs to me that it might read "two or more corporations". Has this been given adequate study?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member is overlooking the earlier provisions of the same clause. This sets out the terms applicable to one corporation and then the terms applicable to another corporation. I think the hon. member need have no fear that if there were any two out of two or more this will clearly provide that all pairs of corporations that come within the description contained in this clause will be deemed now not to be associated with each other in the year.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 19—Deduction from corporation tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On clause 19 there is an amendment of which hon. members have received notice. I would ask my colleague, the Postmaster General, to move this amendment to clause 19.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I move:

That Bill C-120, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by striking out lines 1 to 3 on page 12 and substituting therefor the following:
"19. (1) Subsection (1) of section 40 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
'40. (1) There may be deducted from the tax otherwise' "

Mr. Chevrier: What is the meaning of this amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I presume the hon. member wishes an explanation of the amendment rather than the clause?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment is necessary to repeal section 40, subsection 1, of the present act. The present wording of section 40, subsection 1, provides for a 9 per cent abatement for corporations in Ontario and a 10 per cent abatement for corporations in Quebec during the remainder of the present arrangements with the provinces. Accordingly, the present provisions of section 40, subsection 1, lapse at the end of the 1961 taxation year. However, at that time if it were not for this amendment the law would revert to the way it read in 1956 when it provided for a 5 per cent abatement.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like some further clarification of this matter. Under the agreement effective for the two income tax years of 1960 and 1961, and in its income tax bill of 1960, clause 12, which I now have before me, the government increased the provincial share of the corporation income tax from 9 to 10 per cent. That is to be found in clause 12 which reads as follows:

> There may be deducted from the tax otherwise payable by a corporation under this part for a taxation year an amount equal to
> (a) 10 per cent of the corporation's taxable income earned in the year in a province prescribed by a regulation made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance that was, for the fiscal year commencing in the calendar year in which the year ended, a prescribed province as defined in section 9A of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Provided that a province would undertake to make available to universities annual grants determined by conditions specified in section 9A of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. This is chapter 13 of 8-9 Elizabeth II, which reads as follows:

> "Foundation" means the Canadian Universities Foundation incorporated by letters patent dated the 4th day of February, 1959, under the seal of the Secretary of State of Canada;

This year, in the bill now before us we are amending the Income Tax Act so as to increase the provincial share of income taxes beginning January 1, 1961 in accordance with the proposal made by the government last February and to be embodied in a bill which has not yet come before the house, although the resolution is on the order paper. However, the clause inserted last year in the Income Tax Act to implement the agreement with the province of Quebec in respect of university grants, unless I am mistaken, is being deleted. The question which I should like to put to the minister is this: Is it true that this section as it appeared in the amendments to the Income Tax Act last as clause 12 is to be abandoned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think there is some misapprehension here. The clause that was introduced in 1960 provided for an increase from 9 per cent to 10 per cent in the abatement in respect of federal corporate income tax applicable in what was known as a prescribed province. The only province that was a prescribed province was the province of Quebec last year, and this year the abatement to federal taxpayers in so far as federal corporate taxpayers in the province of Quebec are concerned is 10 per cent and not 9 per cent as in the case of other provinces. This legislation had a two year effect and it will expire at the end of this coming year.

Now, it was necessary because we have no provision made for what takes place in this regard beyond that time, to introduce this clause. If it is not introduced at the expiry of this year what we revert to is not the 9 per cent but the previous 5 per cent. This is the reason for the amendment and the effect of the amendment will be that on the expiry of this legislation that had a two year life, the percentage of abatement will be 9 per cent which will be general in all provinces, and as the hon. member is aware that is the extent of the abatement in respect of federal corporate taxes that is proposed in the general abatement. This whole matter out of which the 1960 amendment arose will have to be the subject of further discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that "the end of the year" means the end of the calendar year to which the minister refers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the end of the taxation year.

Mr. Chevrier: I also take it from the answer which the minister has given that section 12 of the 1960 act is now being abandoned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it expires.

Mr. Chevrier: It expires at the end of the calendar year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will expire at the end of this year, so it is necessary now to make provisions in contemplation of that expiry so that the extent of the abatement in the province of Quebec in respect of corporate taxes will revert not to 5 per cent but to 9 per cent when the provision comes to an end.

Mr. Chevrier: So that in 1962 it will revert to 9 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, under the amending bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that mean it is the intention of the government to terminate this agreement with the province of Quebec in respect of university grants?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a two year life to the amendment which was introduced at the 1960 session. It will be necessary by next year to work out some arrangement to meet this problem. The 1960 solution had a two year life and on its expiry we will have to find another solution.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask then, if that is so, whether the federal government communicated its intention to terminate this agreement to the provincial government of Quebec?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not a question of the termination of the agreement, Mr. Chairman. The federal legislation introduced last year had a two year life given to it by parliament. It was not a matter of confirming an agreement or anything of that kind. The federal legislation was given a two year life by parliament. The effect of this is known and understood by those who will be interested in it.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the point about which I wish to be sure, and I am not too clear. Perhaps the minister could clarify it a little further by answering this question. Were there any negotiations at all between the federal government and the government of Quebec in connection with this matter, either verbally or in writing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were asked to leave out of this year's legislation, whether income tax legislation or federal-provincial fiscal legislation, any reference to the kind of arrangement that was made in 1960 and to provide for an alternative arrangement in respect of the university grants.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister who asked the federal government to do this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premier Lesage.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to carry that a bit further, if I may. If this section 12 of last year's Income Tax Act is deleted, does this mean the 10 per cent corporate income tax will not apply after January 1, 1962?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member looks at the 1960 amendment he will see it was given effect to March 31, 1962 to make it coterminus with the five year period under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. The abatement, as such, applied to the 1960 and 1961 taxation years, so that in this respect the plan of the 1960 amendment was in conformity with the plan of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act both with respect to the abatement that applied to taxation years and the operation of the general agreement with reference to fiscal years.

Mr. Chevrier: May I go just one step further? Since the present bill will apply in 1961, does this mean that the special arrangement with Quebec will not apply in 1961 also?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it continues to be a prescribed province in 1961, as I understand it to be, the 10 per cent abatement will apply in the province of Quebec in 1961 because the legislation was given a two year life in a province that qualified as a prescribed province. A province could have opted out if it did not wish to continue. It was a prescribed province and my understanding is that Quebec continues in 1961 to be a prescribed province as it was in 1960.

Mr. Chevrier: If that is the case, is it not a fact that this appears to be a clear breach of the agreement—at least, it appears that way to me—which when made was supposed to apply to the years 1960 and 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. With respect the hon. member has not been following what I have been trying to say. The 1960 amendment introduced by parliament was given a two year effect and that provided, in effect, that in the case of a prescribed province it could have a 10 per cent abatement for its corporate taxpayers from federal corporate taxes if it chose not to have any university grants paid to its universities. The province of Quebec was the only province that qualified as a prescribed province; and so in the year 1960 federal corporate taxpayers in that province were entitled to a 10 per cent abatement. The same is true for 1961. So by the end of the year the effect of the legislation enacted in 1960 will have been spent. It is just a matter of the expiry of that legislation according to its terms. Then the question arises: What happens at the expiry of that legislation pending our working out with the province whatever arrangement may suit it if something of this kind were to be continued? By this amendment, in the case of a province that was prescribed in 1960 and 1961 we provide that at the end of this period it reverts not to 5 per cent abatement but to 9 per cent. In other words, it is putting the situation back as it was in 1959.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said earlier that a request had been made by the premier of the province. Can the minister tell us when the premier made this request?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may say frankly that I do not wish to go further into detail on this matter. This matter was discussed with the premier when he was here. He intimated this was his wish. That is the reason that in this legislation nothing is provided with regard to that subject. It will have to be considered on another occasion.

Mr. Chevrier: This was the conference that took place in February?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; the February conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that this is not a matter that can quite be left in the nonchalant manner in which the minister has left it. It seems to me that the minister has either said too much or too little. The minister has told us that the premier of Quebec asked not to have continued this provision that was made last year. Surely this is a very important matter that is involved here. If we adopt this clause we are dropping a provision for which the minister took credit to himself a year ago and which would put the people of Quebec on a basis of equality with those in the other provinces; and he was very scornful of the attitude we took on this side of the house about this matter. He said he had solved this problem that the Liberals had been unable to solve. He boasted a great deal about that solution. Now he comes before us and just drops his solution and expects the House of Commons to regard this as a matter of no consequence or of no moment. If the minister felt as he said he did a couple of years ago, I cannot understand what is being done now?

We all remember his eloquent speech with which I agreed. I do not often agree with the minister but I agreed with that speech. He said it was intolerable, if that was his word; I have not the text of his speech before me. However, in effect he said it was intolerable to have this money that was collected from all over Canada paid in two thirds of the country but not in the other third. I agree completely with that statement. I think the minister for once was showing himself to be broadminded and statesmanlike. The minister said he was going to solve that problem and he brought in a solution last year that he told us would solve that problem for all time. Now he is just quietly dropping his solution and giving us no explanation at all. If this problem was as urgent as the minister said it was two years ago—and I think it was; I agree with the minister about that matter and I said that previously—what has happened to make it less urgent now?

When one considers all the time that has been spent in the last year in carrying on these discussions with the province, I would have thought that the minister would have taken some initiative in seeking to discuss with the government of Quebec how this matter was to be arranged and, if this particular provision was to be dropped and this particular solution was to no longer be a solution, what solution is going to be found. Before we drop this legislation and change it I think we should know what has happened. After all, as the minister pointed out, if Quebec does not want to go on being a prescribed province, it will not matter that it is in our law; they do not have to be a prescribed province. However, I do not think the minister should so quickly drop this statesmanlike solution he found a year ago—just drop it into the sea—without having anything whatever to put in its place. That procedure does not seem to be consonant with that statesmanlike attitude the minister adopted a year ago.

After all, I do not think there is anyone in the House of Commons who does not wish to see the people of Quebec receive in one fashion or another out of the federal treasury their fair share of the money collected from all over Canada that is to be used for the support of the universities. That is a general proposition and I think everyone agrees with it. There are in some provinces some people who attach no importance to the way in which that money is paid. They do not care how it is paid as long as they receive it. In other provinces there are people who do attach importance to the method by which the money is paid, and who consider that it is very important that it should be done in accord with what is their view of proper constitutional arrangements. I certainly respect their views in that matter. I respect them completely and I have always respected them. I do not say I have always understood all of them but I have always respected them.

However, for us here in this parliament just quietly to drop this provision, to have nothing to put in its place and to be told by the minister that he is doing this because the premier of Quebec asked him to do it but does not wish to say any more about it, seems to me to be a little bit less than frank with us. I think we ought to be told whether this was just a casual reference made in a casual conversation or whether the minister received a formal communication from the premier of the province or just what happened; and whether, when this was received, any overtures were made to the provincial government with a view to finding some other solution to the problem or whether this was just another case in which the government, because it has an awkward problem, is going to try to forget about it.

It seems to me that we cannot allow this matter to rest where it is now and adopt this amendment which just throws away the fruits of the minister's statesmanship of only a year ago. I think the minister ought to tell us whether he has taken any steps to find out what would be a method acceptable to the present government of the province of Quebec for dealing with this problem. The minister was at great pains to deal with the previous government of Quebec; he was very anxious; he was very concerned; he went out of his way. Surely the minister is not going to say that, because the political complexion of the government of Quebec has changed, his zeal for justice and for fairness that he had a year ago has evaporated all of a sudden. I cannot believe that of the minister. At any rate, I should be very reluctant to believe it. I should hope that the minister would be able to tell us that he is in active negotiation with the government of Quebec and that he believes he has a solution of this problem, if he has one; or if he has not, I think he ought to tell us what he has done about it. It is a very serious thing. If we are going to maintain unity in this country we in this parliament, regardless of party, must seek to treat all parts of the country equally and fairly. I would hate to see us go back to that regrettable situation—

An hon. Member: Which you were in five years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, which we were in five years ago. That is right. It was a regrettable situation as the hon. gentleman knows well, because he follows matters of this kind very closely. The hon. member knows well why we were in that regrettable situation. When the Massey commission recommended the university grants in the first place they were established by the St. Laurent government. The hon. member for Greenwood recalls those events very well, because he pressed the St. Laurent government to do that. He expressed great appreciation of it when it was done and gave the warmest possible support to it. The first year after those grants were established the premier of Quebec accepted them. Perhaps I should not say that he accepted them, exactly, but he entered into an arrangement with the then minister of finance whereby they were accepted by the universities in Quebec for one year. Then, for reasons which those of us who are not privy to the mind of that gentleman have never been able to understand, what was perfectly acceptable one year became totally unacceptable the next year.

For several years the people of Quebec lost the benefit of these payments. Then, in an effort to find another solution, my right hon. friend, Mr. St. Laurent, back in 1956, I think it was, or 1957, found a method by which these grants would accumulate until such time as a means could be found to make use of them. In other words, notwithstanding the intransigence of the government of Quebec the government of Canada said: we must find a way to be just, and we will save up the money. Of course, we had money to save in those days. We did not have deficits. We said: We will save up the money until some means can be found by which the universities can receive it. And a means was found. A means was found by the present minister, and I give him credit for his zeal in that matter. I have praised him for it, and I praise him for it again. A means was found a year ago which was acceptable to the then government of Quebec. Under that arrangement the universities of Quebec have benefited. Now we are going to have that stopped cold and nothing put in its place.

It is not for me to say anything about the government of Quebec, and it is not, really, for anyone else in this house to say anything about it. That is their business. But the solution of this problem is our business, and it is a very important business. If we are going to maintain the kind of country which I am sure all of us on both sides of the house would like to have, it is very important that we bend every effort to find a solution to this problem which will be an effective solution in every province. This means we have to maintain the kind of relation which every province, whatever its political complexion, which makes such an arrangement possible. I hope the minister does not press us to take his statesmanlike solution of last year off the statute books until he is able to come in here and offer us an acceptable alternative.

This is not imposed upon the government of Quebec, as the minister has rightly said. It is not imposed on the government of any provinces. This is a voluntary arrangement which a province can accept or not as it likes. Why take it out of the act at all? If it related exclusively to Quebec, that would be another matter but, as I say, unless the minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are not taking it out of the act. It was put into the act by parliament for two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know what the minister is going to say, and the hon. gentleman is right in a technical sense. It was put in for two years and it will expire unless something is done to keep it alive. If the minister has not done anything about this before, perhaps I can make a suggestion. It is almost six o'clock now. We know the minister does not take much time for meals. We know he has no other worries at the present time. I suggest that the minister go into his room, which is not far from this chamber, and telephone Mr. Lesage and say to him: We have reached this point—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think you will be doing that.

Mr. Pickersgill: That, of course, is a characteristic intervention by the minister. He has so much knowledge of what others do. I am merely suggesting it would be a statesmanlike thing for the minister to go to his room and telephone Mr. Lesage and say: We have reached this point in the consideration of this bill and I should hate to drop this; I wish to do something about it; I wish to make sure that Quebec continues to get a fair deal. Is there something we could do about it? I think this would be a very constructive way in which the minister could spend the next half hour of his time. Then, perhaps, the minister could come in here as he did so proudly a year or so ago and tell the house—you know how modestly he would say it, too, sir—Mr. Chairman, we have a solution to this problem which is really going to work. What is more, I have caught these Liberals napping and we have the problem solved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are always napping. One does not have to catch them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the minister always says that but I thought this time I would save him some trouble by putting it on record in Hansard for him.

An hon. Member: That's right. Keep it going.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am seeking to be very serious about this. I am sure no one in this parliament wishes to see this problem remain unsolved. I note that some of my remarks seem very palatable to some hon. gentlemen behind me. It does seem to me that there must be good will, and active good will, on both sides for its solution.

May I, sir, observe that it seems to be six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, just before six o'clock we were discussing clause 19 of the bill and I had posed some questions to the minister. I should like to make quite sure that I have understood properly the matter which is now before us.

In clause 12 of the bill introduced last year the arrangement made was for two years, as I understand it. In the bill which I have now before me the explanatory notes relating to clause 12 indicate that this amendment which deals with the deduction from income tax allowed the corporations in certain provinces implements paragraph 2 of the income tax resolution as follows, and then in quotations it says that for 1960 and 1961 taxation years the deduction from tax allowed to corporations in respect to income earned in a province which imposes an income tax on corporations and in which arrangements exist for the replacement of federal grants to universities by additional provincial grants in accordance with the proposed amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act be increased from 9 per cent to 10 per cent in respect of income earned after December 31, 1959.

It is clear from the legislation introduced last year that the arrangement referred to therein was for the two years 1960 and 1961. However, if I understand the explanation of the minister properly this arrangement will not apply in 1961 because we are now deleting that provision from the act, and this bill now before us will not apply in 1961. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. gentleman will look at subclause (2) of clause 19 he will see that this section is applicable to the 1962-1966 taxation years.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; where is the minister reading from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is stated in line 14 on page 12 of this bill in subclause (2) of clause 19.

Mr. Chevrier: That says that this section is applicable to the 1960-61 taxation year, not the 1962-1966 taxation years, as the minister has said.

Mr. Drysdale: You are looking at the wrong bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the hon. member is looking at last year's bill rather than the one before us now.

Mr. Chevrier: I beg the minister's pardon; that is right. The minister is then saying that the arrangement will apply for the year 1961.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the effect of the law as it stands today. There is no change being made by this clause in the law as enacted by parliament in 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, would the minister point out where it says in this bill that we are repealing the old clause and inserting a new one, and that the old clause applies to the whole of the year 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is provided by last year's bill which is not being modified by this clause in that regard at all.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but it is being taken out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All that is being done by the proposed amendment now before us is to say what happens at the end of this two year period, which ends at the end of the year 1961. All we are dealing with is the situation which arises on the expiry of the two year period for which provision was made by the legislation of 1960. All we are saying is at that time we do not revert to the 5 per cent but to 9 per cent as the statutory percentage of abatement in the province of Quebec for federal corporate taxpayers.

Mr. Chevrier: Before we recessed the minister had stated that he was asked to remove this (a) portion of clause 12 in last year's bill by the premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think that is quite the way I expressed it. I was asked as to what this arose out of, and I pointed out, I thought quite clearly, that we were asked not to bring into the scope of these new arrangements any new provision in relation to the university grants or the tax arrangements in lieu thereof which took the form of an increased federal abatement in respect of federal corporate taxpayers in prescribed provinces. We have kept that out of the scope of the legislation that parliament is now being asked to deal with, whether in the income tax bill or the new bill of which notice has been given on the order paper in resolution form. This matter as to what happens in regard to university grants will have to be a subject of further discussions between now and the end of this present fiscal year.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me use the minister's own words. He was asked by the premier of the province of Quebec to not bring this matter into the scope of the new arrangements. I should like to ask the minister when this conversation took place. He has already said that it was during the course of the last federal-provincial conference in February. Could the minister be a little more specific and say whether it was at the opening, during the course of, or at the end of the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not during the course of the conference proper. It was a discussion held outside the conference.

Mr. Chevrier: Was there anyone present?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not at that time.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister say whether it was on the first or second day of the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can locate it by saying to the hon. member that it was during the evening of the governor general's dinner.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the amendment carries I should like to ask the minister whether he did telephone Mr. Lesage at my suggestion between six o'clock and 7.30 o'clock this evening? Since it was my suggestion it is probably superfluous for me to ask that question.

What I should like to ask the minister, and it is perhaps a question that is meant a little more seriously, is this. Has the minister made any attempt, or has anyone in the government made any attempt—perhaps the honourable and persuasive Secretary of State would have done so—to approach the government of Quebec with a view to finding a means of dealing with this problem?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not yet, Mr. Chairman. We think we had better dispose of this major matter of the new fiscal arrangement before we come down to that specific matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a very odd answer indeed for the minister to give because last year he went to the extraordinary length—we on this side thought it was a rather extraordinary length—of including this arrangement that he is now terminating in the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. It did seem an odd place to put it, but that was the way it was done and we wonder why, if it was not to be an integral part of that arrangement, it was done that way at that time because up to that time, of course, the statutory basis of the university grants had been quite different. Can the minister give any reason why this subject was not also discussed at the federal-provincial conference along with the other subjects discussed there in view of the fact that the government itself had taken the initiative of bringing it within the ambit of those arrangements?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nobody chose to introduce the subject in the conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, that, sir, seems to be very odd, too, does it not, because it was the federal government that took the initiative in this matter. According to the minister, it was the federal government that last year, finding a more receptive premier of Quebec than Mr. Duplessis, opened up this subject, first with Mr. Sauve and then with Mr. Barrette. Why, after last year's zeal, are they so coy this year? It is a little difficult to understand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not if the hon. member has regard to the view that was expressed. I make it quite clear that we are not terminating anything. The hon. member talks about our terminating something. We are not terminating anything. We take account of the fact that the legislation which was passed by parliament last year was given by parliament a two year life. It will expire at the end of the present fiscal year. And all that we are doing here, pending the making of some new arrangement, is to make some provision for what happens at the expiry of that two year term. It expires with the legislation that parliament enacted in 1960. I am not attempting for one minute, Mr. Chairman, to prejudge what may be done in relation to this problem as from April 1, 1962.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did a lot of prejudging last year when he brought in his great statesmanlike solution to this problem. Last year the minister told us that this was to be a part of the general settlement that the government was seeking, the new arrangements, the new deal; this was to be an integral part of it. The minister says, "Oh, no, we did not bring it up because nobody else did". Well, that is a very odd attitude indeed to take. Is this government now taking the view that it is afraid even to speak to the provinces about these problems, even to talk to the provincial governments about them? It does seem more than strange that no attempt has been made to seek a solution of this problem.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 20 agreed to.

On clause 21—Dividends received by brokers.

Mr. Benidickson: In this clause we have a reference to withholding tax. Indeed in the explanatory note there is a reference to the fact that perhaps there had been what is called a serious error. In what year did this occur? My investigation indicates it was perhaps 1952 and 1953. Has there been litigation since with respect to the amendments proposed in clause 21? I think it is appropriate to ask the minister whether he has consulted with his colleague the Minister of National Revenue and has ascertained up to date information as to what collections of income tax collected at source may exceed the liabilities of the taxpayer in the last two or three years?

I recall that the minister used to be one of those who objected to a system operating in the Department of National Revenue under which the maximum liability was collected in the department but was subsequently found to be excessive. I should like the minister to inform us, as we revise the Income Tax Act, whether this policy has been reviewed. Can he tell us to what extent income tax deductions on the wages of the low income tax group in the country have been reduced to the equivalent of the ultimate tax liability? This would reduce the refunds ultimately paid to these people, representing the amount that the department had taken in excess of the amount due the department in income tax.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister agree to the committee reverting to clause 19 so that I may ask one question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Ask it on this clause.

Mr. Chevrier: All right. I think I understood the minister clearly to say a moment ago that this bill would apply to the year 1961.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: I had put the question to the minister that the arrangement would not apply in 1961. I understood him to say that it would apply in 1961. Am I fair to him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me put it this way. In section 12 of last year's bill the arrangement was for two years, namely 1960 and 1961. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Having obtained that answer, I put this additional question to the minister. This will not apply in 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the "this"?

Mr. Chevrier: This will not apply in 1961, "this" having reference to clause 19 of this year's bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right, as I said before, because clause 19 deals with the situation that arises on the expiry of the legislation which was given a two year life when enacted in 1960.

Mr. Chevrier: Then am I correct in saying that the arrangement referred to in clause 19 will not apply to 1961 because the clause has been deleted in the income tax bill for 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. If the hon. member will look at the record, I think he will see that I have made that very clear. He may find it a bit complicated but I think that when he looks at the record he will see it is quite clear.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue it unduly but after having read this carefully during the recess I was clearly under the impression that clause 19 which is now before us will not apply for the year 1961 and the minister has said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister gave the opposite answer earlier.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no. I suggest that the hon. member look at the record and he will see that it is clear.

Mr. Chevrier: Then the minister says that for the year 1961, having regard to the way the clause now appears, the arrangement will not apply?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is going around. I have dealt with the matter and I think he will find it very clearly on the record.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just put it this way, that the arrangement as referred to in clause 19, section 40(a), (b) and subclause 2 will not apply in 1961 because the clause has been deleted from the 1961 bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nothing has been deleted. I agreed to answer a question of the hon. gentlemen without reopening the clause. He is asking questions now that have been answered before and I think when he sees the record he will find that the information is there and it is quite clear.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it is. However, I am not going to pursue the matter ad infinitum.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I raised a very valid question in connection with clause 21. I had in mind the vast number of taxpayers whose taxes are deducted at source. We have a reference here to a comparatively small number of taxpayers in whose case it is being suggested that there be a withholding tax deducted at source related to dividend or interest receipts of income. This is not political. I recall that when I was on the other side of the house we were rather worried that we collected more at the source than they were really obliged to pay from some people who earned less than those at the top of the totem pole. I wonder whether this situation has improved. I take full blame for the former situation, but what is happening now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not bring that statistical information here on a bill of this kind. It is within the knowledge of the Department of National Revenue and if the hon. member is interested in this matter I suggest that he put his question on the order paper and the information will be forthcoming.

Mr. Benidickson: This, of course, is related to the tax at source on the wages of employees. This is a withholding tax with respect to people who might have taxable income from dividends and interest. I would ask the minister to look at the explanatory notes, particularly those with reference to subclause 2 of clause 21. Will he explain in a better form than is done here what was the previous error that this amendment is endeavouring to correct? Has there been some litigation in recent times and, if so, what was it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Very simply, the word in line 21 which will now be "on" was "or" when it should have been "on". The "r" should have been "n".

Clause agreed to.

On clause 22.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister should give us some explanation of this clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment concerns donations by charitable foundations to governments and municipalities. It arises out of budget resolution No. 4. The particular amendment has been requested to permit a foundation to make donations to a municipal agency such as an art gallery.

Mr. Benidickson: This amendment is interesting. Some of us are a bit credulous with respect to those who would donate on a charitable basis for the purposes referred to in the resolution and in the amending bill. What kind of offers have been made in this regard so far that would warrant this amendment to our income tax laws? Has the minister knowledge of offers that have been made by way of gift to Her Majesty in the right of Canada or a province or to a Canadian municipality? If so, has any substantial amount been involved in recent times?

Mr. Chevrier: Is the matter sub judice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no litigation about this.

The Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: The minister is proposing to parliament that we amend the Income Tax Act to provide that there will be clear tax-free protection for a donation by an otherwise taxable person if he is giving something to Her Majesty in the right of Canada or a province or to a Canadian municipality. Maybe I am naive but I am not aware of many people who do this kind of thing. Something must have prompted the Minister of Finance to amend the Income Tax Act to provide that under such circumstances such a gift would have the tax advantages proposed in the bill.

I recall that the Minister of Finance rather looked askance at the attitude of a former administration which felt that they had received from one or two estates a very substantial tax advantage which might be diverted to unusual purposes for the advantage of the public. Here we are concerned with the matter of a gift by a taxpayer to a government. In the former case it was a matter of the government deciding that these were receipts rather unexpected and unanticipated in times of great prosperity when it might be possible to divert equivalent assets in another way to something like the Canada council. There was no thought on the part of taxpayers who were passing away that they were making a gift to Canada, to a province or to any other area of public ownership. This was fortuitous and accidental. I think we should know from the Minister of Finance what prompts him to suggest that an incentive could be granted to people who might, in a way in which I have never known about before, wish in the future to make an outright tax exempt gift to a government, whether federal, provincial or municipal. I am not quarrelling with that principle. However, I think we are entitled to information as to what has led up to this. Why does the minister recommend this? He has information that we in the opposition do not have.

If there are people who want to donate, in a taxation year, their income to a government agency such as the Canada Council, I think we should have information concerning that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already said, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment was requested to permit a charitable foundation to make a donation to a municipal agency such as an art gallery. This clause is to amend section 62 of the act, and section 62 deals not with charitable gifts by individuals but by non-profit corporations such as a charitable foundation. This provision is designed to remove any limitation in respect of gifts by such non-profit corporations or charitable foundations to Her Majesty in the right of Canada or a province or municipality, such as the particular occasion to which I have referred.

Mr. Benidickson: Have we, in the past, suffered by the absence of this amendment? If so, could the minister indicate under what circumstances we have suffered, perhaps, from the charitable inclinations of anybody in Canada because we did not have this proposal in the act before?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member asks if we have suffered. It depends on whom he means by "we". The fact is that unless such an amendment as this is passed the particular foundation in question will not be able to make a gift to the municipal art gallery in question.

Mr. Herridge: I see the two postilions of the minister are smiling when the hon. member continues to ask this question. It is an interesting point, however, and I think the committee is entitled to know whether the minister has received representations for this amendment to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have indicated that.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a matter to which all of us wish to be sympathetic, but the minister has said this is an individual foundation to which an opportunity might not have been possible if this amendment were not passed. He said "a foundation". I should like to know which foundation, whose foundation? How desirable is this? I think the minister should be frank with us. I think all of us desire to encourage those who have wealth and who plan that this wealth, after their death, will be devoted to cultural and social purposes. We want to be sure that they have a full opportunity to do so. The minister referred to an individual foundation. Will he name which foundation indicated to the minister that our law was inadequate up to now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was asked if representations had been made to this end, and I said yes. I referred to the fact that they had been made on behalf of a particular foundation. It is not customary to disclose the names in such cases.

Mr. Benidickson: No, but the minister did use the singular.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision is of general application, Mr. Chairman. Its purpose is to give encouragement to charitable foundations to make suitable gifts to municipalities for art galleries organized by municipalities.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is just one observation I should like to make before the clause is carried. It must have been rather painful, I would think, for the minister to put this clause in this particular language because what it does is to make Her Majesty a charity or, more particularly, to make the treasury of Canada a charity. In view of the present state of the treasury of Canada, I would have thought the minister would have been quite sensitive about doing that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not a new provision. There has been such a provision in this act for many years in relation to gifts to Her Majesty and these qualify for the purpose of reducing taxable income, Mr. Chairman. It was written in, as a matter of fact, in 1950.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister look at page 15, subclause (b) of subsection 4? I want to say that this perhaps worries me more than some other items in the clause to which I have referred. It says:

> There shall be included in computing a corporation's income all gifts received by the corporation and all amounts contributed to the corporation to be used for scientific research.

I have already commended the minister for some of the amendments he has introduced in his budget in respect of scientific research. I am concerned about whether or not a gift would necessarily be, in layman's language, a gift of a capital nature. As I read this paragraph, once one of these research corporations has been established and I were to give it a gift of $100,000 in 1961, which I could not do, I take it that would be regarded as income in that year and 90 per cent of it would have to be spent in that year. Perhaps I would wish my gift to be regarded as a capital grant, and perhaps I would be more concerned about the interest on my capital grant over the years being used by this non-profit research corporation, rather than have my gift regarded as income after the establishment of the corporation so that 90 per cent of it would have to be disbursed in that year. Am I wrong in my review of the amendments that are here?

I admire what the minister is doing here. He is encouraging corporations and individuals to invest in research. However, unless I misjudge the interpretation here, I question the requirement that 90 per cent of the funds received in a current year must be disbursed in that year. I wonder whether or not that requirement prevents a bona fide research corporation from receiving from anybody in Canada what is called here a gift, without the necessity that such gift be disbursed to the extent of 90 per cent in the year of receipt.

Mr. Drysdale: Before the minister replies, I wonder whether I might make a brief comment. First of all, I should like to commend the minister for bringing in this particular amendment covering scientific research. Many of us who serve on the research committee find it extremely encouraging that we have some tangible evidence of the government's interest in our operations and activities. When the minister is giving his reply I wonder whether he could indicate the scope of the definition of "scientific research". We in the research committee, perhaps loosely, have kept it to the one word "research". I wonder what effect the addition of the word "scientific" has. I wonder whether it tends to narrow the scope or whether a broad definition is being given of "scientific research".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The expression "scientific research" is defined by the Income Tax Act, section 72, subsection 4,

> "scientific research" means any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge,

Then in the same section 72 there are other provisions that have a bearing on the scope of those words. So far as the question of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is concerned, I think his interpretation is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: Is incorrect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is correct.

The Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Having heard from the minister that my interpretation is correct, if we pass the section I think we should have second thoughts. Having given credit to the government for encouraging in a new and substantial way the devotion of funds for research that will sustain some acceleration owing to tax laws, may I say this. If we have set up a corporation that is in all the sense of the act a truly and wholly desirable non-profit research corporation, I cannot see that we should legislate to say that any taxpayer who subsequently makes any gift—I think the word is "gift" in the section—to that very worthy corporation is, in making his gift, debarred from insisting that perhaps only the income of his gift rather than the capital would be included in income on the 90 per cent basis for the taxation year under consideration. I think this is an important matter. I have already commended the minister for his enterprise in this sphere. However, I think corporations will be established where the donor does not want necessarily to make a gift or, in fact, perhaps would not make a gift if he felt that 90 per cent of his gift had to be expended in the year following the gift. I think he would prefer that there were some continuation relative to his important capital donation. I wonder whether that result is what is defeated by these words.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is really nothing I can add, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member correctly interpreted the clause in his previous remarks. The donor can adjust his gift accordingly in order to suit the absorptive capacity of the donee charitable trust or corporation.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 22 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I simply predict that, whatever government is in power in a year or two—and I have some opinions upon that matter—this is legislation that will not likely stand. I do not think that people who have the kind of assets that we want to be devoted to this kind of worth-while entirely non-profit research enterprise are likely to make gifts—and I emphasize the word "gifts" —if the law says that those gifts must not be expended with relation to the return of the capital given to them but must be expended 90 per cent within the period of the taxation year within which the gift has been made. I say that provision will be discouraging to people who are likely to make gifts to the kind of research corporations which are given some encouragement under this amending bill. I have congratulated the minister for what he has done; but with regard to a corporation which he has set up here as being entitled to some tax exemption, I say that he has made a very great mistake in saying that a gift which, on the part of the donor may be regarded as capital, must be expended to the extent of 90 per cent in the year in which the gift was made.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 23—Distribution of income.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On clause 23 and clause 24, Mr. Chairman, here we have an amendment, the third one on the list, to strike out clause 23 and clause 24 and renumber clauses 25 and 26 as clauses 23 and 24 respectively. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to move that amendment.

Mr. Comtois: I so move.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: As I said earlier, this covers a number of pages of the amending bill. Having brought in approximately six amendments to the income tax proposal since June 20, is the minister sure that all the consequential amending clauses are covered when he has changed his mind about dealing with personal corporations which he said on budget night was a subject that had given him and his department a great deal of concern for over a year and upon which he was prepared to come to the country and make some announcement? Are we sure that all the consequential amendments in a hundred or more sections of the Income Tax Act are taken care of in the amendments which are before us tonight? I ask that question because four times within the last week since the Income Tax Act was introduced we have had amendments from the minister, not including this one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have full confidence in the competent draftsmen who are responsible for drafting the bill and amendments. It is usual, indeed, almost customary, one might say, for amendments to be introduced in measures of this kind during their passage through the house. In the 16 years in which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and I have been here, there was not one occasion, I am positive, when the income tax bill went through the house without there being a number of amendments made.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not wish to prolong debate tonight. The minister is completely wrong in that assertion. Not only is he wrong in his main point, but I point out that the budget resolutions relative to the Income Tax Act have always been introduced much earlier in the calendar year than the hon. gentleman has been prepared to introduce this one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what you said before.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 25 renumbered, now, as clause 23, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister should give us some explanation before this is carried.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause 25, renumbered 23, provides for deductions in respect of amounts contributed to non-profit organizations established to promote scientific research. This is in keeping with paragraph No. 3 of the budget resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister knowledge of any serious intention on the part of taxpayers to take advantage of this position or is this something which has been generated entirely within the government in the hope that it will have some effect? Is this the result of proposals which have been made to the government by corporations, or is it part of the policy of the government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is, of course, part of the policy of the government to encourage scientific research, but we have some hopes that this new provision will be used.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says "hopes". What I was really asking about were not hopes but expectations. In other words, have there been representations from any corporations that this legislation would be desirable and likely to be productive?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have had some representations. I am not going to say that any particular corporation has committed itself to making donations for this purpose if the legislation is passed.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has indicated that a substantial portion of this amending bill is to be forgotten or deleted because, contrary to his boast, he is not ready to deal with a proper set up for the taxation of personal corporations. But I have found on page 20 of the amending bill a subclause, I refer to subclause (2), with respect to subsection 4 of section 139 of the Income Tax Act which means that this subsection would simply be eliminated very quietly. I am neither defending it nor supporting it, but I think we did not have enough information before us with respect to the intention had we proceeded tonight with the bill as presented to us by the minister. I refer to the subsection which, I take it, is to be appealed. I could not see that it was related very closely to some other clauses in the amending bill but it referred to farming, or a combination of farming, as affecting certain taxpayers. As I say, I am not quarrelling with the minister's original proposal but I say it represents a back door effort; or perhaps it is thrown out in a front door effort, because the minister is discarding all his proposed amendments with respect to personal corporations. Inasmuch as this was not very strongly emphasized on budget night, perhaps when the minister is reintroducing his proposals with respect to personal corporations he would give just a little more prominence to this little matter which I saw indicated—the elimination of a provision which might be of importance to some taxpayers but which was not referred to in the minister's budget speech.

This subject, I take it, is not considered worthy of discussion tonight because the minister has abandoned it together with a whole section of the bill to which the minister said he had given extensive consideration and upon which we thought he had reached solid conclusions. I asked the minister not to throw out of the window on some other occasion, perhaps, a provision such as subsection 4 without warning the taxpayers involved.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 24—Personal corporation defined.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 26, renumbered clause 24 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I think the minister should give us an explanation of this clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause 26, renumbered 24, is consequential on the introduction of the provision for deferred profit sharing plans.

Mr. Pickersgill: In what way is it consequential?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has to be a provision dealing with the taxation year of the trust. That is why we have a provision in clause 26 amending section 79 of the act.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the clause as renumbered carry?

Mr. Peters: Does the minister intend to say anything about the regulations which will be passed to protect the funds under this new clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We shall be dealing with that under the next clause.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have renumbered clause 26 as clause 24.

I am proposing now, Mr. Chairman, that we introduce a new clause to be numbered 25. It is among the amendments already referred to. Perhaps I should ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to move it at this time.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I move that Bill No. C-120 be amended as follows:

By adding thereto, immediately after clause 24 as renumbered, the following clause:

25. (1) Paragraph (b) of subsection (3) of section 79B of the said act is amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of subparagraph (i) thereof, by adding the word "or" at the end of subparagraph (ii) thereof and by adding thereto the following subparagraph:

(iii) to any person by way of an annuity, to be increased or reduced depending upon the increase or reduction in the value of a specified group of assets constituting the assets of a separate and distinct account or fund maintained in respect of a variable annuities business by a person licensed or otherwise authorized under the laws of Canada or a province to carry on in Canada such business;

(2) This section is applicable to the 1961 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the committee would like—

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: Could we have copies of the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They were distributed this morning.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose we must keep track of these things.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): This proposed amendment will be found in Votes and Proceedings of Friday, July 7 at page 1.

On clause 25.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might say a word of explanation in regard to this amendment. Section 79B is the section that deals with registered retirement savings plans. The committee will not require any comment in respect to registered retirement savings plans in general. These were introduced several years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say precisely when they were introduced.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They were introduced in the year 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say in what part of that year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was done by chapter 29 of the statutes of that year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not hear the answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said it was done by chapter 29 of the statutes of that year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say at what stage of the year they were introduced?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it was at the usual stage.

Mr. Benidickson: This was introduced by Mr. Harris.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister finds it very difficult to say that this was introduced by Mr. Harris but that happens to be the fact.

Mr. Drysdale: Is that the last time you saw Harris?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Isn't this just lovely? The hon. member has answered his own question.

If I may proceed with the explanation which I think the committee would wish, the kind of provision by way of benefit under registered retirement savings plans which have been contemplated under this section have fixed periodical payments. By amendment to the insurance acts made at this present session we have opened the way now for the writing of what have been called variable annuities. As hon. members will recall this was one of the features of the revisions this year to both the Foreign Insurance Companies Act and the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. We have a new concept now under which payments of the so-called variable annuities will have variable benefits based on the return from equities. This is a departure from the concept of the periodical payments of precisely fixed amounts determined by the contracts at the time they are written. As it is likely that the new type of annuity will be written perhaps extensively in view of the interest shown in it by some of the major insurance companies it is necessary now to ask the committee to amend the provisions of section 79B of the act to bring variable annuities within the scope of registered retirement savings plans.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, has this proposal generally met with the approval of those concerned on both sides of the contract basis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was asked for by representatives of the life insurance companies.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say how it happens that this was not included in the bill originally? Was this something that was proposed after the budget was brought down or was it something that was overlooked?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It had not been possible up to the time this bill was introduced to devise a clause that would meet the points of view of both the government on the one hand and insurance companies on the other. Further discussions were necessary and this clause is now being considered. I am told it meets with the satisfaction of the Canadian life insurance officers' association.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister if he has no notion of how extensive the use has been of the scheme as it exists now, which we are now seeking to amend? Is there any record of the extent to which the taxpayers are taking advantage of this particular scheme? Are statistics kept of a general character that would enable us to tell what extent self-employed perosns without salaries or wages are using this retirement plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that the Department of National Revenue has not attempted to keep such statistics in respect to registered retirement savings plans.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question and so he will understand me better, I shall ask it in English.

(Text):

Is the contribution of an employee to a deferred profit sharing plan to be allowed as deduction from income as in the case of any registered pension plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The ordinary profit sharing plan does not contemplate contributions by employees but contributions on the part of the employer. It is a plan for sharing the profits of a business with the employee. This legislation which we will be coming to, will cover that item. I think we should wait until we reach the next clause before launching into a discussion in this regard. I suggest the hon. member is one clause ahead of us.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I think that matter is covered in the clause we are dealing with. I am simply asking—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is asking me about deferred profit sharing plans which we will be discussing when considering the next clause.

Mr. Boulanger: Did we not change clause 25 to clause 27?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are now dealing with an amendment inserting a new clause to be numbered 25 after clause 26 which has been renumbered clause 24.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we are having trouble with these renumbered clauses because the government keeps changing its mind. It has changed its mind at least four times as shown by the amendments made since June 20, and has again announced a major amendment which takes out many clauses of this amending bill. This confuses the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska as well as others.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment would be much less confusing, Mr. Chairman, if we can reach the next clause.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to the taxation year there seems to be some necessity in regard to registration as covered by clause 26. I wonder whether the minister can tell us what it is?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was referring to clause No. 26 which is No. 24.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That clause has now been carried.

Mr. Benidickson: They have all been changed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are now dealing with an amendment to insert a new clause 25.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have another query I wish to make in respect to clause 25. Have any representations been made on the extent to which taxpayers are likely to avail themselves of this additional opportunity for saving?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On variable annuities?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only time will tell, Mr. Chairman. They have been written on a very limited scale by one or two provincially incorporated companies that are not under federal jurisdiction. This is the first time that the companies under federal jurisdiction have been writing them, and this new type is just in its infancy. I think it is quite impossible to say, but I have been led to understand that the large life insurance companies, or at least some of them, expect the variable annuities to be sold on a considerable scale.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are the large life insurance companies going into this field?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I know two of them that have made such announcements; I presume others will.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this something that was primarily prompted by the government, or is it something that the companies brought to the government and the government felt it was a good thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, companies have been asking for this for some time.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 27.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have an amendment here. You have it before you, Mr. Chairman. May I ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to move the amendment.

Mr. Comtois: I so move.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Mr. Comtois moves:

That the bill be amended by renumbering clause 27 as clause 26 and substituting for the word "employee" the word "employer" in line 37 on page 22.

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Clause 27.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is on this clause that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked me about the contributions of employees to deferred profit sharing plans. I repeat that no provision is made for employees contributions to deferred profit sharing plans. The essence of such a plan is that the employer sets aside some portion of his profits not for immediate distribution among his employees but puts them in a fund. Into the fund he will make his payments periodically according to the provisions of the plan. The employee does not draw anything out until a stated period, presumably on retirement. Now, in the meantime benefits are accruing on his behalf in the fund, but under the legislation as it has been hitherto he was taxed in respect of the sums accruing to him under any such plan. Under the present amendments there will be a deferment of tax during the period when these sums are accumulating on behalf of the employee, and then when he retires and draws out benefits he will become taxable at that time on the benefits withdrawn.

There are extended provisions here dealing with the various aspects of the plan. We have the definition of the deferred profit sharing plan, what is meant by a profit sharing plan; and we have provisions for registration of such plans. The minister is not permitted to accept for registration any of these profit sharing plans unless they comply with a considerable number of conditions which occupy most of page 22 of the bill. Provision continues on page 23 for acceptance of such plans for registration by the minister. They are given a registration date, and no tax is to be levied under subclause 6 while the trust is governed by the plan.

Then there is provision in subsection 7 for setting a ceiling on the employer's contribution which may be deductible from his income for tax purposes, and here the ceiling is the lesser of either the aggregate of each payment paid by the employer in respect of the individual employee or $1,500 minus the amount, if any, that is deductible under another clause, so that we are working here broadly speaking under the same kind of ceiling as applies to registered pension plans. The employer, up to this ceiling of contributions, may deduct them from his income for tax purposes. In this way encouragement is given by the law to the establishment of deferred profit sharing plans.

Page 24 of the bill deals with the provision for limitation of deductions, the portion of receipts that are deductible, and page 25 deals with the appropriation of trust property by the employer and for the revocation of registration in the cases there stated. Page 26 of the bill sets forth the rules applicable to a plan that has been revoked.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked me earlier to deal with the differences between the provisions in this bill respecting deferred profit sharing plans and those in the 1960 draft bill. Perhaps I might review these briefly, if hon. members are interested in them, Mr. Chairman.

First, in regard to the definition of the plan, the present bill provides that the employer must join in the application to register a plan as a deferred profit sharing plan. In Bill No. C-84, which was the 1960 bill, only the trustee was required to make application.

Second, also in relation to the definition of the plan, the present bill deletes a restriction which existed in Bill No. C-84, where a plan covers the employees of more than one employer. In Bill No. C-84 contributions could be made only for the benefit of "employees of the employer or of a corporation with whom the employer does not deal at arm's length". The present bill provides that contributions may be made for the benefit of "employees of that employer or employees of any other employer".

The third difference is in relation to withdrawals for cause. The present bill removes a restriction which existed in Bill No. C-84 concerning withdrawals from a plan. Bill No. C-84 provided that a plan could not permit a payment of proceeds to any employee or beneficiary, except for a reasonable cause, before death or retirement of the employee or the winding up of a plan. The present bill removes this restriction and will permit plans to pay out proceeds at any time to employees if they choose. Such proceeds will, of course, be taxed when received.

This change means that the Department of National Revenue officials will not have to judge what is "reasonable cause" for a payment under a plan. This decision will be left to those who manage the profit sharing plan.

The fourth difference relates to capital gains and losses. The present bill provides that net capital gains made by the trust while a plan was an employee's profit sharing plan may be received tax free when paid out as proceeds. This concession was not contained in Bill No. C-84.

Only capital gains, less capital losses, made while the plan was an employees profit sharing plan qualify for this concession. Proceeds from a deferred profit sharing plan attributable to capital gains made by the trust while the plan was a deferred profit sharing plan are not exempt. This is in conformity with the tax treatment of capital gains made by the trust of a pension plan. If a taxpayer is to enjoy the benefit of tax deferral on income he must be prepared to pay tax on all the proceeds accumulated during the period the plan was a deferred profit sharing plan.

The fifth difference relates to the date of registration. This present bill is much less restrictive concerning the date of registration of a deferred profit sharing plan. It permits the date of registration to be the date of application or any later date specified by the applicants. Bill No. C-84 provided that a plan would be deemed to become registered as a deferred profit sharing plan on the first day of the year immediately following the year in which the application was made.

The sixth difference relates to income of the exempt trust. The present bill adds a requirement that the trust for a deferred profit sharing plan must receive 90 per cent of its income from sources in Canada. This is in conformity with a similar requirement introduced in the December supplementary budget for trusts for pension plans. This requirement did not exist in Bill No. C-84.

The seventh difference relates to the notice of revocation. This present bill requires that notice of revocation of the registration of a plan as a deferred profit sharing plan must be mailed to an employer of employees under the plan as well as to the trustee. Bill No. C-84 required only that notice be sent to a trustee under the plan.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the minister has given us this explanation because Bill No. C-84 was introduced by him last year. He has indicated some seven changes in the amendments to the Income Tax Act now before us which were not provided in the original bill presented by him last year, namely, Bill No. C-84. We have all received the submission to the minister from the Canadian chamber of commerce relating to profit sharing legislation. The minister will be familiar with page 38 of their submission. I believe that this has been adhered to in the bill now presented to us. I should like to know the contrary or adverse representations that may have been made to the minister which are not recognized or reflected in this legislation.

We have had presented to us tonight an amendment to paragraph (d) of subclause 2 of clause 27 which seems to be merely a substitution of the word "employer" for the word "employee". Be that as it may, I have a simple question I wish to ask the minister because I think this is a very important section of the amending bill. I refer to the question of at least 50 per cent of the property consisting of notes, bonds, debentures or similar obligations of an employer which I take it could not be in the resources of the plan. Is that not a very essential part of the legislation that is before us and does the amendment change that? In other words, no part of the funds of the trust governed by the plan may be invested in shares of a corporation at least 50 per cent of the property of which consists of notes, et cetera. Does this amendment completely upset that? I was satisfied, I think, with the original proposals. I see no objection to employees investing in profit sharing assets that involve the business to which they are devoting their attention but with this amendment are we completely altering what was originally proposed by the government as presented to us on page 22 of the bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The provision to which the hon. member has been referring in relation to the 50 per cent reference is to be found in subclause 2 (d) of the clause with which we are now dealing.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I thank the minister for his information.

I am pleased to welcome the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) who, as usual, is unable to make an interjection from his seat.

I asked the minister a question and I thank him for his answer. However, I would like to go further and submit the following point to him.

In some industries there is both a deferred profit sharing plan and a pension plan.

In the deferred profit sharing plan, the worker contributes a certain amount, and so does the employer.

Would that contribution of the worker be taxable with regard to income tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the worker's contribution will be taxed.

Mr. Boulanger: In the case of the pension fund, to which the worker contributes, I think his contribution is not taxable. Now, I ask the minister why the worker's share in a deferred profit sharing plan is taxable, whereas his contribution to a pension fund is not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we are discussing two different things. The pension is one thing and the deferred profit sharing plan is another.

The legislation has different provisions for those two plans.

Mr. Boulanger: If there is in one industry both a pension plan and a deferred profit sharing plan, do you not think that the fact that the worker's contribution is taxable in one case, that of the deferred profit sharing plan, creates a discrimination in respect of the other plan? It is not an encouragement to contribute to the deferred profit sharing plan, since contributions to such a plan will be taxable. This is why I am putting that question.

I realize that as far as results are concerned those two plans are different. But still I would like the worker's contribution to a deferred profit sharing plan to be non-taxable like his contributions under a pension plan.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is no discrimination here. As I said, they are two different matters. The worker's contribution to a pension fund is non-taxable, but his contribution under a deferred profit sharing plan is taxable.

The industry may have both plans, but different provisions as far as taxation is concerned.

Mr. Boulanger: I have here a brief from the council of profit sharing industries.

It was prepared by various financial organizations composed of experts on that subject who made many recommendations to the government.

Here is one of their proposals:

(Text):

The council strongly recommends employee contributions be permitted as deductions from income for income tax purposes.

(Translation):

I based my argument on that brief.

Since contributions by the employee to a deferred profit sharing plan are taxable, there is discrimination in fact against that plan.

That is why I urge the minister to provide that such a contribution will not be taxable, just like the contribution to a pension plan is not taxable.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the worker wishes to contribute to a plan where his contribution will not be taxable, it must be a pension fund, as this deferred profit sharing plan has nothing in common with a pension plan. It is an entirely different thing.

Mr. Boulanger: I know quite well the difference between a pension fund plan and a deferred profit sharing plan, because both have been in force in my own industry for several years and—

An hon. Member: You can bury them.

Mr. Boulanger: In discussing such plans, I think I can enlighten the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) who does not seem to know what it is all about.

Mr. Tremblay: Do they provide benefits for the dead?

An hon. Member: Even those in Roberval.

Mr. Boulanger: I should also like to ask the minister a question dealing with the employer's share of the $1,500. In fact, it is the same question in another form. In an industry where both plans are available—take the case of my own industry where employees can contribute to a pension plan and to a deferred profit sharing plan—if I were to contribute two amounts adding up to the total of $1,500, would the tax exemption apply to both?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The employer can deduct $1,500 for tax purposes, but he cannot deduct it twice.

Mr. Boulanger: This means, then that the amount paid by an industry to a deferred profit sharing plan would be limited to $1,500, and if I paid an additional amount of $500 into the pension fund, I take it that I would be taxed on the $500?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I must repeat that we are discussing two entirely different things.

Mr. Boulanger: I come back again to this matter.

I am sorry to inconvenience the hon. members.

Mr. Martel: It is no trouble at all.

Mr. Boulanger: Excuse me, then.

Yet this recommendation is made by the council of profit sharing industries in its brief. Maybe I do not understand what is written therein, but it seems clear. We should like that the contribution made to a profit sharing plan be no more taxable than a contribution to a pension plan. That is simply what we want and what is requested by the council of profit sharing industries. We know that the two plans are different and involve two types of contributions, but we should like that neither of them be taxable.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that since this is—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order; the Chair recognized the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. McMillan: I simply wish to ask the minister whether there are any regulations providing for the treasury to recapture some of the loss in income tax because of payments into some of these profit sharing plans and also deferred retirement plans. I have in mind the age of retirement and the speed with which money has to be returned. I just wondered whether there were regulations in respect of this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am trying to follow the hon. member. Is he asking about regulations under the deferred profit sharing plan?

Mr. McMillan: Yes, in this plan where a certain amount is paid in respect of the employer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These provisions are not in effect yet. This is introducing a new idea into the Income Tax Act, so there are no regulations as yet to deal with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was going to observe that what we are doing here is setting out a very important new plan so far as taxation is concerned. We are making to these profit sharing plans the same kind of concessions as have been made for some years to pension plans, that is to say the contributions of employees shall not be taxable as income at the time they are made but shall be taxable at the time they are ultimately received. If I am not stating the matter correctly, I should like the minister to correct me because I am seeking to understand this provision. This is a new, complicated and rather lengthy section of the act. I do not believe we should just say "carried" without going over each subsection to see what it really means.

We do now that, with regard to some pension plans of late, some questions have been raised in very exalted quarters. It would be perhaps just as well before we deal with this matter to make sure that we are making a law that is workable and that is not going to be called into question and that the taxpayer's rights as well as his status are not going to be called into question at some future occasion. I suggest, therefore, sir, you call each of the subsections separately so that we can question the minister on the details and really understand what is meant by each part of this provision.

It seems to me I understand clearly what is meant by subsection 1. I think I know what the word "deferred" means. It means that the share of the profits coming to the employee is not going to be paid out in the year in which those profits are made but is instead going to be paid into a fund which shall have a trustee who will pay that out on some subsequent occasion. I assume also, and this is an assumption which I imagine is correct but the minister can put me right if I am not right, that any contributions made by employers to this profit sharing fund are of profits after tax, and that there is no way in which any of the profits before corporation income tax has been applied to them can be paid in; is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, he can deduct up to the amount of the contribution for each individual employee not exceeding $1,500 in any one case.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, this a device by which corporation income tax is also reduced as far as the treasury is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Just as in the case of a contribution to a registered pension plan. There is the same ceiling. This is an over-all ceiling. You cannot contribute $1,500 per employee under a registered pension plan and another $1,500 under a deferred profit sharing plan; $1,500 is the over-all limit of contributions per employee.

Mr. Pickersgill: You can do one or the other but not both?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You can do both but the employer cannot have an exemption for more than $1,500 aggregate of contributions per employee.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will see that I have learned something already. I think my friend the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has another question.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Section 79 of the present act prescribes that the employer's share is not taxable, which means that there is no limit to the amount he may subscribe. Is that right? I mean under the present act, not under the bill we are considering now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is quite correct, there is no limit now but the contribution is taxable each year.

Mr. Boulanger: Under the present act, the employee's share—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tax is not deferred.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the pension.

Mr. Boulanger: It seems as though a non-deferred profit sharing plan is taxable because it says here that:

An amount paid by an employer to a trustee under a profit sharing plan during a taxation year or within 120 days after the end of the year, can be deducted in the computing of the income of the employer for the taxation year, providing such amount was not deductible in computing the income of the employer for a previous taxation year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the present act, it is the same as in the case of wages; the employer's contribution is taxable in the hands of the employee, now.

Mr. Boulanger: Why then the amendments in Bill C-120? Why a limit of $1,500?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because we are introducing a different plan from the one referred to by the hon. member. The difference is that the profits are deferred, the tax is deferred and the employer's contribution is not taxable under this deferred profit sharing plan. There lies the difference.

Mr. Boulanger: I realize of course that there is a difference between the two plans, but both have the same purpose. The purpose in either case is to establish a pension fund for the employee when he retires. I see therefore no reason why there is under the new act a limit of $1,500.

The recommendations of the council of profit sharing industries make reference to the employer's contribution. I have studied carefully these recommendations and it is requested, or rather I will read them to the minister. First—

(Text):

(a) that restrictions on employer contributions to a deferred profit sharing plan be entirely divorced from any contributions which an employer may make to a registered pension plan;

(b) that employer contributions to a deferred profit sharing plan should not be permitted to exceed in any year, 15 per cent of the total payroll of participating employees.

(Translation):

So the council of profit sharing industries asks that the limit be not $1,500 but 15 per cent of the total amount of the employer's contributions, which would be more logical.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I should point out to the hon. member that he is referring to representations made by this council previously, not the most recent ones.

Mr. Boulanger: Last year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): While there were representations designed to seek a raising of the limit beyond $1,500 which any employer may contribute to such an employee, we have not seen fit to give effect to those representations.

The hon. member has been discussing two different things. Where it is a matter today of an employer sharing profits with his employee without any tax deferment under a plan, then obviously the distribution is assimilable to the payment of wages and the employer may deduct as an expense of doing business his contributions by way of profit sharing if there is to be an immediate distribution. It is just as though he were enlarging his wage bill. He can deduct without limit from his income tax the amount that he chooses to distribute by way of profits among his employees. But in that event the money is taxable in the hands of the employee.

We must put aside those ideas entirely when we come to the scheme of deferred profit sharing plans. Here, with a view to encouraging employers to share profits and also to set them aside in a plan that will provide benefits to the employee at the time of retirement, we do not propose to tax the employee in respect of those contributions made on his behalf by the employer into the fund and we propose to allow the employer to deduct up to $1,500 per employee the contribution that he makes into the fund on behalf of that employee. These are benefits that are extended to both employer and employee in order to encourage employers to make this kind of provision for employees under proper plans, with proper trust provisions, these plans to be registered according to rules with the Minister of National Revenue, in order that there may be something available to these employees at the time of retirement. These is therefore all the difference in the world between the conception of profit sharing in terms of immediate distribution and profit sharing under a deferred profit sharing plan.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, this brief I received from the council is of recent enough date since it was sent me on May 8, 1961, and I think the minister got it even before I did.

I should like to ask the minister what objection there would be to limiting the employer's contribution to 15 per cent of the total amount of wages paid instead of $1,500?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already attempted to give that information to the hon. member. We consider the limitation which we are applying at present is fully justified.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that merely to say that it is justified is one thing but that to say why it is justified is quite another thing. My hon. friend has sought several times, by putting his question, to find out what the basis or the foundation is for this $1,500 non-taxable limit in the case of each employee. Is it because the government feels that this is all it can afford to lose out of its immediate revenue? I can see a point there. If profits are paid into a deferred fund of this kind and there is no limit upon it there is, conceivably going to be a greater loss to the revenue in the current year than the treasury would care to contemplate, though, after all, employers have to make profits for the shareholders, too, so perhaps it would not go to very great lengths. But is that the sole basis of the $1,500 a year or is there some other reason?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the same reason as prompted the former government to propose a limit of $1,500 in the case of a contribution to an employee's pension fund. There are two reasons. Obviously, one is so that there may not be substantial tax benefits going to persons with large incomes related to provisions of this kind, and the other is the extent to which it is fair to impose a burden on the treasury in aid of such a plan.

Mr. Benidickson: My curiosity is aroused because of other debates we have had about some senior officials whose pensions have come under discussion. Am I right in my assumption that in so far as individuals are concerned the highest amount that any individual may deduct from his gross salary in the course of a year for payment into a retirement pension plan is $1,500 a year? I believe crown corporations occasionally make profits. Some do not. The Canadian National Railways incurs substantial deficits. But should they make a profit they are obliged, I believe, to pay income tax. But they could not deduct in respect of any employee, including the president, on a tax deduction basis, more than $1,500 for any one of their employees. Is that the situation across the land?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Leaving out past service, the act at the present time allows a contribution of $1,500 by the employer to an employee pension plan and $1,500 by the employee. In the case of the registered retirement savings plan where you have one person contributing instead of the employer-employee combination the maximum contribution is $2,500 per anum.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. We are thinking of the private enterprise annuity or whatever was made possible in 1957. But you cannot have both. When we provide, in our new law, section 79C and incorporate that into our income tax schedule, no taxpayer, and this includes the corporations, as an employer, and no individual as an employee will be able to take advantage of more than one of the sections. The $1,500 has to be taken up by the corporation in connection with the pension scheme or a deferred profit sharing plan. In a similar way, an employee cannot deduct $1,500 as his contribution to a pension plan and an additional $1,500 with respect to deferred profit sharing plan. Am I right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right. You cannot do it twice. Contributions can be made to the two plans but no more than $1,500 per annum per employee may be deducted for tax purposes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister told my hon. friend from Drummond-Arthabaska that there was no limit to the amount of profit which an employer could put into one of these schemes for immediate distribution in the same tax year. I think the minister gave as his reason for that the explanation that this was assimilable to wages and therefore it was taxable as personal income. It is conceivable, of course, that the tax on personal income would be at a much lower rate than the tax would be in connection with corporation income tax. The government has decided to restrict contributions to $1,500, and I am not arguing about that, because the minister and his officials have got to judge what the needs of the treasury are. I am not criticizing that at all; I am just noting it. Is there any evidence that there is any serious loss to the treasury in revenue from these profit sharing plans where the profits are distributed immediately, a loss substantial enough to make the government feel there should be a limit there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no statistics kept on this, but I have no doubt the answer would be in the negative.

Mr. Pickersgill: I trust that my suggestion regarding procedure will be adopted. I think my hon. friends on this side all concur in it. At least, I hope they do. My suggestion is that we should take the subclauses one by one. It would be understood that we would not go back to them. This is a long, complicated and involved clause. I think that if we are going to do our duty as the representatives of the taxpayers we ought to scrutinize the clause carefully. I have only one more question to ask on subclause 1. It is an important question. The minister may say it is referred to in a subsequent clause. If he does, that ends it as far as I am concerned.

The minister has to approve these plans. There is a trustee. Does this mean that some kind of supervision of these plans is envisaged by the federal government to make as sure as they can be that they are run in a competent manner and that the trustees behave as trustees should, or do the federal government consider this to be beyond their jurisdiction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously, the Minister of National Revenue is mainly responsible for reviewing the plan submitted in order to determine whether under subsection 2 he should accept it for registration. Then, if we were to read further on in this bill we would see the conditions under which the minister may revoke the plan. This is to be found in subsection 13. Obviously this arrangement assumes a measure of supervision. I am not going to say it can amount to a detailed measure of supervision from year to year but obviously in order to discharge the burdens put upon him by this clause the Minister of National Revenue will have to undertake supervision in the manner indicated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this supervision to be exercised merely by the tax collector or is there to be some measure of supervision by, say, the superintendent of insurance? What does the government envisage in this regard?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would be the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Pickersgill: What kind of staff would be envisaged for the purpose of doing this work? This is really important. It does seem to me that if we are going to allow these deferred trusts, these deferred profit sharing plans to be set up, there might be serious eventual losses to the treasury, in addition to the deferment of immediate revenue if the funds were to be dissipated.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot say in detail what kind of section will be set up within the department or how it will be staffed to deal with this. There are provisions here, Mr. Chairman, that obviously lay certain duties upon the minister and when the bill comes into effect the minister will have to be responsible with the assistance of the civil service commission to make the staff provisions required to discharge the duties imposed upon him by the legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should imagine that the same kind of persons and staff that the minister now uses for whatever supervision he may give to pension plans would be the obvious kind of persons to be engaged in this kind of activity. Does the minister consider that to be correct? I cannot imagine that the government is asking us to set up a plan of this kind without having thought out the administrative scheme carefully before doing so. Unfortunately, as we all regret, the Minister of National Revenue is not here to give us any guidance in the matter. It might be that his parliamentary secretary could throw a flood of light on this question. He is here and we all know how eager he is, and I am sure we would be delighted if he could give us a little help in this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing I can add to what I have said. This matter has to be worked out when the legislation is passed. It is partly a departmental responsibility and partly the responsibility of the civil service commission.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has a good point. We are enlarging the field under which some form of old age security may be worked out. We are referring now to a matter of deferred profit sharing which will be used, for the most part, by individuals for purposes of old age retirement. The minister came before parliament on budget night and talked about the portability of pensions as reported at page 6660 of Hansard of June 20, 1961. He also indicated his willingness to confer with the different provinces in regard to these matters. I was surprised that he indicated some insecurity in regard to pension schemes which already exist for old age retirement plans; yet at the same time he introduced, through tax laws, an element of encouragement in profit sharing which will take place under this proposed amending bill. He suggested there was some form of registration in existence now carried out by the Department of National Revenue.

I suggest we forget about the uncertainties that have existed in the past in regard to portability of pensions, because we are starting afresh this year with something which I assume the minister wants to launch on a sound basis. How does he intend to ensure that these new schemes will be registered and tied up with the Department of National Revenue? How does he intend to ensure that this program will be commenced on a clear and sound basis so that in future years we will not find it necessary to come back and discuss this scheme and its security with the provinces and companies involved? I suggest that is what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was dealing with.

We have exempted in a similar way contributions made by employers and employees to pension schemes. For a long time we have had very loosely defined registration of such schemes with the Department of National Revenue. However, in regard to this new type of tax exemption encouragement to individuals to provide security in old age by way of profit sharing plans, we are commencing under the aegis of the federal government something new which we hope will do the complete job. The minister has cast doubts upon a great number of old age security schemes, payments to which are now exempted taxation and took a whole page of Hansard on June 20, 1961, to do so. Is he sure that this scheme is to be launched on a sound basis so that within three, five or 10 years it will not be necessary to come back to the companies, provinces and others to renegotiate it again? I think this type of assurance should be given by the minister because he said in his budget speech he intended to review the whole situation in regard to pensions, portable and otherwise.

I should also like the minister to deal with the portability of pensions provided by profit sharing programs. Is there any clause to be included in such schemes which would not allow an employee to benefit from years of employment until he had remained a certain period of time with a specific employer? Has that situation been taken into consideration in the drafting of the provisions now before us about which the minister boasts? Before he retracts some of the old plans which he has criticized I should like him to give some assurance that this new profit sharing arrangement provided for under this new measure—of which I approve and think very desirable—is being commenced on a proper and worth-while basis following complete and thorough consultation with the provinces, companies and others. I suggest in this regard the minister should give us an indication that he is going to be as paternal as he proposed he was in respect to the original plan for old age security to which he referred as reported at page 6660 of Hansard for June 20, 1961.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I would have another question to direct to the minister. Are the profits of a trust company, administering a pension fund for a group of workers, taxable?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the question.

Mr. Boulanger: I am asking the minister whether the profits of a trust company, administering a pension fund, are taxable?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is a taxable profit.

Mr. Boulanger: I believe there is a section in the present act which says that the profits of a trust company are not taxable.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member is misleading himself in talking all the time about a trust company. What he means is a trust fund. I am trying to read some sense into his question. I think he means a trust fund or what is earned by a trust fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: By the trustee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, by the fund. It is in the hands of a trustee. It is dealt with here. We will come to that.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not in this clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I still have a question about the first subclause, or perhaps I should say an observation which follows the observation made so eloquently by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River. It does seem to me, sir, that we have had about enough in this present year of those broad general principles enunciated by this government which at some time in the remote future are going to provide the administrative or regulatory framework for carrying them out. I will illustrate what I mean. This is just by way of analogy, sir; I am not seeking to debate this matter. Last November we were told we were going to have financial assistance for shipbuilding. We were told about it again in May, and a strategic moment in May, and we have been trying ever since to find out what the scheme is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is just by way of analogy to show that we are being given the same old treatment here in this bill.

I said to the minister these deferred profit sharing plans have to be registered and there has to be a trustee prescribed who must make application in a prescribed manner. I asked him something about the degree of supervision and what facilities the department had for doing this. I asked him whether the same people would do it, or people similar to those who were now supervising pension plans with which, as my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River rightly reminded us, the government was not very well satisfied because the minister raised a good deal of questioning about the trustees of many of those pension plans. I believe that my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River was quite right in saying, if those pension plans have not been well supervised, if we are now going to start this new deferred profit sharing business, let us start it right, let us not have to come back, three, four or five years hence and say many of those trustees under this plan are not very satisfactory and we ought to be doing something about it.

This government seems to have vague, general ideas which it brings in in the form of legislation, with all kinds of regulatory power left to the governor in council to be carried out some time after and it is usually some time after; but, sir, surely if this is going to amount to anything, if it is going to have any importance, the government ought to know now, and ought to have ready now, the regulations which are going to govern. I do not say that they can lay them on the table now; I am not asking that at all. But I am saying that in my experience when I was in the government—and I was in the government at one time and I had quite a lot to do with it for quite a long time—my right hon. friend, Mr. St. Laurent, did not bring vague, nebulous schemes into this house. He knew where he was going and what he was doing and so did his ministers, and this is why in those days we had an administration in this country instead of a lot of nebulous ideas that never seem to come to any kind of fruition, or if they do they are shockingly badly administered.

From what the minister himself has confessed about pension funds it looks as though we are starting on the same road here with these things without any clear knowledge of how it is going to be done, without any knowledge whether the officials are there to do it.

I gave the hon. member for Edmonton West, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, the opportunity to tell us how this was going to be done. I am sure the hon. member is a very zealous parliamentary secretary. I am sure he knows. I am sure he has gone into this whole matter in the department and can tell us. I wish he would. I wish he would give us some reassurance as to how this job is going to be done and how efficiently it is going to be done. That is all I am asking. I do hope the parliamentary secretary will give us the benefit of the knowledge he undoubtedly has.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question was answered some time ago. We are just getting a repetition of the question. The question has been answered. Would we not look bright, Mr. Chairman, coming here and saying we would set up a whole new section before the legislation was ever passed? We prefer to follow the constitutional manner, ask parliament to pass the legislation and then deal with the question of machinery and staff in a prescribed manner that will mean responsibility on the part of the department in association with the civil service commission.

Mr. Benidickson: I think I can answer that immediately by quoting the minister's words in his budget speech as reported at page 6660 of Hansard. He referred to what has been on the statute books for a long time and he took a good deal of our time on budget night to say that in connection with pension plans he felt there was much that should be attended to. Now he is introducing something very controversial. I wish to refer him to his words. He said:

> These pension plans are accorded valuable income tax concessions provided they are registered for this purpose with the Department of National Revenue. In general, tax deferral is granted during the period of accumulation and the pension benefits are taxed as personal income as and when they are received.
> I doubt very much whether it is as well known as it should be that the federal government does not supervise or control the solvency of private pension funds; neither do the provinces.

The minister is introducing another form of tax exemption on exactly the same line after taking 20 minutes on June 20 to tell us, patting himself on the back, that he felt he was going to tidy up some of these matters for the benefit of those who might reach retirement age and expect to get financial benefits when they arrive at that age. But, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, he is introducing something new without in any way assuring us that he has provided for those concerned the kind of protection which he said on June 20 was desirable and which had been ignored in the past and which, in consultation with the provinces, he proposes to rectify. That is the position we are in.

What is the project? Is the degree of supervision of trustee plans in the public interest comparable in some respects with the supervision traditionally exercised over insurance companies? Many people may be surprised to learn that no such supervision has existed with respect to pension plans in the past. These are the words of the Minister of Finance when he is appealing to the public in his budget speech with respect to old fashioned ideas of savings provided not only by employers but matched by employees. Now with respect to this plan, when we are introducing new legislation, when the minister has all these things in his mind with respect to the past, why can he not tell us of the supervision which he points out was absent in so far as the federal government is concerned? What supervision does he expect to provide with respect to those deferred profit sharing plans? What reason is there for not telling us about the federal supervision at the time that this kind of legislation is being introduced? Inferentially at least the minister criticized in the past the fact that pension plans had some elements of danger connected with them and should be reviewed, and if he is introducing something new that involves tax exemption on both sides, employer and employee, why can he not say at the same time what he is going to do to make sure that there is what he referred to as the supervision traditionally exercised over insurance companies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a most unprofitable way to spend the time of this committee to engage in repetition of the kind we have been having. I have already dealt with this question.

Mr. Benidickson: I was giving you your own words. I thought you would like to hear them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has given me my words about something entirely different and I wish he could get these two things clearly separated in his mind. In the one case we are dealing with deferred profit sharing plans and in the other we were dealing with pension plans. There are actuarial considerations applicable to pension plans that do not apply to deferred profit sharing plans because in the case of pension plans you have contributions by employers and employees. In the case of deferred profit sharing plans you have contributions made by employers. So you have a different situation altogether, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member can read the language of this clause quite clearly, I am sure, and see what is required in the way of decision, in the way of supervision on the part of the minister. The language of the clause is quite clear in the duties it lays upon the minister and you may be sure those duties will be discharged.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, after this lecture to the opposition—and we have had a good many from the minister about how wrong it is for us to repeat things that it seems to be very difficult for the minister to understand—may I say that the minister's idea of an answer in this house, which is all right under the rules on the orders of the day, of course, but is a very different thing when we are in committee, is to say "I answered that", and his original answer is usually to read the explanatory note or perhaps half of it.

I did not rise to comment on what the minister said this time so much as on what he said last time. His expression was, "Wouldn't we look bright?" Well, it would be pretty hard for them to look bright at any time in this year, I am telling you, and that is what the public is coming to see. He said, "Wouldn't we look bright if we had our plans ready to carry out this law when it is passed?"

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the trouble with this government, as I have said before, is that when they pass a law they have no idea how to administer it. The thing lies around for months and even years without anything being done about it because they do not think these things out in detail in advance. I can tell the minister that I was around here in the days at the end of the war—

Mr. Lambert: The great I am.

Mr. Pickersgill: —when the economy of this country was being transferred from a wartime to a peacetime economy and when Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Howe, Mr. Claxton, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Laurier were piloting legislation through this house that gave the country the years of full employment we had up to 1957. When those things were happening we knew what we were going to do about the laws after they were passed. We did not start erecting an administration after the law had been passed.

I say that for the minister to say that he does not even know who is going to administer this, that he supposes they will get some civil servants and he supposes these civil servants will conduct some kind of supervision, and he does not know how extensive it will be, is to say that they would look bright if they knew. I think they would look bright if they knew and, to put it the way my children sometimes put it to me, I suggest it is about time they "smartened up".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Aren't you the bright fellow?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Your family must say that to you about three times a day.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 26 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, we are still on subclause 1. For my part I would be quite prepared to have subclause 1 carried and we could go on now to subclause 2.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it agreeable to the committee that we proceed through clause 26 subclause by subclause?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Surely we can make some progress. Can it not be called a page at a time?

Mr. Benidickson: I think even the minister will agree with this suggestion. We are on subclause 2 of the clause 27, I take it.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have now changed it to 26.

Mr. Benidickson: I know, but I cannot keep up with the amendments.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. I take it that it is agreeable that the committee proceed through this clause page by page. It will perhaps make it easier for the committee's deliberations. Shall the section of the clause on page 21 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: First of all, sir, in paragraph (a) of subclause 2 the plan provides that each payment made by an employer to a trustee in trust for the benefit of employees of that employer or employees of any other employer who are beneficiaries thereunder, is an amount that is the aggregate of amounts each of which is identifiable as a specified amount in respect of an individual employee. That is going to be prescribed as a condition of the plan but is there going to be some kind of continuous audit to see that in fact that provision is carried out? I would think it is very essential to the success of this plan that there should be some kind of audit in some kind of fashion to see that that does happen.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has, I think, not grasped the effect of this subsection. This is a term or condition of registration of the plan. The plan must make provision in the terms appearing in subsection (2) before the minister can accept the plan for registration.

Mr. Pickersgill: But having accepted it for registration, is he not going to take any further interest? You can accept a plan for registration and then they can do something else entirely unless there is some kind of supervision from some quarter. What I am asking is, what kind of policing, what kind of auditing is going to be done to see that in fact the plan is carried out, or is none to be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will look at page 26, subsection (13)(b) he will see that if any provision of the plan has not been complied with the minister may revoke the registration of the plan as of any date following the date that the plan ceased so to comply or that any provision of the plan was not so complied with, and he shall thereupon give notification of his action by registered mail to a trustee under the plan and to an employer of employees who are beneficiaries under the plan.

Mr. Benidickson: That is perfectly true but we have had long experience with what we call the blue book of registration of pension plans in the Department of National Revenue. I did not read this before; but I come back to the minister's comments in the budget where he was very exuberant. He said:

> There is, however, no governmental supervision to ensure that the assets of other plans are being accumulated at an appropriate rate to meet the future liabilities of those plans.

I know that the minister has said that the same liability does not exist with respect to profit sharing plans unless there is an appropriate deduction in compensation by the employee. I agree. However, I see nothing here to say that perhaps under some of these plans the employee is not going to be obliged to make a contribution and perhaps to buy stock in the corporation with which he is employed or in some of its other enterprises. The minister has complained of laxness over the years and he has introduced a new feature. I approve the new feature but I say that at the time of introduction surely the minister should present us with evidence that he is starting out to guard against the kind of thing that he complained about in connection with the availability of opportunities for old age security for employees. The minister said that there is no individual provision to assure that assets are being accumulated at an appropriate rate to meet future liabilities of these plans.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I repeat what I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, about the difference between deferred profit sharing plans and pension plans. The pension plan involves contributions by employers and employees under a contractual arrangement under which there is an undertaking to pay stipulated amounts on a periodical basis to the employee or pensioner at a particular time. Now that, of course, involves a question of the actuarial soundness of the plan. But in the case of deferred profit sharing plans, there is no contribution by the employee. There is no stipulation as to periodical payments. In this case it is simply a matter of carrying along and making available at the time of retirement the benefit of whatever amounts were paid in and credited to a particular employee. The particular employee will be taking some responsibility in relation to such plans himself. There is no contractual feature there in the sense that there is in a pension plan to give rise to the question of actuarial sufficiency.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister suggesting that under no circumstances will there be a profit sharing plan under which the employee makes contributions out of earnings that he could have taken as salary or compensation and that as an alternative he contributed to a profit sharing plan? In other words, is the minister suggesting that these amendments do not contemplate any scheme under which there would be a co-operative contribution, perhaps on the part of the employer and employee, which would build up the employee's share in the deferred profit sharing plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It does not prohibit the employee from contributing but it offers no tax concession in such a case.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Under the present legislation, the beneficiary of a profit sharing plan is not required to pay income tax on the amounts he receives from the trust company, up to the amount of his own contributions. Nor is he required to pay tax on the capital gains of the trust. Under the amendment to the present act, I understand that these capital gains and contributions will be taxable. I should like to know why, under the amendment, capital gains and employee contributions will be taxable, whereas they were not under the present legislation?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, is on page 27 or a later page, and not page 22.

There are a lot of detailed stipulations about these plans. I am sure the government is not putting them in there just for fun or in order to fill up the pages of the bill. I am sure the government must think there is some public interest to be served by putting them in here. If there is a public interest to be served by putting them in here, then there is a public interest to be served by seeing that they are fulfilled. I come back again to my question; what means is the government going to take to see that these conditions are fulfilled and are not merely part of a paper plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is evidently speaking about the conditions on page 22. Those are conditions on which the minister must satisfy himself before he registers the plan. Obviously, he must examine the plan with sufficient care to be able to make the determination that is called for by each of the conditions prescribed in subsection (2).

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell me why the second condition, (b), is a necesary one? It is not readily apparent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would not be a deferred plan if it were possible to borrow benefits out of it by way of a loan. If you allow loans to be made that is the very same thing as a distribution of the profits. The loans could be to the full amount of the employee's share of the profits. There has to be a deferment of the enjoyment of the benefit, Mr. Chairman, if there is a deferment of the tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister seems to have a rather different conception of a loan from the puritanical conception that I was brought up to have. My conception of a loan is something you pay back. It would appear to me that there would be no particular benefit if these employees used the deferred profits that were in this fund. Suppose an employee went to Household Finance and borrowed some money; that would not be regarded as a benefit that ought to be taxable. I should like to know what the reason is. After all, presumably any of these loans would be paid back. There probably is some good reason but the reason the minister gave is certainly not a good reason, unless the loans were not loans but were, in fact, just an indirect way of distributing profits immediately without any intention of recovering them and recovering them with interest.

It does not seem to me on the face of it that there is any more reason for a trustee not to invest this money in loans to employees, if they are good risks and if he can get a good rate of interest, than to invest in the minister's bonds or something else. As I say, there must be a good reason, but certainly it is not the reason given by the minister. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have given the reason, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. member would read the provisions of the Income Tax Act he would see a good many other cases in this act in which provision is made to the effect that loans are to be treated as though they were a distribution and taxed as though they were payments out, to guard against cases where the provisions of the act would be avoided by people who take money out and call it a loan in the hope of evading tax on payments which, if they were called anything else but a loan, would become taxable as income. There are various provisions to that effect in the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister accuses me of not understanding the Income Tax Act, and in doing so he is quite right. I am not a careful student of the Income Tax Act. I thought I should like to take a sort of elementary course this evening. I think the minister cannot complain that my questions are not to the point. I never heard before about such provisions in connection with loans. I have once or twice had an overdraft at the bank, but I have never had to pay income tax on it. It is just possible that I might, at some time or other, have borrowed money from an employer, though mostly my employer has been the government of Canada or an impecunious university and they were not in a position to lend. This information that the Income Tax Act is studded with cases where loans are treated as income on which you have to pay a tax is news to me. I should like the minister to show me several examples because they may throw light on this situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think there is time in which to give the hon. member all the education he needs on this subject tonight. However, I ask that we stick to the clause under consideration. Perhaps then we could make a little progress. We have not passed anything now for about two hours.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have not passed anything for the very good reason that this is an entirely new proposition—

Mr. Benidickson: The minister does not understand it.

Mr. Pickersgill: —with which the minister is apparently so little familiar that he does not know how to explain it. I do not think that anybody anywhere, including the minister, believes the ridiculous explanation he gave for this provision, namely that if one of these funds lent money to the employee, that would be an indirect way of giving him an income. It is absurd; it is ridiculous. It may be that it is thought that they would not be careful enough. I can think of reasons myself, but I am not sponsoring this legislation. It is not my duty to explain it to the minister. I am a member of the opposition. As an opposition we have a duty to see to it that, as far as we can do so, silly, unnecessary or ill-conceived legislation or legislation that is not understood by the sponsor is not passed by this House of Commons. It seems to me that a plan of this sort is a good way in which to invest. After all, we think of credit unions which are not perhaps in many ways so very different from this. They exist for the very purpose of lending money to their members. Most of them have a very good record of collections. I would think that the other persons participating in one of these deferred profit sharing plans would make it fairly unpleasant for any one employee who took money out on a loan and did not pay back the loan. I would have thought that on balance that this would be a fairly good way to invest the money, namely in loans to members. However, as I say, there must be some good reason for this provision but it is certainly not the one given by the minister. If the minister just does not know what it is, perhaps I have laboured this point enough and I might go on and ask him about the next one.

Section 79C, subsection 2(c) reads as follows:

> (c) the plan provides that no part of the funds of the trust governed by the plan may be invested in notes, bonds, debentures or similar obligations of
> (i) an employer by whom payments are made in trust to a trustee under the plan for the benefit of beneficiaries thereunder, or > (ii) a corporation with whom that employee does not deal at arm's length;

Will the minister explain what public or other interest is served by this particular stipulation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the purpose of this provision is quite obvious to all concerned. It is a question of solvency. It is a question of the direction of these moneys to the proper purpose. This plan is largely created by the employer through his contributions on behalf of the employee. That is the reason why this step is taken to prevent the funds of the plan from being used by the employer in his own business or in a business that is associated with his business.

Mr. Benidickson: I am speaking on subsection 2, and there are a number of subsections here. I felt the minister had not properly answered my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on an earlier question which related to loans. To bring something down to simple terms, if I were reading paragraph (e) of subsection 2 I would think it relates to loans. I would think it perhaps relates to a requirement by a person who may have all his assets in one of these deferred profit sharing plan schemes. He may have been so keen on participating that he does not even own his own home. He may have been a renter all his life. Everything may have gone into it. I have heard about one or two such people who have participated very successfully in the deferred profit sharing plan of their employer but to the extent that they have no current assets; they own practically nothing except perhaps a bit of furniture in their houses. Eventually they hope to share in the progress of the business in which they have been employed. Under paragraph (e) it is stated that this sole savings plan of the individual would not be available to him in the case of an emergency when he wanted to borrow some money and when he was in dire straits. I cannot think of anyone who was more eloquent in describing straits of this kind than was the Minister of Finance when again, on budget night, he referred to the extraordinary medical expenses which some of our people unfortunately are obliged to meet. He referred to a single motor accident. I quote from page 6661 of Hansard. As found there he stated as follows:

A single motor accident, for example, may cause a taxpayer more extraordinary medical expense in one year—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. I shall have to ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River how he relates this quotation to the material set forth on page 22 of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I thought the minister had been so eloquent that I would use his words in order to indicate that a person having devoted all his resources and savings to one form of security at the time of retirement, namely that under a deferred profit sharing plan, might have no assets except his assets in the profit sharing plan. I am referring to paragraph (e) where it states that the minister would not accept for registration such plan if an individual in those dire straits felt obliged in any way to assign or surrender in whole or in part his assets and interest in this lifelong plan of savings through the profit sharing plan. That is why I referred to the catastrophe that could occur. I thought the minister on budget night had dealt with the matter very well when he said that today even one automobile accident might put a person who had not made other savings provisions into a position where he was in very dire straits.

