small business loans, a program of agricultural rehabilitation and development, increases in veterans pensions and allowances, advances in export credits, to mention but the highlights of the sessional bill of fare.

As I have said, these are each an integral part of a cohesive economic policy and program of real action. The Leader of the Opposition cannot assert, and he has carefully avoided asserting, that there is any other country in the western world which has adopted a program of economic and social action in any way comparable in extent, depth and impact to that which has been presented this session to parliament by this government.

Mr. Benidickson: Why is it the only one that has flopped in the western world?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this budget constitutes part of that program. This budget deserves the support of the house. It deserves, and I believe it will receive, the support of the country.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, did you notice that the hon. member who has just spoken is very nervous, as are, I suppose, all Conservative members at the present time? He is almost as nervous as the Conservative members from the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: You would make anybody nervous.

Mr. Denis: Perhaps it is because he comes from the province of Ontario, where there has been a by-election recently, where a Conservative majority of 3,530 in 1958 melted and changed into a golden Liberal victory of 2,548 according to an early report of the election results. When the hon. member speaks of a three to one victory, I would ask him to bear in mind what I have just said. I think the hon. member is all wrong.

Is he aware that in Kings a Conservative majority of 1,100 has melted to a small majority of 165. Is that the three to one victory referred to by the hon. member who has just spoken? Is he aware that in Esquimalt-Saanich, a Conservative majority of over 14,000 has melted into a small majority of 700?

Mr. Drysdale: What do you want—a consolation prize?

Mr. Denis: Was that a three to one victory for the Conservative party?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Your figures are wrong.

An hon. Member: Three to one.

Mr. Denis: In Restigouche-Madawaska a Conservative majority in 1958 of 4,000 melted into a small majority of 900. Is that a three to one victory for the Conservative party?

Mr. Drysdale: Yes.

Mr. Denis: I would say that if we do not have a general election at this time it is on account of the four by-elections. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman is very nervous. He even complains because we are using our big guns in order to fight the present budget.

An hon. Member: Do you consider yourself a big gun?

Mr. Drysdale: Popguns.

Mr. Denis: This is a free democracy. I do not include myself in the big gun category, but I do not think the parliamentary secretary contends that he is a big gun in the Conservative ranks. Since the beginning of the discussion of the budget we have heard from the Conservative ranks only water pistols.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now we are getting the blunderbuss.

Mr. Denis: Why? To defend a bad budget.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, let me rather commend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for his masterful speech. I am sure the people are only waiting for an opportunity, through a general election, to show their appreciation for the leader of the Liberal party and to take advantage of his competence not in the capacity of Leader of the Opposition, but as prime minister of Canada, to remedy the administration of the present government which has been running the country so badly for four years.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to commend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) for his great victory in relation to the budget. In fact, he has been able to persuade the Conservatives to remove the 7½ per cent excise tax on cars. However, as he has indicated, this removal of the tax comes too late, because the season is too far advanced.

I understand that the removal of this tax was designed to provide jobs for the unemployed, in view of the unemployment situation created by the Conservative party in the city of Windsor.

It will take more than a year before those unemployed workers can return to their jobs. Had the tax been removed two or three years ago, the citizens of Windsor who are now unemployed would not have to go back to their jobs, because they would already be there, and we would not see in the province of Quebec and in the other provinces the foreign cars which are displacing Canadian cars. Those cars came into Canada as a result of the trade mission led by the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill), and it seems that our trade commissioners were less interested in selling Canadian cars than in buying cars abroad.

An hon. Member: Why did your own party not remove this tax in 1956?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, it seems that this budget is an effort to repair the damage done by the government, but unfortunately, some of the damage will remain. Happily, the Canadian people will not have to wait too long to rid themselves of the present government's sloppy administration.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to support the position of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), who pointed out the meanness of this government in depriving postal employees of statutory leave.

I also take this opportunity to note the arrival in the house of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), who probably heard that I was going to speak; knowing his great fondness for my speeches, I thank him for coming to the house. While he is here, let me say how mean it is to deprive his employees of statutory leave, when employees of private enterprise are allowed such leave.

What is worse, to my mind, is that those who have intermittent employment, that is who do not regularly work eight hours a day, are not even entitled to annual leave. I think such an attitude is inhuman and small-minded.

In the city of Montreal, there are some postal employees who work intermittently seven days a week, and if one of them wants to leave, he must do so at his own cost and expense, because this government does not pay him a single cent. To my mind, such conditions are inhuman and obsolete.

I asked the Postmaster General a question with regard to this matter and he asked me to wait and reiterate my question when his estimates were discussed. All that is very well, but if a general election comes in the meantime, I am very much afraid that I shall not be able to ask him the same question, for the good reason that he will not be Postmaster General any more.

However, I would ask him not to wait until the post office estimates are discussed next year before he considers this request made to him by the hon. member for Skeena, myself and all opposition members, in view of getting fair treatment for these civil servants who are working intermittently.

Mr. Speaker, it would only require a few cents to pay the cost of those statutory and other holidays; in fact, I did suggest some means of doing so that would not cost this government too much.

It is well known that, year after year, the Conservative government has had deficits. Yet, Mr. Speaker, after reading papers this morning, I discovered a gold mine for this government. As a matter of fact, it seems that many thousand dollars do not get to the income tax division. Indeed, I read this morning in the Gazette:

(Text):

The federal Conservative party's chief organizer for eastern Quebec province testified before the Salvas royal commission here yesterday that he received more than $20,000 in National Union kickbacks.

At page 2 I read, referring to the testimony of Mr. Boucher:

His testimony came as the million dollar kickbacks probe—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would relate what he is saying to the subject under discussion. There are two problems which present themselves to me. One is that this relates to a provincial inquiry—I am not sure whether it is a judicial inquiry, royal commission or what it is, and to an inquiry into the conduct of an individual, an inquiry which has not yet concluded. The other aspect is that unless the hon. member relates it to the federal budget, it seems to me to be irrelevant.

Mr. Denis: I do not wish to make any comments as far as the issues are concerned. I wish to ask the Minister of Finance and the government to send some investigators there to watch the inquiry and find out whether there is some way of finding more money, because every year the government has deficits of hundreds of millions of dollars. Is it not the same as far as the hospital is concerned? I think the present government should look into every hospital in the province of Quebec which was administered by the Union Nationale. There is one, for instance, St. Luc hospital. Every director of this hospital is a Union Nationale organizer. I want the Minister of Finance to make inquiries about it. If the minister needs money he should ensure that income tax is paid by all Canadians. It is only just that those who pay their income taxes honestly should be protected. The government should ensure that those who perhaps do not earn their money in the same way most Canadian taxpayers do should also pay income tax.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite stated that Canadians were pleased with this budget.

I also heard some members say that the press had reacted favourably to the budget.

I do not know where they got their information. I personally scanned 35 papers, and almost everyone criticized this government in some way or other.

I have here a paper which says:

This is a record deficit in peacetime.

Another paper has this to say:

This is disappointing.

And another says:

There we have an anti-Coyne budget.

And here read:

(Text):

Too little too late.

(Translation):

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that those papers are published in each of the ten provinces of Canada.

Another paper says:

(Text):

This lack of decisiveness has been a factor in the confused marking time which has been so characteristic of the past year or more.

(Translation):

Another from Saskatchewan says:

(Text):

When an individual spends more than his income, he very quickly goes broke, but in the case of a nation, Canada as an example, when expenditures exceed income, it is politely termed deficit financing.

Another from Alberta reads:

In the past both Fleming and Diefenbaker have tried to escape responsibility for unpopular monetary policy by blaming it on the Bank of Canada.

An editorial in an Alberta newspaper calls it: "A dangerous budget". Another newspaper says the budget will increase the cost of living. Another says it is a tradition of Conservative governments to be on the deficit side every year. Another newspaper says there will be no jobs created for the unemployed, at least for many months, and that it is doubtful whether the budget will do anything to help the unemployed at the present time. Another newspaper says the budget is paving the way for inflation. Another newspaper says the budget is "uninspired and uninspiring".

May I also mention here what has been said about the budget by Joe Morris, western regional head of the international woodworkers of America who, as reported in the Nanaimo daily Free Press on June 21 described it as "A lame attempt to disguise the bankrupt fiscal policies of the Diefenbaker government." Almost every newspaper in Canada has criticized the present budget. I have gone through 35 of them, and almost every one condemns the government's budget, except of course Montreal Matin, which is so fanatically Conservative that it might even publish something in favour of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard).

[Mr. Denis.]

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this budget is a delayed April fool's hoax. It came out in June. And it came wrapped up in heavy paper and by heavy paper I mean that the presentation lasted $2\frac{3}{4}$ hours. It is packed up in some kind of piano box.

The mountain in labour has brought forth a mouse.

It took 175 pages, Mr. Speaker, to tell the people of Canada, to the unemployed: You will not get anything this year; to tell the farmers: You will not get anything this year, you will have to wait.

The only thing that may bring you comfort is that you will be able to smoke king size cigarettes at no extra cost.

As I said a moment ago, if we have not a general election this year it is on account of the four by-elections. I think that everything was set, that the Conservative electoral machinery was ready.

They were waiting for the results of the by-elections before launching the campaign which they had prepared in detail.

The Minister of Finance had the Coyne affair. The president of the C.N.R. had been summoned to Ottawa at about the same time.

The president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had also been summoned.

The Minister of Agriculture had gone off to China, to sign a contract for the sale of wheat. Of course, we do not know the terms of that sale.

There was also the question of the merchant marine. It was quickly disposed of. Construction of vessels began immediately, and so quickly that Canadian-produced engines cannot be used.

It was a Conservative member who said that, on June 22, and I must quote what he said, it is too edifying.

Mr. Grafftey: It is the other text.

Mr. Denis: I heard the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) mumble. I must warn him that if he continues misbehaving, his government will present a bill to have him thrown out of the house.

This is what the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Allmark) said:

No one who has followed—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member quoting from another debate?

Mr. Denis: No Mr. Speaker. In this debate, at page 7154 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Allmark) is reported to have said:

(Translation):

No one who has followed the shipbuilding industry has failed to notice the number of times foreign engines are used in ships belonging to the Canadian government. Too frequently we find that these ships are designed so that Canadian marine engines cannot be adapted for use in them, or that they can be adapted only at considerable additional cost.

Some time before the by-elections, we saw ministers devote their week ends to meetings. We saw some hon. members deliver their little speeches, either on veterans, lotteries, capital punishment, or any other subject, and those speeches were ready to be distributed.

One member went as far as writing to all his constituents here in Ottawa, to ask them if they were willing to take part in the election campaign in the constituency where he worked.

Well, during all that time, everything was ready. However, nasty blows fell on them: the results of the by-elections, the Coyne affair, which went against them. The Conservative backbenchers who make derogatory remarks about our public officials keep in the background and are afraid to question when they are here. I am referring for instance to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who often criticized the president of the C.N.R. in the house; yet, yet, when the parliamentary committee met to hear the president of the C.N.R., the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was conspicuously absent.

Mr. Pigeon: I cannot attend all committee meetings.

Mr. Denis: Yet, when one makes accusations, especially against so important an official as the president of the C.N.R. and the latter is called here as a witness, it is most important for the member who attacked him in the house to attend the meeting to question him and to tell him personally what he finds wrong with him. But the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm did not attend the meeting.

Besides, the members of the province of Quebec were preparing for the electoral campaign. They made speeches for and against a national flag, a national anthem, joint programs and university grants. They spoke for and against the Colombo plan, capital punishment and lotteries. In short there was something for everyone.

Nevertheless, the by-elections turned out against them. Moreover, the Coyne balloon burst, and instead of a "Fleming versus Coyne" budget, we have a "Fleming versus justice" budget, a "Fleming versus democracy" budget. It has also become a "Fleming versus bill of rights" budget.

I forgot to say that they had also based their campaign on the bill of rights. I understand the bill had been printed on calfhide with some writings intended to convince the Canadian people that this bill was the result of the excellent administration of this government. The strange thing is that this government violates the bill of rights at the first opportunity.

Moreover, another obstacle to a general election were the bombs which kept exploding in Quebec, so much so, that election organizers were not available for an electoral campaign as they were involved in various judicial inquiries.

I do not want to enlarge on that point, except to say that instead of a little chocolate budget which would have been served as dessert to the people in order to conceal from it the bad administration of this Tory government, all those blows which fell at the same time resulted in the Canadians getting not a budget which would have helped the little man, the unemployed, the taxpayer, but a budget which is interesting only by the number of pages it covers.

We were expecting a deficit. We know that the Minister of Finance was wrong in the past, and we think that he is wrong again this time.

In other words, in this budget, there is nothing for the little people, nothing for the man in the street, nothing for the taxpayer in general. If there is anything, it is the opportunity for big financiers to make a killing on the stock market, and I would not be surprised if those rich financiers who do business with the United States and are paid in American money made thousands and thousands of dollars of profits, as a result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

But what about, for instance, borrowers, not lenders, not those who export quantities of products, but those who borrow and have to repay, who have borrowed in the United States and who have to pay back in American dollars the loans they have made, such as municipalities, provinces and even individuals, who have been unable to find money at a reasonable rate during the Conservative administration and who had to go to the United States to get a better rate of interest? All those people will have to pay more, on account of the government's present policy, on account of the budget now being discussed in this house.

Recently—I think it was yesterday—the Minister of Finance said that the Canadian dollar had been devaluated by 3 per cent. Here is the result of that devaluation. I have here a report of the Ottawa Citizen, and I quote:

(Text):

G. A. Lascelles, finance commissioner of metropolitan Toronto, said each drop of one cent in the value of the Canadian dollar would add $200,000 a year to Toronto's costs on its American indebtedness.

This means that because the present government has devalued the dollar by three points it will cost Toronto $600,000 more a year to pay its indebtedness than it otherwise would.

(Translation):

The situation is the same in all other provinces and all other municipalities.

Montreal is on the market for a loan to build an underground railway, and if the authorities do not find enough money here in Canada, they will have to get it elsewhere, they will have to import the necessary funds. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, at what rate they will have to borrow from the U.S., now that the Canadian dollar is devaluated according to the wish of this government.

Therefore, those who have borrowed or all those who want to borrow, namely people of low income, will be the losers with this budget. On the other hand all those who lend money, all those who sell something will gain from it—the wealthy, the tycoons will again profit by it. Profitable deals on the stock exchange have multiplied since this budget was brought down. I am sure the budget does not provide for present conditions, where we should do all we can to fight the slump and stop unemployment, to lower the interest rates and the cost of living. This budget will do just the opposite. And if, by chance, it should have some useful results in a year or a year and a half from now, in the meantime, the unemployed will have to be satisfied with their scanty unemployment insurance benefits. It is fortunate the unemployment insurance fund was well filled. In fact, under an act introduced and carried out by a Liberal government, the Conservatives inherited a fund of $900 million, which unfortunately has declined now to $100 million.

Well, where would we find ourselves now, what would have happened to the unemployed if they had not had that fund that was created under a Liberal government? They would be hard-up indeed, they would be completely broke, they would be in trouble and they could not buy bread or butter. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this measure alone is worth more to the Canadian citizens than the four years in office of this government.

Mr. Speaker, my time has run out, but I would have so much more to say to the Conservative government.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in the budget debate at this time. Firstly, it gives me the opportunity to indicate my admiration of the wonderful speech made earlier this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in which he dealt with practically all of the items and problems mentioned in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), a week or so ago.

Second, Mr. Speaker, it gives me the opportunity to express the views of the people of Nickel Belt, the riding which I represent, concerning the budget. We all realize that the budget is possibly the criterion on which the government is judged from year to year, and necessarily this budget is no exception.

As I criticize some of the matters contained in the budget I am sure that the people of my area will agree with me. I feel it is my duty to constructively criticize the budget as have so many newspapers throughout the country and as was so ably done this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition who criticized the economic position of Canada at the present time after four years of Conservative administration.

As recently as last night a friend of mine presented me with a very small book which I consider to be possibly one of the oldest books in Canada having to do with trade and economic problems. This book was written in 1811, 150 years ago. It is entitled "Cursory Observations". The author is Jeremy Cockloft, the elder. The person who wrote this book thought that at that time the government was going to the dogs. It contains a chapter which deals with economics and trade. It ends up practically stating that the country should be given away to the states. The last phrase of the chapter reads as follows:

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if this writer was living in 1961 he would have the same remarks to make about the present government. I cannot say that without presenting certain proof and I certainly intend to do that. The Minister of Finance has made it quite clear, as has been repeated in this house, that he felt that what he was presenting to the country was a planned solution to our problems, and that in effect the deficit which the budget indicated was planned also. I feel, Mr. Speaker, as do most Canadians, that the deficits of this government are not planned. If they are one cannot fail to observe that they recur from year to year.

I asked for and received the amounts of the deficits that have been incurred from year to year since this government has been in office. For the year ended March 1, 1958, the deficit was $38.5 million. For the year ended March 31, 1959, the deficit was $609.5 million; for 1960, the deficit was $413 million; for 1961, $345 million; and the budget just brought down by the minister estimates that for 1962 the deficit will be in the neighbourhood of $650 million. This is definitely not sound planning but it is the type of situation that this government creates from year to year. As indicated, there may be reasons why a government must have a deficit from time to time and with that I very much agree. The last one was poorly planned; perhaps it was not planned at all.

As we go about trying to find reasons for this great deficit at this time we find they do not necessarily relate to questions having to do with the needs of the economy. I am told that possibly the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave the clue to the Minister of Finance for the deficit budget which he presented. The Prime Minister appeared on television the day after the presentation of the budget and it might have been expected that as the head of the government he would have indicated the reasons for the deficit. I have a transcript of his television address on June 21, 1961 in which he explained the reasons for the deficit. One thing he said was, "Should we turn back the clock on the Columbia river"?

It would seem that he meant to indicate to the Canadian people that this was a reason for the deficit forecast by the Minister of Finance. We all know that no such project will possibly even be commenced, let alone have to be paid for, before the termination of the year covered by this budget. We all know that the government has got into a shemozzle with one of the provinces with regard to the Columbia river situation.

I am very grateful to those responsible that I was a member of the delegation to Washington recently. In walking the streets there and talking to the American people one found they were very anxious to know what the situation was with respect to the Columbia river. In the minds of our neighbours some fear has possibly been created because we have not confirmed the Columbia river contract. For the sake of expediency and possibly publicity on the eve of an election in that country, we purported to sign a contract with that country. Surely it is not fitting and right for the Prime Minister of this country to go on the air the day after the budget speech and indicate to the Canadian people that a deficit was required in order to go ahead with such projects which we all realize it will not be possible to commence during the period covered by this budget.

We were told that the deficit was needed to bring about a reduction in taxes with a consequent reduction in revenue to the government from the people, but we have been told by many that this amounts to barely one tenth of 1 per cent of the deficit or approximately $65,000, and the balance must come from other sources and not through any reduction in taxation.

We are told that this deficit is planned. I believe the Leader of the Opposition made reference to that this afternoon. We all recall very well that around Christmas time last year the Canadian tax foundation made an estimate that the deficit in the present budget would be nearly $700 million. Surely the Minister of Finance cannot establish in this house that the tax foundation was planning his budget and his deficit as well.

We are told that one of the main objects of the budget, which is certainly of great importance to Canadian citizens, is to bring about a decrease in interest rates. If there is to be such a large deficit and if the cash position of the government is short, surely the government will have to find the money somewhere. I am quite prepared to admit that I am not a specialist in economics but there are only two ways of obtaining money when you are short of it. Either you borrow the money or you print it. I feel that the government will surely find itself in that position. With such a very large borrower in the field, I cannot conceive of the availability of money not being decreased with the result that interest rates will increase.

Furthermore, I believe I said in the house a couple of years ago that I had read a definition of a Conservative to this effect, that a Conservative is a person who acts hurriedly after thinking for too long a time. I think this is evident from the budget of the Minister of Finance at this time. We realize that the minister has brought down the budget only after the Canadian people had waited a long time for it and after there had been many requests for it by the opposition. In addition, we find some solutions of problems in the budget which have been put forward repeatedly by the Liberal opposition over a long period of time.

There is, for instance, the reduction in the excise tax on automobiles. We realize that the devaluation of the dollar will be beneficial in some ways to certain phases of our economy but on the other hand it will harm those industries that buy a great deal from our neighbour to the south. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) made it quite clear this afternoon that he had requested the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles on many occasions. However, the minister has brought this about after he has already been made aware that the premier of the province of Ontario, where most of our automobile industry is located, has seen fit to impose a three per cent sales tax on all goods sold in the province of Ontario.

If the Minister of Finance believes that he is doing a great thing for the automotive industry, he must realize he is very late in doing so. The premier of the province of Ontario is quite friendly with the present government. We recall that during the 1958 election he went about the country with the Prime Minister and stated to the people of Ontario that if they would elect Mr. Diefenbaker he, Mr. Frost would come to Ottawa and get hundreds of millions of dollars for the people of Ontario. It would appear now that the promises made to Mr. Frost at that time were not lived up to because he saw fit some months ago to announce the imposition of a 3 per cent sales tax. That tax will take a great big chunk off the reduction in the excise tax.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was endeavouring to indicate to the house that, in indicating in the budget speech that the excise tax of 7½ per cent on automobiles was to be taken off, the minister was well aware that the purchaser of automobiles in Canada had already for some months lost 3 per cent, at least in the province of Ontario, through the sales tax imposed by the premier of that province.

I wish to indicate further that the minister himself in another paragraph in his speech, has taken away a good bit of the 4½ per cent which should be left. This is done by his indication that he would make all efforts to devaluate the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. That action, of course, creates certain problems. They are possibly more marked in the automotive industry than in others. This industry purchases much of its goods and services from the United States in connection with the manufacture of automobiles.

I am speaking now, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the purchasers of automobiles in Canada. In this category is included each and every one in my riding as there are no manufacturers in our area. If the dollar is devaluated, we know very well that, in respect of services, the amount the subsidiary companies in the automobile industry in Canada will lose is great. That amount, of course, the purchasers of automobiles in this country will have to meet.

As undoubtedly every person in Canada realizes, it is not by mere accident that the Canadian automobile is absolutely the same in model as the United States automobile. Although the motors are assembled in Canada or are possibly manufactured to a degree in Canada, it is not by a mere coincidence that they happen to be the same as United States motors. Therefore these companies, as well as the bread producers in this country, well realize that they will be paying more for these services, which are a combined service. In paying more for services and materials the Canadian manufacturers will necessarily have to charge more to the Canadian buyers for the same goods which they are now selling.

I say the situation is the same as that in the case of bread. The Minister of Finance can continue to quarrel and to say that this should not be so. However, these companies have accountants who will figure these costs and these costs will be added. Therefore I am quite positive as, I believe, are the Canadian people, from their understanding of the matter, that this is very close to being a farce when you indicate in one paragraph that you are taking something away while you know very well that practically the entire deduction indicated in that paragraph is taken away absolutely by another paragraph in which you indicate that you will make all efforts to devaluate the dollar to a significant degree. The guess of any other member of this house is as good as mine but "a significant degree" may be very close to the 4½ per cent which is left in this instance. I therefore feel that the people of my area and the Canadian people in general find no satisfaction in this reduction made at this time when for months and years it has been requested by the Liberal opposition.

Furthermore, I have indicated that this government acted late and acted on many occasions on the information and the request of the opposition. As a member of the opposition I appreciate that fact. Some members may find this situation odd. However, I find indicated in this budget measures which will elucidate what I am now trying to indicate to this house. For instance, the members of this house and the Minister of Finance himself will recall that last year, when the budget resolutions were discussed, I was in quite a dogfight with him concerning the fact that in those budget resolutions no exemptions were granted for propane containers whereas the fuel tanks were exempt. This dogfight went on for maybe an hour or two and the minister at that time could see no reason in the request which was made. I say this with some humility, although I was possibly the major proponent of that request. I would ask hon. members to read Excise Tax Act resolution No. 9. I will read the first sentence:

9. That propane bulk tanks for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings... be exempt from sales tax.

This is a clear indication that if we obtain benefits or new propositions, many of them can be attributed to the Liberal opposition. In the same fashion, of course, the Minister of Finance takes more time to study and to adopt these good suggestions made by the opposition.

Hon. members will recall that last summer in this house we were involved in a great discussion. Of course I took part in that discussion also. At that time a ceiling was placed on C.M.H.C. mortgages by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). It affected greatly the bonus miners in my area especially. It was three months later that the Minister of Public Works was satisfied to accede to the demand of the opposition at that time. He did that in three months. I am happy to see that the Minister of Finance saw the light, although it took him 12 months to do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, before taking my seat, I should like to make some remarks to the Minister of National Revenue concerning the proposed French television station for the Sudbury area.

For more than a year the people of that town have been hearing about this project. This parliament approved the establishment of the station, but because of some difficulties, the work has not yet been started. First of all, permission had to be secured from the United States to use channel 13 for this French station in northern Ontario.

In the last two months, I have asked several questions of the Minister of Transport who is responsible for obtaining permission to start the work. Even though the minister co-operated with me in this matter, this authorization was long to come. However, I am now informed that the required authorization was given a few days ago. Naturally, as a result of that delay, the contracts which were granted a year ago will now have to be changed. With all the hon. members of this house, I hope that the difficulties involved in a new award of contracts a year later will not delay further the construction of that television station.

Mr. Speaker, since I am talking about television, I should like to say that in view of the Conservative government's efforts to gain greater control over publicly-owned corporations and organizations, we are concerned with the fact that the committee on radio and television which is, of course, mostly composed of Conservatives, recommends in its last report to the house that no member of the administration be allowed to sit on the board of directors of the corporation; that leaves out Messrs. Ouimet and Briggs. In other words it seems that this government has decided to seek dictatorial powers over all associations of any value that discharge certain administrative functions in government agencies.

While I am not aware of all the problems that can arise, or of the great difficulties that may exist between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Coyne, I can say on behalf of my constituents that this had created deep concern. On their behalf, I therefore ask for an investigation that would get to the bottom of this quarrel between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Coyne. In so doing, Mr. Speaker, I am not taking sides for anyone. I am convinced, however, that the Coyne incident is similar to the Ouimet and Briggs incident and to others which seem to show that whenever we have occasion to receive a report from a committee, the government is bent on wielding dictatorial powers over those agencies which are absolutely necessary to the administration of the various divisions maintained by the government.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, as I have almost completed my remarks I think it is fitting to indicate that the attempt by this government to obtain more power within the agencies of government is most significant and I know it worries the Canadian people very much. I am not attempting to take sides. I have heard and read many of the speeches concerning the bill before the house which is known as the Coyne bill, or an act respecting the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A bill of attainder.

Mr. Godin: I demand, on behalf of the citizens I represent, a full inquest to ascertain—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Do you want a coroner too?

Mr. Godin: —a full inquiry to ascertain the difficulties which may exist at this time. I say this because the Canadian people fear this is on the part of this government another effort, as has been made obvious in reports from our committees, to obtain complete authority over appointments in the public service and government agencies of this country and to prevent these people from having the authority they should have.

The federal crown corporations and agencies have been operating for many years. I have heard many Canadian citizens say they are very pleased with the operations of the C.B.C. and the Bank of Canada. It is most surprising to the Canadian people and to myself that at this time, after the comparatively short period of time in which they have been in office, this government is attempting to make sure it has the means whereby it may appoint men of its choice over whom it will have complete authority and control. On behalf of the people I represent I suggest that in the long run this will be most unfortunate for our country in that we will not have an independent administration in these agencies and corporations which are operating at the moment and of which we are justifiably very proud.

Mr. Speaker, my time has almost elapsed. May I say that it is my opinion and the opinion of the people of my riding that because of this budget and its proposals, and because of the administration of this government during the last four years, nothing will satisfy the Canadian people completely at this time except the opportunity of going to the polls in a general election.

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, like all the other members now in the house, I heard the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) express his annoyance about the differences of opinion between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the governor of the Bank of Canada. He said that the people has been worried over the conflict between those two persons. Let me simply tell him that if this government had been soft enough to implement the policies Mr. Coyne advocated, namely credit restriction and tax increases, the people of Canada would have been doubly worried.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Many views have already been expressed by members on both sides of this house, Mr. Speaker, about the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance. Quite naturally, a number of those comments were spoken in a spirit of partisanship which sometimes blinds judgement, particularly when one is left in the cool areas of the opposition. I would prefer to quote the comments of Canadians who are experts on economic matters and who are not necessarily related to any political party.

However, I should like first to pay an unrestricted tribute—for, unlike Mr. Coyne, we do not like restrictions—to the Minister of Finance whose greatest merit is, I humbly submit that of having introduced a budget imbued with great Canadianism and having shown his attachment, for which we congratulate him, to the protection of Canadian business and industries.

It is easy to see how popular the last budget has been by looking through many Canadian newspapers. In fact, one of the best informed papers in Ontario, the Globe and Mail, published in the financial column of Mr. Ronald Anderson a lengthy and favourable comment from which I quote the following:

> The budget presented Tuesday by the Hon. Donald Fleming, Minister of Finance, contains three important provisions to help Canadian business. The first and most important one is the plan to reduce the external value of the Canadian dollar; second, the proposal to bring about a decrease in interest rates; third, the abolition of the 7½ per cent excise tax on passenger cars.
> Those are constructive measures. Other significant proposals provide for the extension of the role and financial resources of the industrial development bank and a tax deduction for research expenditures.

A weekly newspaper highly considered by all businessmen across Canada, the Financial Post, had something in the same line as Mr. Anderson. In last week's issue, the following editorial comment could be found:

> The budget contains a host of provisions whose unquestionable usefulness the Canadian people will appreciate. An example of this is the incentive given to research conducted in our country. Another is the extension of the functions and powers of the industrial development bank. It is hoped that this will slow down the selling-off of Canadian business.

And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is an important point.

> The various steps concerning the bond market are very sound. The provision for a new and thorough study of our financial institutions is timely, and our newspaper has often advocated it. These are all fruitful improvements.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to rely on the views of experts on financial matters who are somewhat independent from all political parties, rather than on the views put forward by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Many businessmen express as much satisfaction as the reporters of the Globe and Mail and the Financial Post. Automobile manufacturers welcome the abolition of the 7½ per cent excise tax. Textile manufacturers are glad to be able to count on a greater protection for their products. At this point, I must say that I represent a riding where there is a textile mill; it is therefore with pleasure that the workers of my area welcomed the proposals of the present government.

Exporters are pleased to compute the increased profits they will make from larger sales on the world markets. Hundreds of small businessmen will apply with more confidence to the industrial development bank. Finally, special incentives for the replacement and modernization of equipment will step up production in a great many factories.

The Minister of Finance has efficiently coordinated both monetary and fiscal measures. Some opportunist politicians blame him for it. Those who view the situation as statesmen must—like the members of the committee of the other place—commend him for it. The odds are that the Canadian people will finally come into line with the statesmen.

The people will soon realize that the June 20 budget shows a true Canadian spirit. The case of textiles will prove them right.

In order to show the importance of the textile industry in Canada, I shall simply read part of a speech made last April by the president of the Cotton Institute of Canada and managing director of Hamilton Cotton Limited of Hamilton, Ontario. This is what he said:

> The manufacturing industry employs today about 25 per cent of the Canadian labour force, compared to 16 per cent for agriculture, only 5 per cent for our resource industries, and about 30 per cent for service industries, including all sectors of trade and transport. It is a well known fact that the so-called service industries greatly depend on the manufacturing industries. In fact, a recent investigation undertaken by the C.N.R. reveals that each job in the manufacturing industry provides 1.17 jobs in other industries.
> Therefore, it is obvious that as far as employment is concerned, it is by helping the largest employer, the manufacturing industry, that we will get the most benefit. Now, the textile industry, of which we are a significant group, is a vital sector of the Canadian manufacturing industry. In fact, the primary textile industry is the country's second most important employer in the manufacturing field—the first place being occupied by the wearing apparel industry. Its importance is therefore obvious.

Under the Liberals, the textile industry was treated as a poor relative. It was left to the mercy of foreign competition. The present member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) stated in this house that the textile industry deserves very little consideration because, according to him, it is artificial from three points of view: (1) its skilled labour; (2) its methods; (3) its raw materials.

Unfortunately, those words express only too well the attitude which the Mackenzie King government took with regard to that industry which is such a large employer. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is no news for you that the member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not intervene when the customs tariffs which served as a dike against the flooding of our market by imported textile products, were under assault. We had to wait until the Conservatives came to power for the textile industry to recover the protection which is so essential to its survival.

The present Minister of Finance has negotiated agreements under which the Japanese put quotas on their exports to our country. The minister also proposes increases in the tariff rates which should help that industry develop even more. No one will forget that, at least not in the province of Quebec where, not including Montreal, one worker out of seven is in the employ of a textile mill.

I should like here, Mr. Speaker, to quote from a speech made by Mr. Young, president of the Canadian cotton institute, in order to warn the government against the dangers which are involved for this product in the competition from our southern neighbours, the United States. Here is what Mr. Young said:

> Since 1956, the United States government has spent nearly $20 million in subsidizing textile goods shipped into Canada. These shipments represent now 45 per cent of the American cotton goods exports and compares with 18 per cent in the carrying out of this program. During the same period, the Canadian cotton textile industry laid off 4,800 employees and, at the end of 1960, it was employing only 17,300 persons.
> It is clear that this subsidy is paid to make more business for the American exporters in reducing their export prices.

Consequently, I should like the government to strengthen, if possible, the measures taken to protect our industry against that competition from the United States.

The June 20 budget shows a true Canadian spirit, as I said, as far as the protection of our foreign markets is concerned. There is every indication that if we can go on selling our raw materials in England, we will have to continue selling our secondary products in the other countries of the commonwealth: India, Australia, New Zealand, the new African states. If we were to press London to join the common market, we would disturb the whole structure of the preferential tariff, we would throw out of key this whole tariff at a time when India and a number of African states, about to enter industrialization, could absorb large quantities of our secondary products.

There is no need to read publications such as Foreign Trade to get a clear indication of the magnitude of our trade with commonwealth countries, and of the possibilities in that field. Any thinking person knows about them. That is why the Minister of Finance could state with his usual firmness:

> This historic right of commonwealth free access to the United Kingdom market for agricultural products, industrial material and most manufactured goods is the keystone of the commonwealth trading system. Not only for economic reasons, but for political reasons as well, we would not wish to see this system abandoned ... We will pursue whatever policies may be required to achieve this end.