Before we pass it, I ask what is the necessity for paragraph (e). In other words, this is a form of individual asset that has been accumulated over the years. In my illustration I take it that the man, if he went to his banker, could not point to anything except the fact that, all through his life, he had been a devoted servant to his company and that in consequence, in accordance with a plan they had with their employees, this company had provided for him a deferred profit sharing scheme. He needed money desperately. He had nothing. As a matter of fact, he may have been injured and in consequence may have had to terminate his employment. The question I ask is this. Why would he not be able to take recourse to the only asset he has, and perhaps a very consequential one, which had been accumulated for him, and by his own design, in co-operation with his employer over the years? But it says here he could not suggest anybody who would lend him capital funds in this emergency—the kind of money he would need, say, for a temporary emergency.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Deferment of tax is a valuable benefit and it is associated with the deferment of payment. If you are going to allow benefits to be enjoyed during the period you are going to defeat the whole purpose of the relationship between deferment of benefit and deferment of tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: With regard to paragraph (f) I have no particular query. It seems to me to be a sensible provision. As to paragraph (g) it is, of course, just the usual provision by the government to make as many regulations as possible which it had not thought of when the legislation was before the house. As far as subsection 2 is concerned, I should like to be able to say I am satisfied with the minister's explanation, but I think after the minister's total failure to give any explanation it is perhaps not much use for us to proceed further with it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall page 22 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall page 23 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: We are going a little fast.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Too fast for the obstructionists.

Mr. Pickersgill: Subsection 3 contains one of the points about which my hon. friend from Drummond-Arthabaska wished to ask.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): This is on page 23. I suggest the hon. member should address his questions to the Chair.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I asked a question of the minister. I do not know whether he is ready to answer it now, or whether he wants me to put it to him again. In any case, here is my question: Under the present act, the beneficiary under a profit sharing plan is exempted from taxation tax—

Mr. Martineau: Taxation tax?

Mr. Boulanger: Income tax, if you prefer.

Mr. Martineau: His income tax.

Mr. Denis: You should read your speeches on aid to universities instead of laughing at others.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I was saying that the beneficiary under a profit sharing plan did not have to pay tax on the amounts received from the trustee or the trust company up to the total of his contributions, on the capital gains of the trust.

Under the new act, those contributions and the capital gains of the trust will be taxable. So, I ask the minister why he has amended the act in this way.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the clause the hon. member is looking for is subsection (6). No tax is payable under this part by a trust on the taxable income of the trust for the period during which the trust was governed by a deferred profit sharing plan.

Mr. Benidickson: I confess I did not completely follow the question which my hon. friend asked in French, but long before this debate I had noted a question I wished to ask the minister with respect to subclause 3. In what circumstances would there be capital gains prior to registration of a plan of this kind? Would the plan not be set up, and does not this amending bill contemplate that a corporation, say, would immediately indicate its intention to register in this way? Would there be much capital gain or loss in a matter of days involved prior to this decision or within a few days after this decision before the letter actually reached the department? What is the important date —the date of signifying intention? Is that information by the Department of National Revenue? Is it from that date that capital gains and losses become effective in so far as this clause is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member began with subsection 3 and has moved to subsection 4. Subsection 4 defines the registration date. On looking at subsection 3 it must be obvious to all hon. members that there are employees profit sharing plans in existence. These are not going to be accepted for registration under subsection 3 unless all the capital gains which have been made by the trust governed by the plan before the date of application for registration have been allocated by the trustee under the plan to the employees or other beneficiaries.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for that answer which was a helpful one.

There are some important companies, not many, which already have profit sharing plans, which have not had the advantage of the employer being able to deduct from corporation tax a maximum of $1,500 in respect to each employee. The minister is simply requiring that any plan which has gone on up to now without the benefit of this tax concession must bring its capital gains into the fund up to date. Is that the point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can repeat what I said. It is all set out in subsection 3. The minister will not accept for registration any plan unless all the capital gains made prior to the date of application have been allocated by the trustees to the employees and other beneficiaries under the plan.

Mr. Benidickson: There have not been many of these, but some are of some consequence. Perhaps the Simpsons-Sears plan is important in the light of this legislation. Does the minister agree?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Any plan of the kind is important to those concerned.

Mr. Matheson: This amendment represents the hope of the government that there will be a lot of new people going into this type of program. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The plan offers considerable benefits and is obviously based on the view that this is good social legislation and should be encouraged.

Mr. Matheson: Is it the hope of the department that there will be literature available to the public with respect to the administration of this plan? It appears to me, as an average small town lawyer, that this is extremely complex for people to understand unless there is some accompanying literature to guide them. Is there any literature at the moment with respect to this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no literature drawn up yet. We are simply dealing with the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall page 23 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is 10.30.

An hon. Member: Pure obstruction. Another filibuster.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the leader of the house what the business will be tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: It appears that we shall carry on with the business on which we were engaged today, and the other items of legislation which I announced on Saturday. If there should be any change in that program I shall let the opposition parties know in good time before the house opens.

It being two minutes after 10.30 o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OPERATING COSTS AND REVENUES, CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION OFFICES, POINT ROBERTS AND BOUNDARY BAY

Question No. 279—Mr. McLennan:

Question

1. What is the total cost of operating the customs and immigration offices at Point Roberts and Boundary Bay including salaries and upkeep during a fiscal year?

2. What is the total revenue collected for the same period?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Total expenditure for 1960-61: Boundary Bay, $36,123.03.

No information is available regarding Point Roberts since it is the United States office opposite Boundary Bay.

2. Total revenue collected for 1960-61: Boundary Bay, $36,425.03.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 11, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

NIGERIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF AERIAL MAPPING PROJECT

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a short statement to make concerning Canada's special commonwealth African aid program.

The house will be interested to know that agreement has been reached for an aerial mapping project to be undertaken in Nigeria as a part of our assistance program. This project, which is the first Canadian capital project in Nigeria since that country attained independence, will include an aerial survey and topographical mapping of approximately 28,000 square miles. It is expected that the maps which will result from this project will greatly facilitate the economic development of Nigeria. The cost of the entire project is estimated at $1,350,000. It will be undertaken by a Canadian company over a period of two or three years, subject to the appropriation of the necessary funds by parliament.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that when the minister of labour of Nigeria was here the other day we expressed our warm admiration for his country, and indication then was given of our interest in trying to assist that country in ways now covered by the announcement made by the minister.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of announcement that receives the wholehearted support of the Canadian people. In particular, I think any assistance by Canada to the developing nations in Africa is most welcome, is most desirable and is in our mutual interest. Our only criticism in the past has been that Canada should raise its sights and do more in this regard.

FINANCE

ALLEGED SECRET USE OF EXCHANGE CONTROL FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will tell the house why he chose to keep the House of Commons in ignorance until June of this year concerning a change in policy affecting the use of the exchange fund to affect the value of the Canadian dollar, which he secretly put into effect last December.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there were any questions asked about this matter in the meantime. There was a modification of the policy, not an extensive or far reaching modification but a modification. I think if anyone had chosen to ask a question and the opposition had been on its toes, for instance, this information would have been forthcoming in reply to any questions. The position of the exchange control fund is published as at the end of each month. There is no secrecy attending that.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I say this information now comes to light not by reason of any questions asked in the house but by another breach of confidence by the man who is the governor of the agent of the government in these matters. This is a shocking breach of confidence by a man who pretends to stand on principle and to be defending principle.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware that when this matter was brought up in the house he gave the house an assurance that the exchange fund was being used to level off fluctuations in the rate of exchange but not to affect the rate itself?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was the policy that was observed, Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to the house in reply to any question there has been on this subject. I would not wish the house to be misled by what has been said elsewhere into thinking that there was some far reaching or extensive departure from the policy that had been followed. It was a very modest modification of the formula that had been observed up until that time. I emphasize that fact—a very modest modification, not the impression that has been created elsewhere on the subject.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister tell the house whether there is any relation between the use of the fund in this way and his description of the reduction of the dollar by a significant discount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the hon. gentleman's question clearly if I fully apprehend it. What he has asked me about is, I take it, something that occurred after December 20 and prior to June 20. I have been asked questions and I have answered questions as to what is in our minds in relation to a significant discount at any particular time depending upon Canada's total economic circumstances. That has been made very clear, Mr. Speaker. If I have not fully apprehended the hon. gentleman's question, I will be glad to enlarge further.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister another supplementary question. The minister mentioned a breach of confidence. Does the minister consider it a breach of confidence that he revealed to the house that in—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now presenting an argument in the form of a question. There have been two supplementaries on a matter which has been debated at great length in the house, and I would think it should not be allowed to go on to the point where it becomes another debate.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF AGREEMENT BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to give a denial or otherwise to an allegation found in a Canadian Press dispatch in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that Canada is guilty of having violated our agreement under the international monetary fund, in that we did not hold prior consultation with the executives of the fund before the bringing down of the budget.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canada is quite prepared to defend her action in the light of the articles of the international monetary fund. I made that matter very clear previously. Allegations emanating from another source suggesting that this action on Canada's part was in violation of the articles of the international monetary fund we reject as unfounded and improper.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received a telegram from Mr. E. P. O'Neal, secretary treasurer of the British Columbia federation of labour, requesting a full and thorough investigation by the federal government into all aspects of T.C.A.'s conduct relative to the current contract dispute, in which he states that T.C.A.'s actions are a direct violation of the principles of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act? Has the minister undertaken the investigation which has been requested?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can best answer that question by reading the telegram which I sent in reply to Mr. O'Neal. It reads:

> Retel seventh concerning dispute affecting flight attendants employed by T.C.A. Every effort being made to obtain settlement of dispute before strike deadline set for July 21. Complaint concerning company actions made by representative C.A.L.F.A.A. on May 28 and at my request statement in that regard subsequently made by T.C.A. which also issued statement to employees in attempt to clarify any misunderstanding that might have arisen. To date have had no further complaint from C.A.L.F.A.A. in this regard and would assume that it is considered more constructive action to direct efforts toward settlement of dispute relating to wages and working conditions.

BRIDGES

FORT WILLIAM—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. My question arises out of a resolution passed by the Fort William city council urging the government to give consideration to the construction of a bridge across the Kaministikwia river as an extension of Eighth avenue to the city road to provide access to highway No. 61. Has the minister received this request from the city of Fort William, and, if so, is he in a position to say that consideration will be given to this project?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have received the resolution referred to, and I have the answer.

The letter containing the resolution of the city of Fort William concerning a bridge over the Kaministikwia river was received only today. I have not had much opportunity to study the resolution as such. However, I have in the past examined the request for a bridge over this river, which would appear to be a link in the road system of the city and province. I stress those latter words. As such, it did not appear to be a responsibility of the federal Department of Public Works.

The hon. member raised a question on this matter during discussion of the estimates of my department on June 15, as reported at page 6392 of Hansard of that date. He suggested that a future extension of the terminal might require such a bridge. Our present plan for the lakehead is extensive, as the hon. member mentioned, and can be enlarged two or three times if necessary without affecting the proposed bridge. Our traffic connections to the seaway terminal will be quite adequate in view of the large overpass now under construction which will connect the terminal directly to the main highway arteries. The answer, therefore, is no; we do not intend to build a bridge.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I refer the minister to my question of July 8. Is the minister now in a position to give any information in reply to requests for an extension of the lobster season in district 6B?

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies to that question may I ask him at the same time to report on the request for an extension of the season in district 6A?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last I said I hoped to be in a position to make a report today. I am now able to say that up to July 6 the catch in lobster district 6B was about 90 per cent of the average for the last three years. At that date there were still nine days of fishing remaining and catches were heavy. It is expected that by July 15 at least an average catch will have been harvested. In lobster district 6A the catch up to and including July 6 was about 86 per cent of the average for the last two years. With nine days remaining from that date and with catches heavy, it is anticipated that this district also will have at least an average catch. Under the circumstances no extension of the season in these two districts can be justified. I might add that requests for extensions which were received some time ago were based on the assumption that the catches in these districts would be much below normal.

INDUSTRY

GASOLINE—REPORTED INCREASE IN PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the attention of the minister been directed to the announcement by Imperial Oil Limited and Texaco Canada Limited, appearing on the front page of the Montreal Gazette today, to the effect that they have boosted the price of gasoline by 1 cent per gallon throughout greater Montreal, the Hull area and western Quebec? Has the minister any comment to make thereon?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article or advertisement or whatever it may be in question.

Mr. Macnaughton: It was an announcement on the front page of the Montreal Gazette today.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mount Royal has sent over to me the article in this morning's Gazette which was the basis of his earlier question. I have now had an opportunity to read it. I draw attention to the fact that this article indicates that two companies have announced an increase of 1 cent per gallon in the price of gasoline in local areas, greater Montreal, Hull and western Quebec, and that there had been a similar increase announced in Ontario.

Attention is drawn in this article to the fact that this is an outcome of the price wars that have prevailed hitherto, and it is described in the report as a correction of a situation arising out of price wars. I do not think it has any significance as far as parliament is concerned. I do not know whether it has any significance with regard to the policies in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: It is related to the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now we have the missing link; the hon. member for Laurier has said it is related to the budget. It is quite obvious that no person who takes this article at its face value and applies an honest judgment to it could by any stretch of the imagination think it had anything to do with the budget, because it says itself:

> An Imperial Oil spokesman said price wars in Quebec and Ontario the last three years had driven down the price to what the company felt was an "unsatisfactory level" and that the increase was aimed at correcting the situation.

So it is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who tries to connect this with the budget is not only drawing a long bow but is resorting to his distorted imagination.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the minister and ask him how it is, then, that the price of certain commodities in Canada has already increased; for instance, the price of bread—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —which it has been stated is directly related to the budget, as this item is directly related to the budget.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should not attempt to renew the budget debate on orders of the day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, the hon. member has not contented himself with asking a question; he has put a statement on the record. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think I should be entitled to say this briefly about the situation—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes to comment briefly upon the price of a loaf of bread I will allow him to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let them eat cake.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has said there has been an increase. What there was in fact was a suggestion that there might be an increase. I have already drawn attention to the fact that the increase in the world price of wheat, from which Canadian wheat producers do derive some benefit after all, would not account for more than one eighth or one ninth of a cent per 24-ounce loaf of bread. That is the molehill out of which the hon. member for Laurier is trying to construct a mountain in his own imagination.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Minister of Finance if he is aware that the increase in the price of flour since the budget was delivered is greater, on the quantity of flour used by each of the major bakeries, than the total—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member completes his question the minister will wish to reply. I heard all this discussion in the budget debate, and it does not seem to me there is any urgency about anything that is now being said.

Mr. Chevrier: Where there no price increases in the budget?

Mr. McIlraith: You will have observed, Mr. Speaker, that my question was seeking information, and it did not contain argument.

Mr. Speaker: I did observe that, but I was afraid the debate would be continued by hon. members.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the question is in order. The answer may be out of order. I think the time to rule it out of order is when the answer is given.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I would love to answer that question. I would just like to say that if the price of bread or flour has been increased in the manner indicated by hon. members opposite, it could not be attributed to the budget. I think the western wheat producer will be very glad to see an increase in the world price of wheat.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer, or the statement permitted which was not related to my question, I should like to put my question. It is this. Is the minister aware of the fact that the profits of the major bread companies in Canada last year in each case were less than the amount of the increase in the price of flour they buy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of what the hon. gentleman refers to as a fact. I would wish to examine that very carefully before I regarded this statement on his part as any justification for associating any reputed increase in the price of this product with the budget, because it is quite clear that hon. members opposite are simply trying to make a whipping boy out of the budget for something for which the budget is in no way responsible.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: We rely on the facts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not come to you for instruction on facts.

Mr. Chevrier: You have been doing pretty badly.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether the minister can tell the house whether the combines investigation branch will investigate the announcement of the Imperial Oil Company increasing the retail price of gasoline, and consider whether such an increase would be a contravention of the resale price maintenance provisions of the combines act.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the director of the combines restrictive trade practices commission is aware of this announcement, and will take any necessary action.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the vacancies on the board of directors of the C.N.R. have been filled, and whether the chairman of the board has been appointed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DORVAL AIRPORT—AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO U.S. FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that several hundred employees will be laid off at Dorval as a result of the granting of a lubrication service contract to an American firm?

Could the minister give us some explanation on this matter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): That is the first time I have heard of it, Mr. Speaker. I will have inquiries made by my departmental officials.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAID HOLIDAYS FOR PART TIME EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to supply some information in reply to the questions which were directed to me recently concerning the advisability of granting leave with pay to part time employees. Generally speaking, the government—and this includes the civil service commission—has followed the policy of granting regular leave only to full time civil servants. A thorough review of that policy is now being made. The new policy we are now considering would be aimed at granting leave to all employees on the basis of their period of employment. When the civil service commission has completed its study of the matter, the house will be informed of the way in which this principle would apply.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

"LADY CHATTERLEY'S LOVER"—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL FROM SALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question with regard to statements that the book "Lady Chatterley's Lover" has been withdrawn from sale by publishers. I should like to ask the minister whether his department has given any advice to Canadian publishers to the effect that this book should be removed from sale, or any advice to the customs department that no more copies should be allowed into Canada.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak from personal knowledge because I have not asked my officials, but I feel quite certain that my department has given no such advice.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY ON DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the new crop year is just a few weeks away, and the government has stated there would be a review of the policy of the wheat board in relation to the delivery of grain to feed mills, has any consideration been given to this policy, and can the Prime Minister say whether grain deliveries to feed mills within the designated areas will begin the first of this crop year and will be brought under delivery quotas?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally I wish to look into the implications of that question and get the relative information.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF FISHING LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before orders of the day are called I should like to remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs that on July 5, 1961 the hon. member for Trinity-Conception directed the following question to the Minister of Fisheries:

> Can the minister say whether active negotiations are being carried on at the present time with the nations which are fishing off the east coast of Canada to extend the fishery limit to twelve miles?

At that time the Minister of Fisheries said he would bring the matter to the attention of his colleague. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs is now in a position to answer that question?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as members of the house will recall, Canada made intensive efforts both before and during the 1960 conference on the law of the sea to bring about international agreement on the breadth of the territorial sea and contiguous zone. The failure of the conference has not, however, meant the abandonment of our interest or our efforts in this field. Canada has continued, along with other like minded countries, to seek an answer to these questions which will afford adequate protection to our fishing interests and at the same time contribute toward an international solution of this problem.

Because of the confidential nature of these developments I am not at liberty to disclose the solution which Canada is pursuing. I can assure the members of the house, however, that no efforts are being spared in our attempt to bring about a resolution of this problem. With respect to the particular question asked, the proposal we have in mind would apply equally to both Canada's east and west coasts.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the government would give consideration to the adoption of Bill No. C-96, which stands in my name on the order paper, to provide a solution in this regard?

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the hon. member for Skeena is an authority on divorce, but I doubt very much whether he is an authority on the law of the sea, and I should have to take a very clear look at the bill before I decide to adopt it.

Mr. Argue: That is a pretty cheap answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, as a fellow British Columbian I am sure the minister wil agree that each of us has an interest in all sorts of fields.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the government is considering initiating negotiations for an international agreement to cover those countries which support the twelve mile zone?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot go any further than the statement I have already made. It would not be helpful if I were to make a disclosure along the lines of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed from Monday, July 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-120, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

[Mr. Green.]

On clause 27.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last night we were considering the subclauses listed on page 23 of the bill. Has the consideration of this portion been completed?

On subclause 3.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you could perhaps suggest to hon. members that we should be allowed to hear ourselves think.

Subclause 3 agreed to.

On subclause 4.

Mr. Pickersgill: There does not appear to be anything in subclause 3 that would call for any particular explanation beyond what has already been given to my friend the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska last evening. I wonder whether the minister could tell us what point is involved in subclause 4.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the tax advantages accorded to such a plan depend upon registration. Therefore they run from the date of registration, and that is why this subclause has been included.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, that answer is not very illuminating, if I may say so. The language of the subclause says:

> Where a profit sharing plan is accepted by the minister for registration as a deferred profit sharing plan, the plan shall be deemed to have become registered as a deferred profit sharing plan
> (a) on the date the application for registration of the plan was made, or > (b) where in the application for registration a later date is specified as the date upon which the plan is to commence as a deferred profit sharing plan, on that date.

Does that mean that if an application is not considered for a considerable period of time, as might very well be the case while an investigation was being carried on, it would in fact be considered to be in force from the very date on which the application was received by the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, unless the application indicated that the plan was to come into effect at some date later than the date of application.

Subclause 4 agreed to.

On subclause 5.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the explanation to subclause 5 does not leap to the eye. No doubt the minister can explain it very simply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should have thought this was plain. This clause states that for a period during which a plan is a deferred profit sharing plan, the plan shall be deemed, for the purposes of the act, not to be an employees' profit sharing plan. There is a difference between an employees' profit sharing plan and a deferred profit sharing plan. The definitions of this clause under consideration are included in subclause 1.

Subclause 5 agreed to.

On subclause 6.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister ought to give us some explanation in respect to paragraph (b) of subclause 6.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I should add to my last observation that employees' profit sharing plans are defined in section 79, subsection 1 of the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see; that is not in this bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a definition in this bill of profit sharing plans as well as a definition of deferred profit sharing plan, but there is a definition in the act now in respect to employees' profit sharing plans.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that this did puzzle me a little bit and, of course, it is for the reason the minister gave to the committee last night, that I do not have that familiarity with the act that he has. It did seem to me that they were both employees' profit sharing plans but one was deferred. I was a little puzzled by the language. I can see that one is an immediate profit sharing plan while the other is a deferred one, if I might put it that way. Perhaps "immediate" would not be the right word to use. Perhaps it is an annual disbursement profit sharing plan or something of that sort; is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not necessarily. If the hon. member will have regard to the section of the act he will readily see the difference. Here we are dealing with the principle that to derive the tax advantages that this clause accords to deferred profit sharing plans there must be proof to the minister that the plan comes within the definition of a deferred profit sharing plan.

Mr. Benidickson: Subclause (7)(b) contains a reference, I take it, to a pension plan, and the maximum that can be deducted by an employer would be the amount of the pension and the deferred profit sharing. How long has the maximum been set at $1,500?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told since 1954.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River got up before I had completed the question I wanted to ask about this deferred profit sharing plan and the employees' profit sharing plan. In his answer the minister rather gave the impression, and the language in subclause 5 does give the impression, that a deferred profit sharing plan is not an employees' profit sharing plan; that is, my understanding is that a deferred profit sharing plan is a plan for profit sharing by employees only. Is that not correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, employees in the broad sense of the word. It might of course include officers of the company.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister will see where my difficulty lies, in that I had not read the definition in the act itself. I think the language is not very fortunate, because here we are told a deferred profit sharing plan shall be deemed not to be an employees' profit sharing plan, but a profit sharing plan is an employees' profit sharing plan. It does seem to me there ought to be a little more clarity in the definition to draw a distinction between a deferred profit sharing plan and an employees' profit sharing plan. It seems to me that you need another word that is the antithesis of "deferred" in there, because both plans relate only to employees. Does the minister not think there might be defective draftsmanship there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, sir.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister give consideration to the possibility that there might be, and there might be an occasion for misunderstanding, and perhaps have it reviewed further?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not find any lack of clarity in this provision that the hon. gentleman sees.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 8.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have asked the minister whether he would say something about the 90 per cent figure in paragraph 6.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, Mr. Chairman, I did refer to that last evening in reviewing the clause and pointing out the exemption that exists. I drew attention particularly to the difference between the terms of this measure and the terms of Bill C-84 which was introduced last year. I said the present bill adds a requirement that the trust for a deferred profit sharing plan must receive 90 per cent of its income from sources in Canada. I also pointed out this is in conformity with the proposals that were advanced in the budget speech of December 20 and became law following that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is, of course, one of the measures that is calculated by the government, I suppose—perhaps not to direct; that is far too strong a word—but to suggest to Canadians who have savings plans of one kind or another that it would be desirable for them to invest those savings in Canada. That is a position that I do not quarrel with, a position that Mr. Coyne, of course, has been taking for a long time, and that the government appeared to accept from him in the baby budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government did not accept it from Mr. Coyne in the supplementary budget or anywhere else.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the minister hates to admit that Mr. Coyne was ever of any assistance to him, but we have observed, sir, that with respect to practically every idea that the minister has produced in the last seven or eight months, we have now found their source.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not Mr. Coyne.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will let the public judge that and they are making a judgment, I might add; but that perhaps, sir, is slightly irrelevant to the discussion here. I may say that personally I think it is desirable, notwithstanding the fact that this government proclaims that it is a great free enterprise government, that where these tax incentives and tax advantages are given they should be used in order to encourage, to provide incentives for people to invest in their own country. The clause certainly commends itself to me as I would imagine it does to most other members of the house; but it did seem to me, sir, that perhaps the government was hiding its light under a bushel, and hiding the source of its light under a bushel.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in the submission of the Canadian chamber of commerce to the minister in April, 1961 they reported to him that they had examined last year's Bill C-84, and the executive council went on record as endorsing the postponement of tax on members of deferred profit sharing plans until such times as payments were actually received. In the submission reference is made to the three year average formula provided in section 36 of the Income Tax Act as an appropriate means of determining the amount of tax. Now, is that commendation provided for in this legislation to set up the new section 79 (c) for deferred profit sharing plans? Is there in this bill the equivalent of what the chamber of commerce commended when they referred to section 36 and the three year average formula?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will look back at clause 16 of this bill I think he will find the answer to his question. There cannot be an unqualified answer to the question he posed. If the payments are derived from the fund at the time of retirement in accordance with terms of a registered deferred profit sharing plan, then they will qualify under section 36 of the act; but if they should be withdrawn before that time for any reason, then they would not qualify under section 36 of the act. I am speaking of withdrawals before retirement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister give us just a word of explanation on subclause 8?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The gist of it, Mr. Chairman, is completely set forth in the explanatory note. Where you have two or more taxpayers who are not dealing at arm's length—for instance, they are associated companies and they have had arrangements between them in relation to deferred profit sharing plans—and you may have the same person being an officer of the two associated companies, this provision is to make it quite clear that only one of the taxpayers, only one of those employers, is entitled to claim the deduction on account of the contribution made in respect of that particular person.

Mr. Benidickson: Does this clause apply only to employers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, sir.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 9.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister might give us an explanation of this subclause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to give an explanation, but in this case you have a short clause and the whole pith and substance of the clause has been stated in the explanatory note. I can read the note to you, but I do not think I can improve on the note.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 10.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think paragraph 10 is an amplification of paragraph 9, and for the benefit of some of us who are not quite as good at arithmetic as the minister perhaps he might give a brief explanation of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause will take account of the change that will probably be brought about in various plans following the adoption of this measure. It is quite obvious that various plans will now seek to qualify as deferred profit sharing plans under the act in order to obtain the tax advantages provided under this legislation. This clause is designed to look at what may happen in relation to some existing plans which must undergo certain changes in order to qualify as deferred profit sharing plans for registration under the act. That is the background against which this provision is written, and this applies to the beneficiary, the employee who may have been contributing under a plan himself. What is to become now of the contributions he has made into a plan if he is to withdraw them? What is to be the position of the withdrawals?

Mr. Benidickson: Upon which under the law in the past he has paid tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This clause deals with that situation and, as indicated, the beneficiary, the employee, will be allowed to receive tax free an amount equal to the aggregate of the amounts that he was required to include in computing income in previous years by virtue of an allocation made to him under the employee profit sharing plan but which he has not actually received previously. In the second place, he will also be allowed to receive tax free the return of all his own contributions which he did not previously receive and the net capital gains made by the trust and allocated to him when the plan was an employees' profit sharing plan.

Mr. McMillan: I take it, then, that there is no tax paid on capital gains in respect of any of these funds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only on the capital gains made after the plan has qualified.

Mr. McMillan: And no credit is given for capital loss.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister perhaps used a word inadvertently. He referred to contributions made by an employee prior to the coming into force. I presume he meant contributions made by the employer in respect of an employee; because these profit sharing plans, the minister told us last night, do not have any employee contributions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On such a plan you might have contributions by employees also. A deferred profit sharing plan under the new provisions does not take account of contributions by an employee but among existing plans that have not qualified for tax benefit you might have had plans where the employee made a contribution and, of course, received no tax deduction.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I may be very obtuse but I do not see how that could happen. How could the employee contribute to a profit sharing plan? Surely the profits are made by the employer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You could have plans that were a combination of profit sharing plans and pension plans. There are all kinds of varieties of these plans up to the present time, but this will not qualify the definition being written into the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, this relates not merely to profit sharing plans but also to a kind of mixed arrangement where there might be a combination of a pension plan and a profit sharing plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would more likely be a savings plan than a pension plan so far as the employee is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: But once one of these is converted into a deferred profit sharing plan there could be no more employee contribution to it in order to qualify under this law.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There could be a plan where the employee is making contributions, but there would be no tax advantage to him in consequence of doing so.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has raised a point there, or perhaps I raised it and the minister has enlarged on it a little. Would the Minister of National Revenue accept for registration a mixed plan that was partly a deferred profit sharing plan and partly a savings plan? It would not appear to come within the categories that we considered on page 22 at a length to which the minister rather took exception last night. It seems to me that if you had such a mixed plan the attribution of capital gains, for example, and perhaps even the attribution of the shares of the various participants would be made very much more difficult. In other words, I think we ought to know whether these plans have to be strictly deferred profit sharing plans or if they can also have a savings element and other elements added to them without being disqualified under the legislation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member will find the answer to his question in subclause 1(b) of this clause, the definition of a profit sharing plan. The concluding words beginning in line 15 are "whether or not payments are also made to the trustee by the employees".

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister could translate that into layman's language.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to translate the whole bill, but it is surely not too much to ask hon. members to contemplate the use of these words and their meaning.

Surely this means very clearly that a plan that qualifies as a profit sharing plan in positive terms because it has all the ingredients that the statute prescribes for the deferred profit sharing plan does not cease thereby to be a profit sharing plan because it also includes other provisions, such as contributions by the employees; but there is no tax advantage accruing to anyone in respect of the contributions made by the employees.

Subclause agreed to.

Subclause 11 agreed to.

On subclause 12.

Mr. Benidickson: Just what is envisaged here? What type of appropriation by the employer is being forbidden here from the point of view of tax benefit? Has it reference to use of the funds for the business itself?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is to stop abuse of the fund by the employer.

Mr. Benidickson: The fund has to be quite separate from the operations of the business?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the intention, that the fund shall not be permitted to be abused by the employer or used as a cloak for his own operations.

Mr. McMillan: Is there any control over any securities that might be held in such a fund? For instance, could the fund be made up of common stock in a company? In the case of some of these funds in the United States I believe that common stock of the company is held as security.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We had that last night, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. member will look back at subclause 2(c) he will find that the plan must not provide that any part of the funds in the trust governed by the plan may be invested in notes, bonds, debentures, or similar obligations of (1) an employer by whom payments are made in trust to a trustee under the plan for the benefit of beneficiaries thereunder, or (2) a corporation with whom that employer does not deal at arm's length.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words it is perfectly clear that under no circumstances will one of these plans be recognized if any part of the funds in it is used in any fashion as capital or as a loan to the company that has made the profits. Perhaps the minister could explain that. That is what it seems to me to be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He can invest in shares of the company.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the whole amount be invested in shares of the company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. There is no limit on the shareholdings of the company.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish to pursue that a little further. I understood from what the minister said that these funds could not be invested in any way in the company.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reference is to notes, bonds, debentures or similar obligations. Capital stock is not an obligation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite appreciate that, but that raises this question. Why should there be this distinct prohibition on fixed interest obligations and things of that sort? Why should it be competent to invest in something that may or may not produce a profit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A great many of these plans are designed to encourage the employees to acquire a share of the stock ownership of the company that is the employer.

Mr. Pickersgill: What fear is there of having them invest in the other obligations of the company? Is this a treasury provision? What does the treasury fear may happen?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were on this subject last night, Mr. Chairman. It is in kind with various other provisions of the act. If such provisions were not written into the act here and elsewhere it would be possible for a taxpayer who has obtained a tax advantage under given circumstances to get his money back by the appearance of a loan. We dealt with this subject last evening. It is the same situation, and the same reason applies.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would appear to me to be equally easy, if the company had an authorized capital which had not all been subscribed, for the fund to subscribe to the additional stock and the company thereby to get back the money just as effectively and indeed more effectively, because there would be no obligation to pay any interest on it. That would appear to me to be as easy or easier than would be the case with a loan or bonds or debentures. To my simple mind there does not appear to be much valid reason in what the minister said about getting back the money. There may be some other reason, as indeed I am sure there must be. I am sure this was not included simply to make the bill more complicated.

What precisely is the concern? When all is said and done I assume that the company, unless it went broke and defaulted, would have to pay back this amount and would have to pay interest in the meantime. There does not seem to be any possible loss to the treasury because of this provision. It would appear to me that it must be included in order, in some way, to protect the funds. If it is included to avoid a loss to the treasury I wish the minister would explain how a loss to the treasury could occur.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have endeavoured to do that, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member does not appreciate the difference between the acquisition of stock in a company which carries with it a share of ownership in the company and the distribution or recovery by the company of money through the issuance of what would appear to be debentures, notes or bonds thus recovering the benefit of money that has been contributed to the fund by the employer and for which he has received a tax deduction. This is fully understood by the business community.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, no doubt it is understood by the business community but I am a member of parliament, just like everyone else in this chamber.

Mr. Drysdale: Not quite like anyone else in this chamber.

Mr. Pickersgill: The mere fact that it is understood by the business community does not justify the failure of the minister to give a comprehensive reason. I put this question to the minister. Let us suppose that company A which has one of these deferred profit sharing plans borrows $10,000 from the Bank of Montreal at the same rate of interest as company B, which borrows a similar sum from the trustee of the profit sharing plan. Is not the relationship of both those loans to the treasury precisely the same? What tax advantage would company B receive through borrowing from the trustee over what company A would receive as a result of borrowing from the Bank of Montreal at the same rate of interest? If that were explained to me I think I would see the point, but at the moment I fail to see that the source of funds makes any difference as far as the treasury is concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It makes a great deal of difference if you are opening the door to all kinds of transactions under which the employer is simply recovering his money and handing over what may be no more than a piece of paper, a note. This would open the door to all kinds of devices that could defeat the purposes of the legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as I can make out, what the minister is now saying is that this has nothing at all to do with revenue and nothing to do with the treasury. This represents an attempt to protect these funds from abuse, to protect the participants in the funds from unscrupulous employers who might borrow the money, pay no interest on it and never pay it back. Surely that would be a felony. It does not seem to me that if the employer borrows some money and pays the same rate of interest he would pay through the Bank of Montreal, there can be any possible difference between the two transactions except that you might say the employer is himself both the lender and the borrower, which is perhaps not a desirable situation to have from the point of view of the solvency of the fund. But from the point of view of the treasury, which the minister implied was the reason for this, I cannot get through my head what conceivable difference there would be in the two sets of circumstances. It seems to me we have not received an adequate explanation.

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 13.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this subclause passes I feel the minister should give us—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly obvious to any hon. member who will read this subclause that it deals with the circumstances under which the minister may revoke the registration of a deferred profit sharing plan. It sets out the circumstances under which he may do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now that the minister has anticipated what he thought would be my question, Mr. Chairman, I shall put to him the question I wished to have him answer. Even I can read the word "revocation" and even I know what it means. This subclause raises the question which as yet has not been answered, as to how the minister is going to find out when revocation should take place. This is a great vacuum, if I may express it in that way, in this whole scheme.

Provisions are laid down for the registration of these schemes and provision is made for revoking them if the conditions are not fulfilled, but no evidence has been given to us relating to policing and no provision appears to have been made for any form of policing of the schemes. That seems to me to be a serious lack and imperfection in the whole scheme when we are embarking on a savings plan of this kind. It is true, as the minister has said, that these are not employee savings, but this represents a scheme whereby the government in future is going to permit profit sharing, which is now a current annual thing, to be deferred to create a property and estate which the employee may enjoy in his old age. If that is to be done under conditions laid down by this parliament, because many people are not able to protect themselves very well in these matters we should know precisely how these schemes are going to be policed and how effective that policing will be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The statute does not put any limitations in the way in which information may come to the minister on which he may see fit to act to revoke the registration of a plan. As to what is to be involved in the detailed administration, there is really nothing I can usefully add to what I said last night. We spent considerable time on this matter last evening, and I discussed this subclause in relation to other subclauses bearing on the same subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: I recognize at once, Mr. Chairman, that what the minister says is quite true. However, I had hoped that after reflecting on this overnight the minister would come to the conclusion that the information he gave us last night was inadequate because the bill itself was inadequate, and that steps ought to be taken to improve the bill so as to provide for this supervision. We spend a good deal of the taxpayers' money with regard to insurance companies; or perhaps it is not the taxpayers' money because possibly a levy is made on the insurance companies for the purpose. However, we make a real effort to see that insurance companies in this country are well run.

The minister in his budget told us that he is now going to try to see that pension funds are better run. Here we are starting a new savings scheme on which a great many simple people will depend for their old age. Surely at the very start it would be prudent, wise and foresighted to make adequate provision for the administration and policing of the scheme. It seems to me that is something to which further consideration should be given.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have listened with great interest to this discussion. It seems to me that the situation is clear. This is something as to which in its early stage the companies concerned are in touch with the taxation department. Their statements come every year. They pay taxes every year. Surely the officials who are presently engaged in this administration have the most intimate knowledge of the companies financing in all their details. Certainly if the minister had come along and had announced a great new department being set up, with dozens of people in it, I think we would all have been a little bit critical. I think we would have said "Why are you doing that? You have many competent people. Why do you not build this thing up as it comes?" I do not think anyone would deny that the taxation department takes an interest in the affairs of various companies. I have never heard that questioned. I can see no reason to believe that this situation, as it develops, will not come automatically and inevitably to the attention of the present competent officials and those who will be added as necessity demands.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Greenwood described his intervention as a question. In a way it was a question and I will attempt to answer it. As he almost always is, I think he was exceedingly reasonable in what he said. I think it would have commended itself to me completely if the Minister of Finance himself had not raised a query in our minds about trustee pension funds in his budget speech. But for the very precise reason that he did that, he raised in everyone's mind the question whether the Department of National Revenue was equipped at the present time or perhaps had the authority at the present time to do this very thing.

As my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River put it so well last night, it is precisely because of the question that the minister himself, with all his authority and all his knowledge, raised in his own budget speech with respect to trustee pension funds that we have been alerted to this problem. We perhaps would never have thought of raising this question ourselves; as the minister is so fond of telling us, we are such an inefficient opposition, and we do not think of these things ourselves. We perhaps would never have thought of it if the minister had not put the idea in our minds in his budget speech with reference to another form of deferred benefit for which there is an immediate tax abatement. It is precisely for that reason, namely that the minister himself has suggested that there is a deficiency in our existing machinery in respect of a very similar thing, that we feel we should not allow that kind of situation to grow up.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Greenwood. Indeed, I doubt whether there is in this house any other hon. member, since Mr. Thatcher went to another place, who is as concerned about saving the taxpayers' money as I am, with the possible exception of the hon. member for Greenwood, who I think shares with me a kind of old-fashioned frugal attitude to life. I certainly do not include the Minister of Finance, who has inflated the expenditures of this country out of all recognition since the days when Mr. Harris administered them frugally up to 1957. If Mr. Harris had still been here I would have included him in that select category. But perhaps this semi-biographical material is not very relevant.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is very true.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I am coming back to is this. If this could be done by a very modest improvement in the establishment of the Department of National Revenue; or if the department feels this is not its proper function, as it might, if some arrangement could be made with the superintendent of insurance, who really has much more of this kind of function, to keep an eye on these things, it seems to me that we might avoid a situation which would be regrettable in the future. I make no apology for insisting upon this point.

The Chairman: Shall paragraph 12 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with this matter of registration may I say this. I recall that some years ago there was some considerable anxiety among officials and ministers as to what responsibility, if any, rested upon the administration simply by the registration of a pension plan. Here we are asking for registration of another form of employees' benefits. If the trustee mismanages that fund we fear registration might involve the government in the same manner as we feared registration might involve the government in some responsibility with the pension plan. What has the minister to say as to the justification for an employee saying, if the fund is mismanaged and the assets are not there when he retires and he complains, "I thought this was a fine fund; it was registered with the government" and who feels that the government is to blame for not having had adequate supervision? I know we discussed this matter with respect to pension plans, the blue book and so on. I am wondering what the minister has to say as to future liability merely by registration without perhaps more supervision.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance at the time the statute was amended to strike out the word "approved" as applied to those pension plans and substitute the word "registered". The change emphasized the fact that the government was not to be deemed to be giving approval to the plan or the operations under it. This present clause contemplates registration on the conditions described in the subclause. I do not think I can add anything useful to that. The employee who has important rights at stake here will have to take some responsibility on his own shoulders also for seeing that the fund in which he is interested is properly administered, and to that end assuring that there will be a competent trustee.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Subclause agreed to.

On subclause 14.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister explain the effect of clause 14 (b)?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Putting it briefly, Mr. Chairman, this means that where the registration is revoked the tax advantages die with the revocation and remain in that condition as long as the registration is revoked.

Mr. Pickersgill: When one of these plans is revoked is there an attempt made immediately to recover the tax over the years on all the funds that have been put into the plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The tax advantage that the clause contemplates continues during the period of registration. It begins with the registration; it ends with the revocation of registration. But remember that if the funds are paid out on any other basis than the provisions of the plan, which will contemplate on retirement of the employee, of course the payment out becomes taxable in the hands of the recipient.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister explain very briefly just what would happen after a plan had been revoked? As far as what had happened between the date of registration and the date of revocation was concerned, would the plan still operate, in so far as the treasury was concerned, as though it had not been revoked? In other words would the revocation merely apply to the future and not in any way to the past?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The revocation will take effect from its own date. I dealt with this question, Mr. Chairman. I have pointed out that if one of the grounds, or if a ground, upon which the minister proceeded to withdraw or revoke the registration was payment out in breach of the conditions of the plan upon which it had been admitted to registration, then certainly tax would be collected on the payment out in the hands of the recipients.

Subclause 14 agreed to.

On subclause 15.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the explanatory note, where there is reference to a percentage. The explanatory note says:

—even although it is not expressed as a percentage of profits—

What does the minister have in mind with respect to "percentage of profits"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is a relieving provision. It is designed to make clear that the plan does not have to stipulate in advance for a fixed percentage of the profits of the employer being paid over at the end of the year.

Mr. Benidickson: A fixed percentage is really what is involved?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Subclause 15 agreed to.

On subclause 16.

Mr. Pickersgill: What precisely is the purpose of this subclause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Throughout clause 27—as renumbered now, 26—in various places there is the expression "the employee or other beneficiary". This subclause 16 defines the expression "other beneficiary". It says:

—"other beneficiary" shall be construed as meaning any person, other than the employee, to whom any amount is or may become payable by a trustee under the plan—

Mr. Pickersgill: How can that be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It might be his widow on his death.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that. But there are of course strict provisions, if I remember rightly, against any assignment or any hypothec, or anything of that sort, of any of these funds. So the beneficiary here would only be a beneficiary within the terms of the plan itself; that is to say, at the end of the period of deferment. There could be no beneficiary in the interval, I take it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would have to be a beneficiary defined by the plan, and the terms of the plan must all conform to the terms of the clause before us.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I put a hypothetical case to the minister. Is it envisaged that these plans would provide that in the case of the death of an employee, whoever his legal heir was would be a beneficiary and would be able to draw upon the fund once the will had been probated or the estate wound up?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot imagine any plan under which the rights of the employee in the fund would terminate on his death if the payments out to him had not been exhausted as of that date.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not know of any such plan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot imagine any plan under which the employee's rights under the fund would terminate on death, if the payments out to him had not then exhausted his interest in the fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are such plans.

Subclause 16 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall paragraph 2, clause 27, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is clause 28.

Mr. Benidickson: This is what was amended, is it? This is consequential to the long amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I think the hon. member did not hear the chairman. The chairman is putting to us, now that we have adopted subclause 2, clause 27 as amended, renumbered clause 26.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 28.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on clause 28 there is an amendment which hon. members have. I would ask my colleague the Solicitor General to move that amendment to clause 28.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I beg to move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Browne (St. John's West) moves:

That clause 28 be amended by striking out subclauses 1 and 2 of clause 28 and renumbering subclause 3 of clause 28 as clause 27.

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 27 carry?

On renumbered clause 27.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this undistributed income of a corporation is always a complicated matter. I wonder whether for the record the minister would give us a full explanation of the effect of this amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Subclause 3 concerns tax-paid undistributed income. The act provides that corporations meeting certain conditions may elect to pay a 15 per cent tax on undistributed income which they hold on hand. The undistributed income on which this tax is paid becomes tax-paid undistributed income and may be capitalized or made available to shareholders by means of redeemable preferred shares free of personal income tax.

This present amendment, which is admittedly quite technical, provides that the tax-paid undistributed income of a corporation that is wound up may pass to another corporation and continue to be classed as tax-paid undistributed income.

The Chairman: Shall clause 27 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that subclause 3 is struck out?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was included in the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, it is included in the amendment.

The Chairman: Subclause 3 becomes clause 27.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if we have now passed 28, which was renumbered 27, there is an amendment to the succeeding clauses of the bill simply dealing with the numbering. It is that clauses 29 to 39 be renumbered as clauses 28 to 38 respectively. I would ask my colleague the Solicitor General so to move.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Browne (St. John's West) moves:

That the bill be amended by renumbering clauses 29 to 39 as clauses 28 to 38 respectively.

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: We will now proceed to new clause 28.

On new clause 28—Deductions from income from businesses of associations, etc.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister is going to give us some explanation of this clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is clause 29, renumbered 28. This amendment deals with a deduction for drilling and exploration expenses incurred in searching for oil or natural gas. The act at present permits an association, partnership or syndicate formed for the purpose of drilling or exploring for petroleum or natural gas to deduct its drilling and exploration expenses. However, a member of such an association may not deduct his share of these expenses from his income from other sources. This amendment will extend the present concession and permit a taxpayer to apply his share of the expenses from one association or partnership against his income from another association or partnership.

Subclause 2 involves an amendment which deals with bonus payments made to a government for a lease to extract petroleum or natural gas, or for the right to explore for these products. The act at the present time permits—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could make a suggestion to the minister. Would it be more convenient, since the subclauses do not seem to be too clearly related, if we could clear up each one separately and then go on to the next? This might save a lot of time. I should like to ask one question in respect to the first provision. Does this involve a relaxation or a tightening up of the law? I must say this is an aspect of the law—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a relieving provision.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is to say it is another concession or tax benefit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the reason for extending this tax benefit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is fairness and equity, Mr. Chairman, having regard to the purposes which I have indicated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the minister is suggesting—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are proposing to extend the concession by permitting an individual taxpayer to apply his share of the expenses in one association or partnership against his income from another association or partnership. So in this respect it is a matter of equity, extending to individuals the kind of treatment that has hitherto been accorded to associations, partnerships or syndicates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, what the minister is saying in other words is that the present law is not equitable. Could the minister say when the government discovered that the present law was inequitable, how it discovered that, how this amendment came about, and whether representations have been made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should not attempt to pinpoint that for a moment. We receive representations all the time, and these matters are under study at all times.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this something in respect of which the government received representations a year ago and did not accept them? Was the inequity maintained all last year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that has been discussed from time to time over some period.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have been rather interested in this regard because to a simple mind, what is equitable in 1961 should also have been equitable in 1960. The minister is defending this amendment on the basis of fairness and equity, yet he says he has been receiving representations for several years. I think the minister ought to tell us when it dawned upon him that this was inequitable.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the observations about what was equity in 1960 will equally apply to 1956 or the early part of 1957. These matters are under study and there are representations received from time to time. They are subjected to very careful study, and we are satisfied now that this amendment should be made, and we so recommend to the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will this amendment, apart from being equitable, which is, of course, the first concern of the government—that is, justice as between one taxpayer and another —be productive of any advantage to the national interest? Will it result in any greater investment or any greater expansion, shall we say, or is it merely a matter of being equitable as between taxpayers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should expect it to be of particular assistance to individuals who may be interested in drilling and exploration for oil or natural gas. This is a provision which is going to be of assistance to individuals, people of small interests.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, when we have dealt with the amendments to section 83 we shall have legislation in two parts, one with respect to drilling for petroleum or natural gas, and then in the same area of the tax statute we have a comparable concession to those engaged in metal mining. What is the situation at the present time in respect to an individual who enters upon exploration activities in so far as metal mining is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that this form of syndicate or association has prevailed in the gas and oil exploration field but has not been used in relation to metal mining. Certainly we have had no representations from anyone interested in metal mining in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, we were just dealing with the first subclause. The minister had started to explain the second one, and if no one else has anything to say I should like him to continue his explanation in that regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the second subclause you will see that this amendment deals with bonus payments made to a government for a lease to extract petroleum or natural gas, or the right to explore for these products. The act at present permits a corporation to deduct such expenditures if the property leased is subsequently abandoned as unproductive. This amendment will extend this right of deduction to a successor corporation which has acquired the property of the corporation which originally made the bonus payment.

Mr. Pickersgill: What inspired this particular amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Representations and study.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this an amendment for the purpose of making the tax more equitable, or is this an incentive to expansion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This again is a relieving provision which should aid in the development of resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not exactly an answer to my question. I will put each question separately so the minister can explain them separately. Is it felt that this is required because there is some inequity or unfairness in the existing tax structure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is recommended to the house, Mr. Chairman, because it is considered fair and because the government has an interest in encouraging people to concern themselves with exploration. It is thought that this will provide an encouragement to that end.

Mr. Pickersgill: In what way will it provide an encouragement? Can the minister explain just what the incentive feature of it is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think if the hon. member has attempted to follow what I said he will see that it is quite clear. I will go over it again. I have said that the amendment deals with bonus payments made to a government for a lease to extract petroleum or natural gas or for the right to explore for these products. The act at present permits a corporation to deduct such expenditures if the property leased is subsequently abandoned as unproductive. This amendment will extend this right of deduction to a successor corporation which has acquired the property of the corporation which originally made the bonus payment. There are transactions going on between corporations in this field, those that originally have undertaken the exploration which proved unproductive, and there are naturally tax implications in every one of these transactions. In this case it is thought it will facilitate exploration if the tax benefit that arises in the case where the outlay has proven to be unproductive is available to the successor corporation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that these bonus payments are payments made to governments other than the federal government, because otherwise there would not seem to be much sense in collecting the bonus payments and then treating them as an expense of doing business.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It depends where it is, whether it is in a province or the territories.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would explain to me what advantage it would be for the federal government to exact one of these bonus payments if it is going to be given back to the taxpayer, either because he incurred a loss or because he made a gain. In what circumstances could the federal treasury ever get anything out of this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is in a competitive area of competitive business. The hon. member talks about the bonus going back if the venture proves unproductive and treats that as the same situation where an area or property proves productive. He is misleading himself there, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not seeking to—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the interests of equity there are these government charges. I think you will find them imposed by all provinces in the case of exploration carried on within their provincial boundaries. This is the way in which effort is made not only to raise revenues but also to proceed with some regard for equity in relation to the rights that are given by government to persons interested in exploration. This is dealing with the matter at a later stage; this is dealing with the matter after there has been an outlay and after the bonus has been paid to the government for the lease. Later on, if the property leased has been abandoned as unproductive, there is an advantage today taxwise on the part of the lessee, the lessee being a corporation; it is a very considerable advantage to that lessee to be able to convey that position to a successor corporation. It has the opportunity of conveying its interests to another corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: Have we not always been very loath to permit corporations to merge, one corporation to buy another corporation largely for a tax reason, such as perhaps a tax loss of considerable substance that one company had on its books? Is not this equivalent to encouraging the buying of one company by another company simply because one company is carrying some losses? Is this not the kind of thing that we do not encourage in a normal way, and indeed discourage as between one corporation and another, one corporation with a substantial profit and another with rather heavy losses? One company is merged with the other simply for tax gain. Is this not doing about the same thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not think it is doing the same thing, because this is limited in its application. This applies to the payment made to the government in respect of the lease. I do not think this can be regarded as an inroad on the basic principle of section 83A of the act in that sense.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the minister gave what seemed to me to be a very lucid explanation of this provision as it applied to payments made to some other government. I can see quite clearly that the government, say, of the province of Alberta would get the bonus and the taxpayer would be allowed to treat this bonus, I would think quite properly, as one of the expenses of his operation. But what I cannot get through my head is, if the bonus is paid to the federal government and if the taxpayer is going to be allowed to treat that bonus as an expense of doing business, what conceivable purpose there would be in having the bonus in the first place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, when these blocks are put up for tender no one knows whether the property is going to be productive or unproductive, and you may have various competing bids for the opportunity to obtain a lease. This is the bonus payment. Surely nobody is going to suggest there should not be a charge made for that right by way of this so-called bonus payment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let me put it this way, sir. I can see that where you go to Alberta and bid and Alberta gets some benefit from it, but what conceivable purpose there can be, if the taxpayer knows he is going to be able to treat this as an expense, in having this bonus in relation to the federal government leases I just cannot see, and the minister has not yet made it clear to me.

Mr. Benidickson: He gets the benefit only on the tax, does he not?

The Chairman: Shall subclause 2 carry?

Subclause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall subclause 3 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we should have an explanation of this, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would have thought the explanatory note was very clear in providing whatever elucidation is required of this short clause. However, I might say that the amendment in subclause 3 also deals with the deduction for exploration and drilling expenses. The act permits a company engaged in the oil, gas or mining business to deduct exploration and drilling expenses incurred in searching for oil, gas or minerals. The act also permits a company which acquires the property of another company under certain conditions to deduct the drilling and exploration expenses incurred by the former company. However, these provisions do not at present cover the situation where a company acquires a property of its former subsidiary. This amendment is intended to correct this omission.

Mr. Benidickson: This would have exactly the same effect. Suppose we had a mining company that was a failure and on its books it had a very substantial loss. To all intents and purposes, unless there was encouragement from the point of view of tax advantage, we would hear no more about that company; it would disappear and probably surrender its charter. Does not something of this kind simply encourage one profitable mining company to look around for the charter of another company that has to all intents and purposes folded? It takes it over for purposes of tax advantage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member is overlooking what the act now allows. We are simply dealing here with one omission from the general rule that the act provides in this regard now. This is to cover the situation where the company acquires the property of its former subsidiary. That is all it does.

Mr. Benidickson: It may acquire the property, but the property is just a piece of rock and has proven to be a failure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is overlooking the fact, I think, that the act at present permits a company which is engaged in the oil, gas or mining business to deduct exploration or drilling expenses for oil, gas or minerals, and that it also permits a company which acquires the property of another company under certain conditions to deduct the drilling and exploration expenses incurred by the former company. This simply fills a gap or corrects an omission in dealing specifically with the situation where a company acquires the property of its former subsidiary, which has always been a subsidiary.

[The Chairman.]

Subclause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall subclause 4 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the minister will give us an explanation here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think this is very plain. It was set out in the budget resolutions and I referred to it in the budget speech. This amendment extends the right to deduct exploration and drilling expenses to metal fabricating companies.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point of order at this time. On two or three occasions today the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has qualified himself by saying "I am a very simple minded individual" or "I have a very simple mind". He has said that he is unable to understand the technical provisions of this very technical statute; yet he is the person who is asking a great majority of the questions and presumably he is representing the Liberal party. It seems to me that we should get some protection from this type of questioning. Surely there is somebody in the Liberal party who would be qualified to ask these necessary technical questions. Of course he has been delegated to keep things going while they are straightening out things in the other house.

Mr. Habel: As the whip of the Liberal party I object very strenuously to the hon. member's remarks and I say he has no right to speak, as he did, from the seat of a Liberal member.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, we are in committee of the whole. It was the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who said "I have a very simple mind". Nobody took issue with that point. I am sure he is in the best position to qualify himself, which he did under those circumstances. I was saying that I hoped there was somebody else in the Liberal party who could perhaps ask some relevant questions on this very technical subject rather than tedious and repetitious questions which are forbidden under our rules.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it would appear that I have a question of privilege as a result of this phony and specious point of order or alleged point of order raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, who I see has retreated from the advanced post in a progressive and forward looking party which he occupied when he made his intervention.

Mr. Drysdale: You mean the Conservative party.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not surprised, sir, to find the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond getting closer and closer to the Liberal party.

Mr. Drysdale: Not clear to your thinking; I can assure you of that.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is obvious even to the simple minded that in doing so he is simply following the public trend as reflected in the Gallup polls and in a great many other indications of the transformation of opinion that is taking place at the present time in the country. I may say that with a little mild Liberal indoctrination I think perhaps the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond would be admitted on payment of the appropriate membership fee.

Mr. Winch: Now I know he is simple minded.

Mr. Pickersgill: That might give him some faint hope of coming back here again and adding his simple contribution to those of the other simple minded people in this house who represent the ordinary voters of this country, who are entitled to understand our proceedings without having to go through a great deal of technical jargon.

Mr. Winch: Is this not the wrong institution for simple minded persons?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Vancouver East has embarrassed me on one of the rare occasions when I have really been embarrassed in this house. I used "simple" in the old fashioned sense—

Mr. McCleave: So did he.

Mr. Pickersgill: —of meaning just the plain and ordinary people who use plain and ordinary horse sense. It does seem to me that if more effort were made to translate our statutes into simple language that simple minded people could understand, it would be a great improvement. I have merely regarded myself as a representative, as I am—

Mr. Drysdale: Of the simple minded.

Mr. Pickersgill: —who has three times been chosen to be the representative of the fishermen and loggers of my constituency, none of whom would pretend to be very learned in the law but most of whom have a good deal more common sense than some hon. members of this house demonstrate on some occasions.

Mr. Drysdale: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I want to make clear that I was referring to this particular statute, the Income Tax Act, which is exceedingly technical in nature. I merely mentioned how the hon. member had qualified himself. I had merely hoped that there was somebody in the Liberal party who was capable of dealing with it in a technical way, and the technical aspect was referred to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps you might permit me to say that happily we have no keeper in the Liberal party.

Mr. Drysdale: Have you all escaped?

The Chairman: Order. This so-called point of order and so-called question of privilege has, I think, provided a change of tempo which everybody has appreciated, and we can now revert to the bill.

Subclause agreed to.

Subclause 5 agreed to.

On clause 29.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the parliamentary secretary, who sat here so patiently waiting to get a word in edgewise, could oblige us by telling us what clause 29 is all about.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as the explanatory note indicates, this is consequential solely upon the repeal of section 34. This simply deletes the reference to section 34 from the paragraphs in clause 29.

Mr. McMillan: Are we on clause 29 now?

The Chairman: Renumbered clause 29.

Mr. McMillan: What would be the position of a part owner of a syndicate or partnership that struck oil if he sold out and made a very large profit? Would that be considered a capital gain? So far as income tax is concerned, would he be allowed to deduct any expenditures in connection with exploration? I know that some of these syndicates go on to form a company and the company takes over from the syndicate. What is the procedure in these cases? How are these deductions from income tax made?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think the hon. member is referring to the old clause 29 which is now clause 28. I am not too sure that I understood his question relating to that clause, which has already been passed. On a matter as technical as these clauses are, I would certainly be hesitant to give my hon. friend anything approaching a legal opinion. I would be very glad indeed to discuss the whole matter with him and secure for him all the information he requires.

The Chairman: Shall clause 29 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think there was an understandable confusion. You called clause 29 and the hon. member was quite properly looking at the 29 that is in the bill. I am sure the parliamentary secretary does not have the slightest intention of abridging the hon. member's rights—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because I know the hon. gentleman has been meditating on this question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My genial friend from Welland would be the last one whose rights I would seek to abridge in any way.

Mr. McMillan: What clause are we actually on now? I should like to know, because we were just discussing—

The Chairman: Clause 28, formerly clause 29, has been carried, but if the hon. member wishes to pursue this matter I am sure there is no objection. At present we are considering clause 29, formerly clause 30, and it is to be found on page 30.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I might make a suggestion that I am sure would be agreeable to the parliamentary secretary, that no other member would ask any further questions but that the hon. member for Welland, because of the misunderstanding, might pursue his point briefly when we come back after lunch. That will perhaps give the two hon. gentlemen an opportunity to confer so that things can be speeded up.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): When the committee rose it was agreed that the hon. member for Welland be permitted to ask questions on old clause 29 which has been renumbered new clause 28.

Mr. McMillan: I was asking about a syndicate that might sell out at a capital gain. I have knowledge of a partnership or syndicate that had rights for the drilling of natural gas within a certain area and they struck gas in the first well, then sold out at a considerable profit. This was quite a common thing at one time in southwestern Ontario.

According to the answer I received, this would be a capital gain and the cost of drilling would not appear in any income tax calculation. My question is, would the purchaser have the right to write off any of these earlier drilling costs? Could he, for instance, split up his costs and show the drilling cost as a separate item, then write it off immediately? I take it that the rest of the holding would be written off at a reduced rate. I wonder if these drilling costs could be written off immediately on purchase.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The gain to which the hon. gentleman refers may or may not be a capital gain, depending of course upon whether or not the syndicate, association or partnership is engaged generally in business or trade. If it is as the hon. gentleman has suggested, in fact a capital gain, then there would be no deduction from that capital gain for the purposes of section 83A. Such deductions are deductions only from income. I only want to emphasize to the hon. gentleman that in the particular circumstances he describes, I would not wish to be considered as giving a legal opinion that the gain was, in fact, a capital gain.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The Chair takes it that in the absence of further questions from the hon. member for Welland old clause 29, new clause 28, is carried.

Clause agreed to.

New clause 29 agreed to.

On new clause 30.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister give an explanation of this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The first subclause of old clause 31 concerns reserves which taxpayers may deduct in computing income. The Income Tax Act, in section 85B (1)(d) provides that if a taxpayer has been required to include an amount in income on account of property sold during the year and the proceeds of the sale are not fully receivable within two years, the taxpayer may deduct as a reserve the amount that can reasonably be regarded as a portion of the profits from the sale. The two year rule is intended to leave out a great number of sales where payment is made over a period shorter than two years. It has been the practice when real estate was sold on a deferred payment basis to bring into income annually that proportion of the profit on the transaction that the payments receive in a year bore to the total sales price.

However, this concession to the taxpayer may not be completely provided for under the present law. Moreover, it has become apparent that some provision should be made to cover the method of operation followed by land development companies. These companies, frequently made up of builders, acquire land, subdivide it, instal services and sell it to builders. The Department of National Revenue takes the position that a sale is made when a lot is transferred to a builder, but the builder may not be able to make payment for several months. It may extend over the year-end of the land company. This means that the land company has to include in income money it has not actually received, and because the term of the payment does not extend more than two years it does not qualify for a reserve under the present provisions of the act. The amendment provides that a reserve may be deducted with respect to sales of land where the proceeds of the sale are not receivable until after the end of the taxation year.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 31.

Mr. Benidickson: We have a subsection 2 in this clause that hardly relates to subsection 1, as I see it. I take it that there will be an order in council now with respect to policy reserves. Will that be gazetted? Will that be something which will now be standard and known to the people in the insurance business in contrast, perhaps, to the past system where simply the approval of the superintendent of insurance had to be negotiated in the case of each individual company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer to the first part of the question is yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did not give any general explanation of this clause, but I was particularly interested in the marginal note. I wonder if the minister could throw any light on that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, clause 32, which has been renumbered 31, is consequential upon the reduction in individual and corporation income taxes commencing in 1962. It is intended to prevent taxpayers from receiving a double benefit. It is similar to the amendment described earlier in connection with clauses 17 and 20.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has no light to throw on the marginal note?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think the hon. gentleman needs any.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just so that it will be in Hansard, may I say that the marginal note is "election". I do not think there is any subject on which the house would be more interested in having some light thrown by the hon. gentleman than the marginal note to this clause.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 32.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to subclause 2 the explanatory note reads as follows:

(2) This new paragraph provides that expenditures of a capital nature on scientific research in Canada made by a predecessor corporation but not deducted by it shall be available for deduction by a new corporation formed as a result of an amalgamation.

Will the minister inform the committee the reason for this amendment? What representations were made to have this amendment included? It seems to be a rather unusual clause from my point of view.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recall any specific representations on this point. However, this is part of the program that we worked out for giving the utmost encouragement through tax measures for the carrying on of research particularly for industrial purposes.

Mr. Herridge: Does this mean that a corporation that was formerly carrying out research, forming another corporation or company for the purpose of specifically carrying out research, can deduct for tax purposes the money spent in the previous year by the parent corporation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not precisely. What we are dealing with here are first of all expenditures of a capital nature on scientific research. We are only dealing with expenditures on research in Canada. That runs through all these provisions. We are dealing here with expenditures of a capital nature made by a corporation, expenditures which had not been deducted by it. If it amalgamates with another corporation this amalgam, the resulting corporation, may deduct those expenditures made on scientific research which had not previously been deducted by the predecessor corporation. I am told that there was a recommendation to this effect from the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian institute of chartered accountants.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 33.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we ought to have an explanation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 34, renumbered 33, is a relieving provision. The act at present permits a corporation to elect to pay a special 15 per cent tax on an amount of undistributed income which has been matched by dividends paid to shareholders. This amendment will allow a corporation to include in the dividends used for this matching certain dividends it may have been deemed to have paid to shareholders.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 34.

The Chairman: Shall clause 35, renumbered 34, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: After an explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a relieving provision.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this to create a situation of fairness and equity, or is this to provide an incentive for expansion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendments to the law following the supplementary budget of December 20 provided that the 15 per cent non-resident withholding tax would in future apply to interest paid to non-residents in a foreign currency. However, it provided an exemption from this tax for obligations incurred prior to December 20, 1960.

This amendment provides that where a taxpayer was paying interest in a foreign currency to a non-resident on an obligation incurred prior to December 20, 1960, and that taxpayer's property is purchased by someone else who assumes all the vendor's obligations, the interest shall continue to be exempt when paid by the purchaser.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 35.

Mr. Benidickson: This is quite a technical amendment. I think those in the accounting business and otherwise would like to have an explanation on the record.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are two parts to clause 36, renumbered 35. Subclause 1 contains an amendment which is relieving. It will prevent the double taxation of certain income by providing that a redemption of shares which were deemed to be received as a dividend shall not also be deemed to be subject to the 15 per cent non-resident withholding tax.

Subclause 2 contains an amendment which is intended to close a loophole whereby a non-resident shareholder might arrange to have the dividends to which he is entitled paid to another non-resident who is not a shareholder in order to avoid the 15 per cent non-resident tax.

Clause agreed to.

New clause 36 agreed to.

On new clause 37.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister explain this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment provides that the minister may issue a notice of assessment—that is the Minister of National Revenue—on account of non-resident withholding tax or for an amount that is due as a penalty.

Clause agreed to.

On new clause 38.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is partly on a deferred profit sharing plan. Perhaps the minister ought to just indicate its relationship to the general scheme.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 39, renumbered 38, contains provisions that are consequential upon the provisions already made for deferred profit sharing plans. I think the reasons for them are obvious.

As to subclause 2, I point out that this amendment is in conformity with the amendment made to section 16, provided by clause 5 of the bill. Subclause 3 is consequential upon subclause 4. Subclause 4 extends the meaning of residence. Subclause 5 is, I think, fully explained by the explanatory note in the bill. Subclause 6 deals with residence of a corporation. Subclause 7 is necessary to close a possible loophole in the rules dealing with associated companies.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 40.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment to strike out clause 40. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to make that motion.

Mr. Churchill: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Next sitting of the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Saturday July 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-121, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1961, to the 30th day of June, 1962, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock on Saturday Your Honour had just drawn my attention to the scope of the bill, and there had been some discussion about a point which I was in the midst of making and which I did not have an opportunity to complete.

The point I was making was this. It is a very simple and a very obvious point, but one about which there seems to be an amazing amount of misunderstanding and confusion, and indeed a very marked change in attitude in the case of one very distinguished person. I refer to the question of who is sovereign in this country.

Lest Your Honour should think I am embarking upon a line of argument that is not germane to the bill, I will deal with that point first. The whole point of the argument I was making following the argument made, without any exception being taken to it, by my hon. friend from Laurier was that since parliament is sovereign in this country, parliament certainly has a right, before granting large sums of money to be expended by a crown corporation, to know who is going to be the head of that corporation and who its directors are going to be. That is the precise objection that we on this side of the house are taking to the government proceeding with this bill without first telling us the answer to that question.

My hon. friend from Laurier on the orders of the day this morning asked the Prime Minister whether the directors and the chairman had yet been appointed as a result of the legislation passed by this house some time ago. I remember very well that the legislation was passed by this house before the famous by-elections, because I made certain predictions about it that I am afraid are not going to be fulfilled quite literally. However, I think they are a fair indication of what is likely to happen in due course with regard to that legislation. I say, as my hon. friend from Laurier has already said, that we as a sovereign parliament are entitled to know who is going to be in charge of this crown corporation, who is going to be spending these millions and millions of dollars, before the taxpayers' money is invested in this fashion. I use the word "invested" because of course these are capital sums with which we are dealing in this bill.

In the days when the present government was not in office and when the right hon. gentleman and some of the other occupants of the treasury benches were over here on this side of the house, this kind of argument in this set of circumstances was very frequently made both inside and outside the house. In order to illustrate the importance of the argument I am making I wish to cite as an authority the Prime Minister himself in the days when he was leader of the opposition. I recognize that was for a very short period, and therefore I have not many citations. In fact I wish to cite only one. I have in my hand a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, a newspaper that I find very useful for reference. This is a clipping from that newspaper of March 22, 1957, headed:

> Diefenbaker demands reforms—Parliament "puppet of few cabinet ministers".

In an address in Halifax the present Prime Minister appealed for:

> Restoration of the prestige of parliament which today "has become the plaything and puppet of a few cabinet ministers".

I suggest that in respect of the Canadian National Railways that is precisely what has happened. Since last September nine months and eleven days have passed during which this government has declined to decide who should be the regularly appointed chairman of the board and who should be the directors of that railway, the greatest railway in North America. It does seem to me that the government, or a few cabinet ministers are treating parliament in exactly the kind of way to which the right hon. gentleman took exception at the time when he was over here on this side of the house. In other words they are seeking to make parliament the puppet of a few cabinet ministers. We are not entitled to know—we are supposed to vote this money blindly—who these people are who are to manage this railway; who is to be the head of the management of the railway; whether Mr. Gordon is finally to get out of the death cell in which he has found himself ever since last September; whether his exit from it is to be to the executioner's block, or whether he is to get a reprieve.

Mr. Drysdale: He looks pretty lively.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact there is many a tiger in a cage that looks pretty lively, but that does not mean he is not still in a cage. If Mr. Gordon—and I did not mean to reflect on him in any way—has perhaps exhibited some of the impatience of a caged tiger upon occasion, who can blame him, after nine months and eleven days of suspended sentence? How, indeed, can any man be expected to discharge great responsibilities when so little confidence is shown in him by those who have the responsibility for his appointment or his dismissal?

I want to make it very clear, as I think I did the other day and as my hon. friend from Laurier did, that we do not question the right of the government to replace Mr. Gordon. That is their right under the law. And we are not suggesting that parliament should usurp the functions of the government; not at all. What we are suggesting is the government should do what it is supposed to do. It should do it when it is supposed to do it, and then account for its conduct to parliament so parliament can make an intelligent judgment. If the government have found someone better than Mr. Gordon to run this railway, let them appoint him. If they cannot find anyone, let them take Mr. Gordon out of this state of suspense and reappoint him. Either course would be a respectable and a responsible course. The course that is being followed is irresponsible. It is bound to lead to bad morale; it cannot help but do so, and it should not be continued.

In this same newspaper clipping I read this:

> Mr. Diefenbaker complained that the prestige of parliament had been dropping because "members were denied information on affairs of the nation".

What we have witnessed in the last few weeks and the last few months—all through this session, as a matter of fact—in the denial of information is something the equal of which cannot be found at any time since confederation. Let me go on with the Prime Minister's words:

> The "shutters were drawn down whenever there was a question not in the best interest of the Liberal party."

That is what he said.

Mr. Drysdale: That is true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I hear a feeble little bleat from behind me saying "That is true".

Mr. Drysdale: True.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is true is that the shutters have been pulled down, bolted and barred by the present government. But they have gone a lot further than that. They now assert that parliament has no right at all to the information.

Mr. Speakman: Who said that, besides yourself?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister stated that in this house last Friday. He said the government of Canada was sovereign. His words are in Hansard and I can quote them if anybody wishes me to do so.

Mr. Speakman: Quote them.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the Prime Minister who said there could not be two sovereignties, and one of those sovereignties he described as the government of Canada.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Starr: And the other one?

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not make any difference what the other one was.

Mr. Starr: Yes, it does. The other one was the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: One of them was described as the government of Canada. These are the ministers who are trying to make puppets of parliament, in the words of the present Prime Minister on a former occasion. Now parliament does not matter at all, it is the government that is sovereign. That is the present doctrine.

An hon. Member: Oh, come now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to remind the hon. member who is interrupting that Hitler too won an election before he established his dictatorship, so the fact that there was a huge majority in 1958 is no excuse for saying that the government and not parliament is sovereign. This is a subversion of our whole conception of responsible government and our whole conception of parliamentary government. This is the doctrine of dictators.

The government say, "We have won the election and the other side have no rights". In that same direction the Prime Minister went further and said, "We are staying". He did not say "We will stay if the people want us"; he simply said "We are staying". His words are right there in Hansard to see. Of course we know that has happened. These people have got in office in the past by winning elections and then they have stayed and stayed without any more elections.

An hon. Member: Yes, for 22 years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say this is a very strange doctrine coming from the right hon. gentleman who in 1955 in this house, during the debate on the Defence Production Act, which was being put on the statute books solely to deal with the emergency of a possible war and only to be used in those circumstances, had this to say, and this is from Hansard of June 8 of 1955 as reported at page 4558:

> However, there has been no suggestion on the part of the government that it intends to deviate one whit from the trend that apparently is to be followed, of establishing for ministers of the crown and this government an absolutism.

Those are the words of the present Prime Minister applied to the government of that day in 1955. Those words apply to the Prime Minister today who, when he is asked whether the directors of the Canadian National Railways have been appointed, on a day when the government is coming here theoretically asking us—in fact ordering us—to vote this money, says, "No, you are not entitled to this information". They said it was urgent to get the bill through so they could appoint the directors and settle Mr. Gordon's fate, yet six weeks afterwards no appointments have been made, no decisions arrived at. Parliament has the right to know these things. As my friend the hon. member for Laurier said the other day, once we in parliament can be got rid of the government can perhaps start leafing through its list of defeated candidates and other supporters of their party to fill up these holes.

An hon. Member: We do not have any defeated candidates.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member says they do not have many defeated candidates, and I suggest they have not got nearly as many as they will have after the next election.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps if the hon. member did not mention the next election so much there would be less difficulty in keeping the attention of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I made reference a few moments ago to trends, and it may be that I am simply following one which exists in the atmosphere around us. I shall endeavour to resist it. This opposition not only has the right but the inescapable duty to resist this tendency toward cabinet dictatorship, this tendency that was epitomized in the words of the Prime Minister when he said that the government of Canada is sovereign. I venture to say that no Prime Minister in the history of this country has ever before uttered those words in the House of Commons.

Mr. Aiken: To which page does the hon. member refer?

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the page reference? I thought hon. gentlemen listened with the greatest of care to their leader's speech, but he will find those words at the bottom of page 7685 of Hansard, beginning in the first column and carrying on to the top of the second column. He will find an entirely false antithesis there which I am not going to waste the time of the house in reading. That statement clearly says that the government is sovereign. That statement slipped out. The Prime Minister was speaking his real mind that day with that sincerity which is his most famous characteristic. It was frightening; it was very frightening in a free parliament to hear the Prime Minister of this country say not that this parliament is sovereign and the ministers are its servants, as all his predecessors have said, but that the government is sovereign.

Mr. Aiken: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, he did.

Mr. Aiken: Read the statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The other day when I attempted to read it I was precluded from doing so because hon. gentlemen opposite did not want to hear it read.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Read it now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall read it with great pleasure, sir. The statement of the Prime Minister to which I referred as recorded at page 7685 of Hansard for July 7, 1961 reads as follows:

> Sir, these letters reveal—

That is to say, certain communications which Mr. Coyne had addressed to the hon. gentleman opposite and which were made public.

> Sir, these letters reveal an attitude which, if accepted by the government, would result in two sovereignties in Canada, the government of Canada and the governor of the Bank of Canada;—

An hon. Member: That is right, but not in that order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, he said the "government of Canada".

An hon. Member: Read on; go ahead and read on.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is all that I am concerned about, sir, because—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Well, if the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. gentlemen must allow the hon. member who has the floor to make his own speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And make his own mistakes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman not aware that the crown and the two houses of parliament are the government of Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not aware of that fact. I am aware of the fact that that is a false proposition. The government of Canada is Her Majesty's ministers for the time being, it is not parliament. Of course the hon. member for Carleton, being a real old Tory, would suggest that the crown was sovereign. We do not think the crown is sovereign, we think parliament is sovereign.

Som hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a false doctrine, but a Tory doctrine, that government is superior to parliament and, in the words of the Prime Minister, parliament is the puppet of a few cabinet ministers. That is something we thought was dead in this country. However, sir, I should like to come back to the bill.

An hon. Member: It is about time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, if the hon. gentlemen—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to this—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman think—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman can make his speech when I have finished mine. He has been of great assistance to me on previous occasions, but on this occasion I can do without that assistance. I suggest to you, sir, that this parliament, has the right to be told, and we have a duty as the opposition to use our resources in this parliament to find out, who are the individuals who will run this railway before we dispose of vast sums of money, millions of dollars, to unknown persons. Indeed, we should not dispose of these vast sums of money to unknown persons.

There is a second point, Mr. Speaker, which seems to me to be very relevant. That is that the government has responsibility for the management of the railway. The government is not charged with management, but parliament has charged the Canadian National Railways under the statute with management. However, the government has the responsibility for the management. The Minister of Finance has denied that the government has any responsibility in another field, but in this field I do not think even the Minister of Finance would deny that he has the ultimate responsibility to this parliament for the deficit. It is not Mr. Gordon who is responsible; the responsibility lies on the Minister of Finance. The government cannot escape that responsibility. If the government is to discharge that responsibility to this parliament as it should be discharged the government must have management of the railway in which it has confidence, and it must back up that management in the way it should be backed up, or it should get rid of it.

I remember very often Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, who had a very different conception of the relationship between the government and parliament and a very different conception of the responsibility of government for agencies under its control, saying in this house that we must either have confidence in the management of the railway or we must get a new management. That is the only proper way to do it, but this government will not do either. As my hon. friend from Laurier said, it expresses no confidence in the management. It refuses. It continues to sit by and listen to the backbenchers abuse Mr. Gordon and attack the management. It expresses no confidence in the management. It is true the Minister of Transport said that he liked Mr. Gordon and he got on very well with him, but he did not say "We have confidence in Mr. Gordon; we think he is the best man for the job, and we are backing him up".

Mr. Ricard: Do you?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not my affair; it is the government's affair. The government is responsible. Every time anybody in this house suggests that this government should take responsibility for something they reply, "Do you take responsibility for it?" Why, sir, the Prime Minister was in Winnipeg the other day, and according to news reports he is even blaming the Liberals for the drought. They just cannot take responsibility for anything, not even themselves.

The plain fact is, sir, that whatever one may feel about Mr. Gordon, he has been treated in a shocking way by this government, in what my hon. friend from Laurier has described over and over again as a disgraceful way. If they do not believe in Mr. Gordon, if they think he is no good, they do not need to keep him there; they can let him go and do something else. But if they do think he is the best man they should confirm his appointment and give him the necessary prestige and confidence to carry on this tremendous responsibility. It is a tremendous responsibility to run any railway these days, and to run this greatest of all the railways on the North American continent is one of the biggest jobs on this continent, and one of the most difficult. Surely, if we are going to have any kind of management at all, that management has got to be invested with the confidence and backing of the government.

Of course this is just part of a system. As one well known citizen of this country has said, this is just part of that systematic attack on all crown companies which seems to pervade the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not say that the members of the government themselves do it directly, but one knows something from long association with politics and long experience in parliament that the backbenchers do not talk the way they do, they do not make the kind of reports they do, if they are discouraged. I do not say they are encouraged.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): They do not have freedom in the Liberal party to say anything.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, of course, they start talking about Mr. Gordon being a Liberal appointee. Mr. Gordon's term expired in the autumn of 1957. In the autumn of 1957 this government reappointed him, and they reappointed him quite hastily. Of course they did not have a majority then. Perhaps they were a little more conscious then that parliament was sovereign and not the government, as the Prime Minister now says.

Mr. Churchill: Where did the Prime Minister say that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I read it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Churchill: You did not read it. I challenge you to read it.

Mr. Pickersgill: And he may read it himself again as often as he likes. I read to him from Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: You just twisted the words.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no getting around it; the Prime Minister said—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Ridiculous hypocrisy.

Mr. Pickersgill: —there could not be two sovereignties in this country, the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Churchill: He said no such thing.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You twisted it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen can try to put it straight if they like.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of privilege which affects every member of the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman has purported to read from Hansard words which are not in the order in which he read them out. This is an insult to the members of the House of Commons, because at page 7685 of Hansard the Prime Minister used these words:

> Sir, these letters reveal an attitude which, if accepted by the government, would result in two sovereignties in Canada, the government of Canada and the governor of the Bank of Canada; but not in that order.

The letters reveal an attitude which, if accepted, would result in two sovereignties in Canada, the government of Canada and the governor of the Bank of Canada; but not in that order. Now I protest, sir, against the statement of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the Prime Minister said that the government of Canada was sovereign. That is not there in the record.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —I rise on a point of order, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there is any need to make a point of it. The hon. member who has the floor is entitled to interpret the words in the sense in which he thinks they will support his argument, and it is open to other hon. members to give them any interpretation they wish. Actually the words have been read by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and members can draw their own conclusions as to their meaning. It is not a point of privilege to interpret the meaning of words which have been read to the house. As I follow what the hon. member has said, he is making an argument based on those words but he is not ascribing any words to the Prime Minister which have not been read.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I had the floor a moment ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just listened to a question of privilege raised by the house leader, and I hope I have disposed of it to the satisfaction of the house. If there is another question of privilege which the hon. member for Laurier and the Minister of Finance wish to raise I will hear them, of course.

Mr. Chevrier: I wanted to reply to the words of the house leader. Your Honour said you had disposed of the point; therefore I am perfectly satisfied to leave it at that. The Minister of Finance wants to put his oar in, too. If that is the case, then I want to continue with my point.

Mr. Speaker: I trust the matter has been disposed of. If hon. members disagree with the interpretation put on the words they will rise and make their own speeches.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank Your Honour for that, because I am making an argument when I say that these are the words of the Prime Minister, and nowhere in any of Mr. Coyne's letters will these words be found. These words are the Prime Minister's interpretation of Mr. Coyne's letters, and I take the Prime Minister's interpretation of Mr. Coyne's letters to mean that the Prime Minister feels that one of these two is sovereign or he would not have put it that way. I was extremely fair; when I was asked to read the words I read them. I say they betray the real bent of the Prime Minister's mind after four years in office; that the government is sovereign, not parliament.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This twisting is in the hon. gentleman's mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it was in his mind all along; perhaps even four years ago when he said "parliament, the puppet of a few cabinet ministers", he was looking forward to this day. I repeat, sir, there are two things that are shocking about the situation in which we find ourselves in relation to this present bill. The first is that we cannot find out, we are not told, whether the government has any confidence in the present day to day management of the railway, because that is what it is; and that is destructive of morale. The second point is that the government, which undertook as soon as the legislation was through to appoint the remaining directors and the chairman, has not carried out that undertaking to parliament, and is asking us to pass this legislation without that undertaking having been carried out.

Sir, in order to get the opinion of the house on this question I should like now to move an amendment to the second reading of this bill. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house declines to give second reading to a bill providing large sums for capital expenditures on the railway system while the house is not possessed of the identity of those, namely, the chairman and members of the board of directors, who will be responsible for the making of such expenditures".

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the amendment seems to me to be entirely out of order, because the house knows very well who are the chairman and members of the board of directors. They were appointed some time ago and under the statutes of this country are continuing in office. I am sure the house knows very well that Mr. Donald Gordon is president of the C.N.R., and the directors are readily ascertainable by anybody who wants to take the trouble to look up their names.

Mr. Chevrier: Does Your Honour wish to hear argument on this point?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is unnecessary if that is the only objection taken to the amendment. Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the speech just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I listened with equal interest to the several statements made on Saturday by some hon. members, notably the hon. member for Laurier. The issue before us at this moment is a simple one. We are being asked to provide very considerable sums of money under this bill which is to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1961, to the 30th day of June, 1962, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just contended that before voting these moneys we should learn from the administration what its intentions are with regard to the president, whoever he shall be, of the Canadian National Railways. We are also asking who are to be appointed to fill certain vacancies on the board of directors of this great national railway system. This is not an unusal request under any circumstances, but in the circumstances that now attend the situation with regard to the direction of this railroad I think our justification for asking for this information is great.

We are reminded that the term of office of the president of Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, expired some nine months ago, and that he has been carrying on, I think one may say, on sufferance during this period without any indication whether or not his term of office is to be extended of whether in fact he is to be reappointed for a fixed term under the statute. The Canadian National Railways is a large operation, the largest railway system in the world, yet for some reason this government refuses to indicate whether it proposes to continue the present president in the direction of this railroad. That is an impossible situation.

There are limits on the prerogatives, even by custom, to which a government can legitimately cling. No government can be forced to announce the appointment of a particular individual unless it has been given ample opportunity to make up its mind. But that cannot be contended in this case, because the definite term of the president expired nine months ago. Is it fair to this railway system, is it fair to this parliament, is it fair to this country that this uncertainty should prevail?

The hon. member for Bovavista-Twillingate says you have asked for certain moneys, and before those moneys are granted we are entitled to know who is going to direct the operations connected with the moneys to be appropriated under this bill. This is a reasonable request. I well remember, during the course of another debate this session, attacks were made on the president of the Canadian National Railways largely by members who sit behind the treasury benches. The Minister of Transport was finally prevailed upon to come to the defence of an official who serves under him.

It took some pressure to convince the Minister of Transport that it was not fair for a minister to refrain from commenting on attacks that had been made on an official who reports to parliament through him. Finally, after a long and protracted debate, the Minister of Transport manfully acknowledged that as far as he was concerned he had nothing but high commendation for the president of Canadian National Railways. But he qualified his tribute by saying "as far as I am concerned". The hon. gentleman did to an extent meet the tradition that it is always incumbent upon a minister to defend a public official with whom he has official connections, but the minister would not go further than to say "as far as I am concerned".

What we are entitled to know now is what is the regard that this government has for the president of Canadian National Railways? It can express its view as to his competence by giving us some definite indication of what it intends to do by way of reappointment or by way of replacement, but surely we are entitled to have this information. Why has the government not made up its mind, if that is the situation? If it has made up its mind, why should it not tell this house? If it has not made up its mind, then it surely owes to parliament some explanation for this long delay in determining if Mr. Donald Gordon is the kind of man it wishes to see continued as the president of Canadian National Railways.

There is a further principle involved. It is connected with other situations that have nothing to do, of course, with the operation of the railroad. It is that more and more in this country there is a growing feeling, justified or not, that the government is not satisfied with the heads of certain crown corporations, with certain leading public servants.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the course which the hon. member is following is relevant to this fairly narrow question. The question is the voting of funds for Canadian National Railways and the amendment has placed before the house a very precise reason for not voting those funds, namely, that the house has not been given the names of the chairman and members who will have responsibility for making expenditures. I would think that to discuss the views of the country at large on the government's attitude toward other public servants is not relevant to this issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot quarrel with the position that you take, except that this was not my main argument. I was surely entitled, in commenting upon the substance of what I have to say, to relate my remarks to the general disquiet which I believe exists with regard to the government's treatment of certain public officials of our country. It was only in that context that I had made my observations.

We have been told in another place by one distinguished senator who happens to be the president of the Progressive Conservative party, that the government has intentions with regard to the division of functions at the top of the management of Canadian National Railways. The suggestion has been made that the office of president will be filled by one individual and that he will not continue as chairman of the board. This is a very important announcement to have come from someone who may be close to the administration but has no official functions whatever in so far as the government of Canada is concerned. We are entitled to know whether or not that announcement of policy from that quarter represents what the government really has in mind.

Does the government intend to divide the functions, as was announced by Senator Thorvaldson or was Senator Thorvaldson talking through his hat? Was he talking with justification or had he been informed of this by the government? Surely it is not treating parliament fairly to suggest that that kind of announcement can be made in another place but that we may not expect any comment on it from a member of the government in this chamber. Surely we are entitled to know, not only if the present president is going to be continued in office, but whether his functions are going to be divided as Senator Thorvaldson indicated.

The Minister of Transport is now in his seat. He has not had the advantage of listening to the earlier part of the discussion. I would tell him, therefore, that we have been arguing here, notably today through the rather moderate but vigorous statement of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who has presented an amendment, that before we accede to the request for certain moneys as contained in this bill we should be advised what the government's intentions are with regard to continuing in the office of president the present incumbent. We have pointed out that nine months have elapsed since the term of Mr. Gordon came to an end, and that it is wholly irresponsible for the government, after nine months, not to be in a position to indicate what its intentions are as to the replacement of Mr.

Gordon or his continuing in office or dividing the functions at the top level of the management of the railroad system.

How long does the government intend to allow this situation of uncertainty to persist? Is there any obligation on the government to make up its mind with regard to this matter? I will admit that the Minister of Transport has not been minister of transport very long.

Mr. Churchill: But he is very effective.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish some other ministers were equally effective. I am not going to name the Minister of Veterans Affairs when I say that, but I simply say I wish the Minister of Transport had some other colleagues who deserved the designation the Minister of Veterans Affairs says applies in this particular case.

The Minister of Transport has not been in office for the full period of these nine months. However, he has been in office now long enough to know what the situation is. He, himself, has said he has confidence in the present president of Canadian National Railways. He made that statement, as I pointed out a few minutes ago, only after considerable prodding. He will remember that for two days strong criticism had been levelled in this house against Mr. Gordon, notably by hon. gentlemen who sit behind the minister. It was only after we had pointed out repeatedly that there was an obligation on the part of the minister either to agree with those criticisms or to defend the president of the railway, that the minister's statement was made. If he agreed with the criticisms, then it was clear what the responsibility of the government with regard to Mr. Gordon must be. The minister is satisfied. He has given the present president full endorsation. No one could have paid a more generous tribute to the competence of Mr. Gordon than did the Minister of Transport.

What we are entitled to know today is whether or not that tribute in appreciation of Mr. Gordon's competence is shared by his colleagues in the government, and whether or not they intend to continue that gentleman in office. This is the gist of the amendment that is before the house at the present time. The amendment deals also with the members of the board of directors who have yet to be appointed. I ask the Minister of Transport, and I ask the Minister of Finance—I would simply say in passing that if the Minister of Finance feels he is being unduly detained in this house, and on that account cannot accept the invitation which has been extended to him in the other place—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been no invitation, so do not litter the record again with untruths.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is untrue?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What you just said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me repeat what I have said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, are we going to discuss this bill or are we going to have a discussion based on the misstatement just uttered?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't be so sensitive.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would do well not to bring in what is a purely extraneous matter and is certainly not an uncontroversial one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not catch that last observation, Mr. Speaker, and I like to hear what you say.

Mr. Speaker: I was just observing that it would be well for the hon. member not to bring in purely extraneous matters and which, as he has observed, are not uncontroversial.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just observing, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Transport is here now—

Mr. Speaker: I know what the hon. member was observing, and I was asking him not to observe that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just observing that the Minister of Transport is now in his place, and if the Minister of Finance who has, after all, been under considerable fire now for many days in this house, feels that he wishes to attend—

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member appears to be deliberately following what I suggested to him was not a proper course to take. I trust that he will accept the responsibility of the Chair for some determination of what course this debate should take.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not going to pursue the point, Mr. Speaker, except to say, with great respect, that I find it difficult to accede to that suggestion. But under the circumstances there may be some other way of dealing with it. I would think it was most extraordinary that in the course of the debate one was precluded from saying to an hon. member that he could absent himself for particular purposes. I find it difficult to accede to the suggestion that such is not the case. However, I have such great respect for Your Honour and for the sensitivity of all the circumstances implied in what I have said that, for the time being, I am prepared to pass on to my plea to the Minister of Transport. In doing so, however, I cannot help but note how sensitive the Minister of Finance is. I say this to the Minister of Transport. Surely he cannot now take the position that he can go on denying to us knowledge of the government's intention, particularly when we are now approaching the end of the present session or the present portion of this session of parliament. Is the government going to take the position that it will make an announcement with regard to the president of the railroad and the nomination of the new directors after parliament will have risen and before parliament returns? Is the government going to take advantage of that interval to announce if Mr. Gordon is going to be retained and who the new directors are? If that is the decision the government proposes to take I will say now that it will be a demonstration of this government's disregard for parliament. Or let the minister tell us frankly, "We are not in a position to announce it. We have certain considerations in mind that have not yet been realized. We cannot tell the house who the new president is going to be or whether Mr. Gordon is going to be continued or who the new directors are to be." Let the minister take the house into his confidence. But to deny us this information at this time is incomprehensible.

Let the people of this country recognize and recall the fact that we are not asking for something to be settled that has only suddenly arisen but rather something that has been in existence now for almost nine months. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate took the position that before money was granted parliament had the right to know who was going to be the head of the Canadian National Railways. This morning we were told by the Prime Minister that the government had not yet decided who was going to be the president. When is that matter going to be decided? Are we then going to be denied this information only to be confronted when we leave here with a revelation of information that is now being denied to the house? Some hon. members who are new to this chamber find it irritating to find those of us in the Liberal opposition persistently making arguments of this kind. If they will look over the record of Hansard they will see the kind of arguments that were made by the present Minister of Finance and the present Prime Minister, without having anything like the justification that attends us in this particular instance. Because we are asking for what I think it is our duty to ask, we are being criticized and hon. members opposite find our interventions irritating and annoying. They may be annoying and they may be irritating but these are the instruments which an opposition is entitled to use in order to elicit from a reluctant executive information which the public and parliament are entitled to have.

An hon. Member: A filibuster.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "a filibuster". I do not say that this applies to him in particular but among hon. gentlemen sitting around him there are those who know the meaning of filibuster when we think of the way in which private members of the Conservative party during this session held up government business and are partly responsible for the fact that this is the longest session on record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let no private member in the Conservative party talk about a filibuster. They have filibustered important legislation in this house as no other group has ever done, I suppose, in the history of parliament. We think of the filibustering on A.R.D.A., a bill which was introduced by the Minister of Agriculture and which does nothing for the farmers of Canada in the short term. We think of all of those instances of filibuster. Let no one suggest that we in the Liberal party are filibustering. If we are filibustering—

An hon. Member: You are just blustering.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —we are filibustering with justification.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I see the hon. member for Regina City in his place. Does he not think that we are entitled to know after nine months, when the term of office of the president of the railroad has expired? Are we not entitled, or is he not entitled as a representative of the people of Regina, to know who the next head of the Canadian National Railways is going to be?

Mr. More: I can ask my own questions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are we entitled to vote moneys when this information is denied us?

An hon. Member: Have you any recommendations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I see the hon. member for Cornwall who has just come in. He is a member of this house. He represents people in this parliament. What explanation is he going to offer to his constituents, people who are putting up taxes, who are putting up money that ultimately finds its way into the exchequer of the Canadian National Railways? The people of Cornwall want to know.

Mr. Drysdale: Do you want Gordon fired?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now we hear from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Essex East seems to be making some reference to me. I made no interjection or comment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I mean the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In dealing with the question of privilege may I request the co-operation of hon. members on my left but beyond the speaker who seem to be diverting the hon. member for Essex East from the main path of his argument.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In this instance, Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty in readily accepting what you have suggested, although I must say that I find these diversions somewhat helpful. I asked the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond this question. How will he justify on going back to his constituents, voting millions of dollars to the Canadian National Railways and not having joined with the rest of us in ascertaining from the government who is to be head of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Drysdale: It is very easy because I know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says he knows. Oh, now we have it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman says he knows.

Mr. Drysdale: Just read the annual report of the C.N.R.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly the information given to the other place by Senator Thorvaldson who said that the office of president was going to be divided, that the person who was president would not continue to act as chairman of the board of governors. That was an announcement of policy made in the other place. We have been asking in this house for a confirmation of that announcement by the president of the Progressive Conservative party and yet we have not been able to obtain any information in that particular from the minister. Now from the generous and amiable member from Burnaby-Richmond we learn that he knows who is going to be the next president.

Mr. Drysdale: Read the annual report.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We now learn that he knows whether or not the present president is going to be continued. That can mean only one thing, namely that he as a member of the Conservative party has been given information by the members of the government—by the Minister of Finance, by the Minister of Transport—perhaps in caucus, which information is being denied to parliament.

Mr. Drysdale: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot hear the hon. member from that place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think if the hon. member wishes to raise a question of privilege the house ought to accord him that right, even though he finds it convenient not to be in his place.

An hon. Member: Put him in his place.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In the first place I might say I object strenuously, as I indicated earlier, to this matter of seating, but I understand it is under review by the committee of the house. The point I wanted to raise and direct to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East is that the information I was conveying to him is readily available to all hon. members—in fact, to the rest of the world—because it is in the Canadian National annual report, which indicates that Mr. Donald Gordon is the president. This should answer the question contained in this very important motion raised at this time.

Mr. Crestohl: Who is the chairman of the board?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the hon. member, who has crossed the chamber to sit in a seat he prefers, will recognize that he has not raised a question of privilege. However I do not make any comment on that. I can understand what the hon. member is trying to do in not being in his seat; he is trying to get as far away as he can from the ministerial benches. I can well understand why.

The situation is quite clear. In the face of what has been alleged today I hope the Minister of Transport, who comes to this debate fresh, perhaps with information which is not now in the possession of the Minister of Finance, will be able to give us the information to which we are entitled. He was not in the house when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate read his amendment and therefore I should like to read it again:

> This house declines to give second reading to a bill providing large sums for capital expenditures on the railway system while the house is not possessed of the identity of those, namely, the chairman and members of the board of directors, who will be responsible for the making of such expenditures.

Our request, our justified demand is embodied in the terms of this amendment and by no contrivance possible can the ministry justify refusing to give the house this information. The government is entitled to these moneys in support of the railway, but there must be an answer to our questions. To ask us to vote moneys when the government does not know who is going to head the railway, or when it refuses to give this information, is wholly irresponsible and is in keeping with the disregard for parliament which this government continues to demonstrate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house did not need to be told by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that he and his colleagues are conducting a filibuster. That was perfectly well known to all hon. members of the house. Before they carry on their filibuster any longer, Mr. Speaker, I think I should say something to them about the consequences of their filibuster.

It is essential for the provision of the funds required by the Canadian National Railways that this measure should be carried without delay. We have now had the measure before us at the resolution stage and the bill stage. I think this is the third day it has been under discussion.

Mr. McIlraith: Why did you not bring it in earlier?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is plenty of opportunity for anyone who has anything serious to say about the bill to do so; but there is no opportunity for filibuster on this bill or intentional delay unless such hon. members as are participating in that intentional delay and obstruction wish to see the operations of the Canadian National Railways hampered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I make that statement, Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding of the situation. There will be opportunity for fair discussion, serious discussion, but there is not time for wilful obstruction and filibuster.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Give us the information for which we are asking.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The information hon. members need to have will be forthcoming in answers to inquiries they may wish to make on the clauses of the bill. That information will be forthcoming. But I just wish to sound this word of warning to hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If they are thinking about prolonging an obvious filibuster I am giving them due warning now that the operations of the Canadian National Railways are going to suffer. That happens to be the fact. If they wish to continue to be irresponsible about this and ignore the position of the Canadian National Railways and the need on the part of the Canadian National Railways for having the financial provisions this bill contains for the railway, they can go ahead and do injustice to the Canadian National Railways and deprive that crown corporation of the provisions it needs from this bill.

The situation is just that, Mr. Speaker. So they can make their choice now between going gaily ahead with their filibuster and denying to the Canadian National Railways provisions which that company now requires, or on the other hand they can deal responsibly with the bill. We can have a serious and sensible discussion without obvious delay, endless repetition, deliberate filibuster and obstruction.

An hon. Member: That is too much to expect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members opposite seem to think that just by sheer repetition they are going to compel the government to embark upon—

Mr. Pickersgill: To make up its mind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —a course that is not within the power of the government to follow at this moment without further steps being taken. They are demanding—demanding, Mr. Speaker—that the government should tell them who are going to be appointed to the additional places on the board of directors of Canadian National Railways as provided by legislation passed through this house several weeks ago.

They are demanding also that the government should take some action with respect to the term of the existing principal executive officer, the president and chairman of the corporation. Let me say this, that the appointments of those additional directors have not been made.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They cannot be made until the legislation has been proclaimed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ridiculous.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The legislation has not been proclaimed, and I doubt if under the existing pressure of business in this house there is any use of hon. members thinking for one minute that the legislation is going to be proclaimed and those appointments made this week. In resorting to that kind of demand they are just exposing their own intention to filibuster and delay this measure. Every hon. member knows that the president and chairman is in office; he is carrying on as he has heretofore.

When the bill is proclaimed and it becomes then appropriate to make the appointments, those appointments will be made. But hon. members opposite merely delude themselves if they think that by conducting a filibuster of this kind and hurling abuse at this side of the house they are going to accomplish their purpose.

I wish to be understood. I am speaking very plainly, Mr. Speaker, to the opposition and I am telling them that if they think they are going to accomplish the purpose they profess to have by this filibuster, they are not going to succeed. They are simply going to deprive the Canadian National Railways of the arrangements that this bill proposes to make for the railway and which the railway requires.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard from the lips of the Minister of Finance an indictment of the government the like of which we have not heard for some time. I invite hon. members to consider the argument of the minister. He accused the opposition of a filibuster because one hon. member had dared to speak in support of an amendment that was offered to this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): About 15 speeches on Saturday, and endless repetition.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance would observe the courtesies and rules of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, tell the truth.

Mr. McIlraith: I will tell the precise truth, and not follow the precedent set by the Minister of Finance in that respect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Tell the whole truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is the Minister of Finance to be talking about telling the truth?

Mr. McIlraith: I will tell the whole truth and, therefore, not follow the precedent set by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are telling only part of it.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Finance persists in this course of interjecting. That is a course to which I have no objection if he has the ability to make his interjections relevant or pointed, or if he makes them with some skill or dexterity. However, if they are mere clumsy, repetitious statements on his part I should ask him to desist until his turn comes to speak.

The minister accuses the opposition of filibustering this measure for having dared to have one speaker speak in support of this motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what I said. You had a dozen speakers on Saturday.

Mr. McIlraith: Your remarks are on the record and the record will speak for itself.

An hon. Member: It sure will.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Finance then made the threat that further discussion in respect to this bill would in some way jeopardize the position of the Canadian National Railways, because it would not have the funds available for this capital work. Let me point out to him that if that is so he owes an apology to the House of Commons for coming to parliament with this legislation so late. If what he has said is true, and is the whole truth, as he put it, then the government has failed in its responsibility in bringing this legislation forward so late that it cannot be considered properly by the house.

To show just how far the minister has gone let me say this. When my desk mate, the hon. member for Essex East was speaking in support of the amendment to the motion, the minister referred to his argument as an inane argument. I should like to follow up the hon. minister's remarks in that regard.

Let me analyse just exactly what he is asking this government to do. He is asking this house to approve a bill providing some $178,900,000 for the Canadian National Railways for purposes more particularly set out in the bill. I remind the Minister of Finance that that represents $10 out of the pocket of each citizen of Canada; those who work, those who are too young to work, and those who are unable to work because of illness. That is the magnitude of this bill. The amount of money asked for is the equivalent of $30 from the pocket of each member of the labour force. That is the amount he is asking the taxpayers to provide this year as well as that enormous amount of money required to offset the budget deficit.

Surely this is a matter of major importance to the citizens of this country. Surely if the Minister of Finance is asking the taxpayers to make this substantial contribution out of their earnings in one year he has an obligation to tell the taxpayers why he wants that money, because this bill certainly has the effect of arbitrarily taking that money from them.

If the Minister of Finance is going to tell the whole truth, as he refers to it, is he going to tell the taxpayers that he will not inform them who is going to be in charge of spending this vast amount of money? Is he not going to tell them who is to be responsible? Is he going to tell them if they search through the statute books they will find there a board of directors and a chairman of the board, but that he will not tell them who they are? Is he going to tell them that this government will not indicate what its policy is in this regard? Is he going to tell them that if they look at the statute and read it carefully they will find that the government has the right to make these appointments but that the government is going to take this money from the taxpayers without telling them who the management is to be, and only after the government has received the money will it then tell who is to manage the railway?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Parliament be damned.

Mr. McIlraith: Surely that is not a responsible way to treat the taxpayers of Canada. Surely that is not a responsible way to treat the members of the House of Commons who, in the final analysis, are nothing more or less than those individuals elected by the voters of Canada to represent the taxpayers. Surely it is not inane to ask the Minister of Finance to reveal the policy of the government in this regard and to reveal the government's action before parliament joins in taking this very large sum of money from the taxpayers for this purpose.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance becomes very wrathful about these things and wonders why we should dare to defend the right of parliament to have this information. He wonders why we should dare to try to maintain the responsibility of parliament. He wonders why we should attempt to make the government answerable to parliament. According to his theory the government is apparently no longer answerable to parliament. But that is a question which will be resolved at some time or another in the future. However, I warn the minister that if he persists in this high handed, arbitrary and arrogant method of dealing with parliament he must be prepared to accept the consequences.

Earlier this session when the opposition presented an amendment to a supply motion on February 20 and February 21 having to do with monetary policy there was reference made to the head of an institution very much occupying public attention today. On that occasion the Minister of Finance defended the head of that institution at some length. I remember the argument very well because I intervened in it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. McIlraith: I am wondering today, in regard to this debate on the railway bill, why the Minister of Transport is not bearing the burden of the argument in presenting this bill. Maybe he has not had a chance because of the Minister of Finance, but whatever the reason he is not bearing that burden.

The Minister of Transport has made it clear that the government proposes to appoint promptly the members to the board of the directors of the Canadian National Railways and also that the chairman of the board had the support of the government. This was exactly the pattern followed by the Minister of Finance in that other connection. Then the Prime Minister entered the picture. I am wondering if in a few weeks the Minister of Transport will not be forced to take the same type of action vis-à-vis the four directors whose term of office is expiring shortly, and the chairman of the board of directors, as the Minister of Finance was forced to take a few weeks ago vis-à-vis the head of the Bank of Canada. It seems to me that is the kind of situation we are confronted with today. I believe we would be remiss in our duty if we did not press the government of the day to give an explanation regarding the appointment of the men who will be responsible for the direction and administration of this great railway system. Surely that elementary information should be given before this money is provided. I suggest it is an impertinence on the part of the government to go to the taxpayers of Canada and take from them this vast sum of money without giving that information. It is an impertinence to parliament for the Minister of Finance to submit this bill without being ready and willing to give such information.

For my part I completely repudiate the criticism of the Minister of Finance that we are conducting an obvious filibuster. I regard the proceedings in respect to this legislation and the way in which this government is putting it through as an obvious demonstration of arrogance on the part of the government toward parliament. I regard it as the duty of members of parliament to endeavour to obtain this information before this large sum of money is provided from the taxpayers' pockets.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had little intention of speaking on this matter but I arrived in the chamber just in time to hear the proposed amendment. I like to think that I usually speak in moderate terms but I find it difficult to do so this afternoon because, quite frankly, I find it impossible to understand how a serious man could propose such an amendment.

Why do I say that? I say that because although I was not on the railway committee this year I was on the committee for a good many years. I have heard representations made by the president of the railway and his staff. I have taken part in the deliberations of the committee.

We have then had this measure following, the committee reports, and I suggest it is practically a routine measure.

Mr. McIlraith: A measure having to do with $180 million?

Mr. Macdonnell: Do not let us be led astray by the fact that there are large amounts of money involved. The question is whether this proposal has come before us with the proper authorization. This proposal comes to us from the railway. It does not creep up out of the ground. It has not come in any accidental way. It has been approved by the board of the railway, and the president of the railway came and presented it; then it was discussed by a responsible committee of this house. It was then reduced to legislation and it comes to us with the imprimatur of that committee. In that sense, as I said, it is routine. I have sat on the other side of the house and I have taken part in discussion of this legislation and I have made comments on it but I do not think it ever occurred to me previously that we were acting in an almost irresponsible way and asking the House of Commons to dig up huge amounts of money. What I thought we were doing was coming to the House of Commons, following the careful and responsible sittings of the railway committee, such as took place this year. What is suggested? It is suggested that by reason of an accident, an accidental situation, namely that there are four directors still to be appointed and that the president's appointment, which has expired, has not been repeated yet, in some way that means that we should not vote the amount. It is difficult to understand, as I say, why reasonable men would suggest that. Do they think if we do not know the names today that we will wake up tomorrow morning and find that a lot of third-rate people have been appointed to this board?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question? He has said this is a routine matter and in the context he employed that may be the case; but does the hon. gentleman deny that we in the opposition are justified in asking if the president will be continued in office, particularly in view of the fact that his term expired nine months ago, and that hon. gentlemen opposite have criticized him and the government itself has not defended him? In these circumstances are we not entitled to ask, and make as a condition precedent to our vote, that the government tell us what they intend to do with regard to filling the post of president of the railway?

Mr. Macdonnell: Of course you are entitled to ask. You have asked it a dozen times. I have never objected to your trying to do that. Incidentally, I have spoken in favour of the president of the railway. I think he is a great executive. That is another matter. It has nothing whatever to do with this. I maintain that these two things are just as far apart as the east is from the west. We have here a bill which came to us following the deliberations of a serious committee. It is a thing which, as I say, is routine, and in the sense in which I use the terms the hon. member admits it. It comes up every year. Are hon. members to say that because there are still four directors to be appointed and the president's appointment has not yet been continued the money is not to be spent but is to be held back? As I say, it is difficult for me to understand how serious men would ever make such a proposal, it is such a trivial argument. One might go on and argue that the eight men who are on that board now no doubt, were a party to these amounts being produced before the committee and that the committee sent on the measure now before us. Incidentally, those eight men would still be an effective majority on the board. However, that is a trivial argument and I do not make much of that. I return to my original point. This is a measure in the ordinary course of business, sanctioned by our practice year after year. In my view it is trivial to suggest that this measure should not be passed because we have not got the full list of members of the board of directors. Do we think that a lot of wild men are going to be appointed? Do we think that some men utterly incompetent to run the railway are going to be appointed? No, of course we do not.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself briefly to this motion. On July 7 we heard the Prime Minister say that civil servants like children should be seen and not heard. Today, July 11, we heard the Minister of Finance go one step further and enunciate the principle that the opposition like children should be seen and not heard.

An hon. Member: You are one.

Mr. Matheson: As an example, the Minister of Finance mentioned the subject of filibuster. We are reminded of what happened on Friday, June 20 last, when there was introduced by the same Minister of Transport who appears here today a measure to provide for the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories for the Canadian National Railway company involving a proposed expenditure of something of the order of $86 million. On that occasion, sir, in order to be co-operative, there was a minimum of discussion on this side of the house. The hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West spoke briefly agreeing, in effect, to the proposition as put forward in order that business proceed. Thereafter, sir, we had lengthy speeches by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), which speech appears at page 7322 of Hansard; then the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), at page 7326; then the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Biggs) at page 7327; then the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent), at page 7330; and then the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock), at page 7333 and he concluded only because it was five o'clock. I submit that a study of those pages of Hansard indicates that this administration was not prepared to proceed with real business that day. We sat and listened to congratulatory speeches which contained nothing serious at all. I refer to the time-wasting speeches that were made in this house on that bill after the hon. member for Kootenay West concluded his remarks.

Now, sir, this is not a theoretical railroad to the Northwest Territories; it is the C.N.R., the most important link in our nation. It is one of the most important instruments of our economy and of our way of life. Surely we have the right to question the administration on some of these matters, having in mind the context of other developments in the last few weeks. These things cannot be forgotten when we ask questions now. We do not know who is going to preside over this great business in our country today. I point out, sir, this is not a case of railway business simply seen in isolation. The economic value of the C.N.R. to our community is determined not by the railway's income account and balance sheet but by the social dividends the community receives in reduced costs of transportation. The primary dividend is the money saved by using rail transport rather than any other kind of transport. I am reading these words from the study of the Canadian National Railways, volume I, by G. R. Stevens.

You will recall, sir, that Mr. Gordon received his appointment on January 1, 1950. When he took over from his eminent and worthy predecessor, Robert Charles Vaughan, there was a deficit from the preceding year of $42 million. By great energy and devotion the new president was able to reduce that deficit immediately to something slightly over $3 million. It increased to $15 million, and thereafter for two years he was able to operate this great line at a surplus to this country. There was a slight deficit in 1954 and then for two years, until this government took over, we were operating in the black. Commencing in 1957 we find the situation where the railroad under this administration starts to slip. But what didn't slip? From a deficit of approximately $29 million they now creep up to the end of 1960 with a deficit of $67,497,000. Nevertheless under Mr. Gordon's administration we have been able to increase our operating revenues by 38 per cent and at the same time increase the average hourly earnings per employee by over 77 per cent.

We know nothing about what is going to happen in the future. We are seriously and earnestly concerned about what is going to happen to perhaps the greatest industry of our country, an industry not only important for its own sake but because it is the framework, the sinew, the arterial system for everything else in Canada. Probably there are no two things as important to the general prosperity as transportation and currency. These are the reasons why we rise today, not for the purpose of delaying the house but to put before parliament legitimately some of those problems that are very much in the minds of members of the opposition if not in the minds of members of the administration.

Mr. J. Edgar Fournier (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, before I embark on the subject that is before us today I should like to make a few remarks in my native tongue.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in any discussion during this session which, I think, could be adjourned any moment now, but instead I wanted to listen, observe and take my bearings. So, I am not following the tradition of this house according to which the maiden speech of a new member should deal mainly with his constituency. I defer that to some later occasion. In the meantime, I will endeavour to set the record straight about the Restigouche-Madawaska election. In fact, Hansard contains some erroneous remarks made by certain opposition members.

Mr. Speaker, I do not need to acquaint the house today with the Restigouche-Madawaska constituency. For years, that constituency was neglected and forgotten by Liberal representatives, but my predecessor, Mr. Van Horne, took it out of the Liberal party muck to restore it to its lawful place. I am determined to see to it that it retains that place.

(Text):

I have sat in the house for 17 days, Mr. Speaker, and, as I said in French a minute ago, I have been making observations and listening to the debates. Sometimes I have found them very interesting and instructive, especially when the speakers have been on the government side, but I am afraid that I cannot pay the same compliment to the opposition as on many occasions their arguments are shocking, degrading and do not add to the dignity of the house, especially when the frontbenchers are trying to overrule the Speaker.

In listening to this debate on the C.N.R. I am sure my knowledge is very limited as I was not privileged to attend the committee meetings. However, I should like to make a few observations. My riding of Restigouche-Madawaska used to have two major C.N.R. railway centres, Edmundston and Campbellton. They were two divisional points with a great number of people employed there but today they are largely ghost shops.

In the early fifties under Liberal management an overnight transformation to diesel power took place which should have been carried out at a much slower rate in order to save millions of horsepower. I am referring to steam engines, most of which were practically new but had to go to the scrap pile at the expense of the taxpayers. If the transformation had been carried out more slowly management would have had ample time to transfer some of the men to other departments instead of throwing them out on the street without jobs. The machinery to bring about this sudden transformation was established under the Liberal administration.

Today the government is rebuilding those two centres. I wish to compliment the government on the new station which has been built at Edmundston, a station which was in the Liberal platform for some 30 years. It was built by this government in 1959 and included a freight shed which had also been promised by the Liberals. In Campbellton a complete new transformation is to be started in the near future.

There is one major problem, Mr. Speaker, which seems to puzzle me and to puzzle all the taxpayers of Canada. It is the difference between authority and management. Last Friday in the house some hon. members made reference to some dispute involving the private trucking companies and competition in the trucking business by the C.N.R. The answer given by the Minister of Transport was, "This is a decision for the authorities".

I have no doubt that this good and conscientious minister has inherited such a situation as a result of 22 long years of Liberal administration when authorities, management, administrations and politicians were all riding in the same private car. My question to you, sir, is this. Are we asked to vote several hundred millions of dollars to be spent by this so-called authority while at the same time we, the government members, not the opposition, have no authority as to where and how such expenditures will be made?

I am sure everyone in this house will agree that somewhere along the line there is confusion, and under our democratic system I am sure that those elected by the majority vote of the taxpayers, who have been given the responsibility by the taxpayers to vote these moneys, should have some authority with regard to how and where they will be spent. If not, then some better understanding should be in order.

There are many instances I could mention at this time where the so-called responsible authorities in the C.N.R. have cost the taxpayers of Canada thousands of dollars, if not millions. There is concrete evidence that authorities, administration and management are not working hand in hand to save public money. I know these are matters for committee meetings, Mr. Speaker, and I will not discuss them further now.

There is more than money involved in administration. Such things are involved as co-ordination of various departments, duplication of services, spending within the revenue, and public relations, and on the last topic I wish to make a few comments.

Every time the working force of the C.N.R. has received an increase in salary or an adjustment of some sort through the efforts of their unions the price has always been a mass lay-off that followed. This, Mr. Speaker, is again a sign of poor administration. If those men were needed before the increase in salaries why were they not needed after the increase was granted, or were they fired for political motives or motives of revenge? If the management of the C.N.R. would put half the effort they are now expending on firing employees on the promotion of jobs we would have better public relations than exist now between the employees and the management.

But what can we do? Under the long regime of Liberal administration the C.N.R. got out of control and it will take some time to bring it back to where it should be. Let this so-called authority not forget that under our democratic system our elected members of the government are the ones who are responsible to the people, that the elected members of the government are responsible to the people of Canada and that the so-called authority is only authority under the duly elected members of the government.

The C.N.R. is Canada's largest business. It is spread from coast to coast and involves all classes of society and all walks of life. Again, I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur, as found on page 7740 of Hansard, when he quoted Mr. G. R. Stevens as having said:

> The economic value of a railway to the community is determined not by the railway's income account and balance sheet, but by the social dividends the community receives from the reduced cost of transportation.

I would add that it is also determined by the services rendered to the community and I think this is the most important criterion. We have no objection to voting the necessary funds to keep this railroad operating for the welfare of the community and to offer a balanced service throughout the country, but we do take strong objection to voting money which will be spent by irresponsible so-called authorities. I refer again to the matter of trucking which I mentioned a while ago. I would suggest that for some time yet the C.N.R. should not go too strongly into the trucking business but rather should approach the matter with moderation. Since last year's operations were not too successful, and before we find ourselves with another hungry child which will have to be fed with taxpayers' money, I would suggest that effort should be made by the railways to keep their box cars filled and moving on the railroad, rather than moving them onto our highways.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that my three weeks in this house have revealed some things to me which I never expected to see and of which I am sure the people of Canada are not aware. I refer to the behaviour of the opposition in this house and to some statements made in this house about this bill. Who do they think they are, Mr. Speaker? Do they think they are still the government? Do they not remember the shocking events of 1957 and the disaster of 1958 when the people of Canada told them on what side of the house to sit for some time to come? This time may prove to be much longer than they expect if they continue to filibuster the proceedings of this house. If the people of Canada could only see them. No one will deny that Liberal politics have been placed ahead of the interests of the country at the taxpayers' expense.

Is this government responsible to the opposition or is it responsible to the people of Canada? Is the Canadian National responsible to the government or to the opposition? Who makes the appointments to the Canadian National Railways, the government or the opposition? Who runs the affairs of the country, the government or the opposition? Let us vote on this bill and let us keep a close watch on the expenses. In closing, let me remind my hon. friends of the opposition that instead of giving advice to this house they should direct their efforts to organizing their own camp.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I feel I must heartily congratulate—

Mr. Parizeau: Here is the shining light of the opposition.

Mr. Denis: —the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Fournier) who has just delivered his maiden speech in this House of Commons.

I congratulate him all the more heartily as his speech did not hurt the Liberal opposition very much. I express the wish that at least after the next election, he will put his vast knowledge to the service of his country, not in this parliament, but rather in his province or his municipality.

We note that at the last by-election, the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska obtained a majority of some 900 votes. Whereas, in 1958, his predecessor had obtained a majority of about 4,000 votes. I am sure that is not due to the candidate.

Mr. Fournier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wish to rectify right now an error that has crept into the debate and that I wanted to correct later.

My friend just said that I obtained a majority of only 900 or 960 votes. In fact, it was 1,022 votes. On the other hand, if we go back to the 1958 election, it is to be noted that 7,000 Liberals had voted for the present government. So, the majority I obtained is not 960, but 7,000 votes.

Mr. Denis: I am ready to concede a few thousand votes to the hon. member, to please his imagination, but after the next election, the situation will not be the same.

Mr. Parizeau: You will not even be in this house.

Mr. Denis: In any event, if the hon. member's majority has declined, we must not necessarily believe it is his fault; it is rather that of the present administration, of the present government, in other words of the hon. members forming the government.

Mr. Parizeau: The hon. member for St. Denis will lose his deposit at the next election.

Mr. Denis: It is too bad the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was not here when the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) made their speeches. He could then have realized that it is the Conservative members who are filibustering on this bill.

For some time, the government has been threatening everybody. Nobody is allowed to make any speech, to criticize the government, to oppose its views.

For some time, Mr. Speaker, the government has been asking that everything goes according to its views, to its fancies. It will not allow the opposition to criticize the policy of the government, which for four years has been made up of confusion, obstruction, vision and contradiction.

I do not know what is happening now but even this bill is not supported by each and every Conservative member. Some are in favour, some are against. In a word, nobody knows where we are going. Does the government support its backbenchers who are criticizing Mr. Gordon? Does the government support Mr. Gordon? Does it reject him? We do not know.

And we are asked to vote the considerable amount of $178 million without being told whether Mr. Gordon will remain in his position or whether he will be fired.

If we are to believe the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), Mr. Gordon is public enemy No. 1 in this country. He is asking nothing less than his resignation, as we can see at page 6039 of Hansard, where the hon. member charges Mr. Gordon with being autocratic.

He is enemy No. 1 of national unity.

He asks the government not to renew Mr. Gordon's mandate.

If those assertions are accurate, what is the government waiting for? If they were accurate last year, why did it not act last year? If they were accurate two years ago, why did it not act two years ago.

The president of the Canadian National Railways is managing millions, hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers, should I say, since the railway shows a deficit every year and that president is hired only from day to day.

His term of office is over. We do not know whether he is going to be president of the C.N.R. tomorrow or the day after tomorrow. And in spite of that, we are asked to vote a sum of $178 million without knowing who is going to see to it that the amount is well spent.

Mr. Speaker, suppose you are a shareholder of a company. You would certainly like to know who would manage the thousands of dollars you would invest in it.

Mr. Parizeau: It certainly would not be the Liberals.

Mr. Denis: It seems but reasonable and fair that the country be told now, before a sum of $178 million is committed to the care of an unknown individual. The house is entitled to know who will be president and also the names of the five new directors the government intends to appoint. We do not know where we are going. We are on tenterhooks. Yesterday, a president was fired. Today another one is on the point of being fired. There are threats of a reform or of the abolition of the Senate. They threaten us with an election. But, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that we do not fear an election. I would like action to be taken on these threats about a general election, because if there were a general election this year, I am sure the people would be glad to rid themselves as soon as possible of a government which has so badly administered the country during four years. The Liberal party, which would then replace it, would tell the house who would be appointed president, who would be appointed directors, and if a president or director were not suitable, it would dismiss him if he deserved it but it would give him a chance to defend himself before the house.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier.

(Translation):

Mr. Parizeau: Quebec's great defender.

(Text):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those of my colleagues who have spoken on this amendment and to deal with a number of matters that have come up and which, in my opinion, are nothing more nor less than pretexts on the part of the government. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Finance, after having warned the house of the importance of this bill, should have left the house abruptly. It would have been much more satisfying to me were he in his seat now because there are certain things I should like to say to him in answer to the charges which he made and which I think need to be said on this occasion.

The Minister of Finance said that it was essential that this measure be carried without delay. Why is it so essential at this time? It was in the power of the government to bring this measure before the house many weeks ago, in fact several months ago; but suddenly the Minister of Finance sees great urgency in the measure. He goes further; he warns and even threatens the opposition that, unless this legislation is passed, the operations of the Canadian National Railways will be hampered. He says this is no time for willful obstruction on the part of the opposition. May I say that the operations of the C.N.R. will go on notwithstanding the warnings and threats of the Minister of Finance. Whether this bill is delayed another day or two is a matter that will not affect the operations of the Canadian National Railways, and no one knows that better than does the Minister of Finance. After all, this great railway has been hampered by the present administration in the fact that the committee dealing with the annual report of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. met this year many weeks, in fact months, after the time at which it normally meets.

Then the Minister of Finance made this rather strange assertion. "Why", said he, "have the directors of the Canadian National Railways not been named? They cannot be named unless this legislation is proclaimed." That is not so. That is an untrue statement and no one knows it better than does the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the hon. member meant that sequence to his remarks. He said first it is an untrue statement. Then he said the minister knew it was an untrue statement. I would hope he would not leave that on the record because that is contrary to all the rules.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It is not an untrue statement anyway.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to charge the Minister of Finance with voluntarily having made the statement. If you feel that, in the remarks I have made, such is the case, I of course amend them immediately. What I had in mind, however, and what I intended to say was that the statement made by the Minister of Finance was wholly inaccurate. It is not a fact to say in this house that the directors of the Canadian National Railways cannot be named until this legislation is proclaimed. That is not a fact. That is not so. That is the same old story that we were given when we asked the Minister of Transport why the directors of the Canadian National Railways were not named for days after the legislation increasing the directors from seven to 12 was passed. We were told then, "Wait until the committee has dealt with the annual report of the C.N.R.". Now that the last piece of legislation dealing with the affairs of the Canadian National Railways is before the house we are told "Oh, no; you cannot have this information until the legislation is proclaimed". That is not so. It is not a fact. It is an inaccurate statement by the Minister of Finance and I say to the Minister of Finance that no one knows better than he does that the statement is inaccurate.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Is it not a fact that this act increases the number of directors of the C.N.R. has to be proclaimed before the number of C.N.R. directors is increased from seven to 12? Is that not a fact?

Mr. Chevrier: That is not what the Minister of Finance said.

Mr. Balcer: He said five new directors could not be named until this act was proclaimed and he said the house knew about it.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. The minister asked me a question and I am going to reply to him. The opposition is not in possession of the information. The government is in possession of the information. The government knows whether or not the legislation has been proclaimed. However, that is not what the Minister of Finance said. I took down his words. He said that the directors of the Canadian National Railways cannot be named or appointed until this legislation is proclaimed; not until the other legislation is proclaimed but until this legislation is proclaimed. I say that statement is not accurate.

Then I return to the statement I made earlier, namely that all of this fuss could have been avoided a long time ago if the government had only had its legislation in order. However, such was not the case. The government has been bungling all along. It has not been prepared. Its legislation was not prepared for the house. Even the bill which the Minister of Transport brought down the other day was not ready. The resolution was ready and then it was based on an agreement which had not yet been made between the parties.

Mr. Balcer: There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Chevrier: There is a great deal wrong with that and I will tell the minister why there is a great deal wrong with it. The bargaining position of the government of Canada is being endangered by bringing into the House of Commons a resolution based upon an agreement which has not yet been negotiated. In other words, now the parties to the construction of this railway know on the one hand that the government is going ahead with it and this knowledge will strengthen their hand in bargaining powers as between themselves on the one side and the government on the other. That is why I say it is bad business on the part of any government or any administration to bring in a resolution that is based on an agreement that has not been completed.

The hon. member for Greenwood rose in his place in this debate as he had a perfect right to do, and he said he found it strange that in regard to this routine matter there should be such a long discussion about this bill which involves the expenditure of some $180 million. He also suggested that the president and the director not being known had nothing to do with the legislation before the house. He referred to his experience in the past and I may say that he has a great deal of experience. I say to him in fairness that no one has criticized the refinancing legislation of the Canadian National Railways more constructively than has the hon. member for Greenwood. But when he makes the statement he made a while ago I say this to him. The circumstances today and the circumstances yesterday are entirely different. In past years under a Liberal administration there was no question as to who was to be the director and the president of the Canadian National Railways. At the present time there is a question. Before we vote these huge sums of money I say that we are entitled to know why it is that the government will not make up its mind and will not tell parliament.

There is a great deal in what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said earlier today, namely that the reason is, as the Prime Minister said when he was leader of the opposition, that parliament is a puppet. That is the reason. In the view of hon. gentlemen opposite parliament is exactly what the Prime Minister said; there are two sovereignties. As far as I am concerned, there is only one sovereignty and that is parliament and parliament alone. Before we vote these huge sums of money we should be entitled to know who the people are who are going to spend these sums of money.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think the hon. member wishes to be fair. However, he has entirely ignored what was perhaps my strongest point, namely that a committee of this house has been over these figures and has approved them.

While I am on my feet may I ask another question? Does the hon. member, with his experience, not agree that the passing of this bill is necessary in order that the arrangements for financing and so on, with which he is so familiar, can go forward? They cannot go forward, as I understand it, until this bill is passed.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, that is quite correct; but what difference does it make whether it goes forward today or next week? Why is it that legislation was brought down in this house six months ago, was dealt with in stages and was not completed until last week? Whose fault is that? That is of course the fault of the government. It is also the fault of the government that we have this situation in connection with the C.N.R. If the committee had met earlier, if the affairs concerning the Canadian National Railways had been dealt with earlier we would have disposed of this matter a long time ago.

Mr. Speaker, I was passing on to another matter with which I wished to deal before I closed my remarks. It has to do with the report of the royal commission on transportation. That report, as the house knows, has been submitted to the government in at least its first part and two other volumes will be brought before the house in due course.

In this first volume it has been recommended that large sums of money be paid to the railways in four fields. First in the field of passenger train service, where the Canadian National Railways testified that their train service deficit in 1958 was $40 million, and where the Canadian Pacific Railways testified to the same effect, that their passenger train service burden in 1958 was in the neighbourhood of $15 million to $16 million, and wherein too the MacPherson commission recommended large, maximum annual payments in respect of this loss of service ranging from $40 million in 1961 to $8 million in 1965.

The second recommendation in the report had to do with light density lines and therein, too, was a recommendation for a subsidy. That also applies to export grain traffic, where the commission has recommended that in the case of C.P.R. a sum of $9 million annually shall be paid on behalf of the export grain traffic as a contribution to constant costs. There is one other matter having to do with statutory free transportation.

I raise this matter because there is to be found in the supplementary estimates of the Department of Transport an amount of $50 million which has not yet been reached during the discussion of these estimates. I have tried to obtain information as to what this sum represents. Does it represent a partial acknowledgement or acceptance of the recommendations of the royal commission? Does it represent a payment for the wages in connection with the dispute between Canadian National Railways and its non-operating employees, or does it represent a straight subsidy in connection with both?

I think the house is entitled to receive that information before we vote on this amendment, and on the bill, if need be. I attempted to obtain this information from the committee when it dealt with the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, but again I did not get very far in that attempt because it was felt that questions relating to this matter were very close to the borderline because the commission had not yet finally reported, and in any event the wording of this item in the estimates, No. 590, was such that it was clear.

Well, I never thought it was clear at any juncture. If there ever was evidence of lack of clarity, it is in this item. I should now like to read it into Hansard. It is entitled, "Board of transport commissioners". The item reads:

Interim payments, related to recommendations of the royal commission on railway problems pending its complete report, to companies as defined in the Freight Rates Reduction Act of an aggregate amount in respect of the calendar year 1961 of $50 million, to be paid in instalments at such times and in accordance with such method of allocation as may be determined by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, as compensation to such companies for the maintenance of their rates on freight traffic at reduced levels as provided for in the said act.

So it covers the whole field. It covers the world. It covers in part the recommendation; in part salaries; in part reductions in freight rates. Again we have an example of the manner in which this government proceeds to deal with important matters of this character. We were also told we would have legislation in connection with these recommendations. That was a statement made repeatedly by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) during one of the debates of this house. We are still awaiting that legislation.

If the government had in mind the welfare of the railways and of the people of Canada it would, after this long period of time in which the report has been in its hands, have had legislation to deal with the situation as we find it. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, there was every reason for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to move this amendment, which we on this side of the house will support.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, we definitely have the right to ask the government to tell us, in all fairness—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, would the house be willing to continue during this hour from five to six o'clock the business on which it was engaged at five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The old filibuster.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE CUMBERLAND RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY AND THE SYDNEY AND LOUISBURG RAILWAY COMPANY

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. S-19, respecting the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company and the Sydney and Louisburg Railway Company (Without amendment)—Mr. MacInnis.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Stands, Mr. Speaker.

Order stands.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPLICATION BY TRUCKERS TO TRANSPORT BOARD ON COMPETITIVE RATES

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. C-39, to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring this bill indicated the last time this matter came up that he would be prepared to proceed on the next occasion. If he is not prepared to proceed, I think he should lose his place in the queue.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I might—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member wait just a minute.

Mr. Argue: That was reserved for the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when this bill came up last Friday it was suggested by the house leader that he agreed to its standing on the basis that it would be delayed for perhaps a week because private bills come up on Tuesday, and I indicated at that time, and felt the house had accepted it, that it would go ahead on the following Friday.

Mr. Peters: Why not take it now?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member ready to proceed?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I ask that it stand.

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the government prepared to request that it stand?

Mr. Churchill: I ask that it stand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It stands at the request of the government.

Mr. Howard: Favouritism.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Skeena has just said "favouritism" and I think that remark should be withdrawn.

Mr. Argue: It is true.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see that there is a point of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point of order. Would the hon. member resume his seat.

Order stands.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION FOR REGULATION OF EXTRAPROVINCIAL TRUCKING

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. C-44, an act to regulate extraprovincial transportation—Mr. Chown.

Mr. Speaker: The order stands.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr Speaker, does this stand at the request of the government?

Mr. Speakman: It stands but not at the request of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that event, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we would agree that it stand.

Mr. Speaker: This just means it goes to the bottom of the list.

Order stands.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PRINTING OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN BOTH ENGLISH AND FRENCH

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 29, 1960, consideration of the motion of Mr. Boulanger for the second reading of Bill No. C-6, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, this is the fifth—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Question.

(Translation):

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, it is rather amusing to see the Liberals take the attitude they are adopting now. This is not the first time that the matter of bilingual cheques has been on the order paper of this house. On several occasions in the past, a measure similar to that of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) has been submitted for approval by this house and on each occasion, the bill was delayed with the result that again today we have to discuss it—

Mr. Boulanger: Question.

Mr. Ricard: —and our hon. friends have had all the time they needed—

An hon. Member: You have had it too.

Mr. Ricard: —to make a decision on this matter. However, today they act as they always did, they recommend one thing and do another.

They certainly recall the days when the hon. member for Beauce, Dr. Raoul Poulin, year in and year out, used to introduce in the house a piece of legislation similar to the one introduced today by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

I went through the official record for years prior to 1957, and made a particular study of the speeches made, in reference to this legislation, by the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), for Levis (Mr. Bourget), for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) and for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), and, to my great surprise, Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to find, except a short—

Mr. Bourget: Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to raise a point of order. I understand the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot has referred to me as one of those who dealt with this bill. Could the hon. member indicate the page and the date of the speech I am supposed to have made.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member for Levis is going too fast. He is trying to put in my mouth words I have not said. I said that I had searched the record prior to 1957 in order to know what stand had been taken by the hon. members I mentioned a minute ago, and I was just going to say that none of them, except the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, had anything to say with respect to this bill in the past.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order and again on the same question, I submit the member has intimated that I had spoken to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Ricard: I said exactly the opposite.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I am positive that tomorrow, the official report will show that he actually said he had searched Hansard in order to scrutinize speeches made by the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, St. Denis and myself. Then, I can only conclude that he is suggesting—

Mr. Tremblay: No, no.

Mr. Bourget: If you would let me talk, perhaps we could understand each other better.

Mr. Tremblay: Exactly—you do not understand.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member by way of personal explanation is correcting the statement that he had spoken in this debate when in fact he has not spoken on this bill at all?

Mr. Bourget: That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said a few moments ago that he had searched through Hansard and found that the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), St. Denis (Mr. Denis) and Levis (Mr. Bourget) had spoken in regard to this bill. I must say that I have not said a word in regard to this bill.

Mr. Speaker: We have the assurance of the hon. member for Levis that he did not speak on this bill. I understood that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) asserted that he had spoken on this subject in years past but not in respect to this particular bill. In any event the hon. member has made it clear that he has not spoken before on this bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that I had looked up Hansard to make sure—let us give the hon. member for Levis the benefit of the doubt, let us say that I looked up Hansard to find speeches, but he rose a little too soon, because I was going to say that I had found no speech of the hon. members of the opposition, except the one delivered by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who talked out the bill before the house on January 31, 1957.

I should like—

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Just as you are doing now.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) had ample opportunity himself, when he was a member of the Liberal administration—

Mr. Boulanger: That was four years ago—

Mr. Ricard: You had many opportunities to adopt such a bill if you had wanted to. But in keeping with your habit, you had one policy for the province of Quebec and another for the rest of the country. That is exactly what you have always done—try to divide and rule.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, an article of the newspaper Le Devoir of February 7, 1958, which I should like to quote in part:

> The subject of bilingual cheques is not new. It has been discussed since the creation of family allowances at the end of the war. It is a known fact that the federal government had thought of issuing two sets of allowance cheques—bilingual cheques in the province of Quebec and English cheques for the other provinces in confederation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is evidence that the Liberals advocated two policies, one for Quebec and another for the rest of the country. It is a requirement of their political education. They always follow the same policy—divide and rule.

I continue:

> French Canadians protested against such a rule which was inspired by the Quebec reserve thesis and requested bilingual cheques for the whole country in accordance with the spirit of the constitution. They soon referred to the fact that family allowance cheques were not the only cheques issued by the federal government, even if there were more of those and they asked that all cheques like currency be bilingual.

The Conseil de Vie française was our spokesman. On the eve of the 1953 election, it sent a delegation to Ottawa to submit a brief on bilingual cheques to Mr. Douglas Abbott.

The association made repeated representations to the different ministers of finance who came afterwards—i.e. Walter Harris and Donald Fleming. These representations were always well received but gave limited results.

In the commons, the independent member for Beauce supported these claims by introducing year after year a very well written bill that would have settled the question once and for all. His efforts were not useless since they forced the four federal political parties to accept the principle of a reform.

All that, Mr. Speaker, happened under the former Liberal government. That government could have given us bilingual cheques. But it did not.

Now that the Liberals are in the opposition, they demand that the government take steps they refused to take themselves.

I resume my reading of the article:

A quarter of a century ago, parliament and the nation had to deal with the question of bilingual currency. In those days as today, a Conservative government was in power in Ottawa and the Liberals who had been deaf to our demands, suddenly found themselves most zealous in the opposition.

Ever since the Liberal party has been confined to the cold regions of the opposition, they have felt a sudden outburst of patriotic and bilingual fever.

It still remains that they never did anything.

To further the expansion of bilingualism, the present Conservative government favours it not only in government buildings, but everywhere.

Indeed, everybody knows that the Department of Public Works is at present substituting bilingual traffic signs for unilingual ones.

The Liberals have been in power for 22 years and apparently, they never noticed this anomaly which the Conservative government is pleased to correct.

I would add that the Conservative government has no advice to take from the Liberal party in that respect and in many others.

Here is another proof of that. It was under a Conservative government led by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett that the currency minted in Canada was worded in French. Never before that had the Liberals dared take such a step. Never before had it occurred to them that there should be some French on our currency.

It is therefore R. B. Bennett who had the honour of having bank notes printed in French for the first time.

The purpose of the present resolution is to have negotiable instruments printed in both languages in Canada.

This motion should not have been introduced by a private member, because it calls for a spending of moneys and it rests with the government alone to introduce such a bill.

Be it as it may, hon. members may rest assured that, at the right moment, bilingual cheques shall be printed. And again a Conservative government will be the one to take steps in the interest of bilingualism.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), when he deems advisable to do so, will give this country bilingual cheques, not only for the satisfaction of Conservative members, but for that of all the people of Canada, much to the regret of the Liberal members who, during the long years when they were in office, have not found time to do anything in that field.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased at this time to speak in strong and very sincere support of the bill now before us.

An hon. Member: Did you ever speak in its favour before?

Mr. Argue: My record on this subject is consistent. In spite of the interruptions I hear from the opposite side I would suggest that the record is a consistent one and I am very proud to be able to speak at this time in support of what I think is a very important piece of legislation. This is a bilingual country; it is a bicultural country and I think it behooves members of parliament to recognize this fact.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot says that this government, or at least the Conservative party, will provide for bilingual cheques at the opportune time. I suggest that now is the opportune time. I ask why should we wait? For what reason are they delaying? I am certain that this measure would receive the unanimous support of this house now as it has on former occasions and that instead of talking it out a member of the cabinet should rise in his place and say that the government is prepared to accept the measure and to issue the proper instructions that instruments referred to in this measure be made bilingual.

It is easy for hon. members opposite to say, "Well, the Liberals should have done this. Why did they wait so long? They were here for 22 years and they failed to replace the plaques in the House of Commons by substituting bilingual plaques". Well, if there have been mistakes in the past surely that is no excuse for continuing the mistake in this field. Why hark back to something that happened years ago when there are things that should be corrected now? To blame people for what happened over a 22-year period is certainly no excuse for talking on this bill at length, if that should be the position of hon. members opposite, and failing to bring it to a vote.

I am prepared to congratulate the government whenever it makes a move in this direction, but when criticism is justified I think that criticism should be made. Although for some years some of us have said that there should be placed within the employ of the government, that is within the civil service, at least two persons, one to instruct French speaking people in the English language and the other to instruct English speaking people in the French language, this has not been done. I do not know why this has not been done. Some members of parliament at any rate have been pressing it. There was a professor by the name of Edouard Peloquin who came to Ottawa periodically from Montreal one or two days a week to assist some of us in studying the French language. He was unable to continue his trips to Ottawa because of financial problems. The classes were not paying and he was losing money and was not able to finance these trips out of his own pocket. Some of us intervened with members of the government—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Argue: If you can talk about the ordering of plaques by the Department of Public Works, surely we can talk about this matter. When we intervened the answer was, "It is too complicated; we have tried and it cannot be done". I say it is a disgrace to this country that the government has failed to provide a teaching staff to enable highly placed civil servants to learn both languages, and the record of the government is not nearly as good as was stated in the house this afternoon by the preceding speaker.

I said that we do not have to go back to mistakes of the past. We can talk about the things that should be done now and the passing of this measure is one of the things that should be done now. I am confident that not only will this kind of proposal receive the support of the C.C.F. members of parliament if we have an opportunity to vote on it but this kind of recognition of the bilingual and bicultural nature of our country will be recognized, I am confident, in all its aspects by the New party whose program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Hon. members can snicker. They may think it is a joke but I do not think the question of bilingual cheques and the bilingual nature of this country are anything to snicker about.

Mr. Nesbitt: You are the joke.

Mr. Argue: My friend can get up and speak if he likes, but I am certain it is the Conservative party that is lagging in this regard. I am confident that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska—

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member aware that in the Department of External Affairs at least—I cannot speak for other government departments—civil servants are given extra allowances to learn another language?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think the allowances should be increased. Apparently very few are taking advantage of them because the number of bilingual people in the Department of External Affairs does not in any way reflect the bilingual nature of this country. It may be that some efforts have been made but they are feeble and inadequate efforts. One of the strengths of our nation is the bilingual nature of our country. One of the strengths of Canada in international affairs lies in the fact that we are a bilingual country. Let parliament itself, let all parties in the House of Commons recognize this fact by passing this bill and not have any part in delay and obstruction which would prevent the bill from coming to a vote.

(Translation):

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to take part in this debate on Bill C-6, introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, in view of the fact that as early as 1959, I had placed my views on the record with regard to this matter.

In my humble view, it would not even be necessary to vote such a bill because, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) indicated a moment ago, the government could make this move without any legislative amendment. In fact, that was the view I expressed in 1959, and while I of course support the principle of this bill, I am still of the same opinion.

At that time, I argued that the problem could be settled through a government decision. As a matter of fact, I am sure the government will settle the matter in due course, despite what may be said to the contrary by our good friends in the opposition and even by members of the C.C.F. party, or the New party as it will soon be called, because as I understood the remarks just made by the present leader of the C.C.F. and perhaps the future leader of the New party, he more or less disowned the remarks previously made in this house by another member of his party either in regard to this matter or with respect to bilingualism.

I referred a moment ago to the suggestion which he says was made years ago for the provision of courses for unilingual civil servants. I have not been a member of this house very long, but I do not think that suggestion was made so many years ago. I rather think it was made this year, when the new Civil Service Act came up, by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

I have no doubt that the teaching of English to French speaking civil servants and the teaching of French to English speaking civil servants would help solve the problem of bilingualism. However, it would not settle the whole problem which we considered when discussing that bill.

But to come back to the bill before us, with regard to the opportunity of enacting legislation to provide for the printing of negotiable instruments in both English and French, I think we did approve some bill to this effect before. It is, of course, another bill altogether and I do not want to deal with it, but it is more complete. I refer to Bill C-31 submitted by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and which, to my mind, is more explicit than the one introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

I shall not discuss it in detail, because I would be out of order since we are not allowed to deal with another bill when discussing a particular measure. However, I simply want to remind hon. members that I still think such legislation is unnecessary, and that the government can always take action in this respect. However, if the question were put, I say that I would still believe the other bill introduced by my colleague from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to be more adequate.

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martel: Of course my hon. friend from Drummond-Arthabaska thinks this is very funny. I have no objection to his finding the matter hilarious. He can hardly be blamed for not having submitted his bill earlier, when his party was in power, because at that time he was in fact like myself, not a member of this house. Indeed, if my memory serves me well he had himself elected as an independent, and I think he would have done better at that time to join the Conservative party. His bill would be enacted today, not straight away, perhaps, but he might have come to some understanding with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to have his bill adopted.

Mr. Boulanger: Never, never.

Mr. Martel: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I refer to the discussion which took place in 1959 on the matter, when the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska introduced an identical bill. At that time, I took part in the discussion in which various things were mentioned, like the constitutional guarantees with regard to the rights of the French and English languages and of bilingualism, guarantees which every year are more widely recognized, especially since the Conservative party came into power. It was referred to in some newspaper items and more particularly in an editorial printed in Le Droit, part of which I will read into today's record in a few moments, if I may do so, Mr. Speaker.

The various opinions expressed at that time were described as strange in some newspapers. I know that mine in particular was considered rather strange because it was said that although I was a French Canadian I was seeking to kill the bill. Such was not my intention, since I had already said that the government could implement such a plan without the necessity of making amendments to the act. Anway, I feel that the attitude of our opponents who just took part in the discussion is not less strange, since now they are endeavouring to take credit for such legislation, which was introduced for the first time, as everybody knows, by the independent member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin). I am referring more particularly to the year 1956. It is true I was not in the house then, but I have looked into that matter. I should like to come back to the editorial quoted a moment ago by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot to the effect that when the Liberals were in power nothing was done to help pass the bill introduced by the former independent member for Beauce.

Not only that but when that bill came before the house in 1957, the Liberals resorted to all sorts of tricks and tactics behind the scenes. They even had statements in the press, trying to ridicule the hon. member for Beauce, Mr. Raoul Poulin, saying that he was seeking to bury his own bill, which was completely false, for if there was one who fought for bilingualism in this house, it is the former independent member for Beauce.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I should like simply to record in Hansard part of an editorial which appeared in Le Droit of February 14, 1959 and dealing with a debate on bilingual cheques which had taken place a few days before. This article was written by Mr. Pierre Chaloult. It is too long to be read in full, unless my hon. friends would allow my recording it in Hansard without first reading it. Anyway, I can quote a few excerpts which seem most relevant. I quote:

> The matter which is now raised in this connection is that of bilingual cheques, according to the request made by the independent member for Beauce, during the second last federal session, Mr. Raoul Poulin.

And further on, the article refers precisely to the opinion I expressed in 1959, which I mentioned again a moment ago, and goes on to say:

> But there remains a very simple way of avoiding all those inconveniences, without displeasing, French speaking Canadians, since the Minister of Finance, Mr. Donald Fleming, has merely to repeat, in 1959, the action taken once by Mr. Pierre Véniot. Mr. Fleming may, in fact, close the debate forever by telling the house that he has, on the very day, or the day before, or when it pleases him to do so, given instructions for the printing of federal government cheques in both official languages of this country.
> Since this bill would interfere with nobody's rights or convictions, no one should complain about it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that would be the solution. We would not have to vote any legislation in that regard.

I believe that the government has the power to do so and will do it at the first opportunity.

Since the Conservative party took over, many necessary measures have been adopted.

We are now in the midst of a debate which has already been going on for days and we have seen several lengthy debates on various matters.

Besides, the Conservative government has already shown its goodwill in relation with the establishment of integral bilingualism in Canada by giving us simultaneous translation and by appointing a perfectly bilingual governor general. Furthermore, several other measures of a similar nature have been passed, which very clearly indicate the good intentions of the Conservative government in the matter of bilingualism. So, I have no fear in stating that it will give us bilingual cheques at the earliest possible date.

Obviously, there is still a very important matter to settle, that of the Bank of Canada. For many years, that institution has been issuing bilingual bank notes. The Senate is now discussing a bill concerning the position of the governor of the Bank of Canada, and I know that the views of this house will finally prevail and that the present governor will be dismissed. I hope, furthermore, that the Conservative government will soon give its approval to the issuance of bilingual cheques.

Mr. Speaker, I close my remarks and leave the floor to another member who would like to deal with this matter.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, but I do not want to let this debate come to an end without straightening out a few facts.

First, I should like to commend the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) for introducing this measure.

This is a simple bill, and only one thing is important here, namely to vote the bilingual cheques. I do hope that the house will have an opportunity to vote on the matter before six o'clock.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find that some hon. members have referred back to earlier periods such as in 1956. In considering the whole question of bilingual cheques, I should like to ask them to go over the Hansard of the time. They will find that in 1956, when the Liberal party was in office, a special committee was set up and that the names of the members of that committee are recorded in Hansard. Moreover, I think it was the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) who was then chairman of that committee.

A vote was taken previously in this house on this matter of bilingual cheques, in January 1958, and I am pleased to remind our Conservative friends, who seem to have a weak memory in this respect, that the Liberals without exception voted in favour of bilingual cheques. On the other hand, I must say that at least nine government members voted against the scheme, when the Conservative party was in office.

Mr. Speaker, I find that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) is at his desk. If what I am going to say about him is untrue, he may rise and I shall be glad to withdraw my statement. If I remember correctly, the minister voted at the time, namely in January 1958, against the adoption of bilingual cheques, together with nine of his colleagues, and at the time—

(Text):

Mr. Churchill: Has the hon. member verified that statement? On a point of order, may I ask the hon. member if he will give the reference in Hansard to indicate the accuracy of his statement.

Mr. Deschatelets: I am glad to put the record straight. Before doing so, I said that if I was wrong I was ready to apologize. Here are the names of the nine Conservative members who voted against this measure concerning bilingual cheques.

Mr. Churchill: What is the page?

Mr. Deschatelets: The page of Hansard is 4322, for January 31, 1958, French edition. The names are Messrs. Hales, Hodgson, Kennedy, McGregor, Milligan, Noble, Small, Smith (Calgary South), Wratten.

Mr. Churchill: I accept your apology now.

Mr. Deschatelets: No, I agree that the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) is not there. However, I am still right when I say that nine Conservatives voted against a similar measure, and no Liberals have ever voted against such a measure in the only vote that has been taken in this house on this subject so far as I can recall. I simply wish to put the position clearly.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member—

Mr. Deschatelets: No, I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. The minister can speak afterwards.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I must add that at the time I naturally voted with the Liberal party, because our party was unanimous.

A few moments ago, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) dealt with the matter of bilingual currency. May I tell him that in 1935, a Conservative government, in order, as he so well put it, to divide and rule, divided our currency. The currency printed in French was for Quebec and the currency printed in English for the nine other provinces.

Mr. Ricard: That is what you did with those bilingual cheques, with the family allowance cheques.

Mr. Deschatelets: In a report on what happened in 1935, published by the Globe and Mail of Saturday, July 1, 1961, I find this:

(Text):

Red serial numbers appear twice on the face with the prefix A on the English notes and F on the French notes.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

(Translation):

On the other hand when we took over in 1936, that is 25 years ago, we established bilingual currency for the whole country, one currency for one country and—

(Text):

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: And here, according to Hansard of June 11, 1936, the former leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Bennett, had this to say in respect of that legislation, and I quote Le Droit of June 10 1961:

Twenty five years ago—
The Conservative leader R. B. Bennett objects to bilingual currency, saying that a minority should not impose its will upon a majority. He insists that the section of the Bank of Canada bill, which contains the promise that bank-notes will from now on be bilingual, should not be left in the bill.

Now, I hope that the Conservative members who like so much to talk about their former leader, Mr. Bennett, who after his defeat, it will be recalled, standing on the gangway of a liner, turned to one of his supporters and said, with tears in his eyes: "At last, I am going back home".

Well, I suggest to my Conservative friends, when they speak about bilingual currency, to tell exactly what happened. It is the Liberal party which gave Canada bilingual currency and many more references will be found in Hansard on this subject.

These last few days, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) made much of the fact that he had bilingual signs put up in the parliament buildings. I had no intention of mentioning this, but since he raised the matter himself, may I ask him to be more practical, for the sake of bilingualism, and see that elevators are run by bilingual operators.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the opposition not only has indicated their approval of bilingual cheques this afternoon but their intention of voting in favour of the bill.

Moreover, I should like to congratulate the C.C.F. leader—

Mr. Ricard: On a point of order. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has just hinted that the parliament's elevator operators do not speak French. Some operators speak French just as there are some who speak English. I wanted that fact recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no point of order. I could add, however, that that remark was not too relevant.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, in reply to what has just been said, I should just like to state that if the Minister of Public Works fully wishes to respect bilingualism—it was fine of him to have bilingual signs put up—he should see to it that the parliament's elevators are operated by bilingual employees.

Mr. Ricard: There are bilingual operators.

Mr. Deschatelets: I have nothing else to say—

Mr. Ricard: Some of the operators are bilingual.

Mr. Deschatelets: Some of them are not.

Mr. Ricard: There are some, just like when your party was in power.

Mr. Deschatelets: I was saying that the parties of the opposition are in favour of that bill and are quite anxious to vote on it.

I also wish to congratulate the leader of the C.C.F. party for the stand he has taken.

Those are the remarks I wanted to put on Hansard. I hope it will be possible for us to vote on the bill before six o'clock.

(Text):

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish first of all to place on the record a statement to the effect that I am in favour of the principle of this bill. We have had a very short debate on the subject of bilingual cheques. However, this subject under discussion has been before parliament on numerous occasions in the past. A similar bill was introduced by the same sponsor in 1959 and was debated in this house during the month of February of that year.

Although on the face of it the bill is a very simple one, the subject matter is of great importance. At the present time government cheques are issued in the English language in some parts of the country while other government cheques are issued in the French language. The debate in 1959 disclosed that, in addition to having English and French cheques, we have some cheques printed in both official languages. I believe the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) mentioned the fact that cheques of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and cheques of the C.B.C. were printed in both official languages. Hon. members who have spoken today, as have others in the past, suggested that legislation may not be necessary. I am one who supports that principle. However, debate on the principle is certainly necessary.

The explanatory note has not been mentioned today but for the purpose of the record I think some reference should be made thereto. It simply states that the purpose of the bill is to provide that cheques, drafts, et cetera, and any other similar remittance of any department as defined in the Financial Administration Act shall be printed in both the English and the French languages. All hon. members and the public at large are familiar with the fact that currency under the Bank of Canada Act is bilingual. This has worked out satisfactorily and without any hardship or inconvenience. Bringing forth bilingual or bilingually printed cheques, et cetera would also be something easy to administer.

It was amusing to hon. members to hear the house leader of the C.C.F. speak in support of this bill. I believe all hon. members are generally in support of it. However, unlike the hon. member for Assiniboia, none of us is trying at this hour to appeal to the delegates who will soon be assembling at the convention in this city. Perhaps the delegates will listen to his words today and those from Quebec will be influenced by his statement.

I think the government as such is probably in favour of the principle because it was this government during this parliament that brought forth simultaneous translation of the debates of this house. Since then the record will show that this parliament has had more debate in the French language than has any parliament in recent years. In addition, it was this government that selected and appointed an outstanding Canadian of French origin to be Canada's first French speaking, native born governor general. Not long thereafter it was this government that supplied the funds in order to permit the C.B.C. to open the first French language television station east of Quebec. That station was opened a couple of years ago in Moncton, New Brunswick, a bilingual city supporting both the English culture and the French culture. After the opening of the television station this same government permitted the Canadian National Railways at great expense to construct a second microwave set-up in order to make it possible for the people of eastern New Brunswick and satellite areas to have daily live television emanating from Montreal owing to the existence of this second microwave facility.

Consequently, it should be very easy for hon. members on all sides, and particularly supporters of the government, to use their influence in order to convince the government of the importance of taking the necessary steps to implement the demand or request introduced by this bill. It may not require legislation to do so. However, the government must have an expression of the wishes of the people. I refer not only to the expression of the feeling of members of the House of Commons but editorial comment which may possibly follow this debate.

The constitution of 1867 provided for a certain amount of bilingualism, including debates in both languages in this house and the printing in both languages of statutes of the legislature of Quebec and of federal statutes. In 1951 the census return showed that, apart from Quebec, there was great growth in the numbers of French speaking persons in Canada. According to the census of 10 years ago, in 1951 the province of New Brunswick was 38 per cent bilingual. I suggest that when the results of 1961 are published the growth of French speaking people in Canada—again apart from Quebec—will once again be substantially increased and this increase will occur primarily in New Brunswick, particularly the northern part of the province and the east coast.

I am not one who says that this bill must necessarily be adopted by vote today. I make that statement because I feel that is not the way a government which believes in tradition does things. It would be wrong for hon. members supporting the government to simply sit back and permit such a bill to become law. Changes of this type which are of national importance, changes that affect the feelings of many people must be fully considered and then introduced by the government by way of administrative action or by necessary legislation. It is for that reason, and for that reason alone that I would be inclined to vote against this legislation at this time.

I have in my riding not only a French T.V. station, as was mentioned a few moments ago, but also the only daily French newspaper published east of Quebec. I also have in my riding a French radio station owned by the C.B.C. These news media, radio, press and T.V. have done much in the past few years to acquaint the English speaking people with the culture of their French neighbours throughout eastern New Brunswick. I know that the situation existing in my riding also prevails in many parts of Ontario. Hon. members from Ontario have spoken in previous debates in favour of this bill. I mention particularly the hon. member for Parkdale who spoke on a similar bill in 1959.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the hon. member's speech as reported at page 643 of Hansard of 1959. At that time the hon. member said, quoting his words as reported at page 203 of Hansard for 1957:

> I am of the belief that our nation is a greater nation because of the historical association of two great races of people, the English and the French. They have lived side by side, more often than not, in harmony and good will. Out of this association has developed a nationality which makes us, not only a more interesting country in the eyes of the world but an example in tolerance and understanding.

[Mr. Creaghan.]

Mr. Boulanger: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Scarborough.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to take up a few moments of the time of the house on this matter—

Mr. McGee: I understood you to have recognized me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The hon. member for York-Scarborough.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the principle of the bill I should like to comment briefly on the contribution made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I regret very much that he is not in the house at this moment. I know it is quite improper to impute motives to any hon. member in debate, so perhaps I can suggest what I have in mind this way, that one might be forgiven for coming to the conclusion that an event in the not too distant future has prompted a sudden interest on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia in certain French Canadian delegates who might be at that convention. I might say we all wish him well in his endeavours at that convention, recognizing that the fact he is here in the House of Commons places serious limitations on his activities in that connection.

The contribution of the hon. member for Assiniboia was typical in many other respects. He rose; he stated his point of view and then asserted in a vigorous manner that, having heard from the hon. member for Assiniboia, we should all sit down, be quiet and vote. This is a pretty typical attitude of that group except when they happen to be discussing something that serves their purposes in another way.

I would remind the hon. member for Assiniboia of the statement made by the respected hon. member for Kootenay West when speaking on another matter not dissimilar to the proposition suggested in this bill. As reported at page 1326 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kootenay West had this to say, and I commend these words to the hon. member for Assiniboia:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise because I have a few words to say on this resolution. Let me say first I think it is a good thing, whether or not we come to a conclusion tonight, that we discuss this question.

The question at issue at that time, of course, was a national flag. I submit, with deference to the hon. member for Kootenay West who is in the house and listening most attentively—that this subject is in the same category as the one being discussed at that time. But the most typical thing about the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia was his trigger-like action. First he demanded that we have teachers summoned from all points of Canada to train our civil servants to speak both languages, and he was off and flying on this demand. He was perhaps overlooking several constitutional impediments, but let that matter stand aside for the moment. Then upon being interrupted by the hon. member from Oxford and being advised that in the department of which the hon. member has such distinguished knowledge this practice is in effect, that allowances for this purpose are given, without halting, breathing or interrupting himself the hon. member for Assiniboia said the allowances must be raised immediately; something is wrong; those are inadequate allowances, and must be raised. That somehow seems to sum up the New Party, C.C.F.—call them what you will—attitude on things generally: whatever it is, we do not know what it is, but it is not enough.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I wonder why it is the hon. member was not educated himself in this way in that department?

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, to come back to the principle of this bill, it has been my privilege on a number of previous occasions to speak in support of this proposition. As I see my time is coming quickly to a close I should like to place on record and bring to the attention of the house the attendance in the gallery of Mr. Joe McCulley, the very well known warden of Hart House, who in his own way has had a great deal to do with one aspect of bilingualism. I refer to the University of Montreal and the University of Toronto week-end exchanges of young English speaking people from the province of Ontario and young French speaking people from Montreal. These young people have exchanged visits through the winter. On one occasion I had the privilege of attending one part of that program, albeit a social part, and I can commend it highly. I should like to commend Mr. McCulley for his part in that program.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-121, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1961, to the 30th day of June, 1962, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pickersgill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): When the house adjourned at five o'clock for the hour devoted to private and public bills, I was just saying that we were quite justified in asking the minister to provide more information to the house. I think the hon. members opposite, at least those who have sat in the opposition, will agree that it is the duty of the opposition to give close scrutiny to the legislation placed before parliament, and that the essential duty of the opposition is to seek all the necessary information, particularly when it comes to a substantial amount such as we are asked to vote in Bill C-121, involving as it does an expenditure of $178 million.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) stated this afternoon that it was impossible to appoint the five new directors before the proclamation of the relevant legislation. It is therefore the responsibility of the opposition to ask the government, in the hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will reply, what is holding up the government in proclaiming this act which was passed weeks ago in the house.

Furthermore, what is the government doing with regard to the four present directors and the president of the C.N.R., whose terms of office expired last September. The opposition surely is entitled to ask these questions, and it is also entitled to a reply. This afternoon, reference was made in the house to the fact that a few days ago, the Minister of Transport was finally forced, I would say, to admit before the house that he personally got along fine with the president of the C.N.R. The fact remains, however, that parliament is entitled to know, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond mentioned this afternoon when he ventured out on rather dangerous ground, that the committee report clearly indicated who would be the next president of the C.N.R. As I say, parliament has a right to insist on being told the name of the president who will have to see that the $178 million dollars we are being asked to vote are properly spent. Parliament is also entitled to know whether this time, as it happened before, the Prime Minister will not interfere and prevent in some way or other, according to what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said this afternoon, the appointment of the person recommended by the railway committee.

It seems to me that we are entitled to expect answers to those questions.

Is the government waiting so as to appoint puppets that the Prime Minister will be able to handle as he pleases?

The Canadian people must depend on the opposition to know what goes on behind those underhand practices. Deceived in the last four years by visions that are turning to be disillusions, it is time that parliament knew whether the country is run by one man or by a government made up of a responsible cabinet. It seems to me that the time is past when a one-man government could prevail over an informed parliament knowing where a one-man government might lead a country.

It is time, Mr. Speaker, to have those questions answered and cabinet members should give us the answers instead of beating around the bush for fear of giving away a great secret—the secret of government by one man, who calls all the tunes for the ministers to dance to.

The amendment now before us, Mr. Speaker, is a very responsible one which, on behalf of the Canadian people, asks for an announcement concerning the board of directors which will be called upon to spend the not inconsiderable amount of $178 million.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with the amendment and will, of course, vote against it. We have already indicated that we support the measure and look upon it as being largely routine.

In regard to what appears to be the desire of the official opposition to debate this measure more thoroughly, I think they should have a certain amount of compassion for the Minister of Finance, as I am sure he is busy and has many things on his mind. I know there is another place where he would probably like to be and no doubt he hopes to get there very soon. I am sure the sooner he is given that opportunity the sooner there will be a rising barometer in respect to his mood and general attitude toward life.

It seems to me that in their remarks hon. members of the official opposition are overbuilding the issue with regard to who the directors are going to be and whether the appointment of Mr. Gordon as both chairman of the board and president is going to be renewed. We have a certain number of directors at the present time, although there is a shortage of one as a result of the unfortunate death of Mr. Bickle. But judging from the information we have had before our parliamentary committee, I do not feel that there is any indication that the board of directors is that important or that vital in so far as the day to day operations of the railway are concerned. While we are very much in sympathy with the bill that increases the number of directors, we do not feel that the fact there has been a delay in appointing them is a vital issue in any way. It may reflect what is a characteristic of the government, namely procrastination, but in this particular instance it does not seem to me that it is fundamental.

I indicated on second reading, Mr. Speaker, we do not think Mr. Gordon can continue in an indefinite position, but again in the short run we do not think it is working any hardship on the railway. In fact, it may be helping to keep him on the move in meeting the problems that the railway has at the present time, particularly with regard to this most grievous problem of morale. Therefore the bill comes down to being not an issue of the directors or of Mr. Gordon's position, whether definite or not, but whether the C.N.R. is going to be provided with money. I think a much better argument could be made against—

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the hon. member advocate that as a general policy, that is, the state of uncertainty, to promote efficiency of officials?

Mr. Fisher: No, I do not think so, but I do not know of any group that is more in a state of uncertainty than members of parliament and I have never thought that this particular uncertainty did any harm. As a matter of fact many people would say this is one of the great merits of elections and their prospects; it keeps us all in jeopardy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question at this point. The hon. gentleman said he does not think that the uncertainty of being a member of parliament has any effect on our efficiency. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks that applies equally to people who have administrative responsibilities, instead of loquacious responsibilities, as we have?

An hon. Member: As you have.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Speak for yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I speak for the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: As far as loquacity is concerned, it seems to me, as I have sat here listening to the Liberals, that one could become tremendously irreverent and begin to sing "Show me the way to go home". But I suppose the house is something like an Ontario beer parlour and singing is not allowed. I was almost tempted this afternoon, as the debate dragged on, to launch into that.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the hon. member permit one more question? Would the hon. member favour the philosophy for employees?

Mr. Fisher: In so far as employees are concerned, no. I think employees should know where they stand. But in this particular case Mr. Gordon has been left in charge. I should like to see him go, but it is quite apparent to me that he is not going to go.

An hon. Member: Despite all those Tory wolves.

Mr. Fisher: If the official opposition want an issue relating to the spending of money, why do they not get involved in a discussion of the money that is probably coming from this bill that is going into the expansion of the Canadian National trucking operations? It seems to me they would have a real issue there. I know the Liberal opposition is a free enterprise party. They believe in the extension of private competition wherever possible.

An hon. Member: In theory.

Mr. Fisher: I saw a report in the Montreal Gazette this morning that the trucking association of Quebec is appealing to the government to disallow the licence of Midland Superior, one of the large trucking companies bought, we understand, for approximately $2 million by the Canadian National Railways. We discovered in the committee meetings that the C.N.R. has put the money to one side and has not even paid it yet. The deal is hanging fire. Apparently they do not want to go through with the deal because they are afraid Quebec will cancel this trucker's licence. Truckers in Quebec are protesting that Midland Superior, because it is running apparently under a kind of phony ownership at this time, should not be allowed to carry on. This, it seems to me, would be a real issue to offer the opposition in terms of the debate of this bill as being a reason why they should block the bill, rather than the lesser issue of the uncertainty under which civil servants are operating.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, I was one of the first advocates in this parliament of, not so much uncertainty for civil servants, but of a bit more dash and drive on the part of this government to get away from the big excuse that one encounters all the time from government members. That excuse seems to be that "many leading civil servants are not really pulling with us." There is a kind of grudge; a chip on the shoulder attitude. Many members of the government somehow feel they have not had the co-operation, the liaison, the confidence and support of so many people at the head of the public service. It is difficult for an outsider, such as an opposition member in a case like this, to judge. I do not know really whether it is the case. The point is that if the government members feel this way they should move and they should have moved long ago. This is the point that I would bring up in so far as the president of the C.N.R. is concerned, or even with regard to the governor of the Bank of Canada. But, as I say, I think we should expedite this bill and allow the Minister of Finance to get off and prepare for what I would expect to be sure to follow, namely his visit to the other place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat may I ask another question? Do I understand the hon. member to agree with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska who entertained us rather irrelevantly this afternoon in his—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —assertion that the C.N.R. should be run as the Intercolonial was run; in other words, there should be no independence of management and no merit system and the government should appoint all the employees?

Mr. Fisher: I just finished going through certain parts of Colonel Stevens', his first volume on the history of the C.N.R. I recall a story drawn from New Brunswick to the effect that with respect to the Intercolonial, a gravel pit that should have cost $5,000 wound up costing the Intercolonial $500,000. This was many years ago. I must admit I believe it was under a Liberal administration. Certainly we should not go back to that state of affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely that is what the hon. member wanted. May I be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman one more question. Is the hon. gentleman suggesting, as he seems to be, that the government backbenchers were quite right in suggesting the government should fire all the senior civil servants and put in a lot of Tories? Is the hon. gentleman not really suggesting that that would be the end result?

Mr. Fisher: No. My point is that a government should have complete confidence in its senior public servants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: Where it has not got complete confidence it should not have the excuse referred to, even in its own mind. It should do something about it. The point I was trying to make was that this government in this kind of situation has not indicated its intention. After all, I have been fired off jobs. I do not see why any civil servant should necessarily complain if he is fired for the reason that the government does not think he is doing an efficient job. My point is that the government did not move and has not moved in many cases—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is my point too.

Mr. Fisher: —and yet it is trying to use that excuse.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might be permitted one more question if the hon. member is agreeable. Does my amendment not say that the government should either put up or shut up, and should the hon. member not vote for it?

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, we now have before us Bill C-121, the title of which reads as follows:

An act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of July, 1961 to the 30th day of June, 1962 and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

What is the government asking of us by this bill? It is asking us to vote, for the benefit of the Canadian National Railways, a sum of $178,900,000. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), during the debate on second reading, moved the following amendment:

(Text):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house declines to give second reading to a bill providing large sums for capital expenditures on the railway system while the house is not possessed of the identity of those, namely, the chairman and members of the board of directors, who will be responsible for the making of such expenditures."

(Translation):

The government is asking us to vote the sum of $178,900,000 for the Canadian National Railway Company; a crown corporation. Why? To refinance that crown corporation.

It seems to me that we have a right to know before agreeing to vote such an imposing amount, who are the people who will be appointed to administer the C.N.R. in the coming year. At this point, we are still in the dark. Perhaps the ministers do know. Perhaps the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) does know. But certainly parliament does not know.

Mr. Speaker, the comments made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Fournier) somehow surprised me. Incidentally, may I commend him for rising this afternoon to give his maiden speech in this house.

I am most surprised that a former minister of the crown from one of Canada's provinces should make the statement on constitutional theory he did this afternoon. He said, in fact, that it was up to the government to vote the necessary sums of money. I always thought that the members for the house were responsible for such control.

We are not only asked to give a cheque of considerable value to the C.N.R., but we are not even to be told in whose name that cheque will be made out. The company is, at present, administered by a president appointed from day to day whose term of office may expire overnight.