Those proud words are in full agreement with the ways in which the Minister of Finance, in international conferences, has stood for the rightful interests of Canadian producers.

After all, if the Minister of Finance has always defended our producers, he has done so by means of structural reforms, to use the words of Mr. Jacques Parizeau, and in referring to those reforms I am led to stress the consistency that any observant person will find in the various budgets introduced by the Minister of Finance. In fact, the June budget is but an extension of the December one. It is its logical outcome.

Have I not referred, a moment ago, to the sound protectionism that the June 20 budget forecasts in the field of textiles? Well, in December, the Minister of Finance had redefined, for customs purposes, products of a class or kind made in Canada. The new definition will have as its essential result to encourage purchasers of machinery to buy their manufacturing equipment in this country. Mr. Jacques Parizeau noted in this connection:

> For a long time, the equipment imported into Canada has been segregated by customs authorities under two classifications according to whether it was possible or not for the importer to purchase similar equipment in Canada. In the first instance, tariffs were often from 15 to 25 percent; in the second instance, however, they ranged between nil and 7½ per cent. Those provisions have often been evaded in the past and the second classification has been rather large compared to the first. Abuse has become general. With a re-definition of those classes, the Minister of Finance in fact has re-defined hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of imports and increased the effective protection of the equipment industry which employs large numbers of workers.

In December last, the Minister of Finance had taken correlated steps to reduce the inflow of imports and favour the Canadians seeking markets abroad for Canadian products. He has provided for the creation of an export bank which offers short and long term credit through the chartered banks. Canadian exporters have benefited from the creation of that bank as of December 1960, as they will benefit from the devaluation of the dollar as of June 20, 1961.

Labour itself has not been ignored either. In December, in order to eliminate unemployment pockets in depressed areas, the Minister of Finance invited business firms to those areas and backed his invitation with generous tax abatements. In June, he has decided to encourage employment in the automobile industry; in fact, he has abolished the 7½ per cent excise tax. Because of the automatic reduction of new car prices, demand will increase and production will advance accordingly.

Whether we refer to the main budget or to the baby budget, our findings are the same —the present government pursues the same objectives. Should they be indicated once again?

1. Balancing our trade through diversification;

2. Abiding by international commitments, such as GATT and defending our rights and interests;

3. Protecting our producers against unfair competition in the industrial and agricultural fields.

In view of that threefold aim the government has been trying to rationalize capital inflow. The rate of public and private investments will not be slowed down in the process; there will simply be a substitution of Canadian funds for foreign funds. That is why the Minister of Finance said:

> Since our aim is to reduce substantially and fairly quickly our excess of imports, visible and invisible, over our exports, it follows that we must aim at replacing, from Canadian sources, an equivalent amount of funds that would otherwise have been raised abroad. We have been giving most careful thought to ways and means of supplying these funds from Canadian sources.

This cannot happen overnight. For a long time, borrowers in this country have been used to going to New York to raise money. On that world money market, lenders are so easily found that unimaginative borrowers services, however excellent, of our own financial institutions.

The central government will set an example. Better still, it will take concrete action to ease the long term bond sector available to the provinces and municipal corporations. Therefore, the Minister of Finance announced on June 20:

> —I propose to restrict new federal bond issues, at least for many months, to the field of short term securities.

This action is along the same lines as the treasury decision to take over the whole portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund on the basis of the book value of the bonds. To this dual approach should be added the measures taken by the government to open a secondary mortgage market. In June as in December, the government has shown its intention to enlarge and develop the Canadian capital market. Those, Mr. Speaker, are the points on which I wanted to call the attention of the house.

The general idea that one can derive from this budget is that the minister has tried to protect Canadian industry and Canadian companies.

He deserves to be commended for that attitude. It is, indeed, for that reason that every newspaper across the country has spoken favourably of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance.

Independent and impartial opinions of newspaper columnists and economic experts mean more, in my view, than the more or less sincere opinions which have been expressed by hon. members opposite.

(Text):

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, last week after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made his annual fiscal accounting to the Canadian people, there was what purported to be another national accounting made to the people by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). This so-called accounting was made in a television address on the occasion of the fourth anniversary of the mounting to the seats of the mighty by the Conservative party. It is with this latter accounting that I intend to deal for a few moments.

The Prime Minister during his television chat invited Canadians to look over the shadow his administration had cast across Canada under his stewardship. Perhaps more properly I should have said spectre, not shadow. He invited Canadians to join with him in his self-satisfied gloating over the period when, as he said, there had been more development in Canada than in any equal period in the past. Alas, Mr. Speaker, what a sad commentary on the 1957 model man of vision who is now, in 1961, the model man of hallucinations. Is that too strong a word, Mr. Speaker? Surely this is the most charitable explanation of that half hour of half truths which he gave the Canadian people.

This is what he said, Mr. Speaker:

> And now, I look back with you over the four years. What have been the effects? The national income has risen 18 per cent and the gross national product—that is all our earnings and income and production—by 17 per cent.

This, Mr. Speaker, so far as it goes—and I say so far as it goes—is the truth. But what he neglected to mention was that during the last four years of Liberal administration, from 1953 to 1957, the national income rose not 18 per cent but 24 per cent and the gross national product during the same period rose not 17 per cent but 27 per cent.

Let me quote what one of the most Conservative of Canadian papers, the Financial Post, said in its editorial "The Spectre of Stagnation" on April 29 last:

> What is important about G.N.P., however, is not the sometimes stunning dollar totals and their frequently quoted advances.
> What matters to practical business planners and to responsible government officials should be real rates of growth. And here the G.N.P. story reveals the spectre of stagnation.
> Consider these comfortless figures:
> Since 1947, G.N.P.'s average annual rate of increase has been almost 8 per cent. This, on the surface is a remarkable performance but the average hides the fact that between 1947 and 1956 the annual average was 9 per cent, while in the last four years the rate of increase has been only half as fast—4 per cent per year. To see how small the real volume gains are, take out the effect of price increases. Then the annual 9 per cent gain from 1947 to 1956 turns into a 5.5 per cent advance and the 4 per cent increase 1956—1960 slows to a 1.7 per cent annual rise.

This, Mr. Speaker, more than shows the hollow puffing of the government, but the most chilling aspect is that if one does take out from the G.N.P. these figures to arrive at the real G.N.P. per person in Canada, without the rise in cost and considering the population increases then in fact in the past four years the G.N.P. per person in Canada has dropped 4 per cent. This means that while under the Liberal administration of 1956 each person produced $96 more, under this government each Canadian produced $55 less.

But to return to the Cheshire cat recital of the Prime Minister of last week, he said at page 7 of the script of his broadcast:

Progress and expansion on the scale of the last four years is not inevitable.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I join with most other Canadians in saying thank heaven that that is so and that it is not inevitable.

Then, as an example of a sheer flight of imagination, listen to what the Prime Minister said on the subject of trade:

And when you think of the doom and gloom remember this. Canadian exports have been steadily increasing since we took office and they're now, 1960—

And I may say this is obviously a speech left over from last year. I continue:

—at an all time high, 12 per cent higher than they were four years ago.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that during the last four years of Liberal administration trade in Canada increased by almost the same figure; actually it was somewhat higher, 12.8 per cent. But in the past four years world trade has expanded 20 per cent. Canada has slipped from fourth to fifth place among the world's trading nations.

Then, the Prime Minister took great glee in the drop of 4 per cent in imports, although he was silent on the fact that this is used as a first indication by economists of a drop, and a considerable drop, in personal incomes.

We come now to that part of the Prime Minister's speech where he dealt with the problem of unemployment in Canada, a subject to which perhaps he felt he could at last refer, with the summer season here and people re-employed in the tourist and construction industries. The Prime Minister said:

We have unemployment, the result of men being displaced by technological change.

The Senate committee found a number of reasons for the amount of unemployment in this country but certainly did not dismiss it, as did the Prime Minister, as being merely the result of technological change. Listen to what the Financial Post had to say about the cause of unemployment in the same editorial to which I made reference a while ago.

The result of this trend toward stagnation has been the worst unemployment recession since the 1930's. Unemployment is now averaging 7 per cent a year as against only 2-3 per cent in the early 1950's.

Then the Prime Minister said:

However, in Canada, and it's well to remember this, unemployment has lesser impact on the Canadian than on the American economy. Compare our situation with the United States and then think of this.

Suppose we accept this invitation of the Prime Minister and compare our situation with that of the United States. I should like to read into the record some figures which I have taken from "Economic Indicators", May, 1961 and from the "Canadian Statistical Review", May, 1961. The figures are as follows:

	Percentage of Labour Force Unemployed
	U.S.A.	Canada
1960—March	5.5	6.6
April	5.1	6.8
May	5.1	7.2
June	5.4	6.6
July	5.5	7.1
August	5.8	7.6
September	5.7	7.2
October	6.3	7.6
November	6.2	7.5
December	6.8	7.9
1961—January	6.6	7.7
February	6.8	7.8
March	6.9	7.7
April	6.8	7.6

Mr. Grafftey: Were the methods of compiling the figures the same?

Miss LaMarsh: The methods of compiling the figures, in answer to those who inquire, are identical. How, unless he is in fact suffering from hallucinations, can the Prime Minister justify his statement when every solitary month of the past 18 our percentage of the labour force unemployed has been a point or two higher than that of the United States.

Then the Prime Minister launched into a reference to a few more figures. He said:

There are 267,000 more Canadians working during the month of May this year than a year ago and this is something that they don't tell you about.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is certainly correct that no one else but the Prime Minister would dare to tell the Canadian people that, because the d.b.s. figures show that 113,000, not 267,000, more Canadians were employed in May, 1961 than in May, 1960. I assume that either the d.b.s. or the Prime Minister is deliberately false. Then the Prime Minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member appears to have said that either the Prime Minister or the dominion bureau of statistics was deliberately false. Mr. Speaker, this is obviously an unparliamentary expression to use even in this alternative form—

Mr. Chevrier: Why don't you sit down and let her make her speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the objection is to the expression "deliberately false". It is quite unparliamentary.

Miss LaMarsh: I would hope the Prime Minister was correct and the d.b.s. wrong.

Mr. Hellyer: That is too much to hope for.

Miss LaMarsh: Then the Prime Minister went on to say—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, to go on to add another expression does not constitute a withdrawal of an unparliamentary expression. I ask that the reference to which I object be withdrawn. It is quite unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: It is an inflexible rule of the house that no member should impute to another a deliberate falsehood. The hon. member's remark was somewhat ambiguous. I would think that the proper course would be to make it clear that she was not imputing a deliberate falsehood to the Prime Minister.

Miss LaMarsh: I would say this. The speech writer for the Prime Minister might well have been incorrect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the withdrawal of an unparliamentary expression. A variation does not constitute a withdrawal. I ask, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: He should withdraw his false figures too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that that unparliamentary expression be withdrawn in accordance with the practice of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister is correct in saying that it is not sufficient to adopt another mode of expression even though it modifies the meaning without removing the offensive words and I would hope that the hon. member would make it clear that she is not imputing deliberate falsehood to the Prime Minister.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite prepared to say that the computers in the dominion bureau of statistics are completely wrong and withdraw any suggestion that the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is customary in the house where exception is taken—and the rules are very clear about offensive statements—to make a wholehearted and not an evasive withdrawal. I would hope that the hon. member at the beginning of her parliamentary career would not leave the record stand as it is.

Miss LaMarsh: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. If I said something that was unparliamentary I would of course not wish to break the rules of the house, and in making the remark I did I would assume, therefore, that the conclusion would be taken that the computers and those who prepared the figures must have been in error. I am quite prepared to withdraw anything I said which was unparliamentary in the Speaker's opinion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The figures were false.

Mr. Chevrier: That is all it was, false figures.

Mr. Speaker: I will take the hon. member at her word. The imputation of a deliberate falsehood to one or the other I think should be withdrawn because it does leave the imputation even with the explanation that has been made.

Miss LaMarsh: I abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister went on to follow those figures with this remark:

> Now in any other country in the world this would be hailed as an indication of solid economic progress.

How perfectly incredible. During a year when there have been three quarters of a million of his fellow Canadians without employment, although he had promised previously that no one would suffer from unemployment while he was prime minister, and when we have only to compare the number of unemployed in May, 1957, 184,000, with the number of unemployed in May of this year, 457,000, almost three times as many, he casually invites Canadians to crow that this is economic progress.

Once again he mentioned the unemployed in his address. He was speaking about payments of unemployment insurance and he said:

> The unemployed? Should their claims be disallowed when they need help most?

This, Mr. Speaker, from an administration that sat calmly by and permitted those who were unemployed, who came here to Ottawa to consult with the Prime Minister and his ministers—and in the face of the assurance of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to the contrary—to have $4 to $6 cut from their benefits because they exercised their right to come to Ottawa. Again, there was this classic remark in his speech:

> Are we giving too much to hospitals?

In the light of some recent revelations in the province of Quebec, it may well be that we are giving too much to some hospitals or to some friends of some hospitals. Passing from such things the Prime Minister went on—

Mr. Grafftey: How are things in Hawkesbury?

Miss LaMarsh: —to lift his eyes to the visions of yore and to tell us this:

> When they speak of deficits one of the reasons was the program for national development.

I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, what program for national development? I recall the right hon. gentleman in 1957 and 1958 shouting from the hustings that the former government ought to have had a shelf of public works ready to be used in the face of a recession. Admittedly the Liberal administration had ready all the plans and preparations for the South Saskatchewan dam, and this was the only reason that this government was able to start work on it immediately. But what other national development is there which has necessitated five swelling deficits?

Mr. Pearson: The causeway.

Miss LaMarsh: Where is the Chignecto canal? Where is the P.E.I. causeway and where, oh where, is the much vaunted Columbia river development?

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the Minister of Justice?

Miss LaMarsh: Never, Mr. Speaker, has so much money been owed by so many on account of so few and for so little. Yet the Prime Minister said that "in the period of the last four years there has been more development in Canada than in any other equal period in the past". Then he went on to say:

> That statement I stand by as one that cannot be challenged in any way.

I for one challenge it and in every way. Before I leave this fascinating exercise in the style of George Orwell's novel, "1984", a sort of big brother who tries to change the record of history by simply making assertions, I should make reference to some of the Prime Minister's comments on deficits. He said in that speech:

> I remind those who may be concerned about deficit financing that if we had a deficit of a billion dollars a year, it would still be less than 3 per cent of our gross national product.

If we had a deficit of a billion dollars a year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You will have next year.

Miss LaMarsh: I wonder what visions the Prime Minister was seeing when his colleague, the Minister of Finance, told us last week that this year we have a billion dollar cash deficit. What possible excuse is it to say that this is less than the expenditure during the war? We had deficit budgets then for a purpose, not deficit budgets because the government did not know how to avoid them.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote once more from the editorial in the Financial Post to which I have already referred. They have this to say:

> Clearly what is needed is less complacency in high places, more realism in appraising Canada's dismal situation and more, infinitely more, government action to prod this economy into faster growth.

Mr. Grafftey: Who wrote that?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Miss LaMarsh: I have referred again to the Financial Post editorial of April 29, 1961. However, I do offer, Mr. Speaker, in the Prime Minister's words, that one ray of hope offered by the hon. gentleman to the people of Canada:

> Progress and expansion on the scale of the last four years is not inevitable.

Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that there will be, in the style of the new liberal administration in the United States, a return to plain speaking to our people when the facts, unpleasant though they may be, are given to the people, when with a new Liberal administration here in Ottawa this country will in truth return to a period of expansion and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Churchill: Will you call the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act to provide:

1. That the maximum weight for cigarettes subject to the excise duty of four dollars per thousand cigarettes, be increased from not more than two and one half pounds per thousand cigarettes to not more than three pounds per thousand cigarettes.

2. That any enactment founded upon this resolution shall come into force on the 1st day of January, 1962.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. As I indicated this afternoon one of the very desirable features in this inadequate budget was, of course, the removal at long last of the excise tax on automobiles which had been promised by the head of this government during two election campaigns. It was only as a result of continued interrogation and prodding by the hon. member for Fort William and others. including myself—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is dealing with the wrong resolution. The resolution that was called was the one respecting the Excise Act, not the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The chairman said, "Excise Tax Act". However, if the chairman wishes to change it, it is all right.

The Chairman: Order. The resolution I have is the one relating to the Excise Act.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe, Mr. Chairman, you added the important word that differentiates one statute from the other. However, now that it is clear we are dealing with the Excise Act, I believe the Minister of Finance should explain paragraph 1 relating to the maximum weight of cigarettes subject to this tax, his expectations regarding this recommendation, and so on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I believe the purpose of this amendment was fully explained in the budget speech. This explanation is to be found at page 6662 of Hansard.

This resolution would have the effect that, in future, cigarettes may weigh as much as three pounds per thousand cigarettes before becoming subject to the higher rate of excise duty. At present the act provides an excise duty of $4 per thousand cigarettes weighing not more than 2½ pounds per thousand. If cigarettes weigh more than this limit, the duty is $5 per thousand. This resolution proposes that the point at which the higher rate becomes effective be increased to three pounds per thousand cigarettes. This change will permit manufacturers to put more tobacco in cigarettes than at present without paying higher duty. At the present time most cigarettes longer than normal in size made in Canada are longer because of the filter and are not true "king size" cigarettes as they are known in the United States.

The proposed change will permit the manufacture of so-called "king size" cigarettes without additional tax. It has been estimated by some cigarette manufacturers that this change may result in the use of an additional ten million pounds of tobacco per year. This is an increase of 8 per cent or 9 per cent in tobacco consumption. Although the change is a tax reduction in that a larger quantity of tobacco may be purchased for the same amount of tax, it is not anticipated the tax revenue will be affected to any significant extent since people purchase cigarettes by number rather than by weight.

Mr. Benidickson: I know very well that after budget night the administration does receive comments upon its proposals, such as this one. Would the minister indicate, in all fairness to this committee, if any such comment has been received by the administration in respect of this particular proposal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The representations or communications, Mr. Chairman, are of three kinds. First of all, the association representing tobacco growers has given the warmest kind of commendation to this resolution. I have had various communications from the representatives of growers to that effect. There have been representations also from manufacturers. One manufacturer, for instance, warmly commends the resolution in its present form. Another manufacturer asked for more time in which to instal the machinery required for the manufacture of the longer cigarettes. A third manufacturer first of all expressed a preference for the resolution not being proceeded with, and in the second place, if it were proceeded with, that it be deferred to a later period than January 1, 1962 in order to allow more time for the installation of machinery.

We had given some thought to this matter before the resolution was originally drawn, and had considered that a six-month deferment of the effective date of the change would be adequate to permit manufacturers who were not yet equipped with machines to make longer cigarettes the time to do so. In the light of these representations indicating that those manufacturers who are not so equipped would like a further six months to provide themselves with the necessary equipment, I shall be bringing forward an amendment to the second paragraph of this resolution proposing a three months' deferral of the effective date.

Mr. Benidickson: It is almost six months now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a six months' deferral written into the resolution. In other words, the resolution in its original form contemplated January 1, 1962 as the effective date. I am proposing now a further three months' deferral to April 1, 1962, in the light of these representations made by two manufacturers who think they will require further time to equip themselves with the necessary machinery.

I would ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move the following amendment:

That paragraph 2 of the Excise Act resolution be amended by striking out the expression "the first day of January 1962" and substituting therefor the expression "the first day of April, 1962."

Mr. Churchill: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: This is another sign of indecision and lack of firm judgment, such as we had in the presentation of the budget as a whole. At this stage we are debating the resolution, and later we will have a bill presented to us to amend the Excise Act. The minister has given notice that the government, with all the time at its disposal, apparently has not yet decided when this measure is to come into effect. The government requests another three months. May I ask the minister if it is his intention, before the adjournment of this session, to ask us to deal with second reading of the Excise Act to make effective the proposals contemplated in this resolution? We really do not have the bill before us now, but we have a warning, so to speak, of the government's intention. In as much as this is not going to be operative until April 1, 1962, has the minister any advice to give us on the necessity of debating the consequences of the principles involved here and the effect on the industry at this time? Is it perhaps likely that we would deal with this after the summer recess?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is of course a bill to follow. The resolution will not become effective unless the bill is passed. I hope that we can proceed swiftly with all stages of the budget resolutions. It is desirable that this legislation be passed soon in order that the manufacturers in this business may know the intention of parliament and be able to make their plans for equipment and the manufacture of the new type of cigarettes accordingly.

Mr. Benidickson: I share with the minister concern that the manufacturers, and I presume the consumers, would have some certainty about the end result of the budget proposals. Am I wrong in my thinking that as of the night of the minister's announcement the Department of National Revenue would have taken the minister at his word in so far as the tax imposition is concerned, knowing that he has a massive majority behind him? Since the night the minister introduced his budget has the Department of National Revenue been in fact imposing the tax in accordance with the wording of this resolution irrespective of whether we pass it tonight or next September?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. The resolution proposes that the change in the act become effective on January 1, 1962. The Department of National Revenue is not going to advance the effective date beyond that mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: I think I was wrong there. The minister is perfectly right, but I am right in my general premise that when the minister announces a tax change it becomes effective on the night he announces it. In this instance the effective date would have been, as his budget speech suggested, January 1, 1962. He now proposes an amendment which would make the effective date April 1, 1962. This is not really emergent legislation as far as we are concerned at the moment. Unlike other announcements of the minister on budget night, the first item we are considering would have become operative on January 1, 1962. By the amendment the minister is proposing it will not become operative as a tax item until April 1, 1962. We are asked to proceed with this resolution and I presume the minister has some good reason for advancing it tonight. I am just a little bit suspicious of why we have to deal with this particular amendment if it will not affect the people of Canada under the present intention of the government until April, 1962.

There are many people in this house who think the government has advanced contentious legislation rather late this session if there is a possibility of having a summer recess. Surely this particular legislation is not of very great consequence to the people of Canada if in the first place it was not to be operative until January 1, 1962, and now under a proposed amendment of the government not until April 1, 1962. Am I missing something? Why is this resolution advanced on the basis of priority? Why is it the first item of the budget proposals that the minister thinks should be considered at this particular stage in the session when some of us are perhaps contemplating a recess, but not necessarily so. We are prepared to carry on here as long as necessary but this does not seem to me to be one of the urgent items that should be taken up as the first budget proposal if it is not to be operative in so far as the people are concerned until April, 1962.

Mr. Garland: I have one question to ask the minister. Did the minister or his department consult with the Department of National Health and Welfare to determine the possible effect, if any, on lung cancer that might result from this increased usage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not specifically, Mr. Chairman, but I think it is obvious that the incidence, if any, to which the hon. member refers is not likely to be affected by the present measure. This means longer cigarettes or cigarettes with more tobacco in them.

Mr. Garland: There is a suggestion of increased usage of ten million pounds.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us what tax changes there have been on cigarettes since June, 1957?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We had one previously. We had this one change which was made in 1959, which added the equivalent of, I think it was, one dollar per thousand cigarettes to the tax on cigarettes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The tax has been increased, then?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for those people who are interested in this industry that the present government has seen fit to increase the tax on cigarettes over and above what it was in 1957. It is particularly unfortunate in view of the promises which seemed to have been made by the Prime Minister during the campaign in 1958. At Brantford, on February 17, 1958 he is reported to have said:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker last night dropped a clear hint that the taxes on cigarettes, cigars and tobacco soon may be cut.
> He told an audience of 1,400 that no industry in Canada suffers a greater degree of taxation than the tobacco industry.
> Tobacco growers, he said, are the one segment of agriculture that has not received the attention it deserves, although growers long have clamoured for government aid.
> The Prime Minister added: "We want to give them this assistance. We are having a study made of this industry to see what action is needed to give tobacco growers a reasonable return and some security for their efforts."
> The tax on a 33 cent pack of cigarettes now is about 18 cents, made up of an excise tax, and excise duty, and a 10 per cent sales tax.
> The study probably will be made by the Department of Finance and any ensuing tax cut could be introduced in time for the 1958-1959 federal budget expected in May.
> To the Brantford audience, living on the northern fringe of Ontario's tobacco belt—where production has jumped from 63,000 acres in 1943 to 120,000 in 1956—the Prime Minister's hint appeared an effective vote catcher.

It is particularly interesting, Mr. Chairman, in view of this, that presumably after the study by the Department of Finance to which the Prime Minister alluded, their conclusion was not that the farmers should be given relief but on the contrary that the tax should be increased. Surely the report of the Prime Minister's statement in Brantford is very clear that it was his opinion then that the industry was overtaxed, that the tax was too high. Yet following the study by the Department of Finance the tax was not reduced but on the contrary was increased.

This is one more indication of a promise which was made to the Canadian people in 1958 and was not kept. In respect of the present budget it might be said that one of the greatest areas of expansion in the whole budget is the minister's switch from regular to king size.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No. I think the minister should indicate what research preceded this decision and, having regard particularly to what the hon. member for Trinity has said, to what extent it has been along the lines of a planned program which is something that the minister always talks about.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment now and we might as well dispose of the amendment before dealing with the rest of the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: With the expectation that the minister will make some reply on the resolution as amended, that will be satisfactory.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I would hope that the minister would indicate a little more than he has done so far the background of the investigations that resulted in this decision on the part of the ministry, particularly in view of the comments of the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this measure has been asked for by the tobacco growers. It has been strongly supported by the growers. Certain manufacturers have asked for it as well, but the strongest plea has come from the tobacco growers.

Mr. McIlraith: Was the resolution asked for by any of the cigarette manufacturers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Of the larger manufacturing companies, how many of them were for it and how many were opposed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To my knowledge it has been asked for by Rothmans for several years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister any indication that the price of these king size cigarettes will be the same or higher than the price of standard cigarettes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No specific indication in this regard. It will be a matter for the market.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Benidickson: The minister spoke yesterday with a great deal of vehemence and apparently on the basis of a great deal of research as to the element of cost of a consumer product of great importance. I refer to bread. Apparently he had looked very carefully into the matter and had decided that, so far as bread prices were concerned, a five cent or more increase in the price of wheat would not justify the bakeries in increasing the price of bread. I must admit that I am a consumer of some products but I am not a consumer of this one and I do not know too well what may happen. What is likely to happen so far as consumers of cigarettes are concerned? As the result of this proposal, are they likely to get more value for their expenditure or less?

The minister mentioned that one of the important though lesser manufacturers, Rothmans, had been an advocate of this change. What about the people who are dominant in this field, for instance, Imperial Tobacco Company? Are they for or against this proposal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I answered that question a few minutes ago as to the position taken by the Imperial Tobacco Company in its representations since the budget. This resolution will have no relationship whatever to cigarettes of the present size with respect to price or anything else, but it will have the effect of reducing the tax and accordingly the price on what are commonly called king size cigarettes. It is expected, and this is the burden of the representations made very strongly by the tobacco growers association, that this resolution will result in the use of an additional ten million pounds of tobacco a year.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister indicated that he thought this was a reduction in tax. Has he or his staff calculated the tax loss so far as the crown is concerned that may result from this reduction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I dealt with that earlier.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Customs Tariff to provide that the provisions of subsection (2) of section 3 and subsections (1) and (2) of section 5 apply to goods entering Canada through a port of any kind rather than being limited to goods entering through a sea, lake or river port.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would facilitate consideration of these resolutions by the committee if I were to say a word in explanation. There are four resolutions here to amend the Customs Tariff. The first one concerns only a definition. It is customary to deal with changes in definition in the act in the first resolution under this heading. This change in definition results from the fact that goods coming into Canada enjoying British preferential rates can arrive by air and no longer are limited in their transport to entry through a sea, lake or river port.

The second resolution concerns changes in the Customs Tariff respecting textiles. As I reported to the house in the budget speech, here we have the results of three reports of the tariff board followed by extensive negotiations, and this is put forward as a complete negotiated package in so far as GATT bindings are concerned. It is a complete package in the sense that in the negotiations the reductions were accepted by the countries in whose favour there were bindings in satisfaction of the increases. So that this is in itself a complete package.

The third resolution embraces a number of miscellaneous items which are bound under GATT, and these have all been the subject of negotiations with those countries in whose favour they were bound under GATT.

The fourth resolution embraces another miscellaneous group of items which are not bound by GATT.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is not new. Every year we have amendments to the customs tariff in the manner that these are advanced. I think the minister would be the first to agree that these amendments are of the utmost importance. In view of what he said in his budget speech and again tonight, he himself will recognize that we have had multilateral trading agreements with a great number of countries for many years. This is very important. When we want to raise our tariff against a certain item of import and against a certain country, as the minister has indicated in all too unclear and broad terms, this involves renegotiation.

Before we continue to pass items here in the House of Commons, I feel that the time has come when we should hear not only about the industries and the products that were affected in a beneficial way, but should also hear from the administration about the trading quid pro quo that is involved. This disclosure has been avoided. That is not true with respect to other countries that belong to the same international trading organization. In parliament here, if it is possible, the Minister of Finance talks about the results of his trading that may have helped certain industries but he attempts to avoid telling parliament and the country about the industries and the people employed in those industries who have perhaps been sacrificed as a result of readjustments and trading negotiations that have taken place under GATT.

Under the United States system where these things are announced, they then offer those interested, adversely affected and so on, an opportunity to come forward to register their interests and their complaints. As we have not that system in Canada I feel that every year the Minister of Finance, when he talks about items bound under GATT and other trading agreements, should tell us not only about the positive items where he has negotiated on behalf of certain industries for trade preferences but should tell us the quid pro quo. We know that there has been involved a quid pro quo, as I said. Somebody else has been sacrificed. Who are they? What are the products? What are the industries? Where are they situated? Before we pass not only the resolutions relating to this matter but before we pass at the next stage legislatively the bill that will be founded on these resolutions, I think the Minister of Finance is bound to tell us what the trade was on both sides. He has told us that, in connection with certain textile items, he feels he has provided added advantage in relation to Canada's associates in GATT. That is a multilateral trading agreement involving more than 30 countries.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will permit me to do so, Mr. Chairman, may I draw attention to the fact that there are four separate resolutions here. There is nothing of concern to GATT under the first and fourth resolutions. I have already said that there were bindings or negotiations with respect to bindings in relation to the items embraced in the scope of the second and the third resolutions. We would perhaps have more orderly procedure, Mr. Chairman, if we confined ourselves as we go along to the respective resolutions as they will have to be called separately and adopted separately. The first one concerns the definition only.

The Chairman: I have indicated that I was inviting the committee to consider resolution No. 1.

Mr. Benidickson: You are well aware, Mr. Chairman, that on item No. 1 in committee of the whole it has been the traditional practice, of which the Minister of Finance was a great observer when he was sitting on this side of the chamber, to make some observations about the proposed statute as a statute on a broad basis. It was on that basis that I wanted to refer this committee to the resolution. The opposition is not expected perhaps to be completely cognizant of some of the machinations related to legislative developments. We know that we are changing the Customs Tariff. We look in the first instance to what the minister tells us on budget night. I refer to page 6653 of Hansard. The minister, under a heading provided to us of "Tariff board reports and other tariff changes", stated as follows. I will read the first part of the minister's remarks:

> The rates of duty on most items of significance in the Canadian tariff are, as hon. members well know, bound against increase under our GATT agreements—

That was the purpose of my rising at this point. The minister then went on to say that in the schedules before us in these resolutions we shall find adjustments, changes and amendments. The minister took time out to say that these changes would benefit a certain segment of our economy. However, the minister has not said what the other side of the picture is, whose ox was gored, or who paid for these concessions that were given when certain changes were required under our basic GATT agreement. I think that matter is important at this stage of the discussion of the resolutions affecting the Customs Tariff. I ask the minister tonight to give to us this information, having regard to the next paragraph of his budget statement in which he referred to renegotiations and to three reports and indicated that, having regard to tariff board reports in Canada, the administration was anxious to fix this matter up with its trading partners across the world. Having done that, or having followed that course, he does not say what exports of Canada were affected in a trading nature to compensate when these items were bound under our GATT agreement, or what industries paid for the concessions that were made with respect to imports. I think we should hear about that matter before we proceed further with these resolutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already made it quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that the complete answer to the hon. gentleman's question is to be found in resolutions Nos. 2 and 3. There is to be found there the complete story of the changes made in accordance with the provisions of GATT as a result of negotiations. I shall be glad to answer any further questions when we reach the details of those two resolutions.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister flatters me and all members of this committee when he says that the complete answer is to be found if you look at page 6673 of Hansard, of June 20. I thank the minister. He is very complimentary in suggesting that I am just that knowledgeable about the quid pro quo or the trading and could find it by reading, say, resolution No. 2.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already explained that there was a complete package in resolution No. 2 respecting all textile items. It is a complete package. The quid and the quo are both there. A similar situation exists in relation to resolution No. 3, as to the changes made there. The complete answer is that in resolution No. 3, the quids and the quos are both to be found.

Mr. Benidickson: I doubt that anybody can find it outside of the minister, his parliamentary secretary and perhaps one or two others. Certainly I cannot do so. I do not pretend to be that knowledgeable. I doubt that anybody can look at resolution No. 2 and find the answer without the proper, honest disclosure on the part of the minister as to what the trading quid pro quo was. I say that I cannot find it in the fine text of resolution No. 2, and I have had some experience in this regard.

I say that the minister must be more frank with the committee than he is apparently intending to be. On budget night, as reported at page 6653 of Hansard, the minister said there were renegotiations. He told us that certain items were bound and he went on to say that measures have been taken to prevent certain imports that were damaging to certain industries in Canada. I say the minister has not given on that page of Hansard or up till now the other side of the picture, which is, who lost by these renegotiations or these trading agreements to which he referred at page 6653 of Hansard under the heading "Tariff board reports and other tariff changes" which he said were bound.

When he says they are bound, it means that under our multilateral tariff commitments our partners in trade look at the dollar value of the imports that the Minister of Finance boasts at page 6653 of having been curtailed. These approximately 30 traders with whom we have these multilateral agreements are not stupid and I know it would not be possible to change these agreements unless some export industry of Canada had been sacrificed. I want to know which ones were sacrificed to justify the boast that is made at page 6653 of Hansard with regard to the curtailment of imports.

I think at this stage the Minister of Finance should give us more information. This information is generally given. It is certainly given in the United States and then representations are made and there may be an appeal to the tariff board before the government of that country actually enters into a firm treaty agreement with respect to a commitment on imports and exports.