A bill was adopted on May 22 last, authorizing the government to increase the number of directors of the C.N.R. from seven to 12. There are, consequently, five directors to be appointed.

The minister told us then that he had in mind to appoint some fine Canadians. The Minister of Transport would surely not appoint a bad Canadian as director of the C.N.R. But one thing remains: these appointments are the responsibility of the government. Almost seven weeks have passed since that bill was carried. And it was said at that time that the bill would be put into effect as soon as proclamation would be given. What keeps the minister from going to his colleagues from the cabinet and telling them: "Now is the time to act; now is the time to proclaim this legislation". What keeps him from making his colleagues see reason? Would he, by chance, not have his word to say in the cabinet? Is this a one man government, who would appoint his own creatures to the board of directors of the C.N.R.?

We have been accused of repeating ourselves in this debate as well as in many others. But we are compelled to repeat ourselves because here is a government which refuses to take action when the time has come to act. Here is a government which refuses to take its responsibilities. The present government beats about the bush and waits until things have come to a crisis before settling problems. It is notorious for its confusion, irresponsibility and irresolution.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has stated that we should look into other questions, for instance the trucking industry. I would like to point out that we will have an opportunity of discussing that point when the bill is before the committee. Right now, we are debating the amendment which has been moved. That point was raised by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), amongst others. We will consider it when the bill is examined in committee and we will take that opportunity to ask the minister to what precise use those $178.9 million will be put.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to urge the minister once more to take his responsibilities and to see that Bill C-94 is proclaimed, so that the new C.N.R. directors may be appointed.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two on this matter. I am not of the opinion that we should refuse to make this money available to the C.N.R. because it is a maintenance grant in lieu of revenue and really is in the form of a loan to maintain the operations of the railway; yet I am in agreement with the fact that the government is not to be trusted in the making of appointments when it gets around to doing so. In parliament we have only certain methods of enabling the government to do what we wish it to do and one of them is by the voting of money to make these things possible.

We have seen what has happened in the case of some of the appointments made by the government. When these people were under pressure from the government they did things that they were not willing to do of their own free will. Not because the government has the responsibility for appointing these people and probably not because of the responsibility we expect them to have to parliament but because of the responsibility that we have to parliament itself, I believe it is exceedingly important that we must examine and on the basis of our knowledge be very cautious about appointments the government makes.

It is quite possible that Canadian National Railways is not being operated properly and will not be operated properly unless the right people are appointed to the board. On many occasions my colleague, the hon. member for Port Arthur, has shown his reluctance to support the chairman of the board. I was not a member of the railway committee this year but I am told that when he appeared before it his attitude had changed. He did make some suggestions. He did, so to speak, turn over a new leaf. I believe that now it is the responsibility of the government to tell us, during the discussion of this bill, what their intention is in relation to his reappointment. The government should tell us whether they are going to appoint to the board people who are capable and qualified and who have the interests of the trucking industry at heart. It seems to me that trucking is becoming a greater and greater part of the transportation system known as Canadian National Railways, and it seems to me that the easiest way to make it impossible for us Canadians to afford a national railway system is to appoint people who are not qualified to speak for the trucking industry.

I believe, therefore, that we as members of parliament have a right to know who the directors are going to be. I believe we have the right to know whether they are being appointed for political reasons or whether they are being appointed because of a certain aptitude for the job they will be asked to do. Having in mind the remarks that have been made in the newspapers during the last two or three days about a board of directors, most of whom were appointed by this government in recent years, which made a decision and then for political reasons or under political direction made a complete about-face, I do not believe it is unfair for us to request this information. While it is not my intention to hinge our support of this measure on this request, I think it is important that, as members of parliament, we should give much closer attention to appointments to boards of directors of crown corporations. It seems to me there is a lack of good sense or good business judgment exhibited in the picking of directors for these companies. It would appear that in the case of one member of a board, to whom reference has been made in this house, the appointment depended entirely on the size of the contribution made to a candidate during the last election campaign.

I can see no reason why the minister cannot give us some indication of when these positions will be filled and who will fill them before we are called upon to pass this measure. This money will be used for the maintenance of the railway and it is necessary, therefore, to vote against the amendment which, in effect, would kill the loan that is to be made to Canadian National Railways. I do not believe our good judgment will permit us to pass on matters of this nature for much longer without being better informed than we are at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

[Mr. Peters.]

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the minister is of course introducing an annual bill; it is required every year. This year I think the annual expenditures are perhaps lower than we have experienced for some years. On the other hand we know that the committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government was confronted not only with a capital budget that may be reduced but also with operating reports which indicate that last year the railway had an unprecedented deficit notwithstanding capital revision. The situation that concerns many of us is the fact that for 1961, despite the forecast of the Minister of Finance that we might have an increase in gross national product, we will still have a deficit of $64 million in this most important crown company.

In addition to that, only in the last portion of Bill No. C-121 do I find clauses in language unsimilar to that of those which we have met every year heretofore. There we have a very interesting and significant matter. I think this committee should concern itself with this matter because we have a proposal from the government to defer responsibility in two or three items upon which this house reached a decision ten years ago when there was another revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways.

I think three clauses of this amending bill for 1691 are simply items of procrastination, and they are important items of procrastination. They refer to deferment of interest that might otherwise have been paid to the crown by this crown corporation on two or three items of concession given to the Candian National Railways ten years ago in 1951 in the revision of its capital structure. I hope the Minister of Finance will not be offended when I say this is rather typical of the procrastination in respect to decisions for which this government has been noted in recent times.

I indicated at the resolution stage that these capital revisions are of great consequence and I am not going to repeat myself in respect to that tonight. However, I indicated at that time that there had been write-offs to the extent of $700 million in 1951 and now a prospective write-off of an equivalent amount is to be postponed for one year. I think the minister should give us some indication when we are considering matters of this importance as to the direction in which the government might be leaning.

This government is now familiar with the testimony the chairman of the board of directors has given to the committee of this house during its sittings this year. In view of the write-offs in 1937 and in 1951 of these gigantic amounts, in each case almost $700 million, I think the minister should explain why this government is not willing to face up this year to those obligations which were made evident by the statute some ten years ago at which time there was a revision following the royal commission. What is the reason behind the failure of this government to face up to its obligations rather than asking us by means of three new clauses in this annual bill to defer this obligation? What is the reason for the procrastination and indecision on the part of this government in carrying out its obligations made evident in at least two statutes? I refer, of course, to the Canadian National Railways Refunding Act revision of 1955, and of course the basic Canadian National Railways Refunding Act of 1951. The debts incurred as a result of those two revisions normally would require interest payments.

The main difficulty as I see it is that this government is nonchalantly evading its obligation to make a decision in respect to the management of the Canadian National Railways and is again asking for a deferment. This measure indicates procrastination and indecision on the part of the government in respect to this important matter of which it should obviously have been aware because of the statutes of some ten years ago to which I have referred. At that time it was known that the expiry date would be 1960 or 1961. Yet by these three clauses in this bill we are now being asked to give the government a blank cheque, further time and condonation in respect to its indecision and procrastination. I think the minister should indicate the reason for this inasmuch as it was known some ten years ago that this would be required either this year or last. It was known ten years ago that the chickens would come home to roost this year. I ask the minister to explain to this committee why he is now asking us to condone this indecision, because obviously there is to be no decision in this regard this year, despite the fact that he promised last year that there would be. I ask the minister why this committee should now give this government a postponement by adopting the subclauses of this bill, the effect of which will simply give the government another year to make up its mind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is discussing matters pertinent to three specific clauses in the bill. I will be glad to discuss those matters when we reach consideration of those clauses, being No. 11, No. 12 and No. 13.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 1 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: I should like to deal with the matter of the trucking industry in Canada as related in particular to the C.N.R.

I think that, when we come to clause 3, I shall also take the opportunity to put questions about that matter to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

We have learned on June 29 last, in a letter from Reimer Express Lines Limited addressed, I think, to all members, that the East-West Transport Limited, a crown corporation financed by the crown, was one of those who were cutting rates in the trucking industry. We were also informed in a telegram sent to all members that the C.N.R. proposes to ask the Quebec provincial transport board permission to buy certain trucking companies. Needless to say the telegram was a protest against such a request.

We were given the opportunity to see the brief submitted in November 1960 to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) by the Quebec trucking association, a brief prepared by Mr. Camille Archambault, assistant to the chairman of public relations of the association. The brief shows on page 4 that the association includes:

> —1,046 members, owners of motor transports with more than 15,000 commercial vehicles for public transportation.

If the Canadian National Railways start buying out private trucking companies, they certainly are going to offer disastrous competition—to say the least—to small businesses with considerable transportation as well as handling personnel.

I quote Mr. Archambault's remarks, on page 4:

> The intrusion of railways into highway operations would certainly have serious consequences for the users and professionals in that field, as well as for our economy as a whole.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the proposed C.N.R. request—it may be pending before the provincial authority at present—should not be made or should not have been made. I know that some will object that the federal government has no business interfering with the administration of the provincial board of transport and I agree. But obviously the Canadian National Railways may or may not apply for such authority to purchase trucking companies to operate a highway transportation system in the province of Quebec or anywhere in Canada for that matter.

When we come to clause 3, I will ask the minister if in the amount mentioned there is something toward the purchase of such a system of road transportation.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before clause 1 carries, sir, in a rather menacing tone on my amendment on second reading the minister said that if this bill was not passed very promptly great harm would be done to the Canadian National. Would he specify what harm that would be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, those who are familiar with the purposes of the bill and with the resolution that preceded it will be aware that the bill authorizes the provision of money to meet certain capital expenditures of the C.N.R. for the period from January 1, 1961 to June 30, 1962. This bill provides authority for certain capital expenditures which, unless the bill is passed very quickly, will be impeded.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister cite one single expenditure that has so far been delayed because of any delay in the passage of this bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that funds pursuant to the provisions of this bill will be required by July 15.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister cannot assure us that there has been anything delayed because the bill has not passed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was informed, Mr. Chairman, that if the bill was not passed through all its stages by the 15th, which means this week, so that money will be released under its terms, then those programs would suffer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say which programs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The whole program which depends upon the release of funds by July 15. They require funds by July 15.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Benidickson: In this clause, Mr. Chairman, we have perhaps the central concern of all of us in passing this legislation, because it refers to capital expenditures which make this annual bill necessary. In his capacity as Minister of Finance, can the minister indicate to us when we might reach the stage where depreciation might approximate the capital requirements of the Canadian National Railways? We now have to provide loans for capital investment in this crown company as a result of which depreciation amounts to $120 million a year, I think. I see the Minister of Transport in his seat. Perhaps he might have some views on this subject to assist the Minister of Finance. When we get into the position where depreciation alone on capital assets that have resulted from appropriations by parliament is about $120 million, are we going to be asked in future years for capital advances that actually increase the over-all debt, and capital requirements that exceed the equivalent of normal depreciation rates on this vast asset in the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not wish to hazard an answer to that question. The depreciation accruals for 1961 are estimated at $108.1 million.

Mr. Benidickson: I said about $120 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure I have is $108.1 million.

Mr. Benidickson: It is $118 million, is it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, $108.1 million.

Mr. Roberge: Will the Minister of Finance now tell us whether the Canadian National Railway has made a request to the provincial transport board of Quebec for permission to acquire certain trucking companies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That I do not know, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Roberge: Does the Minister of Transport know the answer to that question?

Mr. Balcer: Repeat your question.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Could the Minister of Transport say whether it is true or false that the C.N.R. has filed an application with the Quebec transport board with a view to acquiring certain trucking companies?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, that is the information I have received.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to know from the Minister of Transport whether he has received a telegram from various trucking associations in Quebec, protesting this attempt by the C.N.R. to get into the Quebec trucking business?

(Text):

Mr. Balcer: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Roberge: Would the minister indicate to us whether in the amount that we are being asked to vote, especially in the material item, of approximately $14 million, any money is provided for the purchase of trucking equipment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that there is $6 million in round figures in this capital budget for highway equipment of all kinds. This includes some owned by the railway.

Mr. Roberge: If the minister has the information can he tell us what are the transport trucking companies that the C.N.R. is thinking of buying at the present time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have not that information but I do not know that it is ever given in advance of acquisition. It would be an extraordinary thing if before acquisition or during negotiations the Canadian National Railways were asked to make public its intention of making approaches to some companies with a view to arriving at a bargain with them. That would not be a conceivable way of carrying on business.

Mr. Roberge: Surely, Mr. Chairman, if the Canadian National Railways has made application to the provincial board to acquire some transport companies the approach has already been made. I am told that the minister does not have the information. I am not satisfied with the minister's answer, but I have to accept it.

Mr. Tucker: I should be grateful if the minister would advise whether any consideration is being given to enlarging the Newfoundland hotel in St. John's in view of the increased population of the city. St. John's now has a population of approximately 80,000. In view of the fact that in 1958 the Newfoundland hotel had a profit after allowance for interest and depreciation of approximately $153,000, $152,000 in 1959 and $152,000 in 1960 or more than $450,000 in three years, and in view of the existing conditions and the hardship on the travelling public in trying to secure hotel accommodation, would the minister advise whether any consideration is being given to the enlarging of the Newfoundland hotel in St. John's?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no provision in this capital budget for the enlargement of that hotel.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to know whether Mr. Gordon, before making application to the provincial transport board, discussed the matter with the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member heard the answer of the Minister of Transport on the subject.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in clause 3 dealing with capital expenditures we have a very substantial item involving branch line construction. This usually involves ancillary legislation related to particular new lines for which parliament takes responsibility and not the C.N.R., and included in the bills would be an authorized expenditure. We merely give to Canadian National Railways the administration of these roads. So many things are so long delayed this session, and although there was a reference in the speech from the throne to the desirability of proceeding with the Pine Point railway from the point of view of assisting in an upturn in the economy, we know that about six months have elapsed and nothing has been done.

I believe that under branch line construction on page 2 of the bill there is some provision for the Pine Point railway. We are now over half-way through the calendar year 1961. How much is likely to be expended in the calendar year 1961 on construction of the Pine Point railway?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That will depend, of course, on action by parliament. It will not be possible to undertake construction until parliament has passed the necessary enabling legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister wants to be fair and he knows that this bill includes not only authorization to the C.N.R. We do not hold up the C.N.R. This is a massive bill in so far as the authorization of capital expenditures is concerned. We are authorizing this capital budget of Canadian National Railways for the calendar year and, in fact, we go beyond that. In another clause of the bill we assure that the railway is not going to be held up and that in the first six months of the subsequent year it is going to have funds so that it can go ahead with a project such as I have described. What we are doing tonight in looking at this legislation has nothing at all to do with the programming of the Pine Point railway. There is a reference to $10 million in the contingency fund of Canadian National Railways for the Pine Point railway. I am simply asking the minister how rapidly is that money going to be spent? How rapidly is construction of the road likely to progress? To what extent will there be expenditures in the calendar year 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think anyone can answer that at the moment. One would have to know when parliament is going to take action on the measure on the order paper. There is provision, as the hon. member has indicated, by way of contingency to meet this or any other opportunities that arise for the construction of branch lines, but I cannot indicate to the hon. member what amount is likely to be expended during the present calendar year because I do not know when parliament is going to authorize construction of the Pine Point railway.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I suppose the minister is aware that in lower town in Quebec city there is a building belonging to the C.N.R. I was told that it was the intention of the C.N.R. to expand or make alterations or improvements to the building or possibly even to construct a new building there. In the $14 million is there any amount provided for that purpose?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand not.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, admittedly in clause 3 of the bill there is a substantial amount of capital requirement that involves a completely owned subsidiary of Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines. The amount is almost $20 million. Does this involve capital commitments made irrespective of the policy of the government with respect to a possible enlargement of the activities of the chief competitor of Trans-Canada Air Lines? I refer to Canadian Pacific Air Lines which now has a limited franchise. As far as I am aware, Trans-Canada Air Lines executives say that the air line can go forward successfully only if it is not faced with undue competition in the domestic sphere. Are these expenditures of almost $20 million to be made by Trans-Canada Air Lines irrespective of any decision that might be made by the air transport board which might increase domestic competition on the part of Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: The commitments have already been made for these capital expenditures. I assume that they involve up to date jet planes, that the orders have perhaps been placed and that irrespective of any decision that is made by the air transport board Trans-Canada Air Lines is committed to these financial expenditures. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, major expenditures were necessary in 1960 on account of ground facilities and maintenance facilities for the DC-8 and Vanguard aircraft. Of the $39 million for property and equipment in the 1961 T.C.A. budget, $29.5 million relates to programs approved in previous years' budgets. The major new commitments for 1961 are initial payments on the delivery in 1963 of five additional DC-8's—

Mr. Benidickson: 1963?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, delivery in 1963 of five additional DC-8's and the delivery in 1965 of 14 medium range jet aircraft.

Mr. Deschatelets: On page 2 under the heading "Investments in affiliated companies", there is an item amounting to $5,922,000. Has this item anything to do with investment of any sum in the trucking industry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an item of $5 million here for Canadian National Transportation Limited.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Issue of securities.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, subclause 1 of clause 4 reads:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and with the approval of the governor in council, the national company may issue notes, equipment trust certificates, bonds, debentures or other securities, bearing such rates of interest and subject to such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, to provide amounts required for the purposes of section 3.

My question is this. Would the minister explain to the committee under what circumstances they issue notes, equipment trust certificates, bonds, debentures or other securities, and what the other securities would be? I was interested in the terms of this clause because of the different types of securities given. In what proportion of the total are they usually issued?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a standard clause, Mr. Chairman, that has appeared in this bill for some years. As to the practice, I may say that in the case of advances made by the Minister of Finance to Canadian National Railways, these are on an interim basis and are secured by demand notes. So far as equipment trust certificates are concerned, I believe there has not been a case of the issuance of equipment trust certificates in recent years. So far as bonds are concerned, the company has been offering a bond issue on an average of about once a year, sometimes less often and sometimes a little more often. As to debentures and other securities, I do not believe there have been any debentures issued in recent years, as distinguished from bonds.

Mr. Herridge: What would the other securities be? I would be interested in that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any other form of securities that the company has issued in the last four years. This is an enabling provision which has been well established. Of course, in the case of privately owned companies these various forms of security would no doubt be used, depending on the circumstances. The circumstances would dictate the particular form that the security would take. These are all well recognized forms of security in the case of privately owned companies.

Mr. Herridge: Does the company ever give mortgages on its property as security?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it has not in my time, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 9—Minister may place amounts at disposal of company.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: I have a question to ask, Mr. Chairman, with regard to clause 9. This clause deals with the amounts paid by the C.N.R. to the trucking service.

If the income proved inadequate, could the C.N.R. under clause 9 apply to the Minister of Transport (Mr Balcer) for more funds, and could the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, make the additional money available?

Is my interpretation correct?

Let me put it more clearly. Could the C.N.R., assuming that receipts from the trucking service proved inadequate, come back for additional funds, and get the requested funds subject to the approval of the governor in council? Is my interpretation correct?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The deficits on any particular line, Mr. Chairman, or a particular operation of the total system are lumped, in the end, in the total financial report and figures of the entire system.

Mr. Deschatelets: If I am right in my assumption, Mr. Chairman, that means that the $6 million that is going to be used by the Canadian National and given to the trucking business is only a minimum.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will permit me to say so, I think he is confusing the current and capital budgets. The figure that was mentioned a little while ago of $6 million related to the capital budget. The hon. member then proceeded to ask me a question about deficits incurred on current operations. What I am saying is that in a huge system like Canadian National Railways system, where there are numerous railway lines some of which are still operated as separate railway lines, as well as other forms of transportation carried on by subsidiary corporations, the total operating statement of the system includes all of those whether the operation of a particular line has resulted in a deficit or a surplus.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder whether the minister could explain what to me appears to be a contradiction between clause 3 and clause 9. Under clause 3 we are asked that a fixed amount be provided, and subclause 6 states that no amounts shall be spent for a purpose mentioned in this section in excess of the amount authorized. Then, under clause 9, apparently there is provision made to the effect that whatever amounts have been spent in excess of that fixed amount they shall be reimbursed out of the funds of the government. I cannot follow the reasoning. Why, in one clause, are we asked for a fixed sum and why in another clause is it stated that if the company goes beyond that amount they shall be reimbursed out of the national revenues. Would the minister expain that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again, if the hon. member would permit it, I would say he is under a misapprehension here. Clauses 3 and 9 are not related. Clause 3 deals with capital expenditures while clause 9 deals with temporary loans by the government for the purpose of meeting income deficits. The two clauses are not related and clause 9 is in no sense a means of providing additional capital funds to the Canadian National Railways in excess of the amount permitted by clause 3.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Extension of period in respect of which no interest payable.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not believe the minister made any reply to the remarks I made earlier on this subject. I advanced the criticism that this government should have had adequate warnings and should have provided a new plan before the expiry of the ten year term. I know that we have had a reference to a royal commission. Did the royal commission deal with this particular problem? In what way did it deal with it? What were its recommendations? I take it that what is involved here is really an addition of one year to the ten year term of interest free lending to the Canadian National Railways on a principal sum of $100 million. I am sure the government realized this matter was coming up. It was in the bill that followed the Turgeon royal commission. Why are we avoiding facing up to what is required here, or am I wrong in thinking that we are really giving another year or an eleventh year of interest free lending to the extent of $100 million to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The hon. member is quite correct. The effect of section 11 is to extend for another year the moratorium on interest on the $100 million loan authorized by the capital revision act of 1952. The reason for this further extension is that this would not have been a suitable time to be undertaking another revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways when the royal commission is studying some matters which are of very great and far reaching importance to railways' financial operations in Canada. I do not suggest for one moment that the royal commission has been asked to make recommendations specifically with relation to the revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. I do not suggest that at all. However, the fact is that the matters that were referred to the royal commission for study and report are matters that are quite fundamental to the earnings position of the two great national railway systems in this country. It is surely the part of wisdom to await the report of the royal commission before launching into a subject like capital revision. We do not very often undertake capital revisions of the Canadian National system. The last one was to cover ten years. The next one may cover some years. I think the hon. member will agree that it would have been quite unwise to attempt one of these relatively rare and far reaching revisions before we had received the final report of the royal commission on the railway freight rates.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Continuation for further year of application of R.S., c. 311, s. 6(1).

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the minister would explain this clause. It seems to me that this is a repetition of a clause we had for the first time in our annual bill of last year. Am I right? This too results from a little procrastination in deciding what is going to be done about further revision of the capital structure of the C.N.R. You concluded debate very properly, Mr. Chairman, on the previous clause; but perhaps in courtesy the minister might just reply to this question. Notwithstanding the sittings of the royal commission, did the minister and the chairman of the Canadian National Railways confer at any time; and did the minister authorize the chairman of the Canadian National Railways to make the proposal he made to the House of Commons committee on railways, air lines and shipping, government owned, with respect to another very substantial write-off of capital debt?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 12 of the bill arises out of the same circumstances as does clause 11. The clause is new but its intent, as the hon. member has indicated, is similar to that of section 11 of the 1960 act. The effect of the clause is to extend the authority for purchase by the minister of the four per cent preferred stock of the company for a period of one year beyond the present expiry date of December 31, 1961.

This is not a matter of procrastination, Mr. Chairman. It is a matter of taking a wise course in the light of the fact that a royal commission is studying the whole question of our railway freight rate structure.

Mr. Benidickson: My question was this, Mr. Chairman. Had the chairman of the Canadian National Railways, prior to his testimony before the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, government owned, discussed with the Minister of Finance his proposal which was described by one member of the committee as a bombshell, namely a suggestion that another $700 million to $900 million of advances by taxpayers to this crown company might be written off on a further capital revision? Was that matter discussed with the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I had communication with the president of the Canadian National system on this subject. There has been an exchange of communications. He has submitted his views to me and study has been given to them. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that no decision has been reached.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is hardly necessary.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Issue of substituted securities: 1955, c. 31, s. 3.

Mr. Benidickson: I am satisfied with the explanation the minister gave at the resolution stage. What was the date of that stage? I do not have it before me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thursday, July 6.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought the minister then explained fully the requirement for this clause. This involves a completely different amendment from the one that was made in 1955. I am satisfied with that explanation. I simply wish to draw attention to the fact that an explanation was given in considerable fullness when the resolution was discussed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Auditors.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister whether there is in Mr. de Lalanne's contract with the Canadian National Railways or whatever arrangement there is with him any stipulation that he should have leave of absence if he wished to be a Conservative candidate at the next election.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fisher: I assume that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not to receive an answer to his question. There was some disappointment on the part of several members of the railways, air lines and shipping committee. I do not think I am taking too much on myself in saying that there was more than one who, without being critical of Mr. de Lalanne's evidence, felt that the annual report of the Auditor General is in many ways too brief and does not contain enough narrative to indicate the various steps taken and the way in which the work is approached and handled. I should like to make a suggestion at this particular time. I understand that he follows what is said in the house about the Canadian National Railways. Perhaps next year, if the minister does not draw it to his attention, the committee will receive from him perhaps more of a preliminary explanation and so would make our inquiry a little more forthcoming for us. I know the hon. member for Greenwood is looking at me. Of course he has experience in financial matters and I suppose chartered accountants and their doings are familiar to him. But Mr. Gordon himself said a number of times in the committee that chartered accountants have a language and a gobbledygook all their own and you really needed a translator. That was somewhat the impression we got from the very terse and very narrow replies we obtained to questions addressed to Mr. de Lalanne.

I would emphasize again that this is not expressed as any criticism of him. I just hope that in future we will get a more thorough explanation, more of an introduction and more of a narrative to indicate just how completely he does the job and how he sets about it. This would give us a better indication of what we can ask him in regard to what he discovered.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, before another hon. member rises there is this question that I wish to ask having heard the hon. member for Port Arthur. I think perhaps inadvertently the hon. member referred to a report of the Auditor General. I am sure he meant the auditor of the Canadian National Railways because it has always been mentioned in debate on this matter that the Auditor General is not the auditor of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways.

Does the hon. member for Port Arthur confirm that when he was referring to the auditor mentioned in the last clause of the bill he was referring to this gentleman who is a private auditor, and not the Auditor General?

Mr. Fisher: I certainly was. Perhaps we have the Auditor General on our minds these days, those of us who were in the broadcasting committee and saw his performance there. Perhaps he looms larger than he really should. I have one final question to ask the minister, if it has not already been put to him. What role is the Glassco commission playing in analysing the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the Glassco commission is playing any part in any detailed analysis of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways system. It may be looking at some general features of the relationship to government of this very large system. It would be a huge undertaking of itself to conduct an examination of the whole system internally from the point of view of those subjects upon which the Glassco commission has been directed to make its study and report.

Mr. Fisher: I raise this matter because that commission is doing some work in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That is not as large an organization as the Canadian National Railways, but I think it is No. 2 in government corporations. It seems to me the C.N.R. could be an appropriate field of analysis just as much as the C.B.C., if not more so. I thought the Minister of Finance could indicate whether the Glassco commission is, for example, going to examine the relationship between members of the House of Commons and the C.N.R. in so far as their questions going through the Department of Transport and the cost of them are concerned.

We certainly got the impression from Mr. Gordon in several instances that while the C.N.R. management was prepared to spend a great deal of time getting answers to questions of members of parliament, it was an expensive business and one that took away people from duties that were more intimately connected with the railway. I suggest that as a possible area for the Glassco commission to look at, because it always seems to be a good rebuttal to say to a member of parliament who asks detailed questions, "Well, look at the inordinate expense. What do you want the information for anyway?

As the minister probably knows, a study was made last year of government organizations. I have forgotten the author, but the work was published by Yale University I think. This man went back through the history of the relationships of these organizations to parliament, and by a long way the Canadian National Railways led all the rest in terms of consumption of parliament's time, volume of questions placed on the order paper and of starred questions. So apparently in our probing we create a great deal of work for the system and perhaps our inquiries cost a great deal of money. This, I underline again, might be an area for examination by the Glassco commission.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have a question supplementary to the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Will the minister be kind enough to tell us when Mr. de Lalanne was appointed? My second question is: is it the same Mr. de Lalanne who was an unsuccessful Conservative candidate for Westmount, I think, a few years ago?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. de Lalanne was first appointed auditor of Canadian National Railways in 1958. He is a very eminent accountant, with a most enviable reputation in his profession.

Mr. Deschatelets: Has the minister any answer to my second question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Such innocence.

Mr. Benidickson: I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance, for whom I have a high regard, with his usual seriousness and attentiveness to his duties has looked at the committee reports. I was not a member of the sessional committee this year but in reading its report I felt that perhaps the report of the auditor should be drawn especially to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

I assume the minister has looked at the report of the sessional committee but I wish to draw his attention to page 401, where it is indicated that capital expenditures on property investment were in the region of $169 million for 1960. Then on page 402 it is indicated that during the year there was an increase of $141 million in long term debt of the Canadian National Railways.

I raised this matter last year and I say it is something to which we have to face up. It is not dissimilar to the situation we have had in the last 10 or 15 years. But when does this increase in long term debt of this magnitude come to a stop? If the minister is not looking into this matter, is he asking somebody outside the Canadian National Railways, somebody in treasury board, to look at the statements of increase in long term debt of the Canadian National Railways compared with the increase in debt of Canadian Pacific Railway?

I have attempted to look into this matter and I know the minister cannot do it personally. I know I cannot. I have had a cursory look each year. But is there a serious study of this matter on the part of the cabinet, which makes available to the Canadian National Railways these massive sums? The long term result is that there is a steady increase in the fixed charges of the railway. As I see it, it is the fixed charges of the railway which are crippling the railway. I am not so sure—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is referred to in the auditor's report, if you look at page 403—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The Chair will need some guidance from the hon. member to determine whether the hon. member is within clause 14 which, as I understand it, deals with the auditing of the Canadian National Railways' accounts.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite. I have reference directly to the report of the auditor who is the man being reappointed and whose report is to be found at page 403 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping. I have related my remarks directly to that report, Mr. Chairman.

I do not wish to delay the committee. However, I am very concerned about this and I expressed my anxiety last year. I think there is some substantial reduction this year in the total amount of borrowing required by this crown company. That relieves some of my anxiety and distress. However, the facts are plain if one looks at the auditor's reports of last year and this year. I suggest that an increase of $141 million in over-all capital debt obligations of this railroad in this year plus a debt of $67 million is something deserving of careful attention.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When you said "debt" I take it you meant deficit?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I intended to refer to the deficit of $67 million. I should like some assurance from the minister that this situation is receiving consideration. I feel that an investment of $1 billion in improved and efficient equipment of this railroad should enable it to occupy a position of earnings which would show up to more advantage.

However, on the contrary, we have the largest deficit experienced in many years. I am wondering about this increase of $141 million in one year as disclosed in the auditor's report to the House of Commons committee, and I felt that concern was related to this clause of the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that this is a matter of continuing concern and directs attention to the whole question of the capital structure of the system. In 1960 there was a very high deficit amounting to some $67.5 million. There has been no deficit as high. The company did show a net revenue from railway operations of $7,347,000. The huge deficit is accounted for by the burden of fixed charges. At the same time there has been this continuing increase over the years in long term debt. Against that picture must be set the fact that some of the major capital investment programs of the company are coming to a close. The whole dieselization program which naturally has been costly in terms of the amount of investment is now relatively complete, and there will be operating savings as a result of that dieselization throughout the system. However, the matter to which the hon. member has called attention is one which will have to receive very careful study in relation to the proposed revision in the capital structure of the system within the coming year.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, there is a bit of confusion in this quarter of the committee as to the reply given by the minister to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont when he asked the minister whether Mr. J. A. deLalanne of Montreal, the auditor for the Canadian National Railways, was at any time a federal candidate of the Progressive Conservative party. I am sure the minister wishes the committee to have the facts. Can the minister say that Mr. J. A. deLalanne of Montreal, the auditor for the Canadian National Railways, was not a candidate for the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will say that he is a leader in his profession and a very eminent chartered accountant.

Mr. Pickersgill: How coy.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 14 carry?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, there is one point in connection with the auditor's report which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister. When the auditor was being questioned in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping I asked him certain questions about the trucking operations of the C.N.R. I should like to quote a portion of that discussion which is to be found at page 405 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping. I asked the following question:

> In your work this year did you go into the operations and the accounts of these subsidiaries?

Mr. de Lalanne replied as follows:

> Once these companies were actually 100 per cent or partially owned C.N.R. companies, I naturally considered it was part of my duty to satisfy myself with regard to whatever was being accumulated in the accounts of the C.N.R., for consolidation in these statements, and that the accounts were reasonably accurate, the same as I would in regard to hotels, telecommunications, and other things.

Now that I have looked at that statement in retrospect comparing it with the fact that Mr. Gordon indicated to us that Midland Superior, which is the largest of the trucking subsidiaries purchased by the C.N.R., is not included as actually being owned by the C.N.R., I would very much appreciate knowing whether Midland Superior came under audit in 1960. It has been suggested by other members that these trucking operations are in a peculiar position. I would certainly feel much better about that particular aspect of the Canadian National Railways trucking operation if we knew that it was being audited by the auditor for the Canadian National Railways. In view of the explanation given at page 405 of that report to which I have referred there is certainly some doubt in my mind that this is so. I felt this was a point worthy of bringing to the minister's attention for many reasons, not the least being because the president of the C.N.R. indicated that the profit from his particular company which apparently the C.N.R. does not own and does not show in its books was enough to balance the losses it incurred through the other trucking subsidiaries that it purchased. We have a most unusual situation here which I think is worthy of the minister's attention, and I should like to ask him to check with the auditor in this regard.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one final question in respect to this bill. Some 12 or 13 years ago a former minister of fisheries, who was the humble member for Coast-Capilano introduced a private member's bill which provided that the Auditor General would audit the book of accounts of the Canadian National Railways. If I remember correctly, that time he received some vociferous support from members of the Progressive Conservative party. In view of that support for that private member's bill by some members of the present government when they were in opposition, would the minister inform this committee whether the government has given consideration at any time to this auditing being done by the Auditor General?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it would not be possible for the Auditor General with his limited staff to undertake the auditing for the Canadian National Railways. To do so would involve a drastic revision of the whole set-up of the Auditor General's office. This involves a major audit and I think hon. members will appreciate that the present organization of the Auditor General is not such that it could undertake this audit.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

AGREEMENTS RESPECTING TAX COLLECTION, ANNUAL GRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces and to provide that the minister may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1962 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1967,

(a) a tax equalization payment;

(b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment;

(c) additional annual grants of ten and a half million dollars to each of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, and of three and a half million dollars to the province of Prince Edward Island;

(d) a further additional annual grant of eight million dollars to the province of Newfoundland;

(e) where a province does not levy a succession duty, an amount equal to the standard estate tax applicable to the province for the fiscal year; and

(f) advance payments on account of amounts collected under a tax collection agreement that may be entered into with the province.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, since assuming office four years ago, the government has devoted much time and study to the problem of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. It has materially increased the return to the provinces from the existing tax-sharing arrangements by raising from 10 per cent to 13 per cent the standard rate on personal income tax; and by introducing the Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grants, it has greatly broadened the fiscal aid element of federal assistance, and for the first time given full recognition to the special financial disabilities of the Atlantic region. Although it has greatly improved the financial substance of the present arrangements, this government has recognized the weaknesses of the tax rental system which it inherited, both from the provincial and federal standpoint, and has become increasingly convinced of the need for a new approach which would give greater freedom and responsibility to the provincial governments, and which would be compatible with the constitution.

During the past year we have held three dominion-provincial conferences for the purpose of reaching agreement with the provinces on the form of the financial arrangements which should exist after the expiry of the present Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act on March 31, 1962. The first of those conferences was held July 25 to 27, 1960; the second, October 26 to 28, 1960 and the third February 23 to 24 of this year.

At the first of those dominion-provincial conferences, held July 25 to 27, 1960, the provinces presented their views on the form the new arrangements should take. Consideration of the financial substance of the provincial proposals made at that first conference will reveal the major weakness of the tax rental system. The provinces, like the federal government, have great and expanding responsibilities. In aggregate, the provincial proposals made at the July conference would have cost the federal treasury something in excess of $2 billion annually, an additional cost equal to more than one third of the total federal revenues for the fiscal year 1960-61. Under such circumstances it became increasingly evident that the tax rental system was unsound. It placed on the federal government the whole responsibility for levying the additional taxes to support large increases in provincial expenditures. The provincial governments assumed no responsibility for imposing the rented taxes on which they depended for revenues nor had they any freedom to amend the rates of these taxes in line with their current needs. Such a system was clearly destructive of provincial responsibility and initiative, and incompatible with the constitution which grants equal access to the federal and provincial governments in these fields of direct taxation.

Accordingly, at the October conference the Prime Minister suggested that the provinces might consider again imposing their own taxes on individual and corporate income, and their own succession duties at such rates as they judged appropriate in view of their needs for revenue. To make the provincial re-entry into these tax fields practicable, the federal government was prepared to recommend to parliament that the federal tax rates in the three shared tax fields be reduced at the time of the termination of the present tax rental agreements, March 31, 1962, by the amount of the present effective standard rates, that is the so-called 13-9-50 formula.

I should explain that under section 2(3) of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act the standard individual income tax rate of 13 per cent is altered to compensate for any change in federal income tax rates from the rates in effect January 6, 1956. At the time of the October conference the effective rate determined in accordance with section 2(3) was 13.98353 per cent, or approximately 14 per cent. While offering a reduction in taxes equal to the standard rates the federal government was at the same time mindful of the need to support the revenue systems of the less well-to-do provinces and accordingly offered to recommend the continuation of a system of equalization.

On the basis of the discussion of the suggestions made at the October conference and further intensive study, the federal government advanced certain proposals at the dominion-provincial conference February 23 and 24 of this year. The Prime Minister's statement to the conference appears as an appendix to Hansard of February 28. As I stated in my budget speech of June 20, the main proposals were that the tax rental system be discontinued, that the provinces impose their own taxes and that a fair and more realistic system of equalization be introduced. At the same time the federal government undertook to reduce its income taxes to a larger extent than was suggested at the October conference. Instead of reducing the personal income tax by 14 per cent, which is the approximate effective standard rate at the present time, the federal government was prepared to recommend to parliament withdrawing from the personal income tax by 16 per cent in the first year of the agreements and an additional percentage point in each of the subsequent years so that in the final year the withdrawal would be 20 per cent.

This additional tax room was offered to the provinces in the personal income tax rather than in the corporation income tax quite deliberately and for good reasons: first, because of the steadier and more rapid growth of personal income tax yields the personal income tax is a more satisfactory revenue source from a provincial standpoint; second, many corporations operate on a national scale and corporation profits are therefore generally regarded as more appropriate for taxation by the federal government; third, the present provincial share of corporation income taxes is 9 percentage points on corporate taxable income, or about 22 per cent to 23 per cent of total corporation income taxes, so that it is reasonable to increase the provincial share of personal income tax before making any adjustment with respect to corporation income taxes.

In short, the provinces would reassume their constitutional rights and responsibilities to impose and vary their tax levies as they saw fit. At the same time in the interests of administrative simplicity and uniformity and in order to save the provinces the expense of setting up tax collection machinery of their own, the federal government was prepared to collect the provincial personal income and corporation income taxes free of charge provided the provincial tax base was identical with the federal tax base at all times. It was explained that this offer could not be extended to the estate tax since the provinces do not have the constitutional power to levy an estate tax on the federal basis. Accordingly, the federal offer in respect of the estate tax was that any province not levying succession duties would receive half the yield of the federal estate tax while an abatement of 50 per cent of the federal estate tax would be granted as at present to provinces levying their own succession duties.

The proposals presented by the Prime Minister to the conference on February 23 and 24 were discussed at that conference and subsequently received intensive consideration and re-examination by federal and provincial officials at two meetings of the Continuing Committee on Fiscal and Economic Matters. In the light of this further study, the proposals were re-examined by the federal government and a letter was written to the provincial premiers by the Prime Minister on June 16 of this year. This letter was tabled in this house and appears in Hansard of June 19.

As the present resolution indicates, the proposal of a system of tax collection agreements to replace the tax rental agreements is a central part of the new approach and is provided for in the bill which I shall introduce. Obviously a system which gives the provinces the right to vary the rates of taxation without imposing on them the administrative burden of collecting the taxes has great advantages for them. It restores the necessary flexibility to the provincial tax system, enabling the provinces to meet increased needs for revenue not only from such sources as the sales tax, the gasoline tax and motor vehicle revenues but from the direct taxes on income which have for the past 20 years been controlled by agreement. The counterpart of this freedom and flexibility is the independence and responsibility of the provinces. There can be no question that in a healthy federal state in which the goal should be enlightened co-operation rather than centralization, it will be better for the provinces to face up to their responsibilities of levying taxes for provincial purposes in the tax fields which were assigned to them by the constitution.

I referred in my budget speech to the fact that replacing the tax rental agreements by tax collection agreements would also have advantages from the federal standpoint. The provinces will be in the position of having to assess realistically their new proposals for expenditure in the light of their revenue potential rather than placing increasing pressure on the federal government. The federal budget will no longer be inflated by taxation which can and should be imposed at the provincial level. I estimate that for the first year of the new arrangements the adoption of a tax collection system will remove more than $300 million from the federal budget.

I have referred to the fact that the federal government was prepared to recommend to parliament certain reductions in the rates of the federal income tax in order to permit the re-entry of the provincial governments into these fields. The amount of these reductions was set forth in my budget speech. When this government took office in 1957 the standard rates under the tax rental agreements were 10-9-50, that is to say, the provinces received 10 per cent of the personal income tax collections, 9 percentage points on the taxable income of corporations and 50 per cent of the succession duty or estate tax. In 1958 this government introduced legislation increasing the provincial share of the personal income tax from 10 to 13 per cent. With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard at this point table No. 1 which indicates the increase in provincial revenue which resulted from this increase of 3 percentage points in the standard rate of individual income tax. May I have that leave, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say what years that covers? Is it all the years since the change was made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It covers the years 1958-59 up to 1961-62 inclusive.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Does the committee give leave to have this table printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The calculations for 1958-59 are based on the Final Calculation of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization Payments for the fiscal year 1958-59 dated Dec. 24, 1959; for 1959-60 on the Final Calculation of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization for fiscal year 1959-60 dated Dec. 22, 1960; for 1960-61 on the Fifth Estimate of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization for fiscal year 1960-61 dated Jan. 6, 1961; and for 1961-62 on the First Estimate of Standard Taxes, Equalization and Stabilization for fiscal year 1961-62 dated May, 8, 1961. The Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grant and the deduction on account of Quebec special corporations taxes are excluded.

The figures in brackets exclude the amount of the abatements.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In 1958-59 this increase was worth $55.9 million to the provinces, in 1959-60 $67.2 million, in 1960-61 $68.3 million, and the estimated value for 1961-62 is $72.6 million or a total of $262 million for the four years.

The withdrawal provided for under the new arrangements is 16 per cent of the personal income tax in the first year and rises by 1 percentage point each year to 20 per cent in the last year, that is, by 1966. Thus the share which the provincial governments will receive of personal income taxation will by the final year of these agreements be double the share which was provided when this government took office. Having in mind the system of Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grants introduced by this government and the very great rise in federal payments to the provinces on account of conditional grants as well as the increase in other federal responsibilities, the offer to provide for this increased provincial share in the personal income tax is very generous. The offer to increase the withdrawal in the personal income tax from the effective rate of approximately 14 per cent at present to 20 per cent by the end of the next five year period means that the federal government has offered to increase the provincial share of this tax field over the next five years by more than 40 per cent even if the provinces impose taxes no greater than the amount of the federal withdrawal. I should like at this point to place on Hansard table No. 2 showing the federal contributions to or for the benefit of the provinces and certain provincial institutions for the fiscal years 1956-57 to date, including the estimated amounts for 1961-62.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Has the minister leave to have this table printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The table indicates that the total value of these payments and abatements has more than doubled in the short space of five years—from $689.4 million in 1956-57 to $1,470.1 million in 1961-62.

As I mentioned earlier, the proposal to offer tax collection agreements and to increase the share of the personal income tax available to the provinces was accompanied by a proposal for an improved system of equalization and larger grants to the Atlantic provinces. As the resolution indicates, provision is made for equalization payments, payments to the Atlantic provinces, stabilization payments, and payments of a special grant of $8 million per annum to Newfoundland.

Under the present arrangements equalization is based on the per capita yield from the three standard taxes, that is, from the personal income tax, corporation income tax and succession duties at the standard rates of 13-9-50 in the two provinces which have the highest per capita yield. There are two fundamental weaknesses in this formula. The first is that equalization to the per capita yield in the two provinces with the highest yield is not realistic. The second is that by limiting the equalization formula to the three standard taxes no account is taken of wide variation in the revenues from other provincial sources. Equalization based on standard tax yields in the top two provinces led in some instances to larger payments than could be defended on the basis of fiscal need. At the same time it took no account of variations in fiscal capacity due to differences in other revenue sources.

It was with these considerations in mind that the government decided to propose an equalization formula based on the national average yields of standard taxes plus 50 per cent of the natural resource revenues. I should like at this point to refer to two tables which were presented to the dominion-provincial conference of February 23-24 of this year and which appear as an appendix to Hansard of March 7, 1961, in order to illustrate the effect of the new proposals. The first is a table showing natural resource revenue for the years 1956, 1957 and 1958, and the second is a table which illustrates the effect of including provincial natural resource revenue in the equalization formula. It will be seen from examination of the first table that there is an extremely wide variation in the amount of natural resource revenue per capita in the provinces, ranging from a low of 18 cents per capita for the three year average in Prince Edward Island to a high of $112.17 per capita in Alberta. The national average is $16.62 per capita. It was because of this extreme variation that it was decided that the inclusion of some portion of natural resource revenue in the equalization formula would produce a much better indication of fiscal need. It was decided therefore to include only 50 per cent of the average natural resource revenue on the ground that this would allow for some variation in the different rates of taxation in the provinces while at the same time not discouraging the provinces from using this revenue source.

The other element in the equalization formula consists of the standard taxes. For purposes of the equalization formula, the standard rates will be the rates by which the federal government withdraws from the standard tax fields, that is, 16-9-50 in the first year, 17-9-50 in the second year, 18-9-50 in the third year, 19-9-50 in the fourth year, and 20-9-50 in the fifth and final year of the new period. This means that the basis of the equalization payments will rise throughout the period as the federal government leaves increasing room in the personal income tax field for the provinces. The national average per capita yield of the standard taxes for any year plus 50 per cent of national average per capita return from natural resources for the average of the three preceding years will thus constitute the level below which no province can fall.

In addition, two equalization guarantees are provided. First, for provinces below the national average in the yield of standard taxes and 50 per cent of natural resource revenue, the equalization will never be less than enough to make them at least as well off as they would have been under a projection of the present arrangements. Second, for no province will the equalization payments ever be less than enough to bring its total receipts under the new arrangements up to the level of its total receipts in the final year of the old arrangements or in the average of the last two years of the old arrangements, whichever is the greater. The equalization provisions are applicable to all provinces whether or not they enter into tax collection agreements with the government of Canada.

At this point, with the permission of the house, I should like to place on Hansard table No. 3 containing a hypothetical illustration of how the equalization formula would apply to the year 1962-63 on certain assumptions.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Has the minister such permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Present Formula (13–9–50)—revenues projected to 1962–63 from First Estimate for 1961–62 using same assumptions as with New Formula:
total revenues from standard taxes at 13–9–50, equalization, stabilization, Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grants, Additional Grant to Newfoundland	37,227	7,381	41,315	35,762	241,500	296,170	42,296	42,528	61,294	76,069	881,542
1957 Formula (10–9–50)—revenues projected to 1962–63 from First Estimate for 1961–62 using same assumptions as with New Formula:
total revenues from standard taxes at 10–9–50, equalization, stabilization	19,556	4,881	30,430	25,426	217,284	266,865	38,056	38,268	55,144	76,026	771,936

NOTE: The projection of the New Formula is based on standard taxes of 16–9–60, i.e., on rates equal to the federal withdrawal. The provinces will of course be free to levy higher or lower rates than these and if they do so their receipts will be correspondingly higher or lower. The federal withdrawal in the individual income tax will rise progressively during the five year period commencing March 31, 1962 reaching 20% in the fifth year. The value of the additional four points made available to the Province of British Columbia, for example, will be $8,942,000 in terms of 1962–63 tax yields as estimated above.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should point out that the figures in this hypothetical illustration differ somewhat from those presented at the February conference and tabled in Hansard of March 7, 1961, because they are based on more up to date estimates.

The above table gives a comparison between the estimated amount the provinces would have received under a projection of the arrangements in effect when this government took office four years ago when the standard rates were 10-9-50 and their estimated receipts under the new arrangements proposed. It will be seen from this table that in aggregate the provinces will be $127.5 million better off under the proposed arrangements than they would have been under the arrangements in effect four years ago. This is the estimated benefit in the first year of the proposed arrangements. This benefit will increase materially in subsequent years as the federal income tax withdrawal increases from 16 per cent to 20 per cent.

The resolution also refers to increased grants to the Atlantic provinces, bringing the total of these grants from $25 million in each of the last four years to $35 million for each of the five years in the next period. This special and separate recognition of the fiscal problems of the Atlantic region was initiated by this government and has been widely acclaimed, not only in the Atlantic region. It complements the improved equalization formula. The decision to increase these grants by 40 per cent for the next five year period is a further indication of the emphasis which this government wishes to put upon the need for placing all regions of Canada in a position to supply essential services without resorting to unduly burdensome levels of taxation.

The resolution also indicates that the bill will provide for an additional payment of $8 million per annum to the province of Newfoundland for each of the five years of the new period. This is in recognition of the special fiscal need of the province of Newfoundland.

The over-all effect of the new equalization formula taken together with the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants and the special payment of $8 million per annum to Newfoundland will be a greater emphasis on fiscal need. I should like to illustrate this fact by making certain comparisons. In 1957-58, the first year of the present tax rental arrangements, the total equalization payments of $136.0 million were distributed as follows: Newfoundland, 8.5 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 2.2 per cent; Nova Scotia, 12.8 per cent; New Brunswick, 6.4 per cent; Quebec, 31.7 per cent; Ontario, nil; Manitoba, 10.2 per cent; Saskatchewan, 14.1 per cent; Alberta, 10.8 per cent; and British Columbia, 3.3 per cent.

In the first year of the new proposals the estimated total of fiscal aid including equalization, Atlantic provinces grants and the special grant of $8 million to Newfoundland will be $216.7 million and will be distributed as follows: Newfoundland, 15.2 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 3.2 per cent; Nova Scotia, 13.8 per cent; New Brunswick, 11.9 per cent; Quebec, 33.4 per cent; Ontario, nil; Manitoba, 5.9 per cent; Saskatchewan, 10.3 per cent; Alberta, 5.8 per cent; and British Columbia, 0.5 per cent. Thus the share of these greatly increased fiscal aid payments going to the Atlantic region will have risen from 29.9 per cent to 44.1 per cent. By the end of the five year period of the new proposals the share going to the Atlantic region will be over 50 per cent, provided rates of growth are not greater in the Atlantic region than elsewhere in Canada. Thus the new formula gives full recognition to the principle of equalization and fiscal need which this government has always maintained to be essential. At the same time the federal treasury will be saved the expense of paying equalization on an unrealistic basis and unsupported by fiscal need.

Under the present tax rental agreements certain stabilization provisions were included to protect the provinces against an undue decline in the revenue from the standard taxes and equalization. It can be argued that it is not the federal government's responsibility under tax collection agreements to protect the provinces from declines in the yield of their own taxes. It was evident, however, during the course of the discussions, that the provinces attached considerable importance to the stabilization provisions of previous agreements. Under the existing arrangements, the stabilization provisions ensure that a province will not receive less in any year from standard taxes, equalization, and stabilization than 95 per cent of the total it received in the average of the two preceding years. It was decided as a concession to the provinces to continue this provision so that even under tax collection arrangements all provinces, including those which do not enter into collection agreements, will be protected from an inordinate decline in the revenues from the standard taxes and equalization.

Reference is made in the resolution to the fact that the bill will provide for advance payments in respect of the taxes collected under the tax collection agreements with the provinces. The details of the tax collection agreements will have to be worked out in the course of the succeeding months. However, it has been evident from the discussions to date that some of the provinces will wish the tax collection payments to provide for an even flow of revenue throughout each fiscal period as is provided under the present tax rental agreements. Therefore it is necessary to provide authority for the federal government to pay out money to the provinces on an estimated basis pending the final determination of the amounts of provincial tax assessed year by year.

I wish at this time to refer to three other matters which are not included in the bill but which may nevertheless be regarded as part of the proposed fiscal arrangements for the provinces for the period after March 31, 1962.

Under the 1947 and 1952 Tax Rental Agreements Acts provision was made for paying to the provinces half of the federal income tax collected from certain public utility corporations whose main business is the distribution or generation for distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam in respect of income of the corporation derived from the said distribution or generation. This sharing has been continued on a year to year basis since then and has been provided for in the estimates. It was evident from the discussions at the conferences that most of the provinces attach great importance to the continuation of this arrangement. As a concession to the representations made by the provinces, the government proposes to give the assurance that this sharing will be continued throughout the period of the next agreements, that is, for the next five years up to and including the fiscal year 1966-67.

A second matter which will be dealt with outside the provisions of the bill is the matter of a co-operative approach toward the taxation of the forest industry. Under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, provincial taxes on the income from logging operations are specifically excluded from the corporation taxes which a province must refrain from levying in order to enter into a tax rental agreement with the government of Canada. Taxes on logging profits are imposed in two provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, and although these taxes are deductible as expenses in computing federal income tax, the result has been that in these provinces the forest industry bears somewhat higher income taxes than other industries. It was because of the government's concern with this situation that the Prime Minister made the following statement in his letter of June 16, 1961 to the provincial premiers:

> At the conference I stated that the federal government was prepared to consider certain concessions in connection with the taxation of the forest industry if the provinces were willing also to make some concessions. It has been conceded that because the logging profits tax is levied in addition to the corporation income tax, the forest industry bears a greater tax burden than other industries. The possibilities of lessening the burden of taxation on the forest industry have been discussed at the official level. One of the possibilities discussed was that a tax credit, shared between a province and Canada, might be granted to the industry.
> Before this can be done some further technical discussions will be required to reach agreement on the definition of logging income which will be subject to tax and accepted for the purpose of this tax credit. Subject to reaching agreement on this matter of the definition of logging income, the federal government is prepared as a means of relieving the tax burden on the forest industry to offer a tax credit equal to two thirds of the logging tax up to a maximum rate of 10 per cent, provided the province gives a tax credit equal to the remaining one third of such logging tax.

A third matter has been under discussion with the provinces for some time and that is the application of provincial sales taxes to federal agencies and corporations. Similar agencies and corporations at the provincial level have been subject to federal sales and excise taxes and it has been the contention of the provinces that federal agencies should be placed in the same position. At the February conference the Prime Minister made the following statement concerning this matter:

> We have given further thought to the means of achieving reciprocity of treatment in the position of provincial crown corporations and agencies under federal sales and excise taxes and the position of federal corporations and agencies under provincial direct taxes on purchases. We are prepared to waive federal immunity from taxation and instruct federal corporations and agencies to pay provincial purchase taxes and other similar taxes, on the understanding that provincial corporations and agencies will be subject to federal sales and excise taxes. We think that this is an equitable arrangement, being in accordance with the general principles followed in regard to the payment of federal taxes on purchases by federal departments. We think it is better than reciprocal exemptions as an administrative and accounting arrangement, preserving as it will a fairer relationship between crown corporations and agencies in general and private businesses.

We are proceeding with the preparation of a list of federal agencies and corporations which would be subject to provincial sales taxes and any necessary legislation providing for such payment of taxes will be introduced to take effect April 1 next year.

I have now explained the main features of the bill as provided for in the resolution and have dealt with certain ancillary matters which are part of the fiscal arrangements. The provisions of the bill will reaffirm and strengthen the principle that equalization payments must take full account of fiscal need and at the same time enable the provinces to exercise their constitutional rights of taxation. The government is convinced that the new arrangements provided for under the bill will be the basis for a sound partnership between the provinces and the federal government and will usher in a new era of co-operation on more equal terms.

Mr. Pearson: In what some of us still persist in hoping are the dying hours of this session which began last November the minister has put before the committee a resolution dealing with a subject which is almost as important as any subject can be in a federal state, namely the fiscal and financial relationships between the provinces and the central government. Our whole history shows the importance of this matter in national development, unity and strength. If that development in our federal society cannot proceed in a way which provides for the maintenance of a reasonably balanced level of essential services throughout the country so that there will not be in this federation underdeveloped areas in that sense, our history shows that the federation cannot be strong. Our history also shows that this consideration puts an obligation on the federal government to assist, through fiscal aid and financial aid, those provinces which are not as fortunate as others in their resources and because of that fact have not access to as much financial resources as have some of the more fortunate and richer provinces. That is the basis on which the federal government has helped the provinces ever since 1867.

In his statement the minister said that the principle in the relations between the provinces and the federal government in this field, and I would add in every other field, must be one of enlightened co-operation rather than centralization. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we all agree with that statement. We on this side will consider the application of this formula in that light, namely whether it implements the principle of enlightened co-operation; whether it is fair in its impact on the poorer provinces; and above all, whether it implements in a fair and equitable way the principle to which we on this side have always attached so much importance, namely the principle of equalization. The minister spoke for some time, Mr. Chairman, and we will examine with great care what he has said. Especially will we examine the statistical tables he has placed on the record. I thought some of the minister's arguments and some of his statements, and especially his passion now for the principle of equalization, were a little disingenuous in the light of the past history of the attitude of his party to this matter. I also noticed that, among the tables which the minister inserted into the record, he did not include, or at least I did not gather that he did so, one which we would certainly like to see included, namely a table which would show what the continuation of the present arrangement would mean to the provinces in comparison with the application of the new formula.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is on record in one of the earlier tables.

Mr. Pearson: As I say, we will study these tables with interest. I have not had much chance tonight to do that. We will have something to say about these tables and we shall also be glad indeed to put on Hansard a few tables of our own, as our interpretation of the application of this new formula is certainly not that which has been given to us tonight by the minister. In any event, this new formula or this new deal embodied in this resolution on which a bill will be based is apparently the result of four years' consideration given to this matter by the federal government. This is the final outcome of the promises made by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958 when they told the provinces there would be a new deal which would be acceptable to all the provinces and welcomed by them. We remember particularly the statements made by the Prime Minister in Ontario and the reaction of those statements by the premier of Ontario. We also remember the amount which the premier of Ontario said would be fair to that province under the new deal which he assumed the new government would give him and on the strength of which he begged the people of Ontario to "follow John".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That amount was $100 million.

Mr. Pearson: That amount was $100 million. They have not followed John into $100 million for Ontario but they followed him into a sales tax for Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If these proposals which the minister has put before the committee tonight carry out all these desirable principles which the minister has mentioned such as equalization, enlightened co-operation, greater assistance to the provinces and greater recognition of provincial fiscal needs, it is a strange thing that these proposals have not been accepted with enthusiasm by all the provinces.

That has not happened. Most of the provinces have been dissatisfied with the deal which has been put before them. Some provinces, especially the less rich provinces, are complaining about the inadequacy of this formula which is a result of four years' consideration by this government and which was to put the fiscal relations of the provinces and the federal government on a new and more satisfactory basis.

The resolution contains these words:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces—

We will have something to say about these agreements:

—and to provide that the minister may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1962 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1967,

(a) a tax equalization payment;

The minister had a great deal to say this evening about this principle of equalization and the way this formula was implementing it in a way which would strengthen rather than weaken the principle. We claim, and we will be able to produce evidence to support the claim, that the equalization formula weakens rather than strengthens the principle. In any event, the principle itself is not so important as the base on which the principle is applied. For the minister to argue that by altering the base from the top two provinces to the national average strengthens rather than weakens the principle is very, very difficult for us on this side of the house to understand. We would like the minister in the course of this discussion to tell us how this equalization payment under the new formula will actually affect the various individual provinces. I am not sure whether the tables the minister introduced tonight deal with that matter, but perhaps he will deal with it before the debate is over.

The government has claimed, and the minister has repeated the claim this evening, that these new tax collection agreements represent a return to the spirit of the constitution and this gives back to the provinces their complete rights in the field of direct taxation. The minister claims that this represents, in that sense, a very great advance over the tax rental agreement formula. Of course that claim, if I may use the minister's favourite word, is nonsense. Under the present system which has been applied since 1957 three options were offered to the provinces. They could levy and collect their taxes at whatever rates they wished to determine themselves. They have always had that option. They could simply rent the three direct tax fields or they could levy those taxes, and the federal government was willing to collect them provided the provincial rates did not exceed the standard rates. Up to the present, then, the provinces have had these three options. Nobody forced them into the tax rental agreement field. They had the other options. Under the new formula the rental option would cease to be available and the federal government would be willing to collect provincial taxes at any rates.

While this last change—the minister went to some pains to illustrate this point this evening—may be an improvement for certain of the richer provinces, it can hardly be described as a revolutionary change. The minister called it—and I am paraphrasing what he said—a sort of introduction of the idea of flexibility. He said this provides more flexibility in these areas. But this new arrangement may very well lead to the tax jungle of the 1930's. Moreover, to the extent that the provinces will have to depend on additional direct taxes without equalization for their financing, great regional inequalities will arise because for most of the provinces equalization is a very important source of revenue. We claim that the principle of equalization and the application of that principle in the new formula will react to the disadvantage of the poorer provinces. Indeed the provinces themselves have already pointed that out to the minister. They seem singularly ungrateful for this new deal which according to the minister is going to mean so much to them.

Therefore we on this side of the house claim that the equalization principle is weakened under this new formula and we will produce evidence to support that contention. We claim that the new proposal is much more a return to the tax jungle and the inequalities of the 1930's than even the 1867 arrangement which embodied a large element of equalization.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it 10.30.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader would indicate what business the government intends to bring forward tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: It will be a continuation of the program as outlined; third reading of Bill No. C-120 regarding the Income Tax Act, then a continuation of the debate on the resolution with which the committee has just been dealing, and the other item on the order paper, Bill No. C-71, an act respecting the civil service of Canada. Those are the legislative items that will be available to the house tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister any views about the report of the committee on procedure?

Mr. Churchill: I am waiting for an opportunity, when the house is free of some of the other business, to consider that matter. Then, of course, we have interim supply to take into consideration.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader would consider bringing in the civil service bill tomorrow so that the Minister of Finance might be free to attend, if he so desires, the Senate committee on the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, your solicitude is so impressive. You are most unselfish.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.M.H.C. REPOSSESSIONS

Question No. 277—Mr. Meunier:

1. How many houses have been repossessed for Central Mortgage and Housing, by provinces, for each year from 1957 to 1960 inclusive?
2. What is the value, by provinces, of these repossessions?

HOUSING—LATEST N.H.A. STATISTICS

Question No. 286—Mr. McCleave:

What are the latest figures under the National Housing Act for (a) housing (b) assistance on municipal sewage projects (c) loans for university residences, during 1961?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

(a) In June, housing starts in urban centres numbering 10,644 dwelling units were at the highest level since November, 1959, and represented an increase of 22.3 per cent over June, 1960.

Starts for the first six months of 1961 totalled 39,981 an increase of 35.3 per cent over the figure for the first half of 1960.

N.H.A. lending activity continued to improve in June, bringing loan approvals for the first six months of the year to 29,823 dwelling units, up 190.6 per cent over the 10,262 reported for January-June, 1960.

(b) Up until June 30, 72 loans amounting to $30,426,000 for the purpose of providing assistance in the construction of municipal sewage treatment projects have been approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Loans have now been approved to municipalities in each of the 10 provinces. In addition, 14 formal applications are on hand for loans amounting to $2,450,000, together with another 199 preliminary inquiries. For 123 of the latter, the municipalities' estimate of loans required totals $67,558,000.

(c) Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has also made 11 loans in an amount of more than $9.5 million to universities to assist in the construction of student residences. The universities for which loans have been approved are: University of New Brunswick, Acadia University, University of King's College, St. Francis Xavier University, Assumption University, Waterloo Lutheran University, Brandon College, United College, Winnipeg, Emmanuel College, Saskatoon, Notre Dame College, Wilcox, Saskatchewan and University of British Columbia. The residences to be built with the assistance of these loans will accommodate more than 2,000 students.

In addition to loans approved, the corporation has received and is reviewing applications from 13 other universities that are seeking loans aggregating some $19.5 million to accommodate 4,500 students.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 12, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STARRED QUESTIONS

C.N.R.—DISTRIBUTION OF PRESIDENT'S COMMENTS BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

Question No. 440—Mr. Pitman:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways, directly or indirectly, reproduce and mail any portion of the comments of its president, Mr. Donald Gordon, made at any of the meetings during the present session of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping?

2. If so: (a) what portions were so reproduced, by whom, by what method, how many, and at what cost? (b) to whom and by whom were such reproductions mailed, and at what cost?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows: Certain portions of the testimony referred to were reproduced in regular editions of two employee communications media known as Management Bulletin and Daily Report. This is normal practice. In addition, as suggested during the committee, other features of the testimony will be reproduced in the magazine Keeping Track. The first two publications referred to are reproduced on duplicating machines and are distributed to supervisory and management personnel, while Keeping Track, a monthly printed magazine, is distributed to all employees and pensioners and others. As indicated, the communications referred to are regular publications and the costs of insertion of particular items are not therefore segregated.

SOULANGES CANAL—TENDERS FOR PURCHASE OF EAST END

Question No. 442—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the Department of Transport receive tenders from industry in relation to the purchase of the east end of the Soulanges canal at Pointe des Cascades?

2. If so, what is the list of names, addresses, and amounts of such bidders?

3. How many employees are likely to be engaged in each case?

4. What action has the government taken on these tenders?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Max and Sol Goldberg, Montreal, P.Q., $50,000.

(b) Roger LaFleur, Montreal, P.Q., $52,000.

3. Goldberg offer—no firm plans but reference to possible 100 employees.

LaFleur offer—no reference.

4. Offers not considered satisfactory and, as already announced, property involved offered to the province of Quebec along with balance of Soulanges property.

AUTOMATIC ARCTIC WEATHER STATIONS—USE OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Question No. 446—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Is any applied research being conducted in Canada into the feasibility of using atomic energy to power automatic weather stations in the Arctic?

2. Is any government agency co-operating with the American atomic energy commission in the research work being done by the Martin Company in Baltimore in the development of an isotope power atomic weather station?

3. Has any consideration been given to the use of such atomic weather stations in the Canadian Arctic?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to part 1 of this question, the Department of Transport has no knowledge of any such research.

With regard to parts 2 and 3, I would refer the hon. member to the reply given in the house on July 5 to his oral question by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I might add that the Department of Transport has no knowledge of any government agency co-operating directly with the United States atomic energy commission on this subject.

DAILY POINTS OF CALL, LETTER CARRIERS

Question No. 447—Mr. Thomas:

1. How many points of call are considered an average day's work for a letter carrier?

2. What would be the estimated cost of extending house-to-house delivery to towns and villages with 1,500 or more points of call?

3. How many additional jobs would be created by such an extension of house-to-house delivery?

4. What percentage increase in postal rates would be required to pay for such extended service?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Order for return, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS, 1951-1957

Question No. 448—Mr. Hanbidge:

1. How many royal commissions were established by the St. Laurent government between July 1, 1951, and June 10, 1957?

2. What was the purpose of each such commission?

3. When was each established?

Starred Questions

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is 15, excluding routine investigations into charges of political partisanship. The answer to parts 2 and 3 is rather lengthy and detailed. With leave of the house may the answer be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the balance of the answer may be incorporated without being read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The balance of the answer follows:]

2 and 3. Purpose and date of establishment.

1. Claims arising out of world war II, (Mr. Chief Justice Ilsley), 31 July, 1951.

2. South Saskatchewan river project, 24 August, 1951.

3. Staking of areas and application for permits re exploring petroleum products by Sun Oil Company and California Standard Company, 12 November, 1951.

4. Claims arising out of world war II (Mr. Chief Justice Campbell), 23 October, 1952.

5. Criminal law relating to defence of insanity, 2 March, 1954.

6. Criminal sexual psychopaths, 25 March, 1954.

7. Quartz mining and placer mining in Yukon Territory, 29 April, 1954.

8. Agreed charges under part IV of the Transport Act, 20 May, 1954.

9. Parents, copyright, trade marks, 10 June, 1954.

10. Humber river valley flood, 20 October, 1954.

11. Coasting trade in Canada, 2 December, 1955.

12. Long term prospects of the Canadian economy, 17 June, 1955.

13. Broadcasting in Canada, 2 December, 1955.

14. Dispute between Canadian Pacific railway and brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers, 17 January, 1957.

15. Financial position of Newfoundland, 21 February, 1957.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TRUCKING PROFITS

Question No. 450—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the "small" operating profit reported by the Canadian National Railways trucking operations include the operating profit of Midland-Superior?

2. If so, what provision was made in the accounting to allow for the fact that the C.N.R. did not own Midland-Superior outright in 1960?

3. What was the amount of this allowance?

4. Were any dividends paid to shareholders (other than the C.N.R.) of this trucking firm in 1960?

5. If so, what was the amount?

[Mr. Hanbidge.]

6. Was any charge made against the revenues of Midland-Superior in 1960 for the cost of the capital allotted to purchase this firm?

7. If so, did it wipe out the operating profit?

8. If not, was this practice used on East-West Transport and Empire Transport during 1960?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the eight parts of this question are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. As was indicated in the answer to starred question No. 265, since the purchase of Midland was not completed as at December 31, 1960, there is a credit of about $400,000 not yet taken into C.N.R. accounts for that year.

3. See answer to No. 2.

4. No.

5. Not applicable.

C.N.R.—EMPLOYMENT OF MANAGEMENT CONSULTANTS

Question No. 451—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways employ any firms of management consultants during 1960 and 1961?

2. If so, what were the names of the firms, and how much were they paid in total for fees and expenses?

3. On what assignments did the firms work?

4. Were the firms selected after calling for tenders and picking the low bid? If not, what was the basis for selection?

5. How much does the C.N.R. expect to spend for management consulting fees and expenses during 1961?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise that in common with all large organizations it obtains from time to time technical advice or consultation on specific problems. A number of firms have been employed in respect to special studies and projects. In doing so, the company avoids building up its senior staff on a permanent basis. The term "management consultant" is not susceptible to precise definition. However, in the general consulting field the firm of Woods Gordon and Company has been assisting the company in its general reorganization. At the same time the firm of Price Waterhouse has been assisting management in the development of accounting techniques to coincide with the new form of organization. It is not practicable to call for technical advice by tender, so that the selection of such assistance is a matter of management judgment exercised in the light of the knowledge and the skills available in relation to the particular problem. It has not been the practice to disclose the amount of fees paid.

EXTERNAL ASSISTANCE GRANTS AND LOANS

Question No. 453—Miss LaMarsh:

1. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants for each year since the second world war?
2. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants in each year since the second world war?
3. What is the total of Canadian external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
4. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants and loans for each year since the second world war?
5. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants and loans in each year since the second world war?
6. What is the total of Canadian external assistance loans less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
7. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants and loans less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
8. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants and loans (less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans) for each year since the second world war?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question involves complicated statistical research and more than one department is concerned. I ask that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the hon. gentleman is now in the house I wonder if he could now give me an answer to starred question No. 449.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was detained when the house opened. I was on the telephone, and I arrived only after the starred questions had been called. I had intended to ask, when we had completed the questions on the orders of the day, if the house would agree to revert to starred questions to permit me to answer several of them.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house would give the hon. minister leave to answer those questions now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CASH BORROWING REQUIREMENTS, EXCHANGE FUND

Question No. 445—Mr. Benidickson:

What is an up to date estimate by the government of its cash borrowing requirements during 1961-62 to provide the exchange fund with resources to assure the maintenance of a significant discount of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the U.S.A. dollar?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think there are three questions which I would have answered, had I been present at the moment when they were called which were allowed to stand in my absence. The first is No. 445. I am asked for an up to date estimate by the government of its cash borrowing requirements during 1961-62 to provide the exchange fund with resources to assure the maintenance of a significant discount of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar.

I dealt with this subject in the budget. It has not been the practice to issue, except perhaps on such occasions as a supplementary budget, any further statements on such subjects during the course of the year. None of the estimates with relation to the balance of ways and means or cash is made the subject of further statements during the course of the year once the budget has been introduced.

PERSONNEL, FINANCE MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 452—Miss LaMarsh:

1. Apart from the minister and parliamentary assistant, what was the maximum number of persons employed in the office of the Minister of Finance in the fiscal year 1956-57 and what was the aggregate of their annual salaries in that year?
2. Apart from the minister and the parliamentary secretary, what was the maximum number of persons employed in the office of the Minister of Finance in the fiscal year 1960-61 and what was the aggregate of their annual salaries in that year?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Question No. 452 asks, first what was the maximum number of persons employed in the office of the Minister of Finance, apart from the minister and the parliamentary secretary, in the fiscal year 1956-57, and what was the aggregate of their salaries in that year. The second part asks the same question with respect to the fiscal year 1960-61.

My answer is that the number of employees in the office of the minister was the same in both years. It was 10 in the fiscal year 1956-57 and it was 10 in the fiscal year 1960-61. It has been reduced to nine since, and at the moment it happens to be, temporarily, eight.

As to the total paid by way of salaries, in the fiscal year 1956-57 it was $35,969.63. In the fiscal year 1960-61, having regard to increases in salaries which became effective since the earlier year, one made effective in the fiscal year 1957-58 and the other in the fiscal year 1960-61, the total of salaries was $51,936.46. With the reduction of the staff since the beginning of the present fiscal year there has, of course, been a reduction since that time with respect to the amount of salaries payable in the fiscal year 1961-62.

Starred Questions

EXCHANGE FUND RESERVES

Question No. 449—Mr. McMillan:

What was the amount of reserves in the exchange fund on the close of business on (a) June 20, 1961, (b) June 30, 1961, (c) the latest available date?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): This question asks what was the amount of reserves in the exchange fund on the close of business on (a) June 20, 1961, (b) June 30, 1961 and (c) at the latest available date.

As I have pointed out on earlier occasions, it has never been the practice to issue figures on the holdings of exchange except at the month end. These figures are published at the end of each month. They refer to the holdings of gold and foreign exchange, usually U.S. dollars, which are official holdings. Practically all of the official holdings are in the exchange fund. It is not the practice to issue the figures apart from the total. In total the official holdings, as I say, are nearly all in the exchange fund.

Now as to the holdings, in keeping with the practice I shall begin by giving the figure on May 31. It is not one of the dates that appear in this question, but in keeping with the practice observed at all times in the past I am coming as close as I can to the dates that are mentioned in the question. On May 31 the official holdings of gold and United States dollars at the close of business that day were $1,949.2 million. On June 30 they were $1,985.2 million. Mr. Speaker, the date June 20 happens to be the date of the budget, and is a date, not being a month end, when it has not been customary to issue any statement as to holdings. The same would apply to part (c) of the question, the latest available date. I think therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should not depart from the practice that has been observed, but I may perhaps suggest that there has been no significant or great change in the figures.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is one thing I might have added to the answer I gave in reply to starred question No. 449. Within the limits of the practice in these matters I may say that part of the increase in the holdings of gold and U.S. dollars between May 31 and June 30 occurred before June 20. Also, in relation to what has happened since June 30, the holdings of gold and U.S. dollars are less today than they were on June 30.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLISHING HOUSES IN CANADA

Question No. 215—Mr. Argue:

1. How many publishing houses are there in Canada?
2. What is the name of each, location of head office, and type of publishing business?
3. Are any of these (a) owned (b) controlled by (i) American (ii) other foreign nationals?
4. If so: (a) which ones? (b) by what company are they owned or controlled, and to what extent? (c) on what date did this control or ownership take place?

LOANS TO INCORPORATED COMPANIES

Question No. 288—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1950, have any loans, except those made by C.M.H.C., been made to incorporated companies other than crown corporations?
2. If so, with respect to each such company, what is (a) the name, address, and type of business (b) the total amount of each loan (c) the date of each loan (d) the term of each loan (e) the rate and type of interest paid or payable on each loan (f) the authority for each loan?
3. Have any companies defaulted on their loan, and, if so, which companies, and what are the details in each case; and what is the total amount lost to date by defaulted loans?

DAILY POINTS OF CALL, LETTER CARRIERS

Question No. 447—Mr. Thomas:

1. How many points of call are considered an average day's work for a letter carrier?
2. What would be the estimated cost of extending house to house delivery to towns and villages with 1,500 or more points of call?
3. How many additional jobs would be created by such an extension of house to house delivery?
4. What percentage increase in postal rates would be required to pay for such extended service?

EXTERNAL ASSISTANCE GRANTS AND LOANS

Question No. 453—Miss LaMarsh:

1. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants for each year since the second world war?
2. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants in each year since the second world war?
3. What is the total of Canadian external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
4. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants and loans for each year since the second world war?
5. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants and loans in each year since the second world war?
6. What is the total of Canadian external assistance loans less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
7. What is the total of Canadian external assistance grants and loans less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans for each year since the second world war?
8. What percentage of Canada's national income (or gross national product) was spent on external assistance grants and loans (less repayments of principal and interest on external assistance loans) for each year since the second world war?

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEARSON—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JULY 11

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday the Minister of Finance indicated that if questions were asked by the opposition on the operation of the exchange fund as they should have been asked—as the minister put it, if the opposition "had been on their toes"—they would have been replied to. I call your attention to the fact that questions Nos. 445 and 449 appear on the order paper as starred questions. Those questions deal with this very subject. The Minister of Finance is not here to answer them, nor is his parliamentary secretary nor anyone else.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the minister is available I am sure they will be answered. I compliment the Leader of the Opposition for following the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that if hon. gentlemen opposite had been "on their toes" they would have received this information.

Mr. Pearson: In reply to what the Prime Minister has said, the right hon. gentleman has probably forgotten that questions on this subject have been asked previously. Apparently the Minister of Finance also forgot that yesterday when he made that inaccurate statement. I point out that two questions dealing with this subject are on the order paper and there is no one here from the Department of Finance to reply.

[Editor's note: For answers to questions above referred to, see "Starred Questions" this day.]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

INQUIRY AS TO JOINT CONFERENCE ON SENATE AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister inform the house whether any steps are contemplated to establish a joint conference between representatives of the House of Commons and Senate to deal with the controversial Senate amendment to the customs tariff bill?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): When the Senate convenes this afternoon the answer to that question will be given. It is appropriate that any response should be made in the other place, where the discussions are taking place.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INQUIRY AS TO CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether the government has received any communications since June 20, 1961 from representatives of the international monetary fund criticizing or questioning this government's action in forcing down the exchange rate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice, and will answer it in the proper course.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his suggestion some time ago that there might be a conference of commonwealth prime ministers to discuss the European common market. Has his attention been called to a statement made in the British House of Commons yesterday, and reported in the press, by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that such a conference would be quite unsuitable?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have seen a reference to that matter in the press but as yet have not had Hansard in order to ascertain the degree to which the summary in question represents what actually took place. I might say that, as the hon. gentleman knows, it is not the practice for commonwealth prime ministers to comment on the views expressed by prime ministers in other parts of the commonwealth. Each is entitled to follow the viewpoint which he believes is proper.

Tomorrow meetings will commence between Right Hon. Duncan Sandys and four ministers of the Canadian government. These meetings will be in the nature of the United Kingdom government placing its views before the Canadian government. As we see it, these are preliminary discussions.

In so far as the statement is concerned that a prime ministers' conference would be out of place, may I refer the Leader of the Opposition to my words of June 9, 1961, as found at page 6085 of Hansard:

I envisage bilateral consultation, official and ministerial, but because of the potential consequences of United Kingdom membership in the common market, I believe that the fullest consideration should be given to collective ministerial discussion and also, if necessary, to a meeting of the prime ministers.

That still represents the viewpoint of this government.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the house whether he thinks a prime ministers' conference is necessary in the light of this grave threat to Canada's market.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, after the United Kingdom has had the opportunity, through the secretary of state for commonwealth relations, to place before the representatives of the Canadian government the situation as the United Kingdom sees it, then it will be time enough to determine the future course to be taken.

As to the statement regarding the grave consequences, may I say this. Discussions have already taken place between Mr. Sandys and the governments of New Zealand and Australia. Those countries also have discussed the potential consequences, results and implications of the United Kingdom joining the common market. We are going to have the same opportunity now. Having heard in detail what the situation would be from the United Kingdom viewpoint, then it will indeed be early enough to determine the future steps to be taken.

Mr. Argue: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would comment on Prime Minister Macmillan's rejection of a prime ministers' conference when the Prime Minister of Canada has made no such request?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's supplementary question was answered earlier by the Prime Minister who indicated that he did not consider it proper practice for one prime minister to comment on another prime minister's statement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, in the forthcoming discussions with the secretary of state for commonwealth relations, advantage will be taken of his presence to raise the question of the desirability of extending these European freer trading arrangements across the Atlantic to include the United States and Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the discussions that are to take place will require considerable time. Ancillary and additional matters will of course receive the consideration which the time available makes possible.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SAN FRANCISCO—OPENING OF TRAVEL BUREAU OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the many requests from British Columbia organizations and members of parliament for the establishment of an office of the Canadian government travel bureau in San Francisco, in view of reports to the effect that the minister has recently visited that city in this connection, and in view of the general interest of the house in the minister's activities, has the minister anything to report to the house with respect to his recent visit to San Francisco?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for this question, because it gives me an opportunity to inform him and the house that the tourist bureau in San Fransisco was officially opened on Monday afternoon. I was able to be present representing the government of Canada.

It was a very successful occasion. Various state authorities were present, including former Senator Knowland. There were representatives from most of the consulates in the city of San Francisco. His Worship Mayor Christopher officially cut the ribbon declaring the centre open. Personally I was impressed with its location. It is in one of the most strategic corners of the city of San Francisco and should do much to stimulate tourism, particularly to the western parts of Canada.

I should also add that the province of British Columbia is following the good example of the federal government in this regard and it is going to locate British Columbia house in the same district.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he was able to stay over in San Francisco for the all star baseball game?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, we were so busy on official duties during the very short visit to the city of San Francisco that I was only vaguely aware this event was taking place.

Mr. McIlraith: That is too bad.

Mr. Dinsdale: But I do assure the hon. member that had the opportunity been presented I would have accepted with enthusiasm.

GRAIN

STATEMENT ON DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me the following question:

> In view of the fact that the new crop year is just a few weeks away, and the government has stated there would be a review of the policy of the wheat board in relation to the delivery of grain to feed mills, has any consideration been given to this policy—

While that question was directed to me, I think it should be answered by the Acting Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in November, 1960 the Canadian wheat board announced a new policy in respect of deliveries by producers to feed mills, which was to remain in effect until the conclusion of the present crop year on July 31 next, at which time this policy would be subject to review by the board.

In the application by a feed mill for designation as a non-quota feed mill provision is made whereby the mill will supply periodically to the board information in respect of its purchases of wheat, oats and barley from permit holders. The final report from the mills must be submitted to the board on or before August 15, 1961. This information will form an integral part of the data to be considered by the board in the review of its feed mill policy and, as a consequence, this review cannot take place until subsequent to August 15, 1961.

In the interim it is the intention of the board to extend its present policy beyond the end of the current crop year until the review of its feed mill policy can be completed, which should be toward the latter part of August, 1961.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BERLIN—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister based on a speech he made in Winnipeg on the 9th of this month, and more particularly on this statement in the Prime Minister's speech as reported in the press:

> We need to be strong and unhesitating in our defence of essential western rights and obligations . . . We need at the same time to maintain a calm judgment so that we will not overlook possibilities of compromise which, without amounting to appeasement, might none the less contribute to peace.

Inquiries of the Ministry

May I ask the Prime Minister to outline to the house, with regard to the East-West German problem, what he means by "compromise" in the Berlin situation and "appeasement" in the same situation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): While discussions are going on relative to this matter designed to bring about a degree of unity which has not always been present among the NATO countries, I think the hon. gentleman would agree that it would be inappropriate at this time to go into detail.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the statement of Chancellor Adenauer yesterday that there could be no compromise in the Berlin situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I noticed the report of that statement.

NEWFOUNDLAND—SUPREME COURT REFERENCE RESPECTING PEPPERRELL AIR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Justice how soon the government expects to be in a position to make the joint reference to the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the Pepperrell air base at St. John's, which was agreed upon between the Prime Minister and the premier of Newfoundland some time ago, and I think it was actually announced in the house?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I am not in a position to give a definite reply to that question. I had a meeting with counsel for the government of Newfoundland some two or three weeks ago at which the question of bringing it on as early as possible was explored. I would certainly hope that the terms of reference might be agreed upon in time for argument at the sitting of the court this fall.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Does he not appreciate that until some arrangement is made about this matter this very valuable property which ought to be in use is not in use?

Mr. Fulton: I understand there have been discussions between my colleague the Minister of National Defence and the premier of Newfoundland with a view to finding some method of making it possible to use the property. I am not aware of what has been the outcome of those talks. I know there have been difficulties arising from time to time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence has anything he can usefully say about this problem at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there was a joint board set up to operate the dock or the pier particularly, and that has now been in operation for a considerable number of months. There was another board set up to take over actual possession of the rest of the Pepperrell base from the United States, and I proposed to the premier of Newfoundland that if he wanted to make use of the hospital, which was the building in that complex of particular interest to the province of Newfoundland, there was no reason why this should not be done. I have not heard from him since in that connection.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he can give the house any up to date information on the progress of negotiations between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian air lines flight attendants association.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The progress I can report on this dispute, Mr. Speaker, is that they are continuing their talks and we hope through that process we shall be able to arrive at an agreement.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a telegram from Mr. Robert Smeale, business manager of the C.A.L.F.A.A. in which he makes a further complaint of the continuing intimidation of employees by T.C.A.? How does the minister square this with the statement yesterday that there had been no further complaint on this question?

Mr. Starr: No such telegram has yet been brought to my attention.

Mr. Argue: It was supposed to be in your office.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Can the Minister of Labour not say that perhaps the telegram in question has been sent, if not to the Minister of Labour, to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Starr: I do not know where the hon. member gets all this misinformation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Minister of Labour not aware that all leaders of the parties, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F., have received telegrams? It is unusual if the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister has not received one.

Mr. Starr: I am not aware of that.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister say what plans for the extra winter works program have been decided on? If so, will he let us know what this program is?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): As soon as a winter works program has been decided on by the cabinet it will be made known.

(Translation):

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—REASON FOR REFUSAL OF OFFER TO BUY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister state the reasons why he refused the offers that were submitted to him for the purchase of the Pointe des Cascades area along the Soulanges canal, which had been put on sale by his department?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have refused to sell the Pointe des Cascades areas to private enterprise for the following reason. The department of fish and game of the province of Quebec did not accept our original offer, and its representatives indicated that they would cancel all plans for the development of parks and a fish hatchery in the Soulanges canal area if we sold a single section of the 14 miles of land along the canal.

In view of that attitude on the part of the provincial government, we had no alternative but to reject the offers we had received.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING TO AMEND CONSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he can bring the house up to date on the progress of the conference with the provinces on constitutional amendments?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Since the time of my last report to the house in answer to questions, I have been in communication wtih provincial attorneys general to have the meetings resumed in June or September. It was not possible to set a date in June. A date has been set in September; if my recollection is correct, September 12.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether in the course of those constitutional discussions the question of Senate reform has been raised?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker; that was not a matter which at that time it seemed appropriate for us to consider. Whether or not the situation in that regard has changed I will leave it to the hon. gentleman himself to speculate on.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-120, to amend the Income Tax Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, when the committee considered this bill, and particularly when it considered clause 19, if the official opposition had not, through the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), raised the matter of grants to universities, the arrangement made with the province of Quebec in 1960 and represented in this house as a great victory over provincial autonomy would have lapsed without the members of this house being made aware of it, and particularly without hon. members on the government side knowing about it. Obviously this arrangement would also have expired without any notice being given to the government of the province of Quebec.

(Text):

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the bilateral arrangement worked out in 1960 would have been terminated wisely but certainly not with dignity.

(Translation):

I should like at this time to recall briefly the background of this unilateral action on the part of the central government. First, may I call the attention of the house to the discussions that took place in committee on clause 19 last Monday.

In reply to a question raised by the hon. member for Laurier as to the reasons why the government had terminated this arrangement with the province, the Minister of Finance made this statement, as recorded on page 7813 of Hansard for July 10, 1961:

> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We were asked to leave out of this year's legislation, whether income tax legislation or federal-provincial fiscal legislation, any reference to the kind of arrangement that was made in 1960 and to provide for an alternative arrangement in respect of the university grants.
>
> Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister who asked the federal government to do this?
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premier Lesage.

This vague answer of the minister was not deemed satisfactory by the opposition, especially by the hon. member for Laurier who later in the same debate returned to the charge, as reported on page 7817 of Hansard of last Monday, by asking the following question:

> Mr. Chevrier: Let me use the minister's own words. He was asked by the premier of the province of Quebec not to bring this matter into the scope of the new arrangements. I should like to ask the minister when this conversation took place. He has already said that it was during the course of the last federal-provincial conference in February. Could the minister be a little more specific and say whether it was at the opening, during the course of, or at the end of the conference?

This is what the Minister of Finance replied:

> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not during the course of the conference proper. It was a discussion held outside the conference.
>
> Mr. Chevrier: Was there anyone present?
>
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not at that time.
>
> Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister say whether it was on the first or second day of the conference?
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can locate it by saying to the hon. member that it was during the evening of the governor general's dinner.

Everybody in this house was under the impression at first that this matter had been discussed in plenary session during the talks and meetings that were held here in Ottawa between representatives of the federal and provincial governments.

Now, following the questions asked by the hon. member for Laurier, the minister told us that it was just an intimate conversation which took place during or after a dinner given by His Excellency the Governor General. That is not all, Mr. Speaker. We learned yesterday that the version which the Minister of Finance gave to the house is not true to the facts. His statement was most emphatically contradicted by the other interested party, the premier of the province of Quebec. Indeed, here is what he said in that connection:

> I read in the newspapers, this morning, a Canadian Press report on a debate which occurred in the House of Commons yesterday concerning federal grants to universities.
> It is reported in that dispatch that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) stated that I have asked him to leave out of the legislation "any reference" to the agreement signed in that regard, in 1960, with the Quebec provincial government.
>
> I must say I have never made such a request to Mr. Fleming. There has been no communication between the Minister of Finance and myself, either orally or by letter.
>
> The subject was discussed briefly in the course of a friendly and private conversation during a dinner given by His Excellency the Governor General, in February. We discussed together the proposals I made as early as in July 1960 concerning the federal government's gradual withdrawal from the joint programs and the progressive return to the provinces of their taxation rights so that the latter may fully meet their obligations in that respect.

From one thing to the other, we got to speak about Bill C-56 which has become chapter 13 of the 1960 federal statutes. I have never asked or even suggested the abolition of the 1 per cent abatement granted corporations in the provinces which handle university grants themselves.

I just reiterated to Mr. Fleming some criticism I had, in any case, publicly voiced before, against one provision in Bill C-56. I am thinking of the clause allowing the federal government to deduct from equalization payments the surplus revenue which the additional taxation of 1 per cent yields to a province—which is the surplus amount received from the federal government by the universities under the federal act. I added that we should try to find something better to fully safeguard provincial autonomy. As far as I remember, the conversation on the subject did not go any further.

I repeat that I have not since received any communication from Mr. Fleming or from the Prime Minister and that I myself did not get in touch with the federal government or with any of its ministers or officials.

Needless to say that I was greatly surprised this morning at reading this item announcing one-sided action by the federal government. There is certainly a misunderstanding somewhere. I fully trust that the federal government will be ready to start negotiations with us to settle the matter, said Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time during the last weeks that statements by the Minister of Finance have been denied. It would be useless to quote other instances of such incidents which are familiar to all. But this new incident is of very great significance and extremely serious, because it endangers good relations between the central government and the provincial governments, those relations being essential to the good operation of our administrative system.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member that the debate is on third reading of the bill, and that discussion should be relevant to the bill as it has been reported from committee and not to extraneous matters which are not covered in the bill. I am not sure to what section of the bill this question of university grants relates, but it seems to me that the course the hon. member is following just now goes beyond the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Roberge: I say to you with great deference, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks are related to clause 19 of the bill as reported from the committee and as now before us for third reading. If I may be allowed to go ahead I have only a few more sentences.

(Translation):

I should like to recall once more, Mr. Speaker, that last year a great number of Quebec members supporting the government, including the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer), the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) and the present Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), rose in the house to praise the Minister of Finance and to commend him for having at last found a formula which, in their opinion, was a satisfactory solution to the problem. I trust that, in the course of this debate on third reading, we will hear these ministers criticizing now the Minister of Finance for the inaccurate report he made last Monday of his private talks with the Quebec premier and for the unilateral action he has taken.

I trust also that the minister himself will inform us before long of his intentions in that matter and that he will tell us what new formula he expects to propose to the province of Quebec as far as university assistance is concerned.

(Text):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out that what has been alleged to have been said by Mr. Lesage was taken from press reports. Leaving aside the possibility of inaccuracy or error arising from condensation of his remarks, it should be pointed out that the Minister of Finance during the course of the debate indicated that he had informal discussions or conversations with Mr. Lesage in this regard. Mr. Lesage admits that such conversations took place, although he does not place upon them the interpretation placed by the minister.

I remind hon. members that while no one can comment on what transpired at the in camera sessions, Mr. Lesage outside the in camera meetings did publicly discuss in complete and full detail the various features of the government's proposal. In fact one might say he dotted the i's and crossed the t's. I believe I am correct in saying that at no time did Mr. Lesage refer to the question of university grants within the framework of the government's proposal. If following that he was dissatisfied that this was not discussed within the framework of federal-provincial relations, if he felt it should have been in the government's proposal, or if he did not feel in accord with what was said by the Minister of Finance, certainly one might have expected some comment from him either at that time or since.

It is clear that this legislation will continue in force until March 31, 1962. There has been no indication on the part of the government that any other course would be followed. The Minister of Finance indicated his willingness to meet with authorities of the province of Quebec to discuss this matter and make mutually suitable arrangements. The position of the minister has not changed since he made that statement. From the events that have transpired it is clear that there must have been some understanding that the matter was not to be discussed at the time of the conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: Hon. members who now protest that statement were not present at the conference. Certainly there was no comment indicating a possible change. It is clear that there is no difficulty concerning the effecting of a satisfactory arrangement between the federal government and the province of Quebec or between the federal government and any other province that wishes to adopt this course between the present time and the time at which the present arrangement concludes in March of 1962.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, I rise in an effort to clarify my position. In his opening remarks the hon. member for Edmonton West said that the statements attributed to Mr. Lesage were drawn from newspaper clippings. I hasten to indicate that what I have cited from the remarks of Mr. Lesage was taken from yesterday's press. Everything I cited appeared in quotation marks, and the words were attributed to the premier of Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great respect and attention to the statement of the member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) concerning an alleged difference between the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the answer which the premier of Quebec saw fit to give the press.

I am under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the premier of Quebec somewhat misunderstood the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Finance concerning agreements between the federal and provincial governments on the matter of grants to universities. In my opinion, it has been clearly established in the house thanks to the action of the Conservative members from Quebec when Bill C-56 was under consideration last year that educational problems as well as the matter of grants to universities are an exclusive provincial prerogative.

The statement of the Minister of Finance yesterday did not go against the principle established last year, as a matter of fact the minister did not say that the government was now prepared, before the agreements expire in 1962 to propose to the government of the province of Quebec another formula regarding university grants.

If we correctly understand the meaning of his words, we can see that the Minister of Finance clearly expressed in my opinion that the principle which has been recognized under Bill C-56, will be kept in force until 1962. So this arrangement in Bill C-56 shall remain in force for the province of Quebec until 1962, but the minister also indicated that should the province of Quebec be willing to discuss another form of arrangement after 1962, this government would be prepared to open discussions with the premier of Quebec.

I feel there has been a storm in a teapot over the statement made by the Minister of Finance, as well as the reply of the Quebec premier. An attempt has been made to muddle things up in order to gain political advantages.

I do not wish to express here the Quebec point of view, but I might say that, as long as the agreement under Bill No. C-56 is in existence, until 1962, we, on this side of the house, who represent the province of Quebec, will fight with the utmost energy to safeguard the principle that education should be the exclusive responsibility of the provinces, and that grants to universities be administered by the provinces, as provided under that arrangement.

And I am convinced that the Conservative party which achieved that compromise now helping Quebec universities, will manage, in the light of the discussions held, and whatever party may be in power in Quebec, to uphold that principle and recognize the claims of the province of Quebec.

(Text):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although I am the mover of this motion I have not spoken in this debate. I should like to say a word by way of clarification of the matter raised by the hon. member for Megantic.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to take the floor?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman, as he did the other day, could speak to a question of privilege. I am sure there would be no objection from this side of the house if the hon. gentleman wished to do that.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that I am prepared to put that proposition to the house. Perhaps the house would give the minister leave to deal with the only point that has been raised in this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman would have had the right to intervene at the time the hon. member for Megantic resumed his seat, but he did not avail himself of that opportunity. I speak only for myself when I say I would not wish to deny the minister that opportunity now provided he dealt only with the point raised by the hon. member for Megantic, and did not introduce extraneous matters. I am sure my colleagues would consent to having the minister do that.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the house, Mr. Speaker. I simply wish to say something by way of clarification of the matter raised by the hon. member for Megantic, which arises out of a statement I made in the debate in committee on July 10 and which has been commented upon by Premier Lesage of Quebec in a statement given to the press yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, it occurred in the discussion which you will find commencing at page 7813 of Hansard and principally at page 7817. It was concerning one clause of this bill, namely clause 19 relating to deduction from corporation tax in the case of corporate taxpayers in any province that is a prescribed province under the 1960 amendment. The position is this. I did not wish to give the committee the impression that I had discussed this particular bill with Premier Lesage. I did not wish to do that at all. What I indicated to the committee and sought to make very clear when the matter was raised a second time, as found at page 7817 of Hansard, was that the subject of the university grants and the special provision that had been introduced into the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act in 1960, in the case of any province which desired to become a prescribed province because its universities were not accepting these federal university grants, had not been introduced into the discussions at the conference; I refer to the dominion-provincial conference. My reference to my conversation with Premier Lesage, as I said in reply to a question by the hon. member for Laurier, was that this was a conversation that occurred outside the conference. I simply asked the premier whether he wished this subject to be introduced into the scope of the discussions in the conference. He indicated that it was not his wish. Clause 19 of the bill is consequential in nature simply by reason of the fact that the 1960 amendments to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act which dealt with this subject were given only a two-year life. They conclude under the 1960 enactment with the conclusion of the five-year period under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, namely March 31, 1962.

Before that date arrives there must of course be discussions in relation to how this problem is to be met in the future. That consideration was clearly in Premier Lesage's mind and it was clearly in my mind in what I said to the house on July 10. As found at page 7817 of Hansard, the first column, I stated as follows:

> This matter as to what happens in regard to university grants will have to be a subject of further discussions between now and the end of this present fiscal year.

Again, as found at page 7818 of Hansard, at the top of the page, I stated:

> I make it quite clear that we are not terminating anything. The hon. member—

That is the hon. member for Laurier.

> —talks about our terminating something. We are not terminating anything. We take account of the fact that the legislation which was passed by parliament last year was given by parliament a two-year life. It will expire at the end of the present fiscal year. And all that we are doing here, pending the making of some new arrangement, is to make some provision for what happens at the expiry of that two-year term. It expires with the legislation that parliament enacted in 1960. I am not attempting for one minute, Mr. Chairman, to prejudge what may be done in relation to this problem as from April 1, 1962.

I make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that I think there is no occasion for misunderstanding on this matter. Certainly I did not wish, by anything I have said, to give rise to any misunderstanding in relation to either Premier Lesage's position or future discussions that may occur. This matter will certainly have to be discussed. At the present time the province of Quebec is a prescribed province under the 1960 legislation. Its federal corporate taxpayers received an additional 1 per cent abatement in 1960 and the province is continuing in the position, by its own decision, as a prescribed province also this year. Accordingly the federal corporate taxpayers in this province will receive the benefit of that additional 1 per cent abatement on corporation tax in 1961 as well.

As to what happens beginning with next year, that will have to be a matter for discussion. We shall be pleased, of course, to take this matter up with Premier Lesage and discuss it with him at any time that meets with his wish.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the minister gave several citations from what he told us in the committee stage in the house, but he refrained from giving one which I now intend to put on the record. It is found at page 7813 of Hansard, half way down the first column, where the minister is reported to have stated as follows:

> We were asked to leave out of this year's legislation, whether income tax legislation or federal-provincial fiscal legislation, any reference to the kind of arrangement that was made in 1960 and to provide for an alternative arrangement in respect of the university grants.
>
> Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister who asked the federal government to do this?
> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Premier Lesage.

My hon. friend from Megantic has read a statement by Mr. Lesage, who said he did not make that request. Those two statements are in direct contradiction of one another, and no discussion about what may happen in 1962 or any other aspect of the matter will alter that flat contradiction.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

AGREEMENTS RESPECTING TAX COLLECTION, ANNUAL GRANTS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 11, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

> Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces and to provide that the minister may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1962 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1967,
> (a) a tax equalization payment;
>
> (b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment;
>
> (c) additional annual grants of ten and a half million dollars to each of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, and of three and a half million dollars to the province of Prince Edward Island;
>
> (d) a further additional annual grant of eight million dollars to the province of Newfoundland;
>
> (e) where a province does not levy a succession duty, an amount equal to the standard estate tax applicable to the province for the fiscal year; and
> (f) advance payments on account of amounts collected under a tax collection agreement that may be entered into with the province.

Mr. Pearson: In speaking last evening to this resolution, Mr. Chairman, which deals with new tax sharing arrangements with the provinces, the minister had this to say, as found at page 7910 of Hansard:

> It—

That is the new arrangement.

> —has materially increased the return to the provinces from the existing tax sharing arrangements—

Then he also stated:

> Although it has greatly improved the financial substance of the present arrangements, this government has recognized the weaknesses of the tax rental system which it inherited, both from the provincial and federal standpoint, and has become increasingly convinced of the need for a new approach which would give greater freedom and responsibility to the provincial governments, and which would be compatible with the constitution.

The minister then proceeded to show how greatly the provinces would benefit under these new arrangements. We do not propose to discuss the resolution at great length, Mr. Chairman. As I said last night, we will reserve our detailed consideration of this matter for the bill itself. However, if this new arrangement was so advantageous to the provinces as the minister indicates it was, it is very strange that the provinces, or at least most of them, should have been so ungrateful in their reception of it and so lacking in appreciation for this new deal. When these new arrangements were announced the premier of British Columbia expressed great disappointment that British Columbia would get no equalization grants, and he found other things to criticize in the arrangement. On February 27 the premier of Alberta told the Alberta legislature that the provinces of Canada were given "no option" at a federal-provincial fiscal conference in Ottawa on the Thursday and Friday before. He went on to say:

> —the federal government left no door open for the provinces to choose between the new taxation program outlined them and the tax rental agreements presently in force.

Then he indicated his disappointment with these arrangements. That is two provinces. Then we come to Saskatchewan, where the provincial treasurer said on February 28 that the dominion-provincial tax sharing arrangements proposed by the federal government would not benefit Saskatchewan or its local governments. He then told the Saskatchewan legislature:

> —the proposals would merely "freeze us to the level of payments we would have received under the present arrangements."

He went on to say this, according to the Canadian Press report:

> Abandonment of the tax rental system means there can be no leadership expected from the federal government in preventing a return to the "tax jungle of the 1930's".

That is something I mentioned last night. Then Mr. Lloyd had this to say:

> More important, it means the federal government will have lost the last vestige of control over the use of income taxation as a means for combating unemployment and stimulating economic growth.

So Saskatchewan was bitterly disappointed over these arrangements. Now we come to Manitoba, where the premier, according to a report in the Winnipeg Free Press, said this—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What date?

Mr. Pearson: The date is April 8 and these words appear in an article by John Dafoe:

The new federal-provincial tax agreements which go into effect in 1962 won't likely produce any extra revenue for Manitoba until the 1964-65 fiscal year, Premier Duff Roblin told the legislature Friday.

The premier went on to say there were some good features in the agreement of which he approved. I do not wish to give a one-sided impression of his reaction. He also went on to say, and apparently this is the best Mr. Roblin could say:

"On the whole", Mr. Roblin said, "the new plan does Manitoba no harm at present and, in the latter years of the agreement it is likely to do some good through moderately increasing provincial revenues. It is, nevertheless, disappointing that the province is to receive no immediate increase in the new proposals as compared to the old agreements".

He also said this:

—"the lowering of the equalization level from the average of the top two provinces to the Canadian average would, by itself, seriously impair Manitoba's position".

Now we come to Ontario. As the richest province Ontario comes out of these arrangements better than any other province, but according to Premier Frost the arrangements fell——"far, far short" of the annual $150 million of additional revenue he had sought to negotiate in the two days of talks with Prime Minister Diefenbaker and Finance Minister Fleming.

Then he added:

"Additional taxes are our only possible alternative"—

We know what that meant; a sales tax. So the premier of the province that did the best out of these arrangements was singularly modest in his expressions of appreciation. So far as the premier of Quebec is concerned the Canadian Press story had this to say on February 24:

Premier Jean Lesage's first reaction to the news that his province would receive not a cent more from the arrangement was one of naked anger.

I think we can leave that reaction there. Then we get to the Atlantic provinces. Of course the reaction in three of the four Atlantic provinces was much more favourable. In New Brunswick the premier said the new taxation proposals "would do lasting harm" to his province. The premier of Nova Scotia —I wish to quote all the reactions, favourable and unfavourable—was more satisfied with the arrangements and expressed that satisfaction in measured terms. The premier of Prince Edward Island was satisfied. The premier of Newfoundland was pleased with the inclusion in the arrangement of the $8 million grant for five years in lieu of the constitutional grant flowing from act of union under term 29. This is satisfactory, of course, as far as it goes, but it does not meet the point that this grant to Newfoundland was guaranteed by the act of union and should not depend on action by this parliament. However, there it is for five years, and I am sure the government and the people of Newfoundland will be very glad to receive it.

Mr. Chairman, this shows that in general the provincial reaction to the new tax sharing arrangements was not the kind one might have expected if in fact these proposals will do as much for the provinces as the minister indicated last night. To illustrate this the minister put some interesting tables on the record. As I said, we will in due course submit our own tables. There is one table to which I wish to refer particularly. That is table 3, which is headed:

Hypothetical illustration of provincial revenues for the year 1962-63 under new formula assuming—

This is the assumption that is made. I hope it is a more accurate assumption than others which have been made in this field by the minister:

—assuming rate of growth of 5 per cent per annum in tax yields and no change in the 1961-62 percentage distribution by provinces of tax yields or population.

I ask the minister now if he will also submit and put on the record a projection of this table for the four years after 1961-62. If these figures can be collected and made public for the one year, surely it is possible to do this for the subsequent four years of the agreement. We would certainly like to have that information, because without it the whole story is not told.

Our main quarrel with these new tax sharing arrangements and this new formula is the weakening of the principle and the application of the principle of equalization. In this connection let me quote what the Prime Minister said on July 25, 1960 in words which surely constituted a formal pledge to the premiers of the provinces. The Prime Minister said this:

I want to make this abundantly clear on behalf of the dominion government that whatever the ultimate decision may be, the principle of equalization must be preserved.

No doubt the minister will tell us the principle is being preserved. But at that time the Prime Minister went on to explain what he meant by the principle and what he understood to be the application of the principle, which is even more important, when he defined equalization in these words:

—a payment by Canada to the provinces to bring the per capita return from the three taxes at standard rates up to the average per capita yield in the two provinces in which per capita yield is highest. For provinces in which the tax potential is relatively low, this principle is most important.

By "principle" he meant bringing up the per capita yield in the other provinces to that of the two highest provinces, not the national average. This is a formal, specific, definite pledge and that pledge is abandoned for something else, Mr. Chairman, in these new arrangements.

This new formula has been put forward by the government in a form which I think could very easily deceive and which, indeed, has already deceived the layman, the non-expert in this field. It appears to increase gradually the provincial share of personal income tax without, as the minister claimed last night, unduly weakening equalization. We claim that this impression is altogether unjustified. When we look at the new formula itself without the guarantees and the grants and the arrangements which were substantially attached to it, we find that only one province can benefit, and that is the richest province of all, and that all the other provinces will be worse off for the first few years during which the arrangements will apply, though that situation in some cases changes during the latter part of the agreement.

While the so-called new formula, then, would give $18 million more, I believe, to Ontario in the year 1962-63, all the other provinces would lose in that year as compared with the present arrangements in spite of the higher rates on personal income tax, through the lower equalization basis, because the basis of the two top provinces has been abandoned for the national average. Even though a new factor has been added, a new growth factor, nevertheless the receipts by the other provinces would be lower because of that fact.

Therefore what has been presented by the government as a new general formula is, at best, a formula which in the early stages would benefit the richest province only. Since the so-called general formula was clearly not applicable to all the other provinces, a lot of patchwork had to be done until we have these special arrangements, these special deals, if I may use that expression, designed to remove some of the original inequities.

There is a special grant, of course, to the Atlantic provinces. The existing grants are, I believe, increased by $10 million a year. But the Atlantic provinces will receive only $5½ million more in 1962 and 1963 than they would receive if the present arrangements were continued, because of the application of the equalization formula. Of the additional $10 million which is provided, $4.5 million will be needed to fill the gap between the present arrangements and the new formula. It is only after four years that the Atlantic provinces will benefit fully from the additional $10 million, that is in 1965-66.

Then another arrangement is offered to Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, three provinces which will be below the national average for equalization purposes. That arrangement is a guarantee that during the next five years those provinces will not receive less than if the present arrangement had merely been extended. Under such a provision I admit that those three provinces will not be worse off. Quebec and Manitoba will begin to benefit slightly under the new formula in the last year of the new arrangements, that is in 1966-67. But Saskatchewan will never benefit during this period. These three provinces, therefore, will continue to live under the conditions of the existing arrangements during the next five years. For all practical purposes they will gain nothing; therefore their disappointment is easily understood.

Then, of course, a fourth arrangement is offered to Alberta and British Columbia, two provinces which would be above the national average. These two provinces do not receive less during the next five years than they got on the average during the last two years of the existing arrangement, that is in 1960-61 and 1961-62, as compared with the extension of the existing arrangements. However, as compared with an extension of the existing arrangements, Alberta will always be worse off under the new system. My calculation shows that Alberta will lose about $20 million in the next five years under the arrangement now contemplated. British Columbia will lose in the first two years and gain during the last three years. In the aggregate, if my calculations are correct, British Columbia will gain about $7 million during the next five years.

It is our contention that this new formula, these new tax sharing arrangements, weaken the principle of equilization; that they create rather than remove regional inequities as compared with the existing arrangements, and that these inequities will result from the lowering of the equilization base. Some of the provinces will be hurt. The per capita revenue in 1966-67, when the new system will yield its maximum benefits as compared to the present system, will be lower in Alberta, about the same in Quebec, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and higher in the other provinces.

It must be observed also, and this is certainly important, that all the provinces in Canada under these arrangements will lose in relation to the richest province, the province of Ontario. Surely it is not a good thing for national unity, for one federal system and for national development to neglect to act in a way which will bring the less rich provinces into alignment, as far as that can be done by federal help, with the richer provinces.

These are the reasons why we disapprove of some of the aspects, and some of the important aspects, of this new program, and why we cannot go along with the minister in his extravagant praise of this new deal brought about after four years of conferences with the provinces; brought about, the hon. gentleman said last night, in a way which would cause great satisfaction in all the provinces which would benefit by it, but which seems to have been received in most of the provinces with disappointment and only in one or two with satisfaction.

Mr. Regier: It is the opinion of this group that this is by far the most important legislation which we have had before us since the house opened last November, because this has to do with the development or otherwise of the Canadian people as a nation.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, I represent a constituency in the province of British Columbia. I admit at once that I believe that in the long run, if we were to regain our original rights, or if our original right to levy our own levels of personal and corporation income tax were to be returned to us, British Columbia would be much better off than if the agreements were to be continued. However, I should like to think I was a Canadian before I was a British Columbian, and I believe most British Columbians would accept the responsibility of being Canadians ahead of any feeling they might have for their own welfare within the province.

We know that on a per capita basis we are one of the wealthiest and fastest growing provinces in Canada. We believe that the legislation forecast in this resolution is contrary to the intent of the fathers of confederation, who worked so hard and overcame so many difficulties to achieve the necessary teamwork and co-operation among the then existing colonies to lay the beginnings of one nation that was intended to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We believe that in these proposals the government are not now supplying the leadership that is essential to the growth of Canadian nationhood. We believe they are supplying leadership in the wrong direction, and that this will hurt what we like to think is at least a developing nationhood.

We do not believe in centralization; we believe in the federal system of government. However, we now have responsibilities on all levels of government that were not even contemplated when Canada was first formed in 1867. I am sure if the fathers of confederation had been able to foresee the needs of the Canadian people in 1961 they would have made many arrangements other than those that were arrived at. I am sure that were they here today they would not applaud the spirit that is behind the resolution now before us.

We do not want centralization. We need to continue, for very valid reasons, our federal concept of government. However, this ought not to prevent growing co-operation among all levels of government. This abrogation of the spirit of dominion-provincial tax sharing, this abrogation of the spirit of that legislation which we have had on our books now for so long, is not likely to lead to closer co-operation. It is more than likely to lead to greater divergencies, to greater discrepancy, to greater bitterness not only among various levels of government but also among various areas of Canada in their relationship one to another.

We realize that the path to harmony under our system of government is strewn with many obstacles indeed, that the difficulties are great; but we have confidence. We believe we have more confidence than the government of our day in the basic good intention and feeling of patriotism that exist in the hearts of all Canadian people from coast to coast. We feel that this legislation of desperation, as I would call it, is not crediting the Canadian people with the basic qualities that we believe they have. We contend that had there been a real will a way might have been found to resolve this problem in an altogether different manner from that that is now being proposed.

I know the minister is predicting all kinds of safeguards in the legislation to come before us so there shall be no undue hardship imposed on any of the provinces, but in essence what this government are proposing is that they are intending to desert a system whereby national agreement was reached and provinces were entitled to things as Canadians. That is to be replaced by what in effect is everybody for himself, and we shall in effect give hand-outs to our poorer relatives in other parts of Canada. I do not think the poorer provinces of Canada will take kindly to this new atmosphere that is to be created.

The people of Nova Scotia have rights as Canadians, and they do not want to feel that they are dependent upon the big-hearted Minister of Finance in Ottawa who may arbitrarily, in the years to come, have unto himself the right to determine the fate of the people of Nova Scotia, and be able to determine how much money we will be prepared to let the people of Nova Scotia have out of the national treasury.

We not only believe that this is a turning back of the clock with respect to the development of Canadian nationhood, but we also regret that this represents in essence a new low in our dealings with the provincial governments. We used to have the courtesy at least of sending them telegrams. The minister was severely criticized at the time he began to substitute the sending of telegrams to the heads of provincial governments for consultation. As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate so rightly corrected me the other day, in effect in the atmosphere that now prevails the policy is "take it or else" and this has been made very plain. I was pleased to hear the leader of the official opposition say that at least the head of one government has complained that they have been left with no option, no open door. As I understand the language of no open door, this means that the federal government has decided in fact that there shall be no consultation any more to see whether agreements mutually satisfactory might not be arrived at. Now the provinces are told "take it or else".

In many respects it has to be "or else". If the provinces want to take advantage of federal collection machinery they will have to conform to very stringent and almost impossible conditions. I can tell the minister right now that if he insists on those conditions the province of British Columbia will have to collect its own income tax. It is absolutely unrealistic to expect a province that is as wealthy in natural resources, especially in the basic industries, to comply willingly with those terms. I am convinced that in its own interests the government of British Columbia will have to establish its own collection machinery. We in that part of Canada at least now know that we shall have a double system of income tax and in effect a return to the tax jungle of the hungry 1930's.

We believe the Minister of Finance of the province of Saskatchewan really hit at the essence of this policy when he said that the federal government is now proposing to abdicate its ability to combat recession and unemployment. What is going to happen? If the federal government decides that in order to stimulate the economy of our country a 5 per cent reduction in income tax is reasonable and desirable, the minister knows very well what the hard pressed provincial governments will immediately do. If the federal government for national purposes deems it advisable to reduce income tax levels by 5 per cent, each of the provincial governments will immediately absorb that 5 per cent and the intent of the federal government for national purposes will immediately have been vetoed. Vice versa, if the federal government feels at some time that it needs to increase the levels of income tax there will be a great desire on the part of politicians on the provincial level to make good fellows of themselves, especially if they are politically opposed to the government at Ottawa. Their inclination will be to reduce the income tax by as much as the federal government raises it, so they will be able to go out on the hustings and say to the voters "Look what evil people the members of the federal government are; they have raised your income tax, but we good politicians, friends of the people, have lowered the income tax".

This will not lead to harmony. It will lead to disharmony. It will lead to one level of government being played off against another level of government. It will lead to the introduction of political aspects into this whole field, and the federal government will find that it has tied its hands with regard to its ability to accept responsibility for the national economic welfare.

The federal government will find that it has in effect deserted its responsibility with respect to the particular needs of hard hit regions of Canada. The federal government should realize that it is now proposing to desert the desire of all Canadians that there should be basic national minimum standards in the fields of health, education, welfare and highways, and that there should be teamwork in the matter of forest fires and so on.

I express the opinion that our nation is already far too deeply involved in the field of co-operation, in the field of the sharing of responsibilities between the two levels of government, for the federal government to attempt at this late date to turn back the tide. I should like to read one sentence from a book entitled "Law and Policy" by J. A. Corry, vice-principal of Queen's University and acting dean of the faculty of law. On page 62 he has this to say:

> Federal spending now supports so much of the established political, social and economic structure that there is genuine reluctance to take steps that might wipe it out.

The book was published in 1959, and the passage I have read is taken from a lecture delivered by Professor Corry in 1957. I am sure that as recently as 1957 no leading thinker in our nation ever expected that the day would arrive when we would have in office a federal government that would attempt to push back the tide, that would attempt to turn back the clock; and I would say that the efforts of the government in this respect are going to fail because the Canadian people will not be prepared to accept this scheme.

We have co-operation now between the federal government and the provinces in the field of combating forest fires, in the field of professional education, in the field of university education, in the field of highway construction, in the field of building forest access roads and roads to resources, and in the field of public welfare to ensure basic minimum standards for all Canadians. Every Canadian gets an old age pension of $55 a month no matter where he lives in Canada. Some Canadians receive more. They receive an additional payment from their local government, but every Canadian as a Canadian receives his $55 a month.

We have had for a long time the greatest of co-operation in the field of health and in our attempts to establish basic health services for all Canadians regardless of the province in which they live. The federal government is going to find it very difficult, if not completely impossible, to implement its apparent tendency to hand back to the provinces, as the government says, all the responsibilities and the revenues that constitutionally belong to the provinces. In the book "Law and Policy" some doubts are expressed as to the constitutionality of many of our existing activities where co-operation and the sharing of responsibilities with the provincial governments are involved. However, no leading Canadian has ever dared to test these things before the courts, and Mr. Corry comes to the conclusion that it is a good thing that the designation of particular responsibilities has been absorbed by the political field in Canada and that interpretations and rulings by the judiciary in this regard have been avoided. He feels that it is in the interests of a developing nation that this has occurred. He is rather pleased that political techniques have been employed to overcome at least a number of our major problems in this respect.

We cannot make uniform national progress in Canada if the intentions of the government are going to be pursued. We will find British Columbia becoming richer and Nova Scotia becoming poorer. This is inevitable. This measure will not supply employment to the unemployed miners of Cape Breton. It will not help northern New Brunswick to raise its living standards. It will make the people of Ontario wealthier than they are today, and possibly inadvertently and unintentionally it will result in the spread between the haves and the have-nots in Canada continuing to grow. We believe that the spread between the rich and the poor in the various regions of Canada in which they live should be narrowed. We understand that possibly not in our lifetime will all Canadians enjoy equal rights in all parts of Canada. However, that certainly ought to be our objective; and the activities of this government in the matter of dominion-provincial tax sharing lead us in this group to believe that the government is leading us on to very dangerous paths indeed that will sow the seeds of disunity in Canada and will set Canadians against Canadians.

There is no appeal here to Canadians to come to the conference table and resolve their problems as Canadians. This is an appeal to Canadians to stay at home and ignore the welfare of other Canadians, who will have to make do; but in case they are in very dire need they will have the right to come to Ottawa and out of the goodness of our hearts we will then decide what kind of a hand-out we will give them to help them with their particular problems.

I cannot help but recall the underlying election appeal that our Prime Minister put forward so successfully in 1958. He really took hold of what he felt was a growing Canadianism, an awareness of Canadians as Canadians, and he capitalized on it very successfully on the hustings. I do not hold this against him. I suppose every politician likes to take the innermost feelings of the people and use them in order to commend his own election platform and program. I see nothing unworthy about that. However, I fail to understand how one great Canadian Conservative Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, could lead the first major move to weld the colonies into one Canada and another Conservative Prime Minister, who I am sure wants to be an equally great Canadian Prime Minister and who won election on the basic appeal to Canadianism, can now, instead of the co-operation we heard so much about, say to our provinces "Take it or leave it".

The government say, "We will give some guarantees to those of you who might otherwise have to suffer unduly, and if you run into serious difficulties we may, out of the kindness of our heart, decide to give you a hand-out." I am sure the founders of this nation meant that a Canadian would be a Canadian from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I deem it to be the responsibility of this goverment to ensure that a boy or a girl in Cape Breton will have the same educational and employment opportunities as a boy or girl in wealthy Ontario or wealthy British Columbia.

This government is steering this country in a direction that it was not intended it should go by those who founded our Canadian nation. If the Prime Minister warns of an election platform upon which he may be willing to appeal to the people, I can tell him that if he goes to the people now Mr. Coyne will have been forgotten after the first week of the election campaign and this will be the big issue. I am sure we will win out on it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are some aspects of this problem upon which I should like to say something, particularly in so far as they concern the province from which I come, the province of Ontario. However, before dealing with those aspects of the problem I should like to say it is regrettable that a matter of this great importance is presented to us by the Minister of Finance just a few days before we are apparently going to adjourn this session of parliament. It is true that the bill based on this resolution is not going to be proceeded with at this part of the session. Nevertheless the resolution having to do with this matter, and of course the related bill, are of such importance that one can legitimately complain about the fact that we are dealing with this measure at this particular juncture.

As a matter of fact, when one thinks of the important legislative measures with which we have dealt in the last three weeks, one can only conclude that we have had a further demonstration of the inept way in which the affairs of this house have been directed by this government.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not directing my remarks at the Minister of Veterans Affairs when I say that. I am saying we have had important legislation dumped on us like an avalanche during the last three weeks, and this has demonstrated the ineffective way in which our affairs have been directed by this government. Much of this legislation could have been presented earlier in the session, when we could have had an opportunity of giving it careful consideration.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): If we had not been delayed by the Liberals.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not going to be thwarted by these remarks about being delayed.

Mr. Spencer: It is a fact, though.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend from Essex West now says something in support of what has been said. I may tell my hon. friends that if they want to interject these remarks, they do not divert me in any way. The fact is that we did not have any legislation of a serious nature presented to us up until the dying days of this session, and particularly in the last few weeks. This is a reflection upon the ability of the government to organize its affairs and organize the affairs of this house. Now, that is a fact. We find that included in these important measures is the particular measure which we are discussing at this moment.

The Minister of Finance presented a number of tables, I think no less than seven, in the dying hours of last night's sitting. These tables defy the kind of analysis which we are entitled to have of this problem. We will be able, I take it, in the interval before we come back to make the kind of assessment with regard to those tables that will have a very important bearing upon the contention the minister has made, that the recent federal-provincial fiscal arrangements have been widely received by the provinces. The fact is that the provinces are not happy about this measure at all. The words quoted by the Leader of the Opposition this morning are a clear confirmation of that fact.

May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Churchill: Go ahead; you have two minutes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall be glad to go on to accommodate the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. gentleman has suggested that the house is being pressed to consider this resolution. Would he suggest a time for the termination of the session? We have not suggested that we end the session immediately. How many days would he like to spend on the discussion of this resolution?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me tell my hon. friend that we are prepared to stay here as long as there is important public business to discharge.

Mr. Ricard: So are we.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let there be no doubt about this. What do we hear in the public corridors, what do we hear in the lobbies both on the government side and on our side? We hear the question, when are the Liberals going to stop debating measures so we, the Tory members, can get home? That is the request that is being made.

Mr. Churchill: That does not answer my question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has my hon. friend any more questions?

Mr. Churchill: My hon. friend has not answered the question. How many days would you like to spend on the resolution stage?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As long as it is necessary to discharge our responsibilities.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he inform us how many of the members of his party are on vacation now?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not very many.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has said, namely that this resolution takes us back to a period that could be characterized by saying that the taxing opportunities taken by the federal and provincial governments 20 years ago represented a period that was one of confusion and often of uncertainty. This resolution takes us back to the pre-Rowell-Sirois days before 1941. Anyone who is familiar with the history of federal-provincial fiscal relations will appreciate what that means. I also agree that this measure is calculated to bring about a lack of co-ordination in provisions for the standards of living of all Canadians. No matter what the minister may say to the contrary, it will mean that different provinces will have different means and methods of providing for the welfare of their people. There will be inequalities that will be encouraged as a result of the step that is taken in the government's policy embodied in this resolution and announced many months ago; it was announced last fall, to be precise.

However, one cannot fully appreciate the full implications of this resolution by merely examining its expressed provisions. In this resolution there is nothing to indicate the abandonment by the government of procedures that have been followed now since well after the beginning of the second world war. To understand exactly what the government has done one should go back to the assurances given to the Canadian people by the present Prime Minister when, in the opening campaign speech at Massey Hall on April 25, 1957, he said:

> We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination as displayed by the present government, but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

As was said by the hon. member who has just spoken, in this particular bill and all that it represents and all the procedures that were taken in connection with it from the time the government's present policy was announced there is nothing that suggests an effort at unity or an effort at collaboration with the provinces. It is a "take it or leave it" position and is contrary to the spirit implied in the statement of the Prime Minister which I have quoted. In the same speech the Prime Minister said that he was pledged to work out new tax-sharing arrangements with the provinces which would strengthen Canada's federal system and give provinces and municipalities the funds to carry out their responsibilities.

It will be seen that this bill will not give the provinces the funds to carry out their responsibilities. It is therefore only right that at this late stage in our proceedings we should examine the implications of this resolution. As I said before the luncheon recess, when the bill comes before us there will be an opportunity to particularize our reactions to it. At this time, however, I wish to confine myself to one aspect of the consequence of this policy by giving special emphasis to its consequence in the province of Ontario.

It will be recalled that during the course of the present winter officials in the government of Ontario made it clear—and I may say this was early in February—that if they did not get the additional $100 million which Premier Frost said he must have from Ottawa, it would be necessary to impose a further form of taxation in the province of Ontario. As a matter of fact, I am wrong in using the figure of $100 million. While that figure represented the demand made a year and a half ago by Ontario, and also one made by the premier of Ontario in April of 1957, it had grown to not less than $118 million in the month of February of this year.

To understand the full implications of this resolution it should be recalled that in July, 1960 Premier Frost made additional demands on the federal government for a 50-50 share in federal income, corporation and succession duty taxes. At that time the proportion of sharing in these taxes by the provinces was on the basis of 13 per cent of income tax, 9 per cent of corporation tax and 50 per cent of succession duty taxes. Only because of the demands made on his government, Premier Frost pointed out, was it necessary for him to increase this amount. His enthusiasm in 1957 will be recalled, when he approved of this government and particularly of the present Prime Minister, giving every evidence that he fully expected to be able to obtain from the present federal government additional sums of money which he said had been denied his province by the previous administration.

While it is a fact that Premier Frost made his demand for an increase to 50-50 sharing in these three areas of taxation with the federal government, it is also a fact that this demand was turned down by this government. It was turned down in a manner that I believe warranted the criticism Premier Frost and other members of his government levelled against this administration for its failure to live up to the commitments made and the assurances given by the Prime Minister in his speech in Massey Hall in 1957.

When Premier Frost was faced with the rejection of his request for these additional sums of money, he then sought—it will be remembered—a constitutional amendment to give Ontario the right to levy an indirect retail sales tax. We do know that in October of 1961, the federal government, through the Prime Minister, said there would be no increase in the present sharing of tax revenues.

Mr. Speakman: Are you reading the Prime Minister's mind?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Speakman: You said 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I intended to say that in 1960 the Prime Minister announced there would be no increase in the sharing of revenues with the provinces beyond the formula of 13, 9 and 50 per cent. The Prime Minister then said that in view of the decision of this government not to increase grants as requested by practically all the provinces, the federal government proposed the abandonment of the existing tax rental arrangement with nine of the provinces.

The Minister of Finance has said that the proposal now before us was well received by the provinces. I think it is clear from what the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out that this is not the situation. The premier of Ontario had no hesitation in giving his reaction to this announcement of policy by the government. He said, "This is very far removed from Ontario's requirements. It falls far short". We do know that his dissatisfaction with this announcement of policy was widely shared all across Ontario. Perhaps a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 6, 1961 reflects the reaction that exists throughout the province and which immediately followed the announcement by the Prime Minister. The Globe and Mail said on March 6, 1961:

> What all of this shows to Ontario, and to the other provinces, is that leadership in fiscal matters cannot be left to Ottawa. Ottawa is not giving such leadership; will not give it for at least another five years, because the new tax sharing system which starts March 31, 1962 runs until March 31, 1967. By that time, the Ontario sales tax—like many another emergency measure—will be solidly entrenched.

The government of Ontario has announced that because of the failure of this government to live up to its commitments and its certain failure to recognize the demands made by Ontario and other provinces, and because of the obligations imposed on the government of Ontario, it had to resort to an additional form of taxation to obtain the necessary revenues which it feels it is entitled to receive from Ottawa.

This is a far cry from the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1957 when he said, "We will make sure the provinces and the municipalities have sufficient money to do the job they are supposed to do". What the Prime Minister and what the government have in fact done is to say to Premier Frost and to the other provinces, "If you need more money, go out and get it yourselves". That is exactly what the province of Ontario has done.

I say that if the Ontario government has imposed a sales tax to be collected some time in the month of September, the main contributing factor in the decision of the Ontario government to provide for this additional form of taxation rests on the shoulders of this government because of the arrangement it is now proposing to the provinces.

I have before me the Ottawa Journal of February 23, 1961 and the headline is:

> Sales tax threatened in Ontario.

The article goes on to say:

> Such a tax, Ontario Premier Frost pointedly did not deny, could be the price of failure of the provincial and federal governments to reach an amicable new settlement of the 20 year old issue of tax sharing.

Let no one say that in suggesting the province of Ontario has been compelled to resort to this sales tax because of the failure of this government I am resorting to inaccuracy. This is based on an admission made by the premier of Ontario himself, as I have just indicated, in this story which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on February 23, 1961.

Mr. Chairman, we have also the budget of the provincial treasurer for the province of Ontario delivered by Mr. Allan on March 10, 1961 in which the provincial treasurer pointed out the need for additional revenue in Ontario. He pointed out the consequences of the failure of the federal government to recognize the claims made by Ontario and other provinces and then announced, of course, the decision of the government of Ontario to impose a sales tax.

It will be recalled that the provincial treasurer of Ontario had announced that his budget would be presented in the Ontario legislature some two weeks, I believe, or thereabouts, before the date when it was actually presented. It was postponed in the hope that as a result of the conference which was about to take place with the federal government there would be some announcement of policy by the federal government which would enable the provincial treasurer to change his budgetary proposals. These changes were not forthcoming and in the budget of Mr. Allan of March 10, 1961 there was the announcement of this new policy and its consequences for the people of the province of Ontario.

I do not think I overstate the case when I say that throughout the province of Ontario there is great dissatisfaction over the introduction of this sales tax. I think when we are discussing this matter we should fix the blame where essentially it lies, as was stated by the provincial treasurer and by Premier Frost himself. The Ontario government said, "We need additional revenues. We cannot get sufficient moneys to take care of our obligations because of the failure of the federal government to give us the money to which we feel we are entitled. Consequently, as we have to build schools, as we have to build roads, as we have other obligations to meet, we have no other course but to impose this additional sales tax". I am not saying the Ontario government should not have found another way of providing for the revenues which it felt it required. I am saying that the evidence is clear; the Ontario government was driven into this position as a result of the position taken by the federal government and its intransigence with regard to its tax sharing policy with the provinces.

The consequence of this, in the province of Ontario, will, of course, be great. I mentioned the other day, and I repeat now, that the effects of the removal of the excise tax on automobiles at long last will be considerably mitigated in the province of Ontario, the largest market for Canadian purchases of automobiles, as a result of the sales tax to be imposed in Ontario collection of which will commence some time in September. The consequences will, of course, be even wider than this. They will be felt all over Ontario as this tax comes to be imposed on all kinds of goods, creating all kinds of new obligations for retailers and for consumers who, in their thousands, are beginning to protest the imposition of this tax. When we are discussing the policy of the federal government regarding this matter it is only proper that we should attribute to the federal government its share of responsibility for the course which has been taken in Ontario.

It is all very well for hon. gentlemen, when confronted with specific proposals, to examine them per se, to fail to relate them to the facts of history and to circumstances, particularly those which attended the announcement of policy by this government when it was asking the people of this country to give it support in 1957 and 1958. We were told then that this government would embark on a policy which would resolve once and for all the fiscal differences which prevailed between the two senior levels of government. We were told there would be a dominion-provincial conference early in September. Those elections were held in the month of June. We know there was no conference held until the month of November, and then it was only because of prodding from this side of the house that a one day conference was held. We do know that following that conference instead of a policy being arrived at in collaboration with the provinces there was an announcement of the policy of the federal government, unilaterally, by way of a telegram which, we all remember, did not contain correctly the figures which had to do with further dispositions of money to be made to the provinces.

But let this be clear. We shall have an opportunity, when this bill comes before the house, of examining further aspects of this measure. The bill is not going to be dealt with until we return. We are now simply discussing the resolution. I feel, as a member from the province of Ontario, knowing the dissatisfaction which exists in Ontario over the sales tax, that it is only proper that we should attribute to this government the proper degree of responsibility for that fact. I do not say that this was the only way by which this additional money could be raised, but it is right to say that not only are individual citizens in the province of Ontario complaining, not only have members of opposition groups in Ontario complained about the sales tax, but organizations generally are complaining about the failure of this government to live up to its assurances in the matter of federal fiscal arrangements. When Ontario citizens come to pay this tax they will not only remember the Ontario government but they will remember the assurances given by the federal government —the assurances given by the federal Prime Minister in Massey Hall in the presence of Premier Frost in 1957. They will remember that Premier Frost indicated there was going to be some relief for Ontario as a result of a new fiscal deal.

Well, we have the results now, and there is no new deal for the province of Ontario. There is no new deal for the other provinces. What we have, once again, is a failure by this government to live up to the assurances which it gave not only to the people of Ontario but to the people of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is of extreme importance because it determines and establishes the axis around which federal-provincial relations will revolve for a period of five years as of April 1, 1962, until March 31, 1967.

What are, briefly, the main points of this resolution?

An editorial published in La Presse of June 23, 1961, sums them up very well, I think, and I quote:

> This week the Prime Minister communicated with the premiers of the provinces. He informed them that his government could grant them no more advantages than those offered in the taxation field during the last federal-provincial conference in February of this year.
>
> In short, Mr. Diefenbaker had bad news for them.
>
> The provinces in general and more particularly Quebec, were disappointed by the February conference on fiscal matters. After all, the provinces were still hoping that Ottawa would relent. Their hopes were now dealt a fatal blow.
> As a matter of fact, Ottawa has regressed in the field of personal taxation. But it catches up in other ways, by amending the equalization formula. The new equalization formula submitted by Mr. Diefenbaker considers some new factors by which payments to Quebec will be, to all intents and purposes, frozen for the next five years, whereas, until now, they have been increasing rapidly from year to year.
> The formula devised by Mr. St. Laurent was more generous, because it was based on the average return from the three normal taxes in the two wealthiest provinces, whereas the Diefenbaker formula is based on the average return of those same taxes in all provinces. Under Mr. St. Laurent, it was equalization from the top; with Mr. Diefenbaker, we have equalization from the bottom. From this point of view, the new proposal is not only less generous, but discriminatory.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been criticized for three fundamental reasons. First of all, the equalization principle is practically frozen, whereas it should necessarily remain adaptable and flexible. Second, the formula means equalization of provincial revenue from the middle instead of from the top, which led the Saskatchewan premier to say at the last federal-provincial conference that this was not equalization any more but "averaging". The premier of Quebec also had some concise but extremely revealing comments to make when he said that "the principle of equalization has been killed".

The third great weakness I see in this formula of the present government is that in practice, it means a greatly reduced income for the provinces recognized in the past as have-not provinces. Moreover, I feel quite sure that Mr. Duplessis would have been the first to reject such a formula outright. Why? Because at the last conference which he attended, he stated quite clearly that what he wanted was cash; having little interest in the other formulas previously put forward, he would certainly not have liked this scheme which, in the case of the province of Quebec for instance, provides for reduced returns for the next five years, whereas under the old formula which was so bitterly attacked by our Conservative friends, the share of Quebec increased year by year.

In fact it will be recalled that for the first year Quebec drew an equalization payment of $36 million, and for the years 1960-61, it will draw approximately $72 million.

Referring to the table that was placed on the record yesterday by the Minister of Finance on page 7920 of Hansard, I find that it is a little over $71 million.

Mr. Chairman, it is well at this time, in order to understand the mechanics and the yield of both formulas—the old and the new—which are placed before us, to consider first the case of the province of Quebec as an example.

Under the old formula, it will be recalled that the yield of the three taxes, personal income tax, the corporation income tax and the succession duties, in the two most wealthy provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, was about $45 per capita. In Quebec, the per capita yield was $29, so that the province of Quebec was entitled to an equalization payment of $16, multiplied by its population figure. Now, the new formula that is placed before us takes into account the tax yield in the ten provinces, and that yield is about $34.50 per capita on a national basis, as against $29.50 in Quebec.

The province of Quebec is therefore falling short of the national average by approximately $5. Moreover, in this new formula, the government is introducing a new factor: the provincial natural resource revenue, more exactly 50 per cent of that special revenue. Now, the natural resource revenue per capita in the provinces comes to about $7.75, as against $3.25 for the province of Quebec.

Allow me to summarize the two situations. In the case of the three taxes, Quebec falls short of the national average by approximately $5, while in the case of the average for the natural resource revenue, Quebec falls short by approximately $4.50.

These two figures add up to a total of $9.50. And this $9.50, multiplied by the population figure of the province of Quebec, which is about 5,700,000, determines the equalization payment to which we would be entitled, acording to the new formula proposed by Mr. Diefenbaker; it comes to some $47 million.

Therefore, that is much less attractive than the present formula which yielded approximately $72 million to the province of Quebec.

The Minister of Finance adds a guarantee that there will be no reduction in payments during the next five years. However, there is another guarantee, a guarantee we do not like, namely that during those five years those payments will not increase, as they would have if the old formula had been kept in force.

Mr. Chairman, in general the provinces have shown their disapproval, their great disappointment and their obvious dissatisfaction with that formula. That is why I feel the government is making a serious mistake in forcing the passage of this resolution, especially at this stage of the session. This matter is not urgent. The present agreements will expire only next spring and instead of arrogantly imposing its will to the provinces in a take it or leave it attitude, the government had ample time, to continue its negotiations with the provinces and to seek a new solution with them, in view of the importance of this matter for the unity and expansion of the Canadian federation.

I am not speaking here of expansion in the restrictive sense which the Minister of Finance gives to it, but in a broad sense which would allow the provision of essential services in all provinces so that there may be no underdeveloped sector and so that all Canadians may reasonably reach a comparable standard of living in all provinces.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have refused to budge an inch from the position they took at the last federal-provincial conference. Having expressed a refusal, they thought they could encourage the provinces by telling them: "Well, you can levy your own taxes if you are not satisfied", just as if that were a new right. In fact, certain provinces have already had to levy direct taxes as for instance, in Ontario where a 3 per cent sales tax will come into force next September.

If the government thinks it has given satisfaction to the provinces it is soon to suffer a rude awakening, after having promised so much to the provinces. It now introduces in resolution form legislation which is certainly nothing to boast about.

We of the official opposition have always attached a great deal of importance to the principle of equalization. But, for all practical purposes, this measure is getting away from that principle. And the poorer provinces will be the most affected.

The Secretary of State, to comfort the province of Quebec, could tell her: You will get less under this formula, but you will gain in autonomy. He could also say: You will have a higher degree of autonomy than heretofore since you will be able to levy your own taxes should you need more money.

My concept of autonomy is quite different. It is a concept which reconciles constitutional rights and practical common sense. It is not by lowering equalization payments to the provinces in general and to Quebec in particular that we will be promoting their autonomy. A province can only exercise its autonomy to the fullest extent when it has all the required facilities to develop harmoniously. A municipality ceases to be autonomous when it can no longer face its obligations, and the same goes for the provinces, in similar circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, to put it briefly, I submit that this new formula is completely and directly contrary to the promises made to the provinces in 1957 and 1958. In addition to weakening the equalization principle, which has shown its value, this formula will leave the provinces in a state of discontent and frustration that will bring us much closer to fiscal disorder than to the agreement of 1867.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman; I wish to make a few observations about this resolution. They are not so much observations in detail as observations of a general character. In what I say I am not going to attempt to traverse the whole field of federal-provincial relations even since the present government came into office. I am not going to go back to the bad arithmetic of the Minister of Finance and those telegrams which he sent in that new spirit of harmony about which we heard so much in 1957, because I say that never since Mr. Bennett was in office have relations between many of the provinces and the federal government reached the stage which the relations with some provinces have under the present government.

An hon. Member: Joey Smallwood.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the premier of Newfoundland, because this government repudiated the terms of confederation. Look at the kind of relations they have with the premier of British Columbia. Because they were so over-eager they signed a treaty before they knew whether they could carry it out. Now he has torpedoed their whole scheme. It is just of a piece with everything that this government attempts to do. Without exception everything ends in a mess. One of the reasons, in fact, one of the principal ones, I think, is that the Prime Minister did not listen to those very wise words which were uttered from this side of the house by his great predecessor on October 16, 1957 when Mr. St. Laurent said from this house, and I am simply paraphrasing, that for 22 years every undertaking given by the previous government to the people of Canada that the government and parliament of Canada by themselves could carry out had been carried out and people will expect the same thing from their successors. What have they got from them?

Mr. Ricard: Is this the Mr. St. Laurent that you kicked out?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot has at last given me an opportunity to reply to that insinuation, that innuendo that he is so fond of uttering.

Mr. Ricard: Give it to us.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are those in this country who know something about my personal relations with Mr. St. Laurent over the years and anybody who thinks that I ever had any part in doing anything but paying the highest possible honour to the greatest living Canadian, one of the greatest Canadians we have ever had—

Mr. Ricard: Your party kicked him out of office.

Mr. Pickersgill: —is completely mistaken. As far as our party was concerned it was with the greatest possible regret and I will say more than regret—

Mr. Ricard: You can say that again.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would let me say it without his interruptions. I do not think he was in the confidence of the Liberal party then or at any other time, nor is he ever likely to be—

Mr. Ricard: I never wish to be either.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because he has a cast of mind and a type of respect for the rights of others that I would think would make it very difficult for him to find himself at home in the company of Liberals.

Mr. Ricard: I never wish to be.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that it was with the greatest regret and not merely regret but some embarrassment that every Liberal in this country learned that my right hon. friend, Mr. St. Laurent, after the election of 1957 had come to the conclusion very reluctantly that he could not carry on at that time because of the state of his health. All these other stories that have been circulated as political propaganda by hon. gentlemen opposite show how little they have of a constructive character to say to the people of Canada.

What I am saying, sir, is that because of the attitude taken in 1956 at the time that the tax-sharing arrangements act was put on the statute books there was the greatest possible doubt in this country with respect to where the Conservative party stood so far as equalization was concerned. As the Minister of Finance has often told us, the opposition of that day, the Conservative party, voted against that bill. They talked against it and they voted against it and during all the period up to that time they said that they were in favour of a different system involving the allocation of tax fields. Mr. Drew was the leader of the party in the house at that time and he made many speeches on this subject. There was a legitimate fear in many quarters that if a Conservative government came into office in this country equalization would be done away with. The right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister will recall that in his speeches, and I think I have some extracts from them here which I do not wish to take up the time of the committee to quote—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to but I do not think there will be any quarrel about this point.

Mr. Churchill: Don't misquote them.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman in 1957 gave assurances in Carman, Manitoba, and in a number of other places that the present government, if it came into office, would maintain the principle of equalization.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it is maintaining the principle.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister says they maintained the principle of equalization and they have maintained it precisely as it was expressed in Mr. Harris' bill in 1957. They maintained it right up until the month of October, 1960, I think it was. From November of 1957 when the first federal-provincial conference was held after the present government came into office until the conference held in July of 1960, the proceedings of which I have here in my hand, there was a good deal of speculation in the provinces and elsewhere about what kind of proposals would be made to take the place of the existing Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act as amended and, to be completely fair about it as I wish to be, as improved by the present government. What was done in 1958 was an improvement and I have never pretended it was not at any time. I have once in a while ventured to express the view, and it is true, that it so happened that the only improvement that was made was made between the two elections. But that is true, of course, of everything else. There were quite a number of things done between the two elections but then the improvements stopped.

On July 25, 1960, a conference was held in the railway committee room in this building. It was opened by the Prime Minister and in the course of his remarks at that conference he made a statement which I should like to read into our record. I am going to read from page 10 and I do not feel I should do anything less than quote whole paragraphs although there are some portions of some of the paragraphs that really have nothing to do with the argument I am seeking to make. However, I wish to be completely accurate and completely adequate in what I say about what the right hon. gentleman said. He said:

> Some provinces have indicated a desire to resume the collection of their own revenue from these tax fields.

I think it is in order to make the reference clear. That refers to the income tax, both personal and corporate, and the succession duty or estate tax.

> This raises a question which will have to be considered in the course of this conference—

The question of some provinces wishing to resume the collection of these taxes themselves. The following are the words to which I wish to draw particular attention:

> —but I want to make this abundantly clear on behalf of the dominion government that whatever the ultimate decision may be the principle of equalization must be preserved.

Mr. Martineau: And so it is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Preserved and extended.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I go on to the next paragraph which defines equalization very precisely. These are the Prime Minister's words, not mine, and I think it would be fairer to the Prime Minister if these words were put on the record in the way in which they were uttered without having interruptions. I do not mind hon. gentlemen interrupting my words but I am seeking to put the Prime Minister's words on record so they can be read clearly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I have enough confidence in my arguments that I am always willing to have the arguments of my opponents put fully and fairly, and I always try to do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do not get too far out on that question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue to quote:

> Equalization, the second component,—

This is the definition.

> —is a payment by Canada to the provinces to bring the per capita return from the three taxes at standard rates up to the average per capita yield in the two provinces in which per capita yield is highest. For provinces in which the tax potential is relatively low, this principle is most important.

Having read that definition, and that definition is very clear and very precise, I say it is a definition of equalization that Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Harris and their colleagues—

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, not at this moment—including the Leader of the Opposition, put on the statute books in 1956 when the Conservative party voted against it. This definition of equalization which the Prime Minister gave in very precise and very accurate language, was the principle of equalization about which he used these words:

> I want to make this abundantly clear on behalf of the dominion government that whatever the ultimate decision may be the principle of equalization must be preserved.

Having said that, and so that there would be no doubt about it, the Prime Minister gave this definition of equalization which I have just read. Then, having said that, he also said this:

> The government believes that the principle of fiscal aid and equalization to assist the less wealthy provinces stands on its own feet and is accepted on that basis, and is quite separate from the question of tax rental or tax sharing.

I think that is a principle with which no one would have any quarrel. I do not know that they need necessarily be separated in the statutes. In fact, they never have been and are not going to be now under the proposals before us. The fact is that they are two different elements of the matter and the Prime Minister rightly pointed that out. I have no quarrel with the statement made by the Prime Minister. In fact, the contrary is true. I went to that conference and I listened to that speech because I have always been greatly interested in this subject. I recall that day saying to a friend of mine who was with me, now at last one thing is quite clear and that is that the present government has accepted, in unqualified language, the principle of equalization as it is understood and as it is clearly defined. This is something on which the provinces can really rely. Well, the provinces relied upon it for how long? I believe it was from July until October.

Then, in October 1960, the Prime Minister came along at the next stage of the conference with what he was pleased to call a suggestion. This suggestion repudiated this definition of equalization that the Prime Minister had solemnly affirmed in July. If I may use his own words, he said:

I want to make this abundantly clear on behalf of the dominion government that whatever the ultimate decision may be the principle of equalization must be preserved.

This was not some vague principle, but was equalization as specifically and carefully defined by the Prime Minister in that paragraph to which I referred.

Then, in the month of October the Prime Minister came along with this suggestion, this new mix, which imported into the principle of equalization the notion of revenues from natural resources and the national average instead of the average of the two highest provinces, which was the principle of equalization the Prime Minister had undertaken to preserve. I say that if anybody understands the word "repudiation" in its ordinary meaning, this was a very clear repudiation in October. We described it as such from this side of the house and we have consistently so described it ever since. It was a repudiation of a solemn undertaking given to the premiers of the provinces at that time. This is a repudiation of a principle that was evolved and, as I said the other day when speaking on the income tax bill even Mr. Duplessis, with all his intransigence admitted, after the conference of 1955-56, that the principle of equalization was a great improvement on what had previously existed. This principle had been patiently evolved over the years, and now it has been repudiated.

We had, first of all, what was delicately called a suggestion in October, what became a proposal in February and what is now a "take it or else" attitude as indicated by this resolution. Without going into any of the details, sir, that is the record of this government so far as equalization is concerned.

I could not, of course, allow this motion to pass without saying something about one other element that is imported into this resolution. I refer to the so called additional annual grant of $8 million to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Speakman: Do you not agree with it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman dare to ask anyone on this side of the house that question? We remember that day when the Prime Minister came into this house and repudiated that, too, and the Leader of the Opposition got up at once and drew attention to the fact that this was a repudiation of the terms of union. This award was made by the McNair commission and it was intended to continue, just as the awards that were made the time of the original confederation were intended to continue. It was part and parcel of the terms of union. The Leader of the Opposition took that position then, and it has been the position of the Liberal party ever since. Our position on this is very simple and very clear. We intend to carry out the terms of union. We intend to stand by the pact of confederation with Newfoundland, just as we stand by the pact of confederation with every other province. While it is true that the sum of money here is exactly the same as the McNair award, it is given not as a matter of right but as an act of grace. This is not the right way to treat the constitution.

There are many other questions that were raised by the Leader of the Opposition and by other hon. members who have spoken. One would hope the Minister of Finance would deal with those questions and satisfy our curiosity about them. I had not intended to speak about them at this stage. What I intended to do was deal with these two matters of principle, the repudiation of equalization which the Leader of the Opposition pointed out in great detail this morning, and the repudiation of the constitution.

I say, sir, that this is a sad and sorry way to deal with a problem that was nearer solution in 1956 than it had ever been. I would add also that Mr. St. Laurent said at the time that this problem will never be completely solved. Its complexity is such that there will always be improvements to be made. He said also when anyone had any better suggestions to offer they would be considered by the Liberal party, and that is our attitude. When the Leader of the Opposition became the leader of our party in 1958, certain improvements were suggested and on subsequent occasions other improvements have been suggested by the Liberal party. I say that this is a very unfortunate and retrograde step. It is going back, to use the words of the premier of Saskatchewan, a long way toward the tax jungle of the thirties.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: I want the hon. member to tell the house whether, in his opinion, there is any difference between a principle of equalization and a formula of equalization.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, of course there is. It does not require a great intellect to discover that. But when a pledge is given that the principle of equalization will be preserved and when the equalization is precisely defined immediately after that pledge, it does not mean "some" scheme of equalization. To an ordinary plain man who accepts the plain words and who does not try to read the fine print or to twist words, it means the principle of equalization embodied there in the definition. I can see the line of twisting—and it is so characteristic of this government; they all catch it from their front benches—turning and weaseling around. However, the fact is that every plain simple person accustomed to dealing with governments that put their intentions in plain language and keep their word, expected that undertaking to be kept in the words in which it was given and not in some other scheme.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill (for Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-122, to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the governments of the provinces and to authorize the government of Canada to enter into tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the motion is adopted, Mr. Speaker, can the minister say whether the bill is printed and ready for distribution?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: In both languages?

Mr. Churchill: I will investigate and find out.

Mr. Pickersgill: In these circumstances, I think perhaps the minister would not wish to have first reading given until the bill was available in both languages.

Mr. Churchill: On the contrary. I think the practice of the house is to give first reading. It may well be that the copies are available.

Mr. Habel: Where are they?

Mr. Churchill: Surely I am not obliged to go to some other office to find out. This is the responsibility of the officials of the House of Commons and not mine. If the first reading of this bill is given on this occasion, then the officials who are under the direction of Mr. Speaker will distribute them to hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed from Friday July 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, when I was speaking on this bill on the last day when it was before this committee, I had listed some of the advantages that will be made available by the bill if passed by the house to the civil service and to the civil service administration of the country generally. I had mentioned that under Bill No. C-71, the right to pay of employees of the government is recognized for the first time and that a wide system of appeal is now available to civil servants from administrative decisions within the departments in which they work. I had mentioned that the distinction between temporary employees and permanent employees has been removed and that now there can be a transfer from the public service to the civil service in appropriate cases. I had also mentioned that a very real preference will be set forth under the bill for bilingual people and that the bill provided for the admission of new Canadians to the civil service who under the old act were prohibited from giving service to the country in this way. I had come to the point where I was talking about the very major gain in the new relations between the civil service and the government in the provision of a consultation method and procedure and also the discussion in the committee as regards the setting up of arbitration facilities where disputes might arise.

In that connection may I say this. When the hon. member for Hull was speaking on Thursday, July 6, he said as follows:

> The minister has referred to arbitration. He referred to it as something highly dangerous. He said he opposed it because he wanted to protect the rights of parliament.

This appears at page 5 of the translation of the debates of July 6. The hon. member was referring to the Minister of Finance at that time. I bring this to the attention of the committee because it is so palpably wrong and unfair, that it should not be allowed to go unchallenged. Actually when the minister was before the committee he stated as follows, and I am referring now to the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special committee on the Civil Service Act at page 537:

> We do not wish to embark on any radical or untried form of legislative action, but we—I speak for my colleagues and myself—are willing to explore the possibility of developing in Canada procedures based upon precedent and fortified by good faith. I think it is recognized by all, Mr. Chairman, that any system of negotiation which might be considered will require considerable time, and no doubt patience, to develop along these lines. I am led to believe that the views of the staff associations themselves on matters of representation fall somewhat short of unanimity. I would respectfully suggest, therefore, that this whole question be carefully explored so that the rights of parliament will not be unduly abridged, and that all of us on our part and in our turn will be able to develop an approach to the question of consultation on matters of pay and conditions of employment which, being based upon precedent and experience, will stand the test of time.

That is certainly the opposite of the impression that was left with the committee by the hon. member for Hull.

Further, I find a completely different interpretation from that put upon the minister's words by the hon. member for Hull in a column written by Mr. John Stockdale of the Ottawa Journal, in the issue of that paper of Saturday, June 24. Mr. Stockdale followed the meetings of the special committee very closely and he as much as anyone is familiar with the bill and what it intends to achieve. What Mr. Stockdale wrote is as follows:

> It may not all be spelled out in the new Civil Service Act, but the writing which will concede powers of negotiation and arbitration within the Canadian civil service is on the wall—if not in the bag.
> The prophets who put it there are no less than finance minister Fleming and parliamentary secretary Dick Bell.
> Reactions from staff organizations today are generally favourable, even if there are reservations related to the circumstance that techniques of discussion and negotiation remain loosely defined.
>
> Mr. Fleming made it clear consultation with staff associations on pay and conditions was to be at all appropriate times. Mr. Bell was emphatic that, in a relatively short time, it was intended to achieve a Canadian version of Britain's Whitley procedure —and the cornerstones of the Whitley system are negotiation and arbitration.
>
> The need to avoid legislative rigidity was stressed. If the elastic seams now incorporated within the bill are stretched sufficiently, most of the objectives of the major staff associations can be attained.
>
> An established means of working together in harmony, understanding, mutual confidence, good faith. That was what Mr. Fleming regarded as the shape of things to come.
> Neither the inquiring Liberals on the committee nor the staff associations could—if principle works out in practice—want more.

On June 28, after the committee had concluded its sittings on the bill and after the statement of the Minister of Finance had been placed on the record, a press release was issued by Mr. Fred Whitehouse, president of the civil service federation of Canada. As all hon. members know, the civil service federation of Canada is by far the largest of the civil service staff associations and embraces some 80,000 civil servants. I quote from the press release of Mr. Whitehouse:

> —it is apparent that the government in providing for compulsory consultation has moved a long way towards giving public servants a voice in determining their rates of pay and conditions of employment. This is especially true in view of the statements made by the Minister of Finance in committee that it was expected that the provisions for consultation would evolve into a system modified to meet the needs of the Canadian civil service, similar to the Whitley councils of Great Britain. Mr. Fleming felt this could be done without the restriction of legislation.
> The minister went on to say that an important element in negotiation and consultation on these matters is to meet in a spirit of good faith and co-operation on the part of both sides. The civil service federation of Canada agrees with this statement and is prepared to meet with the civil service commission and officials of the government in a spirit of co-operation and good faith, always bearing in mind that co-operation is a two-way street and good faith on both sides must be the vehicle employed to reach our mutual destination.
> The civil service federation of Canada agrees to the foregoing with a view that experience will lead both sides to the evolution of a system of negotiation and arbitration in the shortest possible period of time.

I also had a letter from Miss Frances E. Goodspeed, president of the professional institute of the public service of Canada. This is another of the large civil service staff associations, embracing I believe some 5,000 civil servants. This letter, dated June 27, 1961 reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. MacLellan,
>
> On behalf of my colleagues in the professional institute and myself may I express our appreciation of the opportunity which was afforded us to appear before your parliamentary committee on Bill C-71 and the careful consideration of our views on the subject matter of this bill by the committee.
> Members of the professional institute who attended the sessions of your committee were greatly impressed with the very thorough and searching review which was given every section of the bill. We are confident that your efforts will result in a new Civil Service Act which will afford an opportunity to continue in the future the development in Canada of a public service which will give the utmost satisfaction to the public in the discharge of its duties, personal satisfaction to those who seek therein a challenging and useful career, and which will gain even greater regard abroad than it currently enjoys.

I believe that in yesterday's press there appeared an account of an interview with Miss Goodspeed wherein she stated that she was very satisfied with the progress that had been made toward the beginning of a system of arbitration for the civil service. I would point out that in the meetings of the special committee there was at no time any suggestion that arbitration should not be something which we could look forward to in the future. There was a difference of opinion as to method. There were some who thought that by legislation we could accomplish arbitration more quickly, but the majority of the committee was of the opinion and agreed with the Minister of Finance that arbitration could better be gained by evolution, as was done in the United Kingdom, without direct legislation. I believe the passages I have quoted indicate that the majority of civil servants take the same stand.

In addition to the matters which I have mentioned, an eighth advantage to the civil service provided by the bill is in the establishment of a grievance procedure. This is another measure which the civil service has been requesting for many years. We were very pleased in the committee to amend this bill to provide for the establishment of a grievance procedure. This is something which I believe will also assist in the development of better relationships between the government and the civil service.

All in all, Mr. Chairman, I feel this new bill which is before the committee should be passed as soon as possible, as was requested by Miss Goodspeed in her statement of yesterday. By virtue of the bill a new, golden age will be ushered in as regards the relationships between the people of Canada and their civil service. Most of the problems have been removed and I am sure that the days ahead will illustrate the value of this bill to the civil service and the work they do for our country.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like for a moment to pay tribute to the hon. member of the special committee who attended every meeting; who more than any other member of the committee carried the responsibility and the burdens of this bill; who more than anyone else understands the problems of the civil service and, I believe, who more than anyone else can be called the champion of the civil service in Canada. I refer to the distinguished hon. member for Carleton, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, with whom it was my pleasure to work very closely during the months we were considering this bill.

I am sure hon. members on all sides of the house will endorse what I say, that the hon. member for Carleton is one of the finest lawyers and parliamentarians we have in the house and certainly is the best friend in court that the civil service has ever had. If I may say one thing to the civil service of Canada, and in particular to the civil servants who live here in the Ottawa valley, it is that the best way to strengthen their own causes is to strengthen the hand of the hon. member for Carleton.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to try to compete with hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the members of the committee and the chairman, except that I must say all congratulations offered to the chairman were well deserved. The committee proceedings were conducted fairly and well. I must also say that all members of the committee, and not only the hon. member for Carleton, were great friends of the civil service and were trying to do their best to ensure that the civil service of Canada would have a good deal.

I should also add that those who appeared before us were most helpful. I refer to the members of the civil service commission, the representative of treasury board, the members of the staff associations and those who sent in letters on certain problems for our perusal, including the question of bilingualism. These representations were very helpful. The meetings were conducted in a spirit of fairness and I think this is one committee which could serve as an example to some others which have sat during this and other sessions of parliament.

However I do not altogether give the credit for this to those of us who sat on the committee. It so happens that we were a group of dedicated people who were considering a very delicate cause. This legislation which is designed to improve the civil service is most important because in our time more than ever before a good civil service is absolutely essential to good government. The need for a growing and better qualified civil service can be attributed primarily to the increased role of government. As a result we have to rely more and more on an increasing number of experts and highly qualified administrators. The civil service in Canada is composed at all levels of men and women who are well qualified to perform their important functions and who are devoted to the service of their country, people who are entirely loyal to the government of the day. Those who give loyalty and service have a right to expect confidence, support and encouragement, in addition to conditions which will make them more effective in their work.

This bill is the result in part of investigations which began in 1957 with the then chairman of the civil service commission, Mr. Heeney, and his associates who were asked to make a report on the Civil Service Act.

That report was very full and it was discussed in committee last year. In part this present bill implements some of the recommendations of the Heeney report. However, I do not want anyone to think that this bill implements the whole of that report. I should just like to put on record the case for a new concept in law which the chairman put in his report in 1958. He said:

> The legal framework within which a public service functions is of importance because of its direct bearing upon quality and administrative efficiency. Law alone cannot guarantee good administration but it can and does have a real effect on the quality of the personnel who are recruited and it can provide incentives to good performance. As conditions change, there develops from time to time a need to re-examine legislative arrangements so as to determine whether the law is well suited to current needs. Forty years ago, the need was for a civil service free from what Sir Robert Borden called "the malign influence of patronage". Forty years ago, and this is all too frequently forgotten, the need was also for a public service free from nepotism, the coddling of incompetent favourites, the granting of promotions for consideration and similar internal abuses. Not much is gained if the "malign influence" of political patronage is replaced by bureaucratic patronage, which may be less apparent but which can be no less insidious and demoralizing. If both are to be kept in check, there is need for independent authority and control such as the commission was designed to provide. The effectiveness of the present act in protecting the national service from these traditional abuses is a convincing argument for the preservation of the essential legal safeguards of the merit principle. At the same time, in the vastly different social and economic conditions within which public administration must be conducted today, it has become evident that a monolithic merit system is not in itself enough.

Those were the broad principles of the Heeney report. As I said before, the Heeney report is adopted in part in this bill, but only in part, as we shall have the opportunity to see when we examine the clauses one by one. In case hon. members may be under a misapprehension let me say that this bill is not what could be called a bold, new approach embodying new principles. In many ways the bill is a 1961 version of the 1918 act in the light of practices which have developed over the years. It does not attempt, for example, to provide new and broad principles governing personnel administration and employer-employee relations which the service needs and which the service requests. This is probably one of the points of real importance which came up for discussion in the committee when it dealt with staff association representations. While clause 7, which embodies the principle enunciated by the government in this regard is a great advance, we must express our stand at this time and say that the principle involved in this bill in this regard is not satisfactory to the opposition. The time has come to face the issue of bargaining between the government and its employees squarely and frankly. As I said on March 7, in our country all municipal employees, including policemen and firemen have obtained the right to collective bargaining. In the federal field the majority of the employees of crown companies already enjoy such a right. But ordinary civil servants have no right whatsoever in this respect. This has become a serious anomaly and an unfair discrimination. In Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand the right to collective bargaining has been granted in one form or another to civil servants. In the United Kingdom, the national Whitley council agreement on arbitration for the non-industrial civil servant has now been in force for more than 30 years.

Our stand on this principle is still the one that I expressed some months ago. We believe that the present Canadian system which provides only for consultations—and that, after all, is all that is included in the present bill—is completely inadequate to protect the fundamental right of the civil service to participation in collective negotiations. At the same time, our view is that the right to strike should not be granted to the civil service and that a strike should not be tolerated in the government service. We believe that civil servants should be granted the right to joint negotiations and arbitration provided the supremacy of parliament is safeguarded.

We do not intend at this stage to put forward a concrete and detailed proposal which would embody these rights, but I suggest—and this is in accord with proposals I made in the committee—that consideration of the question should be given in the present bill and that details should be worked out by negotiation and by arrangement between the staff associations and representatives of the government. Surely, if it has been possible to do so in other countries, and in one province within Canada, it is possible to do the same in the federal field. The act presently in force goes back to 1918, which is some 40 years ago. Surely, we shall not have to wait 40 years before our ideas become a little bit modern—we shall not have to wait that length of time to see whether the procedure enunciated in clause 7 of the present bill is satisfactory.

There are a few other points which come to notice, but I do not intend to deal with them at the present time. One is the increased power given to deputy heads of the departments under this bill. In this connection I should like to refer to the submission by the professional institute of the public service of Canada. In the last paragraph on page 1 it is stated that the point of concern is the trend toward delegation or transfer of authority from the civil service commission to deputy heads in matters concerning personnel selection, establishment, etc. The professional institute believes that certain rearrangements along the lines indicated will result in increased efficiency and therefore welcomes the proposal from this viewpoint. It has, however, become increasingly apparent to the institute over recent years that even the existing degree of local autonomy within and between departments has markedly affected conditions of employment. It is felt that any further decentralization of authority in the field of personnel management has to be accompanied by a system of monitoring and control much more effective than presently exists. Lacking such a system, the advantages of increased departmental initiative would be negated by damage to morale and even to the merit system itself.

Another aspect of this bill is the power which remains to dismiss any employee without cause. Of course, there may be some good reason for this revision but we were not told in the committee why such a power should remain in the bill. Of course, I shall have an opportunity to say something about that when we reach the relevant clause.

Another factor is that prevailing rate employees should somehow not be considered in this legislation. A way should have been found to treat them as other civil servants have been treated and bring them within the Civil Service Act. They should be given all the privileges enjoyed by other civil servants. This is an anomaly and a difficulty which we might as well face now.

There is another difficult problem which will arise during the discussion of the bill, namely the right of appeal. All of these things, Mr. Chairman, depend to a great extent on the regulations which will be made under the legislation. It is very difficult to discuss the effect of many clauses of this bill without knowing what the regulations are to be. When we were in committee I did raise the point that the regulations should have been brought before us for consideration. I was told that they had been drafted but the committee did not see them. Therefore, we cannot take any responsibility for any of the regulations which have been drafted already and which may form part of the legislation after it is passed.

I raise these few points at this time, Mr. Chairman, because we shall have ample opportunity to raise other matters of importance when we discuss the clauses. However, I welcome the improvements which have been made in the present act.

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

I have only this to say. Once again I repeat, the staff associations deserve our thanks for the manner in which they effectively presented their case. I must say that it would be much better if they united some day. If they could have one broad association representing all civil servants perhaps they could make their case much more effective.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, since this bill was introduced we have had many individuals posing as the special friends of the civil servant. I know there are many members in this house who have had special duties in connection with these problems and who have a great many civil servants within their riding. However, I do think it is time to put in a word of caution on behalf of the long suffering taxpayers in this country. It seems to me that when the change in government took place in 1957 one of the complaints of the people was not just that the cabinet had become too hard to get along with or that the Liberals had got too arrogant. The whole service had got a little too stuck in that way of doing business. In some respects it had taken on some of the characteristics of its bosses, and a complete change was needed. If I may say so, what has been said to me most often since I became a member of parliament is this. Those who have spoken to me have said that they did not see that change in attitude that they had hoped to see when we took over, or at least they did not see it change as much as they had hoped. I am speaking now just of people completely outside the civil service who have talked to me. The main complaints I have had about the failure to make a sweeping change in the civil service came to me from people within the civil service. There are in that organization, as there are in other organizations, the extremely intelligent, the extremely hard working and the ordinary. There are the loafers, as there are in other jobs.

The main source of their complaint seems to be that the method of doing business had become so stereotyped that the rule book and the way of doing things had become predominant. The attitude of "this is the way we do it; this is the way we have been doing it for years," had become so important that the ambitious, hard working civil servant found entirely too many stumbling blocks in his road to do the job as efficiently as he would wish. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention here today to complain about the civil service. I merely think it is necessary to point out that there is such a thing as giving the civil service too much protection from public opinion, by laying down the rules too hard and fast so that they become all-important, so that their main function seems to be how to preserve, protect and extend their method of doing things as they have done them over the years rather than concentrating on the fact that they are there for the service of the public, and giving them more leeway to find more ways, and more efficient ways to be of benefit to the public.

For instance, I noticed that with respect to a change in position the legislation reads, "The deputy head recommends to the commission". I am very much afraid that this sort of provision is going to perhaps aggravate the sort of trouble about which the conscientious civil servant has complained to me.

After a good many years in the service there is bound to be the feeling "We have done this for years and we have done it this way", and even to the most honest and conscientious department head the suggestion by some of his staff, new staff particularly, that a new and more efficient method of doing things can be found is likely to be met with a good deal of resentment. If the department head happens to be a very intelligent man and a big man he is going to take it in stride; he is going to look at the suggestion very carefully, give the man credit and make sure that even a refusal of the suggestion is not going to discourage that employee from looking for improved ways of achieving more efficiency. If, however, the department head concerned happens to be an individual who has moved up despite his lack of ability over a great many years and who has become more and more set in his ways, the mere possibility of making a suggestion of changing the old method is going to leave that employee in a very awkward position in the department for a long time.

I am suggesting that it is not enough that the job be done in a certain way. It may very well be that the old method of doing things is very efficient; it might even be the most efficient way; nevertheless, the business of government is not run just like an adding machine. The government is always dealing with the citizens of this country and their feelings must be respected. I venture to suggest that it is not the business of this or any other government, or of the civil service, to continue to try to ram down the throats of the ordinary citizens those procedures that the ordinary man in the street finds annoying day after day, even if those procedures may be most efficient. I suggest that we have had too many barriers between the civil servant and the person he is serving, namely the ordinary taxpayer of this country. It has been most unfortunate in many respects; it has hindered the work of the civil service to this extent, that the taxpayer has failed to understand the civil servants and the civil servants have failed to understand the taxpayer. This lack of understanding has often resulted in a lack of co-operation, which hinders efficiency and which leads to bad feelings all around.

I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that if we insulate the civil servant too much from the minister who is after all responsible for having his finger on the pulse of the people, we are making it more difficult for the civil servants to perform their duties in a way which will please the public. It is more difficult for them to realize when the public are pleased and when they are not. I suggest, therefore, that the theory of protection of the civil servant from the politician has gone a little too far. We have, I suppose, to protect the civil servant from some politicians under some circumstances but I am suggesting to the committee that the putting up of more barriers is adding to the concept of the civil servant as something distinct and separate from the people. It has made his job more awkward and those who have talked to me have not liked the idea that they have been criticized by so many people over the years when they have been trying so hard to do their jobs. There is, I suggest, a lack of understanding, and I wish that we would allow just a little political influence to enter the picture so that civil servants can get closer to the people in understanding.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this measure because I have noticed that bilingualism gets a better deal under this bill. Here is what I see in clause 47 of the bill:

> The number of employees appointed to serve in any department or in any local office of a department who are qualified in the knowledge and use of the English or French language or both shall, in the opinion of the commission, be sufficient to enable the department or local office to perform its functions adequately and to give effective service.

This clause represents a big improvement over the former act as far as bilingualism is concerned. I do want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for it.