My point is that the minister has no right to come to parliament and boast that renegotiations have taken place which will give benefit to certain industries in this country which feared imports, without telling us what industries in Canada which exported to our trading partners in GATT were sacrificed. I would like the minister to give an explanation of this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there will be full opportunity to deal with that matter intelligently when we reach the second and third resolutions, which embrace all the items the hon. gentleman is concerned about. I suggest, therefore, that we proceed to adopt resolution No. 1, which concerns a matter of definition, and then we can talk about the first of the groups which concern the GATT bindings, in resolution 2.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, item No. 1 concerns definition in relation to the port of entry. We had legislation, which indeed is still on the order paper, concerned with definition under this legislation but in another connection altogether. I refer to the class or kind legislation. I would ask the minister the procedure under that legislation in relation to the coming into effect of the change in definition. My reason for asking this question is that I am receiving a great many general complaints for which unfortunately I am not able to give a particular item or entry number. The claim is being made that the new definition contained in the legislation not yet passed by parliament is being applied although the act itself is not yet law. Would the minister deal with that point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am told that no questions have yet arisen for determination by the Department of National Revenue in that regard.

Mr. McIlraith: Do I understand the answer to mean that there have been no cases of definition of class or kind under that legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told there have been no cases arising out of the proposed change in the class or kind definition.

Mr. McIlraith: I am rather mystified by that answer when there are so many items—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we are outside our proper sphere here anyway. The definition we are talking about here is respecting port of entry. If the hon. gentleman desires information on that other subject I shall be glad to obtain it for him. I do not think this is the place or time for it.

Mr. McIlraith: I would ask the minister for that information, Mr. Chairman. I think this is a matter of enough significance to warrant an answer. I do not think the minister's answer dealt with the point I raised; I think his answer dealt with a point much narrower than the point I raised. There are a great many of these cases coming up; they are coming up frequently, unfortunately every day. Perhaps the minister would look into this matter and give me an answer at a later stage of this legislation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will not affect the legislation now under consideration.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it does not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member asks me to obtain information on something outside this resolution, of course I will be glad to do it.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you very much. Otherwise it is a simple matter to offer an amendment to this legislation and get it in that indirect way, but that is not a method I like to use.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I directed my remarks in a broad way, as the minister always did when he was in opposition, to resolutions preliminary to the amendment of the Customs Tariff. The minister has asked me to deal with these points section by section. I have warned the minister that I am concerned about the necessity for comment regarding not only what has Canada achieved by these renegotiations for certain industries which are concerned about competitive imports, but that I also want to know, before we pass these resolutions, which export industries have paid in some compensatory way because of these renegotiations.

I am now confining my remarks to resolution No. 1. I hope the minister will give the committee a full explanation of these words contained in the resolution:

> —a port of any kind rather than being limited to goods entering through a sea, lake or river port.

Would the minister tell us what has been lacking in the legislation up till now that convinces him this particular legislative enactment is necessary in a statute which will at some time hence follow this resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, for many years subsection 2 of section 3 of the Customs Tariff has provided that the benefits of Canada's British preferential tariff shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of a specified list of British countries "when conveyed without transshipment from a port of any British country enjoying the benefits of the British preferential tariff into a sea, lake or river port of Canada". Similar language appears also in subsections 1 and 2 of section 5. At the time they were introduced, the words "sea, lake or river" in fact covered all ports to which it was physically possible for goods to be shipped direct from British preferential sources. Such goods had to move by vessel. Hence the phrase "sea, lake or river" was all-inclusive. However, with the development of trans-Atlantic, trans-Pacific, and trans-polar air travel, including cargo movements by air, the strict application of the limiting words "sea, lake or river" would now impose an unintended and undesirable restriction. It would exclude from British preferential treatment any goods arriving by air at some airports in Canada. Accordingly, in order to make it clear that goods shipped direct from a British preferential source to a Canadian airport are not excluded from British preferential tariff treatment, it is proposed to amend the provisions in question.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it this is a matter of clarifying the definition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would think, modernizing it.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the preferential tariff was granted to goods that came by air.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: So you are modernizing something which was done, probably, properly but maybe, technically, illegally.

Resolution agreed to.

2. Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 521(2), 522(4), 528, 529, 529a, 534(a), 534(b), 538b, 538e, 538f, 538g(1), 538g(2), 538h, 538j, 538k, 538m, 538n, 538p, 541b, 542a, 542b, 545, 554d, 554e, 554f, 555, 556, 556a, 556b, 562a, 563a, 568, 568a(i), 568a(ii), 574, 574a, 574b, 619, 685 and 810, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of these items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With regard to this resolution, as I indicated earlier, it embraces all the textile items in italics with respect to which changes are being proposed. This resolution arises from three reports of the tariff board. The reports are those relating to hosiery and knitted goods; narrow fabrics and lace; and wool clothing and manufactures.

It is proposed to introduce 29 new or revised items which replace or consolidate 40 former items. Of the 29 new items, 19 involve the renumbering, rewording or consolidation of existing items without any substantial net change in the rates of duty. Two involve increases in duty, while eight involve decreases.

Most of the items in question were bound under the GATT. Hence negotiations with our GATT trading partners were necessary before we could act upon the tariff board's recommendations. In these negotiations our principal trading partners recognized, however, that the proposed increases were offset by equally important decreases. May I ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to pay particular attention to the next sentence? It was not necessary to provide any compensation outside the textile field in order to conclude negotiations with them. In other words, the countries concerned were satisfied that this represents a balance—the quids and the quos as recommended by the tariff board. As a matter of fact, they were so fully satisfied with the reductions recommended by the tariff board that they were not only prepared to agree to the increases recommended by the tariff board but to forgo in three respects benefits they might have expected to receive under the recommendations of the tariff board. It is clear, therefore, that resolution No. 2 is, as I have said, a balanced package which in its result involves neither higher nor lower tariffs.

There are, of course, gains from the adoption of a more logical and orderly nomenclature and arrangement of items recommended by the board. I think that all parties should benefit from this. Moreover, as I mentioned in the budget speech, the resolutions which I have introduced propose certain departures from the tariff board's recommendations, which will provide somewhat more protection for the knit goods and narrow fabrics sectors of the industry than they otherwise would have had.

As to the four departures which I have mentioned, three involve changes which were requested by Canadian textile producers, while the fourth was introduced in the course of negotiations as a result of representations made by Italy. The three departures recommended by Canadian textile producers concerned, first, knitted goods under item 568; second, socks and stockings other than wool, item 568a(2); and third, narrow fabrics of man-made fibres, item 562a(2). The fourth item which, as I have said, was the occasion of representations by Italy, concerned travel rugs under item 534a(2). I shall make this comment on the last, or fourth item, that the departure in this case from the recommendation of the tariff board involves a downward modification in a rate recommended by the tariff board. This was introduced in the course of negotiations in order to meet a special problem in our trade with Italy. The board recommended that the new tariff item for blankets, item 534(a), include travel rugs as well as household blankets. The composite m.f.n. rate of 20 per cent and 15 cents per pound provided for on this item would have increased the effective rate on low-priced Italian travel rugs from 27½ per cent to about 45 per cent. Italy requested that a ceiling of 37½ per cent be introduced for travel rugs, and a settlement was reached on that basis.

In addition, there are a few minor non-substantive changes in wording or arrangement. Those have been introduced for technical reasons or for purposes of clarification.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his statement introducing the amendments involved in resolution No. 2. When we get to the details of the amendments to the Customs Tariff we are, of course, confronted with a complicated affair. It is to me, and I assume it is to most members of the committee who are listening to the minister. While he was speaking I should not, perhaps, have turned away my attention from his remarks, but I was trying to count the number of items in the Customs Tariff which are up for amendment. I have not had that opportunity, but they are very numerous. They are available for hon. members to see, however, in the resolution before us and they appear at page 6673 and following pages of Hansard of June 20.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may tell the hon. gentleman there are changes involved this year in about 80 items.

Mr. Benidickson: Thank you. With regard to textiles, I have not made any comment with respect to the balance of tariff impost involved in these resolutions. I had referred the minister to his own statement made on budget night where he said as reported at page 6653 that these involved renegotiations because, as he has repeated now, most of the items were what we called bound; that is bound against increase under our GATT agreement. As I understand it, the minister in his last statement said that in so far as textiles are concerned, to the extent that textiles comprise items of the 80 which the minister says are in the schedules before us, it has been possible to renegotiate within that very area of textile products. I am glad to hear that. As all members know, we have an opportunity to extract this information at this stage and then we shall have, later, a bill presented giving us a further opportunity to discuss this question. I take it that as far as the 80 items are concerned some will involve textiles, the matter which the minister thought so important that he referred to it in his budget speech as reported at page 6653. I take it that has been the quid pro quo in the trading with the other partners in GATT within that same product area. I am glad this is so.

The minister then went on to say that there were four departures in respect of the advice that was given to the government by our tariff board, a tariff board that is now composed almost exclusively of people appointed by this government. I have no complaint about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not entirely.

Mr. Benidickson: Almost. Who sits on the board who was not appointed by the Conservatives?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is a good board, anyway.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not complaining about the board. I am saying that we have a tariff board and we would like to see that board have an opportunity to investigate the class or kind legislation. That board is composed of people appointed by this government. I have faith in them, faith in their adherence to their oath of office and their willingness to adhere, after appointment, to the laws of the land. I am not so sure, with all respect to ministers and everyone else, that this could be the result if there were not an appeal from bureaucratic decisions, including decisions of political ministers. This is one of the things about which we think.

The minister referred to four departures from tariff board decisions. Now, he skirted around that. He did give some more information when he started talking about some downward revisions of the fourth item which involved negotiations with Italy. However, when it came to three important departures from the recommendations of the tariff board, the minister simply confessed that this was true, this legislation involved three departures. He has not explained what those departures were.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. Benidickson: I was going to ask the minister to give us information relating to those departures and the decisions in respect of them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be pleased to do that. I thought we might more conveniently do that when the items are called in the schedule. If the hon. gentleman wishes it now I shall be glad to give an explanation of these three changes in detail.

The first concerned item 568, knitted goods. The tariff board recommended that no change be made in the British preferential rate of 20 per cent, but that the m.f.n. duty on these goods be reduced from 35 per cent to 32½ per cent. Imports under this tariff item average about $18 million annually, of which $6 million enter under the British preferential tariff and $12 million under the m.f.n. After reviewing the position of the knitted goods industry, however, the government decided that on balance it would not be desirable to introduce this tariff reduction at this time.

During the textile negotiations, Austria requested a concession on women's knitted wear valued at not less than $9 per pound. In the circumstances, it was agreed to establish an item, item 568 (2), for these goods providing for an m.f.n. rate of 32½ per cent as recommended by the board. This rate has been bound to Austria and the negotiations with that country were concluded on this basis. Imports of these very high priced Austrian knit goods are not competitive with Canadian products in the same sense as lower priced items from other sources.

Then, there is item 568a (2). The tariff board recommended that the specific component of the compound duty on non-woollen hosiery be reduced from 75 cents per dozen pairs to 60 cents per dozen pairs. Again, having regard to the position of the Canadian industry, it was decided not to implement the board's recommendation in that regard.

The third item concerned narrow fabrics of man-made fibres, which is item 562a (2). The tariff board proposed the establishment of a new tariff item to cover narrow fabrics of man-made fibres, which had been classified under several different tariff items at various rates of duty. The new rates recommended by the board were British preferential, 22½ per cent and m.f.n., 25 per cent. As a concession to the industry, particularly that sector engaged in the production of synthetic tapes and other narrow fabrics classified under the previous item 562 (a) at higher rates of duty, I have proposed rates of British preferential, 25 per cent and m.f.n., 27½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister said the other night relating to the tariff board report from which he had departed in his recommendations, there was one in connection with nails.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is resolution No. 3. That is not in this resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: I shall defer my remarks, then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This resolution concerns textiles only.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with resolution No. 3, the minister will recall the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made some adverse comments about this item.

Mr. McIlraith: In connection with the minister's remarks about item 568 (2), which reads:

> Knitted garments, women's and girls, wholly or in chief part by weight of wool or hair, valued at not less than $9 per pound.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

There does not seem to be any provision for the new luxury items of knitted silk. They are from Italy. Are they dealt with under this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I understand the item to which the hon. gentleman refers, it is not covered by this resolution at all. It is elsewhere.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no change, then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not in the budget resolutions at all.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one other matter which I think should be clarified at this stage. The form of the schedule takes out certain tariff numbers and then substitutes new ones. Sometimes the items substituted do not coincide by number and we find, in the form of the resolution, that the rates proposed are printed and then the rates in effect are printed on the same page. Sometimes the rates proposed in this budget are the same. For example, in respect of item 522 (4), the rates are the same in both instances. I take it that the change there is in the wording which is in italics.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct; as I said earlier, most of the changes here concern matters of nomenclature. This is part of the revision that the board recommended.

Mr. McIlraith: And the changes in nomenclature may arise out of combining items or dropping items and renumbering items as, for instance, in item 522 (4); that sort of thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that generally in these negotiations if there are concessions under GATT there is one particular country with which principal negotiations are conducted. Could the minister say which one it was in connection with these items?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were a number of countries involved in these changes. The country more concerned than any other in these items, in terms of volume, was the United States.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does Japan take any part in these negotiations, or is our trade with Japan exclusively governed by the Canadian-Japanese agreement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is obligation under GATT, of course, to consult with GATT countries having a supplying interest, and in this case Japan, along with other countries, was consulted.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister indicated in respect of the items involved in resolution

No. 2, which are textile items that have been traded within that group, that the United States was the principal trading country involved. What would be the second and third traders that were involved in these changes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The second would be the United Kingdom; the third, France.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before it carries I have one question I want to ask out of sheer curiosity. Will the minister tell me what a pantagraph is?

Mr. Hellyer: Something like a pantaloon.

Mr. Pickersgill: I refer to item 685.

Mr. Benidickson: The practice has been, as we deal with resolution No. 1, to call the items, item 522 being the first one. I suggest that as we deal with these items we have to watch the wording; it is rather involved. I also suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you call the items slowly. So far as I am concerned I am prepared to have the items called at this stage in resolution No. 2 if we do not do it too quickly because we have to observe the language.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I should not keep the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in a condition of curiosity any longer. A pantagraph is part of a printing press.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it a textile?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. McIlraith: I notice from the form of 685 that there are no italicized words in the definition and there is no change in the rate of duty. Why is the item in here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item continues without change that portion of the former tariff item 685 relating to pantagraphs and parts, engraving mills and other machinery used in printing textiles and wallpapers.

As a result of the tariff board's recommendations, blankets and blanketing used by textile manufacturers and wallpaper printers have been deleted from item 685. Blanketing for textile machinery will fall under the new item 534c.

In a word, you have a residue now of the former tariff item 685.

Mr. Pickersgill: In which there is no change?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we call the items one by one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought it was agreed that hon. members were satisfied with the items in resolution No. 2.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the practice of years has been to call the items without undue haste. I leave it to the chairman's discretion.

Items 522 and 528 agreed to.

Customs tariff—532f. Woven billiard cloth composed wholly or in part of wool or hair; melton cloth for use in the manufacture of tennis balls: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff 20 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent; and, per pound, most-favoured-nation tariff, 25 cents; general tariff, 35 cents.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell us whether there is any large quantity of this billiard cloth made in Canada, and where it is made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The imports in this case come almost entirely from the United Kingdom. As to Canadian manufacture, I am told that none of this is made in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Item 532g agreed to.

Customs tariff—533a. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactured, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or hair, when the textile component thereof is not more than 50 per cent, by weight, of silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 55 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I notice the additional words at the end of the paragraph. The emphasis is on products of silk. I would not think that they are important to our trade with the United States or the United Kingdom. I was wondering about the significance of our trade under this item? With what country do we find that this change will be most important? What other trading nations will this be important to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Item 533b agreed to.

Customs tariff—534a. (1) Household blankets of any material except wholly of cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent and, per pound, British preferential tariff, 5 cents; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 cents; general tariff, 30 cents.

(2) Automobile rugs, steamer rugs, travel rugs and similar articles of any material except wholly of cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 40 per cent; and, per pound, British preferential tariff, 5 cents; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 cents; general tariff, 30 cents.

The total duty leviable shall not be in excess of: most-favoured-nation tariff, 37½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has already made reference to blankets from Italy as being important in some of the changes we are making here. Is this where we must consider the blanket matter with respect to Italy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, this is the item, 534a (2).

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say why the general tariff rate on this item was increased?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member understands that practically all of our trade is carried on under British preferential and m.f.n. items. As a rule of thumb it is usually considered desirable that the general rate be double the British preferential rate.

Mr. Hellyer: If that is true, Mr. Chairman, it was much less than double before the change, and now it has been increased to double the smaller amount. The minister might give us some explanation as to why this change was considered necessary?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a sort of rule of thumb, and that rule had not been evident in this item previously. The tariff board report concerned itself with the British preferential and m.f.n. rates and, as I say, practically all of the trade here is carried on under these categories.

Mr. Benidickson: In so far as Italy is concerned, which apparently is the country of primary export, or import, if you want to call it that, for what is generally referred to in paragraph (2) as automobile rugs, the rate goes up under the most-favoured-nation item and this of course includes Italy. The rate goes up from 20 per cent to 27½ per cent. Specifically, what do we have to give away to Italy in our GATT negotiations to do the right thing by them in the renegotiations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, the quid pro quo is to be found within this item 534a. The hon. member has referred to the increase with respect to the second part of the item, the rugs, but he will find an offset in 534a (1), under blankets.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—534b. Press blankets or blanketing for use with printing presses and stereotypers' and type casters' blankets or blanketing, of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: This poses a technical difficulty for members of the committee trying to follow this type of legislation. We know that generally we look to the columns to see a change in the rate. When we look at the rates in effect prior to the rates proposed in the budget as against the rates given to us in the schedule to the left, we are in this difficulty. The print is very fine. I may be missing the obvious; I confess that immediately, but on a quick glance at item 534b as a member of the committee I do not see the obvious things that we look for, namely either a change in the rate or italicized changes in language.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have the italics only where new words are introduced. Where there are no italics obviously the change has consisted of deletions.

Mr. Benidickson: What are the deletions of words that are not obvious to a member of the committee without asking a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The old item 538h read as follows:

Stereotypers and typecasters' blankets or blanketing and press blankets or blanketing used for printing presses, of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say what has happened to the omitted parts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a very slight change in wording which is introduced solely for the purpose of clarification—

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no change at all then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —as recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is just semantics.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Modernization.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—534c. Blankets, blanketing and lapping for use by textile manufacturers on machines used in the manufacture of textiles: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about this item? Is this the item that is related to pantagraphs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, we are a long way from that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which is the item related to pantagraphs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Pantagraphs are in the last item.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said there was an item related to pantagraphs that was omitted from it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, I will give you that. The item, blanketing for textile machinery, will fall under the new item 534c.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, the minister might perhaps apologize because it turns out this is the item that was extracted from the pantagraph item, which was what I asked in the first place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have given the answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: First you said no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I did not say no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I was somewhat insistent and you finally looked it up with your officials and you found out that that was right. I thought it was from the original explanation you gave. The reason I raise this question is that there does not appear to be any change in the rates at all and I wonder why they have been separated. What purpose was served by all this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this item continues part of tariff item 685 with no change in rates and with minor changes in wording. The new item is as recommended by the tariff board except that the words "on machines used in the manufacture of textiles" were added. This change was made at the request of Canadian blanket manufacturers to preclude the possibility of blankets and blanketing being imported by Canadian manufacturers for further processing into blankets, clothing and other manufactured articles for resale.

Mr. McIlraith: So that there is in effect a change by limiting the articles coming in under this item to the end use to be made of them. It is an important clarification and I think a desirable one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But that in itself is only a clarification.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—541b. Woven fabrics, wholly of jute, not exceeding 12 inches in width: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to item 541b I would assume that the minister's answer as to item 534b would be applicable here, namely, that there are some words omitted. If so, would he tell us briefly what the words are that are omitted because otherwise the words before and after would appear to be the same.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item retains without change in rate or wording that portion of the former item 541b relating to woven fabrics of jute. Braided fabrics will fall under the new tariff item 565b under the words "Braids of all kinds, n.o.p."

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said that there was no change in rate but it appears to me that the general rate is changed. It is 30 per cent in one case and 25 per cent in the other. What is the reason for that?

Mr. Benidickson: The general tariff is not usually important. Why is there a change there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The same observation applies as I made to the hon. member for Trinity. The tariff board concerned itself with the British preferential and most-favoured-nation rates. We have very little trade under the general tariff and the change so far as the general tariff is concerned is one to bring the rate into line with the general practice.

Mr. Hellyer: The rule of thumb given by the minister before was that the general rate should be doubled the most-favoured-nation rate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, double the British preferential rate.

Item agreed to.

Items 542a and 562a agreed to.

Customs tariff—562j. Bolting cloth for sifting flour in flour mills: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, 45 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this something entirely new?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Prior to the budget of March, 1960, bolting cloth entered duty free under the former tariff item 563. The tariff board recommended that this item be deleted from the tariff and this was done by the budget resolutions of March, 1960. As a result, silk bolting cloth became dutiable under existing tariff item 552a at British preferential 12½ per cent and most-favoured-nation 22½ per cent. Synthetic bolting cloth became dutiable under the previous tariff item 562a at British preferential 22½ per cent and most-favoured-nation 30 per cent and 20 cents per pound. The new item has been established as a concession jointly to the Canadian flour milling industry and to Switzerland in order to facilitate the textile negotiations with that country.

Mr. Benidickson: We have very few items left to deal with under this resolution. Would the minister indicate in trade or dollar value which are the most important items? We in the opposition lose touch with the consequential items involved in a technical schedule of this kind. Among those items that are yet to be dealt with, which ones really involve important dollar values? When we have the amendments to the Customs Tariff we will have an opportunity to go over each of these items again in the schedule but perhaps the minister would give us that information as the hour is getting late.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not say that any of these are very large items. Probably the largest in this group is 568. Imports under 568 average $18 million annually. That is the knitted goods item, and $6 million enter under the British preferential tariff and $12 million under the most-favoured-nation tariff. That is by far the largest of these items. Individually the others would not be regarded as large items.

Mr. Benidickson: And these, of course, will appear in the schedule to the bill that is going to be presented to us and we will have an opportunity to reconsider some of these items then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the schedule will be in the bill as in the resolution.

Item agreed to.

Items 565a, 565b, 565c, 565d, 566a and 566b agreed to.

Customs tariff—568. (1) Knitted garments, knitted fabrics and knitted goods, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 35 per cent, general tariff, 55 per cent.
(2) Knitted garments, women's and girls', wholly or in chief part by weight of wool or hair, valued at not less than $9 per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 33½ per cent; general tariff, 55 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister was good enough to say that this was perhaps the most important item so far as dollar value is concerned. We have the words "knitted fabrics" added here. What is the significance of adding those words?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a clarification only.

Item agreed to.

Items 568a and 619 agreed to.

Customs tariff—685. Pantagraphs and parts thereof, including diamond points, and engraving mills, for engraving copper rollers used in printing textiles and wallpapers: British preferential tariff, free: most-favoured-nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The Chairman: Shall item 685 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the house leader could indicate what the business will be for the rest of the week and, if possible, as has been the custom in the past, indicate the business for next week.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Churchill: It is not possible to carry on the custom which we have been following over the last two years, and to indicate the business for next week. The hope of the house, of course, is that we can finish the essential items that are in front of us as quickly as possible. However, I think it is wiser to announce the business from day to day. Tomorrow we will carry on with the resolutions following the budget.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assume the minister meant what he said, namely that he hoped to get through all the essential business. It would appear to me that there might be a considerable probability that the budget resolutions would not take all of tomorrow. Surely the government has some other business.

Mr. Churchill: Nothing pleases me more than does the request of the house for more business for tomorrow. We have on the order paper Bill No. S-28, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely that is not essential business. That was not in the Prime Minister's list.

Mr. Churchill: These have been through the house and then over to the other place. Then there is Bill No. S-29 to amend the Loan Companies Act. Then there is the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: And after that what is there? We are seeking to expedite the business of the house and we should like to have enough business to take a whole day.

Mr. Churchill: We fully appreciate that. There is the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport in connection with the Pine Point railway which also could be considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that one of the items the Prime Minister indicated was essential?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister say whether this program will go on for Saturday as well or could he indicate what would be happening on Saturday?

Mr. Benidickson: Will estimates be taken on Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: No. The intention will be to complete, in so far as we can, the resolutions and the bills following the budget. If the house passes the resolutions tomorrow, as has now been indicated, then of course, I think the bills would normally follow on Saturday.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, if I may do so, I think I should say this. Since we are seeking to expedite the closing of the session or the adjournment, whichever it is, I would suggest this to the minister. I do not believe that, in all the period during which I have observed parliament it has ever been customary to take budget bills immediately after the resolutions. There has always been at least an interval of a full day in order to give the opposition a full opportunity to consider the debate on the resolution stage. I suggest that much greater progress would be made if the government did not seek to depart from that usual convention and would find some other business for Saturday.

Mr. Churchill: For Saturday, and the bills on Monday?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think we could possibly object, after the week end, to having the bills.

Mr. Churchill: These useful suggestions will be taken into consideration and an announcement will be made tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no question that it is the intention of the government to have the house sit on Saturday, notwithstanding the fact that it is July 1?

Mr. Churchill: In the past we have frequently sat on July 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite so. We are not objecting.

It being 38 minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 30, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHEVRIER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY ACTING REVENUE MINISTER

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege affecting the rights of all members of this house. I wish to do so very calmly and objectively, because I recognize the difficulty in which the minister concerned finds himself.

The question of privilege, sir, is that an official of the Department of National Revenue gave in evidence to a provincial royal commission information which the minister declined to give to this house regarding the administration of the department for which he is temporarily responsible. I refer to evidence given by Mr. Frank Gervais yesterday in contradiction of Senator Courtemanche. We do not ask the minister to give us any information which the law forbids him to give, but we believe the minister should prepare a careful statement for tomorrow giving us every bit of information which the law permits him to give, and certainly as much information as was given to the provincial royal commission. May I ask the minister if he is going to say anything in reply.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I indicated that an assessor from the tax department had visited this particular place of business, as is done frequently in respect of many businesses. I do not feel that I have kept any information from the house. I indicated at that time that the assessor had visited the hospital. In fact, what I did say was that an inspector of the department had visited the Jean Talon hospital just as inspectors of the department visit many other places of business during the course of their duties. I do not see that anything further should be done.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, there is certainly a difference of opinion in that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter should not be debated. The hon. member has made clear his alleged point of privilege. There is no motion before the house at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF HELICOPTERS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does he not think, in view of the position which I think he has properly taken with regard to steps for the efficient operation of the commission in Laos, that Canada might itself supply the three helicopters necessary for the successful operation of that commission, because of the intransigent attitude taken by the Soviet union and perhaps other difficulties that attend the attitudes of certain other countries at the Geneva conference?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that the hon. member for Essex East should try to complicate an already difficult situation. We have taken our stand at Geneva during the conference there demanding that the co-chairmen provide the commission with adequate equipment. There was a meeting yesterday to deal with the problem, and I am very hopeful that it will now be solved. There is equipment actually in Laos, some of which was offered by the United States. France, in addition, offered certain equipment. Nobody can put the equipment in without the consent of the co-chairmen. The situation is not just as simple as the hon. member has indicated. I can assure him that the government is doing the very best it can to see that this commission gets proper equipment.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF CANADIAN CITIZEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs could inform the house as to the progress that has been made in attempting to persuade the authorities of Czechoslovakia to bring about the release of Mr. Milorad Cop.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that last November I reported on the arrest and subsequent trial of Milorad Cop, a Canadian who was visiting Czechoslovakia. At that time the government was pressing to have an interview with Mr. Cop. This was allowed in January, following completion of the appeal procedure through which his sentence of seven years imprisonment was confirmed.

At the urging of our legation Mr. Cop has been allowed to receive parcels of food, and a further consular visit was arranged. During these interviews it became obvious to our consul that Mr. Cop's health was deteriorating as a result of his confinement. Our serious concern for his health has been brought to the attention of the Czechoslovak authorities on several occasions, and our representations have been broadened on the basis of humanitarian considerations to include a formal request for Mr. Cop's release and return to Canada.

These representations have been through normal diplomatic channels but have been made at a high level in order to emphasize the deep concern of the Canadian government for the welfare of this Canadian citizen. I myself have spoken to the Czechoslovak minister in Ottawa on the subject. Our representations have not thus far had the desired result, but I think we must give the Czechoslovak authorities time to weigh all the factors bearing on this case in the hope that they will eventually recognize the value to our relations of a concrete humanitarian gesture.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. My curiosity has been stimulated by information I have received through the pipe line, the pump line and the grapevine. My question is based on an understanding that negotiations between the Minister of Finance and the premier of British Columbia in respect to the Columbia development have been continuing through correspondence. In view of the fact that there appears to be a stalemate, and because the house has not been informed of developments to date, is the minister in a position now to further inform this house in regard to this interesting question?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wrote a letter to the premier of British Columbia on May 17 setting forth the views and the offer of the federal government. As I reported to the house subsequently, I had a meeting with the premier during a visit he made to this neighbourhood some few days later. We had a further discussion on the subject at that time. He subsequently wrote me a letter dated June 9 which contained further views of his government in relation to the terms that had been discussed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has Premier Bennett expressed any opposition to the tabling of correspondence later than that already tabled?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He has not, and when I talked to him in late May he was not prepared to agree to the release of the letter I had written to him on May 17. It may be that now that he has replied to that letter he would be agreeable to the tabling of both letters in the house. I have not received any consent or approval from him to that course as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I may ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister planning to take advantage of the Social Credit national convention to have a further conference with Mr. Bennett on this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have not been invited to that conference.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REPORTED UNSUITABILITY OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any comment to make on the statement made by Mr. J. M. Cook of Regina, chief engineer of the Saskatchewan water development branch to the effect that more than half of the 430,850 acres which were to have been irrigated by the South Saskatchewan river dam project are unsuitable for irrigation because of high sodium content—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member has brought forward a matter of such immediate and urgent importance which would warrant asking for comment.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I sent the Prime Minister notice of my intention to ask the question. Perhaps he has the answer.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister wishes to deal with it of course I would not want to prevent him from doing so, but in my opinion it is not an appropriate question for the orders of the day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF OFFICERS AND MEN FROM H.M.C.S. "CORNWALLIS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on the eve of Canada's 94th national birthday, to aid in which observance they have come from all parts of Canada, may I be permitted to draw attention to the presence in the galleries of approximately 180 officers and men of the sunset guard, band and gun crews, of the Royal Canadian Navy's new entry training establishment in Nova Scotia, H.M.C.S. Cornwallis, and ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has a greeting for these men.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the Royal Canadian Navy in the gallery today are here in Ottawa to perform the R.C.N. sunset ceremony as part of our Dominion day celebration. There are three performances being given on parliament hill; one was given last night, one will be given tonight and one on Dominion day, and the public is cordially invited to attend.

I might point out that the approximately 180 officers and men carrying out this ceremony are from H.M.C.S. Cornwallis, the Royal Canadian Navy new entry training establishment, and the majority are young sailors who joined the navy some three months ago and are now completing their basic training at Cornwallis. I am sure those who attend these ceremonies will appreciate not only the high calibre of these young men who have elected to serve their country in the R.C.N. but also this evidence of the excellent quality of the training they are receiving.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I say on behalf of the opposition that we are delighted to have this fine group of young sailors with us. We know they have come from one of Canada's oldest and most distinguished provinces, and we rejoice with the members from that province in having them here to visit us. We also appreciate the performance they have already given and the others they are to put on this evening and tomorrow. We hope they will enjoy their stay here; we agree with the minister that they represent a cross section of the finest and best of young Canadian manhood. They are in fact the people on whom we shall have to rely in the future for the growth and development of this country.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I join with the Minister of National Defence and the spokesman for the Liberal party in extending a welcome to these young members of the Royal Canadian Navy. Not only will we have the advantage of enjoying their entertainment and witnessing their skills, but we trust they will have a very happy, enjoyable and fruitful experience during their visit to Ottawa.

AIR TRANSPORT

RENEGOTIATION OF U.S.-CANADA BILATERAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it a fact that the discussion in Washington on the United States-Canada bilateral air agreement are leading to an early collapse, as appears in a report datelined Washington and appearing in the Toronto Star on June 28? Can the minister report on the progress of these negotiations?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day, a Canadian delegation has met with representatives of the United States government to discuss in general fashion matters concerning the bilateral agreement between our two countries. As I said at that time, these were preliminary talks. My understanding is that there was an exchange of views. The Canadian delegation has expressed the views of our government on this matter. So far the meetings have been strictly preliminary, and we hope to resume talks with the Americans some time in the fall.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In the report to which I have referred it is noted that a United States delegate made the comment that he could not say what progress could be made until he knew what was on the minds of the Canadian delegates. My question is, can the minister comment on this statement, and indicate what the Canadian team is seeking from the United States in these discussions?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meeting was to study in a preliminary fashion the bilateral agreement between our two countries. Canada would like the bilateral agreement to be reconsidered and studied anew by the two countries, and we have given the Americans the reason why we want the bilateral agreement studied again.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

HALIFAX-NEWFOUNDLAND—BILL OF LADING COVERAGE ON SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister please advise the house whether he has received a brief from Mr. Norman Smith, president of the board of trade, St. John's, to the effect that since confederation an arrangement has been in effect whereby goods shipped on the C.N.R. from points on the mainland through Halifax and thence by private steamships to Newfoundland are carried on the one through bill of lading, and that the cancellation of this practice would adversely affect the trade of St. John's? If so, what reply has he made?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a brief from Mr. Smith, and I have written to him that I am bringing his representations to the attention of the management of the C.N.R.

THE CENSUS

VANCOUVER—ISSUE OF SUMMONS FOR FAILURE TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister any information to give the house with respect to a summons served on a Vancouver television and radio commentator in connection with his answers to questions on the census? Would the minister advise whether this is the only case of a summons being issued in connection with failure to answer questions on the census forms?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think that question sounds like one that would be better placed on the order paper and answered in detail.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VOODOO AIRCRAFT—REPORTED CLOSING OF PRODUCTION LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether it is a fact, as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail, that the McDonnell Aircraft production line of Voodoo aircraft was completed in December of last year?