We are all aware of a brief submitted by the conseil de la vie française, which dealt with the situation of French speaking Canadians in the federal civil service. Here, from 1950 to 1958, the departments where the proportion of French speaking Canadians has increased are the following:

Veterans affairs, 3.2 per cent; agriculture, 1.1 per cent, but with substantial decreases in some services. In the auditor general's office, the increase has been of 10 per cent, but the staff there is very limited, so that the increase is slight there also; R.C.M.P., 1.1 per cent; fisheries, 1.3 per cent; national revenue, 1.6 per cent; secretary of state, 9.3 per cent; labour department, 1 per cent; national film board, 9.1 per cent.

On the other hand, there has been a decrease in the proportion of French-speaking Canadians, in the same period from 1950 to 1958: external affairs, 0.4 per cent; citizenship and immigration, 2.5 per cent; trade and commerce, 2.6 per cent; civil service commission, 2.6 per cent; national research council, 0.9 per cent; national defence, 1.2 per cent; finance, 0.6 per cent; printing bureau, 20.3 per cent; justice, 5.8 per cent; mines and technical surveys, 0.7 per cent; Post Office Department, 11.8 per cent; resources and development, 2.6 per cent; health and welfare, 6 per cent; transport, 2.1 per cent; public works, 16.8 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken those figures from the brief submitted by the conseil de la vie française in which we find statistics for the period going from 1950 to 1958.

As I said a while ago, this bill is an improvement on the present act. It will encourage my people, the French Canadians, to apply for positions with the civil service in Ottawa. In my opinion, it is essential, in the interest of national unity, that nearly one third of the positions in the civil service—not only secondary positions, but key positions—be held by French-speaking or bilingual Canadians.

In a few years we will celebrate the centenary of confederation. It would most certainly be appropriate, in the interest of national unity, first that a greater number of my people apply for positions in the civil service—that is most important—and second, that a greater number of French Canadians be appointed to key positions in the federal service. It would certainly be possible to improve the situation so as to attract both English speaking and French speaking Canadians to the civil service and to make them better qualified to work for the Canadian government.

I wonder whether it would not be appropriate to consider the possibility of establishing a civil service school to train both French speaking and English speaking Canadians to work for the government. Such a school could be established by the civil service commission or by the Secretary of State department.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

Moreover, although education comes under provincial jurisdiction, it would be a good thing if Canadian universities, and especially those from the province of Quebec, had a department where French-speaking candidates would be trained for positions with the civil service in Ottawa. In fact, if Canadian universities had such a department, we would have better trained civil servants.

We would then have better qualified people, something which, apart from being in the interest of national unity—it is always desirable to have a logical proportion of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians—would enable the country to have more qualified men to serve the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few remarks I wanted to make.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question? He read a moment ago a table of the average French representation in the various departments, and I did not quite hear what was the average in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys? Would he kindly repeat the figure?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I shall gladly oblige the hon. member. There has been a drop in the proportion of bilingual Canadians in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, but that was from 1950 to 1958, or under the King-St. Laurent administration.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. member to repeat the exact figure which he quoted to the house a moment ago as to average French-Canadian representation?

Mr. Dupuis: It will not be good.

Mr. Pigeon: I think it is 1 per cent; I do not recall exactly.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pigeon: Just one moment, please. I should like to reply to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. He is referring to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys?

Mr. Deschatelets: Yes.

Mr. Dupuis: Do not answer.

Mr. Pigeon: In the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys it is .7 per cent.

Mr. Comtois: It was .07 per cent previously.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary secretary of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell).

Could he tell me whether Bill C-71 has been printed in both languages, and particularly in French?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I shall send a copy over immediately to the hon. member.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) for sending me a French copy of Bill C-71. I directed my question to the parliamentary secretary of the Minister of Finance because there was no French version of the bill on the table.

Mr. Pigeon: Does the hon. member wish to have another copy?

Mr. Boulanger: Moreover, Mr. Chairman, there were no copies available at the distribution office. That is why I asked whether French copies of this bill were available.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I can only say that there must have been such great popularity for the bill that the stock has run out. It certainly was reprinted in both languages in the usual number.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I thank the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance for giving me such a satisfactory answer.

I now wish to add a few words, following the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to the effect that the situation has improved as far as French-Canadian representation in the civil service is concerned—

Mr. Pigeon: That is not what I said.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, for the past several years the Conservatives have been going about the province of Quebec speaking in favour of employment for French Canadians in the civil service.

I appreciate that there has been some improvement in that field under the Liberal government, and much more had been promised, since 1958, under a Conservative administration. However, we see today that the number of French Canadians in the civil service has decreased. Yet, we had some French-Canadian ministers who used to say, in the province of Quebec, that they were going to improve conditions in that respect.

Mr. Pigeon: They have improved.

Mr. Boulanger: Conditions have not improved.

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, they have.

Mr. Boulanger: And among the many documents we receive from the government, some are not even printed in French, for instance the report of the Canadian wheat board—

Mr. Ricard: That report was not published in French either when you were in power.

Mr. Boulanger: I never said that it was published in French under a Liberal administration. I said it was still not published in French today in spite of all the promises made in the province of Quebec in 1957 and 1958 by the Conservative ministers and private members.

Mr. Dupuis: Daniel Johnson's promises.

Mr. Boulanger: No French report was put out by the Canadian wheat board. Moreover, there are a number of other reports which are not printed in French, and when they are, it is two, three and even six months after the English edition has come out.

Mr. Pigeon: That is untrue.

An hon. Member: Do not blame others for what you failed to do yourselves.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I ask the government members who speak so eloquently on the French fact to say less and to act without delay.

An hon. Member: That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), I should like first to point out to him that he has given no figures to substantiate his claims and especially his statement that the number of French-Canadian civil servants has gone down. I notice that he has been most careful not to say in what proportion the number of French-Canadian civil servants has decreased.

Moreover, he said that the report of the Canadian wheat board was not published in French. May I say that that report has never been published in French but that it will probably be next year.

Mr. Dupuis: You will no longer be here next year.

Mr. Ricard: Besides, I should like to point out to the hon. member that for the first time, this year, the annual report of the Department of Defence Production was published in both French and English and that for the first time since confederation, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has issued an atlas in both languages.

Mr. Chairman, the Liberal members are disconcerted by those facts which bear evidence to the efforts we, of the Conservative party, have made to give an essentially bilingual character to our country.

Everybody acknowledges what we have done except the hon. members opposite who are lost in the clouds and who do not know what is happening in this house.

An hon. Member: Twenty two years of incompetence.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, as a—

Mr. Dupuis: Another expert.

Mr. Martel: As a member of the special committee whose task it was to study the Civil Service Act, I think it is my duty to point out that the bill we have before us constitutes an improvement over the present Civil Service Act which, as everyone knows and as several members have said previously, had not been revised since 1918.

Mr. Chairman, I heard a moment ago some members of the opposition make statements on the civil service and on the fact that the bilingual civil servants are less numerous now than before. These members seem to forget that during the 22 years they were in power they did not improve that situation, far from it, as I will show in a few moments. On the other hand, the bill before us is calculated to correct this anomaly, thanks to a quite special clause which my colleague the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has quoted and which I will discuss briefly in a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, we all agree that the part civil servants play in the administration of this country is becoming increasingly important, and that they are the ones who, in any well organized government, are responsible for research and study on which is based the government's policy and its preparation at the first stage, as well as the administration of the legislation passed by parliament. In fact, it is on them that we rely for these collective services which are, so to speak, the reason for the existence of the state.

They are also charged with the administration of controls, the collection of taxes, the spending of public funds; in short, they have an executive role given to them by the government in power.

[Mr. Ricard.]

The civil servants have always played a most important part not only in the administration of the country but also in the administration of each province and municipality.

As, nowadays, the responsibilities of the government are continuously increasing in the economical and social life of a country, and becoming more and more complex, the responsibilities of the civil servants are bound to take an increasing importance, and more and more civil servants are required all the time.

I do not have before me the last statistics concerning the total number of civil servants but, if my memory serves me right, I believe that there are more than 200,000 federal civil servants, irrespective of the staff of the crown corporations or of other departmental agencies which employ nearly 150,000 people.

It goes without saying that I am not including the members of the armed forces in these statistics.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the citizens, and especially businessmen and professionals, must constantly keep in touch with the government administration.

Therefore, they take an immediate interest in the competence, efficiency, sympathy and understanding of civil servants. That is to say that the efficiency of the country's administration and the good relations between citizens and the government are at stake. This principle of efficiency in administrative services is based on the relations between the state and its servants.

In the course of its various meetings, the committee received many representations from different staff organizations. Their representatives had the opportunity of expressing their views and they were questioned by members of that committee.

I too should like to offer congratulations to the committee chairman who so ably conducted the proceedings and join with previous speakers who mentioned the matter.

I do not intend to point out all the evidence submitted before that committee, because hon. members will be able to read the various reports that have been published, but I should like to stress a few points and especially the one which was raised a while ago by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) and which deals particularly with the power given to deputy ministers under the present bill. I share his opinion. Indeed, I think the various organizations have made recommendations along those lines, namely that the bill grants exceptional powers to the deputy ministers. I am not saying that the latter will abuse those powers or that some deputy ministers have done so in the past; I have not been in the house long enough to make such a statement. However, it could give rise to certain difficulties between civil servants, that is between higher officials and their subordinates.

I wish to refer to a recommendation which was made by the conseil de la vie française d'Amérique which testified before the committee last May 5. That organization precisely stressed the point that it would perhaps be dangerous to give too much power to deputy ministers.

It is obvious that the commission always has more or less a veto on these various authorities, but I still want to point out that fact, because I think some wrongs might have been done in the past. In fact, I have in mind a case about which information was given to me by a civil servant. As in the case pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, those complaints did not come from the general public but rather from individuals who had been employed in the civil service. My information came from a person who was a federal civil servant during a period of ten years. I will not identify them, but that person was employed five years in one department and five years in another one.

Mr. Dupuis: Name that person.

Mr. Martel: I would not want to give the name, because that person is no longer with the government service. Still, it shows clearly that anomalies did exist at that time—

Mr. Dupuis: Another unproved statement.

Mr. Martel: —when our friends were in power—

Mr. Dupuis: Give us the name.

Mr. Martel: There is no need to give names in every instance and to lay charges as it is done now at the provincial level. I only want to point out anomalies to prove beyond doubt that there were injustices in particular under the former government and to show that now attempts are made to put the blame for all that on the Conservatives, who have been at the head of this country for only a few years.

Mr. Dupuis: Give us the name of that person.

Mr. Martel: And more particularly, in relation to the attitude of our opponents toward French Canadians or the bilingual employees. At that time, a suggestion was made to have French accepted as a communication language between offices located in the province of Quebec and those in Ottawa, or located in an area with sufficient French to warrant a bilingual staff. At that time this suggestion was not considered. On this point, I am happy to find that section 47 of the new act referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will do away with that anomaly. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I am going to read this section into Hansard so that the opposition will be able to meditate on it, because I believe it will improve the situation which has prevailed until now:

> The number of employees appointed to serve in any department or in any local office of a department who are qualified in the knowledge and use of the English or French langauge or both shall, in the opinion of the Commission, be sufficient to enable the department or local office to perform its functions adequately and to give effective service to the public.

I hope this clause will open a larger number of jobs to bilingual people. It has even been suggested during our discussion by a C.C.F. member that a course be given to present employees to enable them to acquire a better knowledge of both French and English. That was no doubt a good suggestion, but it is beside the point. The only thing that could be done to improve the situation would be to give French Canadians a better treatment, to give them their due share in the federal civil service.

Before I conclude my remarks allow me to quote from a book on Canadian dualism written by Mr. Mason Wade. This book was edited jointly in both languages by the University of Toronto and Laval University.

It deals with different viewpoints adopted on this matter by Canadians from various groups.

I only want to read an excerpt from page 270 of Mr. Wade's book. Here is a quotation from the article by Mr. Norman Ward in his book:

(Text):

> Status in the national government is what the French Canadian really seeks, not only for his language in parliament, public affairs, and national broadcasting, but also for himself as a citizen. Apart from parliament and the parties, this means that he has a special claim on the civil service of which the following, although the figures are now out of date, is a typical expression.

(Translation):

And Mr. Ward continues as follows:

(Text):

> "—in 1918, before the creation of the civil service commission under the federal administration, the proportion of French Canadian civil servants amounted to 21.58 per cent while in 1946 the proportion was down to 12.5 per cent—"

(Translation):

Naturally, these figures have now been compiled up to 1958. They were mentioned a while ago, and I am referring here to Mr. Ward, who goes on as follows:

(Text):

> "—What is worse, with respect to salaries of $6,000 or more a year, the proportion of French Canadians fell from 25 per cent in 1918 to 9.52 per cent in 1946."

(Translation):

From 1946 to 1957, the last year of the previous administration, the situation was far from improved. Thus I should like to quote further comments by Mr. Ward. The statistics he gave were taken from a speech delivered in the house by Mr. Frederick Dorion who was then, I think, member for Charlevoix, on June 16, 1946 as found at page 1620 of Hansard for that year. Among other things Mr. Ward said:

(Text):

The interesting variant on the spoils system in modern administration that is implied in the quotation is no doubt an inevitable product of a bilingual situation such as ours. It is no accident that the French Canadian complainant correlated the decline of the French with the reform of the civil service beginning in 1918, for the expansion of the dominion government in the last few decades was at first characterized, as was the entire civil service after confederation, by exclusively English Canadian thinking. Applicants for civil service posts have for years been able to elect to write examinations in French or English anywhere in Canada, and French Canadians have always held a share of posts, usually among the minor ranks and especially in departments staffed by the patronage method.

(Translation):

This is what Mr. Ward, the author, said.

(Text):

But as the technical requirements of the service have grown, and as English Canadians staff most of the higher ranks, the senior departmental officers have not unnaturally sought more English Canadians to work with, and until after the second world war the proportion of French Canadians in the total service was dropping steadily. As recently as the war a French Canadian cabinet minister could find himself marooned at the head of a predominantly English Canadian organization in which English was the only departmental language and only English Canadian ideas influenced the formation of policy and the organization of the department itself.

(Translation):

That is the end of my quotation, and I simply wish to draw the members' attention to the fact that this situation which prevailed in particular under the previous government was not improved at the time, as indicated by the author.

There is also the impression, which has spread among our population, that French speaking Canadians are not fit to fill positions in the federal civil service, or that they simply do not bother trying to get one. That will be said often, for instance, in the case of appointments made by the civil service commission to senior positions, following promotion competitions. In my opinion, that is not borne out by facts.

I have here an article in which it is said that very few French Canadian university graduates try to enter the government service. As pointed out in Mr. Ward's article, that is probably due to the fact that, when competitions are held for various positions, standards are used that fit the Anglo-Saxon mentality and which necessarily prevent those French Canadians who might wish to become federal civil servants to put forward their qualifications.

That anomaly has been stressed, in committee, by various bodies, namely the civil service association of Canada. A moment ago, a previous speaker—I think it was the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard)—did refer to that. May I refer to page 7 of the submission of the civil service association of Canada, which reads as follows:

(Text):

We feel strongly that there should now be as much concern over patronage from within the ranks of the service as there was over political influence in 1918.

(Translation):

That fact was also stressed by Mr. Hughes, the new chairman of the civil service commission.

I refer here to an article which appeared on April 29, 1961 in the Ottawa Citizen, in which it is stated that there is still favouritism in the civil service. Perhaps that is just the reason. Perhaps that is the trouble, perhaps that is why the French Canadians do not have their fair share of jobs within the federal civil service.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that confederation in my view, and this has often been said, is a pact between the two great races which founded this country. Many people, in fact, still consider the French Canadians not as equals but perhaps as inferiors or as the losers of a battle, and that is most unfortunate. But as long as this attitude will persist, we cannot consider ourselves as a great, united and independent nation where harmony prevails regardless of the religious or political opinions, or racial origins of its people, a nation where life is good, where western democratic freedom is intensely enjoyed every second, every minute, every hour, every day throughout the year, and for many years to come.

We were quoted as an example in the recent discussions between the French government and the Algerian rebels. I do hope those two countries will follow our example and will reach agreement.

People seem to forget, Mr. Chairman, that Canadians of French descent gave their lives for Canada's independence, more than a century and a half ago, when two attempts to take over our country were made, by our neighbours to the south.

Other French Canadians died on the field of honour to defend the freedom and interests of our common homeland, Canada, from the south African to the Korean war, making in the meantime an active and efficient contribution to the last two world wide conflicts.

I dare say that all those sacrifices have not been in vain and that the convention on which this confederation is laid is a pact under which certain rights are recognized to English and French Canadians alike, not only because the latter are to be tolerated, but because we have a full right to be here, and because we consider ourselves as equal partners.

On the other hand, if some persist in maintaining a hostile attitude towards French Canadians, always accusing them of being a vociferous, inferior and discontented lot while closing the door to higher posts before them by all sorts of intrigues which are humiliating for them, limiting their part to that of translator, it may be very unfortunate, but the confederation might get into difficulties, as recent happenings among certain groups in the province of Quebec would indicate. However, I sincerely hope that such turn will never take place, and I think that the new Civil Service Act will, on the contrary, help to improve conditions.

I shall probably have other remarks to make in committee on various clauses proposed in this bill.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, as I used to be a civil servant myself I have a special interest in this bill and I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few observations on this clause. The civil service is a most essential part of the machinery of government. Governments may come and go, but the civil service ensures continuity in the administration of the affairs of our country.

The importance of this was impressed upon me most forcibly not long ago when I had an opportunity to visit France, for which opportunity I am greatly indebted to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I was surprised, almost amazed at the extent of prosperity I found prevailing in France, and in particular at the outlook and attitude of the people. It is the attitude of a young country and one might say that the country has become rejuvenated. I made inquiries about this from responsible officials, having in mind the numerous changes of government which have taken place in France right up to recent years. I asked how this could possibly have been achieved. I was assured that in large measure it was due to the excellence of the civil service of France which, although governments had changed frequently, had provided the continuity essential for maintainnig development.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman what was the year of his visit? What year is he talking about?

Mr. Carter: I am talking about two weeks ago. I think about two years ago the estimates committee, of which I was a member, held some hearings into the civil service commission and a number of problems were brought to light. I presume this new act which is before us has taken care of most of those problems. At that time we found there were numerous categories of civil servants. There were permanent civil servants, temporary civil servants, casual civil servants and prevailing rates employees. There were also semi-civil servants, such as employees of the crown corporations, who were employees of the crown and were amenable to civil service regulations but nevertheless did not enjoy civil service status. One of the things that impressed me most was the fact that a civil servant could be temporary for as long as ten or 15 years. I was surprised to learn how many civil servants had been in that category for a very long time. I think one of the recommendations of the committee was that the number of temporary civil servants should be reduced. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill since it was presented to the house a few minutes ago, but I do hope something has been done to meet that situation.

The civil service commission was set up as one of the safeguards of our freedom by ensuring integrity in the civil service and by eliminating undue political influence in connection with civil service appointments. The opportunities for patronage in the public service of Canada are now relegated to rather minor positions such as revenue postmaster, river guardian and a few minor, temporary jobs of that kind. I suppose that no matter how we set up our ideals we can never achieve them fully, but I was impressed by what was said by the hon. gentleman on my left who preceded me in this debate about patronage from inside the civil service. I do not see how that could be taken care of by any type of legislation. I do, however, feel that we have not used the best methods of recruiting people for the civil service of Canada. Indeed, I have felt that some of the methods we employ perhaps defeat their own purpose.

Most hon. members receive copies of notices of civil service competitions requesting applications for certain vacant posts. On looking them over, one finds that the salaries offered are very often not in line with the qualifications and experience required or set forth in the notice. I have come across a number of cases where this has worked against the best interests of the public service of Canada. A very honest person will look at the requirements and say: well, I do not have those qualifications and therefore it is useless for me to apply for the position; and he does not apply. However, another person, perhaps not so modest, will decide to apply and it very often happens that the choice is finally made from a group of people who are not of as high a calibre as those who neglected to apply in the first place because they were discouraged by the high standard set out in the competition notice.

Then there is the matter of boards of selection. Unless the application form has been changed recently there is a space on it somewhere in which the candidate is expected to list all his previous jobs—the name of the employer, the length of employment and so forth. It seems to me that very often the more lines of employers a man can fill in on that form the better his chances are, because that is taken as being experience. Here again, I think the form is defeating its own purpose, because it is not how much experience a person has had that is important. The important thing is the kind of experience a person has had together with its quality. Very often this is not apparent from the application form.

Again, most competitions for jobs which carry an average salary require an applicant to come before the board of selection. I may say that I know something about this work because I used to serve on such a board before I became a member of parliament. I was a representative of the Canadian Legion on selection boards to make sure that veterans got a fair deal and that veterans' preference was preserved. I noticed two things during that short experience. One was that the questions asked by the person conducting the proceedings and by the government representative very often had no relation whatsoever to the job which was being offered. Often no real attempt was made to bring out information which was not apparent from reading the application form. Often this resulted in the applicant being placed at a disadvantage because, naturally, he had been expecting to be asked questions about his knowledge of the job he was supposed to follow. It can be very disconcerting when a person is asked a lot of other questions which, to him, are not related at all to the job for which he is applying.

The other thing I noticed was that an opportunity obviously existed for whoever was representing the department concerned, to frame his questions so as to favour one candidate more than another. I think this is done more frequently than should be the case. In the final analysis this boils down to the integrity of the people serving on the board. If a person has made up his mind in advance, after reading application forms, that he wishes a certain person for a particular job it is not difficult for him to favour one applicant, or to frame questions to which one applicant can reply, and then to eliminate another applicant by asking questions which have no relevance or which that other person is not likely to be able to answer.

About a month ago a case arose in my own province where a number of applicants were before the selection board. They were kept waiting for a while and the very suspense of waiting for half an hour or an hour to be questioned is likely to be nerve wracking. It happened that one of the applicants at that time was under great stress because of some situation at home; his wife was ill, and there were other problems. When he went before the board he had a complete mental blackout. As a former teacher I can understand how that can happen because I have encountered the same thing when school children, who know what the answers are to certain questions, find their minds a total blank when they are called upon to give those answers on the spur of the moment. That is what happened to this person. He was a candidate for a job which he was qualified to do. As a matter of fact he had been doing it for a number of years to the satisfaction of his superiors. Yet, when he went before this board, because of the situation I have just outlined, he had this mental blackout and failed the competition.

I mention these things because I think great care should be taken by everyone who has the responsibility of sitting on these boards of selection. Then, again, since coming to parliament 12 years ago, I have encountered numerous cases of people in the civil service who have come to me and told me about their grievances. There may be some clash of personality, or the superior may like somebody else better. This person has been brought up and advanced ahead of the person who has been on the job for a longer period and, according to the evaluation certificates, has done very good work. That, of course, is very upsetting to morale. I have known several people who have been on the verge of breakdown because they have been up against this sort of treatment. It is intangible. They do not know how to fight it. They feel they cannot fight it successfully anyway and so they exhaust themselves emotionally and nervously and come to the verge of a breakdown.

The other point that I should like to make has to do with remuneration. If we are to have the kind of civil service that we want for Canada we shall have to pay our top civil servants and all civil servants on the same basis as private enterprise pays its employees. There used to be a time when civil service salaries were much lower than those which prevailed in industry, and this was justified by what was supposed to be job security. I do not think that the job security argument was ever a good one because I think the person who is so much concerned about security that he would take a lower paying job is not the right type of person anyway.

As far as pensions are concerned, nearly all the big companies have their own pension plans and we are looking forward to the day when those pension plans will become portable. Therefore so far as pensions and security at retirement are concerned, the security argument had no foundation at all. However, as an employer I feel that the government of Canada should follow the principle of equal pay for equal work. This is not being done. It is causing a great deal of injustice. To prove my case I will cite what is happening on the Department of Transport vessels. The Department of Transport operates a number of icebreakers and lighthouse tenders and boats of various sorts. The captains and officers of those boats all have the same responsibilities and in many instances the boats are of practically the same size and are doing the same work; they are even doing it in the same waters; and yet because the crew of one ship is recruited in one province and the crew of another ship is recruited in another province there is a discrepancy in the salary paid to the officers and men on the different ships. I submit this is something that should not be tolerated; it is something that cannot be justified. The captains and crews are all carrying exactly the same responsibilities; they are doing exactly the same work; they are on ships of comparable size and they are not even confined to one particular water. They move back and forth in different waters. Newfoundland icebreakers very often are employed in the gulf of St. Lawrence and vice versa. It seems to me there is no justification whatever for having one scale of salaries on one ship and a different scale on another. What I have said about the Department of Transport applies equally to boats operated by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

There is also the question of pensions. We are still faced with the problem of many civil servants who retired long years ago when the dollar was worth much more than it is now and who did not receive a very big pension. I think we have some obligation here. I do not know whether it is taken care of under this legislation or under some special legislation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My hon. friend realizes that it is not a matter for the Civil Service Act but for the Public Service Superannuation Act, an entirely different measure.

Mr. Carter: It may be under a different act but it is part of our responsibility toward the civil service of Canada and I do hope that something will be done about it.

There is one final point I should like to make before I sit down. I refer to morale in the civil service. I think we cannot place too much emphasis on the necessity for maintaining the highest possible morale in the public service of Canada. We have seen what has happened in many countries where subversion has entered in and people in sensitive posts have betrayed their countries and passed over vital information to the countries which are seeking to bring about our downfall. We may try to isolate what we call sensitive posts but that sort of thing is not confined to people in sensitive posts; it is a part of the general morale of the whole service. I think it is something that requires special consideration; it is something for which we are all responsible and it will in great part result from the type of people we select to administer this legislation and the way it is carried out.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have only one general theme to deal with at this time and it is somewhat the same as I have dealt with in speeches during other sessions and by way of introduction of bills during other sessions. I refer to the question of bargaining rights. I made two or three different proposals which have met with some objection in the past. One was that the current Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act should apply to employees in the public service negotiating with their employer, with certain exceptions, such as the right to strike, and that arbitration proceedings be employed instead of conciliation proceedings as they are known under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. A variation of that this year was also proposed by myself by way of another public bill which in essence said that parliament would be the final arbiter of those matters and would in fact receive the report of the conciliation board under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and would make the final decision on any points which were contained in the report.

Other suggestions have been made and I would think the employees themselves who are concerned with this question of their right to negotiate particularly with their employer are not wedded to one particular system of bargaining as opposed to another. In essence I think what they want to have is the right of determination of their own destiny to the extent that that is possible by way of developing a collective agreement. They want the right to know who their employer is in the sense of whom they are bargaining with, and there is some doubt about that at the moment. Whom should they approach with respect to, first, the development of collective agreements or systems that exist governing wages, hours and working conditions and the like and, second, the processing of grievances?

I am quite sure that even the top officials in the various employee associations are not sure from time to time in their dealings on these matters whether they are dealing with the civil service commission, with the government or whether it is treasury board with whom they are dealing so far as having the final say is concerned or whether it is the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance with whom they should be dealing. Many of them are not sure from one day to the next, depending on the problem, who it is that has the final say with respect to the points that they want to discuss. There appears in that sense, as I said, to be no employer but some murky group of people who at different times have certain things to say about different matters.

As I have said earlier and also on other occasions, in industry employees are governed by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and an employee in industry knows who his employer is. When his organization or association or union sits down on his behalf either to bargain for a collective agreement or to process a grievance it is known who has the final determination. It may be true that in the preliminary stages or in all stages a union or association in private industry will deal with a lawyer representing a particular company or with some employers' association representing a number of employers or possibly with industrial relations consultants. Apart from that, however, there is one person who is the employer. Behind the lawyers and employer associations there is a corporate structure. There is a general manager or a president and board of directors. There is somebody tangible with whom the employees can deal even though in an indirect way, and there is some difference between that system and that which exists within the public service so far as the relationships of the employees with their employer are concerned.

In private industry employees have the right to determine their own course collectively, to have some part collectively in the decision as to what will be their wages, hours of work and working conditions and how various grievances will be processed and dealt with conclusively. Whether or not the decisions are in favour of the employer or employee is immaterial to the point that there is some place where these differences of opinion can be determined.

This is not so in the public service of Canada or in the public service of a number of provinces. So far as the question of dealing with their employer is concerned, civil servants so-called—I do not care for that name but it is the one which is used regularly—employees in the public service of Canada are in fact, as I have said on many occasions, treated as second-class citizens. They are in a different class from other employees. They are in a different class even from employees of crown corporations who have the right of determination and the right of collective bargaining.

In addition to the suggestions I have mentioned, there have been other suggestions made so far as collective bargaining is concerned and some of these should be accepted by the government. I cast no reflections upon the committee that dealt with this matter but I think it is extremely unfortunate that the bill was introduced in the form it was in the first place, that it was reported back to committee of the whole from the standing committee in the form that it was and that there is no adequate or sensible provision for collective bargaining contained in the bill now before us. So long as there is no satisfactory system of collective bargaining there will continue to be difficulties. Employees of the public service are going to continue to have their wages depend upon the whims of a minister of finance and the manner in which he might be able to juggle the books. They are going to have to depend to a certain degree on governmental decisions, some of which may be made on a political basis depending on the relative nearness of an election. They are going to have no formal, sensible approach so far as their dealings wth their employer are concerned, and this is going to continue to cause difficulties.

We passed a bill of rights last year which said in effect or was supposed to say that we believe in equality before the law, but the government does not believe in it when it comes to the public servants of Canada. I am paraphrasing the belief of the government in this regard because I do not think that anyone will say that the bill of rights has any effect or that it covers the activities of the government in its dealings with the public servants of this country. Yet this is the base from which we should start. These individuals should have the basic right that other people have to bargain collectively, to know who their employer is and to be able to deal with him in such a way as to bring about a conclusive result with respect to their grievances, requests and demands from time to time.

Inasmuch as we have a civil service commission that over many years has gathered a great deal of information, statistics and records about relationships of wages and so on in the civil service, it has been suggested that the commission should remain as it is with some alterations, that it should be the agency to which the various employee associations should present their proposals for a collective agreement or for changes and that the civil service commission would in effect be something akin to a conciliation board so far as private industry is concerned. It has been suggested that after the civil service commission had heard arguments from the employee associations and certainly after hearing the arguments from the point of view of the government representing the crown, which in essence I suppose is the employer, it would be in a position similar to that of a conciliation board and would make a public report and recommendations governing the provisions of a collective agreement. The public would have knowledge of this report in the same way as the public now has knowledge of conciliation board reports which are released by the Minister of Labour.

It is further suggested that if the terms of the recommendations were not acceptable to the government or to treasury board, whoever it is that happens to make the final determination, the civil service commission should then step out of the way. Suppose it is thought desirable to establish a negotiating committee of cabinet. This negotiating committee would then be able to meet with the representatives of the employee associations to bargain collectively upon the points at issue.

A few years ago we had some experience along this line in British Columbia when the provincial government said it was going to solve everything for the civil servants of that province by establishing a cabinet committee to meet with civil servants for purposes of negotiation. Everyone thought this was going to be a fine idea, but in one instance it took the British Columbia government employee association over 18 months to even get a meeting with the cabinet committee to talk about one grievance relating to a stationary engineer employed at the old folks' home. When I suggest a cabinet committee as the negotiating arm of the government, I am not suggesting that it follow the course established by Premier Bennett in British Columbia when his negotiating committee of cabinet took 18 months to even sit down with the representatives of the employees.

I think that the negotiating team of the cabinet or committee of the treasury board, whatever seems to be the desire of the government should be governed by some statutory requirement in connection with its meetings with civil servants, just as employers in private industry and unions must meet within a certain period of time if either side opens negotiations toward a collective agreement. I feel that there should be some time limit. In addition to that, I feel that if no agreement is reached at that stage there should be some form of arbitration to finally determine what the provisions of the collective agreement are going to be.

As I have said, a number of proposals have been made in this regard. These proposals have obviously been rejected by the government in office because it would obviously want to maintain the amount of control which now exists and retain the right to prevent public servants in Canada from having what should be their right, that is the right to be heard and the right to freedom of determination of their own affairs. It is obvious from the various refusals and arguments that have been made from the government side, that the government is not interested in extending, in a decent fashion, the right of collective bargaining to the public service of Canada. It is obvious that this government is not interested in even remembering the bill of rights, let alone extending it or making it apply to people to whom it should apply. It is quite obvious from all the comments that have been made that this government wants the Minister of Finance to be able, as he did about a year ago, to hand pick groups of people within the public service and say, you will get so much an hour more and you will get so much an hour more. This government wants to venerate the Minister of Finance and exalt him to a position of being next to, if not in place of, God himself.

This is not good enough. The other day the hon. member for Greenwood upheld the Minister of Finance as being a truthful and honest person. No one disagreed with what he said at that time. Perhaps subsequent events made some alteration in his opinion, I do not know. The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Finance should not have—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a totally unworthy insinuation.

Mr. Howard: What is an unworthy insinuation?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What the hon. gentleman has just uttered.

Mr. Howard: What have I insinuated?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member has insinuated that subsequent events have, in some way, cast some doubt upon the veracity of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Howard: I did no such thing.

Mr. Macdonnell: Of course you did.

Mr. Howard: Here we have three or four people now taking part in this. This is typical of this government. They jump to conclusions and are thin skinned. All I am asking you to do is listen.

Mrs. Fairclough: All you want us to do is listen while you talk.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. lady wants to get into a debate with me about a variety of things happening in her own department, I would be quite happy to oblige her. However, this is not the place to do it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I will answer any questions you wish to ask any time.

Mr. Howard: A question was asked of the hon. lady more than a year and a half ago and she promised the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that she would provide certain information for him and she has not done it yet.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is a lie.

Mr. Howard: She says, that is a lie. I would not even give you the pleasure, madam, of asking you to withdraw, because I know you would think about it anyway. All I said was that the other day the hon. member for Greenwood objected to me making reference to untruths and the like about the Minister of Finance, which I withdrew. I said that perhaps subsequent events would lead the member for Greenwood to change his mind, not that the Minister of Finance was telling falsehoods or anything of that nature. What the hon. member for Greenwood does is his own business. The point at issue is this. The touchiness of hon. gentlemen opposite indicates very clearly that they do not want the public servants of Canada to be on the same plane and have the same rights, freedoms and responsibilities as everyone else has. They want to continue to treat the public servants as second-class citizens, to be able to juggle their wages, hours and working conditions as it is politically expedient so to do and keep them in a condition of subjugation. They want to continue to force them to be the cap-in-hand people who come to the cabinet or perhaps the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, with all her graciousness, and ask, please, madam, would it be possible to have a change in our working conditions?

I do not think that is good enough for the people in the public service of this country. As I said earlier, it is extremely regrettable that the government did not have the courage to bring in this sort of bill in the first place so that these people who have been treated as second-class citizens for many years by previous governments, could at long last be brought out of that condition and brought to realize that perhaps the bill of rights does mean something to them. The civil servants might be brought to realize that the bill of rights is not a fanciful group of words about which the Prime Minister likes to become emotional from time to time.

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Chairman, on July 7, 1961, at page 7686 of Hansard, the Prime Minister gave a definition of the bill of rights as it applies to the civil service. This is one reason why I, as a member of the committee, am still worried about the lack of the right of arbitration in the bill that is now presented to the committee. I am not going to read what the Prime Minister said about the obligations or responsibilities of civil servants. However, I am going to read an outline of the effect that apparently the bill of rights will have on civil servants. He said:

> Then, as far as civil servants are concerned, these words might be used, I think, to define their responsibility; one way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard.

Actually, that is the one thing that is missing from the bill that is presented to us now.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Do I understand that when he used that phrase which he just used about civil servants being seen and not heard, he attributed that phrase to the Prime Minister; is that correct?

Mr. Tardif: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does he not know—he must know—that the Prime Minister quoted that as a phrase used by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. How can the member be so utterly unfair as to try to leave the impression again that those were the Prime Ministers' own words?

Mr. Tardif: Actually, from what I read at page 7686, there is no indication that the Prime Minister was quoting anyone else. I shall read it for you, if you will listen.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not know that those words were used by the Prime Minister as a quotation from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate? Does he know that? That is the question.

Mr. Martineau: May I speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman? I think the hon. member has been most unfair. He knows very well that those are not the original words of the Prime Minister, they are a quotation. It is in plain letters here when the Prime Minister continued, as found at page 7686 of Hansard and said:

> Hon. members may wonder what I was quoting from. Well, I was quoting the immortal words of the member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoken on October 24, 1953, at Carleton College,—

Surely the hon. member knows that he is creating a false impression by attributing to the Prime Minister the authorship of words which immortally belong to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Argue: That is just the way the Prime Minister acts.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue I would point out that the words were taken by the Prime Minister as his own and used in debate. Then later he referred to the source of the words. I wish to put on record the whole of the quotation, not just the part read by the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue.

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: The point is this. The Prime Minister was referring to the Bank of Canada and he went on to say this:

> Then, as far as civil servants are concerned, these words might be used, I think, to define their responsibility: one way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard.
>
> Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Prime Minister then continued and the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue quoted him from there on. I should repeat that quotation so that it will be complete:

> Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members may wonder what I was quoting from. Well, I was quoting the immortal words—

The word appearing here is "immoral" but it was corrected later by the Prime Minister.

> —of the member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoken on October 24, 1953, at Carleton College, in which the following personal remarks were interspersed:

Then appears the quotation:

> "I know that there are those who would disagree violently with this view—some people already have—"

And he quotes who disagreed.

> "—but I am vain enough to believe that I was a good public servant."

From the whole quotation it will be seen that the Prime Minister had adopted the words and used them as his own. He then went on to say from where he had obtained them and to attack the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. That was the whole burden of his argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was absent, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Russell had his say in this connection, but I am glad to have been present during the concluding remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West. May I say immediately that I was quoting the words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I placed those words before the house as an example to which reference was made during the course of that memorable address by him to Carleton university back in 1953. The remarks can be found in the Ottawa Citizen of that day. I was not in any way appropriating them. I was simply pointing out that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had used these expressions and that it was of great interest that the mover of the vote of thanks on that occasion was Mr. Coyne, governor of the Bank of Canada. I am extremely glad of the opportunity of saying that the words are those of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. They are not accepted in any way by us but are quoted simply as indicating the attitude of one who at that time had occupied a prominent position in the civil service and was speaking apparently with the authority that position would merit.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, no; nothing was said about his speaking with the authority of that position. I think the Prime Minister will agree that statement was not in his remarks.

Mr. Tardif: My quoting these words of the Prime Minister certainly created some sensation. I was not in the house when the Prime Minister said that. Yes; I was in the house when the Prime Minister made that speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You had better get your story straight.

Mr. Tardif: It still creates quite a bit of sensation. I was in the house when the Prime Minister said that, and he said that with a great deal of pride. Then all of a sudden somebody said "Hear, hear" and the Prime Minister immediately corrected it. He said, "I don't want you to believe that I said that; I am just quoting what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said." I was going to point that out if hon. members had given me a chance to do so without interrupting me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tardif: Just a moment; let me finish.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Tardif: It is true that after some members drew to the Prime Minister's attention the fact that this was an improper statement to make, a statement that would probably stay with the members of the civil service staff for a long time to come, he corrected the statement. However, that is the action of the government. We just saw in the past few days an instance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tardif: —where a civil servant or employee of the dominion government can be seen and should not be heard. The last employee of the government that was heard, of course, was heard by a Senate committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tardif: There is no question, Mr. Chairman, that even if the Prime Minister attributes—

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Russell has just said that the Prime Minister corrected that sentence after that interjection. May I say that the Prime Minister never corrected it. He had a clipping from a newspaper from which he quoted this statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Tardif: I thought I was being quite bold in quoting the Prime Minister and I was not under the impression that he needed any help. As a matter of fact, I am sure he does not need any help to defend himself.

Mr. Valade: Not from the hon. member.

Mr. Tardif: I accept the explanation of the Prime Minister and I tell the Prime Minister that actions speak much louder than words.

I personally think that in this bill presented to the house today there should have been included a clause that permits the civil service to go to arbitration. If it were possible for civil servants to go to arbitration it would eliminate many problems for them. There is no question that private industries and the leaders of private industries in Canada recognize collective bargaining. I wish to refer to a speech made by the president of Ford Motor Company of Canada, delivered before the British Columbia chamber of commerce on May 15, 1961, in which, with regard to collective bargaining, he said that he believes it is vital for business leaders to reaffirm their belief in the principle of collective bargaining as a device by which management, employees and union represented employees can represent divergent views in order to provide solutions with which both can live. Acceptance of this principle by management must be predicated, of course, he said, on collective bargaining rendering service to the whole economy.

The same thing exactly, Mr. Chairman, could apply to the employees of the civil service, namely that they be permitted to go to collective bargaining and that they be permitted to present their views in a manner that will be beneficial not only to the employees but to the economy of the country also. It would also prevent the government from procrastinating in making decisions in connection with salary adjustments, vacation adjustments or any other working condition that apply to civil servants. I know that the ministers or the hon. members across the floor will say that there is not procrastination. The last time an increase was granted to civil servants it was after demands that were about two years old. If they had collective bargaining or permission for collective bargaining, they would immediately apply to the board and prevent this procrastination that is a recognizable attribute of the present government.

There is another injustice that was done to civil servants at the end of a period of two years of procrastination. It was the fact that salary adjustments had been made to departments at different periods. It is my opinion and that of many of the people who sat on the committee that the adjustment in salaries should apply to all civil servants at the same time. If, because of an increased cost of living or because of other conditions, there is necessity to adjust salaries for civil servants, the necessity should apply to all civil servants at the same time, not to one department in January, another department in May and another one in November. All civil servants should be treated in exactly the same manner. There should be no discrimination, as there is in some departments, in keeping them waiting longer for the adjustments they deserve and which have been agreed.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said that in his opinion civil servants were getting too much protection. Unfortunately I find that is the attitude of the government; they think civil servants are getting too much protection. Every time a minister or a member of the government speaks to an audience they talk of the efficiency and the quality of our civil service, and in the House of Commons they say these civil servants are getting too much protection.

I can advise the hon. member and the government that not only are civil servants not getting too much protection, but they are not getting the protection that is given employees in private industry. Civil servants are at the mercy of the government in respect of decisions that are made. For instance, while this may not be a very important example although the last statutory holiday was part of this bill, it was not granted to civil servants because the bill had not been passed in the house. I hope the necessary arrangements will be made so that the next statutory holiday will be given to civil servants and they will not be forced to lose it as they were last time.

There is another provision that should have been included in this bill but which has been omitted. While I think the bill is an improvement over the measure that was in force and had been in force for a great number of years, there are still many things which should have been inserted in the bill to make it more appropriate. Temporary civil servants should be entitled to the 2 per cent holiday pay as are employees in industry. This provision should apply not only to employees who work for a short period of time but also to employees who work for a number of days every week and are considered temporary employees.

The hon. member for St. Denis, as reported at page 4717 of Hansard, asked the Postmaster General whether it was true that temporary post office employees were asked to pass examinations. The Postmaster General answered—I can quote his answer if the committee wishes, but I do not think it is necessary—that temporary employees were asked to pass examinations because their salaries had been adjusted and they were receiving the same salary as clerks doing an equivalent job. He said their salaries had been raised from $1.26 to $1.72 an hour.

As reported at page 7183 of Hansard of June 28, the hon. member for St. Denis asked the Postmaster General whether temporary employees were going to be granted holiday pay. The Postmaster General said no, it did not apply to them. So the Postmaster General will not think I am misquoting him I will read his answer:

> Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. member's preoccupation with holidays at this stage in our parliamentary session. I think many hon. members are preoccupied with the same consideration.

That was one of the humorous remarks that the Postmaster General usually makes perhaps to prevent a straight answer to a straight question. He continued:

> In this particular case these people are working three or four hours a day. It is not full time employment. They are perfectly free to arrange for holidays if they wish.

In industry, whether or not an employee works only two or three days a week, he is entitled to 2 per cent of his salary as holiday pay and he is the man who decides when he is going to take a holiday. The fact that he is a temporary employee does not prevent him receiving that percentage of his pay for holidays. With respect to part time civil servants there seems to be no obligation under our present regulations to pay them for holiday time.

Industry in the province of Ontario pays 2 per cent of the salary to employees whether they are part time or full time. In this case employees are being asked to pass the same examinations as permanent employees if they are going to work two, three or four days a week regularly throughout the year, and it is my opinion that they should be entitled to 2 per cent of their salary as holiday pay. I deplore the fact that this provision was not included in the bill.

At that time the Postmaster General could not understand why these people should not take examinations and yet be treated differently from regular employees. I think the government should certainly have considered this question and included this provision in the bill presented to the house. If some of these provisions had been included in the bill I am sure our civil servants, who are recognized not only by the government but by the opposition as being the foremost civil servants in the world—this is agreed by everybody—would be a lot happier. I do not think it would cause any great headaches to the government and I think it would eliminate many of the problems that the civil servants of Canada have to face.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, in the discussion on clause 1 of this bill in committee of the whole house it is perhaps appropriate that I should make some preliminary remarks about the standing committee to which the bill was referred after second reading.

I wish to make it clear that for my part I felt the committee made remarkably objective study of the bill. I should like on my own behalf to express to other members of the committee my appreciation of their objectivity in trying to deal with what is of necessity a somewhat complex problem. The chairman of the committee conducted the hearings in a way that tried to take full account of the rights of all members of the committee and of all the associations which wished to be heard or make representations. I must say I found this a very pleasant relief from some experiences I have had in other committees this year and last year. But I am not going to discuss that aspect of the matter here. It was a very satisfactory experience to have that approach taken by the chairman and all hon. members from all parts of the house who were serving on the committee. I wish to express that thought at the very outset of my remarks. I think it should be expressed and I am quite happy to do so.

There is one interesting sidelight to the work of the committee. It seemed to me that the result of the rather lengthy and thorough studies given by the committee was to make us appreciate all the more the splendid work performed by those who drafted the original act in 1918. When one remembers that the act is now some 43 years old, the changed circumstances of the times, the changes in the civil service, the great growth in the civil service and the many new problems which have arisen, one cannot help but have an appreciation of how well the principles in the relationship of government-civil service matters were laid down in the old act. I for one am perfectly prepared to acknowledge that. I am happy to acknowledge it and to express appreciation to those who were concerned with the draftsmanship and sponsorship of the bill at that time.

It was a coalition government. I have expressed the thought previously on this bill that the original bill could probably not have been passed had it not been for the fact that there was a coalition government. It is rather interesting that the two people who were mainly concerned with the carriage of that bill later became judges in very high positions in the judicial system of this country. There is no doubt at all about the fact that it was the coalition government which passed that bill, and it was because it was a coalition government that it was possible to get so many clauses, strong clauses, I may perhaps call them, inserted in the bill. It was a very good thing. I, personally, take some pride in the fact that the two ministers who had so much to do with it were Liberals, but the hon. member for Greenwood would probably say this was a mere accident.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, God moves in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform.

Mr. McIlraith: That is another pleasant debate which we shall leave for another occasion.

I wish to place some observations on record about the original act because I think it is proper to do so. The bill before us now does not change the basic concept of this original act at all, but it does make many improvements which the passage of time has shown to be desirable and necessary. The committee was able, because of the way in which it approached this problem, to have many amendments made in the committee. I think the bill which has come back to us from the special committee is very much improved as compared with the one that went to it. I have not a note of the number of amendments which were made in the committee but it was sufficient to warrant the reprinting of the bill. I think that is all to the credit of the committee. I think it indicates that people were willing to treat the subject objectively. For my part, while the amendments have not granted all I would have wished, they certainly are improvements and I am the first to acknowledge it.

There are many questions which I could raise. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, speaking earlier this afternoon, indicated that with the passage of this bill a new golden age would be ushered in for the civil service. I wish to point out that there is one flaw in that reasoning. Golden ages for the civil service, whatever is meant by that—and I presume the hon. member means good relations, high efficiency, high morale, and so on—will not result merely from legislation. They result from the treatment received at the hands of the government in office from time to time. Good legislation is a great help but it is not legislation which makes what the hon. member calls a golden age for the civil servants. That condition is brought about by a proper appreciation and understanding on the part of the government from day to day, whatever government might be in office, of the role of the civil service in carrying on the activities of government, an appreciation of the necessity of a strong administrative arm in any government if that government is to perform efficiently and well, and of the necessity of a strong and efficient civil service if the policies of the government are to be efficiently and well carried out from day to day.

That relationship is not easy to define in precise terms but it does require an understanding and appreciation which is not always given in an equal degree by governments. Indeed, if hon. members would look at the history of the civil service since the predecessor to this bill was passed in 1918 they will see that the low periods, the periods which were not in any sense a golden age of the civil service, were brought about not because of any change in the legislation at any point in that period of time but rather because of the changing attitudes of governments from time to time. The point I wish to make is, in other words, that not only must we have good legislation on the subject but we must have a good understanding of the problems of the civil service and a good working relationship and direction from the government, whatever government it may be. I must say I regretted part of the line taken by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. It seems to me both of them had lost their objectivity in dealing with what must remain a difficult and delicate subject, though a most important one in a country constituted in the way our country is. I think the problem they were seeking to deal with, the question of bilingualism in the civil service, was treated by the committee in its study as one requiring a great deal of attention, one of real importance. But it was treated as a question of bilingualism in this country because of the rights of the two languages and because of the historical origin of those rights and the need to preserve them fully in spirit as well as according to the letter of the law. Regrettably, the hon. members to whom I referred used the term "French Canadian" in this context. Indeed, one of them used the term "French Canadian" almost exclusively instead of using the term "bilingualism". Then they sought to digress into party warfare on the subject. As a matter of fact, the members who sat on the committee reached, I thought, a remarkable degree of unanimity on that point and on the necessity of trying to get the kind of legislation with regard to this aspect which would be satisfactory.

May I call it six o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might ask the leader of the house if he can indicate what business the government intends to put forward tomorrow and for the rest of the week?

An hon. Member: Why not next week, too?

Mr. Churchill: I did not anticipate that the opposition wanted to sit here for the rest of the week. I shall simply announce that tomorrow we shall carry on with what we are doing today. The order of business—if it is to be changed I will notify the opposition in good time—will be consideration of the Civil Service Act with which we have been dealing in committee, followed by interim supply. If it is possible to reach some solution to the problem of the divorce cases, we might have something to say with regard to that tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SURPLUS MANPOWER AREAS

Question No. 284—Mr. Pitman:

1. What are the names of all municipalities which have applied for designation as surplus manpower areas up to and including June 30, 1961, and in each case what was the size of the labour force?
2. What are the names of all municipalities which have been accepted as surplus manpower areas up to and including June 30, 1961?
3. What percentage of months between May and November between 1953 and 1960 did all the areas in the answer to question 1 have surplus manpower available?
4. In which of the areas found in the answer to question 1 have the industrial employment conditions generally deteriorated since 1953?
5. How many industries within municipalities designated as surplus manpower areas are at present receiving double depreciation allowance?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. The names of the areas and localities that have applied for designation under the special capital cost allowances program are as follows:

Alberta: Drumheller.

Manitoba: Carberry.

Ontario: Cornwall, Morrisburg, Elliot Lake, Fort William, Windsor, Essex county.

Quebec: Chandler, Jacques Cartier, Louiseville, Matane, New Richmond, Richmond, St. Jerome, Tracy.

New Brunswick: Campbellton, Dalhousie, Shippegan, County of Gloucester, Chatham, Newcastle, County of Northumberland, County of Saint John, Grand Falls, Milltown, Moncton, Dieppe, Port Elgin, Sackville, Sussex, County of Westmorland, Woodstock.

Nova Scotia: Amherst, Louisbourg, New Glasgow, County of Antigonish, Trenton, Pictou, County of Guysborough, Springhill, Yarmouth, District of Yarmouth, County of Cape Breton, Mahone Bay.

Estimates of the labour force of 16 areas and localities for which investigation has been completed are as follows:

Cornwall, Ont. N.E.S. area, 32,100; Elliot Lake, Ont. N.E.S. area, 5,500; Windsor, Ont. N.E.S. area, 96,100; Amherst, N.S. N.E.S. area, 5,100; New Glasgow, N.S. N.E.S. area, 22,300; Springhill, N.S. N.E.S. area, 6,900; Milltown, N.B., 700; Grand Falls-St. Leonard, 4,500; Richmond, Quebec, 1,200; St. Jerome, Quebec, N.E.S. area, 7,200; Jacques-Cartier, 15,400; Chandler, Quebec N.E.S. area, 8,000; District of Yarmouth, N.S., 1,900; Yarmouth, N.S., 2,300.

Estimates of the labour force in other areas and localities that have applied for designation are not available until the investigations of the Department of Labour are completed.

2. The following national employment service office areas have been designated under the special capital cost allowances program:

Cornwall, Ont. (includes Morrisburg), Elliot Lake, Ontario, Windsor, Ontario (includes part of Essex county), Amherst, N.S., New Glasgow, N.S. (includes Pictou, Trenton and all remaining parts of counties of Antigonish and Guysborough), Springhill, N.S.

The following localities have been designated under the special capital cost allowances program:

Milltown, New Brunswick, Grand Falls-St. Leonard, New Brunswick.

3. A record of labour market classifications for the period 1953-60 is available for areas served by local offices of the national employment service, but not for particular municipalities or counties. For municipalities and counties that have applied for designation under the program, the corresponding N.E.S. offices, and the percentage of the 48 months May to October 1953-60 that these N.E.S. areas were classified in a surplus labour market category are as follows:

Municipality or county	National employment service local office area	Months classified in a surplus labour market category as a percentage of total
Cornwall, Morrisburg	Cornwall	83
Elliot Lake	Elliot Lake	50(1)
Fort William	Fort William	21
Windsor, Essex county	Windsor	88
Drumheller	Drumheller	8
Carberry	Brandon	2
Chandler	Chandler	42
Jacques Cartier	Montreal	35
Louiseville	Louiseville	88

(1) Covers the period May to October, 1959 and 1960.

Municipality or county	National employment service local office area	Months classified in a surplus labour market category as a percentage of total
Matane	Matane	40
New Richmond	New Richmond	60
Richmond	Sherbrooke	69
St. Jerome	St. Jerome	50
Tracy	Sorel	62
Campbellton, Dalhousie	Campbellton	71
County of Gloucester, Shippegan	Bathurst	52
County of Northumberland, Chatham, Newcastle	Newcastle	88
County of Saint John	Saint John	90
Grand Falls	Edmundston	25
Milltown	St. Stephen	75
Moncton, Dieppe, Port Elgin, Sackville, County of Westmorland	Moncton	71
Sussex	Sussex	40
Woodstock	Woodstock	42
Amherst	Amherst	75
District of Yarmouth, Yarmouth	Yarmouth	27
County of Cape Breton, Louisbourg	Sydney	69
New Glasgow, Antigonish county, Trenton, Pictou, Guysborough county	New Glasgow	83
Springhill	Springhill	60
Mahone Bay	Bridgewater	29

4. In 16 areas and localities for which investigations have been completed, it was found that employment conditions had generally deteriorated over the period 1953-60 in Cornwall, Windsor, Grand Falls, Milltown, Amherst, New Glasgow, Springhill, Jacques-Cartier and St. Jerome. No employment statistics are available for Elliot Lake prior to 1958. Since that date employment has generally deteriorated.

Employment trends in other areas and localities that have applied for designation are not available until the investigations of the Department of Labour are completed.

5. No firms are receiving double depreciation allowances at present. Applications from firms intending to produce new products in designated areas are being reviewed by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

LETTER BOX INSTALLATIONS, MONTREAL ISLAND

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, July 13, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN CIVIL SERVICE REPORT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission, concerning certain employees of the House of Commons, laid upon the table by Mr. Speaker on June 29, 1961, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MEMBERS OF NIGERIAN GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I trust the house will allow me to make reference to the fact that in the gallery there are present today members of the Nigerian trade and economic mission composed of Hon. Chief F. S. Okotie-Eboh, the Nigerian minister of finance, Hon. Z. B. Dipcharima, minister of commerce and industry, Hon. J. C. Obande, acting minister of works, and ministers from the three regions of Nigeria who represent their country on this mission.

Nigeria is one of the greatest of commonwealth countries, having newly achieved its autonomy. The Prime Minister of Nigeria at the last prime ministers' conference revealed something of the great capacity and ability and power of leadership that are his. Nigeria is a bulwark for the commonwealth. I am sure the house will join in extending the warmest welcome to these representatives. Through the chief, the minister of finance, we convey to the people of Nigeria the warm affection of the people of Canada.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to be permitted to associate our party with the words of welcome the Prime Minister has extended to our distinguished guests from Nigeria. We welcome them not only for themselves but because they represent a great new independent African state with which we are privileged to work in close co-operation as fellow members of our commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to associate the members of this group with the words of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming the distinguished and colourfully attired delegation from Nigeria. I do not think any delegation coming to the House of Commons has received a warmer welcome than this delegation has received this morning. Nigeria, of course, represents a new sovereign nation amongst the nations of the world, and I think represents in a very real way the future of the world in that it represents emerging nations. It demonstrates the basic and underlying strength of the commonwealth. I am confident that in the future our relations with Nigeria will be strong and close in every respect.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—MISSION TO DISCUSS ENTRY BY U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to give the house at least an interim report on the conversations with the secretary of state for Commonwealth Relations of the United Kingdom.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been preliminary discussions between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Right Hon. Duncan Sandys. These conversations will continue today between four ministers of the government representing Canada and Mr. Sandys, and at the conclusion a report will be given to the house. What I could give at the moment would not be helpful, for there has just been the beginning of discussions which are going to continue for a day or more.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—STATEMENT ON CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Leeds which reads as follows:

I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether the government has received any communications since June 20, 1961 from representatives of the international monetary fund criticizing or questioning this government's action in forcing down the exchange rate?

I would say that no communication has been received by the Minister of Finance or by myself.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Labour whether he has now received a telegram from Robert Smeale, the business manager for C.A.L.F.A.A. and whether or not he has any comment to make on the charges made in that telegram?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have received a telegram from Mr. Smeale and I have replied to his telegram as follows:

Retel eleventh industrial relations and disputes investigation act provides for the making of complaints alleging unfair labour practices in the form prescribed by section ten of regulations under act. All such complaints received in department undergo prescribed procedure. However it was understanding of my officer, following your protest of May twenty-eighth, that it was not your intention to proceed further. While filing of complaint is completely within your discretion I would suggest that parties are following most constructive course in attempting to settle dispute concerning wages and working conditions.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister has anything to report on any developments in this dispute, and whether he thinks there is a real possibility of a settlement.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by Mr. Remi Duquette, the chief Montreal officer of my department, that the meetings between the parties that have been going on for some days have been now adjourned and that both parties have agreed to meet with him again on Tuesday, July 18 at 10.30 a.m. The adjournment was for the purpose of allowing both parties to review the situation as it now stands. Mr. Duquette has said that although talks have not been conclusive, they are encouraging.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DORVAL AIRPORT—AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO U.S. FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) asked me the following question:

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Is the minister aware that several hundred employees will be laid off at Dorval as a result of the granting of a lubrication service contract to an American firm?

The answer is as follows. On July 1, an aircraft fuel feeding pipe system was inaugurated at Dorval. That service is operated by a Canadian company, the Consolidated Refuelling and Services Limited, which is incorporated in Canada and controlled by Canadians. The inauguration of that system has brought about a reduction in the number of tank car operators employed by the various fuel companies at Montreal's international airport. However, we understand that the employees in question have either joined the staff of Consolidated Refuelling and Services Limited or have been given other positions by the companies for which they work.

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister yet received a report on the construction of the proposed Chignecto canal?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker.

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he has yet received a report on the feasibility of the Prince Edward Island causeway?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, when I receive a final report on either one of the studies I will be very happy to inform the house.

MONTREAL-GEORGIAN BAY CANAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether the interdepartmental study authorized several months ago by him to restudy the studies made in earlier years regarding the engineering and the economic feasibility of the Montreal-Georgian bay canal has been completed, and can he make any comment at this time?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the study has not been completed as yet.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say when he expects the study will be completed?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire into the situation thoroughly before answering that question.

CIVIL DEFENCE

EXERCISE "TOCSIN"—PROCLAMATION UNDER GREAT SEAL

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice which arises out of a statement by the clerk of the privy council with reference to the recent exercise Tocsin, that it took about 23 minutes from the time the Prime Minister received a warning from the chiefs of staff until the proclamation under the War Measures Act was sealed by the Great Seal. I wish to ask the minister whether in fact the War Measures Act had been declared to be in force, under the provisions of the act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it this was an exercise and the remarks of the clerk of the privy council must be taken in that light, that a hypothetical sealing of the proclamation was carried out.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PART TIME EMPLOYEES—REPORTED OFFER OF SICK LEAVE AND HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the minister's statement in the house on July 11 that the civil service commission has followed the policy of granting regular leave to full time civil servants only, would the minister care to comment on the fact that as far back as ten years ago the civil service commission advertised positions for part time stenographers in the Ottawa papers and offered sick leave and holiday benefits?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for sending me a copy of his question. Unfortunately I received it only a few minutes before the opening of the house, so I will take his question as notice and will answer it as soon as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

WITHHOLDING OF BENEFITS DUE TO ABSENCE FROM AREA

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. The minister will recall that there were some 13 individuals who had come to Ottawa in the march of the unemployed and who lost their benefits for that day. They subsequently appealed this, and the appeal was turned down by a split vote.

I have now received a letter informing me that on June 20 last these 13 claimants were advised that their further appeal had been referred to Ottawa for disposition by an umpire and they would be advised of the date and time of this hearing. I should like to ask the minister whether he can inform the house the reason for such unwarranted delay.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter lies within the jurisdiction of the umpire to whom appeals are made. He has the final decision in these matters. I must advise the hon. member that I have no jurisdiction over his activities or how he handles these cases.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Would the minister say whether it is a fact that the government has now decided not to bring in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act this session?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No decision has been made. When a decision has been made, the course to be followed by the government will be announced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says no decision has been made. How then does he explain the announcement in the speech from the throne that the government was going to bring in an enactment amending the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Starr: As I said earlier, no decision on this matter has been made. When a decision is made there will be a policy announced by the government as to the course which will be followed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then the announcement in the speech from the throne means nothing.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO IMMIGRATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether it is the intention of the hon. lady before this session is concluded to introduce the revisions to the Immigration Act which were forecast in the speech from the throne, and whether a firm decision had been made by the government to do so before the speech from the throne was read.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to introduce these revisions at the earliest possible moment. We are still working on them. I cannot indicate the time or date when they will be brought forward, but it certainly is our intention to bring them forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the hon. lady a supplementary question. Does the hon. lady consider that these amendments have the same urgency which she and her colleagues thought they had in 1957?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member I think I should draw attention to the comment I made some time ago, to the effect that many of the welfare organizations and immigrant aid services in Canada have asked us to go slowly in this regard in order to give them an opportunity of thoroughly studying the situation themselves.

REQUEST FOR LIST OF OUTSTANDING RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he can now give a progress report to the house in respect to the formidable task he undertook the other day of compiling a list of the returns ordered by this house which have not yet been complied with.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have already produced a partial list. We are progressing and will try to compile the rest of the returns as soon as possible.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LONG SAULT RAPIDS—PRESERVATION OF REPORTED BATTLE SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. My question is prompted by a lady corespondent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: —correspondent. In view of the historic interest of the site where Dollard des Ormeaux defended Montreal, located at the foot of the Long Sault rapids just east of Hawkesbury on what is known as the old Ross farm, and in view of the fact this site will soon be lost by flooding due to the Quebec hydro project under way at Carillon, would the minister indicate what representations have been made to the Quebec government or Quebec hydro to have this site protected from inundation?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice of this question, which involves considerable research. I wish I were as sure as he that the Ross farm site is in fact the site where Dollard des Ormeaux is said to have fought so heroically the battle of the Long Sault. This is one of the most stirring pages in Canadian history, and if it were possible to bring this page to life once again through a positive identification of the actual site, I assure the hon. member that I would want to explore all possible ways to preserve it as a part of our national historic heritage.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that at best the Ross farm site can only be said to be one of a number of possible locations where the battle may have taken place. A large body of archaeological opinion favours the Carillon site as the actual location. Historians support the viewpoint that Dollard's last stand took place at the western end of the lac des Deux Montagnes.

Mr. Thomas Lee has done some thorough archaeological investigation of the Ross farm site. The evidence unearthed is extremely interesting from a general archaeological standpoint. However, the artifacts located there do not go back beyond the early nineteenth century and indicate that the site in all likelihood was a portage encampment, one of the several portages on this reach of the Ottawa river.

This background information has been made available to both the Ontario and Quebec governments. However, in view of the inconclusive evidence I feel I have no justifiable grounds to attempt to delay the progress of the Carillon dam construction project through representations to the government of Quebec or the Quebec hydro electric commission.

NEWFOUNDLAND—DETERMINATION OF POINT OF LANDING OF CABOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West I should like to put a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Amid the many other urgent discussions that he has had to undertake since he became minister, has he had time to determine the exact place of Cabot's landfall which is urgent, sir, because of the minister's forthcoming visit to Newfoundland?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a question that I shall leave for continuing discussion among the academicians, and I think I can include the hon. member in that category.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the minister.

COPYRIGHTS

IMPLEMENTATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could the minister indicate to the house whether the government intends to take action this year on the recommendations put forward in the report of the Ilsley commission on copyrights, patents and trade marks, including the revision of existing legislation and the putting into force of the Universal Copyright Convention, something which was also recommended by the royal commission on publications?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to acknowledge the courtesy shown to me by the hon. member. Here is my reply. First, with regard to the Copyright Act and copyrights, the problem is under consideration and I trust that within a short time we shall be able to take a step towards the ratification of the international convention to which the hon. member has referred.

With regard to industrial design, we have a plan that is almost completed, and I hope to place it before the cabinet within a short time so as to implement the second recommendation of the Ilsley report.

With regard to the third recommendation, the matter is still under consideration and not much headway has been made. However, I think the hon. member will appreciate that this is a very important and very tricky matter. In any event, we are going ahead as quickly as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN TRUCKING INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the intention of the C.N.R. to acquire trucking companies, which obviously would mean a dangerous competition for private enterprises?

Could the minister also tell us whether the government intends to take definite steps with regard to that matter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated in this house, the board of directors of the C.N.R. is responsible for the administration of the company, and the government cannot interfere directly in administrative matters.

Like all major transportation concerns, the C.N.R. officials feel it would best serve the company's interest to diversify its methods of transportation.

As to the competition which some people may feel would be prejudicial to other transportation companies, this is a matter to be determined by the provincial transport board, which will have to decide whether to grant or refuse a transportation permit to the company concerned.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to announce the government's decision with regard to the presidency of the Canadian National Railways?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been said.

Civil Service Act

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has yet been able to complete his study of the Clark report.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, the study has not as yet been completed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister now give us some indication as to when the study will be completed, and does he expect to have it ready by Labour day?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the government has anything to announce in this regard it will be made known to the house.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MONTREAL—INSTALLATION OF NEW PLASTIC MAILBOXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General? In view of the fact that the minister boasted of having made an innovation installing plastic letter boxes, could he tell the house why is it that out of 580 new boxes installed on the island of Montreal since 1958, only three are plastic boxes while 577 are metal boxes of the old type?

(Text):

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, these were experimental types of boxes which were installed right across Canada in all major cities. As a result of the use of these boxes we have made certain changes in the design, and we hope to have a plastic letter box improved and styled again for test. Unlike some of the suggestions of the hon. member, we like to know where we are going and be sure of our ground before we spend public money.

Mr. Denis: I admit that you do not go very quickly.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada —Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. McCleave in the chair.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned yesterday I was speaking on clause 1. In reading Hansard this morning I note that part of my remarks, where I was referring to the 1918 act, are reported without any interruptions. I regret that the enrichment offered by way of interruption of those remarks by the hon. member for Greenwood is not recorded for posterity. My remarks had relation to certain interjections he was making, and it is regrettable that the interjections are not on record. However, perhaps he will put the substance of them on record later in this debate.

In the concluding part of my remarks I was dealing with the matter of bilingualism as it had been treated by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I had suggested to them that I thought their treatment of the subject was not as objective as the subject itself, a very important one, deserves, or as objective as the members of the special committee were in dealing with the matter.

The point I was seeking to make, with particular reference to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, was that he had confused references to the two languages or to bilingualism with racial or ethnic origin, which is not the point at issue. The special committee attempted to deal with the subject of the necessity in this country of in fact using two languages as required, and it accepted the proposition that the spirit of confederation on this point had to be honoured. That was the approach of the committee, and I thought it was a very good one.

In dealing with the matter the hon. member did not treat it in that way at all. He spoke about the ethnic origin of certain persons in the civil service. So far as I know the civil service commission has never been charged with the responsibility of ascertaining the ethnic origin of Canadians being employed by them, and I for one hope that will never be the basis of selection for the civil service of Canada but that the basis of selection will be merit and the test of citizenship or ethnic origin merely Canadianism.

In other words the only proposition I can accept on that subject is that once a person becomes a Canadian citizen he is a Canadian citizen with full rights, and there are no distinctions as among Canadian citizens. Perhaps it is a trite way of putting it, but I take the position that once we have citizenship no matter by what process, whether through naturalization or by birth, we are Canadians one and all and we must not be kept in separate categories by reason of ethnic origin. For that reason I was seeking to make a critical reference to the hon. member's argument on the question of bilingualism.

If I understood his French correctly, and on this point I think I did, it seemed to me that he was referring to French Canadians much of the time instead of referring to the French language and the necessity for bilingualism. To me there is a very important distinction. If he merely used the terms interchangeably or carelessly I have no objection, but if he was seeking to use the terms deliberately to indicate that the civil service commission must seek to ascertain the ethnic origin of persons being selected for positions I would take objection to that and say that the test must remain bilingualism, that that test alone is the proper one and ethnic origin is not the test.

The subject is a large one and quite complex. The committee did have some rather good presentations made to it. Le conseil de la vie française made a presentation and I thought the discussion in the committee on the whole subject was very good. I also want to point out one other weakness in their case. They took certain segments of the civil service and tried to make a statistical approach to the numbers who are bilingual in given branches. The weakness of that should be readily apparent. If you take a small branch you can come up with statistics that will show that practically all speak one or the other of the two languages.

It must be acknowledged that the necessity for the two languages is greater in some parts of the country than in others. There are problems like that. The point I wish to make is that if the statistical approach is to be used, the over-all picture must be considered. They should not select one branch or another. When that is done problems arise. You may be dealing with technical subjects in relation to which the educational system throughout the country is such that applicants from one part of Canada would seem to enjoy preference because their educational qualifications better suit them for certain positions.

This problem is interrelated with the whole question of education and training. I hope we can develop a solution to the problem on a broad scale. I hope the development of the solution will take full cognizance of the need for encouraging educational institutions in various parts of the country to provide the type of education that will better qualify applicants for some positions. I believe all hon. members would agree there is need for more and better training in the field of public administration as well as in the technical and scientific fields, and that this has a bearing on the number of bilingual persons employed through the civil service in any particular branch. That is all I shall say on that subject for the moment.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member passes to another subject, would he indicate at what page I may find the reference to the remarks he attributed to me a while ago.

Mr. McIlraith: I listened to the hon. member's speech very carefully. I have not marked my Hansard because I did not receive it in time to peruse it.

Mr. Ricard: I rise only to point out that the hon. member appears to be confusing me with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I think the hon. gentleman has attributed to me words used by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, words which I have not uttered in this chamber.

Mr. McIlraith: I am quite satisfied to accept the hon. member's explanation in toto. If I have in any way attributed to him words he did not utter I completely withdraw my reference. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, when speaking, did raise the question in my mind. It may have been merely a careless reference on his part or it may have been intentional. The point is that if it was an intentional reference I wished to direct attention to the approach I feel should be taken in this matter. I wished to reveal my views on the point. I believe it is an important point in the long term, because it is related to a continuing situation and is dependent upon many factors, one of which is education.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona delivered a speech in which he seemed to indicate that he desired more direct ministerial control of the civil service. I was unable to gather how far he wanted to go in this respect. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not here to hear my remarks on this point. His comments were certainly capable of giving rise to the interpretation I mention. He appeared to be pressing for more direct patronage influence in appointments. If he did not mean that, I have no desire to insist on placing that interpretation on his remarks. On the other hand, if he did mean it I wish to point out to him that the original Civil Service Act attempted to get away from that sort of thing. I think it is the desire of most hon. members in all quarters of the house to continue to avoid controls of that nature. If I am correct in interpreting the hon. gentleman's remarks as representing a plea to return to that condition, I would expect that hon. members on both sides of the house would not desire to support the hon. member's position.

There are many references in the bill to matters of major importance with which one is tempted to deal. One of the most important is that of the relationship between the government and staff organizations in the civil service. This represents a difficult and complex problem with which we shall deal in a detailed way when we consider clause 7.

Clause 7 as sent to the special committee was in my view inadequate. The committee was successful in having an amendment inserted, and the bill as it now appears before us is considerably improved over the bill that was sent to the committee in so far as the question of staff consultations is concerned. A long argument could be developed concerning whether or not the procedure for staff consultations is adequate. I do not like the word consult in that context, because I think it is imprecise and inadequate. I shall argue that point a little later.

Clause 10 relates to the subject of pay and allowances. This clause together with clause 7 raises the old question of the rights of civil service bodies to negotiate, to engage in arbitration and other related rights which may be discussed on the specific clauses. Another matter that is raised is this. Once this bill becomes law I feel it should be reviewed from time to time by a committee of this house. When I say "from time to time" I mean reasonably frequently because we are, through the growth of the civil service, moving into a period when the concepts of the civil service and of arbitration are changing. I am not wholly satisfied with the clauses as they now exist in the bill, and wish to see how they operate. I am grateful to the extent that they modernize the act, but I wish to see them examined and kept under constant review. If the government continues to have responsibility in this field, which I expect it will not in the light of forthcoming events, I hope the question of pay and allowances will be kept under constant review. Government needs to be ever watchful of the independence of the civil service commission.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member departs from that point would he be good enough to indicate how frequently he thinks review should be made? The hon. gentleman has raised an interesting point. I am sure it would be useful if on the basis of the hon. gentleman's experience he would indicate to the committee how frequently review should be made. Would the hon. gentleman suggest that it should take place every five or ten years?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think it would be proper to give a dogmatic answer to that question in terms of a precise number of years. In a period when the cost of living is increasing and salaries reflect those increases, the question of pay and allowances becomes of acute interest and requires review more frequently than in a period when the cost of living is static and pay and allowances do not constitute an acute problem. If government is careful in its relationships with the civil service the need of review is not as urgent as it is when government is careless in those relationships. In any event, I am not talking about an annual review. I also think ten years would be much too long a time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are talking about a review of the act.

Mr. McIlraith: If the hon. member wants to crowd me into a somewhat dogmatic answer, I would say that probably three to five years might be the period of time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are not talking about review of pay and allowances.

Mr. McIlraith: No; review of the act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are talking about review of the act and procedures in the act.

Mr. McIlraith: It was a review of the act I was talking about. I picked out the pay and allowances matter only as an illustration of the type of subject that could be important.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Quite so.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to make that clear; it is review of this whole act. The clause of the Heeney report I wanted to read is this. By the way, I should at this point make it clear that the Heeney commission was a commission or process started by the former government and continued by this government. In debate yesterday there seemed to be some confusion on that point, but I think there is nothing at issue on it.

Paragraph 61 on page 23 of that report of the civil service commission of Canada on personnel administration in the public service reads as follows:

> Although it is not, perhaps, widely appreciated, it seems to us that the independent status of the commission in matters of pay and conditions of work is as important a characteristic of our system as its independence in relation to appointment and promotion. In its recommendations on pay, the commission is no more subject to government direction than it is to influence by organized employees. It is as immune to outside pressures as the law can make it. Its sole duty is to reach, within the framework of accepted principles, conclusions based on objective examination and analysis through its pay research bureau and such other sources as may be available to it.

What I wanted to point out here was the need for constant vigilance in order to see that this condition continues. This is a very important matter. I do not wish to rethresh old straw, but I had a difference of opinion with the Minister of Finance having to do with this very subject. Regrettably we did not have an opportunity of debating that matter fully because of the form in which the matter came before the house. However, I thought he was less objective or less vigilant than I would have wished him to be in his appreciation of the necessity for preserving the independence of the civil service commission on this point and related points.

Holding that view, I wish to stress again the necessity for continuing and continuous vigilance to preserve the independence of the civil service commission in its work. If we do not do that; if it becomes a mere agency of government as opposed to an independent commission with its independent guarantee in its performance of the duties with respect to the public service which it is created to perform, then we will have indeed indirectly undone the very thing we are seeking to do and to continue by this legislation.

There is another point of considerable importance that I wish to mention. Of necessity the authority of deputy ministers has been increased. My colleague the hon. member for Ottawa East yesterday put on record the dangers arising from patronage within the service. While we have in this bill increased the powers of deputy ministers and deputy heads of departments, I am not convinced that we have come up with a wholly satisfactory solution by way of appeal procedures to protect all civil servants against improper use of that power. In setting up appeal procedures and methods of protecting individual civil servants against the abuse of that power it is very easy to get a cumbersome kind of system that will impede the work being done and the internal efficiency of administering the service. There is presented a complex problem which I recognize at once.

On that point I am not satisfied that the bill as presented embodies a wholly happy conclusion. I shall therefore content myself now with asking for continued vigilance on the part of all members of the House of Commons to see that, if administration of the act reveals the necessity for a strengthening of the appeal, arbitration and related procedures in relation to this subject, the bill is brought back to this house or forced back to this house and the necessary action taken. From my point of view I thought our solutions were not quite as adequate as they should have been, and there is considerable doubt and uncertainty in my own mind as to just what the future holds in that respect. I hope my fears in this connection will never be realized but will be proved wrong. None the less, I would be less than frank if I did not say that they were there. I observe that my time has expired, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Go ahead.

Mr. McIlraith: There are some other remarks that perhaps could be made.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member's time has now expired. Is it the pleasure of the committee to give further time to the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not wish to abuse the good nature of the committee on this question of using more time than is provided by the rules. However, I have a few more remarks to make and I will try to abbreviate them.

There is the question of holidays. Changes had to be made for two main reasons. There are new problems in this field. The new problems arise out of the universal acceptance of the five day week since the original act was passed. It seems to me that a great many members of the committee failed to realize that the five day week, as a universally accepted proposition, is really in the final analysis comparatively new in relation to the 42-year history of the former act. It is something that has developed only since the end of the war and really in the last very few years. That consideration presents new problems in drafting legislation on the subject of holidays.

Then there is another problem that has arisen in connection with holidays. I refer to the very swift expansion of the civil service, particularly during the second great war. The civil service has gone into activities which, by their very nature, involve shift work and work of that nature other than office work to a far greater extent than was the case at the time of the 1918 act. Those two changes, with the effluxion of time, have created problems in relation to holidays for the different segments of the public service of Canada. When you are dealing with administrative staff and office staff it is quite a simple problem, but it can become a very complex problem where you are dealing with shift work, overtime pay and other related facets of the subject.

I am not sure that our committee came up with an adequate solution of that problem. I hope that again the commission under the regulations will be able to work out something that is satisfactory. We had some reference to this problem in the House of Commons in connection with the Post Office Department. I put a question to the Postmaster

General in relation to the July 1 holiday, which happened to fall on a Saturday this year. I thought his answer was less than adequate or satisfactory in dealing with that matter. It points up the need for a thorough job of work to be done by the commisison in working out the kind of regulations that will grant the holidays that are in accordance with our modern ideas on this matter of employees having to work overtime hours on holidays and allow them the necessary overtime pay or compensatory leave. It is a complex problem and there is perhaps no point in pursuing it further at this moment, other than to indicate that in my view the committee did not by any means reach a wholly complete or satisfactory answer on the subject. I hope the commission may succeed, through regulations and application of the legislation, in doing what the legislation itself may have failed to do.

There is one other major problem with which I think I should deal. It arises under one clause of the bill only but it does have general application to the whole civil service. I refer to the provision in the legislation having to do with the appointment to the civil service of ministers' secretaries and executive assistants. The bill contains a clause that as far as I am concerned is quite unsatisfactory. I want to deal with it here only in its relationship to the general problems of civil service administration. I will have further remarks to make on the subject when we come to the particular clause.

Under the bill as now resubmitted to the house, ministers' secretaries and executive assistants are eligible for appointment to the civil service after three years' service. The former legislation provided only for secretaries. I have no objection to enlarging that provision to provide for both private secretaries and executive assistants, but I must issue a warning on this one point. I think experience and an objective examination of this subject will back me up.

It now becomes possible for a government through this back door method, if I may use the term, to place some 40 new civil servants in the public service of Canada each year after the government has been in office three years. I think there has not been a sufficient realization of the significance of this provision. It does not take many appointments of this kind to lower the morale in a particular department, because they interfere with the expectancy of promotion. If this power were to be used as is provided in the bill before us, it could indeed do much to destroy morale in the civil service. The point—

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps the hon. member would just bear with me for a moment. The existing legislation has one limitation in this regard. This is not a precise way of expressing the limitation, but it is that when a minister leaves the department or dies—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is no limitation now on the number of people.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no limitation on the number of people, but in the existing legislation it is limited to one secretary—and if I may use this term, that cuts it in half—when a minister leaves a department.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No.

Mr. McIlraith: I will be coming to the precise terms of the act in a moment. I have the act here. My point refers to this removal of any limitation on the right to appoint those persons. I think it is important that those persons have the right to be appointed. However, I think that right should be subject to a further limitation, something in the nature of the death of a minister, a minister leaving a portfolio or leaving the government, something of that sort, so it would not be possible to have a continuing flow of ministers' secretaries and executive assistants from a particular minister in charge of a particular portfolio into this channel.

I am open to suggestion on the form of that limitation, but I think there should be a limitation in the clause of the bill similar to the former one; otherwise it could be very harmful to the morale of the civil service and much damage could be done to the civil service by this clause as it now stands.

The hon. member for Greenwood had a question he wished to ask me on the point, and I am afraid I cut him off.

Mr. Macdonnell: My question was just this. Is the figure of 40 used by the hon. member a theoretical figure, or is it an actual, realistic figure? Does that not imply that people holding these positions are going to be resigning year by year by year? It is just the figure of 40 that I wish to understand.

Mr. McIlraith: It is only a round figure. There are 22 cabinet ministers and the Leader of the Opposition, making 23 in all. The number could be 46 right now.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): After three years.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but the government has been in office three years now. There could be 46 of these persons at the moment, and immediately this bill is passed—

Mr. Macdonnell: No.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member hear me out, please. If I am correct in the number of cabinet ministers, 46 of these appointments could be made the day after this bill becomes law. Then you could repeat that process—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is after three years.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to differ with the hon. member for Carleton. I was trying to avoid dealing with this difference at this stage; I would rather do it on the clause. The difference turns on interpretation. The difference between the hon. member for Carleton and myself is this. The hon. member for Carleton says this could only happen each three years. I differ in my opinion on that. I say it could happen more frequently; I say it could happen every year. In any event, even if the hon. member is right my point is still the same if this could happen every three years.

For the purpose of answering the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood I wonder whether I could take an illustration. I see the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is in her seat, and I am sure the charming lady would not mind if I used her for the purpose of illustrating this point. Immediately this bill became law she could have two persons put into her department under this provision. I presume they would be appointed to her department. That is a reasonable assumption based on past experience. She could have two persons appointed. That is a proper thing from the point of view of those persons and I do not quarrel with that. However, we must realize that it does interfere with the expectancy of promotion within the department.

Of course if the minister were moving to another portfolio, if she were moving to the other place or leaving the government for one reason or another, these private secretaries and executive assistants would be left in a very awkward position after devoted service in the public service of Canada. I wish to make it very clear that I have no objection to them being appointed in those circumstances, but if this method were used by the minister—and I do not suggest she would have any such motive—as a means of putting persons into her department, it could be quite badly abused and could destroy the morale of the department or be very harmful to it.

I do not know how many executive assistants the minister has, but she could have more than one. I wish to point out that the legislation does not restrict her; there is no statutory restriction on the number of private secretaries she may have, as I read the whole of the legislation. That comes to the nub of the difference in point of view between the hon. member for Carleton and myself. If the minister has more than one private secretary, she could keep this process going indefinitely. If she has only one, of course she would have to appoint another person, and she could only repeat the process every three years. But even that would be a very severe thing. Suppose she were minister for six years. She might have put four persons into the department, and that could be a very severe blow to the morale of the department. As a matter of fact the hon. lady might take the case of the previous government, which was in office for about 22 years. Even accepting the argument used by the hon. member for Carleton it can be seen that some ministers could have appointed 14 persons to the department. In my view there is no doubt that this would have totally destroyed morale in the department, because it would have removed the expectancy of promotion on the part of departmental employees.

So this is a point which is of major importance to the whole subject, an importance which it is perhaps not appreciated by some hon. members. I do not hesitate to say it should be dealt with when we come to the clause concerned and that some restriction should be placed on this right to appoint. It should at least be made dependent on the minister leaving his portfolio, or leaving the ministry.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the hon. member not agree with me that the phrase "for which he is qualified" would have an effect on this procedure?

Mr. McIlraith: No. It has a very limited effect. It is not a significant protection. That means he is coming in from outside the department. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that we have a person within the department besides the minister's appointee, and that they are both equally qualified. The effect of placing the minister's secretary in the department removes the expectancy of promotion from the one already in the department who may have had every right to expect a promotion.

So this right to appoint ministers' secretaries is something which must be carefully used or it could be very harmful. The bill as it is submitted to us and as it is now before the committee, has removed some of the restrictions which were formerly part of the law on this point. I am not recommending that we should return to the precise wording of the former legislation, because the former legislation is too narrow in that the right was restricted to the appointment of one person.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No. The hon. gentleman has said on a number of occasions that the former legislation restricted such appointments to one. But he is, of course, aware of the ruling of the Department of Justice which indicated that the expression "private secretary" included associate private secretaries and assistant private secretaries. The net result was that there was no restriction in the old legislation on the number of persons from a minister's office who could enter the civil service through that channel.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I think the hon. member for Carleton will agree with me that what is attempted in the bill is to be more precise with regard to the point he has mentioned. The measure is, in that respect, an improvement because the language used is more precise and direct. I may say that in 1918, as far as I can find, the term "executive assistant" was rarely heard of. It is like so many titles placed on jobs in the service, some of which are new and ingenious. In any event it is a very popular title now.

I have no objection at all to the bill covering the two persons in the minister's office. I think these persons in the minister's office should be completely and adequately protected. But I think, consistent with doing that, it is not necessary to put in any language which is so loose as to be capable of permitting an abuse. One minister abusing this clause and taking advantage of the opportunity to use it improperly could practically destroy morale in the whole department, and that would be a most serious thing to do. It would materially hamper the effectiveness or the efficiency of any government.

I wish to thank the committee for granting me the indulgence of extra time, and in closing I should like to repeat the reference I made at the beginning of my remarks to the objectivity of those hon. members who served on the special committee which dealt with this subject.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to say a few words on the subject. I really do not think the hon. member has any reason for concern in the situation he has envisaged. I can assure him, and I believe my colleagues are in much the same position as I am, that competent executive assistants and private secretaries are so hard to come by that we are not anxious to have them leave our offices for employment in the department. Moreover, any employment within the department which would be attractive to them would be on a level where there would certainly be major competition.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to make a correction in yesterday's Hansard, when I spoke on this bill. My correction applies to both the French and English versions of the official report.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

As reported on page 5 of the appendix to Hansard for July 12, 1961, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) asked me to repeat the exact figure which I quoted to the house a few moments earlier as to the average French-Canadian representation.

At the time, I thought he was asking me in what proportion the French-Canadian representation had fallen off during the period from 1950-1958. In the case of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the figure was 0.7 per cent. That is the figure I quoted to indicate the French-Canadian representation in that department. That is not correct, since I know that as far as that department is concerned, the proportion of bilingual Canadians has increased, though I do not remember by how much.

(Text):

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to make one or two general observations with respect to statements which have been made by hon. members, with a view to eliminating as far as possible any sense of discrimination because of language, race, colour, creed or religion.

We are, of course, proud that Canadian civil servants enjoy such a world-wide and eminent reputation for honesty and integrity. We are all proud of that whenever we travel and have occasion to talk to people abroad. We are happy, and justly proud, to learn of the fine reputations that our civil servants enjoy. I am sure, too, that the civil servants themselves wish to be completely sure that at no time does the question of discrimination creep into any of the considerations which come before them.

I see from Votes and Proceedings of June 26 that the standing committee has recommended an amendment which deals to some extent with the subject. I am not speaking directly to that particular clause, but I would point out in a general way that the amendment addresses itself to the civil service commission. It calls upon the civil service commission not to discriminate against any person by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion. This applies to the commission itself.

To my way of thinking that amendment is perhaps a little superfluous. It is, perhaps, not necessary; but I am satisfied to have such an amendment on the record, though I have seen nothing to indicate why it should be called for. I suggest generally that a precautionary measure of the same sort should be taken with respect to the civil servants themselves. There was an incident a short while ago when a civil servant expressed himself in a way which could indicate that he might practise discrimination. I hope, as we come to consider this bill clause by clause, that I may have the opportunity to introduce an amendment to remedy that situation.

Members of the civil service very often occupy positions in which they have to make judgments and decisions in respect to matters which come before them. If a civil servant has any prejudices because of colour, race or religion, this would impinge upon his sense of impartiality. Therefore we should, if we possibly can, address ourselves to the civil service to prevent individuals from exercising or practising any form of discrimination. That is the observation I wanted to make in addressing myself to the civil service, against whom I say there is no criticism to be levelled in this regard. It was just the one incident which happened which led me to mention this subject, because it could provoke among members of parliament the fear that if there is one such individual there could well be others.

As I indicated a moment ago, and I propose to offer an amendment, the act should perhaps contain a provision that if any civil servant practises discrimination or is known to practise discrimination because of race, colour, creed or religion he shall be deemed to have exposed himself to the dangers of sanction and, perhaps, dismissal as a civil servant. I hope the committee will bear with me in this regard, because it is not a matter of politics or any consideration other than that which should be unanimous among members of parliament.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words I should like to express at this time with respect to this particular measure. I want to associate myself first with others who have been calling on the government to accord to civil servants the right of bargaining collectively with the appropriate arms of the government in order to establish hours of work, salaries, holidays and other associated working conditions.

I should like to pay tribute to Canada's public service. I believe there has been developed in this country over the years a civil service which is second to none. I think we have within that service many thousands of citizens who are devoting their talents with, on some occasions, real sacrifice to the public good. I think all members of parliament from time to time should acknowledge the very great service that is being rendered our nation by these our public employees.

I do regret very much that at times there seems to be widespread condemnation of the public service, and regret that hon. members sometimes use words that might be interpreted as a general assault upon the civil service. I should like to take exception to the words of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, because I feel he made rather sweeping charges about our civil service. At one point in his statement he was talking about the former government becoming arrogant, and then went on to say as reported at page 7966 of Hansard for July 12, 1961:

> The whole service had got a little too stuck in that way of doing business. In some respects it had taken on some of the characteristics of its bosses, and a complete change was needed.

I do not think there is any ground whatsoever for such a general accusation. I have had a very moderate amount of business with the civil service, yet have not noticed any change in the attitude of public servants with the change in administration. I think a public servant who is a good public servant before a change in government is an equally good public servant after a change in the administration. Rather than tearing down public servants I think we should acknowledge what is the fact, namely that Canada has built a civil service that is a credit to this nation, a civil service that should be defended by members of parliament.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can inform the committee as to what encouragement in general is being given by the government to bilingualism in the civil service. Statistics have been placed on the record from time to time, and it will not be necessary to repeat them in detail, as to the proportion of civil servants who are bilingual in the various departments. Some of these statistics are contained in the "memoire du conseil de la vie française", which was presented to the standing committee of this house, at pages 7 and 8 of that presentation.

I do not speak this morning to hurl any widespread criticism at this government or any former government, but merely rise to express the point of view that in a nation which is bilingual, with approximately one third of its citizens of French origin, we should be able to give greater recognition to this basic fact than we have been able to do as a nation to date, particularly in respect to the statistics regarding our civil service.

The statistics to which I refer comprise a comparison between 1951 and 1958, showing the changes which have taken place. Whether those changes tend to meet the point I make to some extent, or move further away, they cannot be blamed wholly on this administration, nor am I endeavouring to blame them wholly on the former administration. I should like to know, however, whether the parliamentary secretary can indicate any up to date statistics in respect to the proportion of civil servants of the various departments who are bilingual. I should like to know whether there are statistics available beyond 1958 which establish a trend since that year toward bilingualism among our civil servants.

When the committee met the hon. member for Timiskaming made what I thought was a very constructive suggestion. He suggested that real encouragement should be given to civil servants in all departments, working and resident in all parts of Canada, to become bilingual, and that they should be allowed as part of their working time to take a certain number of hours per week in order to become fluent in the language other than their mother tongue. This kind of program would not only increase bilingualism in Canada but would give Canada's civil servants who are not bilingual an opportunity to acquire this facility in order to better serve our nation.

I should like the parliamentary secretary to inform this committee whether there are any particular plans in existence which the government is now implementing to increase bilingualism in our civil service. I think members of parliament in all parties agree that Canada is a bilingual nation, and I for one feel that French Canadians have a justifiable complaint that their language, particularly in this respect, has not been given the proper consideration by this or by former administrations. I think they are justified in feeling that, whether deliberately or otherwise, there has been discrimination against them.

I think we must recognize that there is a problem, and that all of us should do our best to see that it is dealt with and that there is the kind of equal recognition which I think members of parliament in all parties support. Therefore when I resume my seat I hope the parliamentary secretary can inform the committee now, when we are considering this bill, what plans the government has in hand to increase bilingualism in the civil service.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to the subject that was under discussion between the hon. member for Ottawa West and the parliamentary secretary when I came into the chamber a little while ago. I do so without apology of any kind because, like the parliamentary secretary and perhaps unlike anyone else in the house, I have had some experience of being in the kind of position to which the hon. member for Ottawa West referred.

It is true that when I ceased to be head of the prime minister's office I did not avail myself of any rights I might have had under the Civil Service Act. Neither did the hon. member for Carleton. We both chose to follow a different path or were chosen to follow a different path; I am not sure which way I should put it. While I was head of the prime minister's office for the period from 1945 to 1952, I had the feeling then and even after I went into public life, about which hon. gentlemen opposite may be incredulous, that the Liberal party like all things here below was not going to be eternally in office and that some day some problems would arise in respect of the staffs of ministers' offices. I recognized the feeling of the straight line civil servants—and I think the hon. member for Ottawa West put their concern very clearly—when someone from this "tainted" world in which the hon. member for Carleton and I lived for so long is put into a department and apparently blocks the promotion of a hard working, conscientious public servant.

I also think we should recognize what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out a little while ago, that our government cannot function at all under our system unless ministers, who in these days when the state intervenes to such a degree in every aspect of life have terrible problems and responsibilities, are adequately assisted by competent staffs in their offices because otherwise they cannot do their work well. It is not fair to the people who are to staff these offices—and in fact in this competitive world it will not happen except for a few rare and conscientious people like the hon. member for Carleton and myself—to expect them to stay there very long when they can get more stable and secure positions elsewhere.

I do not count the fact that I stayed so long as evidence of any virtue on my part, because I had a good time when I was in the public service and I enjoyed it, although perhaps I did not have quite as good a time as I have had since then, but a computation was made once, and if I had just remained in the Department of External Affairs—where I was appointed under the merit system, I might say, in 1937—assuming that I would have received normal promotions from 1937 to 1952 and no favouritism my income would have been considerably higher than in fact it was. A friend of mine found that out for me, because I really was not that much interested. I had made the hypothesis one day and he made a computation covering two or three people who had entered the service at the same time I had, and they were all better off. I am not citing this as any virtue, because I think I had a better time than they had. They had to live abroad in other countries while I was able to go on living in Ottawa and doing the things that I enjoyed doing very much.

The real reason I am bringing up this matter is that I think it is essential to the proper functioning of our system of government that ministers have competent staffs, and they will not get them unless there is some provision for a reasonable measure of security for those staffs in the case of a change of government or a change of minister. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West is quite right that security should not be provided in the act for someone who remains in such service for only a couple of years and then leaves because the minister does not get on very well with him. The minister is going to stay on, and it is quite wrong that such a person should be put in a slot in the civil service. If the minister has made a mistake and the person is not suitable, the unsuitable person should not be put in the civil service. That is quite wrong.

But it does seem to me that there should be maximum security consistent with efficiency in the service, which must always be the first consideration, when there is a change of government or a change of minister; because it would be quite unreasonable to expect a new minister to accept all the staff of an out-going minister. It often happens that they do, but they should not be expected to have to do so. One minister does things in one way and another in another way, and they should be able to make such arrangements that they can do their own jobs in the most efficient manner possible.

I also venture to discuss this matter for another reason. I have believed for a long time, long before I came to this side of the house and, indeed, long before I ever entered public life and while I was still a public servant, that it is not merely ministers who need adequate, competent and efficient staffs. I do not think that political parties in opposition which have an essential duty to perform, a duty that has never been more necessary than in recent times, should have to be dependent upon political funds to provide the staff to enable them to do the work they are expected to do in this house. I cannot think of a better expenditure of public moneys.

I may say that I preached this doctrine when I was a minister, and I preached it before I was a minister. I was not able to convince my colleagues, though anyone who will trace the history of the office of leader of the opposition from the time Mr. St. Laurent became prime minister will see that repeated and steady ameliorations were made in that regard. I do not think they were good enough and Mr. St. Laurent knew at the time that I did not think so. Indeed, I am sure he would not in the least mind my saying that on one or two occasions I urged that much more should be done. It is just as important that the staff of the leader of an opposition should be protected and given security as the staffs of ministers. I understand that in the legislation they are, and that is as it should be. I know something about this, too, because I have had some practical experience of this matter. I think the committee might be interested in this. It shows how important it is for us, in carrying out our arrangements in parliament, to have a civilized way of dealing with these problems.

It so happened that some time after the late Gordon Graydon had ceased to be the leader of the opposition he went on one occasion to Mr. St. Laurent and pointed out that he had failed to take certain technical steps which should have been taken to protect the position, under the Civil Service Act, of the successor of my hon. friend from Carleton. At that time I was the head of Mr. St. Laurent's office. Mr. St. Laurent asked me if steps could not be taken, notwithstanding the fact that the law had not in fact been carried out, to make sure that the position was protected.

I am very glad to say that the civil service commission took a very liberal view, if I may use that word, and I insist that it be with a small "l", Mr. Chairman. The commission made a very liberal interpretation of the law and the position was adequately protected. That gentleman, I might add parenthetically, was quite properly devoting a good part of his activities at that time to an effort to overthrow the government then in office, as he should have been doing. Steps were taken to see that his position was adequately protected.

Then came a day some years later when that same gentleman no longer seemed to meet the requirements of his political chief, the then leader of the opposition. I am mentioning no names in relating this incident, but this is what happened. Because the leader of the opposition had not changed and because it was the same man for whom he had been working for some time, technically again he had no rights under the Civil Service Act. However, the matter was brought to the attention of the government of that day. It was brought to the attention of my hon. friend Mr. Harris, and by him to the attention of the prime minister. Again a liberal view was taken. Notwithstanding the technicalities of the act, provision was made in the civil service for that distinguished Canadian who had been for a long time the secretary to the leader of the opposition. Provision was made by the civil service commission with the concurrence and active encouragement of the then minister of citizenship and immigration, Mr. Harris, who provided him with a position in his own department considerably above what the technical requirements of the law would have called for.

Very shortly after this event occurred I succeeded Mr. Harris in that department. I may say that notwithstanding his political affiliation, which had never been concealed and which was never concealed from that time on, he served in that department with the utmost distinction and loyalty. His service could not have been finer. In addition to that he served with the high degree of competence that I am sure he displayed with whoever he served. I had many loyal civil servants—and indeed I never knew of any who were not—in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration when I was the minister. I consider there was none more loyal and few who showed more initiative than the gentleman to whom I am referring.

This is the civilized way to do things. When the government changed, of course, the new administration felt it could use the services of that gentleman in a somewhat more "tainted" way—to use the word I previously used, again with quotation marks—as the hon. member for Carleton and I had served at one time, and he is serving in that way now, no doubt doing his utmost to further the fortunes of the government he is serving, as he should be doing.

I relate this experience because I think it illustrates the civilized way of handling these matters. I do not claim any credit for myself in all this because I was a public servant, I think, when these transactions occurred. Nevertheless the incident I have related illustrates the broad spirit in which Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris viewed these matters. When I hear some of the things that are said about public servants in this house now, I cannot refrain from drawing that contrast.

In that context let me say this, in which I think the hon. member for Assiniboia will be very interested. I do not think what I propose to do is against the rules, because what I should like to read does not relate to the debate we are now having but to something else, though it is extremely pertinent to my remarks. I have in my hand today's Globe and Mail which carries an editorial entitled "The Government and the Establishment" from which I propose to read part of a paragraph. I could read a sentence uncomplimentary to the present government, but I am not going to do that. I shall read just a portion of the editorial which sets out a so-called question of principle or practice. Referring to the present government, the editorial states:

> When it came to power in 1957, it succeeded a Liberal regime which had held office continuously for more than two decades. During that long period the higher, policy making posts of the civil service and the crown agencies, had been filled by men who, while not necessarily political partisans—

I might pause just to recall that two of them were Mr. Justice McTague and Mr. Henry Borden. I continue:

> —were in sympathy with the policies of the King and St. Laurent regimes, and shared their conviction that Canada's economic health depended on the continuance of heavy taxation and tight restrictions on credit and business.

I congratulate the writer for having discerned something that has been very difficult for the Canadian people to discern and with which he deals in the following sentence:

> The Conservatives, by contrast, favoured tax reduction, easier credit, and other policies designed to promote economic expansion.

I must say that anything more ironic, more Alice in Wonderlandish, in relation to what has really happened in the last few weeks, would be exceedingly difficult to imagine. The following is the sentence I particularly wish to draw to the attention of the committee:

> But they found themselves compelled to work through a bureaucracy which was highly sceptical of these ideas and which yearned to maintain its accustomed ways.

I remember very well the days of transition in 1957. After all, I had been, though it was four years before that, for 16 years in the public service of Canada, part of that time in a not altogether obscure position. Of necessity I knew quite intimately most of the senior public servants in this country. After I have made my proposition I would even venture to go so far as to put a direct question to the hon. member for Greenwood, who for a while was a distinguished member of the government. My impression was that in 1957 and 1958, without any exception that I know anything about, public servants—like the people of Canada, I rather suspect to tell the honest truth—had got a little bored with the government that was in office, and rather welcomed the idea of working with new people with fresh ideas. Perhaps I am wrong about that, but I gathered that impression. But I had another impression that was very much stronger, and that was that they were ready and indeed eager to do their duty and to serve their new political chiefs in the same conscientious and forthright manner in which they had served the chiefs they had before June 21, 1957.

I must say that I know of no case in which that was not true. There may have been some ardent partisans among them, but I do not know them. I certainly have never heard of any one of the distinguished public servants of this country who ever attempted in any way to thwart or even to do anything but further the policies of the government of the day. If the government of the day in some circumstances did not have any policies to be furthered, the civil servants could hardly be blamed for that situation. However, as I say, my experience, impression or feeling was that what I have said was true; and that is what the situation should be.

In that context, if I may do so, I should like to quote from a document—I am not sure whether it is immoral or immortal—which has been quoted in this House of Commons already by the right hon. gentleman as an authority for certain conclusions which he drew from it with his usual precision, clarity and that nice capacity for making legal distinctions which sets him apart from his fellow members of the bar. I refer to the Prime Minister's use of this document in another debate, when the Prime Minister used words of mine relating to civil servants about someone who was not a civil servant at all but an officer of parliament and who, according to the Minister of Finance, was responsible to this parliament and not to any political chief, as he had no political chief. That is, of course, the kind of exact, precise, scientific, legal definition the Prime Minister gives to things. That is the way in which the Prime Minister adds so much to our understanding of the correct relationships in our constitution in these days.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I hope the hon. gentleman gets back to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can understand that the parliamentary secretary would much rather I got back to the bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No. I shall be glad to debate that subject at any appropriate time with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: This reference was just parenthetical, Mr. Chairman. The point was that my speech which the Prime Minister did me the honour to quote and to describe as immortal—and I think he exaggerated there—

An hon. Member: You are too modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I had completely forgotten about the speech until the Prime Minister dredged it up. However, I thank him. It is not the first time I have had occasion to thank the Prime Minister for advertising my literary efforts. I thank him again for advertising this one. However, I was talking about civil servants in this speech. I was not talking about officers of parliament who are suppose to be watchdogs to see that we do not have an arbitrary government. I did not expect words applied to civil servants to be taken up, torn out of their context and applied to some thing else entirely.

However, as I say, that is not the kind of argument I make or am seeking to make. What I am seeking to do is to reinforce what I said, namely, that civil servants have certain well defined functions and duties, and that I believe the civil servants of this country, with very few exceptions and none that I know of, have performed their functions in that way.

I should like to quote one or two paragraphs from what I said about this subject. I would not have been so immodest as to do this if the Prime Minister had not cited it as an authority. I would not have thought it was an authority. It was just a fugitive speech that I made when I was invited, as a junior cabinet minister a few months after coming into office, to take part in the opening of the school of public administration at Carleton College. At that time my friend Mr. Coyne was the chairman of the board of governors of that institution. It was for that reason that my friend Mr. Coyne moved the vote of thanks. I am sure that my friend Mr. Coyne would agree completely with everything I said on that occasion, just as much now as he no doubt did then. But this was at an academic institution. Because he thanked me for making the speech he was not expected to endorse my views.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Could we hear something about this bill instead of the history of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): While the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is tending to circle somewhat, I think he is sticking reasonably closely to questions relating to the civil service.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just trying in passing to clear up a few misrepresentations about this speech by a very eminent member of this house. However, I wish to come back to the speech itself. Out of a relatively long experience as a public servant in this country I formed certain impressions which, since the Prime Minister considered they were worthy of note, perhaps might be worth being considered in relation to this bill. In this speech I said—

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before I embark on the quotation perhaps I might call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for luncheon I was referring to this document which the Prime Minister described first as immoral and then as immortal. I do not think it is really deserving of either epithet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never called it immoral.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it was one of those errors of transcription that happen from time to time to the best of us. I was pointing out what the Prime Minister said about this speech. Of course I make no point of this, because the Prime Minister did not have the advantage of having the notes I used. There is nothing to that. The Ottawa Citizen report, which I have since examined, seems to me very fair and accurate, and I make no point of that.

However, what I did make some point of was that the Prime Minister chose to take words that I applied to civil servants and apply them to someone who was not a civil servant. That of course, in my opinion, is not a very accurate argument. I recognize this is not relevant to the present debate, but the Prime Minister did apply what I had to say about civil servants to an officer who has been described over and over again by the Minister of Finance as an officer of parliament responsible to parliament, in the same general category as the chief electoral officer, the Auditor General and those other people who are not servants of the government.

My speech referred to those people who are servants of the government, who are servants of the government of the day, under the discipline of the government of the day and having an obligation to the government of the day. Since the Prime Minister seemed to think there was some merit in what I had said, I thought I should put on the record just two or three paragraphs of what I did say on that occasion, because I do think it is very relevant to this bill, which deals with the civil service of Canada; which deals with those officials who are servants of the government and not servants of parliament or servants of crown companies.

With respect, if I may be permitted—and if anyone takes exception I will not do it, sir—to make a parenthesis with respect to the servants of crown companies, I think the original jurisprudence in this matter was established by Mr. Arthur Meighen in a very remarkable speech he made in this house in 1920; a speech with which, I may say, the Liberal party disagreed at that time but subsequently came round to accepting as the sound doctrine in relation to the C.N.R. and which every government up until very recent times has always accepted as a sound doctrine, and which I think is a sound doctrine.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Those conversions will happen in other things as well.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, they do. We have had quite a history of conversions of one kind and another in this country. I think the hon. member for Carleton is, as he is wont to do, seeking to lead me away from the bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I should not yield to his seductions or temptations or whatever word he would like to apply, but should stick really strictly to this large and growing but limited class of persons who are genuine civil servants, who are and are expected to be, and have a duty to be, the servants of the government of the day; who are not, like the Auditor General, appointed to see that public funds are not misappropriated by the government; or who are not, like the governor of the Bank of Canada, appointed to see there is not inflation in secret by the government or who are not, like the chief electoral officer, appointed to see that elections are not run in the interests of a particular party. These are the necessary checks and balances that the Prime Minister and others of his associates used to talk about some years ago when they were on this side of the house, that are essential to the proper working of a constitutional system, as opposed to a notion that seems to be current in some minds, judging from some of the speeches I have heard from behind me, and perhaps from, in front of me, that if you can get a majority you can do anything you like. That is not our system.

Mr. Grafftey: No; there is no pipe line philosophy in this party.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I say, there is a constant tendency in the committee to divert me from what I am trying so hard to say. I come back to that group of people who are civil servants under the Civil Service Act. I had something to say about their responsibilities, and that in my view their responsibilities were very large. Perhaps I could just quote from this document. I said:

In the first place—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member has come to the end of his time. Perhaps it would be agreeable to the committee for the hon. member to quote the three paragraphs he mentioned. I do not wish to interrupt him in the middle of quoting those paragraphs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the suggestion you have made is acceptable to the committee. In any event, now that I have intervened the hon. gentleman may go on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. I do not necessarily have to recognize the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as the next speaker. Is it agreed that the Chair's suggestion be followed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the indulgence and the good humour of the committee, which perhaps is a nice interlude compared with some of our proceedings in recent times. I was just going to quote two or three paragraphs from this speech. I said this about civil servants:

> In the first place they owe loyal and zealous service to their political chief—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not put it all on the record so we will have the complete benefit of all the views of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I cannot really regard the Prime Minister's suggestion that my mind was limited to this document as flattering, nor do I really think the right hon. gentleman thinks quite so badly of me. Perhaps I will follow the right hon. gentleman's example and quote only selected passages.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I meant the entire quotation, as I remember it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said:

> In the first place they owe loyal and zealous service to their political chief so long as he enjoys the confidence of parliament. If they cannot give such service, even when they disagree with the policy, they are not entitled to feel they are doing their whole duty.
> I know this can sometimes be hard, but it is sometimes hard, too, for individual ministers with strong wills and convictions to give loyal support to all the policies of the government they belong to—and yet that, too, is their duty under our system.

It is this next paragraph to which I attach great importance as a statement of the theory on which our system of government in this field, so far as the civil service is concerned, is based:

> I do not think this means—or should mean—that a public servant should not honestly tell his political chief that he believes such and such a policy will have such and such bad or unfortunate effects, nor that he should not give him the full benefit of his ideas, his advice and his suggestions about policy if and when they are desired.
> I believe a public servant should do his utmost to keep his political chief out of difficulties. But a public servant also has to learn that he does not make the final decisions and that the good public administrator takes his full responsibility but also knows precisely where it stops.

It was in that context and in relation to that paragraph that I also made the other semi-facetious observation which the Prime Minister quoted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would you read on?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the next one is the semi-facetious observation which the Prime Minister quoted and which, I understand, when I was down at the railway station seeing my family off to Newfoundland yesterday, was the subject of some discussion here in the house.

> One way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard.

I was a civil servant for 16 years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Then that, certainly, did not apply to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: This may throw some light on my character. It may be there are uncharitable members of this house on both sides who would be inclined to say that after 16 years of repression I seem to have been seeking to get over that repression. The fact of the matter is that for 16 years, after spending eight years expressing my views to audiences which paid to listen to me at the University of Manitoba, I was in the public service, and I think in the course of those 16 years I never made any public utterance of any kind which was reported in the press. To the best of my recollection I did not. I believe that on one occasion I read a paper to a club called the history club of the United College of the University of Manitoba. I think there were some people there besides the members of the club. But I do not think the address was reported in any newspaper and to the best of my recollection during those 16 years, while I may have expressed myself with a certain warmth at times in private—if I did not admit that I am afraid the hon. member for Essex East might rise to correct me, because he knew me in those days—my views were never expressed in public, although once or twice there was a little provocation.

These are really the only paragraphs I wanted to read. I wished to read them because it seems to me that therein lies the essence of the proper relationship between a civil servant—that is to say one who is a servant of the government, not one who is a servant of parliament—and the government. However, I think there is a corollary, and if the committee is inclined to be tolerant of me for three more sentences I should like to state that corollary. It is this. If civil servants should keep their views to themselves—and they should; if they should not make pronouncements about public policy—and in my opinion they should not—it follows equally that civil servants should not be blamed, as the Globe in its editorial of today sought to do, for the deficiencies of their political chiefs. If the political chief is to be the sole spokesman, he alone is responsible, and he is responsible for the deficiencies of the civil servants as well as for his own deficiencies. That is the essence of our system of government.

I am not suggesting for one minute that this view has not been accepted by everyone on the treasury benches, but I do hear from time to time from certain hon. members who have not had long experience in this house the view that the government cannot be blamed for this or that because of all these wicked civil servants who will not let the government do what it wants to do. That is only a condemnation of a government; it is not a condemnation of the civil service. This, to me, is the essential point, and it is the point I have been seeking, perhaps with a few diversions, here and there, to make.

Mr. Martineau: We have been treated to a most entertaining discourse from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pertaining to what I think I can describe as his philosophy, his approach, his attitude in regard to the relationship between public servants—

Mr. Pickersgill: Civil servants.

Mr. Martineau: I said "public servants". The hon. member says "civil servants".

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a difference.

Mr. Martineau: —and the government. I know the committee wishes to be entirely fair to the hon. member, and I think the only way we could be entirely fair to him would be to put on record as far as possible the entire thinking of the hon. member on the subject of this important relationship. The hon. member, with a modesty which I can only describe as being truly Pickersgillian, if I may be permitted to coin a phrase, chose to read only certain specific passages from the immortal address—I think he will agree that if it was not immortal before, it is immortal now—which he gave to the students at Carleton College on October 23, 1953, and which was reported in the Citizen the following day. There is a good deal in his address of which all of us can approve, and that is why it should be put on the record—I am serious in saying this—if I am permitted to do so. The headline reads "Pickersgill Opens New Carleton College Building". The report is as follows:

> Marking a significant milestone in the history of Carleton College, Secretary of State J. W. Pickersgill yesterday officially opened a new school of public administration.

Now begins the report of the address:

> State Secretary Pickersgill said it was impossible to be a good public servant without understanding and respecting the fundamental facts of Canadian nationhood—

The point I wish to stress at this particular moment is that the hon. member is referring to public servants at large, not to civil servants in a restricted sense.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair. I imagine I knew what I was talking about, or what I intended to say, and in any event I think the context shows what I meant, because every time I referred to public servants I also referred to their political chiefs. That speech comprehended only those public servants who have political chiefs, that is to say, those who are in a department having a political head. I want to make it very clear that that is the kind of public servant—a civil servant, in other words—to which I was referring in the whole of that speech.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, my very purpose in being on my feet is to be fair to the hon. member. I wish to be fair to him in every way. The hon. member has given the committee a certain interpretation of what was said, of what is here in black and white. That is his interpretation. No one denies that that is his interpretation. Other hon. members are equally free to take whatever interpretation they might like to take from the written words. Scripta manent. The report continues:

> —the fact that recognition of two official languages and two systems of jurisprudence is embedded in our constitution and the fact the nation began by tolerating two distinct but closely related cultures.

That is good. Then this article continues:

> "If we are to have a good and well balanced public service in Canada, recruits must be drawn from both those original elements of our population and also from those newer elements which have been added to it", said Mr. Pickersgill.
>
> One thing Mr. Pickersgill did not conceive the new school as an institution which would be much concerned with the methods and techniques of public administration.
> Referring to his own experience the secretary of state declared, "I know that there are those who would disagree violently with this view—some people already have, including the chairman of the board of governors of one of our most respectable universities—

I do not know whether at that time he was referring to the chairman of the board of governors who happened to be presiding at that meeting and who thanked the hon. member following his speech. However, that is only a remark in passing.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact I will clear up that point right now. It was not that particular chairman, and, to tell the truth, I have completely forgotten which one it was.

Mr. Martineau: Be that as it may, it is immaterial in this particular construction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Martineau: The article then continues:

—but I am vain enough to believe I was a good public servant."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Such vanity.

Mr. Martineau: There is nothing like patting one's own back, and no doubt it was a deserved tribute which the hon. member made to none other than himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: No doubt.

Mr. Martineau: The article then continues:

His experience had shown him there were certain essential qualities of a good public administrator.

First of these was "the constant and unfailing realization that he is the servant and not the master of the public."

Mr. Chairman, were truer words ever spoken?

Mr. Pickersgill: That applies to ministers as well.

Mr. Martineau: And coming from the oracle—I was going to say illusive oracle, but perhaps I should say the evasive oracle, inasmuch as the oracle in this particular case is sort of invisible. We cannot see this oracle, we can just sense its presence.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He called himself a fugitive this morning.

Mr. Martineau: Yes, perhaps a fugitive oracle would be the better description. Now, Mr. Chairman, we must not forget the second or any other part of this very impressive speech. It continues as follows:

The second was a proper appreciation of the limits of the public servant's responsibility.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw attention to the fact that there is no mention here of civil servants and public servants and the distinctions that may occur, but twice in the matter of a few passages the term "public servant" is applied.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Martineau: I seem to recall—I believe it was the hon. member, but if it was not it was certainly an hon. member sitting close to him—some of the members of the opposition saying during some of their more lofty flights of eloquence in a recent debate that a certain governor of the Bank of Canada was precisely not a civil servant but a public servant. That exact phrase which the hon. member used in this address was there applied. The article then continues:

"Under our system of responsible parliamentary government, public servants are not expected to take the responsibility for the policies they carry out—that is the responsibility of the politician and in my experience most politicians are ready to take it," Mr. Pickersgill said.

He should know, because at that time he happened to be secretary of state.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was a heavy responsibility.

Mr. Martineau: The article then continues:

However, senior civil servants did owe loyal and zealous service to the political chief so long as he enjoyed the confidence of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the portion I read.

Mr. Martineau: The article then continues:

"If they cannot give such service, even when they disagree with the policy, they are not entitled to feel they are doing their whole duty," he said.

That did not mean, in his opinion, that a public servant should not honestly tell his political chief that a policy would have bad or unfortunate effects. Nor did it mean he should not give his political chief the full benefit of his ideas, his advice and his suggestions if and when they were desired.

"After all you want all the man's brains, not half of them," commented Mr. Pickersgill.

"One way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard."

Mr. Pickersgill defined public administration as "the art of reducing a vast chaos of human relationships into some kind of order but it does not consist in my view of reducing human society to mechanical uniformity."

The state secretary said, "In public administration mere technical efficiency is no substitute for an understanding heart, but an understanding heart must be supplemented by a well furnished and inquiring mind."

Those are words of wisdom which no one will deny. That is the full report of the speech made by the then secretary of state, now the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the then member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Martineau: And the then hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. There is only one further mention of the eminent gentleman in the report, and I think it is a fitting epilogue to the quotation. It reads as follows:

Mr. Pickersgill was introduced by Dr. MacFarlane and thanked by J. E. Coyne, chairman of the board of governors.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may be permitted, although I know it is not quite according to the rules, to thank the hon. member for giving this additional publicity to my modest effort of another day.

Mr. Martineau: I accept the hon. member's thanks.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I will not need to seek unanimous consent to make a long speech, because I only have a few brief remarks to make.

Some members on the government side referred yesterday to the content of clause 47 of the bill, which deals with bilingual employees within the civil service. I commend those who referred to that clause and I join them in expressing satisfaction over the fact that it provides that a person hired by the civil service shall be sufficiently bilingual——to enable the department or local office to perform its functions adequately and to give effective service to the public.

I also commend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who stated this morning that there were too few bilingual employees in the civil service.

In fact, I should like to describe a small experiment that illustrates how true it is that in various divisions, no thought is given to hiring bilingual employees.

In the first place, one needs only look at the unilingual telephone directory that every hon. member has in his office to find that in any division, there are very few employees with a French name, and that only a very small number of employees can answer in French.

Last year, I brought this fact to the attention of the minister of trade and commerce, who is now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill). I asked him, on June 16, how many bilingual employees there were in the small business division. At the time, the minister replied that there were several employees but that he did not know the exact number. I then asked him how many spoke French. He replied that there was only one.

For my own information, I called up Miss Torontow of the small business division in the Department of Trade and Commerce. I spoke to her in French, and asked her whether she knew if there were some lectures given on small business on the occasion of certain visitors being in the capital. She answered "What did you say?" And I repeated my question: "Do you know whether some lectures are being given in French on the subject of small business for the benefit of those who visit the capital?" And she replied: "I don't understand." I asked her then: "Are you bilingual?" And she answered: "Yes." Then I asked her: "Can you answer me in French?" And she said: "No." I asked further: "What other language do you speak?" She replied: "A little of all, but not much of each."

Mr. Chairman, the experience I had with Miss Torontow is inacceptable to Canadians who are asking for bilingualism in the various departments. And when the Minister of Trade and Commerce states that there is one person speaking French in the small business division, while that person scarcely knows two or three words of that language, I believe that he not only scorns bilingualism, but also this House of Commons, because he is giving wrong information, without checking the facts.

Before resuming my seat, I want to mention another aspect of the present situation, as we are discussing the Civil Service Act.

In the past, it was the Secretary of State who had the privilege of introducing this bill in the house. I do not know why this year the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), who is from the province of Quebec, was deprived of the pleasure or the honour of introducing this bill, because we must keep in mind that the Secretary of State is the minister responsible to the House of Commons for the civil servants.

At this time when we are considering the Civil Service Act, the Secretary of State is not even in his seat. This morning, when it was announced that the house would examine that act, the Secretary of State left the house and he has not come back yet.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it is a shame that the Secretary of State should not participate in the examination of this bill. He is the one who answers for the civil service before parliament and he should be here to discuss matters relating to the civil service commission.

I am most surprised that the introduction of this bill has again been entrusted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). It is always the Minister of Finance who introduces legislation. He seems to be the only competent minister on the opposite side. Yet, he has made so many blunders recently that he should have been relieved of the introduction of the Civil Service Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to stress the point that we, from the province of Quebec, just like the members from the other provinces, are most surprised to see the small role the Secretary of State is called upon to play, that prerogatives are taken away from him and given to the Minister of Finance—indeed not even to the Minister of Finance, since he is not here, but to his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Bell) who is piloting this bill in the house.

We are surprised, to say the least. When section 47 purports to be favourable to French-Canadian employees, the French-Canadian ministers should be allowed to play their role in this house, if minorities and bilingualism are to be respected here.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I have a right to rise on a point of order. I have just one word to say—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, but the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) has the floor.

Mr. Martineau: —in reply to certain remarks the hon. member has just made—

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. Is the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister raising a point of order?

Mr. Martineau: Yes, I am raising a point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Then he should address his point of order to the Chair and not to the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Martineau: I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I was addressing the Chair. I referred to the hon. member in the third person; therefore I was addressing the Chair. I am sorry if the chairman did not understand because I happened to be speaking in French, but I was addressing the Chair. The point I am trying to make is that the hon. member stated that this bill comes under the administrative duties of the Secretary of State. My point of order is this—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. That seems to me to be a point of debate and the hon. member can make that point in due course. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Martineau: Respectfully, Mr. Chairman, it is not a point of order. It is simply a point of fact that when the Civil Service Act was first introduced in 1918 it was introduced by the acting minister of finance.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The parliamentary secretary can make his point in debate in the normal way, but it is not a point of order as he himself has said.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I too should like to pay a tribute at this time to what I think and what I am sure all hon. members of this house will agree is a civil service of which we can be most proud. I am especially proud, when I think that Canada has not yet reached its hundredth birthday, that over the years since 1867, the year of confederation, we have developed such a fine civil service. I am sure I am not the only member of the house who is most proud of that fact. I am happy to see the parliamentary secretary in the house today taking a great interest in these proceedings. No member has done more than the hon. member for Carleton to advance the real interests of our fine civil service in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Except the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Grafftey: I am sure my very good friend from Bonavista-Twillingate will be happy to hear that I intend to be very brief, but in my brief remarks I should simply like to say that since confederation Canada, as we all know, has gone through many so-called emergency periods which included two world wars. In Canada, as in so many other countries in the western world, simply by reason of the natural force of sociological, economic and political events, our civil service became bigger and bigger. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the difference between the treatment of the civil service by the present administration in the years 1957 and 1958 and the treatment accorded to the civil service in 1935. I will deal with that very briefly.

Mr. Pickersgill: 1931 to 1935?

Mr. Grafftey: I should simply like to say this. I am not pretending to speak for my party at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Wise man.

Mr. Grafftey: I have not consulted other members. I have not been so presumptuous, but I wish to advance my own personal opinion on the floor of the house this afternoon. I know that members on both sides of the house will have different opinions on this matter. Toward the end of the 22-year rule of the last administration I think a very bad thing happened, and certainly in my own mind I have established a general rule.

Along the opposition front bench today the only real House of Commons man, to my way of thinking, is the hon. member for Essex East. What happened toward the end of that 22 years of Liberal rule which I do not think aided the morale or spirit of a truly independent civil service? We saw the Leader of the Opposition come from the top hierarchy of external affairs right into the active arena of politics. We saw the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who served in the office of the prime minister, do the same thing. Civil servants in that office are meant to be steadfast and independent, if any should be, ready at all times to serve all prime ministers of all political parties. Where did he go? He went right from that high position into the active political arena.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he considers that I am not steadfast and not independent.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, I have never been a person with too much respect for people who plead humility all the time, and I think, as he himself does, that undoubtedly the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a capable and loyal civil servant. But I am now talking about a general principle which I feel in my heart of hearts hurt the system. What else did we have near the end of 22 years of Liberal rule? The hon. member for Laurier went from being an active politician to the seaway commission, and then all around the circle and back again. I am not going to be irresponsible and make irresponsible attacks. I am sure when these gentlemen were in the civil service they were loyal public servants. But what I am saying most emphatically is that the present administration is today trying to correct the bad confusion which was created in the public mind at that time, not only among civil servants but among the public generally.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that the distinguished parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance himself was a civil servant?

Mr. Grafftey: I am quite aware that the hon. member worked in a minister's office—

Mr. Pickersgill: As I did.

Mr. Grafftey: As the hon. member did, but I do not know whether he was a civil servant in the strict sense of the word. I believe he was secretary to the minister of national revenue at that time, and I may be subject to correction here but I do not believe he was a civil servant in the strictest sense of the word.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And then to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Grafftey: And then to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Still a civil servant.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): A public servant.

Mr. Grafftey: I realize only too well that we have not the same system here as there is in the United States, where they recognize the separation of powers theory. But I do say this, and I say it emphatically; that parliamentary democracy only works well when you have a clear cut division between administrative and legislative duties. At the end of that 22 year reign the people from one end of this country to the other were not making irresponsible attacks on these fine civil servants about whom I am talking, but they were making attacks upon what they called bureaucracy; not bureaucracy caused by the civil servants but caused by an administration which delegated to them tasks which they should never have had in the first place. This procedure was involved in those numerous orders in council, and it was caused by the leadership of the government of the day when so many of them did not see this clear-cut division which is so important in our democratic parliamentary process.

Let us compare, for instance, what is going on in Canada today with what went on in the United States not so many years ago. We had a very fine general enter into the arena of partisan politics and trespass upon the jurisdiction of the President of the United States. However, that general knew what he was doing. I ask hon. members to compare that with what is going on in this country today. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, has been charged, for example, with advising the governor of the Bank of Canada. I do not think it is necessary for the discussion of the principle which I am putting forward to become involved in a detailed debate as to whether or not a public servant has a responsibility to the government of the day or to parliament. Perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not think there was anything wrong in advising the governor of the Bank of Canada to take certain action, or advise him how he should write his various releases.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I have already twice denied in this house that I had anything to do with the writing of those statements by the governor of the Bank of Canada. I do not really believe that repeated statements of that sort should be permitted, making it necessary for an hon. member to get up in his place—

Mr. Tremblay: That is true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course it is true; I have no intention of making anything of this or protesting because it is true. I said it once, and I do think that statement should be accepted.

Mr. Grafftey: I certainly accept the statement of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is an honourable man, and I accept exactly what he said. He said he had nothing to do with the writing of the speeches—

Mr. Pickersgill: The statements.

Mr. Grafftey: —the statements—and I only made the general remark that he had a lot to do with advising the governor on his course of action. That is a very different thing.

Mr. Tardif: Where did you hear that?

The Chairman: On the point which was raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I must indicate that hon. members are bound to accept the statement made by an hon. member concerning matters which are within the personal knowledge of that hon. member. That is the first point. On the second point, may I say that even if what the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was saying was relevant to the debate, he should not revive a debate which has been concluded.

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to thank the Chair for directing me in such an able fashion. I am using these specific examples to give to the House of Commons my personal ideas on how important it is, in this day and age, that the voice of the people be heard in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: I simply say that I have used specific instances to point up the general idea that the administration I support understands what is meant by the voice of the people.

Mr. Denis: Prove it.

Mr. Grafftey: It may be that I am going far afield from the subject of this debate, but I believe my remarks are germane. When I talk about the rights of parliament I am not making an irresponsible attack on these fine civil servants. When I talk about the rights of parliament as opposed to administrative control, I believe I am talking about a real principle involved in the discussion this afternoon.

I noticed the hon. member for Essex East applaud but, as I said before, he is a House of Commons man. However, other hon. members opposite, time and time again, have said that the backbenchers on this side do not get up and express their point of view very often. I say they do. Just look at the Hansard index and you will see that it is the same old four horsemen who speak for the opposition, with the occasional interjection from the rear.

In concluding my remarks I should like to bring before this committee the fact that this administration is determined to preserve the rights of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: It is determined that the voice of the people will be heard.

Mr. Habel: When did you get prompted?

Miss LaMarsh: Let us go to the people, and we will see.

Mr. Grafftey: I am sure that in their hearts not too many hon. members opposite are happy to see an appointed official giving testimony before a non-elected body.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member permit a question? In view of what he has just said, will he explain why he supported a government that denied us in this House of Commons the right to have a House of Commons committee deal with the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Grafftey: I expressed my views on that matter.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Grafftey: We are now in the realm of a past debate, and I expressed my views during that debate last week. This is the answer.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Grafftey: Not once did hon. members opposite express one question that they would ask in such a committee that they did not ask on the floor of the House of Commons. I think that answers the question. Again, I would simply say that this administration is drawing the line, between parliamentary rights and administrative control, a line that must be drawn if parliamentary democracy is to function in the proper way. This line was glazed over by the past administration, and legislators became administrators and then in turn became legislators again. One day a man would be loyal to the administration and the next day he would plunge into the arena of partisan politics.

An hon. Member: You should have stayed in your crib.

Mr. Grafftey: I hear an hon. member say that I should have stayed in my crib. I suppose that is another reference to my youth.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. member young?

Mr. Grafftey: As I look at hon. members opposite I understand their chagrin over the fact that the young people of the nation are not following their leadership.

Miss LaMarsh: In making his last few remarks it appeared, at least, that the hon. member looked in my general direction. I should like to say on a matter of privilege that when it comes to youth I will not take a back seat to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, I will be the first to admit that a series of diversions have turned us away from the pith and substance of this debate. I can also assure hon. members opposite that over the last 10 minutes I have tried to terminate this speech on a matter of principle. That principle is simply this. This administration is going to restore this line of division, a line of division that was made not too clear by the past administration when legislators invaded the administrative wing of government and vice versa. We all know what is going on in the country today. These are principles that should be stated and restated.

An hon. Member: It is too late.

Mr. Grafftey: I intend to state and restate them both inside and outside of this House of Commons.

Mr. Habel: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Habel: Will the hon. member tell us whether it was not the Prime Minister who promised to do away with the rule of closure? Has he done so?

Mr. Grafftey: As I understand the question, it was whether it was not the Prime Minister—

The Chairman: Order. I think I should not allow the hon. member to reply to a question which is really not relevant and which would take us far away from the bill. I do not think the question was relevant to the general theme the hon. member was trying to develop.

Mr. Habel: In fact, Mr. Chairman. I should say that the question was certainly relevant to the speech made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

(Translation):

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to answer an attack which I would call underhanded launched by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) against the Secretary of State, who is not in the house at this time because of other duties.

Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has never taken the trouble to study the background of the bill now before the committee. He has therefore failed to realize that it seeks to amend the Civil Service Act which was introduced in 1918 by the then acting minister of finance, Mr. A. K. MacLean, which indicates that the Civil Service Act is properly the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. As to the Secretary of State, he is only the spokesman for the civil service commission in this house.

It is therefore quite appropriate for the Minister of Finance or his representative, the parliamentary secretary, to pilot this measure through the house.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. When the parliamentary secretary of the Prime Minister says my attack was underhanded, he is of course using an expression that was quite popular in Quebec in the days of the Union Nationale. I have never been underhanded.

I will say to my hon. friend, who looks upon himself as a fountain of knowledge, that I knew the civil service bill had been introduced in 1918.

However, my hon. friend apparently does not know that for several years secretaries of state have made it a point to be present in the house and to take part in discussions on the Civil Service Act.

I think my hon. friend should know that in 1918, the secretary of state department did not exist. Perhaps my hon. friend is not aware of it, but that responsibility was entrusted to the secretary of state around 1930. I think I am giving now a lesson to the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister who does not seem to know what happened in the past. I think it was only in 1930 or thereabout, that the secretary of state began to look after the civil service commission. From that time on, the secretary of state has been responsible to the house for the civil service commission.

My hon. friend says that I was underhanded with regard to the Secretary of State. Not at all.

We have now been studying this bill for two days. The Secretary of State was present yesterday. He was in this house during the question period today. But the very minute the discussion of the civil service bill was announced, which should interest him first and foremost, he left the house.

Mr. Pigeon: That is dishonest.

Mr. Dupuis: I object to that and protest against such an attitude.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member does not seem to know that the Department of the Secretary of State is one of our oldest departments.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) just said I was dishonest. I am asking him to retract that epithet, which suits him better than me.

Mr. Pigeon: When the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) stated that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), the Secretary of State, had left the house, he was dishonest because that is not true.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I was in the house and so were all the other members who are present at this time, and I would ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to withdraw the word "dishonest" he used when he spoke about me.

The Chairman: Order. I was just going to tell the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that he must not use that word and ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the word but I should like to say that the hon. member has been unfair to the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm showed a want of tact, as usual.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I have a very important announcement to make. I am not going to talk about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am not going to read his speeches. I am going to ignore them because it seems to me that this afternoon we have been in great danger of making the publicity of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the chief subject of discussion. Indeed, he indicated that himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not start it, though.

An hon. Member: You encouraged it.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to make two or three brief remarks about the civil service. I wish first of all to say a word about the committee and its proceedings. I was glad of what the hon. member for Ottawa East said. It is true that we really endeavoured to discuss in good temper, regardless of party, the questions which came before us. I am sorry to say that it remained for a member of this House of Commons who was not on the committee to refer to second class citizens, the juggling of wages, etc.

If there ever was a time when the subject matter was considered seriously, the subject matter being the welfare of the civil service, I think it was in that committee. I am glad to think that we are now going to have a chance to discuss it here in the same temper.

We were fortunate in having the hon. member for Carleton, the hon. member for Ottawa East and the hon. member for Ottawa West on the committee. They have, I think in very special degree, a knowledge of the ways and workings of the civil service, and we had the great advantage of their assistance.

I should like to read just a sentence from the report of the Heeney committee, pointing out briefly and accurately the tremendous change in the civil service since this act was passed more than forty years ago. It states as follows:

> 15. During this period—i.e. since the act of 1918—and particularly since the 30's, the functions of the public servant have undergone a significant transformation. Fifty years ago, nearly all employees in most federal government departments could be classified, with reasonable accuracy, as clerks, for most were engaged in routine clerical work. Today, the public servant may be scientist, medical doctor, meteorologist, film maker, etc.—

I think we need to remember that when we are considering the problems of allowing people into the service. The difficulties of selection, of course, are great. The question of educational equipment is, of course, all important. I think there is a danger that we should come to regard technical efficiency as the whole story. I do not believe it is the whole story. Particularly as you rise to the top of the civil service I think you need people with what I can only describe as general human capacity wisdom and a broad view of things. I would therefore say that in our selection we should have regard not only to technical matters but to other matters as well. I should like to say one word about the situation which has obviously arisen with the expansion of the duties and the qualifications of civil servants. I refer to the relationship between what is done by government—and we expect it to do so much more than formerly—and private enterprise. I think it is from the happy relationship of those two fields that the most successful and efficient operation of our economy will come.

Years ago I happened to see a good deal of the functioning of the department of mines of the Ontario government. I saw there what I thought was a very happy illustration of the fullest co-operation between the government and the private individual. That department carried on a great deal of scientific work. It had conducted surveys of the whole potential mining area and had indicated where the likely areas for prospecting were situated. They had carried out an enormous amount of useful work. But it was the hard boiled prospectors taking a chance, perhaps 100 to 1 against them, using that technical information and going in with the impulse of private initiative who, let us say, took to the ultimate the work which had been done in the department and discovered the mines.

I like to think of that because at the present time it seems we are sometimes not very clear as to the relationship between public and private services, and it seems to me also that in that we had a very good illustration. I do not propose to say any more at this time, Mr. Chairman. We will be dealing with various matters as they come up item by item and I will reserve any further comments until later.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief words to say on this interesting bill because the civil service in relation to government, in relation to industry and in relation to the public as a whole has been an interesting study of mine throughout the years. It is one of those studies one undertakes when there is not something more pressing.

As I understand it this bill is based on the civil service commission report of 1958 and replaces, generally speaking, the Civil Service Act of 1918. I believe it is generally satisfactory. I followed the work of the committee and I think that regardless of party the committee is entitled to the commendation of the house for carrying on this lengthy study of a very important piece of legislation. There is one clause of this bill in particular in which this group is very interested. We believe further measures should be provided in recognition of the principles of collective bargaining. However, I will have more to say about that subject when we come to discussion of the various clauses of the bill.

There are many people in the country who fail to realize the great importance of the civil service of Canada. Our civil service has made a great contribution to the welfare of the state in war and in peace. It performs essential, valuable and faithful service to the nation at this time. But there are changing circumstances in our society because of increasing industrialization and the widening activities of government which make the responsibilities of the civil service different from what they were some decades ago.

I think it is of increasing importance that we should recognize the necessity of having an efficient and loyal civil service. For that efficiency to be maintained and for that loyalty to prevail we must have circumstances and working conditions that will maintain a high morale in the civil service. I believe we have to give the civil service justice in two particular fields. First of all there must be justice to all applicants. All persons who apply for positions in the civil service must have confidence in the fairness of the examinations and the fairness of the allocation to positions, and things of that sort.

Second there must be a sense of security in their employment and also in their retirement, as compensation for long and faithful service. They must have this security to compensate them for the opportunities which exist in private industry and which in some respects are lacking in the civil service. Civil servants should have the same freedom, with economic equality, as industry: We in this group believe they should have a greater opportunity to practice the principles of collective bargaining, but as I said before, we will leave the discussion of that particular question until we deal with further clauses of the bill.

I have always been particularly interested in the protection of the rights of the civil servant as a Canadian citizen; in particular in political activity. We think that when a civil servant has that right it indicates a mature and highly developed nationhood and civilization. This problem is one that has concerned some of the parliaments of Europe, and particularly the parliament of Great Britain, for a number of years. In Great Britain they have been able to resolve a number of these questions which are still unresolved in somewhat newer nations such as ours.

In Great Britain they have accepted certain basic principles and certain practices as a result of debates in the House of Commons, as a result of reports of several committees which made a careful study of this question, as a result of experience with a developing civil service and as a result of public opinion.

I think we could very well follow with interest what has happened, particularly in Great Britain, in making provision for the greater majority of civil servants to participate in politics without in any way being questioned as to their loyalty to the government and the proper carrying out of their duties.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I wish to quote a few paragraphs from a book written by Harold J. Laski, who is well known as a professor at the London school of economics. This book is entitled "Reflections on the Constitution". Professor Laski deals fully with civil servants, both at the administrative and other levels. He deals with their economic rights and their political rights. I wish to quote briefly from this work because I believe Professor Laski makes some rather cogent remarks on this question.

I shall refer, first, to page 188 of this book. I might say, Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to see I have the rapt attention of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I am sure he is as interested in this subject as I am.

Mr. Brunsden: May I assure the hon. member that he has my undivided attention.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the question.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: You are a bit optimistic, old boy; I have not finished yet. Mr. Chairman, I wish to quote from page 188. This is a chapter entitled, "The political rights and social interests of civil servants". Professor Laski says:

I should like to begin by saying at once that the report of the Masterman committee seems to me a woeful and timid document, built on a distrust of the honesty and loyalty of many hundred thousand civil servants who have given many years' proof that this distrust is utterly without justification.

This report was rather timid with respect to granting political rights to civil servants, but that situation has since changed.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member used the term "social rights". Will the hon. member define those rights? We understand political rights, but what are social rights?

Mr. Herridge: I think those are very easily described. They are all those rights which any Canadian citizen is entitled to enjoy in our society. I do not resent the intervention of the hon. member for Medicine Hat because it gives him the opportunity to make one of his infrequent speeches.

The author of this book goes on to say:

Above all, I believe it is a great mistake to separate the vast majority of officials from work in local government where, very often, their experience of administration would enable them to make an important contribution to the standards of administration.

In Great Britain and other western European countries, civil servants, that is, servants of the federal or state government, shall we say, take a very active part in politics at municipal and other levels. The author says:

In the French system, a great many civil servants, of whom, perhaps the best known among those living is that eminent humanist, Mr. Leon Blum—

Of course, Mr. Blum has died since this was written.

—have played their part in politics without any deterioration in their work; and I have known scores of lesser cases in which the official's political affiliation was both active and known without producing the conviction that he would not be loyal to a minister whose convictions were of a different school.

That is the sort of thing we have to learn in this country. We have to recognize that right, and have that trust. Mr. Laski goes on to say:

Perhaps I may summarize this by saying that when an official has strong political opinions he could not conceal them from anyone but the most stupid of ministers—

I hope they are listening over there.

—for more than the first hour of their relationship, and the real question was, and is, granted those convictions was he capable of looking at the minister's views with detachment and of helping him to apply them with the full energy of his mind. The answer is sometimes yes, and sometimes no. Sir Austen Chamberlain, in his autobiography, tells an admirable story of the permanent secretary of the post office—

That is the same as our deputy minister.

—when he was postmaster general. They quarrelled violently over a decision Sir Austen proposed to make until at last he told his official that he had made up his mind that the decision stood. Thereupon, Sir Austen tells us, his permanent secretary said, "Well, postmaster general, if you want to make a damned fool of yourself, I cannot prevent you from doing so. But at least I can show you how to do it with the least possible damage to the country".

My, what a lot members of the government could learn from that attitude toward public life.

That is what I mean by loyalty and detachment, and I think they are qualities quite distinct from political convictions and party preferences.

Then the author goes on:

First, it is clear that all members of the administrative class should impose upon themselves a self denying ordinance in the political sphere. They ought to resign if they want to be candidates for parliament. They ought not to make political speeches. They ought not to write books or articles on the immediate issues of political controversy. They are too near the centre of power to do any of these things.

That is the practice in Great Britain. Administrative officials do not take part in politics. Apart from members of the administration class, officials can run for election, attach themselves to the party which they adopt, make speeches and take part in political campaigns. Then, continuing, Mr. Laski says:

Assuming that the average civil servant observes the normal decencies of political behaviour, I am unable to believe that the liberation of the grades below the administrative would shock any public opinion or do any harm to the work of the department.

I have quoted these extracts from this very interesting book to indicate the opinion of a man who is very well versed in politics and the principles which ought to be applied to the administration of the civil service. I believe we have to think along these lines. We have to do more in this country to recognize the rights of our civil servants in this respect. We have to trust them more. In Great Britain I have had the opportunity to meet a number of civil servants of high rank and a number of civil servants of lower rank. There is a spirit of confidence in their democratic principles, a spirit of confidence in civil service loyalty over and beyond political opinions which makes it possible for the government and the people to recognize the right of civil servants, with the exception of those in the administrative class, to express political opinions and to take part in politics. While we are considering this legislation all members of this committee regardless of party should give this question some consideration so that as soon as possible in the near future we may be big enough and have enough confidence in our civil servants and in our system to give effect to principles which have been applied in Great Britain as the result of experience. In so doing we should be according to our civil servants the full rights to which they are entitled as Canadian citizens.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make only one correction. I said a while ago that the office of secretary of state did not even exist in 1918. I must say that I was wrong but it is only in 1930 that the secretary of state was entrusted with the administration of the Civil Service Act. I felt bound to make that correction because I do not like to mislead the house.

Therefore, ever since 1930 the secretary of state has been responsible for the administration of the Civil Service Act. He has participated in debates on estimates and legislation concerning the civil service of Canada. A while ago, I said that it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State should not be here this year when we are examining the Civil Service Act and when this bill is being introduced.

(Text):

Mr. Matheson: In speaking to this bill may I dissociate myself from the remarks of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. I think we have a good example in a person who was a distinguished King's counsel—

An hon. Member: Queen's.

Mr. Matheson: No. It was King's counsel in that day, I believe—a colonel of His Majesty's and Her Majesty's forces, a supreme court judge who now adorns the office of chairman of the civil service commission. The fact that this gentleman, who is esteemed and highly respected in all quarters of the house, knew something about practical politics in no way reduces his usefulness to parliament.

Looking at the excellent report put out by the chairman of the civil service commission I note one or two things with satisfaction. One is the salary increase for the majority of civil servants. We must bear in mind that anything which has been gained in the way of salary increase has really been compensation for loss of real income. We must be reasonable and expect that within the near future this matter may have to be reconsidered, particularly if our monetary policy is going to reduce still further the value of our dollar.

We notice also the statement on page 9 of the report that recruiting was easier in 1960. This, unfortunately, is simply a reflection of the employment difficulties which many of our university graduates have faced in the past two years.

On page 11 of the report there is a factor which I find disturbing and I would ask the parliamentary secretary if he could help us with regard to this matter. Under the heading "Shortage Classes" the report says: "At professional level recruiting was difficult in the case of—" Then the report sets out the classifications of a number of people whose services were difficult to recruit. Among them are economists, and I find this distressing, particularly in the light of the longest budget in Canada's history which curiously contained practically no economic theory. There was a certain amount of reference to monetary policy but, after all, monetary policy is only a small part of economic theory.

Turning to Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith's book "The Affluent Society" and in particular to the chapter called "The Monetary Illusion" I find that the author says this, which I believe is germane to our discussion:

> Not only did monetary policy belong to the banking community, but specific steps were taken to safeguard the exercise of this authority from the intervention or intercession of politicians. The central bank was kept "independent" of the government and in degree above it. Such was the case for centuries with the bank of England. It is still so, nominally, of the federal reserve system.

He goes on to point out, as I think we have heard in the speeches of the late governor of the bank, that monetary policy is only a tiny part of economic theory and sometimes an illusionary part.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Matheson: In the language of Dr. Galbraith he says:

> Monetary policy became a form of economic escapism.

The Chairman: Order. I believe the hon. member is getting a little far afield now. He is taking the occasion of the report to discuss other matters which are not germane to the debate. I would ask his co-operation in this regard.

Mr. Matheson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly co-operate. I was pointing out, sir, that we should not overemphasize monetary techniques and be concerned with over-all economic principles.

In The Economist of July 8, 1961, an Ottawa correspondent has the following to say:

—Canada was not ready in 1957, and is still not ready in 1961, to take Britain's offer of a free trade area as a basis for negotiation.

An hon. Member: Order.

The Chairman: Order. I should like to indicate to the hon. member that we are discussing Bill No. C-71 which is an act respecting the civil service of Canada. The problems which the hon. gentleman has been discussing are not affected by the bill as it is drafted and as it is before this committee.

Mr. Matheson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In referring to the interesting and scholarly address to which the Prime Minister devoted his attention when he enunciated his own thesis, that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard, I think we should remember the important part of that address—indeed, the real germ of the message which somehow or other escaped the Prime Minister as he considered the role of civil servants in government, namely, "We want all the man's brains". I think that is very important particularly in these areas of finance, trade and commerce, etc., upon which the well being of all Canadians so largely depends.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he could tell us how many economists of the Ph.D. level have been taken into the public service in the year 1960.

Turning to the chairman's report, there is another sentence on page 13 under the heading "Staff Turnover", which is worthy of note. There is some satisfaction taken there in the fact that the separation rate in the civil service is only 10.5 per cent. However, sir, there is the disturbing sentence further on which reads as follows:

—turnover is not a problem in the civil service, except in a few highly specialized classes—

I would ask in the light of—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman read on?

Mr. Matheson: Yes, I will read the rest, which is as follows:

—and is only a fraction of that for business and industry in general.

Is that as far as the parliamentary secretary would like me to go?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes. The hon. gentleman was leaving out the last part.

Mr. Matheson: Yes, I was referring to what appeared to me to be the whole reason for the paragraph; that is, that there appears to be some concern on the part of the chairman that in certain specialized classes there is a higher separation rate than 10.5 per cent.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, and the next sentence says that it is only one quarter of the rate for Canadian finance, insurance and real estate companies generally in Canada.

Mr. Matheson: Yes, that is so, but I do not think we are particularly concerned about the problems of industry. Addressing myself to the comment of the parliamentary assistant I would say that there was a time when Ottawa was a great magnet for people highly qualified in the field of finance and economic theory as well as public administration. I think of great teams that were developed under Skelton and Clark and others. We still have our Department of Finance but somehow or another it seems to have lost its force.

Mr. Brunsden: They are still coming.

Mr. Matheson: That is the question. Are they still coming? How many Ph.D.'s have come to Ottawa in the years 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961? Are these people being brought here now? If they are being brought here are they simply silenced and put into departments or are they actually being heard—heard not on the public platform but heard by the ministers? Are they being heard by the parliamentary assistant? Does this administration really want "all the brains" of these highly qualified people? Do we have enough of these trained and specialized people? Some of them like Dr. Galbraith are slipping off to be of great service to the United States and to work in industry. Does the chairman of the civil service commission find it possible in any way to take advantage of the excellent academic material that we have in some of our faculties? Is advantage being taken of the splendid school of economics we have here in Ottawa and that other one, perhaps more distinguished if I may say so, which is only a hundred miles away, Queen's University? Is advantage being taken of these great schools? At a moment of critical change in the world we appear to be without any over-all economic policy or purpose.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, one could wish that a debate of this kind respecting so many people could transcend politics. The last speaker has made it very definite that he is speaking from a political angle. I refuse to believe that the civil service is bereft of new recruits from the colleges of Canada. I believe that the young men coming into the civil service today are as capable, as intelligent, as ambitious and as worthy as those of yesteryear. I resent very much the last speaker's suggestion that by virtue of this government being in office we have had an outflow of that type of civil service personnel which we need.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I think the record will indicate that I made no such assertion. I did not have the facts and was asking questions in regard to whether the able people we have in public service are being heard, and whether we have enough of them.

Mr. Brunsden: In regard to the question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, there has been one gentleman loudly heard in the last few days. I believe that this government is just as anxious as any previous government to maintain a civil service as great, conscientious, intelligent and hard working as that maintained by any other government. There seems to be a feeling that this government is out to destroy the civil service.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brunsden: I suggest that belief is incorrect. The civil service is an integral part of the operation of the government of Canada. The hon. gentleman to my immediate right came up through the civil service. There are times when I become very indignant with him, but he was trained there, as was his leader.

How do we obtain men of ability to serve not only in the civil service but also the government of Canada? I believe if we can infuse the youth and trained personnel of Canada into our public service—I say this with due recognition of the fact that many of my young friends in the gallery in future years may take our places in this chamber —we will have a much better Canada.

I say, sir, that Bill No. C-71 is a good bill and should be supported. It may have some clauses that may be debatable, but all bills have clauses that may be debatable. Let us transcend politics on this particular issue. Let us say to ourselves as members of parliament that we are determined to establish a civil service that will be faithful to all Canadians.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, just like the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), and other members of the house, I regret that the Secretary of State should not be here to pilot a bill which comes under his department.

I would at least have expected the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) to attend since several thousand postal workers come under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission. God knows how many meetings have been organized by those employees in the past two or three years to protest against their working conditions, the way they are being treated and the inadequacy of their salaries.

Mr. Chairman, since I have repeated it on several instances in the house, you are not without knowing that every time such protest meetings were held by the postal workers, the Postmaster General was as conspicuous by his absence as he is this afternoon.

How many times have we asked the Secretary of State to see that some salary adjustments to which the civil servants are entitled, be made, when it was finally decided that they should get a salary increase.

You know, Mr. Chairman, that salary increases have been granted by bits and parcels over a period, so that some classifications have obtained their increase before others. They had been entitled to it for a long time.

Now we are today on a discussion of a bill which not only favours the government but the civil servants as far as working conditions and salaries are concerned. Unfortunately, in spite of protests they have made over the years, in spite of representations made in this house by members of the opposition, nothing has been done in this bill to give justice to those who have obtained salary increases some time after other classifications.

Another matter I wish to raise is the fact that federal civil servants cannot take advantage of statutory holidays which fall on legal holidays or on Saturdays. I think that, at last, a section of this bill grants them what we have been asking on their behalf for a long time. But I especially want to emphasize clauses 62 and 63—

Mr. Chairman, you hear the croaking on the other side of the house.

The Chairman: If those conversations annoy the hon. member I shall have to ask hon. members to keep quiet.

Mr. Denis: I note the remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay). He is now sitting on the other side of the house. Perhaps he has been punished? Or could it be that he seeks to get closer to the government officials, to the whip, or to the parliamentary secretaries?

I wonder if he is not looking for a department? Personally, I doubt that the government will waste its time considering such a request.

In any event, he is a friend of the Union Nationale. Perhaps he is complaining because he has not had his share of paint? We will try to see to it.

Let us disregard those rumours that are gone with the wind. I am now coming back to the matter before us, in order, if possible, to protect the employees of the civil service commission.

For several years a certain group of those employees has more particularly been complaining. I mean part time employees who do not seem to be protected by this bill.

If I understood the parliamentary secretary rightly—and I suppose that he will, later on, throw some light upon the subject—statutory leave at this time only applies to regular employees; under the present act, part time employees do not enjoy this privilege.

Not only do they not enjoy statutory leave, but they do not get annual leave such as is granted across the country, except by this government.

The government should set an example of fairness in its treatment of its employees, whether full-time or part-time.

If there are people who deserve the sympathy of the government, it is those who, being unable to find a full-time job, have to work part-time.

Such as it is, the act does not provide statutory leave for part-time employees.

If required to work on legal holidays, they get no extra pay for it. If they do not work on those days, they are simply not paid.

I come back to the question that two or three other members and myself have raised during this session as well as during previous sessions. We have asked the government whether it would not take the necessary steps to remedy the situation and put an end to this unfairness.

Recently, the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Lessard) asked a question on that point. I have asked one myself. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) made a speech along those lines. He suggested that the part-time employees should at least receive a percentage of their salary to compensate for the loss of their holidays.

I know that in the province of Quebec, employers grant their part-time or regular employees 2 per cent of their salary to compensate for the loss of holidays.

Yesterday, several questions were asked to the Secretary of State. He first replied he was not the only one dealing with the matter, that it comes under various departments. After being asked the same question repeatedly, he finally gave the following answer, which I quote from page 1 of the appendix to Hansard for July 11, 1961:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to supply some information in reply to the questions which were directed to me recently concerning the advisability of granting paid leave to part time employees. Generally speaking, the government—and this includes the civil service commission—has followed the policy of granting regular leave only to full-time civil servants. A thorough review of that policy is now being made. The new policy we are now considering would be aimed at granting leave to all employees on the basis of their period of employment. When the civil service commission has completed its study of the matter, the house will be informed of the way in which this principle would apply.

We are now considering a bill concerning the civil service. Why should we wait until we have passed upon that bill to look after such an important group of citizens as part time civil servants?

After four years, it is high time that the government stop carrying out studies and endlessly reconsidering the matter.

It is high time, Mr. Chairman, that the government stop considering only matters pertaining to the department. It should put a stop to this endless reconsideration of questions.

In my opinion, since we are now considering a bill concerning the civil service of Canada, the Secretary of State, who is not here today, should not have said yesterday, when he was asked questions concerning leave with pay for part time employees, "that the matter will be taken into consideration".

Why has he not considered that matter in the past two or three years or even since his party came to power, that is four years ago?

The Conservatives promised to correct all past wrongs, even those which existed under Mr. Bennett.

I will say that what was not done during 22 years, was not accomplished either by Sir John A. Macdonald.

If the government starts justifying its bad administration by accusing previous governments, we will be going back to Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel.

There has been some talk about a general election. The sooner, the better for the Canadian taxpayer.

Instead of blaming previous administrations for their shortcomings, I hope the present government will have the courage to say what it did during four years.

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Denis: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pigeon: You are afraid to reply?

Mr. Denis: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pigeon: Shame.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the mood of the committee this afternoon is a very pleasant one although I have known it, on occasion, to be somewhat more relevant. However, of that latter aspect I do not complain because I am sure that at least the civil servants in Ottawa will understand that perhaps this bill is, in some respects, the victim of other circumstances on parliament hill.

At this stage of the discussion, sir, of this very significant legislation, I doubt if any really useful purpose would be served by any extended references on my part to the very many things which have been mentioned by hon. members on all sides of the committee. On each of the clauses of the bill there will be an opportunity available to make comment in relation to what has been said. I think it would be more appropriate to do so at those times. I wish, sir, to join with hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house who have referred to the high competence with which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond presided over the special committee. He displayed a deep knowledge of the Civil Service Act, judicial impartiality and a skill in presiding. It was a real pleasure for me to participate in the work of the committee because I feel that all hon. gentlemen recognized the vital importance of the task and approached it with a genuine objectivity and, in almost all cases, on a nonpartisan basis.

The maintenance of high standards in our public service, the preservation and improvement of the merit system, the maintenance of the independence of the civil service commission itself, the continuing improvement in the conditions of public service employment, these things are of the very essence, the very lifestream of our whole system of government. Adequate compensation based upon the principle of a fair comparison, conditions of employment to equal at least those of commerce and industry is essential if a civil service career is to be as rewarding and satisfying, as attractive as a professional or business career. I believe that a career in the Canadian civil service must have a status and respect that will be an incentive, a stimulus to young Canadians, dedicated in the sciences and the professions, in administration and in other basic fields.

Yesterday in the course of his speech, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona used some phrases which might well be wrenched out of context to create an impression which I hope he did not intend to leave. Some of those phrases could cause deep misunderstanding among many dedicated civil servants. He spoke of there being too many barriers between the taxpayers and the civil service; of civil servants seeking to ram things down the throats of ordinary citizens. I will not use the various other phrases. If his words are to be taken literally, then I can only say his experience is very different from mine. During my 25 years in the practice of law and in public life I have had to deal with civil servants at all levels and on an almost daily basis. I say without hesitation that I think I have perhaps had more contact with more civil servants over a longer period than probably any other member except the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and possibly the hon. member for Ottawa West. I have found, almost without exception, unfailing courtesy, genuine helpfulness, a genuine desire to be of service and a real dedication to the job. Those are qualities which I think have not been exceeded by the employees of any private employer.

It would be idle for anyone to assert that the civil service is in a state of Utopia. Abuses do, of course, occasionally arise in personnel administration and otherwise. I do assert, however, with the greatest confidence that they are very much the exception and not the rule.

Hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house have spoken of this new bill as a considerable improvement on the bill in its form at second reading and as it was sent to the special committee. With that view, I most decidedly agree. I think the committee, in this respect, made a considerable improvement upon the bill that was given second reading. I believe the bill itself is a considerable advance over the old Civil Service Act. Within the new framework which we have in this bill, I believe we can build, wisely, effectively and efficiently, not only in the interests of the civil service but of Canadians generally.

There have been many questions asked during the course of this rather long debate. I submit all these further matters which require elucidation may be dealt with under the individual clauses. I point out to the committee, of course, that this bill has had a very exhaustive, very detailed study in the special committee to which members on all sides of the house have contributed very effectively.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): During the discussions in committee, the civil service federation of Canada stated that several years ago the national joint council recommended that the principle of the payment of shift differentials be instituted. This is the normal practice in industry and should be applied to the civil service. At that time they were informed that, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, such payments could not be made under the old act. It is for that reason I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West:

Under clause 2, subclause (a), add a new paragraph (iii):

(iii) by reason of duties having to be performed by employees during any shift other than a straight day shift.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This deals with a matter which was discussed in the special committee at least on two occasions. On the final occasion on which it was discussed the committee had before it the clear cut opinion of the draftsman of the bill, namely the deputy minister of justice, that provision was now made for the payment of shift differentials and that it was unnecessary to have any amendment to give that authority. That authority will now be provided through the provisions of clause 12 of this bill which is drafted specifically, in its final paragraphs, to cover such circumstances. I quote:

—or such other rates as may in any special cases be appropriate.

It is also covered by the provisions of the Financial Administration Act which under the old Civil Service Act were overridden but which under the new act will not be overridden. The situation therefore is that the amendment is completely unnecessary as providing for something in respect of which the existing bill makes provision and in respect of which the committee had the specific and definite opinion of the deputy minister of justice. Consequently I would suggest to the committee that the amendment, being unnecessary, be not accepted.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Of course, Mr. Chairman, I should like to rely on the opinion which has been given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is not his opinion; it is that of the deputy minister of justice.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I refer to the opinion that the hon. gentleman expressed. If that is the case and if that is the undertaking, of course, I would be quite satisfied. However, that was the matter that was raised in the committee; and I thought it would be much better for it to be expressed in the committee of the whole here this afternoon than just in the special committee so that it would be understood clearly that such was the opinion, namely that this provision is already made in the bill. Therefore under the circumstances I would be very willing to withdraw the amendment.

The Chairman: Does the committee give to the hon. member leave to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 as amended by the committee carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Powers and duties.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I move that paragraph (c) of clause 6 of Bill No. C-71, be amended to read as follows:

(c) at the request of a deputy head or on its own initiative report upon any matter pertaining to organization and employment in the department.

The Chairman: I assume that amendment would be to replace the present paragraph (c) by this one?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): That is right.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This again was a matter which was carefully considered by the committee and upon which the opinion of the deputy minister of justice was obtained. The opinion of the deputy minister of justice, which is given at page 495 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee of Friday, June 16, clearly indicates that it is unnecessary to add these words in order to accomplish the purpose—and, I may say, the laudable purpose—which the hon. gentleman has in mind. In his opinion as the draftsman of the bill this matter is covered by the generality of the words in subclause (b). In other words, the position of subclause (b) is that the commission has the power to——report to the governor in council upon such matters arising out of or relating to the administration or operation of this act and the regulations—

Those words are of a general character. Subclause (c) provides for a different situation. Subclause (c) permits the deputy head to ask the civil service commission to report upon any matter pertaining to organizations and employment in the department. However, in the opinion of the deputy minister of justice subclause (c) does not in any way restrict the generality of the words in the opening part of subclause (b) and in his opinion it consequently was unnecessary.

Being unnecessary I venture to suggest to the committee that the amendment be not adopted.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the parliamentary secretary has correctly and accurately stated the position taken in the special committee dealing with this point and that his reference to the opinion given by the deputy minister of justice is quite correct. However, it seems to me that this is another one of those points or places in the bill where it is important to make it clear that the commission is independent and not merely enabled to act at the request of the government or the minister as the case may be. There are in the bill several places where that point becomes important and this is one of them. While I am not going to put myself in the position of saying that the deputy minister of justice is wrong in his legal opinion—I should be very reluctant to do that—I think his interpretation of the clause is rather generous to the point of view expressed by himself and by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. Certainly I can see no possible harm that the proposed amendment would do. It enlarges and makes more certain the right of the commission to act independently and on its own account in this respect. For that reason I should like to see the amendment put so that the committee will be aware of exactly what the point is. I think it is useful to raise these points as the clauses are discussed because it will be useful in dealing with the act and regulations that will flow from the act in years ahead.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I say that it is clear that in the structure and intention of the bill there is the desire that the civil service commission may on its own initiative report in respect of those matters which pertain to organization and employment in the department. There is no question that this is the intention of the bill. The opinion of the deputy minister of justice is that the power so to do is fully and amply provided in the first part of subclause (b).

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wish to answer the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, if I may. He says it is clear that in the structure of this bill the commission has the power to report on this subject matter. He says that is the intention of the bill. That is the very distinction I wish to make. It was undoubtedly the intention of the government in submitting the bill that this should be so, but I am not satisfied that it is clear in the actual language of the bill before us. It is to make it clear that the bill before us, as drafted, does what the government intended in submitting the legislation, and what I understand to be the wishes of the special committee, that I raise this point.

We are not at cross purposes in this matter. In other words, we are not at cross purposes as to what was the intention as to what was to be done in this respect, but it is a question as to whether this clause of the bill adequately expresses that intention. When the parliamentary secretary says it is the intention of the bill I wish to be very sure it is the intention as expressed in the language contained in the bill, and not just the intention of parliament in enacting the bill or of those who were concerned with putting it forward. That is my point.

Mr. MacLellan: On this point, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member for Ottawa West has considered the fact that this amendment could in effect reduce the effectiveness of the clause.

What is provided in the bill under clause 6 (b) and (c) is that there shall be three situations where the commission shall report to the governor in council. The first situation is in any case where they deem it necessary or desirable, as the words are used in the clause. This is very broad. They can report on anything they wish. The second situation is, at the request of the governor in council they shall report upon any matter pertaining to organization and employment in the public service. There is a third situation. That is, at the request of a deputy head they shall, even if they do not wish to do so on their own initiative, report upon any matter pertaining to organization and employment in the department.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Ottawa West has considered that if the words suggested in this amendment were inserted here, "at the request of a deputy head or on its own initiative report on any", and so on, this might narrow down the first situation where they could report; that is, in any situation where it is desirable. Then the two subclauses might be read together as meaning that the commission had only the right to report on its own initiative with regard to the organization and employment in the department.

Does the hon. member not think the first authority of the commission is as wide as it could possibly be and there might be a danger of narrowing that authority by this amendment? I think the present clause expresses our wishes very clearly.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, I have considered the very argument he has raised and I have come to the conclusion that since the amendment is in (c) it does not in any way cut down what is expressed in subclause (b) of clause 6. It does not in any way restrict it. It may be argued that it does not extend it—I will grant the hon. member that argument—but certainly it does not restrict it in any way. Whatever effect it has —I submit respectfully—it certainly does not restrict the effectiveness of the clause. The effect of the amendment is to enlarge and clarify and in no circumstances could it be construed as restricting the authority of the commission.

Amendment (Mr. Richard, Ottawa East) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 52.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 6 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Consultation with staff organizations.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, during the sittings of the committee one of the clauses that was discussed at great length and with regard to which there was most disagreement was clause 7. Even with the amendment submitted by the Minister of Finance as a last resort it is felt that this procedure is not sufficient, namely consultation. Therefore I wish to move the following amendment:

That clause 7 as amended by the special committee be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

7 (1) The commission, and such members of the public service as the Minister of Finance may designate, shall negotiate directly with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees of the crown, with respect to pay and other terms and conditions of employment, at the request of such representatives, or wherever in the opinion of the commission or the Minister of Finance, as the case may be, such negotiation and consultation is necessary or desirable in the interests of the civil service or the government. Such direct negotiation and consultation shall be initiated by either the governor in council, its appointees, or the appropriate staff associations and organizations noted above.

(2) Where negotiation does not result in agreement, the matter under dispute shall be taken to an arbitration tribunal by either party.

(3) The results of such negotiation and/or arbitration shall be proclaimed by a suitable instrument, where necessary subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. Chairman, it will be understood that this amendment is in substitution of the present clause 7.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. Mr. Richard (Ottawa East) moves that clause 7 as amended by the special committee be struck out and the following substituted therefor. Shall I dispense with the reading of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this amendment, with which I agree, is the crux of this whole discussion and probably represents the major objection which is taken to the present bill. Clause 7 is in effect the argument, the disagreement and the basis of the whole bill. If the bill is accepted as it is, it will mean that civil servants will not have the right to know with whom they will negotiate for the purpose of reaching collective agreement. It will mean that they will not, in effect, have an agreement. They will still have to continue to follow the inefficient and ineffective means by way of indirect negotiations which have been available up to now. Obviously, if the government really wished to be progressive in its outlook this is the place where it would have given consideration to its employees. I do not disagree with the government's position in asking for a certain leeway in dealing with some of its top employees, though I violently disagree with the methods used in disposing of some of those employees. However, I think there is a level at which the government could ask for certain considerations beyond what is commonly known as a collective agreement.

I think the civil servants in Canada have now reached a stage where they have sufficient experience in negotiation to expect that a formal method of negotiating working conditions should be set up as a result of which the decisions reached could be expressed in a collective agreement. I see no reason why the government should be interested in inserting into the bill such a clause as this providing for indirect negotiations. We already have on the statute books the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which sets forth a formal system of negotiation. Some of the civil servants, and I am thinking of those in one particular organization, believe that the existing act is satisfactory. They believe it is in keeping with their status—that they are white collar workers and do not want to negotiate and bargain. This is not true, however, of the majority of civil servants. It was pointed out by one of those organizations, the association of postal service employees in particular, that they wish to enjoy the full benefits of negotiation and operate directly under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. What the amendment means is that the employees themselves want the right to negotiate directly. They want the right to go to an impartial arbitration board. They want to end up with a contract which will give them certain conditions of employment, wages, opportunity for advancement, holidays and so on. They want this in black and white.

We have suggested that there might be two or three stages of negotiation. We have suggested that the civil service commission itself could, in the first instance, take to the governor in council the wishes and representations of the associations representing the civil servants but that once it has made this presentation, which must of necessity be public knowledge, they should step out of the negotiations, having made their recommendation. Then the employees themselves will be able to negotiate directly with the government.

Whenever people have opposed the idea that there should be direct negotiations with the government, they have always raised the question of possible strikes. What would happen, they ask, if the employees and the government reached a stalemate and it resulted in a strike? After examining the present act I am of the opinion that if any group of civil servants wished to go on strike there would be nothing in the law to prevent them. I think it should also be pointed out that most civil servants have not asked for the right to conduct a strike against the government. They have, however, asked for the right to conduct direct negotiations with the government or its representatives, the treasury board or some other organization. Mr. Chairman, do you want me to cut off now?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Argue: You finish your speech. There is no hurry. It may be your last.

Mr. Peters: I realize the hour is getting late, but I should like to conclude by making a strong appeal that the government should reconsider this clause. This is the clause which will determine whether civil servants are to be emancipated or not. It seems to me that civil servants should have a collective agreement which would clearly set out both their rights and the restrictions imposed on them. There are obligations imposed under a collective agreement but there are also privileges, and both employer and employees should know exactly what these are.

Let us take an example. If we read the act we find that as part of this collective agreement the employee of the government has certain holidays and those holidays are days for which he is entitled to payment. Then we read what the Postmaster General had to say on June 27 about a holiday on July 1. July 1 fell on Saturday. It is true that Saturday is not a normal working day for most civil servants. But that is true with regard to workers throughout this country in organized labour and they do not always decide that July 1 will be declared to be a holiday on such and such a day for pay purposes. It is considered to be an inherent right that they are entitled to a number of days and if they do not work that day they get paid for it. If they work that day they are entitled to be paid twice the amount of their regular earnings, and it seems to me that this government, by using a technicality, is depriving the majority of civil servants in this country of their holiday pay in respect of that holiday. No doubt it is being done legally, but I believe that if we sit down in all honesty to negotiate a contract and it is said that the workers are going to get a holiday on such and such a day and that if they work on that particular day they will be paid with respect to it, if that day falls on a Saturday or a Sunday you should not rub your hands with glee and say: well, this is going to save the government a little money, it is unfortunate that it does not happen more often. It is true that for the next 20 or 30 years it will only happen on two or three occasions that July 1 will fall on a holiday, but I think that these should be conditions of employment which should be negotiated directly with the employee organizations. A collective agreement should be arrived at. For these reasons I hope the government will reconsider this clause and make provisions for direct negotiations.

Other countries such as Great Britain and Australia—almost every country which has had a long history of democratic dealing with its employees—recognize that civil servants have certain rights and liberties, that they have, finally, the right to apply to arbitration so that the settlement of their differences may be reached in a formal impartial manner. It appears to me that in Canada we should not wait for an evolutionary period such as took place in England before coming to this conclusion, but should take an intelligent approach taking advantage of the experience of other countries.