[Mr. Balcer.]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of the date that production line may have shut down, but the production run of F-101 planes was completed some time a few months ago.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say when he expects that these planes will be put into operational service in Canada?

Mr. Harkness: We expect to start forming the squadrons this fall. Some will be in operation before the end of the year.

[Later:]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the time at which the F-101 planes will come into operation I may have left the wrong impression. As I said, the squadrons will begin to be formed this year but they will not be operational as squadrons, although some F-101's will be flying and in operation until some time in 1962.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RESOURCES FOR TOMORROW—PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE BY HOMER STEVENS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired whether Mr. Homer Stevens of the fishermen's union in British Columbia had been invited to participate in the resources for tomorrow conference to be held in Montreal October 23-28, 1961.

I can now inform the hon. member that following a meeting of the policy subcommittee of ministers from the provinces and myself in May, 1961, about 300 persons were selected to participate in the technical discussions of the workshops considering the various aspects of the six renewable resource sectors. Among the participants who were approached was Mr. Stevens, to whom an invitation to attend this conference was extended by the province. As hon. members know, the conference is sponsored by the ten provinces with the federal government.

In answer to the second part of the hon. member's question, Mr. Stevens was a member of the advisory group on fisheries which met in Ottawa last March. Other members of the advisory group are as follows: Hon. James C. Sinclair, president, fisheries association of British Columbia; Dr. P. A. Larkin, director of University of British Columbia institute of fisheries; Mr. C. J. Morrow, president, Lunenburg Sea Products; Dr. W. R. Martin, fisheries research board, St. Andrews, New Brunswick; Dr. K. Doan, department of mines and natural resources, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Dr. J. R.

Dymond, department of zoology, University of Toronto; Dr. Raymond Gushue, president, Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland; Mr. A. H. MacDonald, natural resources department, Saskatchewan; Professor H. S. Gordon, Carleton University, Ottawa; Dr. Arthur Labrie, deputy minister of fisheries, Quebec; and Dr. Harry Winsor, Newfoundland fisheries development authority.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would it be correct to say that the short answer, based on what the minister has said, is that this communist will be participating in the conference?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PAYMENTS TO PERSONS ATTENDING PRECENSUS SCHOOLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked whether census takers had received unemployment insurance benefits while taking a course on census matters in Toronto.

I am informed by the unemployment insurance commission that five half day courses were given and that those taking the courses received $5 for each session. This money was considered as earnings by the commission, and after making allowance for the amount which come under permissible earnings the remainder was deducted from the amount of benefit which went to each claimant. In the case of a person whose weekly benefit was $30, if that person had earned $25 through taking these courses, then after the allowable portion of $15 was deducted the remaining $10 would be taken off the benefit and the person would get $20 for that week instead of $30.

This is only an example and, of course, I would not be able to go into further details unless the hon. member is in a position to inform me of the specific case he has in mind, which he has not done as yet.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXCISE ACT—REQUEST TO REVERT TO MOTIONS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of introducing a bill pursuant to the report presented last evening by the committee of ways and means and adopted by the house. The bill is entitled an act to amend the Excise Act. It will facilitate the earlier distribution of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister proposing to move first reading?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-115, to amend the Excise Act.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to introduce the said bill?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to clarify a point before leave is given. It will be understood that the undertaking given by the house leader last night still stands, that this bill will not be proceeded with before Monday.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand it that way. I understood that the hon. gentleman wished to have the bill in his hands for 24 hours, and that was the reason for asking leave to introduce it at this point this morning. The resolution was reported last night.

This is one of the bills that simply set forth in the same terms the language of the resolution. This is not like the Income Tax Act. There are bills to amend the Excise Act and the Customs Tariff which simply reproduce the precise language of the resolution. This bill introduces only the one amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to make it very plain that it was my clear understanding that the house leader gave us an assurance that the budget bills would not be taken up before Monday.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might say a word here. I did not give a firm assurance. The question was asked based on a reasonable request. It has been under consideration. Within half an hour I will have a program for discussion with party leaders on the other side of the house concerning the completion of the work of the session. I wonder whether the hon. member would let that matter stand until we have that conference.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time? Next sitting of this house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CF-104G—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRIME CONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production concerning the NATO defence program for the production of CF-104G aircraft. Due to the fact that unconfirmed information has apparently been circulated in connection with this matter, is the minister now prepared to make an official statement of what Canadian companies will be the prime contractors for the building of the CF-104G aircraft? I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I have given the minister a copy of this question.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I will give the major contractors and subcontractors for the Canadian CF-104 program and their places of business. These same firms will be used on the F-104G program to be jointly financed by Canada and the United States, and produced in Canada:

Canadair,	Montreal
Avro Aircraft,	Toronto
Orenda Engines,	Toronto
Canadian Car & Foundry,	Fort William
Dominion Rubber,	Kitchener
Jarry Hydraulics,	Montreal
Aviation Electric,	Montreal
Canadian General Electric,	Peterborough
Canadian Steel Improvement,	Toronto
York Gears,	Toronto
Thompson Products,	St. Catharines
Lucas-Rotax,	Toronto
Canadian Westinghouse,	Hamilton
Renfrew Aircraft & Engineering,	Renfrew
Canadian Pratt & Whitney,	Montreal
Bristol Aero Industries Ltd.,	Winnipeg
Light Alloys,	Renfrew
Northern Electric,	Belleville
Garrett Manufacturing,	Toronto
Dowty Equipment,	Toronto
Computing Devices,	Ottawa
Collins Radio,	Toronto
Minneapolis-Honeywell,	Toronto

There are many other subcontractors whose contracts, while not large, will be significant in relation to the size of the company.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say what major United States firms will be involved in the production of these aircraft? Does the minister have a list of those?

Mr. O'Hurley: Would the hon. member repeat the question? I did not quite hear it.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister have a list of the major United States companies who supply components for the F-104G?

Mr. O'Hurley: The major portion of all the parts for this program are being manufactured in Canada under licence. There will be some items purchased in the United States. The list will not be very long. I have not this list with me today. I will get it for the hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Speaker.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

OPERATION OF STAMP VENDING MACHINES ON SUNDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Postmaster General a question. In view of the recent supreme court decision prohibiting the operation of coin laundries on Sunday, has the Postmaster General obtained legal advice on behalf of his department to ascertain whether coin operating stamp vending machines are legal on Sunday?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we have been neither to the cleaners nor to the supreme court with these machines as yet. We will look into the matter, although the point has not yet arisen in the department headquarters.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose yesterday we had disposed of part 2 of the Customs Tariff resolutions. We are now on part 3.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

3. Resolved,—That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 9, 9a, 9b, 9c, 9e, 152(e), 187c, 197a, 198a, 199m, 202a, 409c(3), 425, 425a, 425b, 427e, 431, 438h, 445o(i), 445o(ii), 445o(iii) and 658, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of these items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Customs tariff—9a. Live poultry, n.o.p. British preferential tariff, 2 cents; most favoured nation tariff, 2 cents; general tariff, 5 cents.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, yesterday we disposed of the resolution dealing with the Excise Act, and we disposed of two of the four resolutions which contain amendments to the schedules in the Customs Tariff. The resolutions will be followed by bills which will give details of the manner in which these tax changes will be administered. The bill, of course, with respect to the Customs Tariff will contain as a schedule a repetition of the items which appear in the resolutions.

Having regard to the fact that some of the proposed changes in the budget resolutions are imposing new tax burdens and are not all, by any means, relieving taxpayers of taxes, we feel it would perhaps be more orderly to facilitate the presentation of these bills as rapidly as possible, because even a week end is all too short to enable those in the country who are specialists in the fields of trade and industry affected, and the professional people who practise in the tax field, to be fully familiar with all that is proposed in the actual statutes. I also think it is desirable that the press should have the earliest opportunity of informing the public of the minister's intentions, not only as announced here in brief, but as they will be in the effective tax statutes.

So, reserving fully our rights to continue to examine these matters in adequate detail, I am going to say very little more on this subject today in the hope that we may soon have a look at the actual texts of the statutes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—9b. Quails, partridges, and squabs, live or dead, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. Caron: I should like to ask the minister why there should be a difference between the English and the French versions here. The English version refers to "quails, partridges and squabs". The French version has "cailles, perdrix, pigeons sans plumes, vivants ou morts". Is there any variety of pigeons without feathers, or has the government established a nudist camp among the pigeons? I believe there should be no difference between the two versions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will examine this question in relation to the terms of the bill. I was not aware of any divergence between the English and the French versions of the resolution. The intention is that the resolution shall apply to quails, partridges and squabs whether live or dead.

Mr. Caron: I think the phrase "sans plumes" should disappear completely. Make it the same as in the English version. I do not think they take off their feathers before they die.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not changed as compared with the existing statute. The alteration here in the text, apart from rates, is the addition in English of the words "live or dead". In the French version the only change in the text of the item is "vivants ou morts". In other words the earlier words of the clause are in the present statute. The description in the present English version is "squabs". In the French version it is "pigeonneaux sans plumes". So we have simply carried forward the provision of the existing act in this respect.

Mr. Caron: I think the versions should be the same and that the words "sans plumes" should disappear, then the text would be the same as in the English version—"live or dead".

Mr. Chevrier: "Plumons le ministre."

Item agreed to.

Resolutions agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions on the Customs Tariff?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it might facilitate the business of the house if we were to rise at this point and report these resolutions so that the bill founded on them might be introduced, and ask leave to sit again in committee of ways and means.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that we go on and see if we can dispose of all of these resolutions before we do that. I think we might save a lot of time which would otherwise be spent in going back and forth between the committee and the house and that we would make greater progress, which is what the Minister of Veterans Affairs asked us to do last night.

EXCISE TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That the excise tax of seven and one half per cent on automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use be repealed.
2. That the excise tax of fifteen per cent on radio broadcasting receiving sets be changed to two dollars or fifteen per cent per set, whichever is the greater.
3. That the excise tax of fifteen per cent on tubes for phonographs, record-playing devices, radio broadcasting receiving sets, television receiving sets or any combination of the foregoing be changed to ten cents or fifteen per cent per tube, whichever is the greater, and restricted to tubes the sale price of which does not exceed five dollars per tube, but without affecting picture tubes for television receiving sets the excise tax on which shall continue to be fifteen per cent.
4. That the excise tax of ten per cent on devices commonly or commercially known as lighters be changed to ten cents or ten per cent per lighter, whichever is the greater.
5. That laminated timber for bridges and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax when sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale.
6. That additives for fuel oil for heating and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.
7. That blowers used in warm air systems for heating buildings and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.
8. That thermostats for use with permanent heating systems for the heating of buildings and materials used in the maufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.
9. That propane bulk tanks for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings and directly connected to such furnaces and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

10. That the exemption from sales tax for "Ducts for warm air systems for heating buildings, but not including materials used in their manufacture" be changed to read "Ducts for warm air and ventilation systems for buildings, but not including materials used in their manufacture".

11. That precast concrete piles and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

12. That the exemption for "doors" and the exemption for "Door and window screens", now appearing under the heading "Building Materials" in schedule III, be combined and changed to read "Doors for buildings and door and window screens" and the exemption for "Prepared roofings", now appearing under the heading of "Building Materials" in schedule III, be changed to read "Prepared roofings for buildings".

13. That prepared dry concrete mixes and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

14. That the exemption from sales tax for feeds "for fur bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value" be amended by deleting the words "whose pelts have commercial value".

15. That the exemption from sales tax for "Preparations, chemicals or poisons for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture, and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof", be changed to read "Preparations, chemicals or poisons (other than pharmaceuticals) for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture, and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof".

16. That self propelled, self unloading forage wagons for off-highway use for farm purposes and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

17. That the exemption from sales tax for milk and cream bottles and milk and cream cans be extended to include milk and cream plastic bags.

18. That seismic shot-hole casing and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

19. That the provisions of part II of the said act imposing an export duty on exports of electrical power be amended so that every person who exports electrical power from Canada by a line or wire or other conductor shall pay the duty on all electrical power so exported by him during any period specified pursuant to section 9 of the said act, less any such electrical power reimported by him, or imported by him as a result of an international equichange transfer of electrical power on the same or connected circuits, during that period.

20. That the tax of ten per cent on net premiums in respect of insurance on property in Canada paid or payable by Canadian residents to an insurer not authorized under the laws of Canada or any province to transact the business of insurance, be extended to apply to net premiums in respect of all classes of insurance except life insurance, personal accident insurance, sickness insurance, insurance against marine risks and insurance against nuclear risks to the extent that such insurance against nuclear risks is not, in the opinion of the superintendent of insurance, available within Canada.

21. That any enactment founded on paragraphs 1 to 18 of this resolution be deemed to have come into force on June 21, 1961, that any enactment founded on paragraph 19 of this resolution be applicable in respect of electrical power exported after August 31, 1961, and that any enactment founded on paragraph 20 of this resolution be applicable in respect of contracts of insurance effected or renewed after July 15, 1961.

INCOME TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the maximum annual rate at which a taxpayer carrying on business in Canada may deduct expenditures of a capital nature made by him in Canada in respect of scientific research shall be increased from 33⅓ per cent to 100 per cent.

2. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the requirement that the amount deductible on account of expenditures in respect of scientific research shall not exceed 5 per cent of the taxable income of the taxpayer in the preceding year unless the research program has been approved be removed with respect to expenditures which are not of a capital nature.

3. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years a non-profit corporation constituted exclusively for promoting or carrying on scientific research in Canada that expends all amounts received by it on such research shall be exempt from tax and amounts contributed to it shall be deductible as current expenditures in respect of scientific research.

4. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years a corporation constituted exclusively for charitable purposes be permitted to include donations to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or a province or a Canadian municipality, in the amount such a corporation must expend each year in order to qualify for exemption from income tax.

5. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the present maximum limits on the amount deductible in computing taxable income on account of medical expenses be repealed.

6. That amounts paid on and after January 1, 1961 for or in respect of a laryngeal speaking aid be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

7. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years an amount paid by an individual in the year on account of legal expenses incurred to collect salary or wages owing to him by an employer be deductible in computing income.

8. That for the 1958 and subsequent taxation years an amount not exceeding $300 received by an individual in the year from a municipality as an allowance for expenses incurred while carrying out the duties of a volunteer fireman be not included in computing income.

9. That provision be made in respect of a new class of profit sharing plans under which

(a) amounts allocated by the trustee shall not be included in the income of an individual who is a beneficiary under the plan until the year in which they are received,

(b) no tax shall be payable by the trustee under the plan on the taxable income of the trust, and

(c) an employer may deduct in computing income for the year an amount which when added to his contribution, if any, under a registered pension fund or plan does not exceed $1500 per employee.

10. That after June 20, 1961 any payment by a resident of Canada which is

(a) a lump sum payment out of or pursuant to a superannuation or pension fund or plan,

(b) a payment upon retirement of an employee in recognition of long service,

(c) a payment to an employee or former employee in respect of loss of office or employment,

(d) a payment under a profit sharing plan (to the extent that the amount thereof would be included in computing the payee's income for the year if the payee were a resident of Canada), made to an individual who is a non-resident of Canada and who during the five years preceding the year of payment was a resident of, or employed in Canada, for a period or periods the aggregate of which was 36 months or more, shall be deemed to be income for the year from duties performed by him in Canada but nothing in this paragraph shall apply to a payment which can be established to be one of a series of payments to be continued at regular intervals during the life of the recipient.

11. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years where an individual residing outside of Canada is deemed to be resident in Canada because he is an officer or servant of Canada or a province his wife residing with him (if she was previously resident in Canada) or his dependent child shall also be deemed to be resident in Canada.

12. That for the 1962 and subsequent taxation years a corporation incorporated in Canada that is carrying on business in Canada shall be deemed to be resident in Canada.

13. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the deduction from income allowed to a corporation whose principal business is mining or producting pertoleum or natural gas or processing mineral ores or metals recovered from mineral ores, in respect of expenses incurred in searching for minerals in Canada or exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada be extended to a corporation whose principal business is fabricating metals.

14. That with respect to the taxation years of a personal corporation commencing on or after September 1, 1961 the manner of taxing shareholders of a personal corporation and the definition of a personal corporation be revised and in particular

(a) that carrying on an active business shall not disqualify a corporation from being a personal corporation unless the income from carrying on a business exceeds 50 per cent of the income of the corporation.

(b) that a personal corporation may include a corporation controlled by any group of individuals resident in Canada all the members of which are related persons,

(c) that a corporation controlled by one or more trusts or estates shall be a personal corporation if it otherwise qualifies,

(d) that the income of a personal corporation for a year shall be deemed to have been distributed to its shareholders in proportion to their shareholdings instead of in proportion to amounts transferred to the corporation,

(e) that where a taxpayer has transferred property to a personal corporation and he does not receive by way of dividends on shares in the corporation, or by way of interest on amounts owing to him by the corporation, an amount at least equal to 5 per cent per annum of the value of the property or unpaid balance, any amount deemed to have been received as a dividend by his spouse or child shall be deemed to have been received as income from property transferred from the taxpayer to the extent of the difference between the said 5 per cent and the amount he actually received,

(f) that losses incurred in the previous five years that were not previously deductible shall be deductible in computing the amount of income of a personal corporation that is deemed to have been distributed to its shareholders in a year, and

(g) that where an amount is included in the income of a personal corporation as a recapture of capital cost allowance by virtue of section 20 of the act a shareholder may elect to pay a special reduced tax on his portion of the recaptured capital cost allowance in the same manner as if he had received the recaptured amount directly.

15. That rates of income tax be reduced and related changes made in order to implement certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces commencing April 1, 1962 and that the act be amended as may be necessary to implement an offer of the government of Canada to enter into agreements for the collection of income taxes imposed by the provinces and in particular

(a) that the income tax otherwise payable by an individual in respect of income earned in a province of Canada be reduced by

(i) 16 per cent for the 1962 taxation year,
(ii) 17 per cent for the 1963 taxation year,
(iii) 18 per cent for the 1964 taxation year,
(iv) 19 per cent for the 1965 taxation year,
(v) 20 per cent for the 1966 taxation year,

(b) that the rate of tax on the taxable income earned in a province of Canada by a corporation other than a non-resident-owned investment corporation or a corporation specified in schedule D to the Financial Administration Act that is an agent of Her Majesty be reduced by 9 percentage points in respect of taxable income earned after December 31, 1961 and before January 1, 1967.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CLASSES OF LOANS INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act to enlarge the classes of loans that may be made under the act so as to include therein all business enterprises without limitation as to the kind of business carried on; to increase the authorized capital of the bank from twenty five million dollars to fifty million dollars; to increase the authorized borrowing authority of the bank to an amount not exceeding five times the aggregate amount of its paid-up capital and reserve fund; to enable the bank to make funds available in respect of transportation equipment by the purchase of equipment trust certificates; to enable the bank to acquire title to moveable property and to make such property available to a borrower under a conditional sales agreement or other arrangement under which the borrower has a right of redemption; to raise the limit on the aggregate amount of loans and other liabilities that exceed two hundred thousand dollars, from a maximum of seventy five million dollars to a maximum of two hundred million dollars; and to make certain other changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members will recall that in my budget speech I said that the government intended to introduce a number of amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act. With the full support of the government the industrial development bank has considerably expanded its operations over the past few years. The measures which are now proposed will further augment significantly and in a variety of ways the ability of the bank to finance the physical expansion of small and medium sized businesses. Moreover, as previously indicated to the house, the bank will be encouraged to assist in increasing measure with the problems which arise in connection with financial consolidation and with changes in ownership.

The proposed amendments will affect almost all phases of the bank's future operations. To begin with, hon. members will be asked to approve a change which will extend the coverage of I.D.B. operations to business enterprises of all types. At present eligibility is restricted to certain classes of business, mainly in the field of manufacturing, processing, mining, logging, construction, transportation, and including part of the service sector of the economy.

The facilities of the bank have grown to the point where it is now feasible to widen the scope of its operations so that enterprises over the whole range of economic activity may be assisted. Of course, the bank will continue to operate with good business judgment and reasonable prudence, and where funds are available from other sources on reasonable terms and conditions, recourse to the bank would be unnecessary. Similarly, it is not expected that the bank will be called upon to use its resources in support of enterprises which can obtain financing under the various governmental measures providing special assistance.

This expansion in coverage, together with the establishment of more branch offices across the country, will undoubtedly lead to an extension of the bank's activities. Moreover, with an intensified effort to bring to the attention of potential borrowers the services which the bank can render, we can confidently expect that the bank will grow in importance as an institution which will further economic growth in general and modernization of Canadian industry in particular.

The experience during the more recent past augurs well for the future, and if the current rate of lending continues, loans made this year will exceed 1,000 in number and $50 million in amount. This expansionary trend, we expect, will become more pronounced in succeeding years. With this in mind it is proposed that parliament provide the bank with additional financing capacity, sufficient to permit it to operate on a substantially larger scale.

First, it is proposed to raise the authorized capital of the bank from the present level of $25 million to $50 million.

Second, parliament will be asked to increase the borrowing authority of the bank. The borrowing authority is now limited to three times the aggregate amount of paid up capital and the reserve fund. Briefly, with paid up capital at a level equal to $25 million and a reserve fund standing at approximately $15 million, this means that the borrowing authority now amounts to about $120 million. It is proposed to increase the limit on borrowing to five times the paid up capital and the reserve fund. As a result and on the basis of a doubling in capital from $25 million to $50 million, the borrowing authority of the bank will reach $325 million. The total resources of the bank, including capital and reserves, will amount to close to $400 million compared with $160 million today. Of course as the reserve fund builds up from the present level of about $15 million we can expect a further increase in the bank's resources.

Hon. members will be aware that at present the act establishes a ceiling of $75 million on the aggregate of individual loans and other commitments which are in excess of $200,000. In line with related changes providing for an enlargement of the resources of the bank, it is proposed to increase this limit to $200 million. As a result the bank will have a potential of approximately $200 million, compared with a current level of $85 million, to cover individual commitments of less than $200,000.

So far I have described changes which will bring more potential borrowers to the doors of the bank and will assure the bank of adequate financial backing for its expanded operations. I am now turning to additional measures which are designed to enhance the performance of the bank in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way. The preamble of the act establishing the industrial development bank states the objectives to be pursued by this institution. These objectives relate to the promotion of the economic welfare of Canada, and to this end the bank may lend or may guaranteee loans to business enterprises, may enter into underwriting agreements and may engage in equity financing. It is surely appropriate that at this time, when every effort is being made to increase the usefulness of the bank, attention should also be paid to the adequacy of the existing powers of the bank in rendering financial assistance.

Based on actual experience, it is found that such powers as the bank now has should be broadened in two specific ways. First, it is proposed to facilitate bank action in cases where financial assistance is required for the purchase of movables. Accordingly, it is intended that the bank be authorized to acquire title to movable property, such as machinery and equipment, and to make it available to a borrower by means of a conditional sales agreement. This should prove helpful to borrowers under circumstances where it would be either impossible or cumbersome to take chattel mortgage security on movables and where purchase by the bank, subject to redemption by the borrower, proves to be a most efficient and most convenient way of rendering financial assistance.

A second amendment will permit the bank to make funds available in respect of transportation equipment, for instance trucks and buses, through the purchase of equipment trust certificates. Hon. members will be aware that it is fairly common practice to finance the acquisition of transportation equipment through the issue by a trust company of such certificates or obligations. The proposed extension of the powers of the bank will improve the flexibility of its operations and make it easier for the bank to participate in arrangements for the financing of transportation equipment.

In keeping with the expansion in the scope and functions of the industrial development bank, the amendments will also make provision for the enlargement of the board of directors and of the executive committee to include not only the deputy minister of finance as at present but also the deputy minister of trade and commerce. Provision has also been made for a second director from the business community to be added to the executive committee.

It will be evident that the proposed amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act, which I have outlined in summary form, will enable that institution to provide more and better services to small and medium sized businesses. I have also referred to the contributions which the industrial development bank can make in cases where enterprises, particularly small firms and family concerns, are faced with problems which, for their solution, require the infusion of new management and new capital. Some of these difficulties arise as a result of the general competitive trend in our economy; others relate to the impact of estate taxes. In such situations the industrial development bank can play an increasingly active and constructive role by making funds available as well as technical assistance on a variety of managerial problems. As indicated in the budget speech, it is the hope of the government that in this way the industrial development bank can also contribute to the retention in Canada of the ownership and control of Canadian businesses.

The bank has been furnishing a valuable service in providing for the financial needs of small and medium sized businesses which, because of their size, find it difficult to raise capital on the security market. The amendments which are before the house now will enable the bank to play an increasingly useful role in the future by assisting private enterprise to provide more employment and develop a stronger, more productive and more flexible economy.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why we on this side should delay the passage of this resolution, which embodies certain amendments to be made to the Industrial Development Bank Act. We shall have an opportunity to deal with this matter when the bill is before the house. In any event, we on this side have been advocating for some time now an expansion of the functions and activities of this very useful piece of machinery through proposals which we have made, some of which are referred to in the resolution and in the statement the minister has just made, though not all.

We think the bank has performed, as I have just said, very useful services. We think it should be given, as is proposed, greater financial resources, and that its functions and activities should be broadened. We feel especially that it should be given greater responsibilities and greater opportunities to assist in regional economic development, where government assistance to small business is particularly necessary and desirable for, among other things, employment reasons. We think the industrial development bank could, if it were given the opportunity, play a very useful part in this field. We have gone further, I gather, than the government proposes to go in these amendments, and have suggested that the bank should be separated in its administration from the Bank of Canada and be given a separate corporate existence.

I think that is all I need to say about the resolution at this stage. We will be able to examine the bill when it is introduced, and perhaps further discussion will be required then.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, we in this group want to expedite the passage of this resolution. We too are very happy to see the expansion of the industrial development bank. We note that even last year there was a 24 per cent increase in the number and a 26 per cent increase in the amount of the loans made by this bank. We feel that this bank now serves a growing need in our nation.

Since 1944 some $300 million has been lent in some 4,700 loans. I think the statement of the minister that there will be greater publicity for the bank and that the number of offices is going to be increased over the additions in 1959 of St. John's, Quebec city and London and in 1960 of Ottawa, Sudbury and Edmonton, will be of tremendous help to the Canadian economy. We are particularly happy to see that the small businessman will have greater opportunity and that the scope of the bank is going to be extended especially to the service industries, which I think are going to become more and more important in Canada.

As I said, we are not in the least going to hold up the passage of this resolution. However, I should like to read the preamble to the Industrial Development Bank Act, because I think it has an important relation to what we are doing today:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish an industrial development bank to promote the economic welfare of Canada by increasing the effectiveness of monetary action through ensuring the availability of credit to industrial enterprises—

Here, I think, is the important part.

> —which may reasonably be expected to prove successful if—

This is a very important "if".

> —a high level of national income and employment is maintained . . .

I think this is something which should be very much in the mind of the minister as he seeks to improve this bank; that this act was passed in the expectation that there would be a high level of national income and especially a high level of employment. It is rather strange that we are now turning the whole thing backwards. Now we are depending on the industrial development bank to create the employment so that the bank itself can be successful. I think this is something which might be in the mind of the minister as he brings forward this resolution.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the passage of the resolution, but there are some things I should like to say because I feel very strongly on this subject. Ever since I was elected to the house many small industries that have been trying to establish themselves have come to me for some assistance. I believe that in the past the industrial development bank has not been carrying out the duty for which it was originally intended; at least if I have understood correctly the comments that have been made to me over the years regarding this duty, this is what I have learned. I believe that the bank has been operating on too restrictive a basis.

Obviously the bank was limited to some extent by the statute which confined it to the type of business set out in the act, and I am very pleased to see that the resolution and the bill to follow will enlarge the types of business which will qualify for assistance under the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Those types of business were too restricted, and in my opinion the restrictions were applied too strictly. I know of several businesses that tried to get loans and, although they seemed to have good prospects, for one technical reason or another the applications were delayed and in many cases refused. It has been felt that while the industrial development bank was set up to assist small businesses and small industries to get started, it has been too much of a bankers' bank and has not been performing the function for which it was originally intended. I have two or three examples I should like to give where I feel that the industrial development bank could very well have stepped right in and done the job for which it was intended.

A couple of years ago an industry in South River in my constituency had good market prospects for its product. They applied for assistance to the industrial development bank and were turned down for various reasons. Perhaps I was not aware of all of them, but certainly some assistance to this business would certainly have kept it going.

There is another case in which I have been very interested. In the village of McKellar near Parry Sound a man by the name of Stroud, who is an inventor of printing press machines, has achieved a major break-through in the printing trade. He has constructed a prototype of a printing press that has been examined by people from Sweden, Germany and the United States. He has been most anxious to build his press in Canada if he can. Excellent opportunities have been made available to him by people who would buy the patent and manufacture the machine outside of Canada. For some time he has been trying to get financial assistance from the industrial development bank. I believe that eventually he would get some assistance, because he has been making good progress. However, in my opinion the present amendment will help him to produce in Canada for export a very good, marketable product. It has been examined by responsible authorities, who say that not only can it be sold in Canada but it also can be exported to all parts of the world.

For that reason I welcome this assistance. This gentleman has been trying for two years to get his product on the road. I have been doing the best I could to assist him within the restrictions placed on such assistance by the industrial development bank, and even though the Department of Trade and Commerce has been doing its best to help him he is still waiting for financial assistance that will bring this product on the market.

While I was interested in this machine I came across something else about two months ago. I cut out this article from the Ottawa Journal of May 2, 1961 because of the close relationship to the printing press in which I was interested. The article has to do with a revolutionary milling machine which has been invented in a machine foundry in Ottawa. The article reads in part as follows:

> A revolutionary new milling machine, styled by its developers as "a break-through in its field", has been unveiled at an Ottawa machine foundry.

The article goes on to describe this revolutionary machine and the uses to which it can be put in Canada and in other parts of the world. The last paragraph is significant from my point of view, and that is why I cut out the article. It reads as follows:

> What is needed, he said—

The reference is to Mr. Auger who has been promoting the machine.

> —is financial backing. "We approached the Department of Trade and Commerce", he said, "but they are not yet set up to make loans to comparatively small borrowers. We hope to be able to get a loan from the industrial development bank once we have our plant set up here." The firm has six other machines on Mr. Palyi's drawing board—a basis for what Mr. Auger thinks could be a major new industry for Ottawa.

Here are two machines designed by Canadian inventors and both described as breakthroughs in the commercial field, which indicate that our people in Canada have the ability to invent, design and make prototypes of new types of machines that can be used not only here but in other countries. I note that this milling machine is being taken to the United States for display there in the expectation that the company will be able to make sales of the machine.

Now, these are just two examples that have come within my own purview. There are 264 other members here in the house, and I have no doubt that every one of them has similar examples of projects that could be mentioned in respect of which financing is too limited and where a little bit of a push is needed in order to get started. The idea is there, the ability is there, but the finances are not.

There was one other matter I wanted to mention, Mr. Chairman. I should like to refer to the power of the industrial development bank to assist in financing projects by the purchase of stock in a company. Some of the people who have approached me have said, why could not the government back us up by taking over our plant and developing our markets, and when the thing is running turn it back to us? Would that not be a reasonable procedure? The government is interested in the development of Canadian products. Would it not be reasonable for the government to take over the project, provide people from the technical branches of government to assist in financing and in export arrangements, in production of the machine and in research; then, when the project is fully developed, turn it back to us. Well, of course, the difficulty in this procedure is that the government would take all the risk and the private individual would be in a position to take the profit. While this is a very commendable approach for the people involved, it would not be fair to those people who, on their own, have already made or will in the future make some such development.

There is power in the Industrial Development Bank Act to come into the field, purchase stock in a company for long enough to get it going, and give it the necessary financial backing. Then the stock can be sold to the public. I think this is the type of thing that would be very, very useful. When I spoke previously about the Stroud printing press, there was some publicity about it and several people from other countries approached me as to the method that might be used in financing. I found that several countries in Europe followed the procedure of the government giving assistance through stock purchases. The government purchased the major part of the stock and carried out the development, and when the company was on its feet and ready to go into the market and export, they sold the stock back to the public. The company was sold to the public for whatever it was worth. If a good job had been done in designing and producing a plant, the stock was worth something. The people who purchase it are interested in the development. If the job has not been done so well, then the stock is down and the government fund will have to take a loss. The reason the government fund has to take a loss is that it was an investment. However, I believe it is better that they should take a loss in this way and pass it on to the people who purchase the stock, than merely to take a loss on a bad investment by way of a loan.

I suggest that the industrial development bank take full advantage of the provisions in the act at the present time which would enable it to do this type of financing. Direct loans are certainly a good thing, but they do have to be paid back. Interest has to be paid, and so forth. The stock financing arrangement does not require payments of any kind from the company. The government which has purchased the stock merely sells it again to the public, and there is no obligation on the company to repay a large outstanding loan. I certainly suggest that this type of assistance would be very beneficial both to the development of new industries in Canada and to the export of those products which are made in this country and which can be exported.

I note, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution does not propose alterations in this type of financing and I see no reason why there should be a change. I believe that the type of financing to which I have referred has not been taken advantage of sufficiently, though the powers are already there. The resolution does refer to a provision to enable the bank to take title to movable property and make the property available to the operator under a conditional sales agreement. I believe this is an additional power.

I believe these are all the remarks I wish to make on this particular resolution, Mr. Chairman, except that I am glad to see not only an increase in the funds available but also a widening of the class which will qualify under this act, as well as the intention to make reasonable use of the authority which the industrial development bank already has. In my opinion a good deal of the difficulty has not been that the bank has not had the power but that the bank has not been using it. I suggest that the enlargement of the bank's powers under this resolution, along with the full use of the powers the bank already has, would enable a great deal to be done to encourage industry in this country, to provide a improved level of employment and to increase our exports of those items we produce in Canada, thus reversing the trend of imports from other countries of goods we cannot produce in this country.

Mr. Best: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some brief remarks on this item. I was glad to see today on the other side of the house indications of general concurrence with regard to the changed plan for the industrial development bank. I should like to comment on some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. He mentioned the rather restrictive nature of the bank's regulations in the past. I think this has indeed been so. We have many medium and small sized enterprises scattered throughout my riding of Halton, a number of which have been interested at various times in obtaining funds from the industrial development bank. Nevertheless, while some companies have been successful, may have been turned down.