I completely endorse the amendment. I hope the government will give full consideration to it and that when we again discuss this matter we will be discussing a formal agreement enabling workers to negotiate with employers directly to arrive at a conclusion or agreement upon which the worker can operate. If we do not reach that stage the worker will always be under the threat of having regulations governing his conditions of work which he may never see, never be aware of, and never have the opportunity of making a decision in respect to it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps at this point for the information of hon. members who have copies of the amendment I should read the preamble, which is as follows:

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East) moved that clause 7 as amended by the special committee be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as I understand the stage at which we are in the proceedings of the committee of the house, it is not possible to put before the committee a detailed presentation in respect of this amendment.

The position, as the committee knows, is that the original proposal as advanced when the bill was introduced, was a very great advance over anything that had previously been in vogue in civil service administration. The amended proposal of the Minister of Finance which is now before the committee of the whole is one which again is a very considerable advance, and one which I think would accrue to the benefit of civil servants generally.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I understand it is the desire to move that the committee rise I am sorry that is all I have the opportunity of saying at this time. However, when the committee resumes I would consider it a privilege to discuss this whole matter in detail.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order does the motion made in this way by the hon. gentleman kill the bill?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. gentleman is asking the committee to rise and report progress.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have made no motion. I understand the house leader is about to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, that was just a preparatory statement. After consultation with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house it seems wise to rise and report progress now and then consider interim supply, so I would now move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Churchill (for Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $1,045,379,927.94, being the aggregate of

(a) one-quarter of the total of the amounts of items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $922,235,223.75;

(b) one-third of the total of the amounts of items 99, 141, 148, 195, 196 and 197 of the said estimates, $271,666.67;

(c) one-sixth of the total of the amounts of items 16, 101, 154, 204, 208, 209, 210, 212, 214, 218, 222, 223, 228, 337, 342 and 396 of the said estimates, $4,271,818.84;

(d) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 156, 158, 251, 284, 360, 365, 368 and 400 of the said estimates, $3,591,936.92;

(e) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $88,926,648.41;

(f) one-third of the total of the amounts of items 516 and 527 of the said estimates, $1,181,383.34;

(g) one-quarter of the total of the amounts of items 514 and 590 of the said estimates, $12,515,000.00;

(h) seven-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the further supplementary estimates (1) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $11,844,583.34; and

(i) one-third of the total of the amounts of items 605 and 606 of the said estimates, $541,666.67; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962.

He said: Mr. Chairman, just so hon. members of the house will kow the procedure at this moment we are undertaking to study interim supply in the hope that we might complete that this evening so the house might adjourn. That is the purpose of bringing this forward at this stage on rather short notice. The proposed bill will provide in respect of the main estimates for 1961-62 (a) one-quarter of the items to be voted in these estimates amounting to $922,235,223.75; (b) an additional one-third of votes numbered 99, 141, 148, 195, 196, and 197 to a total of $271,666.67. Those are shown in schedule A of the bill.

Then (c), an additional one-sixth of votes 16, 101, 154, 204, 208, 209, 210, 212, 214, 218, 222, 223, 228, 337, 342 and 396 to a total of $4,271,818.84. That is shown in schedule B of the bill. Then (d) an additional one-twelfth of votes 156, 158, 251, 284, 360, 365, 368 and 400, to a total of $3,591,936.92. That is shown in schedule C of the bill.

In respect of supplementary estimates for 1961-62 the bill provides for (e) seven-twelfths of all of the items to be voted in those estimates for a total of $88,926,648.41 plus (f) an additional one-third of votes 516 and 527, shown in schedule D of the bill, for a total of $1,181,383.34 and (g) an additional one-quarter of votes 514 and 590, shown in schedule E of the bill, for a total of $12,515,000. In respect of further supplementary estimates (1) for 1961-62, the bill provides for (h) seven-twelfths of all of the items to be voted in those estimates for a total of $11,844,583.34 and (i) an additional one-third of votes 605 and 606, shown in schedule F to the bill, for a total of $541,666.67, the grand total being $1,045,379,927.94.

The proportions requested in this bill are intended to provide for the necessary requirements of the public service during August, September and October, 1961. In no instance is the total amount of an item being released by this bill. The form of the bill is the same as that of similar interim supply bills passed previously. The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee of supply and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as the result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I take it that this motion is made on the basis that parliament may not be sitting within the period contemplated by the motion although I imagine that perhaps it might be reconvened earlier. I only wish to say that an unusual procedure has been adopted. The leader of the house, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, is representing the Minister of Finance today. To me this seems unusual.

Mr. Churchill: It is for a very temporary period.

Mr. Benidickson: I would have expected that the very competent parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance would have made these comments in the absence of his minister. As I heard the minister, the reservations as to the rights of members of parliament with respect to every item in the book of estimates are the same reservations that have always been given on interim supply. Do I have the assurance of the Minister of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Churchill: That is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: On that basis we have no quarrel with this measure. Under some votes extraordinary expenditures are required in the next two or three months and in those instances the percentage of the total amount now being asked for is somewhat greater. In other words, no over-all average percentage applies to all the items for which interim supply is being requested. That course has our entire approval. So far as the possibility of adjournment is concerned, it was indicated clearly yesterday by the hon. member for Essex East that we on this side were prepared to sit here as long as the government was prepared to advance matters of current necessity and emergency. That was discussed yesterday.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, this is the 157th sitting day of this session.

Mr. Brunsden: Are you tired?

Mr. Argue: I believe this is the longest session in the history of the country. We assembled in November ostensibly to begin a session that would be concluded in the early summer but as time has gone on it has become obvious that the session could not be concluded even by mid-summer. The government will, of course, have its own reasons for saying that the session has been unduly delayed. I think the main reason why the session has continued so long is the fact that the government is an incompetent government that has failed to meet the many urgent economic problems facing the people of this country and today this government does not have the confidence of the people of the country. It has failed in every way to deal with every single economic problem facing the people of the country.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the hon. member is making a political speech—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: There is widespread unemployment, inadequate agricultural prices, failure to provide a social security system even though the government's commitments in this regard are clear and failure to bring forward financial and economic policies to improve economic conditions. I would say that at this time Canada is probably the most mismanaged country in the world, the most incompetently mismanaged country in the world.

The government is in great trouble because it has failed to be consistent. It has failed to take a straighforward course and has used devious, underhanded methods to deal with situations instead of dealing with them straightforwardly as an honourable government should do in a democratic society.

We are asked this afternoon to provide interim supply for August, September and October. There is no indication when the government wishes parliament to resume. They are asking for three months' interim supply when all reports today have been that parliament would reassemble in September. The government has run into serious trouble in the economic field. It has run into serious trouble in the management of events in the House of Commons.

One of the many reasons why this session has been prolonged is the fact that the government has not had a clear-cut program of public business ready to deal with the crisis but has gone on piece by piece, bit by bit, introducing one small measure after another and sometimes following the course of filibustering its own legislation.

Mr. Churchill: You have been away too much.

Mr. Argue: The house leader says I have been away too much, and this from a spokesman of a cabinet the members of which have been away most of the time. The Minister of Agriculture is so seldom here that when we have questions to ask him we have to ask them of someone else.

An hon. Member: He is selling wheat.

Mr. Argue: The attendance of the opposition has been excellent this session—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: —and we have been giving a good account of ourselves. We are adjourning this session at a time when western Canada faces a drought, a national disaster. The government has no policy, no program, has announced nothing of an adequate nature to meet the very serious income deficiencies that are bound to affect the prairie provinces.

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member says we have no program. The government has a very excellent program which has been acclaimed in western Canada. If the hon. member would take his seat while I am speaking—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member has not raised a point of order, but rather a point of debate. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: This is another phony point of order from a member of this house who probably should be more concerned about doing something because the widespread crop failure will probably be greater in the constituency he represents than in any other. His constituency is likely to have a total crop failure even if rain should come within the next few hours. What does he do this afternoon? He gets up and makes claims that are not in accord with the facts, so far as I am aware, and which I am certain will not have the agreement of his constituents.

We need action by the government now to deal with this national disaster. The government may have its allies in doing so little. The head of the Saskatchewan retail merchants' association said the other day, why all this talk of disaster? He said, farm income is no more than 30 per cent of the income of Saskatchewan. A loss of 30 per cent of this income in Saskatchewan does constitute a disaster in the province and a disaster for Canada. If rain is not received in adequate quantities within the next few days—and I am glad to note there has been some rain in Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan in the last few hours—this will be the greatest national disaster this country has seen since the end of the war and far greater by way of loss of income and total hardship although perhaps, for individuals, not as great as the Rimouski fire or hurricane Hazel or the Winnipeg flood.

This great national disaster facing the people of the three prairie provinces demands substantial action at this time. The government has announced it will pay part of the cost of moving feed grain. It has announced it will co-operate in the maintenance of the supplies of coarse grains that are now in the prairies. This is only a small part of the action which should be taken now. The government should be prepared to pay the full freight costs on cattle if it is necessary to move them long distances to pasture. I would suggest that the government should establish, not these national average support prices with deficiency payments that are such a hoax and which have meant so little in the last few years. The Prime Minister laughs. He can ask the egg producers how much they like these insignificant prices they received when egg prices have been so low. He can ask the hog producers if they have received anything from this program.

Mr. Harkness: The hog producers have been very happy these last few months.

Mr. Argue: We may soon find that out. Some of them have been happy with some of the marketings because this policy has been liquidating production. This is the only answer the government has to agricultural production. I suggest to the government that instead of using this deficiency average price—this is the kind of verbiage this government is good at putting into legislation—they should establish a floor price on cattle and hogs below which these prices are not allowed to go. The government should put in some floors, put in some guarantees and base these prices on a fair return to the farmer plus his cost of production.

I suggest further that there should be an income payment to farmers now, in addition to prairie farm assistance. In addition, if we are going to get this $1 an acre again that is always kept dangling, there should be a payment of $5 an acre from the national treasury where there is a total crop failure. The government always waits so long to make any announcement about this $1 per acre.

The government promised the people of western Canada that there would be a comprehensive system of crop insurance. The government introduced a crop insurance scheme which has been largely a failure. Very few farmers in western Canada have been able to take advantage of this scheme because they felt they could not afford the high premiums that went with this kind of so-called crop insurance. It is not working. If the government had fulfilled its promise to the Canadian people and if we had a crop insurance system that was working, then we would not have to ask the federal government now for special disaster payments out of the national treasury. We would have had an adequate program of crop insurance, and this we do not now have.

As a matter of fact, any farmer who asks for crop insurance must, in becoming eligible for crop insurance, forgo the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We need a crop insurance plan that is available not to a few small areas where there is little crop loss or little risk of crop failure, but one that can be applied universally to all farmers irrespective of the amount of risk involved.

Mr. Harkness: That is exactly what we have.

Mr. Argue: That is not what we have at all. The farmers who have the greatest risk have to pay premiums that they cannot afford to pay; that is what we have. You say to them, therefore, this is the best we can give you and we have to keep the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which we criticized for so many years.

Mr. Harkness: You are not talking about crop insurance at all; you are talking about some form of relief.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend was so good as the minister of agriculture that the Prime Minister transferred him to another department. The farmers all said, wonderful; we are in favour of it. Now, if the government wants a defence program that has greater support in Canada, the best thing they could do would be to transfer the present Minister of National Defence. They should make him a rotating minister. This would be a sign of improved policy, any time he was dumped out of a department. He was the minister of agriculture, and he was a failure. He introduced this legislation which has been such a hoax and today when most of the farmers in western Canada face drought conditions and disaster with no crop insurance, he says the policy is good. They are being looked after. Well, Mr. Chairman, they are not being looked after. They are being condemned to a very inadequate income.

[Mr. Argue.]

This government is going to have an election one of these days. It will not be too soon for the people of this country. I am sure they will welcome the opportunity to express their opinion of a policy that has not worked, a policy that has failed. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister was right when he said the next election issue should be that of private enterprise versus democratic socialism. I think that is the best kind of issue on which to have the election. We accept this suggestion of the Prime Minister. The Liberals were over there for 22 years and they did such a terrible job that the people of the country decided there needed to be a change, and very rightly. Now, the Liberals have been supplanted by another free enterprise government that says, do not blame us; we cannot tell the automobile manufacturers of this country what kind of automobiles they should produce. We want to be so careful that we do not even want to advise them about anything. This government says, "We cannot do anything with private business; it is a law unto itself." All it can do is mismanage the financial and fiscal policies of the country but it cannot exercise any control over basic economic questions in this country.

We suggest this, Mr. Chairman, and the C.C.F. has stood for this for many years. The new party I believe, when it comes out of its founding convention, if it is to have a wide appeal to the people, as I am certain it will have, will be different from these old private enterprise parties. It must be different. It must present the people of this country with an alternative to the economic conditions and the economic slump and morass which this country now faces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Many things need to be done, Mr. Chairman. Many of the things need to be done for which we have been campaigning for many years. One is the removal of some of the rackets in the country such as the racket of the small loans companies and the small loans sharks and the interest rates in the second mortgage field that are supported by the other political parties in this house. We suggest that something should be done about the drug racket and the high cost of drugs. We suggest that to do something about this matter requires government action and government control. We suggest that if this step seems necessary, as we believe it is, the government should take an active part in manufacturing basic and essential drugs as a means of bringing down their cost. We are suggesting that the social security system in this country is very greatly lacking.

Mr. Drysdale: Where?

Mr. Argue: We do not believe we have achieved a welfare state, as Social Credit tells us, or that is an impediment to our development. We are suggesting the welfare state should be developed much more. We are suggesting that we should have an adequate social security system. We are suggesting that our old people who retire in this country should not have to retire on a pittance of $55 a month and be condemned to an inadequate income and near poverty for the rest of their lives.

Mr. Drysdale: How much?

Mr. Argue: There should be a social security system based on a proportion of the average national income. There should be a portable system of pensions, and into this fund, which should be actuarially sound, should be paid contributions from employers, employees, the treasury, and the self employed and the pension should be a very minimum $100 a month. That is not too much in relation to the income of this country and in relation to what should be our standard of living.

We suggest also that there should be a full employment policy, that the answer to unemployment is jobs, and that the way in which to bring about jobs is through active participation by the government in embarking upon a great system of public works projects and public development. When the Liberals were in power they did a great deal in this regard. They had a number of inquiries. They had green book proposals. They had a shelf of public works. They put all the works on the shelf. They have left them there and this government has kept them there. Nothing has been done to implement the great public works projects that are necessary. I refer to projects in the field of highways, sewer and water installations, new schools, new hospitals, parks and the cultural centres and so on which are so necessary. Somebody says "provincial".

Mr. Drysdale: I said "fiddlesticks".

Mr. Argue: As long as we take the attitude that these things are the responsibility of the provinces alone, we take the attitude that Canada shall be condemned to continuing unemployment. In a country like ours which is a federation and which should be a co-operative type of federation or co-operative federalism, the federal government has the obligation of taking a leading role so that worth-while projects of this kind, admittedly in the main the responsibility of the provinces, can be brought forward and implemented.

This government is a private enterprise government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Everybody applauds. They have been so consistently a private enterprise government that they are in danger of losing the election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Everything they do that has any popular appeal at all is an interference with the so-called private enterprise system. They are bringing in amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act. They are bringing in legislation making provision for the government itself to get into the field of trade, and this step we welcome.

An hon. Member: And housing.

Mr. Argue: Yes; and housing. If the government wishes to do something, it must in these measures turn its back on the philosophy which it announces with such great vigour in this House of Commons. There are those who have condemned public ownership in this past. This government is doing its best to tear down the crown corporations of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: "Hear, hear", they say. The government has been doing its best to tear down the C.B.C., and T.C.A., to interfere with the crown corporations that have operated in the interests of the people of this country.

An hon. Member: The Bank of Canada.

Mr. Argue: The Bank of Canada, somebody says, which is very much in the news is another instance of this government's interfering with the operations of public institutions.

In our judgment an increase in the field of public responsibility in the area of public ownership is not only desirable but absolutely necessary. We say, as I have already said, that in the field of drugs and in the field of the manufacture of farm implements the government should give consideration to an increase in public development. This does not mean nationalization.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Everybody says, "Oh, oh". This could mean federal money being invested either on its own or in co-operation with private business or in conjunction with co-operatives in developing these very important fields. Instead of Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited not being in a financial position to buy out Cockshutt when it had an opportunity to do so after the war, we suggest it would have been much better for a federal government of the day to offer the co-operative organization a type of partnership for the development of a manufacturing farm implement industry owned in this case as a co-operative measure by the people of Canada and by the farmer-consumers involved. We had a farm implement inquiry. Some of us have made certain recommendations; but we suggest that, until the federal government takes an active role, farm implement prices will continue to rise.

The Prime Minister has been a great advocate of Canadianism. When he advocates Canadianism, I think it has a particular appeal to the people of this country. In order to bring about a measure of Canadianism I suggest it is time that, as a national policy, we embarked upon a program of developing this country in the interests of Canadians. I believe steps should be taken to remove this huge trade deficit with the United States, which means in fact that in exchange for imports of many millions a year Canada is steadily selling larger and larger chunks of her natural resources and her industries to investors from that country. Instead of Canada following a course of development more and more in the ownership and control of Canadians, we are going the other way; we are going backwards. Fifty-one per cent of the manufacturing industry of this country is controlled from outside our country; 75 per cent of the petroleum industry is owned outside our country; 97 per cent of the automobile industry; 98 per cent of the rubber goods industry.

We say it is time we embarked upon a policy of public development and of a repatriation of these industries to Canadians. We suggest that we shall never have complete and full independence in international policies; we shall never have the full respect of other nations in international affairs until we can demonstrate that we have embarked upon a policy under which our country is developed in the interests of Canadians and is not following a course in which a larger and larger part of this nation is owned and controlled from outside. Surely no one will argue that a country as wealthy as ours should be able to produce the kind of investment capital needed to put people to work, to provide ownership of Canadian industry.

Mr. Chairman, this government, by the very fact that this session is the longest in the history of this country, has proven itself inept. In my opinion the government is at an all-time low since the last election as far as support in Canada is concerned. We suggest that the people of this country need to be offered a real choice; a choice between mismanagement, free enterprise as defined by the government, and a program of public development and public expansion based upon democratic institutions and on control by the Canadian people.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Will he not agree that the speech he has just made is a much abler speech than anything that could be done in that line by Mr. Thomas Douglas?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I would welcome the opportunity in any part of the country to allow the public of this country to make their own choice, in answer to the question of my hon. friend.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before the—

An hon. Member: Are you a candidate too?

Mr. Howard: I may be a candidate in a short while, depending upon when the "sooner or later" arrives.

An hon. Member: It will be later.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Assiniboia referred to the statement of the Prime Minister some months ago that the next election, whenever it does come, would be fought on the basis of private enterprise versus democratic socialism. I do not think that was what the Prime Minister really meant. I think he has had misgivings about that statement concerning the basis of an election campaign. Just the other day the Prime Minister said an election would be fought on the basis on Senate reform, and I understand he has now changed his mind about that and is searching for some other basis upon which to fight an election.

Mr. Speakman: From where do you get your information?

Mr. Howard: In raising this question of private enterprise and the detrimental effects of private enterprise upon the average citizen and upon the Canadian consumer I should like to deal with the aspect of it within which the drug industry, or the pharmaceutical industry, falls. I dealt with this subject on another occasion. I did not have the opportunity to go into it fully at that time because in the estimates of the Department of Justice the objection of the Minister of Justice to discussing a certain type of report was upheld. But this is now public property.

I think we must consider the drug industry as being entirely different from any other type of industry because the consumer relationship with the industry is not the same. We find that in fact what these free enterprisers on the other side of the house attach themselves to does not exist within the ethical pharmaceutical industry. The relationship of the consumer is not with the industry; it is with his doctor. The relationship of the industry is with the doctor through advertising and every other means, and not with the patient or the final consumer of the drug.

We find that the consumer, or the patient, because of the uniqueness of the industry, is generally not knowledgeable with regard to the product he obtains. He does not know what it contains; he does not know how it is supposed to affect him, except in so far as the doctor tells him. He is dealing with a highly technical product, chemically named, with a highly involved nomenclature developed by the industry. The consumer really has no knowledge of what he is getting once the doctor writes out the prescription.

The consumer buys toothpaste. He knows generally what it is for. He buys an automobile. He has an understanding of its use and to a degree has information as to its full operation. If he buys a coffee pot or any other commodity such as that, his relationship with the industry is closer than it is with the drug manufacturing industry. Because of these unique characteristics the consumer has no effect whatsoever upon the price he pays for a particular product. There is no price competition in the ethical drug industry, either here or in the United States. This was discovered in the United States. I should like to quote briefly from the report of the Kefauver committee of the United States on the drug industry. The report is dated June 27, 1961. I wish to quote a small section of this report in order to indicate the attitude of the drug industry to price competition and how it really does not exist.

This is a quotation from the direct evidence of Mr. Francis C. Brown, president of Schering corporation, who said:

> Unlike consumer marketing, Schering cannot expand its markets by lowering prices. Cortisone proved this. After all, we cannot put two bottles of Schering medicine in every medicine chest where only one is needed, or two people in every hospital bed where only one is sick. Marketing medicine is a far cry from marketing soft drinks or automobiles.

That is, even though they use the same approach in so far as slick advertising is concerned to get across the brand name of the product to the doctor. The consumer restraint on corporate price fixing that may exist in other industries is not available in the drug industry. The consumer can have no effect whatsoever upon the prices the drug industry establishes, (1) because of the attitude of the industry which I just read and (2) because of the fact that the consumer has no direct relationship with the industry itself. His relationship is through a professional person, a doctor.

Competition does not exist, and it is relatively impossible for it to exist, in the pharmaceutical industry because of the uniqueness of that industry. This again was indicated in the gentleman's comments before the Kefauver committee which I just read. Corporate conscience, if there is such a thing in the drug industry, could have some bearing on prices; but again the statement I have just read—and the evidence is full of similar statements—indicates that there is no corporate conscience in the pharmaceutical or drug industry. Its whole concern is to rake off the highest possible prices it can and make the highest profit possible on sickness and on illness and to gouge the consuming public to the fullest possible extent. This is the attitude which the drug industry has stated before the Kefauver committee, the answer which it has stated publicly in this regard.

How, then, do we protect the consumer? This government is obviously not concerned about protecting the consumer in relation to the drug industry or to any other industry for that matter. It believes in the concept of free enterprise and it knows full well that free enterprise does not have, except in an incidental way, the interest of the consumer at heart. It has primarily at heart the making of the highest profits possible, the expansion of the industry and the development of control over that industry. The individual consumer is virtually helpless to protect himself against the activities of private enterprise. He needs someone else to protect him. There is only one agency—and I am talking about the drug industry now—which can ensure that the consumer is protected both with regard to the price and with regard to the purity of the drugs he buys, as well as against incorrect, false and misleading advertising. That agency is parliament, or government. This government, believing as it does, or as it says it does, in the private enterprise system is most unlikely, I would assume, to take any steps to protect the consumer. If it believes in the private enterprise system and is, at the same time, of the opinion that some checks or controls must be imposed on behalf of the consumer to protect them against the activities of private enterprise, then it really cannot believe that the next election issue should be private enterprise versus democratic socialism.

The Combines Investigation Act has proved to be relatively ineffective in protecting the consumer. It can be the means of discovering facts leading to prosecution, to fines imposed by the court on guilty parties and to restraining orders to prevent them doing the same thing all over again. Alternatively recommendations may be made for certain action to be taken in connection with tariffs. But this is the full extent of the powers under that act and it does not, in essence, provide protection for the consumer. The act enables courts to impose a penalty against private enterprise for things it has done in the past and it enables some futile attempt to be made by court order to prevent the same thing occurring in the future.

In my opinion, as far as the pharmaceutical industry is concerned we have to take into consideration a number of unique characteristics brought about because the industry has no direct relationship with the consumer but works through professional persons, doctors. The advertising is directed to the doctors. The doctor writes out a prescription for the consumer, this patient, who has no choice concerning what kind of drug or product he should get. He takes the prescription given to him. He goes to the pharmacist and the pharmacist again has no choice whatever. If a brand name is mentioned he has to supply a drug of that particular brand. If a generic name is mentioned he follows the prescription in that regard also.

Since these circumstances prevail, I believe there must be established a crown corporation for the production, sale and introduction of ethical pharmaceutical preparations. It should provide them at cost. In this way we could ensure at least that government agencies such as the Department of Veterans Affairs, which uses a large amount of drugs, or the Department of Defence Production, the northern health services and other departments and branches of the federal government would be able to use pharmaceutical preparations produced under government auspices at a great saving to the public. We could also establish under this crown corporation a sales and distribution organization to provide drugs to provincial authorities at the lowest possible cost for distribution to hospitals and for the care of the needy and the sick, as well as to old age pensioners, who have difficulties enough as it is, inasmuch as the Prime Minister backed out of the promises he made to them in 1957 and 1958 to provide drugs for them at the lowest possible cost. Unless this government or any other government is willing to recognize the basic fact that the pharmaceutical industry has the consumer at its mercy and that there is only one agency, namely, an agency established by parliament, capable of protecting the interest of the consumer, then the consumer will continue year after year to be gouged, robbed of his dollars and to be uncertain whether he is in fact receiving a pure and efficacious product.

I do not wish to discuss the question of the purity of these drugs and the nature of the advertising through doctors, which is another field, but if this government had any concern for the price which the consumer has to pay for ethical drugs and preparations it would immediately remove the 11 per cent tax presently imposed on them. This tax is almost directly responsible for Canadian consumers having to pay the highest drug prices in the world. This is a fact which, I consider, has been established by the Kefauver committee. I believe it has also been established by the restrictive trade practices commission in its study of this matter, documents concerning which were tabled the other day by the Minister of Justice. Surely if this government had a proper degree of concern for the welfare of the citizens of this nation, one of the things in which it would become directly involved would be the elimination of the 11 per cent tax thereby assisting, in some small way, to reduce drug prices. If the government had any concern whatever about the bad effects of monopoly control because of patent controls in the drug industry it would engage in the field of direct licensing in order to ensure that monopoly position does not exist merely because a foreign concern in the United States holds patents controlling our drug industry. It is a fact that almost without exception every single, solitary patent issued under Canadian patent laws in recent years for tranquilizers and antibiotic drugs has been issued to United States or other foreign corporations, even though they have subsidiaries in Canada. In effect this puts control of our drug industry and the welfare of our people into foreign hands outside the country.

In summary I think the marked failure on the part of this government to concern itself with this question of drugs is significant. Because of the degree of publicity which developed in connection with a particular report of the director of research and investigation, and only for that reason, the restrictive trade practices commission and the minister agreed that hearings should be held in public. The afterthought on the part of the government following a lot of adverse publicity about the attitude of the government to the question of drugs was that it might be advisable to hold public hearings "to get us off the hook". But all the time the government knew full well that it intended to do nothing, which is an attitude in keeping with the general attitude of this government on other matters for so many years. It intended to do nothing about the welfare, the health and the interests of the Canadian people. Leave it to free enterprise, they say. Maybe that is why the government is holding up the Clark report and why the Minister of National Health and Welfare has not yet completed his study of that document. Possibly he believes free enterprise will find a solution. We remember how in 1957 and 1958 the Prime Minister was almost obscenely in haste to have this commission established. Out of this we got the Clark report which, ever since then, has been languishing in a bottom drawer in the office of the minister of health and welfare.

That document concerns the health and welfare of the people of this nation and the neglect shown of it is an indication of how little regard the government has for these things.

Without getting into the question of national health schemes in this regard I merely want to point out that the Prime Minister with his propensity for putting things off, for procrastinating, and acting like an ostrich in respect to most issues, in appointing a royal commission is doing nothing more than providing a gimmick to cloud over the basic issue of health needs in this nation and to assure that the Prime Minister will be able to go around the country at election time stating how he appointed a royal commission to study something that does not really need further study. If the Prime Minister and his colleagues want to conduct an election, the next or any other, on the basis of free enterprise versus democratic socialism, then I think they will not be telling the truth, when they gloat about free enterprise, if they do not compare what they say with the way in which they have treated the general consumer and general public in the last three or four years. They have given only casual, if any consideration, to the needs and desires of the people of this nation and have concerned themselves only with the blackening of the names of certain public servants in order to ensure that they get their own way.

Mr. Regier: I understand that we are now asked to vote interim supply to the government of the day. If the Prime Minister is to be taken at his word and if, in the light of decisions arrived at in the other place, he is now going to go to the country with an appeal to the people of Canada, then our party of course will be immediately prepared to grant interim supply.

An hon. Member: You are responsible people.

Mr. Regier: Yes, we are responsible people.

If there is going to be an appeal to the people of Canada on the basis of the dare that was put by members of the other place; if there is going to be an appeal to the nation at all, when we will be most happy to grant whatever interim supply is necessary in order to carry on the normal business of government in the interval until a new parliament is able to meet. However, if the government is now asking for interim supply without any intention of appealing to the people of Canada to render a verdict on the record of this government then we feel we must oppose a request of this kind at this time, because the people of Canada in 1957 and again in 1958 were given very high expectations indeed.

Granted, it was the Liberal government that brought us into this mess with conditions which cause most Canadians very serious concern, but the Conservatives under the leadership of our present Prime Minister assured the people of Canada that they had the answer. What a horrible disaster this assurance has now turned out to be.

I am old enough to remember the assurances given the Canadian electorate by, I think an even greater orator in 1930, the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He stated he would resolve all our problems and blast his way into the markets of the world. I can well remember a meeting in the Third avenue United Church in Saskatoon where all the front seats were reserved for the unemployed who were given a special arm band. Well, we ended up in 1935 with more unemployment than we had in 1930.

Upon looking at the accomplishments of this government from 1957 until 1961 I would say their record is no better than the record of the Conservative party under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, in those comparable years from 1930 to 1934. I hope this government is not going to impose upon the Canadian people one more year of Tory rule. I hope we are able to persuade this government to go to the country now and not wait until the end of their term of office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Regier: I say this without any political considerations in mind but only because I have the welfare of the Canadian people at heart—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regier: I know how difficult times were under the Bennett administration, following which the Canadian people finally got rid of that previous Conservative government. Today we do not have a government of elected representatives of the people, but a one-man government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Regier: I am informed by reliable authorities that the budget was concealed, that its contents were known only to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and that the rest of the cabinet was denied access to it.

An hon. Member: That explains a lot of things.

Mr. Regier: The rest of the cabinet was not even asked to approve of it. The members of the government had to wait, as I had to wait, until budget night in order to discover what "John and Don" had in mind for the rest of us for the present fiscal year. We have noted many other actions which reinforce the allegation that we do in fact have a one-man government and not a government where there is collective responsibility on the part of 20 or more men.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, our international prestige has very definitely declined. Anyone who has attended the meetings of the United Nations over the past number of years has had regret—

An hon. Member: You never attended.

Mr. Regier: Yes, I have been there for the past three years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is six o'clock.

Mr. Regier: After listening to the reports of the delegates of other nations to the United Nations, it is obvious that the government of this day is responsible for the decline in our international prestige.

Mr. Chairman, would you call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, before we adjourned for the dinner hour I had indicated that if there was going to be an appeal to the country we would be most happy to vote interim supply but that if there is not going to be an appeal to the electors of Canada the government of the day in my opinion is unworthy of a vote of interim supply. I indicated that the electors of Canada had very high expectations in 1957 which were continued into 1958 and, as happened once before in my lifetime when the people of Canada elected a Tory government, the people have been horribly disillusioned. The Tory government in the period from 1930 to 1935 hung on to the very end. They were in office for five years, and I pleaded with the government to spare the people of Canada the agony of a five year term on this occasion.

I also contended that in effect we do not have a government as ordinarily understood under our system but that we have rule by one man. I spoke of external affairs and I indicated that our prestige in the councils of the world is now lower than it has been—

Mr. Nesbitt: What do you know about it?

Mr. Regier: —for many a long year. We all know that our economy is sagging. I was interested to read in the press only yesterday that the head of the Canadian chamber of commerce is advising us to pull up our socks and is saying that unless we do so next winter is going to be even worse than last winter for many millions of our citizens.

Mr. Walker: Why?

Mr. Regier: Because of—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Rising unemployment.

Mr. Regier: Rising unemployment, as the hon. member for Essex East says in so ably assisting me, and also because all the economists I have read are predicting a downward curve from the present upswing, which I admit, about the end of October or the beginning of November.

Mr. Walker: That is what you are hoping for.

Mr. Regier: No, I am not hoping for this.

Mr. Walker: Honi soit qui mal y pense. You are as ignorant as Paddy's pig.

Mr. Regier: The whole essence of my speech is to needle the government into some action in order to have an upswing in our economy that will continue throughout the next winter and for the years to come.

Mr. Walker: It is good there are not more like you around here.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister was overruled in 1959 and 1960 by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Regier: However, I am afraid that the actions of the government to date have revealed that they are not going to be responsible for an upswing in our economy—

Mr. Walker: Did you consult with your assistant, the hon. member for Essex East?

Mr. Regier: —but rather that these economists are going to be found right in their forecasts—

Mr. Walker: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Regier: —that next winter will be even worse than last winter. I have already referred to a speech made only a few days ago by the head of the Canadian chamber of commerce. We have a sagging economy. All Canadian business knows it and the lack of confidence in our government—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. There seem to be several other debates intervening during the speech of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, did I understand the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to say that the communists were proposing this?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The words of the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac do not indicate a point of order.

Mr. Regier: I should like to point out to the hon. member who has just risen on a point of order that there is a considerable difference between economists and communists but maybe he does not realize the difference between these two types of people. We contend that not only have we a sagging economy but that the taxation policies of the government are—I cannot think of a better word—plain stupid.

Mr. Walker: What was that again?

Mr. Regier: S-t-u-p-i-d, simply stupid. That is a very good interpretation of the policies of this government.

Mr. Walker: What does your tie represent, son?

Mr. Regier: My tie is red and I hope it will remain red for as long as I live. Red is the colour of reform, the colour of revolt.

Mr. Benidickson: Liberalism.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Liberal colour.

Mr. Regier: I hope I will never be found wearing a blue tie which means reaction and a do-nothing approach.

Mr. Walker: Your assistant from Essex East agrees with you.

Mr. Regier: I say that the taxation policies of the government are simply stupid. This government, like the ostrich, is burying its head in the sand with respect to policies on foreign trade.

Mr. Walker: What was that?

Mr. Regier: They are going around the world with a big club over their shoulders. They are now attempting to brow-beat even the government of the United Kingdom. I notice that their henchman, the Ottawa Journal, had an editorial the other day appealing to the government to please use a very big club on the United Kingdom—

Mr. Walker: I would like them to use it on you.

Mr. Regier: —to prevent the United Kingdom from joining the common market. We say that this government ought to wake up and realize that there are economic and trade blocs being formed all over the world. If we insist on burying our heads in the sand we will be left out in the cold. We will indeed have been found to have left all our eggs in one basket.

Mr. Walker: Take your head out of the sand, then.

Mr. Regier: I appreciate the interruptions of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Walker: I am glad you do.

Mr. Regier: I think he is a very brilliant man.

Mr. Walker: Thank you.

Mr. Regier: I also know he only got into this house on the bandwagon and I believe he will go out when that bandwagon has been thoroughly discredited.

Mr. Walker: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Regier: I believe that this government has reached a new low in its relationships with other levels of government. I believe that this government's activities are a disgrace to the concept of our desire to celebrate, before very long, our 100th anniversary as a nation.

I believe that this government has led us to a position where we have an unprecedented level of national debt. An unprecedented percentage of the national income now has to go to pay the annual interest charges on our national debt. We know that we have unprecedented levels of unemployment in this country. We are miles behind most modern nations in our social security. Our nation has become a happy hunting ground for monopoly interests and, despite our Combines Investigation Act, Imperial Oil announced the other day, with all the effrontery at their command, that the retail price of gasoline in Ontario and Quebec is going to be increased by one cent per gallon. At the same time, Imperial Oil in British Columbia attacks me in newspaper articles claiming that they have nothing whatever to do with the establishment of retail prices of gasoline. Hon. members of this committee know that the day before yesterday our newspapers carried a dispatch indicating that Imperial Oil was increasing the retail price of gasoline in Ontario and Quebec by one cent per gallon.

Our nation has developed into a happy hunting ground for monopoly interests. The hon. member for Skeena spoke most effectively about monopoly interests in the drug industry. Monopoly interests prevail in many fields in which the Canadian people are interested.

We have a so-called national defence department which offers no defence at all for the Canadian people. It is a farce from a to z. Our Canadian defence expenditures have no relationship whatever to the defence of the Canadian people. It is a tragedy at best. We have inadequate protection for our fishermen and our national health measures are a disgrace compared with those of other nations. Even so-called relatively backward countries like Mexico have a comprehensive national health plan. My mother who is now 79 years of age lived in Europe as a young girl and even in her day she had to pay a fee each week which entitled her to complete medical coverage. We, in Canada, are away behind the rest of the civilized world in this respect.

If we think of our basic industry, agriculture, we realize that there have been hand-outs to the people in that industry. I suppose that with the drought on the prairies there will be a lot more hand-outs, and perhaps there will have to be. Fundamentally and basically, however, we have to resort to hand-outs because we have not a government in office that recognizes the basic needs of agriculture, namely, in the words of the Prime Minister when he was a spokesman for the opposition, parity not charity. This government is continuing the old Liberal policy of hand-outs to the farmers, if and when electoral demands are urgent.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask what is the objection to the government's drought relief policy in the drought stricken areas of the prairie provinces?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Again because of the hubbub in the committee the Chair was unable to grasp the point of order. The words that did come through to the Chair did not seem to indicate a point of order. I would ask the committee to abate its various conversations so that the words of the hon. member may reach hon. members of the committee and may reach Hansard.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Regier: I want to thank you very much for your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I realize that truth hurts and that there is a very keen desire to rise on points of order when a few basic truths are enunciated. We have in office, and this is very important to us, a government that has completely failed to show any appreciation of the importance of the civil service of Canada. Without the civil service our government and all law and order in our nation would be hopelessly lost.

We have had an announcement by the Prime Minister that unless the other place does so and so, an election may be called. We, in our group, would welcome an election, despite the fact that in the early weeks of that election campaign we would be having the founding convention of the New party. Nevertheless, we would welcome this election because—

An hon. Member: The New party is not founded yet?

Mr. Regier: The New party may not be founded officially as yet, but I wish to assure the hon. member that in the past number of years there have been thousands and thousands of Canadians who have met in every major city of Canada and who have given some thought to national problems. We will have a consolidation of the thinking of the grass of the Canadian people, which is something that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives nor the Social Credit party have ever had. Our appeal is going to be a people's appeal that is going to have a real influence on the Canadian electorate.

Mr. Creaghan: What has this to do with interim supply?

Mr. Regier: Interim supply involves the life of this government. Anything I have to say concerning the life of this government is appropriate at this particular stage. We say that unless this government is willing to go to the people it is unworthy of interim supply. In the first place we feel that we do not have a unified government. We have a divided government. We have a couple of ministers in the cabinet who unfortunately have to share a desk but who are divided on the issue of the use of nuclear arms by Canadian forces. I have already indicated that most of the cabinet was denied access to the contents of the budget until it was presented in this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Where did you get your information?

Mr. Regier: We also have the admission of the Minister of Finance that he released the budget to a non-Canadian before it was released to this House of Commons. According to our traditions this would have called for his immediate resignation; but not so under a Tory government in Canada.

Mr. Walker: That is untrue.

Mr. Regier: In the United Kingdom—

An hon. Member: What is the hon. member talking about?

Another hon. Member: Donald Fleming.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member is now being interrupted by members of his own party and by members on the opposite side of the chamber. I must ask the committee to hear the hon. member as best it can and to restrain itself.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you had better keep those hon. gentlemen opposite silent.

Mr. Regier: We had a budget leak.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member for Skeena was one of those who was bursting in upon the hon. member who has the floor. I am asking all hon. members to hear the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Howard: I only interjected because of blabberings from the other side.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has the floor.

Mr. Regier: In reply to the leader of the official opposition the Minister of Finance admitted that a non-Canadian had been supplied with certain basic information as to the budget. In Britain a minister of finance only made an indiscreet remark on his way into the Commons on budget night. However, because of this one small indiscreet remark having to do with the tariff on beer the minister of finance in the United Kingdom was forced to resign. Yet our Prime Minister refers to this allegation of mine and says he hopes that it will receive the contemptuous reply it deserves. Our Prime Minister ought to be the last one to refer to the word "contemptuous".

We have procrastination on the part of our government on many vital issues. They cannot make up their minds on many problems that vitally affect our people in the field of external affairs. We say that at least 1 per cent of our gross national production ought to be devoted to the economic aid to the underdeveloped countries of the world. We believe this would not only help foster world peace but would assist in the restoration of the economic health of our own community. We say that NATO as now constituted and as now operating is becoming more of a threat to world peace than a guarantee of world peace. In the field of disarmament we see no action on the part of our government to supply any leadership whatsoever. If anything, we have hanging over our heads a threat that we may very shortly have greatly increased expenditures in the field of national defence. Our civil defence program, so-called, is a farce. Anybody who attended or who has any working knowledge of the recent operation known as "Operation Tocsin" knows that millions of dollars are going down the drain without any useful result. We have higher tariffs, higher interest rates and an uncertain dollar value. We appreciate the reduction of the Canadian dollar on the international scene but we deeply regret the uncertainty that is attached to it. Canadians do not know whether this is going to cost the taxpayers $100 million or $500 million this year. Canadian exporters have no guarantee or no assurance as to what the value of the Canadian dollar is going to be. The government has left the matter up in the air. We also have a great deal of anxiety and uncertainty as to the money supply. In the documents attached to his budget and in the budget the Minister of Finance admits that he will have to borrow in the money markets in this current fiscal year a sum in excess of $2,600 million. Yet he does not tell us how he proposes to raise this money. Admittedly $1 billion is in obligations that are maturing. The holders of bonds might well buy new bonds. However, the grand total is approximately $2,600 million. Is he going to start the printing presses rolling? He has in effect rid himself of the governor of the Bank of Canada who is opposed to an expansion of the money supply beyond the appropriate level. The Canadian people are therefore left in the dark as to whether the government intends to start the printing presses rolling or whether it intends to borrow all this money and thereby increase interest rates in Canada.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not wish to take up much of the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, but there were one or two remarks made by the hon. member who has just spoken which I feel must be replied to. First of all, one of his remarks concerning the role of Canada in the field of disarmament. As I understood him, the hon. member made some remarks to the effect that Canada had taken no leadership in this field. I think most people in Canada are fully aware of the magnificient role the Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken in attempting to lead the other nations of the world in this field. Last year about this time, after negotiations had been broken off in the ten nation disarmament committee, it was the personal initiative of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that put a resolution through in the meeting of the disarmament commission of the United Nations insisting that the major powers get together and discuss ways and means of carrying on negotiations on disarmament. Canada for several years at the United Nations—and I have some knowledge of it; I have been vice-chairman of the delegation there for several years—has taken a lead on each and every occasion to try to get the major powers together again and to see if some arrangement can be made to work out some disarmament agreement. When the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam rises in his place in this House of Commons and makes these insinuations about the Secretary of State for External Affairs I think they must be answered. I might add that if he has acquired his information on this subject during the times that he has attended at the United Nations, I find that very amazing indeed, in view of the length of time he was there and his status when he was there.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: If I may, I should like to make a comment, although just a brief one, on what the hon. member for Oxford has just said. Unlike the hon. member for Oxford I do not have in my background the benefit of long distance telescopes in order to be able to ascertain some of the more detailed things. I would point out to him and to other hon. members that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, contrary to the distortion made by the hon. member for Oxford, made no insinuations against the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was talking about this government, not the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he made those remarks.

In the field of disarmament this government, the hon. member for Oxford or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, bearing in mind the total concept of the need for disarmament, have done nothing of which to be proud. This government has reason to be proud of one of its members, a fellow British Columbian, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because of what he has attempted to do in promoting discussions on disarmament and attempting to promote disarmament. They have reason to have admiration for the hon. gentleman who holds that ministerial post because of his efforts in this field. But this government and hon. members of this house should know full well that the government of Canada is defeating the attempts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the field of disarmament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Poppycock.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says "Poppycock". Let me carry on and explain.

Mr. Grafftey: You need to explain.

Mr. Howard: I will explain when I feel like explaining, not when the hon. member insists upon it. I think every hon. member of this committee knows full well—and this has been expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—that so long as the people's republic of China stays outside of these negotiations there is not going to be any disarmament, unilaterally or any other way.

This is a government which has consistently refused to give this question the recognition it deserves. This is a government which has continued to ride along on the coat tails of the United States when it comes to the question of recognizing the people's republic of China, or red China, or the government of the mainland of China, or however you wish to classify it. We can talk until doomsday about disarmament and neither the Soviet union nor the United States, each one doing it individually, in a unilateral way, or by agreement, is going to reach any agreement or move toward disarmament so long as China is a nation outside of those discussions. China is a nation that has one quarter of the world's population within its boundaries. It is a country which is a growing military power. It is a country which has received, so we are told, a limited amount of guidance and assistance from the Soviet union in certain technological matters. It is a country, so we are told by people who are reputed to know about these matters, which within a decade or less will be nuclear power. If the government believes that the Soviet union and/or the United States, separately or by agreement, are going to engage in disarmament while there is a nation whose borders embrace one quarter of the world's population, which is a growing military power and is going to become a nuclear power, then this is a government which is not moving toward the field of disarmament with the full force with which it should be moving.

If this government believed implicitly and clearly in the questions of peace and disarmament it would back the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the fullest extent and would recognize the fact that there is a growing military and economic power in China, and that this power should be in the disarmament discussions. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has himself said that China must be a part of those discussions. Yet he belongs to a government which refuses to take any concrete, definite, firm steps toward recognition of that country.

It is in this sense that I say this is a government which is not giving the full support it should give to its Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is the essence of what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was saying.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena I should perhaps add by way of explanation that in the disarmament plan presented to the disarmament committee at Geneva about a year ago, the western plan in its second stage envisaged participation of all militarily significant states. I think this successfully answers the point made by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. member tell us what the first stage is?

Mr. Nesbitt: It would take some time to go into details. There were several stages. The plan presented by the west at that disarmament committee was presented before the Soviet union walked out. These plans are a matter of record, and the hon. member or anybody else who is interested can easily obtain them.

Mr. Howard: If you related to them you would defeat your own argument.

Mr. Regier: I have not completed my remarks and I think they should be completed. I indicated that if this government is prepared to go to the country we will be very happy to grant them interim supply, but unless they go to the country they are unworthy of receiving interim supply.

I have especially in mind the attitude of the government in the matter of income tax. We say there are many loopholes, well known to this government, which exist in the Income Tax Act. We have repeatedly appealed to this government to plug those loopholes, but the government has not acted. I am now speaking personally and not on behalf of my own party, but I should like to see all exemptions for charitable contributions abolished. I believe that if I want to make a contribution to my church or to my favourite charitable institution I should be prepared to do so without wanting to cash in on any benefits which may be available under the Income Tax Act. I have received many complaints on this subject, and there are many leading and responsible Canadians who feel that the public treasury is being rooked annually of hundreds of millions of dollars because of these particular concessions.

I believe the government has failed and is unworthy of interim supply. I believe it has failed to adequately protect the public treasury. We say the Income Tax Act ought to be amended. There ought to be increases; there ought to be reductions. We have long favoured an increase in the level of exemptions allowed under the Income Tax Act.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has put forward arguments which more properly should be, and probably were, made in the debate on the Income Tax Act which was recently considered by this committee. I think perhaps brief references are in order in making his point, but there should certainly not be a full scale debate on a topic which has been previously debated this session.

Mr. Regier: I understand your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I think it is most reasonable in the light of recent debates that have been held. However we also feel that this government is unworthy of interim supply unless it is willing to go to the people because of its arrogant attitude in the matter of international trade. This government is guilty of violating at least the principle, if not the letter, of GATT by device after device, session after session. The spirit of GATT has been broken by this government. They have been increasing tariffs on each and every possible occasion. I will admit at once they have not always done it by direct methods.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question? I am genuinely surprised, in fact, I am amazed to hear what he has just said, because I have believed, and I have been told, that our reputation in the matter of the observance of GATT is almost unrivaled. I think that if the hon. gentleman is going to make statements of that kind he should give chapter and verse for them. I am convinced that he is wrong and I think he should not make statements of that kind unless he can give us the evidence.

Mr. Regier: The only evidence I can call are the repeated statements of the Minister of Finance. On each and every occasion when he has amended the Customs Tariff he has announced that this is designed to increase employment in Canada; in other words, an increase in tariffs in order to protect, as he sees it, Canadian industry. The minister usually accompanies his announcement that tariffs are to be increased on a limited number of items with the statement that there is to be a decrease in the tariff on even more items. But we have to consider what items are involved in the increases and the decreases. The decreases may well have nothing to do with our international obligations.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit me to say that I think he has completely destroyed his own argument by those observations. My understanding of GATT is that it is open for members to negotiate with each other and to come to an agreement within the four corners of GATT whereby certain tariffs may be altered. There is give and take. Certain tariffs are raised and certain tariffs are lowered. I think what the hon. gentleman has just said is a confirmation of what I believe, namely, that we have operated within the four corners of the agreement. I think the hon. member should take back what he said about our disregard for GATT because I think it was absolutely wrong.

Mr. Regier: I am absolutely unwilling to take back my basic allegation because I am sure that if the party to which the hon. member for Greenwood belongs goes to the country it will attempt to prove to the Canadian voter that it has protected Canadian industry by increasing tariffs here, there, and everywhere.

Mr. Macdonnell: Within the four corners of GATT.

Mr. Regier: I will not agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that this has been done within the four corners of GATT. I believe the Canadian record in this regard is almost as bad as the record of the United States, and the record of the United States government in observing the spirit of GATT is very bad indeed as we Canadians have good cause to know because we have had to suffer the effects of many of the major violations on the part of the U.S.A. Our government seems to pursue a merry course, independent and in isolation. Let the rest of the world form economic trading blocs; let the rest of the world get together in groups and abolish tariff barriers—we Canadians are going to steer our own course; we are even going to increase the walls which surround us, by the back door method if by no other method. We predict that this will be disastrous to the health of the Canadian economy. I am unwilling to advocate at this moment that we should affiliate ourselves with one economic bloc or another, but I do say we have to consider what is happening in the world and that it is disastrous for Canada to isolate herself and to become, in effect, even more exclusively dependent for our economic welfare on the level of economic activity prevailing the other side of the 49th parallel.

This government was elected on a declaration that we ought to take a few of our eggs out of that one basket and place them in a few other baskets. But ever since 1957 this government has done absolutely nothing to make this country any less dependent on the United States economy. The government and its supporters cannot point to a single instance where, by legislation or otherwise, they have attempted to distribute our eggs into more than the one basket.

We say that this government is undeserving of interim supply because it lacks a national transportation policy. Oh yes, it has set up royal commissions on this subject and investigations on that. But I ask you, Mr. Chairman, how can we deal with the problem of the railroads of Canada without also considering trucking, shipping, air lines and all other modes of transportation? We have no national transportation policy. True, we have resolved our railroad problem for the time being. We have swept it under the rug until the end of this year. I can well understand why the Prime Minister may want an election this fall: It is because round about the end of this year he will again be faced with the ugly problem which is presented to us by the national railroads. All we have done so far is to sweep this under the rug and it may well be an election will be held before we have to face this difficulty. What we need is a real royal commission to consider transportation in all its aspects rather than a royal commission investigating only one phase of national transportation. We in this group say that national transportation involves a public utility and that sooner or later we shall have to reach the conclusion that public utilities ought to be publicly owned.

We have no national policy on energy. We have conflicting interests. We have an ineffective national energy board whose terms of reference and whose powers are so limited that it is unable to deal adequately with the work assigned to it, because it is forbidden to explore other fields of energy.

As I mentioned yesterday, this government is unworthy of interim supply because it is turning back the clock of Canadian national development. I am not going to pursue that subject now, except to say a word or two on the utter failure of this administration to develop a national capital of which we can all be proud. Ottawa is a city which is magnificent in many respects, but everything of magnificence in this city is here as a result of the national capital commission. We have slums side by side with splendour and I believe the time is long overdue, especially since we are going to celebrate a hundredth birthday two years hence, for much more aggressive action to be taken on the part of the government.

We have a government which does not recognize the need of national growth in the economic field so as to provide for full employment. We say that full employment can be obtained in Canada and that it is essential to national prosperity. We also say that until plans to this end are able to take effect no one in Canada should have to suffer because, through no fault of his own, he is unable to earn a livelihood. In the early days of Canadian history anyone was able to take an axe and the gun, go out into the wilds and acquire his basic needs. That day has now gone. Today people are living in apartments and are paying relatively high rents. They are completely helpless in obtaining employment. It is no longer up to them to decide whether or not they shall work. Other people have the exclusive power to decide that. If these individuals cannot work all we can do for them apparently under this government is provide unemployment insurance and, when that runs out, a small degree of welfare hardly sufficient to meet the monthly rental. That is not good enough. The government of the day promised the people something entirely different when they last went to the country. For this reason we should like to see them again go to the people. I am sure the people will not have forgotten the promises made in 1958.

The government has completely failed to introduce an all inclusive and comprehensive social security program. In the field of portable pensions we heard a few words during the budget speech to the effect that the minister is going to look into the existing provincial and private pension schemes in an attempt to see whether he can arrive at some mutually satisfactory arrangement. As long as this government is going to depend on private pension schemes in Canada it will have failed in the field of social security. The government must bring forward a pension scheme which is portable under federal government supervision. In order to do so I realize there must be co-operation among the provincial and federal governments. It cannot be done by the federal government alone. We heard during the budget speech that the government intended to look into the existing private schemes operating in the various provinces to see if some measure of portability in respect to pensions could be achieved. I suggest this is inadequate on the part of the government.

Mr. Chairman, we feel that this government lacks both ability and determination to resolve the social economic problems of the Canadian people. We believe in expansion and progress, and we believe success in this field is beyond private programs. We are not so sure that possibly the promises made in 1958 did not outline the proper course, but from then till now it has become obvious that the follow-up on the part of the government on behalf of the people has been inadequate. Indeed, we believe this government is responsible to the nation as well as to the individuals of this nation. We believe this government has responsibility to world peace and progress in that direction. We realize that it has failed there too.

I will admit that the Liberal party during 22 long years finally led us into the mess in which we arrived in 1957. However, the Tories claimed they had the answer to the situation. We maintain that only a party which is free, with members of parliament who are free to express their personal opinions without being in hock to campaign funds will be able to give good government to the people of Canada.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am amazed by the great eagerness on the part of members of parliament to go home. I think it is important that we should illustrate some of the reasons why they are anxious to go home.

In the last few weeks we have been involved mainly in discussions regarding the banks, bankers and banking problems. This is something we should have expected a Social Credit representative in this house to precipitate. We have been continuously amazed by some of the things which have happened. We are at the present time amazed as a result of some of the things which have happened in the last day or two regarding the banking situation.

The latest rumour I heard is that the former governor of the Bank of Canada has been offered the chairmanship of the international monetary fund, and that one of his first jobs will be to call upon the Canadian Minister of Finance to justify the position taken in relation to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. Of course, we also hear the story that Donald Gordon is being replaced and recalled to the bank where he was formerly the deputy governor to take over the duties of the governor. These are all interesting suppositions. I suggest there will be more rumours as days go by.

I had hoped that the Prime Minister would be in the chamber in order to give us the benefit of a statement of fact in this regard, because it is the Prime Minister who will be appointing the new governor. We should like to know if it is going to be Donald Gordon because he in turn will be replaced by someone else. I presume that individual will be my friend and colleague from Port Arthur, or one of the other applicants for the job who are not nearly as well qualified.

It is very interesting to see that the Minister of Finance has not been with us today. I do not know what his absence means.

Mr. Drysdale: He has been here more often today than you have.

Mr. Peters: I just did not happen to see him, in that event. Mr. Chairman, I believe the people of Canada are going to pay very close attention to the position in which the Minister of Finance now finds himself in relation to the British parliamentary system.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak much longer along this line because I believe that basically the fight is between the present government and the official opposition. I suggest both those parties have had their day in court. The opposition have been fortunate to find that some of their colleagues have been able to justify the existence of the Senate itself. This was of interest to me because I have always been of the opinion that the Senate could not be reformed but only abolished. I am interested in what the Prime Minister intends to do. I am very interested in this aspect of the situation because for the first time since I have been a member of the House of Commons the Senate has expressed its opinion and has stood on its own feet. There is no point in discussing what the Senate did or why it did it. However, if we are going to the people we must have a program covering a diversity of things. The Canadian people are going to be unhappy with what has happened within the last day or two. No one likes to see an underdog trampled upon. I think they have been ashamed as a result of the Prime Minister standing up in this house threatening the other place. I am pleased the Senate took the stand it did and I hope it results in an election. It is for this reason that I say this. In my opinion the Prime Minister of this country is not a big enough man to run the whole country. He obviously needs a cabinet—

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member on his own admission has been conjecturing about many things, the successor to the head of the Bank of Canada and one thing and another. Now he is giving his conjecture about the Prime Minister. I take it this is his own vacuous opinion and his opinion only because it would be just as right for me to say that I heard a rumour that the hon. member was going to drop dead but I fear it is somewhat exaggerated.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The matter raised seems to be more in the nature of debate than a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: It should not be dignified by the term "debate".

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I can only say that I hope the hon. member is not clairvoyant. If this is a premonition born of his imagination I hope it proves to be incorrect. I can assure the hon. member that I have been scared of this too and I have been paying my insurance regularly so things will not be nearly as bad as they might otherwise be. In my opinion, and I think this opinion will be shared by the majority of Canadians, the Prime Minister is not a big enough man, no matter who he is, to be completely responsible for everything. I suggest that it was the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Finance, who interfered in the situation respecting the Bank of Canada. We have already had proof that there was no difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the head of the Bank of Canada. It is only a personal opinion but I presume that the Prime Minister did not like the way he parted his hair or maybe there were other reasons why he did not like him so he had to go. I suggest that the Canadian people are not going to be interested in this kind of development.

The parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs rose and made a contribution tonight.

An hon. Member: The poor man's Donald Fleming.

Mr. Peters: He may be considered by some to be the poor man's Donald Fleming but I would suggest he is the rich man's Donald Fleming. Probably he is a lot better off than the Minister of Finance, but that is only conjecture. He got up and pointed out some things but he did not point out that all hon. members of this house and every Canadian citizen who has really thought about the matter have agreed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and we have been proud of the job he has done. We also know that before the present minister took over the portfolio the Prime Minister handled that department.

We also know that Canada has degenerated so that it is no longer a first or second power in international affairs but a very poor one that is not given much credit at all. It is never certain whether we are for armament or for disarmament. One minister may get up and say that we are in favour of armament. Certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs whom we have supported has not done so but there are others who are suggesting that we should increase our contribution to NATO and continue under the NATO banner when we know that under NATO there are nuclear arms which all of us have said are not a good thing. It is very difficult to equate these two things because if the Secretary of State for External Affairs were allowed to have his way this would not be a fact.

I think the Canadian people are going to be very interested in this election. It seems to me that the Diefenbaker government will not be nearly as popular as it was before. It also seems to me that unless this government sits down and does some thinking it will not have been reborn. It has been said that I belong to a party that is going to have a convention and become something else. Make no mistake about it, Mr. Chairman. The Canadian people did not buy a Conservative government. They bought the Diefenbaker government because they thought it was different and lately they have realized how different. It was without a doubt an odd-ball among unorthodox governments if there has ever been one.

We belong to a party, Mr. Chairman, that is going to develop a policy that will, I am sure, be the culmination of discussions that have gone on in every community and every organization which we have had the opportunity to interest. They have discussed our program. Our program will be a program of the people and I am quite sure that most of us will be in a position to give it wholehearted support. We hope that the government will be interested in calling an election on the basis of this kind of program.

Mr. Benidickson: The program is not known yet.

Mr. Peters: They are in the position, if they wish, to fight the election on Senate reform. I am interested in going home from this place tonight with the hope that the Prime Minister was being honest with the people when he said that if the other place did not do so and so he would have to go to a higher court and there would have to be an election. I hope that is exactly what he does because I am interested in solutions for unemployment. We are interested in solutions for such things as portable pensions. We have heard the Minister of Finance talk about helping the provincial governments to get into this field. We think that the federal government should move into this field right away and hope and expect that the provincial governments will follow.

As far as agriculture is concerned, maybe there is nothing wrong with agriculture but I think something should be done to solve some of the problems. We have had such reports as eggs selling for 15 cents a dozen. This does not happen in my part of the country which obviously means that we should remove the regional basis from the stabilization act and apply the act across the country so that no farmer will get only 15 cents a dozen for eggs.

We believe that marketing legislation is necessary on a planned basis not only to handle grain. The government is to be congratulated for the efforts it has made through the wheat board to sell grain as that board has done for other governments. We believe that the same thing should be done in order to establish markets for milk, cheese, butter and other commodities from the sale of which our farmers are not getting a decent standard of living. I will not talk about all the other problems that agriculture has. Certainly we have a calamity in western Canada. This situation has developed because the Liberal government would not do anything. The Saskatchewan river dam should have been built a long time ago and if it had been in operation now it would have solved the problem for many thousands of farmers in western Canada. Now all we can do is to help the farmers in some way.

I make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman. Let us bring some of those farmers to my area in northern Ontario. The hay on many of the farms there has not been cut for quite a number of years. The municipalities own many of them and they would be quite willing to rent equipment to the farmers so they could cut the hay. They could then ask for government assistance to transport the hay to the west. Let us offer them something good and have them do something for themselves as well. We will co-operate and I am sure that if the government gives leadership this will be of assistance to them.

One of our greatest needs is something about which the government has never done anything, the establishment of a department to handle industrial development. In northern Ontario as in the maritimes and other depressed areas of Canada—they may not like the word "depressed" and there may be a better one—they are not capable at the present time of providing employment for the people who live in those areas and we believe that a department must be set up to help them, as was done in England, and to give consideration to the moving of industry from overcrowded places like Toronto to areas that are much more in need of industries than such cities are. We believe in economic planning and this means planning for our industry and our communities. There are many communities in the country that are now pleading for government aid, leadership and assistance in order to do something about this problem. These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the election issues to which this government has not faced up as yet, but to which they will have to face up.

We are interested in something else. During the last election campaign we heard this government talk about their interest in the development of Canadianism. They wanted us to buy Canadian, produce Canadian and develop Canadian things. I believe we will hear more about this during the coming election campaign. We also believe in this policy. We are surprised, however, when we find that the Minister of Finance is trying to stablilize the Canadian dollar by buying and selling United States currency. Good heavens, can you think of anything more silly than that when we have gold in this country which could be held in reserve and would be a much better method of stabilizing our Canadian dollar? Let us hold more of our gold so that we can stabilize our own currency within our own country and not have to borrow or buy United States dollars in order to keep the Canadian dollar at par. This may be a line of argument about which we will hear a great deal more.

I thought the Conservative party had always been interested in stabilizing money. I always thought they were the strong currency party, and I thought they believed in the stabilization of money. On the other hand, we have heard rumours recently about the Minister of Finance asking the banks to lower their liquid assets by 2 per cent in order that the government could get the money to pay the farmers the $200 million in cash advances. Let us at least get enough gold reserves in this country and let us pay for that gold so that we will revitalize the great gold mining industry. We should set a price of $50 for that gold and not worry about the United States. It is all very well for the Department of External Affairs to worry about the United States, but let us be Canadians and let us start worrying about ourselves. Let us build up our own country on the assets we have, and we have many of them.

One of the second greatest assets we have in this country is our labour. We are not going to be a strong, wealthy country until we provide employment for every Canadian who wants to work. This is not being done now. I suggest these are some of the things that are going to be election issues. There are quite a number of other issues that we will be raising in this election campaign. I only hope that this promise of an election is not going to be another one of the Prime Minister's broken promises. This is really an obligation to the people of Canada. I believe he has an obligation, too, to those people in the Senate who answered him in kind. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this is not going to be another one of the Prime Minister's broken promises about which we have heard so often in the last four years.

Mr. Matheson: Does the hon. member know that according to a Canadian press report which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on May 16, 1957, Mr. Diefenbaker at Carman, Manitoba, called for reform of the Senate so it would not "blindly follow the government's dictates" and strengthening of the power of parliamentary committees to obtain information? Does the hon. member know that?

Mr. Peters: I did not know that, Mr. Chairman, but I am not surprised by my ignorance because I have not followed this subject very closely. The party I represent, and with which I have had some association for a long time—

Mr. Drysdale: What party was that?

Mr. Peters: The C.C.F. party. I hope the hon. member who asked the question has had as long an association with his party as I have had with mine. The C.C.F. party has always felt that we could not reform the Senate, it had to be abolished. Let me cite an example, Mr. Chairman. There is a gentleman sitting in the front row of the government benches who is over 75 years of age. In my opinion, this gentleman has more brains than all the backbenchers put together. One of the senators with whom I have had a good deal of disagreement and whom I have not supported, is now 84 years of age. I think, Mr. Chairman, that you cannot use age as a criterion for reform of the Senate. If this is not the reform that is suggested, and I am only saying that it might be because of what has happened to some of the judges of this country, then before we leave this session the Prime Minister should tell us the kind of reform he advocates.

I was pleased to hear the question raised, Mr. Chairman. I was not surprised, though, because I knew the Liberal party was not interested in getting rid of the Senate. They had thirty years to do this. They have not much interest in reform. The Conservative party, therefore, must have been the ones who were interested in reform. I think the public will be very interested in the arguments that they put forward on Senate reform, an issue upon which we are going to be fighting a national election very soon.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I have been thinking over the rights of parliament, Mr. Chairman. I have been advised that the hon. member for Niagara Falls is going to be crowned a princess on Saturday. She will be crowned Princess Ya-Go-Da-Dia-Se, which means in English "She speaks for others". I am much concerned about one or two aspects of this honour. In view of the attitude of the former Canadian government toward Canadians accepting titles, would it be a violation of Canadian law if the hon. lady accepted this title? I wish also to know whether, in view of her elevation to royal rank she will be required to vacate her seat? If she is not required to vacate her seat, would she have to re-sign the roll in view of the change in name and title? I rise on this question of privilege because it has been concerning me for a few minutes.

Mr. Argue: I rise for a few moments at this particular time—

Mr. Drysdale: Are you on the question of privilege?

Mr. Argue: No. I rise to bring before the committee a grievance which I hope the Minister of Labour might consider. I see he is in the chamber and will undoubtedly consider the remarks I have to make. I am dealing with this matter at this time because there is the happy prospect of the house rather quickly adjourning and because the situation to which I shall refer has been deteriorating in recent days and may result, although I would hope not, in a very disagreeable strike from the standpoint of the employees, the company and the public. I refer, of course, to the current dispute between the Canadian air lines flight attendants association and Trans-Canada Air Lines. This issue has been raised in the house on orders of the day by myself and the hon. member for Skeena as well as others.

Although the minister has taken an interest in this subject there has not been any hopeful indication that this dispute is likely to be resolved amicably within a short time. The request of the employees' association for an inquiry into certain allegations has not been accepted by the government. A conciliation board, and its report, very often are helpful in arriving at the settlement of such a dispute. We have had some experience in this kind of recommendation with regard to another very major labour dispute in this country of some months ago, namely that between the non-operating employees of the railways and the railway management. The government some months ago failed to give, in our opinion, adequate support to the recommendations of the conciliation board which had been accepted by the employees. But none the less, after an interval of some months in which the public felt a railway strike might be imminent, the issue was settled on the basis of the conciliation board report.

In this dispute things have been following an almost identical pattern. A conciliation board was set up. A majority report was made and, as far as two particulars are concerned, one of the members presented a dissenting report. A number of issues are involved but the issues in main dispute consist of additional pay because of the flight of high speed aircraft, the attendant inconvenience to the employees involved, the additional work involved, the additional amount of time required off the aircraft in order to make up a certain number of hours of actual employment.

The employees presented their case asking that one minute be added to each hour of time spent in the air for each additional ten miles of speed of the aircraft in excess of 300 miles an hour. The majority report of the conciliation board recommended a one-minute addition for each hour of service of employment in the air for each additional 25 miles per hour speed in excess of 300 miles per hour. Hence the employees, by this majority report, would receive 40 per cent of the amount they had requested.

They had also requested a general 15 per cent increase in pay. The conciliation board report was favourable to a 5 per cent increase in pay retroactive to October 1, 1960.

There seems to be a good deal of evidence that the company have really not bargained in good faith, and that they have taken steps which would suggest that they are endeavouring to recruit alternative employees or strike breakers, as they are very frequently called, with which to replace the employees involved in the dispute and that this kind of activity—and I think this is a serious charge —has been engaged in while the conciliation board was considering its report and certainly before the report had been made public. It is the feeling of the employees that they have been subjected to a great deal of intimidation, and they are therefore asking the minister to make an inquiry into this particular allegation.

I have in my hand a copy of a teletype dispatch sent out by the management to all T.C.A. stations prior to the report of the conciliation board. By reading this teletype dispatch I think I can point out exactly what the employees have in mind. The dispatch reads as follows:

> The company has been attempting to negotiate a new contract with the flight attendants association since last summer. The major point at issue has been a "jet speed" clause which would result in approximately a 40 per cent increase in wage costs for flight attendants on DC-8 aircraft apart from the across the board increases demanded. Such a clause is unprecedented in the industry and is totally unacceptable to the company. The associations' bargaining representatives, however, have been adamant in their refusal to modify the specific demand in any way. As a result, an impasse was reached. The matter was referred to a conciliation board, and the report of this board is expected momentarily.

It had not yet been received.

It is the law that following the receipt of a conciliation board's report by the Minister of Labour in Ottawa, a period of seven days must elapse before it becomes legal for a union to take strike action. The company very sincerely hopes that such a situation will not develop. It is determined, however, that should the situation come about, it will continue to operate all its services, and it is therefore obviously essential that it immediately take whatever preparatory steps are necessary to insure that this is possible.

One of the needs will be to provide the minimum necessary substitutes for those flight attendants who may decide to strike. It is desired to do this within the company by drawing personnel from supervisory ranks and other non-union employee groups. A course of training has already been worked out which will qualify such employees for limited flight attendant duties. It is obvious that if the company is to protect its essential services, sufficient numbers of company employees are requested to act as flight attendants for the duration of any strike. Volunteers will be posted to stations at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal. If they are posted away from their homes they will be on full reasonable expenses for this duration of their special assignment. If they are posted to a station at which they are normally based, they will be relieved of their present duties and will be on stand by for flight service following the training. It will not be necessary for these employees to undergo special medical examinations, to secure uniforms or to procure special dress. All employees will be provided with a special identification badge and their duties will require them to work at any time within a 24 hour period and in some cases with very limited notice. Their normal salaries will be paid for this period plus $5 per day for each day or part thereof spent flying.

In the interest of keeping the air line operating, and in keeping everyone who is not on strike on the payroll, will you please solicit volunteers immediately from the following ranks: secretarial, stenographic, clerical, managers, sales representatives, supervisors, and any other employees who fall within the non-union group and who can be spared from the day to day operation of the air line. If necessary, consideration can be given to replacing the employees released for temporary flight attention duties with office overload or similar service. Male or female personnel will be accepted from any age group regardless of whether or not they would normally qualify as flight attendants. Would you please take action immediately and forward an initial list of names, classification and location by teletype directly to me within 24 hours of receipt of this teletype bearing in mind that personnel may possibly be required to be positioned by next week. On receipt of these names further instructions will be issued with respect to date and place of assignment as circumstances require.

Mr. Chairman, I think this demonstrates that the company has gone to no end of trouble to recruit persons, irrespective of their medical condition, without respect to their age, and beyond the normal type of qualifications that are necessary for flight attendants. It has been suggested, and I think rightly so, that the whole safety factor by the management has been thrown out the window in this hurried endeavour to recruit strike breakers amongst the other employees of Trans-Canada Air Lines. This has been sent out before the conciliation board report has been received and it has been suggested that by so doing the company has failed to bargain collectively in a responsible manner.

Because of this situation Robert Smeale, the business manager of the Canadian air lines flight attendants' association, and others have asked that the Department of Labour make an inquiry into these kind of activities to see to what extent the company has engaged in them and to ascertain whether or not this kind of course is in keeping with the normal public safety that should be provided to passengers on T.C.A. aircraft.

Mr. Chairman, as I said when I commenced my remarks, I raise this question only because this session is likely to be adjourned in a short time, because the situation with regard to this labour dispute is serious, and in the hope that the minister will reply and will use his good offices to the end that a fair and reasonable decision may be arrived at in the interests of the employees, the company and more particularly the general public.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the minister is using his good offices in this dispute and I wish to thank the hon. member for his observations, suggestions and advice.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution is carried perhaps I may be allowed to make a brief comment.

An hon. Member: Brief?

Mr. Howard: During the latter part of the day we have placed a number of matters on the record and have made a number of suggestions which we hope the government will consider in those leisure summer days between now and when we reconvene, if we reconvene. If and when we do reconvene we hope the government will bring these matters forward in the form of legislation in order to give effect to our proposals and so take steps to protect and advance the interests of the people of this nation.

We can only wonder, in view of the earlier inflammatory statements by the Prime Minister, just what he has in mind with respect to some recent activities in the other place. We wonder whether or not this indecision on the part of the Prime Minister, for which he is noted, is because he has not yet decided which date he will put upon the undated but signed letter of resignation that the Minister of Finance signed on the day he entered the cabinet. We also wonder whether the Prime Minister is deciding how much time will elapse after this signed but undated letter of resignation is dated before he decides to appoint the Minister of Finance, in order to save face all the way round, as the governor of the Bank of Canada. If this is the reason for indecision, we can understand it.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Churchill moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, the sum of $1,045,379,927.94, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this resolution is carried I wish to ask a factual question of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I should have asked this question in committee of supply. Would the parliamentary secretary assure us that a fraction—and would he also tell us what fraction it is, because I have not had time to look it up—of the special supplementary estimate for Cape Breton is included in this bill?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is a fraction, Mr. Chairman. It is seven twelfths.

Mr. Benidickson: The item being originally in the last special supplementary estimates.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes. It is seven twelfths.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, would the parliamentary secretary advise us very briefly what means the government is intending to employ to obtain the necessary revenue now about to be voted, in case ordinary receipts are inadequate.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The usual means, Mr. Chairman.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-123, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1962.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the bill with which we are going to deal has been presented to the members of the committee. It was agreed yesterday that we would defer debate on the particular bill which has been handed to us. I am sure that the unnumbered bill relating to possible agreements between the federal government and the governments of the provinces is not the bill that should have been distributed.

The Chairman: That matter is being corrected, I understand.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): More confusion.

Mr. Benidickson: I simply rise to obtain an assurance from the parliamentary secretary who, I know, has given study to the drafting of this bill which has only come into our hands at this moment, that the measure, in its wording, is in complete conformity with the tradition on interim supply and that there are no gimmicks or hidden notes in it and that there is no item connected with the estimates of 1961-62 involved in the schedules to this bill which are completely to be passed, or that we shall not have an opportunity to discuss when we resume this sitting perhaps after the recess of this particular question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On the basis of the assurances given to me I have no hesitation in saying to the committee that this is in the standard and traditional form of interim supply. It contains none of what the hon. member refers to as gimmicks; none of the items is voted in full, and the passage of this bill will in no way restrict the discussion in committee of supply on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, on the resolution stage we were dealing with simply fractions of less than the maximum of twelve twelfths.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): The house seems to have wound up the business with which it was to concern itself today. I have to make an unusual appeal. I hope the house will be good enough at least to listen to me in patience and with some understanding. Perhaps the house may even consent to take action along the lines I shall propose. I represent the sponsor for 356 divorce bills from the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland. Somebody may have said "shame", but as a Nova Scotian I am not without pride in trying to be of service to fellow Canadians in other provinces.

For four months now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried both in this chamber and in the other chamber, running up and down these stone stairs, to try to get some agreement among people in all parties with different points of view to settle the divorce question, if the divorce question can be settled in parliament without offending the feelings of those in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. I think I should immediately make it perfectly plain that while there may be winds of change in the divorce field I have seen evidence of none of those winds of change from the two particular provinces concerned. Distasteful as it may seem to some of us, we do have to consider divorce bills in parliament. After four months of what I consider hard work, I regret that at this moment I am not able to report general agreement on how to alter our present procedure with regard to divorce or, at least, not general agreement to the extent that it will not hurt some people. I think of two people who may feel they are hurt if we adopt the report of the committee on rules and procedure. I would prefer, if possible, to avoid the hard feelings which must accompany even a step which seems as judicial and fair as that. I do not wish to take the time of the house unduly this evening, Mr. Speaker, but my proposal is this. There are 356 cases. The best opinion I have, after consulting everybody who has an interest in this subject, is that between 12 and 15 cases are of the contentious variety. Some of them have been contested in the other place. Some are going to be contested in this place. Others, while they were uncontested in the other place, should be the subject of further examination in the miscellaneous private bills committee of this house. That was obvious after examination by myself, the hon. member for Skeena, the hon. member for Timiskaming and other hon. members. We know the names and numbers of those cases. It would be a simple matter to take those 12 or 15 cases and refer them to the miscellaneous private bills committee.

It is now 20 minutes after nine. We could have that chore done by 9.30 and we could have passed some 340 other cases and carried out a duty owed to the people of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. I ask all members of this house to do this humane thing on behalf of those who have petitioned Her Majesty. I ask them to take this course after consulting their hearts, their minds, and their consciences. This is the only way in which these people can obtain relief. They have petitioned Her Majesty and we are the human agents here who can say: yes, you may have that relief, or, no, you shall not.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I am not sure what the request is. Perhaps the hon. member for Halifax would indicate what the request is.

Mr. McCleave: Yes. I will make the request very specific so that even the hon. member for Skeena may understand that request. The hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Timiskaming have between six and a dozen cases which they wish examined. Let me have the names of those cases. They can bring down their files in five minutes. We can take the dozen cases which have to be examined and all the others can be passed by 9.30.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Halifax, junior or senior, I do not know which, was permitted to make some remarks preliminary to his request and I hope I shall be allowed the same latitude in that regard.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax on placing himself in the position of being the defender of rights of people in substitution for a government which is a bit of a jelly fish in this regard, one with no backbone to deal with the matter properly.

Mr. Speaker, the gratification that the hon. member for Halifax oozes all over himself makes me a bit sick because we had discussed this earlier, and the hon. member for Halifax is now double crossing us in the approach that we agreed upon.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There has been no double cross on the part of the member for Halifax or any other member of this house in regard to the matter of divorce. There has been no double cross whatsoever.

Mr. Howard: I say there has been a double cross and you are the party in charge of it. I will name the others as well if you wish.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it proposed that the house now rise for an interval of time?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the suggestion made by the hon. member for Halifax could be considered by the house now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's suggestion would of course require unanimous consent. I take it from what has been said by the hon. member for Skeena that unanimous consent will not be forthcoming.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word or two in regard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no scope here for debate. If unanimous consent is forthcoming I shall be pleased to put the question to the house. Perhaps the hon. member will indicate whether he intends to give consent. I take it that no matter what he says now unanimous consent will not be forthcoming.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There was some discussion this afternoon in regard to a request that came for the hon. member for Halifax, and I do not think it has been properly put to the house. The hon. member suggested that there was some agreement among the parties regarding certain divorce bills appearing on the order paper. In these cases it was proposed that there would be an annulment rather than a divorce granted. I understand there are four or five cases of this nature. This group is in agreement with the hon. member in respect to those four or five cases where the scientific evidence has been presented. In view of that, Mr. Speaker, I understand that unanimous consent would be forthcoming. I think his suggestion in this regard would be of interest to this group if it were reworded.

Mr. Speaker: It is suggested there would be no objection to proceeding with the four or five cases of annulment among the divorce bills. Does the hon. member for Halifax wish to take that course?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I shall take that course if I am forced into it. Since there is not unanimous consent in respect to the 350 divorce cases, against my instincts I have to salvage whatever I can out of the wreckage caused by the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Howard: What a foul, slimy approach.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes me to go into a debate and pursue it into his public and private life in respect to remarks such as he has just made, I shall be glad to oblige; but the winds of change will sweep him from this chamber.

Mr. Howard: The member for Halifax has promoted all of this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not propose to allow remarks of that kind to blight the last hour of the session. If there is not an honourable agreement to be reached the matter is closed.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, there are four annulments in respect of which all parties had agreed, but one was a contested case before the committee of the other place and it is the usual practice that contested cases must go to the committee on miscellaneous and private bills, so that in all conscience I can move only three of these annulment cases at this time.

The house in committee on Bills Nos. SD-101, SD-107 and SD-265, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Bill No. SD-101, for the relief of Edel Haimes—Mr. McCleave.

Bill No. SD-107, for the relief of William Paschal Hayes—Mr. McCleave.

Bill No. SD-265, for the relief of Mathilde Marcelle Mathieu—Mr. McCleave.

The Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCleave moved the third reading of Bills Nos. SD-101, SD-107 and SD-265.

Motion agreed to and bills read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the agreement that was reached some time ago when the other bills were to be debated, if we could not reach agreement—and I refuse to negotiate the divorce bills further—I hereby give notice of a motion that when the house resumes the bills be placed in their proper order and listed separately on the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this, the 157th day of the longest session, up to this moment, I move, seconded by Mr. Churchill:

> That when this house adjourns today it stand adjourned until September 7, 1961, at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon, provided always that if it appears to be satisfactory to Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Motion agreed to.

Royal Assent

SITTING SUSPENDED

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while awaiting word from the Senate with regard to the passage of the last bill, may we rise to resume our sitting at the call of the Chair?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that we suspend this sitting to meet again at the call of the Chair to be signified by the ringing of the bell?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 10.15 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa, July 13, 1961

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Charles Holland Locke, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber at 10.15 p.m. for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,

E. Joly De Lotbiniere
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Railway Act.

An act to amend the Excise Act.

An act to amend the Customs Tariff.

An act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

An act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

An act to amend the Income Tax Act.

An act to authorize the provision of monies to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System for the period from the 1st day of January, 1961, to the 30th day of June, 1962, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

An act for the relief of Edel Haimes.

An act for the relief of William Paschal Hayes.

An act for the relief of Mathilde Marcelle Mathieu.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1962.

It being forty-two minutes after 10 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order, until Thursday, September 7, 1961.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—AVAILABILITY OF WORK PLANS IN VANCOUVER

Question No. 261—Mr. Taylor:

1. Have complaints been made that government departments have lodged plans in Edmonton and Ottawa, but not in Vancouver, when calling for tenders on work in the area of the Alaska highway, Yukon Territory, and Mackenzie river delta?

2. Would the minister consider lodging construction plans in Vancouver when filing plans elsewhere?

Answer by: Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. The British Columbia branch of the Canadian plumbing and mechanical contractors association wrote to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources about this matter on June 9. A similar letter dated June 14 was addressed to the Prime Minister by the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines.

2. In answering these letters, it was explained that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has very few tender calls of any significant size in the areas concerned and those that there are relate mainly to the purchase of prefabricated buildings. It was pointed out, however, that the department had followed the practice for some time—and would continue to do so—of lodging plans and specifications with the Vancouver district office of the water resources branch.

In addition to departmental work, there are also projects carried out on our behalf by the Yukon territorial government. The commissioner of the Yukon Territory has been asked to ensure that when he lodges plans and specifications for tender calls in Edmonton, he also lodges them in Vancouver.

MOVEMENT OF CEREALS, ST. LAWRENCE RIVER HARBOURS

Question No. 270—Mr. Bourget:

1. Which harbours on the St. Lawrence river are used almost exclusively for the movement of cereals to foreign markets?

2. What has been the quantity, in bushels, of the cereals exported from Quebec harbour during the following years: 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, and 1960?

3. What quantities of cereals have been exported during the same years from the following harbours: Montreal, Sorel, Three Rivers, and Baie Comeau?

4. On what basis has the government established its policy of maintaining the ratio of cereal shipments from Quebec harbour at 9 per cent or 10 per cent of the quantity shipped through all other harbours on the St. Lawrence river?

5. What has been the quantity of cereals, in bushels, delivered for local consumption from cereal silos situated in the following harbours: Montreal, Sorel, Three Rivers, Quebec, and Baie Comeau, for the years 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, and 1960?

6. What is the storage capacity of the cereals silos situated in the following harbours: Montreal, Sorel, Three Rivers, Quebec, and Baie Comeau?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. The only port on the St. Lawrence used almost exclusively for the movement of cereals to foreign markets is the new bay port of Baie Comeau. Additionally, the export movement at Sorel and Three Rivers accounts for the bulk of the grain handlings at these ports. At the remaining ports domestic shipments in a normal year will represent a sizeable proportion of total handlings.

4. There is no set percentage of grain allocated for export from each port. Generally, export shipments depend on the grain and grade of grain available in the elevator for export after allowing for domestic needs, whether berths are available at the time of presentation of ocean tonnage and the wishes of the buyer as to the port of his choice.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION OFFICE MOVE, B.C.

Question No. 280—Mr. McLennan:

1. What was the reason for moving the farm credit corporation office from New Westminster, B.C., to Kelowna, B.C.?
2. Where is Kelowna in relation (a) to the centre of the province (b) to the largest agriculture production area?
3. How many employees found it necessary to resign their positions on account of the office being moved?
4. What percentage of the employees of the New Westminster office were displaced, or resigned, by the move?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture):

1. The farm credit corporation office was moved from New Westminster, B.C. to Kelowna, B.C. to provide improved service to loan applicants and for economy of administration.

As shown in the following statement, sixty per cent of the loans and loan applications in British Columbia are in the interior of the province.

	Lower Fraser Valley, Vancouver Island, Pemberton and Coastal Area	Interior
Past: Loan accounts on books, March 1959	464	683
Current: New loans, 1959-60	63	93
Future: New applications, April 1960-Sept. 15, 1960	42	92

Nine of the corporations field offices in British Columbia are located in the interior of the province as compared to four in the Fraser Valley and Vancouver island. It is more advantageous and economical to supervise these from Kelowna than from New Westminster.

2. (a) Kelowna is approximately 350 miles southeast of Vanderhoof which is considered the geographical centre of British Columbia.

(b) Most of British Columbia's agricultural production comes from that portion of the province lying between Cranbrook in the east and New Westminster in the west and from the international border to just north of Kamloops. Kelowna is situated almost exactly in the centre of this area and is well served with road communications to each of the corporation's field offices within this general agricultural area and the more sparsely settled agricultural areas in the north and northwest of the province.

3. Two.

4. 33 per cent.