The criticism has been made that this was indeed a sort of bankers' bank. We have heard the same criticism of this bank as we have of ordinary banks, namely that if you wanted a loan you practically had to have the capital you needed before the loan would be made. As one hon. member has said, you really have to prove you do not need the loan before you can obtain it. This is a very fundamental problem which has been applicable to the industrial development bank in the past, and I hope some change will be made in the future. We realize that a complete change in the other direction would not be possible, but we would hope for more flexibility.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has cited various firms and industries in his riding which have benefited or would benefit fro mthe operations of this bank. I have in my riding various firms engaged in new aspects of plastics, new aircraft firms and other imaginative new industries which would welcome, and I am sure are welcoming, the changed provisions which are to be brought about. These new industries, these applications of new methods to old industries, are a most important part of our Canadian development in the modernization of business in our country in its competitive struggle both within Canada and with various foreign countries.

I would like to stress that the industrial development bank could in the future pay more attention to new ideas, I mean ideas in the sense of people or companies that perhaps may not have the risk capital or the background in property to develop their inventions, their new methods and their ideas. From a banking standpoint this may be difficult indeed to evaluate, but surely there is scope somewhere in our government field for an agency or body, perhaps indeed within the industrial development bank, to be just a little more risky in its approach to conventional banking methods with respect to new ideas or processes.

As the previous speaker stated, it so often happens in this country that such new methods, such new approaches to industry, may leave Canada both in ownership and in application because of the lack of risk capital. Generally they go to the United States. I have seen many instances of this. I hope that in future the changed provisions of the bank will provide for the retention in Canada of more of these new ideas. I am sure they are necessary to enable us to modernize and become more competitive in the world around us.

Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition mentioned increased facilities of the industrial development bank in various regions of Canada. I did not hear him develop that idea further. Perhaps we could hear that at some future date. It is difficult to visualize just how that might be done under the present circumstances. We understand that the industrial development bank is going to increase the scope of the industries and companies which it may service. Indeed, service industries and service companies are to come within the field of its coverage.

Another area which has been mentioned by hon. members, and which is a most important one, concerns small family companies, Canadian businesses in origin, management and ownership, which for various reasons are in danger of passing into foreign control. I have seen this happen in various towns in my area and indeed, speaking from slight knowledge, in many small and medium sized towns throughout southern Ontario. I refer to family businesses perhaps established 25, 50 or 100 years ago, with two, three or four generations of Canadian ownership, really pioneer families in those areas, and perhaps businesses upon which many of the people of the town or region in which they are located depend for employment. Many of these businesses are being bought and control is being obtained by United States companies and individuals.

We welcome the statement of the minister that the bank will play an increasing part in assisting the present Canadian ownership through the problems of estate taxes, through the transition perhaps from one generation to another, and indeed the aspect which the minister has emphasized, of technical advice to be given to such companies. This technical and advisory help has presumably been given in the past to some extent, but I gather from the minister's comments that the technical and advisory aspect of the industrial development bank will be increased in the future. I presume this may assist such companies, particularly in the transition stage of ownership which occurs in many small firms.

We welcome the figures for the past year or so in connection with the bank; the fact that their loans increased by a very definite percentage last year; that the indications for the present year are that perhaps a total of 1,000 loans will be made. We are looking forward even more to the future because of the announced changes; the increase in authorized capital from $25 million to $50 million, and the increase in borrowing authority as described by the minister earlier today, to a total of $225 million. The total of these provisions will very greatly increase the ability of the bank to assist Canadian industry.

Another subject which was touched upon in this connection concerns modernization of existing industries. It seems that on many occasions firms which have been successful in the past, and perhaps are today, need to expend a very considerable amount of capital in modernizing their plant or production facilities. This sort of thing is within the purview of the bank, and it is to be hoped that the industrial development bank will take an aggressive stand in assisting industries in these very necessary changes. We can look at many fields of endeavour in commerce in Canada and realize that in order to compete with materials coming in from Great Britain, Europe and Asia such firms will have to bring about a very considerable modernization of their plants and facilities. I am sure the bank will assist in this work to an increasing extent in the future.

The minister's comments about movable property and the purchase of transportation equipment such as trucks and buses were indeed interesting. I think this again illustrates, Mr. Chairman, the increased scope, the much more variable approach, which the bank is going to have when approached by businesses for assistance of different kinds.

The enlargement of the board of directors and of the number of executives of the bank is also worthy of note at the present time. As part of the picture we note from the minister's budget speech that the number of branch offices has increased from four to 13 over the past five years, and that further branches will be opened in the future.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, this illustrates the greatly increased scope and activity of the bank since this government assumed office, and we are looking forward to a much larger scope and a great increase in its lending facilities and amounts in the years immediately ahead.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I rise for a few moments to congratulate the Minister of Finance on this measure, which is one more of the many measures he has put forward to stimulate and develop the Canadian economy. In the past in this house I have had occasion to be critical of the industrial development bank, but I notice that in recent years they have been extending their loans and making more loans, particularly in my own Atlantic region. I very much hope this trend will continue, and that credit facilities through the industrial development bank will be easier. At the moment there is a file on my desk in my office concerning a new industry which proposes to move into the town of Inverness in my riding. I know the location of this industry there will only be possible through assistance and through the special financing which is available from agencies of the nature of the industrial development bank.

I suggest one further step which might be taken toward the development of the Canadian economy. I have in mind the expansion of the industrial development bank for the purpose of or the setting up of a new agency on a national basis for the location of new industries in this country. I am sure there are many industries abroad which would establish branches in Canada if there were some agency organized on a federal basis to invite them to settle here and assist them in their financing. There are, of course, parallel agencies operating successfully in a number of the provinces. In Nova Scotia the Industrial Estates Limited organization and the provincial industrial development fund have been successful in the last few years in establishing new industry, in expanding existing industries, and in keeping within the province industries which might otherwise have moved to other regions.

However, settlement agencies of the nature of Industrial Estates Limited are necessarily limited in scope, inasmuch as they work under provincial authority only and their funds are limited to what the province can provide. I would think that federal agencies similar to those which are now working in the provinces would be most helpful in bringing big industry to Canada, operations which might be beyond the scope and resources of provincial organizations.

I have in mind, for example, that on the North American continent there is no factory which makes small, low cost automobiles, yet there is a wide market in this hemisphere for automobiles of this type which would not be in competition with cars produced for sale at higher prices. It has been suggested to me that Nova Scotia would be an ideal site for a factory manufacturing low cost cars. A factory of this kind would have to look to the whole hemisphere for its market. Indeed, it would have to look across the world in order to sell its products, and it would be of great advantage for it to be situated on tidewater so that cheap transportation would be available.

Moreover, there is on Cape Breton island a good modern steel plant. It is efficiently run and produces a good product, but it is operating under a handicap in that most of its product must be transported to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario for sale. Thus, added to the cost of producing steel is this extra cost of transportation. If there were some way in which a large industry could be settled close to that mill to take advantage of the coal and the steel which is available, it would give a considerable boost to the whole maritime region.

It may, of course, not be feasible to establish a low cost automobile plant in that area, but all the necessary resources would seem to be there, and this is the type of project I should like to see investigated. It would have to be considered with a view to bringing in men with the special managerial and technical skills required to make use of these resources, and all this would involve large scale national financing.

This is a project of a type which perhaps, lies beyond the resources of Industrial Estates Limited in the province. It involves big industry in a day when big industry and mass production are becoming increasingly important. I should like to see a federal agency established whose responsibility it would be to assist in the founding of new industries which could properly and feasibly operate in Canada, and which would be responsible for attempting to bring into regions such as my own industries which would be suited to the resources and economy of those areas.

An agency of this type should, of course, work closely with provincial agencies to set up better facilities for research into the types of industry which could be located in various parts of Canada. It could also assist in bringing in people with executive and managerial skills whose specialized knowledge would be required in connection with the establishment of such industries.

The nation has grown very well under our private enterprise system. We have a high standard of living, and we sell our products across the world. However, I am sure there are many other products which we could be producing and I am sure, too, hon. members will appreciate that there are some areas of Canada which are not growing as fast as they should, chiefly because under the private enterprise system money or business interests cannot be as easily found to settle industries in those regions. I should like to see a special agency set up whose duty it would be to consider ways of encouraging industrialization in areas such as the maritimes. Such an agency would work in co-operation with the provincial agencies which have already been established.

To me it seems a shame that we should have a steel fabricating centre on the island of Cape Breton, together with a large amount of fuel in the area, but that we should only be able to move this steel as a raw material to other parts of Canada for processing. At the moment there is under consideration the establishment of a cold rolling mill at Contrecoeur on the St. Lawrence river for the processing of Sydney steel. The establishment of this rolling mill would be of assistance to the Sydney mill. However, if an industry such as an automobile industry could be established in the maritime area I am sure Dosco would consider it very feasible to establish their cold rolling mill in that area. Around the steel mill at Sydney there could be built up an industrial complex which, as I have said, would help to bring to the maritime region the industrialization which it so badly needs in order to provide sufficient new employment in the area.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to thank hon. members in all parts of the committee for the support they have expressed for this measure. There are three points with which I think I should deal briefly before the resolution is reported.

The Leader of the Opposition raised a point at the outset of his remarks concerning the separation of the industrial development bank from the Bank of Canada. I wish to make it clear that while this measure does not propose that separation, I would not wish it thought that this suggestion is eliminated for all time. The proposal has been made from various quarters from time to time. It has been considered by the government, and it will continue to be under consideration.

A good deal will depend upon the views of management and the bank authorities. There are some problems which would arise if such a proposal were put into effect. I do not need to detain the committee now by reviewing this subject. I simply wish to make the point that this proposal has been advanced from several quarters, and is not dismissed from consideration simply because it is not included within the scope of the present bill. We shall continue to examine this matter.

Second, a point was raised about using the bank's operations with a view to regional considerations. I think it should be stressed again, particularly in the light of the desirability of extending the development of secondary industry in the Atlantic area, that as far as the government is concerned it is our view that the resources of the bank should be available for this purpose. Indeed, the expansion in the number of branch offices of the industrial development bank throughout Canada has been designed to make the bank and its facilities as serviceable as possible to all regions of the country. The number of branch offices of the bank in 1955 was only four. That number was increased by 1960 to 13, and the bank is now better able than ever before to give regional services in different parts of the country.

I think it will be in the minds of all hon. members that it is desirable that these services should be available with as much local accommodation as possible in those areas of the country which have not heretofore enjoyed the same advantages in the development of secondary industries as have some of the more centrally located parts of the country. I can assure hon. members, and particularly the hon. member who last spoke, that the facilities of the bank are intended to be available to serve the worthy object of assisting in the development of secondary industries in the Atlantic area of this country.

The third and last point which I should like to mention, Mr. Chairman, concerns the scope of operations of the bank. This point has been mentioned and I do not wish to repeat what I said earlier. However, one hon. member inquired whether there is any intention that the facilities of the bank should be available on terms which simply duplicate the credit facilities available through other institutions, for example the chartered banks. Let me make it very clear that the industrial development bank is not intended to duplicate existing facilities in this respect. That would not be a proper function of such an institution provided with government resources and government sponsorship. Indeed, the statute is very clear on that point. Section 15 of the act, in subsection 1, contains the following provisions:

Subject to section 14—

Section 14 concerns the aggregate of liabilities.

—where in the opinion of the board—

Or of an officer authorized for that purpose by the board.

(a) a person is engaged or about to engage in an industrial enterprise in Canada—

I hope you will note the terms of the next clause, Mr. Chairman.

(b) credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions—

It has been the policy of parliament, from the time this institution was brought into existence by the legislation of the 1944-45 session, that the services and facilities should not duplicate those provided by other institutions under private ownership. The industrial development bank was intended to be a lender in the secondary sense, providing credit particularly in the medium and longer term field not otherwise available to industries. The advantages offered by the act were obviously largely directed to the smaller and medium sized businesses which are not in a position to go into the security market to meet their capital requirements, or borrowing requirements on a scale not justifying resort to the capital market. I think the situation is quite clear in that regard, and has been from the outset of this institution and the legislation governing it, and the bill now before the committee makes no change in that regard.

I thank all hon. members for the support they have expressed for this measure. It is refreshing to bring in a measure which has the general support of all sections of the house.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-117, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF LINE TO GREAT SLAVE LAKE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Grimshaw, in the province of Alberta, in a northerly direction to Great Slave lake, in the Northwest Territories; to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of a subsidy to Canadian National Railway Company equal to the cost of constructing the said line of railway, but not exceeding in any case $86,250,000, to enable the work of construction to proceed forthwith upon an agreement being completed between Her Majesty, Canadian National Railway Company, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited and Pine Point Mines Limited, the said agreement to provide, among other things, for payment to Her Majesty not exceeding $12,500,000 on behalf of Pine Point Mines Limited towards the cost of constructing the said line of railway, such payments to be based on the average annual value per ton of concentrates shipped and to commence after the completion of construction of the said line of railway and to continue for a period of ten years.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the first portion of my statement is as follows: may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Pickersgill: Dispense.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Balcer: The purpose of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, is to approve the introduction of a bill to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct and operate a railway line from Grimshaw, Alberta, to Great Slave lake and Pine Point in the Northwest Territories. The northern terminus of the line would be the port of Hay River, a distance of approximately 398 miles from Grimshaw. A spur line from the vicinity of Alexander falls would serve the needs of Pine Point mine where one of the world's largest base metals deposits is located. The total mileage of the new construction would be approximately 438 miles. As in the case of previous branch lines, constructed by the Canadian National Railway, this line would become an integral part of the company's system.

One of the main functions of the proposed railway line would be to carry base metals, namely lead and zinc concentrates, from properties owned at Pine Point by Pine Point Mines Limited, a subsidiary of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited. This railway, however, is also intended for the purposes of northern development generally and I would say, Mr. Chairman, that is the main purpose of this railway. In addition to serving a townsite of some 2,000 people at Pine Point, it would provide service to some 8,000 people, most of whom are engaged in farming north of Grimshaw, help existing industries on the Great Slave lake such as commercial fishing, and gold mining at Yellowknife, aid in the development of agriculture where only 700,000 acres of a potential of 6 million acres of arable land adjacent to the proposed railway line are currently being farmed. It would assist forestry based on some 30 million acres of adjacent forest land and stimulate mineral exploration, which would undoubtedly lead to new mining developments. Finally, the railway would form an important link in Canadian defence establishments in the north.

The cost of construction of this railway has been estimated at $75 million. Because of the distance involved, the proposed branch line could not be self-supporting from the start and, as I already intimated to the house on February 16 last, some form of governmental subvention will be necessary. The bill which will follow the resolution will authorize payment to the Canadian National Railway Company of a subsidy equal to the actual cost to the company of constructing the line but not exceeding $86,250,000. This sum represents the estimated cost of construction plus 15 per cent for contingencies.

To assist the government in this project Pine Point Mines Limited proposes to make every year for 10 years following construction a contribution toward the cost of constructing the line which at the average lead and zinc prices during 1951-1960 would aggregate $12½ million over the 10 years. It is also proposed that the company pay on a shipment of 215,000 tons of concentrates annually for 10 years, a freight rate sufficient to recover all operating costs of the new line between Pine Point and Grimshaw. The bill will provide that neither will construction of the railway start nor will the crown make any payment for construction before an agreement has been entered into between the mining company, the Canadian National Railway and the crown in the line with the above.

Pine Point Mines Limited is ready to start the construction of the necessary mining plant on its property near the south shore of Great Slave lake at a cost of $21 million. In addition, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company will spend some $16 million for the expansion of its plants at Trail, British Columbia, where the Pine Point concentrates can be most economically treated.

Pine Point property can be put into production as soon as rail transportation is available, but construction of the line would take about four years to complete. In this connection there is one factor which lends particular urgency to the construction of the line. The Sullivan mine at Kimberley, British Columbia, cannot produce economically more than 65 per cent of the lead and zinc required for the smelters at Trail, British Columbia. In order to maintain the output of its plants, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has been relying on other local sources of supply, but these will be completely exhausted by 1963, and the concentrates from Pine Point will then be required to meet the resulting deficiency.

If there is positive assurance of immediate construction of a railway, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company will make temporary arrangements to supply its plants from some foreign sources and so cover a gap of two or three years. Otherwise, the company may be compelled to make permanent arrangements to import annually some $13 million worth of lead-zinc ores for processing at its smelters in Trail. Quite apart from the detrimental effect that this would have on our foreign exchange position, to start importing zinc at a time when a very rich mine in the north remains unproductive would certainly be bad from the point of view of national development. Consequently, the committee will appreciate the importance of giving prompt consideration to the proposed legislation so that a start may be made on the construction of the line as soon as the current location survey being carried out by the C.N.R. is completed this fall.

I am very pleased to recommend this resolution to the committee, which I think might mark a milestone in the history of transportation in Canada. This is a railroad that will be extremely important in the development of the northern regions of Canada. It is a railway that will prove to Canada and to Canadians the tremendous potentialities that exist in our northern lands. The main bulk cargo that will be carried by the railway will be base metals from one single mine at the start, but this is an example of the great potentialities of the northern parts of Canada.

I know I will be followed by other members like the member for Peace River who has a tremendous interest in this matter and has always shown determination in asking the government to develop the splendid agricultural area of the Peace River valley. I am quite sure it is a great day for him when he sees that the government is going ahead with this forward-looking project that will mean so much to the development of the Canadian north.

There is one rather simple amendment I should like to make to the resolution. I will not read the whole resolution as it now stands, but in the sixth line from the bottom there are these words:

> ...for payment to Her Majesty not exceeding $12,500,000 on behalf of Pine Point Mines Limited toward the cost of constructing the said line of railway...

The $12½ million is based on the price of lead and zinc at the present time, but what we are bringing before the house in this resolution is a system by which the company will make such payments based on the price of lead and zinc concentrate at the time of the payment. I would ask one of my colleagues in the cabinet to move an amendment to change the figure $12,500,000" to "$20,000,000". The resolution would then read:

> ...for payment to Her Majesty not exceeding $20,000,000...

Mr. Harkness: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: On that point, Mr. Chairman, the question arises at once whether the consent of the governor in council was obtained to increase the $12½ million to $20 million. The minister has not made any mention of that. Perhaps he could say a word on it.

Mr. Balcer: If we read the resolution carefully we will see it is quite clear that the amendment is a very practical one because it is based on the world price of lead and zinc. More details will be given, of course, in the bill itself. What is proposed in the resolution now would mean a payment of about $12½ million and the change in the amendment is to make sure that if the price of lead and zinc in the next ten years is greater than the actual price at the present time there will be enough leeway to cover the difference in price. This resolution has been approved by the governor in council, and that is the reason why I asked one of my colleagues to move the amendment.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no difficulty in following the reason for the amendment. It is quite clear from what the minister has said.

But the point is that when an additional charge is imposed on the treasury—

Mr. Balcer: It is not on the treasury.

Mr. Harkness: It is the reverse.

Mr. Balcer: It is the reverse. It is the company that will be called upon to pay the amount of money.

The Chairman: The amendment would have the effect of increasing the payment to Her Majesty from $12½ million to $20 million.

Mr. Chevrier: If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, the point that I made is no longer valid. I should like to comment now on the resolution which the minister has discussed. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned there will not be the slightest difficulty with regard to our approving the resolution and the bill to follow. The reasons for that are quite clear.

For many years now the Liberal party has stood committed to the construction of this line. I remember that when I occupied the position now held by my hon. friend the construction of this railway was under consideration, and after I left and my successor, the Hon. Mr. Marler, took over the Department of Transport I know that the matter was also under active consideration then.

Canadian National Railways, both when I held the office and after I left, was of the opinion that this railway was essential to the development of the north. In their view the railway was essential if the base metal deposits in that area were to be developed. The committee will probably remember that on a number of occasions resolutions were put out on the order paper demanding approval of the construction of this railway. In 1957 the hon. member for Mackenzie River had a resolution on the order paper in these terms:

> That in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability of recommending the construction as soon as possible of a railway from Grimshaw, Alberta, to the south shore of Great Slave lake, Northwest Territories, in order to open up and develop the agricultural lands of northern Alberta and the vast mineral and oil resources of the Northwest Territories.

I think all of the reasons given by the minister for the construction of this railway can be found in the brief which was presented to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects by Mr. R. G. Robertson, commissioner of the Northwest Territories, at Edmonton, Alberta, on November 22, 1955. At page 24 of that brief the commissioner stated:

> May I submit for the consideration of the commission three methods by which transportation facilities into the Northwest Territories might be improved. The first is the construction of a railroad to Great Slave lake.

In the following pages are found all the reasons for the construction of this line, reasons which have already been enunciated by the minister in the statement he made a moment ago. One will find here a discussion of the base metals that would be developed as a result of the construction of the railway, a discussion of the forest reserves that would be tapped by the railway, together with the benefits that would ensue from base metal developments and sales. There is also consideration of the amount of ensuing freight. There is a further statement which the minister stressed particularly in his remarks a moment ago, that the line was to be built to carry lead and zinc concentrates and also, but more particularly, for the purpose of northern development.

The brief which I hold in my hand, reads in part at page 29 as follows:

> A railway to Great Slave lake will not be just another railway. It is not a railway to a lake, or to open a mine or to serve a community. A railway to Great Slave lake will be one of the great development railroads of the country.

Then, the brief goes on to develop that idea. Without in any way minimizing or taking away from the minister's statement, therefore, I simply say that as far back as 1955 there was brought to the attention of the royal commission on economic prospects the need for the construction of this railway, and the vital assistance it would be to the development of metals and the development of the whole north country.

I should like to remind the minister and the committee that the construction of this railway was advocated in the Pearson plan, the plan which was put forward in our election platform in 1958. It is regarded that, unfortunately, there has been a considerable delay on the part of the government in the construction of this line which was first announced in the speech from the throne several years ago. It was announced a second time, and then there was an announcement that a royal commission would determine which of the two routes would be followed, that from Waterways north or from the end of rail on the western route, from Grimshaw. When the royal commission reported on which of these two alternatives would be more advantageous, the government included in its last speech from the throne, that is the one in 1960, the announcement that a location survey would be made. The location survey, I understand, has not yet been completed, as the minister indicated during consideration of his estimates. Nevertheless, the legislation is now being brought forward.

We agree with the minister that this will be a great step forward in the development of the north and in the development of the resources in the north, and it will have also the advantage of bringing about the completion of an important link in defence establishments in northern Canada. We see no reason why we on this side of the house should not give this resolution our wholehearted support.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this is an important resolution covering a very interesting development, having in mind further development in the north. Before proceeding, I cannot help but comment that it is very interesting to members of this group to note how quickly these large and successful private companies, such as Consolidated Mining and Smelting, come running to the government with cap in hand to get public funds to assist them with their free enterprise. I have had considerable correspondence on this matter. We support the resolution, mind you, but this is an interesting aspect of it from our point of view.

The Canadian Pacific Railway has controlling interest in Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. My inquirers want to know why the Canadian Pacific did not undertake construction of this required railroad without having the company in question come to the government for public assistance. I understand that the building of this railroad was primarily prompted by representations made by the directors of Consolidated Mining and Smelting to this and former governments. In addition to carrying lead and zinc to the smeltering trade I understand, according to the minister's report, that there are tremendous quantities of forest products to be transported over this line. There are the possibilities of great agricultural developments.

I am not going to take much time now because I think the debate on this question could take place very satisfactorily on second reading. However, I do suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this proposal contains financial, economic and technical implications of major importance that require careful study by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the protection of the public. I believe this bill should go to the committee for a complete study. The committee should bring before it the president of the Canadian Pacific, or some suitable official, the president of the Canadian National or a suitable official, the president of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, as well as officials of the Department of National Revenue to say how income tax arrangements are provided for under these circumstances. I have been interested in learning how large companies have been benefited from accelerated depreciation in the past. I believe officials from the Department of Forestry should come before the committee to give some accurate assessment of the forest products potential of the area to be served by the railway. Officials from the Department of Agriculture should let us know the grain potential of the area.

I am not speaking for those with whom I have had correspondence only. I have had representations from people interested in this development and who want to see it advanced, but who want to make certain that the public interest is protected in every way possible and to ensure we are getting a satisfactory return. We do not want another section of the Canadian National Railway which will operate at a loss over a number of years. I believe there should be a thorough examination by the committee of every aspect of this proposal. We should have the production of all correspondence, documents, memos, minutes of committee meetings with officials and various company representatives, maps, and comments on discussions that have been held prior to the introduction of this resolution.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I believe we should have very certain knowledge as to the ore reserves available. There is on my desk now contradictory evidence from a mining engineer. We want to be certain we are doing the right thing. In addition to that, we should have some definite evidence that will assure the public that the future operation of this railway will not mean we are imposing an additional burden on the public which should, morally, have been accepted by private interests. We all know that criticism comes from a number of sources. I have had conversations with officials of other mining companies. Before we pass the bill finally, we should be able to go back to our constituencies secure in the knowledge that we can defend this resolution, having received all the information we sought. We could then say we believe we are justified in passing this legislation and in taking another step toward northern development. This is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Chairman, but I shall have more to say on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, let me at once take issue with the statement made by the last speaker that the motive and the reason for this resolution and what is behind it springs primarily from the interest and the request of the directors of a mining company. The background of this project comes primarily from the demands and requests expressed over a period of 30 to 35 years by thousands of people, small people, the homesteaders, the settlers, the pioneers in the north area of my constituency; the people who went into the Northwest Territories and who have established communities, cities and towns there. They are the individuals who are responsible for this particular project. They are the people who have requested this project, a request to which this government has given heed. I say that the hon. member's statement is entirely at variance with the facts.

I agree with the hon. member for Laurier who said that this project was one which had long been promised. It had been promised for almost 30 years. This promise has finally been fulfilled. It has been fulfilled by this government under the right hon. gentleman whose interest in and concern for the rights of the small man are well known to the people of this country. This is a project realized only after this government took office. It is a project that, true enough, was promised for many, many years under the previous administration but which did not get beyond the stage of promise.

I would hope this matter could be considered, and I believe it will be, in a non-partisan manner. It is my genuine belief that this is a project not of a local or parochial nature, but one which many years after the interests of the mining people may be exhausted will be of benefit and value to the economy and to the people of this nation far beyond what was conceived in the first place.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier with regard to the statement made to the royal commission on economic affairs, commonly known as the Gordon commission. A brief was presented by Mr. Gordon Robertson, the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources. I quoted that same statement in the first speech I made in this house to lend emphasis to the necessity for this particular project.

I should like to make this statement, Mr. Chairman, before I deal with some other aspects of this particular matter. There has been some delay in carrying out this project but I would point out to the hon. member for Laurier and to hon. members of this committee that the entire responsibility for this delay can be laid at the door of the previous administration, because for reasons which are completely unintelligible to me, which reasons were advanced and which on examination were shown to be based on completely fallacious assumptions, they sought to divert what was the natural and the logical course of the route of this railway to one which would have proved calamitous for this nation; a route which would have involved the expenditure of a far greater sum than would have been justified in a project of this nature; a route which, in my humble opinion—which is reinforced by the findings of the royal commission, to which I will refer later—should not have been followed.

It was only because the previous administration sought to divert what was the natural route to this other route that this delay occurred. I established this when I spoke on the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I put upon the record facts which constitute an irrebuttable circumstantial case reinforced by documents and references and buttressed by citations which to me indicate that these facts cannot be denied. This was the situation this government faced when it come into office and to which I will refer later.

I think I would be derelict in my duty, Mr. Chairman, if I did not at this time pay tribute to those who have assisted in the realization and consummation of this project which they so devoutly desired. These people have worked for so long to this end. I refer to the thousands of people in the area of Peace River and in the Northwest Territories, many of whom would at first blush appear to have no interest at all in this great project; people living 200 and 300 miles away; people coming from a land which had for so many years been so bitterly disappointed on so many occasions with respect to promises of transportation facilities that they felt this was their fight. This was a project to which they committed themselves irrespective of their personal or pecuniary interests. I refer to the boards of trade, the chambers of commerce, the farmers union organizations and the individuals who worked with me in preparing the material which was submitted to government and to commissions. There is a debt of gratitude owing to these people.

I would also like to refer to the position taken by my colleague the hon. member for Athabasca, who comes from an area which is to some extent involved in this particular issue. The hon. member took what I can only regard as being a proper, worthy and statesmanlike position. His views as expressed in this house from time to time were that this issue should be decided upon the facts, which were shown to be in the interests of Canada as a whole. In doing that, the hon. member is deserving of commendation. I also pay my respects to the hon. member for Mackenzie River, who has long been a doughty and a strong fighter for the things which are requisite and desirable for the people of the Northwest Territories.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to pay tribute to the government and to the Prime Minister. When I first came to Ottawa in 1958 I found a situation which presented some very formidable aspects. So far as I could see, decisions had been made under the previous administration which indicated that the natural and proper aspirations of the people in my part of the country were going to be neglected. With that in mind I presented petitions; I spoke in the house; I presented to the cabinet and to the Prime Minister the request of the people of my area. In his consideration of this particular problem the Prime Minister was not in any way partisan or biased. All that we asked was that this issue should be judged fairly and properly on the facts; on the true, accurate and relevant facts.

We asked for the appointment of a board or tribunal which would make an impartial, equitable inquiry into this issue. That request was granted by the government and there was established in due course a royal commission to make inquiry into this route. That was the Manning commission. It was as a result of the findings of that commission that we have the resolution which is now before the committee. If it had not been for the position taken by the Prime Minister and the government that there was a case which must be heard, I fear that the result might well have been that, as I said earlier, we would have been embarking upon this project on a basis which might well have been disastrous.

I thoroughly agree with what has been hinted at by the hon. member for Kootenay West. There are railway problems facing us today, and I think we must examine this issue quite closely and quite carefully. Fortunately, in doing so we can direct our attention to information, facts, figures and statements which have been gathered by the Manning royal commission. This commission sat for almost a year and its decision was finally made after several months' consideration. This to a large extent accounted for the delay in introducing this resolution. Comment was made at one time that the findings of the commission were not the findings of the majority. I must make reference to this matter. This is altogether incorrect. The findings of the commission were based on a two to one majority in favour of the railroad being constructed on the route established by this resolution. I do not propose to go into what was said, but I want to make it clear beyond doubt that when the commission filed its recommendation two of the commissioners came to the conclusion that the western route, or the route to Grimshaw, should be selected.

We have recently had the benefit of reading the first report of the MacPherson commission dealing with the difficulties of the railways in Canada. I think therefore it is logical that members of this committee will be concerned to examine this question in the light of what will probably be the economic benefits to the people in the northern part of the Peace River region, in the Northwest Territories and in Canada as a whole. I should like to give the committee certain facts and figures which I think will be helpful when we come to second reading. The question of timber was mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West. At the time the Manning royal commission held its hearings the province of Alberta was interested in this matter and we have the benefit of an extensive study and assessment of the potential yield on a perpetual yearly basis from the area which may be called tributary to the route which this railway is to adopt. This information is set out at page 86 of the first volume of the report.

After studying the whole matter carefully, after obtaining the reports of people engaged in the lumber business in the area and after going through the minute and accurate reports of the forestry department of Alberta the commission came up with this information. They found there was a total volume of saw logs which could be converted into lumber amounting to 8 billion board feet. Of course, we must look at this from the viewpoint of the railway in an attempt to find out what revenue can be expected from the various types of traffic which the road can carry. This total volume of timber is expressed as an annual cut of 136 million board feet which would provide a total of 4,500 cars or a total revenue of $3,600,000. I am not suggesting, and I do not expect the committee to accept, that this will be realized at once but it is the potential as far as saw logs are concerned. The total which the area would yield to the railway in board feet would bring an annual revenue of $3,600,000.

Going on to the question of pulp, there is sufficient potential in the area to justify in the course of time the construction of six 500-ton pulp mills at 200 million f.b.m. per annum resulting in a potential annual tonnage of 200,000 tons a year with a total rail revenue of $12 million. This, too, I do not expect will be realized for some time. However, it undoubtedly represents the opinion of people who have examined this situation closely with a view to determining the quantity of freight which will be available to this railway when it has been constructed and the development has taken place which we who live in the area know will, in fact, happen.

I turn from this to agriculture. During the last few weeks anxiety has been felt by many people in western Canada and, for that matter all over the country with respect to the grievous situation in the farm lands of western Canada and parts of the western states of the United States. We have heard, in addition, of the situation in China where large regions are said to be threatened with famine. All this must give pause to all those who have in the past said we shall never require more land to be opened up and added to our existing farm acreage. I think he would be a brave man who, in the light of natural uncertainties and in the light of the speed at which the population of the world is expanding, would say that in the normal course of development we would not require the farm land which will become available after this railroad has been constructed.

While gathering information in connection with the brief I presented to the royal commission I had occasion to seek advice from the agriculture department of the province of Alberta which put out a number of sheets covering various areas. On one occasion I found there were in a certain number of townships in which were alleged to be approximately 400,000 acres of potential farm land. Within a year of the time I first obtained that information until the time I presented my views to the royal commission, that 400,000 acres had been expanded to over 2 million. There is no doubt there will be tributary to the route this railway will take, from a minimum of 5 million acres to a maximum of 9 million acres of potential farm land. It is my sincere conviction that in due course, with the development of our country the agricultural production from that land will be required in Canada and elsewhere.

May I reassure hon. members that we are not thinking in terms of wheat production. What we expect this land will yield will be the oilseeds, the grasses, the feeds—the type of mixed and versatile farming for the products of which there always has been and, I believe, there always will be a proper market. This land will come into production and the production will be required by the world.

I could go into the subject of gas and oil. The whole area is permeated by a development scheme being undertaken at the present time by oil companies which are actively engaged in explorations for natural gas and oil. There are some minor fields already in existence. I have every reason to believe that before the end of the next few years major fields will be discovered in the area. We do not need a railway primarily for gas and oil development but we shall need a railway if in the course of the development of natural gas and oil resources we find there are large quantities of natural gas which have to be processed, resulting in the availability of sulphur.

Some mention of minerals has been made by the minister. True enough, Pine Point minerals, one of the largest lead-zinc bodies in the world, will come into production with a minimum of some 220,000 tons of lead and zinc concentrates a year. That is the minimum. I have no doubt at all that it will be substantially extended.

I noted in a recent press report appearing in the Edmonton Journal that the president of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company felt that this would justify the expenditure of some $20 million at Pine Point alone. I have also been informed by a reasonably good authority that there will be a commensurate expenditure of almost the same amount of money in and around Trail in due course in order to take advantage of the extra concentrates which will be moved into that area.

With the minimum tonnage at which the railway will commence hauling there will be a yield to the railway of something in the neighbourhood of $1 million to $1.5 million per year. That, of course, is subject to such agreements as are referred to in the resolution which will be negotiated in the best interests of the people of Canada by this government.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about the benefits of this railroad to the people of the Northwest Territories. Since 1937-38 when mining commenced in Yellowknife and district the people of that area have been carrying on with an economy which has been unfortunately hampered by the tremendously large costs of bringing freight into and out of that area. I have a table before me which is part of the first report of the Manning royal commission regarding present freight rates and expected freight rates once this railroad has been constructed. At the present time, based on class 45 carload lots by rail, class 5 for carload lots by barge, and class 4 for truckload lots by truck, the cost is $3.68 per hundred pounds from Edmonton to Yellowknife via Grimshaw and Hay River, and $4.68 by highway using the winter rate. That latter figure will have to be reduced because at the present time the highway to Yellowknife has been completed. Set against that are the figures which have been given to the commission which will represent the rates after the railway is built, a rate of $2.61. One can therefore appreciate that there will be a very substantial saving as a result of this railway being built.

In respect to the situation which exists in the Northwest Territories, I suggest that the area is on the verge of tremendous development, but in order for that development to proceed, the people there must be in a position to receive their commodities at a rate which will permit them to proceed economically. That has not been possible in the past. As a result of the policy of this government the Mackenzie highway has been completed, hand in hand with the proposal to construct this railway, and I am sure the Northwest Territories and the general vicinity of the north will benefit tremendously.

Apart from the question of economics, and I think I have said sufficient to indicate that there is vast promise there and great benefits which will inevitably result from the completion of this railroad, there is a sociological factor which cannot be ignored. I have touched upon the first aspect of that already. For many, many years promises have been made and broken but we now have a government which has kept its pledge to the people. I suggest that fact will have a great effect on the minds of the people, particularly those thousands who went into that north country with the firm understanding that a railroad would be constructed. Those individuals have hewn out their farmland from the forest, have trucked their supplies in and hauled their grain out over 250 miles at a cost of 40 cents a bushel. These people have persisted in the face of these difficulties, and now at last they have a government which keeps its word.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the completion of this railroad will provide opportunities for the small people. The days of the pioneer, as I saw them when I first went into the Peace river country, have to a large extent diminished. There will be made available in those areas opened up by the construction of this railroad hundreds of thousands of opportunities for individuals who wish to establish themselves, employ themselves in carving out new carers, new lives, and new homes. It is my firm belief that there will develop shortly on this continent a substantial trek into areas such as this of those individuals who feel that some of the large and more ungainly centres of civilization do not offer what they seek.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to use a phrase which was used by a great British statesman many years ago, I think the Prime Minister and members of this government by this measure have called into being a new land in part to redress the balance of the old.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question as he has misunderstood a statement I made when I suggested that the opening of this mine and the shipment of ore was the prime reason for this bill. I think he misunderstood my application of that statement. Is it not correct to state that this railroad was not practically feasible until the revenue resulting from large shipments of lead-zinc concentrates was guranteed?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I am happy that the hon. member has corrected a misapprehension which I seem to have formed in respect to his statement. I should like to answer by saying that this railroad would have paid for itself in due course without the guarantee of the shipment of lead-zinc concentrate. I think it might be said, however, that will provide some bread and butter at this time.

Mr. Herridge: Right.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, the only member from British Columbia who has spoken on this measure is the hon. member for Kootenay West who appeared to be throwing cold water on what the government was doing, as usual.

Mr. Herridge: Do not misinterpret my remarks.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am not misinterpreting your remarks. You will have an opportunity to reply to what I am saying. I suggest that you said you were going to vote for this measure, of course, but that we should be careful and attempt to detract from it in every way we can, which is your usual policy in regard to measures of this kind.

In order that there will be no misunderstanding in regard to the position of the province of British Columbia in respect to this matter I think I should make a few remarks at this time.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member speaks for British Columbia.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I will attempt to show you that is exactly what I am doing at the moment, to a far greater extent than anyone in the C.C.F. party will do.

I spoke in regard to this matter when I first was elected to this house during my maiden speech as it appears in Hansard of May 19, 1958. I advocated the building of this railroad using the route that is now being adopted by the present government. At that same time the hon. member for Peace River took a very active part and undoubtedly deserves much credit for the fact that this route has been chosen because he brought out facts to show that this was the proper route, and also did a great deal of work in this regard during the Manning commission. I am sure that the people of the Peace River area both in Alberta and British Columbia owe much to the hon. member for Peace River.

After I had spoken in regard to this matter in my maiden speech in this house I received a letter from the premier of the province of British Columbia who, after having congratulated me, in respect to my maiden speech, made the following statement as it appears in that letter:

> I was gratified that in this first speech that you dealt with the development of northern British Columbia and Alberta and wish to thank you especially for the remarks which you made regarding the building of a railroad from Pine Point in the Northwest Territories. I presume you had in mind that the road would go to the neighbourhood of Grimshaw, a point on the northern Alberta railway which is owned jointly by the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways. The traffic would then have a choice either to go by the N.A.R. to Edmonton or by the N.A.R. west to connect with the Pacific Great Eastern Railway at the British Columbia border. Along with this point of view, our bureau of economics has been carrying out some research and for your information I am enclosing their preliminary report. If you are interested, I will be glad to send you any further information we are able to get.

This letter was signed by W. A. C. Bennett, premier of the province of British Columbia. I hope that full use is going to be made of this railway, and that we will see a good deal of traffic going over the Pacific Great Eastern Railway lines because I believe it will be of great benefit both to the Peace river area of British Columbia and of Alberta.

The government of the province of British Columbia took a very active part in trying to provide information with respect to the route which should be chosen for this railroad. I should just like to read two statements from the brief which they submitted to the royal commission on the Great Slave lake railway. They are on page 3 of their brief and read as follows:

> The purpose of this government in making the present submission is twofold:
> (a) In the national interest, it is felt that the proposed rail extension constitutes an important and necessary initial step in the development of the resources of the Mackenzie district and will make a major contribution to the expansion, growth, and development of northern Canada.

Of course, this quite clearly bears out the view many of the members have expressed, namely that this ties in very closely with the whole northern development policy of the present government. After the many years of delay and talk about this railway it is most encouraging to see that action is going to be taken by the present administration.

The second paragraph in the brief reads as follows:

> (b) As a partner with the province of Alberta in responsibility for the geographical region known as the Peace river district, which lies partly within

British Columbia boundaries, this province wishes to make available its special knowledge of the said area in view of the fact that two of three proposed railway routes run through the Peace river district.

Of course, they went on to advocate the western route which has now been chosen by the government. Regardless of what the hon. member for Kootenay West might think, I believe I am speaking for the people of British Columbia when I say I wish to congratulate the government on having chosen the proper route, based on all the facts as they were put before the royal commission. The government deserves commendation in that after the long delay of many years and promises made by former governments this government is taking action to speed up the development of Canada.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, this is the day that I have waited for ever since I came to this house. Unfortunately, perhaps, for some of the residents of my district the railroad is going through the Peace river district. I spoke strongly for the railroad going through my part of the country naturally because the eastern half of northern Alberta is equally rich in resources as the western half. Nevertheless water transport is the life blood of the eastern half of northern Alberta and I have always seen the orderly development of the north country tied in with roads and water transport. Although a railroad is essential for the orderly development of the north country, I have always stressed on our side the need for adequate highways and better water transport. Unfortunately, again the question of building roads in eastern Alberta is largely the responsibility of the provincial government. Our far seeing government has developed a tremendous program of roads to resources. This is the only hope I have of getting superior and rapid development of roads in northeastern Alberta, and I have concentrated most of my efforts in this direction.

Kind remarks were made about me by the hon. member for Peace River and my respect for the hon. member is equal to that of any hon. member in this house because he also has taken a very impartial view. He has demanded that all the facts be put on the table. I do not know whether all the facts have been put on the table yet, but we appointed a royal commission to look into this matter. I have read its reports very carefully and I think it made a fair decision in this case.

I should like to have sat on a commission myself, not as a member of a royal commission but on a fact-finding board. Had I been appointed to such a board, then it would have been said about the decision that I had played petty party politics and regional politics. In a situation of this kind the appointment of a royal commission was the only fair way to make an impartial decision, or certainly one which would be accepted by the people of Canada as such.

The accusation that this road is being built purely as window dressing is far from the truth. This is an essential part of what we are still proud to call the vision, the development of northern Canada. If we wait until we have orders from mining companies, timber companies or any other kind of companies before we build a railroad we may never get those companies into the north country. Railroads are essentially a pioneer project. When Sir John A. Macdonald signed the final order to build the C.P.R. this was vision, a vision which made Canada what she is today, and this move of the government to build this great railway into the north as fast as possible and as far as possible, I predict will have the same kind of result.

The great development of the north country cannot help but benefit not only northwestern Alberta but northeastern Alberta, the whole of Alberta and the whole of our country. The pioneering spirit is not dead in Canada, and this I think will give it that shot in the arm which is needed at this particular time.

Lead and zinc are on the south shore of Great Slave lake, one of the richest deposits on the planet. I do not know how soon we are going to need those deposits, but I understand that at the present time we are in short supply. I am for any company, be it the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, or any other company which takes a forward view and wants Canada to be well stocked with all the munitions of war and peace.

I am one of those who still believe that the leadership given by privately owned and operated corporations is the finest way of raising the standard of living in Canada, in North America, yes, in the whole world. I think it is an unfair thing to say that we are building this railroad for any company because the railroad serves us all. That is why we pay deficits. I say we will not pay deficits if we build those railroads to the right places and carry them to the right places to develop the resources of our country. I say build it now.

I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Mackenzie River who is not here today. I am sure he would be glad to be here to see one of his dreams come true, because he is a man who sees the development of Canada as a whole. He puts party politics to one side. I remember seeing him standing in this house some time ago, and I remember hearing him say, "I don't care where you build it; I just want to know that you will build it as soon as possible."

There have been so-called delays but those delays have been occasioned so that we could build it the best way, the cheapest way, the most efficient way and the way that will serve the whole of Canada, including British Columbia, in the most efficient manner.

There is another reason for building this railroad into the north country, and that is it will help us develop the southern part of our country as well. I can see the day when this railroad to the north from Grimshaw into the Great Slave country will be linked with a line running to the east into Saskatchewan and through my district. One or two very short links would connect the lines of Canadian National Railways north of the Saskatchewan river and provide an efficient railway service to the whole of the parkland stretching from Edmonton to Prince Albert.

Railroads do not only serve mining and agriculture. They are also very important for defence purposes. The proper linking of railways today is all-important when such things as Bomarcs and other rocket equipment will be needed if and when we have a war. In defending North America our defence will have to be extremely mobile, and I look to the day when we will have a network of railways and not the kind of bottlenecks that we have today.

In order to travel into northern Alberta today by railroad you have to go through the city of Edmonton. All the railroad lines fan out of Edmonton. We live in the atomic age and one atomic bomb on Edmonton would paralyse all the railroads in northern Alberta. If our railroads are going to operate efficiently both in war and peace it is essential that we have a proper, sensible network and eliminate these bottlenecks.

So I look to the day when lines of Canadian National Railways in northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta are linked together, and it would not take very many miles of railway line to do this. In one place the gap is only 40 miles and this would eliminate an additional haul of 328 miles from Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan to Heinsburg which is just east of the flourishing town of St. Paul. If this link were closed we would have a short cut between Winnipeg and Cold Lake airport which is today a most important part of the air defence of North America.

Railroading is not dead; it is simply inefficient at the present time. I have said before in the house that I am not a railroader, but if you will take a look at the railroad map of northern Alberta you will see two things. First of all, you will see that we need a link with the Northwest Territories, which we are going to build, and, second, we need to link this great north and south railroad with a line east and west so that we can cut down extra mileage in freight hauls and can have a network for the defence of the whole of northwestern Canada which is of great importance today.

I believe in the future of railroading because we are a pioneer country and we will be hauling heavy freight which can be handled most efficiently by railroads. Perhaps this railroad will not pay for itself in one year but over a period of 50 years it will apy off a thousandfold. It will develop Canada in depth.

It has been said that we are only building this railroad because of the mineral resources. This is not true. The hon. member for Peace River has shown that the potential in timber with proper modern timber farming methods means that northern Alberta will be a very rich source of both timber and pulp once we have rail facilities into that country. I need not stress the importance of the tar sands. In my district alone there are between 200 billion and 500 billion barrels of tar and oil-producing tar sands. Having in mind the situation in Kuwait which may blow up at any time, we can realize the importance of this resource because we may need the oil. I say that we need vision and we should take steps to encourage private companies to go there and develop that great national resource.

Great Slave lake and all the other lakes of the north are rich in fish and fishing is essential to the incomes of our metis and Indian populations. The supply has only been scratched. We can bring tons and tons of fish from the north country by rail and this will be of tremendous help to the Indians and metis in the northern part of my riding in assisting them to earn a living by working at something to which they are eminently fitted. This has been a traditional way of life with the metis and the Indians who take to fishing particularly as a natural way of earning their living. We can show no better faith than by helping them to develop the fishing industry over the period of the next 25 years.

There are also large deposits of gypsum which is very important today. The supply of gypsum is almost unlimited. Iron ore has now been found in northern Alberta. The Northern Alberta Railroad is one railroad which has been paying its way. I think this is very important at the present time when some of the other railroads are experiencing such large deficits. Some people say that we should not build any more railroads but we should certainly build them where they will make money. One reason they are making money lies in the fact that their freight rates for transporting cargo into the north are exorbitant. This is another reason why I should like to see railroads and roads into the north built at the same time because in that way we would have competition.

When I speak of private enterprise may I say that I am not one who believes in monopoly. This is one reason why I have suggested that when this railway into the north has been constructed there would be nothing wrong with building a second railroad into the north. One could run through the Peace river district and the other could run from Fort McMurray to the south shore of Great Slave lake. At the present time this might look like duplication but I think it will not be very many years before the railroad into the north which we are going to construct will be so busy that we will need two lines. Instead of constructing a double track route at that time I think we should have one line running through the Peace river district and one running north from Fort McMurray.

I think any fair-minded person who reads the report of the royal commission will say that the need is greater at the present moment on the western route. Anybody who cannot see that the north country will support two railways and that the future of the north country is almost unlimited lacks vision. A lack of vision cannot be attributed to the present government because they have vision and are doing something about these things.

Before I came to Ottawa I made an election promise that I would do all I could to promote the building of railroads both north and south and east and west where they are required and I say that such lines will make money. Let us be realistic. Let us have no socialist snow poured upon the sunny Alberta scene. If the socialists do not have any positive suggestions to make, let them sit on the sidelines and watch how a dynamic, self-reliant free enterprise system really works. We need every citizen in Canada behind this project. Do not look to the old party with the new face. Just open your eyes and see what the old party with the same old vision, the same old hope and the same old faith does when you put them in power and give them a chance to do so. We have been given this chance and we are taking advantage of it. We do not think such projects are a sad gamble.

I believe in the future of this country in the same way that my grandparents did, and they pioneered in this great district of northern Alberta in the early 1800's. Hon. members will excuse me if I tell them that my grandfather was the Hudson Bay factor at Lac La Biche, which is the territorial centre of my district, from 1874 to 1881. My mother would have been born there but there was only one white man in the whole country, my grandfather, and he took his wife to Fort Pitt in Saskatchewan so my maternal ancestor's home was in that fair province of Saskatchewan. It is for this reason I am interested in the development of road and rail facilities in northern Saskatchewan. This is another part of the country that is going to benefit from railroads and roads built as a result of this government's vision.

How can you say on the one hand that we have had delay and, on the other hand, say that we are building it too fast? We do not believe this is the case. We believe we have delayed only the necessary time for investigating all the facts. I myself asked to have these facts investigated. I compliment this government upon carrying out this investigation not hastily but thoroughly. I do not believe we will have to apologize for the results. By 1967, the 100th anniversary of our country, I am sure the results of this project will be evident. I do not believe there will be any more delay. The survey parties are on the ground and are already providing employment. Pretty soon we will be cutting the rights of way and we will be keeping the promises made by former governments over the last 30 years. We accept responsibility for promises made by the federal government, and we carry them out in the same manner as we carried out the promise to build the Saskatchewan dam.

Great credit has been given to former ministers of agriculture and other prime ministers for their vision in respect of these projects, but it has taken this government to put them into action. One should recall that this has been done at a time when world conditions have made trade a difficult thing, when we have had to get out there and sell like we never did before. We are recovering our markets, and it is these markets that will keep our railroads busy. It was not long ago that we said we had too much wheat. Today it looks as though we are not going to have enough. When father sun smiles too brightly on the prairies, our surpluses dwindle. Now we are selling all the wheat we can grow and we are going to keep growing it, we are going to keep selling it and it will take the railroads to haul it.

The last time we had a serious drought on the prairies thousands of people flocked into the Peace river country. They were promised a railroad to enable them to sell their agricultural products. It is a sad thing that they have had to wait so long to see the fulfilment of this promise. I, for one, am very pleased that they are getting the railroad. I look forward to the day when branch lines from this railroad will serve the whole of the north country, thus lowering the cost of transporting freight and serving the people on my side of Alberta. This is the kind of service for which they have been looking for the last 30 years. The town of McMurray is dependent on water transport. I do not believe the town of McMurray is going to suffer at all from the building of the railway. When the north is developed the way it should be we will be loading our barges with more freight because the railroads will have helped to develop the north country. Water transport is the cheapest form of transport, and as long as water transport facilities are serviced by adequate roads north out of Edmonton to McMurray, then water transport will be able to compete. It is competition that develops, not monopoly. I do not worry about the railroads having competition because there is going to be lots of work for everybody. The railroads will be busy and the roads will be busy.

At the moment, the airways are carrying the passenger traffic. I have spoken to air line officials as recently as yesterday and they are happy that this railroad is to be constructed because they know that the development of the north will mean increased business for them. They will give fast service to the passengers and the light freight, but they know that only roads and railroads can develop the northern part of the country.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words today in commendation of the hon. member for Peace River. I believe he has every reason to feel proud and gratified in the knowledge that his many hard years of work on behalf of this railway have finally borne fruit in the form of this resolution. In order that hon. members will properly understand what the railway means to northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, perhaps I should say a few words about the geography of that part of the country.

I am sure that not all hon. members realize that we are not just west but are considerably north of this part of Ontario. If we were to project the city of Ottawa in a direct westerly line, Ottawa would be in the southern part of the state of Montana. Edmonton is nearly in the middle of the province of Alberta, and the rest of the province is so undeveloped that it is equivalent to parts of northern Ontario. I should say that those parts of northern Ontario about which you are used to thinking of forests, streams, hunting and fishing, are about on the same latitude as Edmonton. North of Edmonton we soon find a forest area. There is almost a solid forest area north and west of Edmonton right to the mountains. The solid forest extends north to the tundra regions.

There is only one real exception to this, and that is the Peace river country which occupies part of northern Alberta and part of British Columbia. This is extremely fertile farm land and very beautiful country. The temperatures are about the same as they are in the rest of Alberta and the normal rainfall is conducive to raising good crops. There has been such an increase in the population of the area that more and more farm land suitable for agriculture is being developed. The Peace river country extends quite a distance in an easterly and westerly direction and finds an outlet for its products to the west in British Columbia through Prince George and down to Vancouver or through Edmonton. There is a narrow strip of land along the Mackenzie highway north of the Peace river itself which is being developed as farm land.

In looking at the development of this part of the country while travelling through it on the highway we get some idea of the reason for the construction of this railway. The farm lands in the north are scattered and there are few settlements which are now as close to the highway as they can get, so they are making use of a very narrow, thin strip of the agricultural land that is available. The problem of importing the things they need and exporting their produce is extremely difficult. I have not ridden through that country in a vehicle for quite a few years, but I have watched the statistics and I know that for all practical purposes development of agricultural lands north of Manning, Alberta, has practically ceased; there is very little expansion.

That territory is capable of providing good farm land for many, many times the present population. There is very good land there. When we see the House of Commons and the government of this country giving consideration to the necessity for taking uneconomic land out of cultivation, of shifting the land from a use which was not intended, back into pasturage, etc., it becomes very apparent why it is such a shame to have what is some of the finest land in the country laying barren, unused because of transportation difficulties.

Those who suggest that the only use of this railway is to haul ore really have not given the geography of the northern part of Alberta much consideration. It is a very significant fact, I think, that the railway is going to carry on from the end of the N.A.R. which is already established in the territory. The N.A.R. railway goes to Peace River by a somewhat circuitous route. The trip is fairly long. It is twice as long by rail to Peace River as it is by road; it is twice as long in miles and it is twice as long in time. The significance of this is that it is extremely unlikely, therefore, that this railroad will be called upon to provide any passenger service to any great extent.

I am not an expert on railways, but I have heard a good deal of emphasis placed on the losses incurred by passenger traffic on the railways. It does seem that railways are always attempting to curtail passenger services to various points and the residents of those points are usually objecting most strenuously. I think that to begin with there will not be the demand for passengers to that part of the country because the country right now is quite sparsely settled. There will not likely be the demand for that service in the future because there is a much shorter road connection, and when you are taking journeys further than from Peace River to Edmonton aircraft is now the accepted mode of transportation. In view of this fact I do not think there will be the heavy drain on railroad revenues with which other lines have to contend.

Next there is the fact that the mine potential of Pine Point is really very, very huge. There is no doubt that the amount of ore to be hauled out of that territory will mean that the railway will be able to operate in the most efficient manner possible. I understand that the soundest financial business for a railway to be in is the long haul of full trainloads on a non-stop basis. Therefore they have here the full potential for economic operation. They will be able to load and assemble full trainloads at a time; they will be able to move these trainloads long distances without many of the normal traffic hazards, without the necessity for frequent stops, etc. The produce of the mines to be developed at Pine Point should be a sufficient guarantee that this railway will be a paying proposition.

Of course, the people of that area are not just interested in the fact that a railroad is going through or that there is going to be a big development at Pine Point. The constituents of the Peace River district are interested in the railway because they see themselves being able to obtain some benefits out of it. That railway will certainly haul the wheat, the cattle and the supplies into that country for those people.

I imagine that it will be only a very short time before the farming population in the area north of Grimshaw will be doubled, and then doubled again. There is room for these people. There is splendid land there. With a good railway operating efficiently, which can therefore give economical rates, there will be plenty of opportunity for the northern farmers to compete with the farmers in the rest of the province and in the other provinces. It is only the high cost of transportation which has caused these valuable lands to be considered not valuable today because of their remoteness. I predict that their full value will start to be known and they will start to be developed within a very few years.

While the commission was considering the route for this railroad a great deal of agitation was being carried on by various groups and organizations who were trying to influence the government to go one way or the other. Many of the arguments used were, I thought, a little specious. Some I thought were merely advanced in an attempt to scare, because some people had private motives which were not at all those which they enunciated to the public.

I do recall, for instance, that in the city of Edmonton some people were trying to get the city to throw its full weight behind the eastern route, the route from Fort McMurray, because they said, "This business will all go to Vancouver. The trains will all move out through British Columbia. This traffic will not go through Edmonton and we will lose it".

I think the people who advanced those arguments were doing the city of Edmonton a great disservice. I do not believe for one minute that the majority of the citizens of Edmonton would insist on the railway going the eastern route merely because it might be better for them, without any consideration to which route would be in the best interests of the people in the north and in the rest of Canada. I cannot understand how so many people in Edmonton could have been panicked by this sort of talk. Surely a city like Edmonton, which has been known as the gateway to the north for many, many years, realizes the importance of Edmonton as a supply centre. Surely the people of Edmonton realize the impact on that city that occurred every time any part of the north was opened up. Demands for goods and services increase as the population increases. The capacity of those people to buy Edmonton's goods and services increases as the north part of the country increases in wealth.

I think the first result is going to be a greatly increased population growth in the north. The effects will be felt in northern Alberta first, and then all the way north. Edmonton, as a supply centre, cannot help but benefit by reason of that increase. There may well be a certain diversion of traffic through to the Pacific coast, but no one, I think, is going to suggest for a moment that traffic should not go where it is most convenient and where it can be most efficiently handled. But I suggest that the amount diverted will be only a small part of the increased potential which the city of Edmonton will find in that new bigger and richer north which this railway will make possible.

I am not saying, of course, that merely puting a railroad in there is automatically going to make anyone rich. Everyone who contemplates a new venture should remember that a railway is not a source of wealth in itself. A railway, like any other means of transportation, represents merely a drain on resources —a factor to be overcome, in the same way as road transport is. Transportation is a cost which has to be borne by every business. We do have the opportunity, however, of getting the minerals out of Pine Point and we should talk of the railway as being that vehicle which seems to have potential as a means of reducing the costs which we have been facing up to this time.

I can recall the misleading pictures which some people have painted about this. There was in Edmonton at one time a newspaper called the Edmonton Bullet, and I still remember the flaming red headline three or four inches high which appeared one day calling attention to a tremendous lead discovery. This was merely going to prove the greatest find of wealth in years and years and they gave the discovery great headlines on a full front page. However, on reading the article it became obvious that these dreams were not to be realized. The lead was lining the Arctic ocean along the extreme northern coast of Canada. Brief reflection showed that it would cost twice as much to move the lead out of there to a civilized part of Canada as the lead was worth. I am merely telling the story to illustrate that wealth is not all it appears on the surface and that these costs, particularly the costs of transportation, are very real things with which to contend.

I know that some people have not paid enough attention to the means of transportation at their disposal. Some people have not made the best use of the transportation which was available. There is, for instance, not very much general knowledge of the size of the fishing industry on the Great Slave lake. I understand that about ten million pounds of fish a year are taken out of that lake. That is a lot of fish when one considers that the product has to be moved 800 miles over a highway to get to Edmonton. It has to be flown a long distance if it is taken out by plane. I believe the construction of a railway will have a great effect on the cost of transporting this fish. Obviously if we had been able to develop an industry which takes approximately 10 million pounds of fish capable of being sold through our present inadequate type of transport the potential must be considerably larger if we could overcome part of the cost of transportation. I am sure we shall see new canneries being built in Hay River, perhaps in Yellowknife and perhaps towards the east end of Great Slave lake.

The size of this lake is generally not understood in other parts of the country. It ranks just next to Great Bear lake in area, and Great Bear lake and Great Slave lake are both larger than lake Erie.

Mr. Pickersgill: How do they compare with lake Victoria Nyanza?

Mr. Nugent: The member for Bonavista-Twillingate shows very little sympathy for the fishermen of the Northwest Territories and northern Alberta. I trust he will restrain his impatience and not be too supercilious about this. There are people who have a great deal of stake in that part of the country. This is, I assure the hon. member, a very serious matter to them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then why do you talk so disparagingly about lake Erie?

Mr. Nugent: I am sure the hon. member for Essex East is really trying to be funny now. Merely because I mentioned that there is another lake bigger than lake Erie he suggests I am talking disparagingly. I can assure the hon. member that if I mentioned somebody who could talk longer than he could I would not be talking disparagingly about the hon. member for Essex East but only about that other person.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nugent: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the hon. member aware that the leader of the house is very anxious to get this resolution through.

Mr. Nugent: I am sure that the hon. member is, as usual, trying to be extremely helpful. That remark of his is about the same as most of his remarks. While it may be helpful and well meant, as usual it does not do a thing for anyone.

While the possible route of the railway was being discussed much was said about the timber potential of the eastern route. I am pleased to reiterate what has been said by others, both in this house and out of it, that the potential timberlands in northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories can be very adequately served by this railway as presently planned. It should therefore be possible for us to have large quantities of freight which can be moved in train loads or, at least, in car lots. There will certainly be trainloads of ore. There will be car lots of timber and fish, car lots, and probably train loads, of grain, cattle and so on. All of this is what the railway calls paying business. All of this makes it possible for a railway to make good money. I am emphasizing this because in my discussions with people in Edmonton about the railway I found that in general the citizens had become alarmed at the thought of a new railway because they had heard so much about railroads losing money, about railroads wanting to discontinue services to certain points and similar troubles. They think of the present age as an air age, an age of competition from trucks and so on. They were growing concerned about investing the sums of money necessary to build another railroad.

I think it should be said that this type of railroading is still a good business investment. This type of railroading will still compete with any type of transportation in the country and it will still make the business a paying proposition.

I should like to say a few words about the members of the Manning commission. I know they have worked extremely hard on this task, and I think the government's choice of the membership of the commission was excellent. Mr. Ted Manning is a lawyer who has lived in Edmonton almost all his life. He has had many dealings with the north of Alberta and the Northwest Territories in the course of his practice. He has travelled all over the region and has an extensive first hand knowledge of the country and its problems. Mr. John Anderson Thompson, the other member of the commission, comes from Yellowknife where he has been in business for many years. He has an extensive knowledge of the problems of the north, especially transportation. Nobody could live in Yellowknife for many years and carry on a construction business there without understanding fully the importance of cheaper transportation. Mr. Gainer gave to the committee, I thought, balance. He brought, perhaps, a more scholastic view to its deliberations. He was perhaps not as directly involved with some of the decisions and could, therefore, give a more detached view of the proceedings.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I have not exhausted the patience of the members of this committee. I see the Liberal front bench getting a little impatient and, if I thought that by merely staying on my feet I could spare the house from hearing more from hon. gentlemen from Bonavista-Twillingate, Laurier, from Essex East and other excessively vocal hon. gentlemen, I would carry on ad infinitum.

Mr. Drysdale: And we would give you a medal.

Mr. Nugent: I do feel, however, that there are perhaps others who understand the importance of this railroad to the area and, because we do not wish to stay here all summer, I thank those hon. members of this committee who have shown patience and now resume my seat.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two in regard to this resolution.

Mr. Hellyer: The amendment was carried.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I should like to continue. I hesitate to incur the wrath of the hon. member for Trinity who has amazed me by his unusual co-operation.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad to hear you say that. It is very encouraging.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly I may be a little out of my usual form. Being a green member here I usually speak once a year, and by speaking now have placed myself out of that category. However, this bill regarding the construction of that railroad line in northern Alberta is a subject of such importance that I feel I must call attention to several facts and compliment those who have been responsible for bringing this bill before this committee. I should like to outline several reasons why hon. members should support this resolution in order to get the project into production.

The first time I heard about this railroad was during the 1958 campaign. Being a farmer from the opposite end of Alberta I was not too much interested in it. In rising this afternoon I recall particular things concerning the development of northern Canada. If my memory serves me correctly many statements have been made about visions. One statement contained words which are clearer to me today, having been in this house for four years, than they were when I first heard them. Those words were "a vision from igloo to igloo".

When I first heard those words as a new campaigner in the federal field I was actually disturbed and quite frankly had a difficult time understanding their meaning. Those words have particular meaning for me today when considered in conjunction with certain pertinent facts concerning our natural resources, and particularly those of lead and zinc. How much longer will Canada be able to supply her own needs for lead and zinc without the further development represented by the bill now before this committee? I have heard from reliable sources that if this railway is not developed very shortly enabling this ore to reach our smelters we will have to import such ore.

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. member would get the lead out we could go ahead and build the railroad.

Mr. Gundlock: If the hon. member for Trinity wishes to ask a question I will attempt to answer it. I am a greenhorn and a farmer, but I will take my chances and try to answer his question quite frankly and willingly, inside this house or outside.

Mr. Hellyer: I will just sit here and bear it.

Mr. Gundlock: I am sorry to impose upon you but I feel there are certain facts which should be placed before this committee. However, as I have stated, if you wish to ask a question or take issue with what I am saying, I shall be glad to facilitate a reply.

Mr. Hellyer: I would just like to get the resolution passed.

Mr. Gundlock: So would I; and I would like also to see the railway in operation.

An hon. Member: The sooner the better.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, I was referring to lead and zinc but the hon. member only referred to lead. I was trying to point out to the committee that I am surprised—although perhaps not too surprised in the light of certain events which have taken place in the last few weeks—that we should be even considering the importation of lead and zinc in view of the large quantities which lie at our doorstep. It is my understanding that some individuals would like to see the importation of more and more of these natural resources.

Mr. Robichaud: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gundlock: Yes.

Mr. Robichaud: Is the hon. member aware that there exists in the province of New Brunswick, five miles from the railway and 12 miles from the sea, a hundred million tons of lead and zinc which remains in the ground because of the lack of markets?

Mr. Gundlock: Yes, I am quite aware of that. However, as I said earlier I am talking about the situation in Canada as a nation.

I suggest that Canada is in great danger of facing the necessity of importing certain resources which exist in Canada in great quantities. I suggest that we are in danger of this, and suggest it quite emphatically. I am speaking of the nation as a whole. In light of certain facts, views and ideas which have been expressed in this committee over the last few years I have come to realize that certain people would not be unhappy with increased importation of certain natural resources because they advocate high tariffs. I take no issue with that view but only suggest that certain people would like to see this come about.

As an Albertan, a Canadian and a Conservative I am very proud to be able to speak in regard to this proposal because I feel that our natural resources should be developed to the greatest extent possible. I do only refer to mineral resources but, as a farmer, I refer to agricultural products as well. I am particularly interested in agriculture and should like to take a moment or two of the committee's valuable time to say a word or two in this regard.

I have listened quite patiently very often to much discussion about overproduction and surpluses of agricultural products. We have heard this all through the agricultural debates. I think we have an example before us today, Mr. Chairman, which makes us realize that a great deal of the discussion was idle talk. We have literally millions of acres available adjacent to the area that this railway will serve. To those who say that we should not open up new agricultural areas, that we would thereby contribute to our surpluses and to our present difficulties I would simply point out in discussing this matter that it is not a fact. You can take the one burning issue that so many people have had so much to say about in this house and across the country, namely the wheat surplus, and you will see today that certain facts have borne out certain ideas that we on this side of the house have been trying to put forward for some time. Our surplus, if you wish to call it that, is certainly not what some members have tried to say it was.

It can be looked at in this way. There are many businessmen in this house. Let us take any product, I do not care whether it is wheat, apples, strawberries, lead, zinc, or what have you. If you are in the business of selling that product, and particularly if you are in a highly competitive business, you know that when a customer comes to you and you cannot supply the article he wants you will say, "I am sorry, I have not that article in stock but if you would not mind coming back next week I will have it for you". Well, in this day and age, with a highly competitive product and in a highly competitive market that customer will not come back.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that if we are in that business, certainly it does not behoove us to talk about surpluses. I have listened patiently to this talk for several years since I have been in the house. I would remind certain hon. members opposite that today we can see where our surplus is. There are agricultural experts opposite. I ask, where is the surplus? To hark back to my analogy; actually do we have a complete stock deal? Are all the articles on the shelf? For the information of hon. members I should like to say I am very happy also to know that the government has already taken steps to alleviate that lack of what I call stock. Therefore, in considering this railroad, Mr. Chairman, and the various aspects of it, such as mineral production and agriculture in particular, we must consider every angle we possibly can. I am only trying to point out some of the things that I am very happy to consider.

Another thing has been pointed out very well previously by several hon. members who spoke on this resolution that we all support regardless of party. I have heard no one say that he did not support it today. There was a great deal of criticism—I think it was constructive criticism—about the time spent studying where the location of the road should be. There was a great deal of discussion on the economics of the road. We are all interested in economics, and particularly in the cost of such a thing as a railroad. But there was one point that probably some of us failed to consider. I refer to the things that were to be hauled by this railroad from its most southerly point. The tonnages were heavy. The tonnage that will be hauled over the railroad has been referred to quite well by other hon. members; but the point I wish to make is that railroads today are different from those of 20 years ago, or even 10 years ago. The road beds are almost unrecognizable, comparatively speaking, because they have to be built in such a way so far as ballasting and grades are concerned that railroaders did not consider years ago. The only point I am trying to make is that in the studies by the commission and by all interested parties, it was apparent that the eastern route might be the most economical or the cheaper route to take simply because it costs less money to build a railroad from the end of the Northern Alberta Railroad by way of the east route to Pine Point where they intended to go. I would go along with that, Mr. Chairman, actually.

One point was left out. I never heard it mentioned by anyone vitally concerned with this railroad. It is simply this. When the railroad reached that southerly point it then had to go several hundred miles over the old roadbed of the N.A.R. Even the N.A.R. today has trouble in face of the drought and other problems affecting western Canada. There are portions of the present N.A.R. on the eastern side that cannot supply adequate facilities, for the equipment that is travelling over that railroad today. If I may say so, the equipment is old, proportionately weak and light. The passenger train that goes there today was retired from service on the C.P.R. in 1927.

When this railway is complete it will be equipped with diesel locomotives which will take long strings of larger cars; perhaps twice or three times as long, I am really not too sure. The loads and the speeds will be greater. The present railroad has trouble. They may have to drag a train up out of the muskeg. It happens almost daily. They have a schedule but no one really knows when any freight train or even a light passenger train will arrive at its destination. In view of that I ask hon. members, is there any argument about the most feasible route being the western route?

I have taken some time, Mr. Chairman and I know that hon. members on the other side and probably other hon. members may think I have taken too much time. We have been talking about facts, figures and economics but I have heard no one say very much about the people that this railway line will serve. Comparatively speaking, there are a great many people living along the western route and very few living along the eastern route. While it is our duty to consider to the best of our ability all the economic factors, and I think we have, I certainly do not think that as elected representatives of the people we should completely ignore the personal factor.

I live almost at the other end of the province of Alberta but I know people from that portion of the province and have visited some of them. Neighbours of mine have gone to that area of Alberta and are farming there. I know the problems that they have. In view of the fact that there may have been some controversy and argument as to the route that should be followed—I hope there is none at this stage—certainly the personal factor should be given at least equal status with economic considerations. I am happy to be able to say these few words in support of of this project in spite of the fact that the hon. member for Trinity thinks we are taking an unwarranted amount of time, and in spite of all the emphasis on facts and figures I want to leave the thought with hon. members that we must consider the personal element.

The boon to the people can well be imagined. Whether or not there is going to be passenger service there will be a train going up and down the line probably every day or possibly several trains a day. I do not know what the schedule will be. However, it is quite a satisfaction to a backwoodsman in such an area to know that there will be a train going by his door or through his community and that if he is in trouble or needs certain services those services and that assistance will be available to him.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I could not let this occasion pass without saying a few words in support of the resolution. For some considerable time prior to my entry into public life I supported the principle involved in the construction of this railroad and once I had come to parliament I assisted the hon. member for Peace River and others from the province of Alberta and western Canada generally in convincing the government that we should proceed with the building of the line.

There was some effort on the part of the official opposition to take credit for the idea and its ultimate fruition in the decision to go ahead with this railway. I should like to say, as was indicated quite adequately by the hon. member for Peace River, that this railroad had been a promise that had been dangled before the eyes of the people of the Peace River bloc for a quarter of a century or more but under the present government something was actually done about it.

I recall quite well the history of the Pine Point railroad in the last few years. It was first indicated during the election campaign of 1958 that the government was going to go ahead with this project and in the first speech from the throne thereafter there was an indication that the government was proceeding with the plan.

I would point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, whose knowledge of this area is cursory, that quite a case can be made to support either of the two points of view with respect to where this railroad should go. However, a commission of inquiry was appointed which heard both sides of the question and also served to dispel some rather illusory knowledge and to eradicate from certain circles in Ottawa ideas about the potentialities, conditions and characteristics of the area. May I say that I have travelled through both areas, although I did so some years ago, and have some rough idea as to potential costs.

The commission of inquiry was appointed in 1959 and turned in its report in June of 1960. In line with the majority report the government indicated in the speech from the throne in the fall of 1960 that it would proceed with the construction of the railroad along a particular route. I cannot see how it can be said that there was any undue delay. Any time anyone talks about delay they seem to be critical. I am not limiting my criticism to remarks made by the opposition in chiding the government with delay but am also referring as well to certain newspapers which have taken the government to task. I think they have done so without a true appreciation of all the facts involved. Such a project does not materialize out of thin air. We all know that there had to be a great deal of negotiation between the government, the railroads and the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company in order to arrive at some plan to finance this program of railroad construction.

The hon. member for Kootenay West requested that this matter should be referred to a committee and that all sorts of people should be called before that committee to satisfy members of the house that various conditions have been met. I would simply refer him to the proceedings of the Manning commission of inquiry. Representatives of the type referred to by the hon. member appeared there, and many more. If the hon. member would take the trouble to read the report, if he would take the trouble to read the submission of the government of the province of British Columbia, he would not make such a request. After all, the government of British Columbia made quite a play so far as this railroad is concerned, and I want to talk about that a little later.

The hon. member believes we should undertake this inquiry. However, when the railroads were built into Chibougamau and Thompson lake, this house was asked to approve expenditures by Canadian National Railways to undertake the construction of these lines. No such request was made by the hon. member for Kootenay West or anyone else to have certain people give this information. With the greatest respect, I would suggest the hon. member should gather together the material that was submitted to the Manning commission which conducted the inquiry into the construction of this railroad.

I feel that this is the first step toward the development of the Northwest Territories. In my opinion Hay River, which is to be developed into a lake port on the south shore of Great Slave lake, is the natural jumping off point for the Northwest Territories. Hay River is served by the Mackenzie highway which gives access from Grimshaw and then goes around the Mackenzie river to Yellowknife. This is the jumping off place for the development of that vast trench of the Mackenzie river all the way down to the Arctic coast. It is true that the development will lessen as one goes farther north. Having spent some time travelling up and down the Mackenzie river as far north as Norman Wells, I have gained a true appreciation of the vast potential that lies in this central trunk of communications.

In so far as this area of northwestern Alberta is concerned—and the same considerations apply to the northeastern part of British Columbia—I may say that the area has been within the economic ambit of Edmonton. It is for that reason I am speaking on this measure this afternoon. I know that as a member of the Edmonton chamber of commerce I found it difficult to support the chamber's contention that the route of the railway should be the eastern route through Waterways, Alberta. The chamber has known all along that I did not approve of this support. It is a judgment decision and the factors are not 100 per cent one way or 100 per cent the other way. On balance, however, I was of the opinion that the proper route was the western route.

I would repeat that the whole of the Peace river country and the Northwest Territories has lain within the economic ambit of Edmonton. However, the British Columbia government has built the P.G.E. as far as Dawson Creek. I believe it now behooves businessmen and organizations in Edmonton and in northern Alberta to look to their laurels. This area, with its vast potential, cannot be considered to lie easily within the grasp of business concerns and organizations in Alberta. I think, myself, that it would be likely that most of the railroad business that will be developed by this line will be the transportation of ore through Edmonton, to Calgary and out to Trail because that is the easiest and cheapest route. I believe, too, that supplies coming in from eastern Canada and from the manufacturing area of Edmonton and Calgary, will move over this line rather than come over the P.G.E. from Vancouver. However, I feel that competition will be good. It will keep our people in Edmonton on their toes. Certainly, the highway connections between Edmonton and Great Slave lake are far superior to any existing in British Columbia.

Now, in so far as the construction of the line is concerned, may I make a suggestion to the minister. I suggest that rather than make this a "do it yourself" proposition using the consulting engineers and the resources of the railroad, local firms in Alberta and British Columbia should be used. After all, there is a problem of time involved here. It is said the construction will take four years. We know that Consolidated Mining and Smelting is worried about their source of raw materials for the next two or three years. They would like the construction of this railroad expedited as much as possible. If the railway has not got facilities to expedite construction, then they should use outside firms.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I felt that I had to say something about this resolution, and I would commend it to the members of this committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE CANADIAN AIRCRAFT REGISTRY

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-37, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on Bill No. C-37, I feel it is one of the most important enactments to be brought before the house in the form of a private member's bill. It may appear at first blush, on looking at the actual wording of the bill, that it is exceptionally complex, but I hope in the brief time at my disposal to strip some of the complexities from the bill and indicate very clearly what I think are the most important principles facing the house at this particular time.

Briefly, the objective of this bill is to establish a central aircraft registry, probably in the city of Ottawa, to record title to and charges against Canadian civil aircraft, aircraft engines, propellers and spare parts. Many hon. members are no doubt familiar with the central type of registry covering motor vehicles that we find in many of the provinces. Hon. members from provinces such as British Columbia which operate under the Torrens system of land registry will also be familiar with the central type of land registry. Similarly, the objective of this bill is to apply the concept of a central type of registry to civil aircraft.

What are the reasons for doing this? First of all, when an individual is acquiring an aircraft which may cost $10,000 or more I think the most important thing is that he should be able to obtain clear title to that aircraft. The aircraft has an even greater degree of mobility than is involved in ownership of motor vehicles and, of course, we have a central registry covering motor vehicles.

The difficulty facing any purchaser acquiring an aircraft is first of all to find out where that aircraft has been. It is possible, naturally, for the aircraft to cover almost all the provinces in Canada and there is even a great deal of difficulty when it is in just two or three provinces, because each province has its own method of registering an aircraft and its charges, such as chattel mortgages or conditional sales contracts and agreements.

Some provinces, such as British Columbia, have established a central registry for aircraft. In the case of Ontario and other provinces anybody wishing to register an aircraft would presumably have to search every county court registry in the province to ascertain that there were no charges such as chattel mortgages or conditional sales agreements against the aircraft. The method of registration in a central registry is doubly important in the case of stolen aircraft, because a person could acquire an aircraft that had been stolen and be under the impression that he was obtaining good title. Then when the person who had lost the aircraft found out where it was, he would recover it and presumably the person who bought the aircraft would lose $10,000, or whatever he paid for it, because no doubt the person who sold him the aircraft, would have disappeared.

There is also the possibility of double sale by very smooth talking individuals. I refer to selling the same aircraft twice within a very short period of time. Since there is no central registry system it would be impossible to establish who was the actual owner and presumably there would be interesting litigation as a result of the transaction in order to find out who was the actual owner of the aircraft.

One of the most important matters in this bill is the question of financing. I am relying on my memory, but I think within the last year or two in Canada there has been over $200 million invested in the acquisition of aircraft. In a similar period in the United States the figure is roughly $2.5 billion. In the United States they have had a central aircraft registry since 1938 and I understand from my reading on this subject that their registry has been extremely effective and has done an excellent job.

There have been instances in Canada where people wanted to finance the purchase of aircraft. They have found out that we had no central registry, and the extremely involved procedure necessary in going through the ten provinces, perhaps having to search every county court registry in about half of them and having to search central registries in the remainder, and this has been a very strong factor in discouraging needed financing.

I have endeavoured up to this point, Mr. Speaker, to set out roughly what I think is the objective of this bill and to indicate some of the problems. Perhaps the most obvious question for anybody to ask is: is there any great support for this measure? What is the support behind this piece of legislation? I would first of all like to refer to a resolution passed by the Canadian bar association at their annual convention in 1956. That resolution reads as follows:

> Resolved that appropriate enabling legislation be enacted to establish, as soon as possible, a central Canadian aircraft registry located at Ottawa in order to record title to and all encumbrances against Canadian civil aircraft.

This matter had been discussed by the air law committee of the Canadian bar association at considerable length and as a result of their recommendations and studies the Canadian bar association gave their unanimous endorsement to this proposal. In 1957 the Canadian bar association met at Banff and during their 39th annual meeting in this city another resolution was proposed. This resolution reads:

> Whereas because of the increasing cost of aircraft outside financing is frequently essential and the task of raising the necessary money is rendered difficult by the absence of any central registry of aircraft where title to aircraft and charges and liens thereon can be registered,
> Be it resolved that the Canadian bar association again urge the government of Canada to establish such a registry at an early date.

Again, as late as February of this year the Quebec branch of the Canadian bar association gave the following endorsement to my bill:

> Whereas the Quebec subsection of the air law section of the Canadian bar association notes with satisfaction that Bill C-37, relating to the establishment of a central registry for aircraft has been introduced in the House of Commons, under the sponsorship of John A. W. Drysdale, M.P.
> And whereas the Canadian bar association has already presented a resolution to the Minister of Justice endorsing the principle of a central registry for aircraft.
> Now, therefore, the Quebec branch recommends that the council of the Canadian bar association inform the Minister of Justice of its continued interest in the principle underlying Bill C-37 and suggest to the minister that the said Bill C-37 be referred to the appropriate committee of the House of Commons for further study and report and that the said committee be authorized to request interested persons and organizations to appear before it for the purpose of providing such information relating to the subject matter of the said bill as the committee may deem desirable or necessary.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to indicate in detail the interest of people who are active in the legal sphere, who understand the complexity of the situation and understand the effect it is having on aircraft financing and who have on every occasion given their unanimous endorsement to the principle of this bill. I would also say that the British Columbia air law section of the Canadian bar association headed by Mr. Jack Cunningham have also provided me with a great deal of information and support in regard to this bill.

What is the present situation under the air regulations, 1960, of the Aeronautics Act? Section 201 provides:

> The minister shall cause a register of aircraft to be maintained in which shall be registered the names of the owner or owners of every aircraft registered under this part and such other particulars concerning the aircraft as the minister directs.

There have been the suggestions that this particular section is adequate to meet the situation. However I will point out very briefly that this particular section does nothing to establish the identity of the owner but merely provides that certain material be furnished as to the aircraft. It provides for registration of the name of the alleged owner of the aircraft but there is no certification as to the ownership of the aircraft.

I might mention, incidentally, that there is no provision for the registration of any liens or charges against this particular certificate, so that it does not do what this piece of legislation is trying to do. It might assist the committee if I indicated the provinces that have central registries—British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland. The provinces which require county court registration are Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Quebec. In Quebec, of course, the situation is a little different, because a chattel mortgage is not recognized in that province, only a mortgage bond by trust deed which is registered in each of the county courts where the mortgagor has a place of business.

What I feel to be the prime objective of this legislation is to have a single central registry in Ottawa to provide for the compulsory registration of the aircraft, engines, propellers and parts. It should be a registry where there could be a very simple and quick search to ascertain the state of the title to the aircraft and find out what liens and charges are registered against the aircraft.

I made some inquiries in connection with the situation in the United States. The aircraft registry in Washington has been operating successfully since 1938. I had hoped to have a firsthand look at their operations when visiting Washington shortly before Easter, but on my arrival I found they had taken the centralizing step themselves and had moved their offices to Oklahoma city. I understand from discussions with some of the officials in Washington that under the United States system in addition to providing a registry indicating the various charges and the ownership of the aircraft they have, in effect, a complete operation and service record of the aircraft so that an individual making inquiries can find out when the engine has been changed or a new propeller acquired or servicing of the aircraft in addition to ownership and all charges. I suggest that if there were similar facilities here in a central aircraft registry in Ottawa they would be invaluable as far as expanding aircraft financing in this country is concerned.

There is some question as to the constitutional situation; in other words, whether or not the establishment of a central aircraft registry would be within the powers of parliament under the British North America Act. Just for the record may I say it seems fairly clear that in the Aeronautics Act of 1932 where the privy council upheld the validity of the Aeronautics Act this establishes without question that this particular act is intra vires the powers of parliament. The recent case in 1952 of Johannesson v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul, I, Supreme Court Reports, 292 lends support to the contention that the protection of security interests is a valid exercise of the powers of the federal government.

In order to confirm this particular viewpoint I engaged in some correspondence with the former minister of transport, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think it would be extremely helpful if I were to put some of his remarks on the record. I wish to do this at length because, as I have indicated, this matter is of extreme importance to the aircraft industry. It is a most technical matter and I hope that making this information available in the pages of Hansard that this will permit the widest possible discussion in the aircraft industry so that we may have both the pros and the cons on this piece of legislation. The letter from the minister of transport is dated April 15, 1959. It reads:

Dear John:

I refer to a previous exchange of correspondence in the matter of the establishment of a central Canadian aircraft registry and in particular to your letter of October 31, 1958, in which the advantages of such a registry to the industry were pointed out.

While it would appear to be within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament to provide for the establishment of a registry for liens and encumbrances on aircraft, the existing provisions of the Aeronautics Act would not authorize the making of such regulations and an amendment to the act thereof would be required for the purpose. The wisdom of doing so, however, is in considerable doubt since I am informed that the registration of encumbrances on chattels generally is a matter coming within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that, in fact, such facilities are provided, by the provinces. It may be, however, that these facilities have not been fully employed in the matter of aircraft conveyance.

A federal aircraft registry is in existence in the United States and its function was recently discussed on an informal basis with responsible federal aviation agency officials in Washington. We were somewhat disappointed to find that the complex, time consuming and expensive procedures established by the federal aviation agency have apparently not achieved the original purpose even though the registry has now been expanded to include the recording of conveyances in respect to aircraft engines and even parts. It is understood that while banks and other loan houses insist upon recording all conveyances respecting aircraft in which they are involved with the federal aviation agency and that the courts are influenced to some extent by the production of such records, these records have not been generally accepted by the courts as evidence of title to the aircraft. The basic difficulty experienced by the federal aviation agency in respect to aircraft title is that resulting from the routine interchangeability of up to four expensive engines and a very large number of extremely expensive airframe and engine components. You will appreciate that, in these circumstances, it would be virtually impossible to say at any given moment who owned a particular aircraft where liens and encumbrances against the airframe itself, individual engines and certain expensive components are held by a number of different persons. It may be of interest to you to know that 12 separate commercial title-searching agencies have been set up in Washington being concerned only with the search of aircraft titles.

While I intend to keep this matter under continuous review, I am not satisfied that it would be either advisable or profitable to set up a federal registry at this time, but will, of course, welcome any further views you may have in the matter.

I have set forth this letter completely. I have done so very frankly because I wanted to present both sides of the picture. The minister has indicated that the amendment which I have contemplated is within the jurisdiction of parliament. He has also indicated why he does not think such a change could be brought about through regulations. It is for that reason I have brought in an amendment to the act. The minister then went to to question the cost of a central aircraft registry and, also the efficacy of a registry of this kind.

I had already written to the federal aviation agency in the United States and they replied to me on November 4, 1960 dealing with my inquiry as to the cost of operating that agency. I do not wish to leave out the cost factor, which I think to be of importance, but we must keep in perspective the relative size of the central aircraft registry in the United States as compared with such a registry in Canada. The letter is dated November 4, 1960 and it is written by Mr. Robert P. Boyle, associate general counsel, general legal services. It says:

Your letter of October 13, 1960 to the administrator of the federal aviation agency was referred to this office for reply.

In that letter you requested information concerning the establishment of a central aircraft registry in Canada. In answer to your specific questions, may I first point out that the following figures are estimates. The interlocking of other functions within the division of this agency, that handles registrations makes it almost impossible to give the exact costs involved. However, the following is a close approximation of the actual figures involved.

Sixty three persons are employed to perform the registration and recordation functions of this agency. The space required is approximately 9,500 square feet. The annual revenue of this function varies between $190,000 and $215,000. The annual expenditure for support of this function amounts to $350,000.

[Mr. Drysdale.]

Although it operates at a slight loss I would suggest that in view of the tremendous cost presently incurred by anyone ascertaining the actual title to an aircraft in Canada it would be possible for the federal government to operate such a registry on a break-even basis.

The former minister of transport indicated in his letter the difficulty existing in this regard particularly in relation to provincial registration. In approaching this aspect of the problem I wrote a letter to each of the attorneys general of the provinces of Canada which I think sets forth clearly the viewpoint I have been trying to express, and I think it would be of value to hon. members if I read this particular letter into the record, following which I shall make reference to some of the replies I have received. I wrote to the attorneys general under date of April 6, 1961, as follows:

Enclosed please find a copy of Bill No. C-37, which seeks to establish a central aircraft registry for the registration of title to and encumbrances against aircraft, aircraft engines, propellers, appliances and spare parts.

At present each province has its own legislation governing the question of title to and encumbrances against aircraft. The present system has actually prevented aircraft financing because of the multiplicity of registries and the searches required to ascertain the state of the title of aicraft in Canada, particularly if the aircraft has been flown in several or all of the provinces.

I am writing to you because, although it appears to be within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament to provide for the establishment of such a central aircraft registry, in order to make the system effective I think it would require provincial co-operation to the extent that the provinces would require regisration only in the central registry and not under the existing provincial legislation. I would, therefore, appreciate receiving your comments on the principle of the bill and whether or not you would be prepared to give the necessary co-operation to make such legislation effective.

I should point out that the Canadian bar association is already on record with resolutions supporting the principle of a central aircraft registry. The international air transport association also supports the principle of such a registry, and is, in fact, setting up a study group in conjunction with other organizations to bring in recommendations on this matter. The bill is based on the central aircraft registry provisions named in the United States federal aeronautics act.

I should emphasize that, being a private member's bill, the only discussions will be on the principle of the bill on second reading, but I am hopeful that by bringing it forward for public discussion in the house and indicating the amount of support that is behind the creation of such a registry, the government will give more serious consideration to bringing in the necessary legislation for the establishment of such a registry.

It was interesting to go through some of the replies I received, and I am sure the hon. members will be interested in obtaining this information.

I start out in the far west, in my own province of British Columbia, with the letter I received from Mr. Bonner, the attorney general, dated May 8, 1961 which reads as follows:

Further to my secretary's letter of April 25th, I wish to say that the departmental committee has drawn to my attention certain points which I think you might wish to examine in connection with your proposed bill affecting aircraft registry. For example, section 27 of your bill purports to prohibit the operation or navigation of any aircraft that is not eligible for registration, and it appears that to be eligible for registration the aircraft must be owned by a Canadian citizen. The bill has been examined to see whether, for instance, a major American air line might be exempted from that provision, but no such exception has been included.

If you agree with this interpretation, does it truly represent the policy you would wish to see endorsed?

Second, the registration system proposed by the bill establishes no priority between encumbrancers as a result of registration dates. While there is nothing to be criticized with regard to such a system if it is well and widely understood, encumbrancers having registered charges under present provincial systems here may have a valid objection if the protection that they have gained by taking advantage of provincial legislation to be removed because of the establishment of a central registry such as you proposed.

I should like your reaction to these observations before I attempt to discuss the bill with my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I think the objections raised in that letter in connection with the second matter are valid. I might say that I hoped to receive this type of reply to my letters. I think however that objection has been effectively answered by referring to a paper presented by Mr. David I. Johnston, a member of the Quebec bar to the annual meeting of the Quebec branch of the Canadian bar association in 1959. That paper is entitled "Some Legal Aspects of Financing Aircraft Purchases," and at page 14 there appears the following statement:

The matter of the seniority inter se of liens and other security interests in aircraft would appear to be a subject for federal legislation once the registry is established. The unsatisfactory alternative would be to leave an area of uncertainty until the courts evolve a priority of liens from the various provincial statutes and precedents.

Then he draws attention to a proposed revision of section 503 of the United States civil aeronautics act establishing the following ranking:

1. Court costs
2. Storage, material men's and repair men's liens
3. Recorded security interests
4. Government tax and penalty liens
5. Unrecorded security interests

As between two liens of the same class, priority would be determined upon a common law time-right basis.

I would suggest such a provision included in the present legislation would clear up the difficulties raised by the attorney general of British Columbia.

The next letter to which I should like to refer is a reply from the Hon. E. Manning, attorney general of the province of Alberta, dated April 24, 1961 which reads as follows:

I am in receipt of your letter of April 6th together with a copy of Bill No. C-37.

In this province as you are no doubt aware, we have a central registry in relation to aircraft which seems to be working out quite satisfactorily.

In so far as this province is concerned, we have had no request for a central aircraft registry applicable to the whole of the dominion and I am not prepared to make any comments on the proposal outlined in Bill No. C-37.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that by drawing the attention of the house to some of the unfavourable as well as the favourable comments that interested individuals in the various provinces will contact the various attorneys general to indicate support for this legislation.

The next reply to which I would like to refer is from the attorney general of Manitoba, the Hon. Sterling R. Lyon dated June 2, 1961, which reads as follows:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 6, 1961, relative to the registration of title to aircraft, etc. I much regret that, due to the fact that your letter was received during the session of the legislature and to pressure of other matters since, I have been unable to reply earlier.

I am personally in accord with your view that any really practicable system of registration of aircraft should be established by act of parliament. I would think, from consideration of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Johannesson v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul (1952) I, S.C.R. 292, that there is no doubt that parliament, if deemed advisable, may properly enact such legislation.

I agree that to make any such legislation fully effective, it would be necessary to enact complementary provincial legislation forbidding registration of aircraft under provincial statutes. It seems to me that, in so far as Manitoba is concerned, this might be achieved simply by amending the definition of "chattels" in clause (b) of subsection (1) of section 2 of the bills of sale act, so as to exclude aircraft or parts thereof, in a manner similar to that in which ships registered under the Canada Shipping Act or the merchants shipping act, 1894 (Imperial), are excluded.

If the parliament of Canada should pass legislation that appears to me to achieve the purposes mentioned in your letter, I would be prepared to canvass this matter among those interested in our province and, subject to there being reasonable evidence of support among aircraft owners and others affected here, to recommend to the executive council of Manitoba that a bill for the required complementary legislation above mentioned be considered for enactment.

This one is more favourable than those from some of the other attorneys general.

Then we pass on to the province of Ontario. The Hon. Kelso Roberts, the attorney general, wrote to me as follows, and made what I thought was an excellent suggestion.

With reference to your letter of the 6th of April, 1961, which was referred by me on its receipt to Mr. Elliott R. Pepper, Q.C., departmental counsel, for study.

Mr. Pepper in return discussed it with the deputy attorney general and they feel that this is a question which might well be discussed by the uniformity commissioners composed, as you are no doubt aware, of the deputy attorneys general of all provinces and certain other personnel, and which committee meets for one week immediately prior to the week of the Canadian bar association annual meeting. This year the commissioners will be meeting in Regina.

You might consider it advisable to discuss the matter with the Minister of Justice and if you both feel that this procedure is advisable I am sure that the Minister of Justice can arrange to have the matter placed on the agenda for discussion by the commissioners this summer.

I might say for the benefit of the house that I have written such a letter to the Minister of Justice drawing the matter to his attention.

The next reply that I received was from the assistant deputy attorney general of the province of Quebec. In that letter dated April 27, 1961, he wrote to me as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am directed by the honourable the attorney general to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 6th instant concerning the establishment of a central aircraft registry.

We understand that pursuant to section IV of the Aeronautics Act, the registration of aircrafts is actually a matter of regulations made by the Minister of Transport.

With regard to this particular suggestion, with respect, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I think the former minister of transport has indicated quite clearly that the regulations cannot be utilized to extend them to the extent that the assistant deputy attorney general suggests.

It may seem like this is a political tour of the provinces, but the next letter is from the attorney general of the province of New Brunswick, the Hon. Louis J. Robichaud, who wrote me as follows:

Dear Mr. Drysdale:

I wish to acknowledge with thanks your letter of April 6th enclosing copy of Bill No. C-37, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

There is no legislation in this province having specific reference to the title to and encumbrances against aircraft.

I would prefer not to comment on the merits of the bill at this time.

With regard to the other attorneys general, I sent follow-up notes to see if I could get some comments from them because I feel that this particular suggested legislation is sufficiently important to justify a completely thorough review of the assistance their answers would provide.

I should now like to turn very briefly, if I may, to the international aspects of this particular legislation. As I indicated in the explanatory notes to the bill, I was interested in having a central registry to comply with the provisions of the convention on the international recognition of rights in aircraft.

Perhaps, because not all hon. members are familiar with this particular piece of legislation, I should put it in a very brief summary. I would commend to the house the source material which I have used which is an historical survey of the law of flight put out by the institute of air and space law, McGill University, Montreal, 1961.

The objectives are set out on page 38 of this survey as follows:

The general objective of the convention—

This is the one that I have already referred to sometimes called the Geneva convention, or the mortgage convention.

The general objective of this convention is the facilitation of the financing of aircraft employed in international carriage. More specifically, the objectives can be said to be four: the protection of secured creditors who lend money on the security of aircraft; the protection of third parties dealing in or with aircraft against hidden charges; the definition and protection of "privileged" and "priority" claims against aircraft; and the facilitation of the transfer of aircraft from one nationality to another.

To achieve these objectives, the convention could have taken one of two forms. It could have created a standard form of mortgage and transfer for use in all contracting states, having uniform effect in all jurisdictions, or it could have provided for the recognition and enforcement by contracting states of any type of charge created in accordance with the law of the state in which the aircraft is registered as to nationality. Unfortunately, the first solution proved unattainable. The divergence in national conceptions proved too great at the time for an adequate compromise standard to be reached. Thus, the convention became a convention not of unification but of recognition.

An attempt was then made to produce an internationally acceptable form of words to cover all the types of charges on aircraft or, more accurately, rights in aircraft to be recognized by contracting states. This was found to be impossible and so an enumeration of four types of rights was resorted to. These are rights of property in aircraft; rights to acquire aircraft by purchase coupled with possession of the aircraft; rights to possession of aircraft under leases of six months or more; mortgages, hypotheques and similar rights in aircraft which are contractually created as security for payment of an indebtedness.

The United States has ratified this particular convention and I would suggest that it would be in the interest of Canada, first of all giving support and recognition to ICAO, which has its headquarters in Montreal, and also giving support to this particular convention, for it is only by establishing a central registry that we will be in a position to ratify this very important convention.

Perhaps I can close, Mr. Speaker, by summarizing very briefly. There is every indication of a widespread interest in aviation and financial circles for the creation of such an aircraft registry. I have pointed out quite clearly that the federal government has the legislative power, which is backed up by the case law and also by the acknowledgment of the former minister of transport.

I indicated earlier that, so far as the provinces are concerned you should not have the situation of duplicate legislation. Without provincial co-operation, they will be free to insist that the title to mortgages, conditional sales agreements, and so forth, be registered in the provinces in addition to the central registry. I have tried to set up discussion machinery to meet this particular point by communicating with the various attorneys general.

I would recommend, sir, that two or three steps be considered. The first step would be, I think, that there would have to be reference to the uniformity commissioners at the meeting of the deputy attorneys general in Regina to get the necessary support of the various provinces. Perhaps the most effective way of doing this would be for the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Transport to present draft legislation perhaps modeled on the legislation I have already proposed in Bill No. C-37.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the sponsor of this bill although I had some difficulty in hearing many of the things he said. I listened with keen interest for a time, and then I got lost when he put on the record so much correspondence between himself and the former minister of transport and then between himself and the attorneys general. I am sure that what I have said thus far will not indicate to him that I am being unfair to the bill.

I have looked at the bill, sir, and I have certain doubts about it which I think should be emphasized to the house at this time. The purpose of Bill No. C-37 as outlined in the explanatory note is to provide a central Canadian aircraft registry, preferably in Ottawa—I think the hon. member said in Ottawa—in order to record title to and all encumbrances against Canadian civil aircraft. Two or three queries come to my mind as I read the explanatory note.

The first has to do with jurisdiction. I have some doubts in my mind whether an enactment of this kind would be intra vires of the parliament of Canada. It is true that the former minister of transport in his letter to the hon. member indicated, I believe, that there was no objection from that standpoint but nevertheless I should like to bring to the attention of the house the fact that in the new section 26(1) the bill deals with (a) any conveyance which affects the title to, or any interest in, any civil aircraft; (b) any lease, and any mortgage, contract of conditional sale or other instrument and (c) any lease, and any mortgage, contract of conditional sale or other instrument, with certain other qualifications. This immediately leads me to the point whether or not this does not invade the field of property and civil rights.

I should like to bring this fact to the attention of the house. At one stage parliament gave the Minister of Transport authority to amend the Aeronautics Act so as to cover the zoning of airports and the zoning regulations had to be drafted very carefully so that they would not impinge in any way upon municipal jurisdiction. In fact, the first draft came very close to that and, if I remember correctly, the regulations had to be redrafted on one if not on two different occasions.

That is what strikes me about this bill as I look at it. In order not to impede the legislation in any way, may I tell the hon. member at once that I have not risen to oppose the bill. I wish to raise certain doubts that are in my mind about its validity.

The first point that I raise is that this is special legislation and legislation of this character should be very carefully worded because, as I said earlier, it might well impinge upon the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: Would he agree with the principle of the bill, the establishment of a central registry? I must confess that I am not entirely happy with many of the words myself that involve details but I am interested in whether or not he is in accord with the principle of the legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: I should have liked to come to that a little later but if my friend wants an answer now may I say that I would prefer to take the position taken by the Quebec branch of the Canadian bar association, which my hon. friend seemed to think indicated approval. As I heard him read the recommendation it was to the effect that the Quebec branch of the Canadian bar association recommends continuing interest in this bill and further recommends that it be referred to the appropriate committee for study, or words to that effect. I can see absolutely nothing the matter with that kind of resolution and I would go all the way in supporting it.

Mr. Drysdale: May I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that they did not disapprove of the principle of a central aircraft registry. They may have had some reservations as to the wording of the bill, which was taken, quite frankly, from the United States legislation, but they did not disapprove of the principle.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not even want to go that far until I knew more about the position, and I will tell the hon. member why. If it is so, as I fear, that the bill might be an impingement upon the right of a province to have registered within the province a conveyance, a chattel mortgage, although as the hon. member rightly said there are no chattel mortgages in the province of Quebec, a lease, a mortgage and so on, I would not in that event give the bill approval in principle.

That is why I think we should have two things so far as this bill is concerned. First, as is customary we should have the opinion of the minister. What does the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) think about this legislation? Second, we should be informed whether or not the Minister of Transport has submitted the bill to the Department of Justice to ascertain whether or not it is an infringement of property and civil rights.

When the hon. member posed his question I was going to discuss another matter, the ability or facility of the Department of Transport to administer legislation of this kind. Can it be done? Can it be done easily or can it be done only with great difficulty? These are questions on which I think we require enlightenment from the Department of Transport.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: Does he feel that there would be more difficulty in the administration of this legislation than with regard to the present shipping registry provisions which are under the Department of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: I think there would be a great deal more than in the case of the present shipping registration.

Mr. Drysdale: Why?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not see any difficulty with regard to the present shipping registry. During all the time that I was on that side of the house acting in the capacity of the present Minister of Transport I never had any complaint so far as the registry of ships was concerned. There may have been some since. After having looked at these various sections, particularly 26 and 27, I think there would likely be greater difficulty in administration. I am not saying that it is not feasible or possible. What I am saying is that on the face of the bill and without knowing more about it than I do it would strike me that it would be rather difficult to administer this kind of legislation.

All these doubts might disappear if the bill were referred to a committee for study and the committee heard evidence from the various persons concerned, particularly from the officials of the Department of Transport. I should like to know what the officials, particularly the legal advisers and the heads of the various aviation divisions of the department, think about this legislation.

I would not want the hon. member to feel that I rose for the purpose of opposing the bill because I know he has put a lot of time and effort into its preparation. That can be seen from the lengthy correspondence which he put on the record and which it will be possible to read carefully tomorrow or later. But before giving my support to the bill, and I speak now only for myself, I would want to know, first, whether it is intra vires of the parliament of Canada, second, whether it can be easily administered and, third, whether it is special legislation. In order to get answers to these three questions I think the minister should be here to tell us how he and those with whom he is associated in the department view this legislation. Until then I would rather reserve my comments.

Mr. Drysdale: May I ask the hon. gentleman one question before he sits down, and that is in connection with the question of the legislation being intra vires the powers of parliament?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: The former minister of transport, as I indicated, had received an opinion from the justice department indicating that this was intra vires the powers of the federal government. In addition, I might also say to the hon. member that all the authorities that I have seen that have been actively associated with the field of air law and interested in this particular type of legislation, have given the opinion based on these two cases that it was intra vires. I wonder if the hon. member has any specific instances going in the contrary direction because if there are it would be helpful to know about them in overcoming this difficulty. I have not seen any, and I was wondering if the hon. member had seen any.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing first with the former minister's opinion, it is my belief the minister was giving his personal opinion only to the hon. member who introduced this bill. He was not speaking as the minister for the department. While he did say that he had consulted his officers, I think the proper method by which to obtain an opinion as to whether legislation is intra vires of parliament is to get it from the Department of Justice. This, the minister did not do.

Mr. Drysdale: I want to correct that statement. The minister did obtain an opinion from the Department of Justice, and then passed on that opinion in his letter. He had obtained it from the Department of Justice because I had raised the question in previous correspondence.

Mr. Chevrier: I had not understood that to be the case as the hon. member read his letter. However, I shall read the letter tomorrow. None the less, I think we should have a repetition of that statement by the present minister because, after all, the former minister is no longer the minister and no longer responsible for the administration of the department.

The hon. member wanted to know if I knew of any case in which there was some doubt or hesitation about a matter such as this, because, after all, we could probably conciliate the two views. Yes, I do, and I did mention it a moment ago in connection with the zoning regulations. The zoning regulations came very nearly to impinging on provincial jurisdiction. I say now that these had to be drafted and redrafted on several occasions because as they were worded and as they were drafted in the first instance they seemed to many of us who were lawyers to be an infringement of provincial jurisdiction. This is the question mark I have in my mind at the moment, that this might well be an impingement upon the rights of the provinces in the field of property and civil rights.

As a result of the doubt which I have in my mind, and which with all respect to the former minister of transport, I still have, I raised these queries and thought that perhaps the best thing to do under the circumstances would be to refer the bill to a committee where the officers of the department as well as the Department of Justice could give their views on the validity of the legislation.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that are left I should like to place a few of my views on the record. I listened most intently to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale). He is certainly to be congratulated upon having done a monumental job. If it had not been for the rules of the house I think he would have achieved an even more monumental accomplishment by talking out his own bill. He has given a true evaluation of this bill in that he has said it is the most important enactment to be brought before this house as a private member's bill. I will agree with him, perhaps, with the exception of three or four bills which stand in my name.

It may be that the information he has put on the record, not only as a result of his own research but also the letters directed to the various attorneys general of the provinces with whom he has corresponded, will give valuable information to the Department of Transport and the Department of Justice. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have not the faintest idea which particular department should look after this matter. However, whichever department does, there will be information on the record for their guidance. I was rather struck by the extent to which an hon. member will go in trying to bring out points in favour of his bill. I do recognize, Mr. Speaker, that I seconded this bill but I did so only for the purpose of bringing it before the house. I did not want the house to act in the same manner as the other place where hon. members' bills have died because no one would bring them before the other place. I think every member has a right to have his bill come before the house at the proper time and receive full consideration.

The hon. member made a great point of the mobility of airplanes. He did point out that we have registries in the various provinces for motor vehicles. Not being a lawyer, I somehow assumed the motorcar to be almost equal in mobility to that of the airplane, that what would apply to one vehicle would apply to the other. He also pointed out the dollar value of the sales of airplanes, some $200 million in Canada. He said he was relying on his memory for this figure, but it does seem to be a good, round sum. However, I would suspect that the greater part of it is made up of sales of commercial airplanes. I cannot see anybody running away with a Viscount or a DC-8. It seems to me that if you took out the sales of commercial planes, this figure would drop down to a point where, although not insignificant, it would not be of the major importance the hon. member has tried to make it appear.

Mr. Drysdale: It includes commercial aircraft.

Mr. Broome: That is what I say; a central registry of commercial aircraft is not going to be of much value—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is my duty to do so, it being six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, before asking the minister for the business of the house, I should like to remind him that he has been asking those of us who sit on this side for co-operation in the last few days, and even for some time prior to that. We have been giving it to him. I should like to suggest to him that it would be much easier for all concerned if he could indicate clearly what the business of the house is going to be, what the government proposes to do tomorrow and for the whole of next week as well.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that there is a general desire to expedite the business of the house at this time of year. However, it has not been possible to get full agreement on all matters. There has been an understandable difference of opinion between this side of the house and the other side as to what should be proceeded with on a particular day.

However, it is fairly clear now that if it is the desire of the house to adjourn soon and reassemble later in the fall, certain matters should be completed within the next few days if at all possible so that we leave things in good order during a short recess.

Under the circumstances, we intend tomorrow, Saturday, to take the estimates of the departments of public works, forestry, defence production and health and welfare. If good progress is made with these departments, we could make a start on national revenue.

On Monday and Tuesday we have available for consideration Bill No. C-92 which has come back from the Senate with a proposed amendment. That is the capital murder bill. Then the Excise Act, the Customs Tariff Act, the Industrial Development Bank Act, the Excise Tax Act and the C.N.R. financing resolution to be followed by an appropriation bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Those latter items have not come from the Senate?

Mr. Churchill: No, just the first one that I mentioned. On the order paper there is also the Civil Service Act with which the house might wish to deal in view of the lengthy discussion it has had in committee. Then there is the Bank of Canada Act to be considered, the Customs Tariff Act which has been returned from the Senate—that is Bill No. C-72—and the final act following the budget, the Income Tax Act. Then there would be some supplementary estimates and interim supply to be considered before an adjournment.

Mr. Benidickson: It looks like September.

Mr. Churchill: There is a possibility of the dominion-provincial tax sharing arrangements resolution being considered by the house, if it is agreeable.

I will announce tomorrow the exact order of those items on Monday and Tuesday, but of those items there is one, the Bank of Canada Act, which will definitely come up on Tuesday. That is the business, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the house leader will remember that the Prime Minister has repeatedly stated that estimates would not be taken up on Saturday.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Benidickson: The house leader said that last night.

Mr. Chevrier: When there was a discussion of the motion to extend the hours it was clearly stated that we would not have estimates on Saturday, and again last night. The question was put to the house leader by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as reported at page 7298 of Hansard:

> Would the minister say whether this program will go on for Saturday as well or could he indicate what would be happening on Saturday?
> Mr. Benidickson: Will estimates be taken on Saturday?
> Mr. Churchill: No—

An hon. Member: That was last night.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a categorical statement that estimates would not be taken on Saturday.

Mr. Benidickson: I didn't think so, at this late stage of the session.

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of matters which could be disposed of and in which the opposition would be quite willing to co-operate in so far as legislation is concerned. The house leader mentioned the agreement—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think a word of explanation is required. When I said last night that estimates would not be taken up on Saturday I was under the impression at that time that we would be able to go ahead with certain of the bills following the budget. But there was no agreement to that course whatsoever when the discussion was held this morning.

The second point is that on April 24 when the Prime Minister was discussing the lengthening of the hours he made a definite commitment which I should have remembered at that time. The Prime Minister said that Saturdays would be set aside for dealing with the supply of various departments. These are his exact words, as reported at page 3928 of Hansard:

> On Saturdays various departments could be dealt with. I would not want to see controversial measures dealt with on Saturdays—

In view of that commitment, it seems wise to proceed with the discussion of estimates tomorrow.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, will the house leader not consider the advisability of proceeding tomorrow with a bill of immediate urgency and importance, the Bank of Canada Act, so that we can deal with that at once, because the Minister of Finance stressed last Monday how important it is to get this through with a minimum of delay; that it involved what he called a crisis.

Mr. Churchill: I can understand the desire of the opposition to proceed with that particular bill. I wish they had shown the same desire with regard to the bills that followed the budget and we perhaps might have come to some agreement with regard to a legislative program on Saturday.

Mr. Pickersgill: We did.

Mr. Churchill: That agreement was not reached and therefore I think we had better keep to the commitment made by the Prime Minister on April 24 to reserve Saturdays for the discussion of estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I asked for the business of the house last night and I clearly understood that the minister gave us an assurance that the estimates would not be taken on Saturday. There was no qualification of that whatsoever. When the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked: "Will estimates be taken on Saturday?" the minister said, "No", and he made no qualification of that.

Mr. Benidickson: And he referred to interim supply for a two-month period.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might add that when the Prime Minister asked for our co-operation last Monday he indicated clearly what measures would have to be passed before we adjourned, and he did not include any estimates in that group. This is a repudiation both of what the Prime Minister said on Monday and of the express word of the house leader given to me last night.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West should speak before the minister.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I support wholeheartedly the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition and the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In this respect we are two parties with one objective, to conclude the work of this session as soon as possible.

Mr. Benidickson: This government is leaderless. They have not even got their bills before us on tax matters.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Churchill: In the opinion of certain members of the young Liberals association it may soon be one party. What I said yesterday was this:

> The intention will be to complete, in so far as we can, the resolutions and the bills following the budget.

That was for today:

> If the house passes the resolutions tomorrow,—

That is, Friday:

> —as has now been indicated, then of course, I think the bills would normally follow on Saturday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Churchill: It was then that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised a very serious objection, and I said after he raised this objection:

> —and the bills on Monday?

That was apparently what he wanted, whereas we wanted to have the tax bills on Saturday. Without the agreement that is necessary we might just as well follow the course that has been followed now for the last several weeks and keep to the commitment made on April 24 that estimates be taken on Saturday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this measure and the attempt we are all making to finish the business of the session at this stage, I ask the Minister of Finance does he not think, in view of the statements he has made regarding the importance of the Bank of Canada Act, that he owes to the house and to the country an explanation for the postponement that he and the government have authorized with regard to this matter? This puts the minister in a most humiliating position and he owes the nation an explanation.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the discussion of the business of the house is now taking the form of a debate. If the Minister of Finance does not wish to reply, I will leave the chair and adjourn the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Just a big majority steamrolling; that is all it is.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FLOUR GIFT TO CHILE, 1960

Question No. 255—Mr. Argue:

1. Was Canadian flour made available free of charge to the government of Chile in 1960 for the relief of disaster victims?
2. If so: (a) what was the amount involved? (b) what was the total cost to Canada?
3. Have any reports been noted by the Canadian embassy in Chile to the effect that: (a) this flour was being trafficked for political purposes instead of being given free to disaster victims; (b) a prominent Chilean politician has been arrested for allegedly dealing in Canadian flour?
4. If so, has the Canadian government made any representations?
5. If so, what are their nature?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. (a) 9,832 long tons. (b) $999,864.48.

3. (a) There were such reports in some newspapers but to the best of our knowledge they are not accurate and were refuted by the government. (b) It has been reported that Mr. S. C. Gonzales was arrested for falsely accusing the government of malpractice.

4. No.

5. Not applicable.

M. C. CAIN FOODS COMPANY—INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK LOAN

Question No. 275—Mr. Herridge:

1. Has the M. C. Cain Foods Company, Limited, of East Florenceville, N.B., obtained a loan from the industrial development bank?
2. If so: (a) when (b) what amount (c) under what terms of repayment (d) what is the present status of this loan?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1 and 2. It is contrary to public policy to reveal information regarding individual loans.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, July 1, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

DOMINION DAY

94TH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this Dominion day, the 94th anniversary of founding the nation, before we proceed with consideration of today's business may I invite hon. members to pause and pay tribute to the fathers of confederation whose faith and prophetic insight brought this nation into being?

Federation was a prerequisite to the national development of Canada, and the maintenance of national unity remains the key to its destiny. I know there are some who feel a sense of embarrassment in expressing pride in their nation, perhaps because of the fear that they might be considered old fashioned or parochial. I do not belong to that group. I realize that a warped and twisted nationalism is productive of tyranny and war, but that a healthy loyalty and devotion to one's country constitutes a most fruitful inspiration in life.

While our nation had its beginning in two great races today we can take pride in the fact it is now the debtor to many ethnic groups. Six years from today we shall be observing the centennial of confederation. I think it is timely that on today's Votes and Proceedings notice is given of a resolution to precede a bill respecting observance of the centennial, to authorize the establishment of a national centennial administration in cooperative form, to plan and prepare projects and programs to be undertaken by the government of Canada in order to mark the centennial, and to provide also for the establishment of a national conference on the centennial which will constitute a forum for consideration by both governmental and non-governmental representatives.

Today in celebrating this day by carrying on our duties as public servants we do our part to help achieve the highest ideals of the fathers who made this nation possible. After the Leader of the Opposition and a representative of the third party have spoken their words regarding this day, I suggest that the house then rise and sing O Canada and God Save the Queen.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure there is no one in this house who has any fear or hesitation in expressing his pride in our country in its growth and development in the last 94 years. I am sure we all feel that a healthy nationalism is the foundation of that growth and development. This is our 94th birthday. It reminds us, as the Prime Minister pointed out, that in six years we shall be celebrating our centennial. Our country is growing older in years and I hope in wisdom and maturity as well. This is the day of the year when we assess the past and, if we are wise, in terms of the present and of the future. We can take pride in that past and from it resolve to play our part so as to make the future worthy of it and of those great men whom we honour today who founded and helped to build our nation.

We must then work together, as indeed we are working here in parliament today, on Dominion day, to do our part to make our country great in strength and unity, a unity which is not uniformity or centralization and a strength which is more than gross national production.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, being somewhat of an ancient in years I am inclined to think of the past on these occasions. Looking at the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) I recall very vividly that 47 years ago he and I celebrated July 1 in a little village in my constituency known as Nakusp, on the occasion of the opening of the Nakusp-Kaslo railroad. Forty-four years ago today I was in a hospital after being knocked about a bit, and that was the first occasion that I was particularly conscious of my pride in being a Canadian. I suppose it was principally on account of being away from Canada at that time and its associations.

Today the great majority of Canadians will celebrate Dominion day as our national holiday. We trust they all enjoy themselves. However, on behalf of this group I do want to say we are of the opinion that we are not setting a good example in the recognition of this national holiday by parliament sitting today; not because we would not be willing to sit and undertake the business of the country, but we think in the first instance it is a poor example, and in the second instance it is unfair to the staff of parliament. I trust that in future years this matter will receive serious consideration, so that all Canadians will have the opportunity to celebrate Dominion day.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang O Canada and God Save the Queen.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1962, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Fifth report of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Macnaughton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KUWAIT—STATEMENT ON ACTION BEING TAKEN BY U.K. GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will have heard news reports of the latest developments in Kuwait. This potentially serious situation has arisen as a result of the claim of Iraq that Kuwait forms part of the territory of Iraq. This claim, of course, is contested by the government of Kuwait, which is a sovereign and independent state and which, in order to safeguard its security and independence, has requested assistance from the United Kingdom government under an agreement concluded between the two countries on June 19, the date on which the former treaty of protection ceased to have effect.

Prime Minister Macmillan has been in touch with me and has explained the circumstances in which the United Kingdom government has felt obliged to honour its commitment to the ruler of Kuwait by acceding to his appeal for assistance. He has informed me of the steps which the United Kingdom government is taking, and also that a report on these steps is being made to the United Nations at once. Indeed, the government of the United Kingdom has asked that the security council be convened today. Mr. Macmillan has made it clear that the purpose of the action taken is to discourage any attempt to interfere with the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait.

Early this morning I sent word to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that in the difficult circumstances of this situation I believed that he could not have done otherwise than respond to the appeal of the ruler, and welcomed the United Kingdom government's action in reporting to the United Nations the steps which it is taking. I also assured him that our representatives at the United Nations would do their best to be of assistance in any way open to them in that organization.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has rightly referred to this situation as a serious one. Indeed, it is a threat to peace. I suggest that the principle upon which action should be based is the principle embodied in the charter of the United Nations. This is more than a principle; it is an obligation on all of us to resist collectively any aggression wherever it may appear. I hope this resistance will not be required because I hope no such aggression will take place.

It is good to hear from the Prime Minister that the matter has been referred to the United Nations, and we on this side certainly support the stand that has been taken by Canada in reply to the message received from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The members of this group are particularly glad and interested to know that the Prime Minister of Canada is being kept informed by the Prime Minister of Great Britain with regard to this serious situation. We appreciate the Prime Minister informing the house of developments at the first opportunity. We are glad to know of Canada's co-operation, concern and interest, and also that the matter has been referred to the United Nations.

CANADA COUNCIL

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the annual report of the Canada Council for 1960-61, in English. I am informed by the director of the Canada Council that the French copy is not yet available. He states, among other things, that he had hoped the French version would be available when the tabling of the report took place. He offers no criticism whatever of the translation bureau and merely assumes that the pressure of work there has made it impossible to get the report translated. As soon as the French version is available it will be tabled.

FREIGHT RATES

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL SUSPENDING INCREASES ON GRAIN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table order in council No. 1961-958, dated yesterday, which continues until December 31 of this year the action of the order in council passed in March of this year suspending increase on freight rates on grain for export shipped by rail from Georgian bay and related ports to Quebec and maritime ports.

Increases in these "at and east rates", as they are called, were originally filed by the railways to take effect at the beginning of this year. The board of transport commissioners deferred the effective date of the increases by their order No. 103860 of February 23, and reduced the amount of such increases. Appeals against these increases were made both by eastern and western interests affected. The government deferred the coming into effect of the increased rates pending consideration of these appeals, and gave the railways an opportunity to answer the arguments of the appellants.

The government has now decided that a further deferment of the coming into effect of these rates is required in the public interest. In the meantime further study will be given to the rather complicated arguments involved, and account will be taken of other influences now affecting freight rates.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-118, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

He said: Pursuant to the resolutions which were reported out of the committee of ways and means yesterday and adopted by the house, I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PINE POINT RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the house leader whether we might have first reading of the Pine Point railway bill so we may be in a position to study it during the week end?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I was not certain that the hon. member for Laurier wanted to proceed so rapidly with the Pine Point railway legislation, but we will take his suggestion into consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Could we get it so we could spend the rest of the day and Sunday on it?

Mr. Churchill: I am sure the hon. member will spend the rest of the day and Sunday in other ways.

Mr. Pickersgill: The bill is not drafted yet.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the bill?

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the leader of the house, and ask him if the Pine Point railway bill is, in effect, ready?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): With regard to all bills the practice is to present them at the time the government decides it is proper to present them. That will be done and it applies with respect to the Pine Point railway bill and any other bill to come before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Then could I ask the Prime Minister whether the agreement referred to in the resolution which appeared on the order paper yesterday among the Canadian National Railways, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada and the Pine Point Mines Limited has been negotiated and signed by the parties involved in this bill.

Mr. Churchill: This question might have been asked yesterday when the Minister of Transport was here. Perhaps the matter could be raised later when the Minister of Transport is present.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the government not know?

Mr. Chevrier: Surely the Prime Minister ought to be in a position to know whether the agreement has been negotiated, because I presume the resolution was based on the agreement.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising to complain about the sufficiency of the answer, which is not in accordance with the practice.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention that this is a matter of privilege affecting all hon. members, namely whether or not the resolution which was discussed yesterday was based upon an agreement. I think the house is entitled to know as a matter of privilege whether the resolution was introduced in the house (1) before the bill was ready and (2) before the agreement between the parties was signed.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think a question of privilege is raised. Undoubtedly the hon. member is correct in saying that the house is entitled to know, in the regular way, but it does not seem to me that a matter of privilege is raised.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Surely an hon. member is entitled to ascertain from the government whether or not its legislation is ready.

Mr. Speaker: That question has been answered.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has been raised but not fully dealt with. My hon. friend is entitled to ask whether the legislation is ready. If the government says the legislation is not ready then, of course, the opposition is entitled to draw its conclusions. We can only conclude that the legislation is not ready, and this is a further indication—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to draw whatever conclusions he wishes, but he is not entitled to complain about the sufficiency of the answer, or to debate it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—VISIT BY INSPECTOR TO JEAN TALON HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I rose on a question of privilege and suggested that the Acting Minister of National Revenue make a full statement giving the house all the information which the law permitted him to give in connection with the visit of one of his inspectors to the Jean Talon hospital in Montreal relative to the Courtemanche matter. I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to make a statement.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): I made a complete statement to the house, Mr. Speaker, yesterday and the day before yesterday.

Mr. Chevrier: In that case I should like to direct a question to the minister and it is this. The minister told us yesterday and prior thereto that one inspector had gone to visit the hospital. However, the evidence is that two inspectors were sent. Is that a fact? If so, why were two inspectors sent?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I said an inspector made a visit to the hospital. As I understand it, there had been an inspector at one stage and a subsequent visit by another. This happens in many businesses. It is just routine procedure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give the name of the additional inspector or officer of the department who visited the hospital?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not know the name of the other inspector at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

POPULARITY OF ARTHUR MEIGHEN COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Will the minister inform the house whether there is any truth in a statement that appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette to the effect that the Arthur Meighen commemorative stamp is less popular than are other stamps in that class?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the purchase of any commemorative stamp is resisted by a percentage of our patrons. In the past I have referred to them as the dry tongue group, because they find the commemorative stamps usually are larger in size and somewhat more difficult to lick, and they prefer to use the normal queen size stamps. We therefore have some patrons who prefer not to purchase any commemorative stamp that is issued.

I inquired this morning after the newspaper story appeared; that was the first indication I had. In this particular case there is absolutely no evidence whatsoever that this stamp has been less popular than any other commemorative stamp that we have issued. As a matter of fact, those who are expert in the field of aesthetics have generally felt that this particular issue was the best of all the prime minister commemoratives we have done in so far as design and execution were concerned.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT RESPECTING LAUNDRY BLEACH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I draw one matter to the attention of the house. It has been my practice in connection with budget resolutions and bills to give the house as much notice as possible of any amendments that may be introduced. Hon. members may have observed that in the Votes and Proceedings for June 30, available this morning, I have given notice of a resolution to amend the schedule to Bill No. C-116 to amend the Customs Tariff. May I advise hon. members that this is the matter to which I referred in the budget speech at page 6654, where I stated as follows:

I might add that at the committee stage I hope to be in a position to introduce a supplementary resolution relating to sodium hypochlorite laundry bleach. This product was reclassified in consequence of a recent supreme court decision. However it would seem appropriate to restore and maintain the former rates of duty pending a report by the tariff board on this and other products included in the chemical reference. Accordingly we have initiated negotiations on the matter under the "special circumstances" clause of the GATT, and I expect that these negotiations will be completed in the very near future.

The bill was reported out of the committee at noon yesterday. I received a telegram yesterday afternoon notifying me of the conclusion of the GATT negotiations. That is the reason I at once gave notice, now produced in Votes and Proceedings, of the amendment which will ensue as a result of the conclusion of these GATT negotiations, and the consequent amendment of Bill No. C-116 which is standing for second reading.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CROP CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. In view of the welcome report of rain in the prairie provinces, I wonder if the minister could bring us up to date with regard to any recent developments in that region, particularly as to whether there has been any appreciable change in the crop situation having regard to that report. Could the minister tell us, further, whether he has any plans for meetings with provincial ministers to discuss the fodder situation on the prairies?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I think everyone in Canada will be pleased to hear that there has been some rain in western Canada in the last 24 hours. These rains were due to a stationary front over most of the northern part of the three prairie provinces. The southern parts of the provinces have not benefited to the same degree. There have been showers, and rainfall between .1 inch and .5 inch have been registered. This will mean that the pastures will be revived to some degree, and brings the hope that the crops can hang on for a few more days during which time further rain may come.

The three agriculture ministers of the prairie provinces and I will be meeting in Winnipeg tomorrow to work out details of a series of programs which we have in mind in case the situation should deteriorate to a disastrous extent.

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the reply given by the Minister of Agriculture to my earlier question I wonder if I might direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the indication that certain areas have not received their share of rain I wonder whether the government has given consideration to making another acreage payment to the prairie farmers.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Matters of government policy are not announced in anwer to questions on orders of the day, but in due course and at the appropriate time a statement in this connection may be made.

REPORTED FORECAST BY OFFICIALS OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture a question based on a report of Merrill W. Menzies, grain policy adviser to the Minister of Agriculture, and Frank Shefrin of the department's economic division? Has the minister seen the report which these two gentlemen have made to the effect that Canadian agriculture is in for hard times during the next ten years? Further, does this report represent the doom and gloom policy of the Department of Agriculture?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I have not seen the report, but I certainly knew of the material which would have gone into it. I think I could point out one very simple difference between this government and the previous government. This government makes up its mind to tell the farmers the truth, and does not continue a policy of deluding them into believing that everything is fine. In pursuance of this policy of telling farmers the truth we have started on a program—

Some hon. Members: Order.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I could direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour, or else to the Prime Minister, or to one of the other hon. gentlemen who may have knowledge of the subject. Could any information be given to the house with respect to the announced collapse of negotiations between the air line flight attendants association and Trans-Canada Air Lines yesterday or the day before?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): I shall take the question as notice and secure an answer for the hon. member.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC SERVICE

QUEBEC—REPORTED KICKBACKS TO FEDERAL EMPLOYEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to evidence given before the Salvas commission that a federal civil servant was in receipt of kickbacks? If so, does he propose to take any action in this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): That has not been drawn to my attention. However, I point out that wherever there is or has been wrongdoing, it will not be condoned in any way. That I want to make perfectly clear, whatever the identity of the wrongdoer may be.

(Translation):

PAID HOLIDAYS FOR PART TIME EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State? Has he reconsidered the request made by the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Lessard) to the effect that leave with pay be granted to part time employees?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): That question is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. However, I have taken note of the request made to me by the hon. member for St. Henry, and I also note that of the hon. member for St. Denis; I shall submit the whole matter to the cabinet.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Secretary of State indicate whether such a request was ever made in the past under the former Liberal administration?

Mr. Dorion: I cannot say, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question has historic interest rather than current urgency.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

VANCOUVER AIRPORT—USE OF U.S. CONSTRUCTION MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member for Vancouver South asked a question on June 27 in connection with the alleged dumping of gravel in British Columbia. I indicated at the time that I would look into the matter. Officials of the appraisers' branch of the department have now been asked to conduct an injury to ensure that importations of aggregate into Canada by Deeks-McBride Limited, Vancouver, B.C. from Friday Harbor and Stillicum in the state of Washington are made at values in accordance with the provisions of the Customs Act.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can say anything about the conclusion of the bilateral talks regarding disarmament discussion arrangements and, apparently, the decision to move those talks later to Moscow, I think, some time in the middle of July.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a final report as yet, but I think the intention was that talks would be conducted partially in Washington and partially in Moscow, and I would imagine that the next stage will be conducted in Moscow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is Canada being kept fully informed as to the nature of those discussions?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he is able now or will be able before the house adjourns to give us a progress report in respect to the negotiations with the government of Manitoba in relation to the Red river floodway, about which action was promised in the speech from the throne.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that discussions concerning the engineering aspects of the project are proceeding quite satisfactorily. There has been some information appearing in the Winnipeg press in this regard, and so far as I am aware everything is proceeding on schedule.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

374. Additional amount for housing research and community planning as contemplated by part V of the National Housing Act, 1954, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $585,900, $1,649,000.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to express our regret that we are taking up this particular vote at this particular time, because the two members of our party who are particularly concerned with public works were assured on the word of the leader of the house that we would not be dealing with estimates today, and are not in their seats for very good reasons. Unfortunately the minister saw fit to change the procedure at the last minute; therefore we are discussing these particular estimates at a time when we should be discussing bills, especially the most important bill before this house. I suggest this would be a good day to discuss it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pearson: That is why, Mr. Chairman, because of this last minute change in the arrangements made by the leader of the house—

Mr. Grafftey: You have no members in the committee anyway.

Mr. Pearson: It is because of this last minute alteration in the program as announced on Thursday night that the two members of this party who are particularly interested in public works are not in a position to discuss these estimates this morning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why are they not here?

Mr. Pearson: They are not here because they were told these estimates would not be discussed today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did the Leader of the Opposition tell them not to come today?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the Minister of Finance I should like to say that those two hon. members to whom I have referred are attending the national celebration of Dominion day in their constituencies because they were informed by the leader of the house that estimates would not be discussed today, and they unfortunately relied upon his word.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, but the house is sitting today.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I set the record straight last night when this matter was raised by the opposition, and the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition are not founded on fact at all. If he will read Hansard for yesterday, he will find out what the actual situation is. We attempted to make arrangements to go on with legislative items today and it was on that understanding that I said we would not be considering estimates today. However when that arrangement broke down, because the opposition would not agree, we had to decide to go ahead with estimates.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the house leader has said he attempted to make an arrangement to proceed with legislative items today. I suggest there is one piece of legislation before this house which could be very appropriately discussed now, this day being the anniversary of the bill of rights. Why are we proceeding with estimates? If the house leader tried to put legislative items before the house for today why does he not now proceed with that bill? We have asked for a discussion of this bill on the earliest possible date, and the Minister of Finance has said that this is a matter of crisis and that we should deal with it as quickly as possible. However, because of this sudden change we are now dealing with the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Just a lot of mock heroics from the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Chevrier: Bring on your bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do you not proceed with that item?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: What happened to the bill of rights?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Habel: Has the bill of rights already disappeared?

An hon. Member: You are making a farce of the bill of rights.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in respect to this—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I see the hon. member for Kootenay West and think he should have the floor.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. For a good number of years the city of Trail has been interested in an urban renewal scheme. At the time the Secretary of State for External Affairs was minister of public works he made it possible for a survey to be made of the whole situation through an appropriation from this department. Since that time the survey has been completed and the city of Trail has had a committee working on this question. That committee has negotiated with the Canadian Pacific Railway in respect to the removal of a section of track, and has had lengthy negotiations with provincial authorities. Trail is now prepared to proceed and is very anxious to obtain final endorsation of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in respect to this scheme.

To illustrate the concern which exists I should like to quote briefly from the Trail Times of Thursday, May 4, 1961 and specifically from an article appearing therein entitled "Federal Government Studying First Phase of Urban Renewal Scheme". That article reads in part as follows:

> First phase of Trail's urban renewal development, that of West Trail, now is in the hands of the federal government, Mayor Leslie Read told the retail section of the Trail chamber of commerce Wednesday night.
> "It has been there two weeks," he admitted. "One month is all the time we are going to give them. If there is no word by then we will press the matter."
> "To us," said the mayor, "urban renewal means a lot; and $1,100,000 is a lot of money to a city this size."

The article then continues as follows:

> In reviewing the history of urban renewal in Trail, Mayor Read told merchants that when he first came into office (1956) track removal problem was one of the major problems confronting the council.

Then the article continues as follows:

> Mayor Read said the B.C. government has approved the first phase and agreed to pay 25 per cent of the cost. Trail also pays 25 per cent and the federal government, if it approves the plan, pays 50 per cent.
> "We hope the federal government will understand our problem," continued the mayor. "If they reject the plan it means, then, that the onus would be on the provincial government to increase its share of the cost".

I raise this matter at the request of the local people because they are very interested in this problem. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs is also interested, because he was recently appointed the first freeman of Trail, and I congratulate him on that appointment and honour. I am not quite sure of the rights, responsibilities and privileges granted to freemen of a city in British Columbia, but I looked the matter up with respect to Great Britain and found that in Great Britain it is based on the honourary freedom of boroughs act of 1885, under which there are certain privileges. In some instances the freemen do not pay taxes; in others they are allowed to lead their cows in the city without any interference. In other instances they are responsible for the poor of the district. I am not quite sure what responsibilities the minister has assumed, but I congratulate him and I am sure he is as interested as any member in this house in this renewal problem in the city of which he has been appointed the first freeman.

Mr. Pearson: Since we are considering this particular item, and in view of what the house leader has just said, may I quote from page 7298 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Benidickson: Will estimates be taken on Saturday?
> Mr. Churchill: No.

Therefore, in order to consider Bill No. C-114 this day, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is a non-debatable motion.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the Leader of the Opposition the motion in writing?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Motion (Mr. Pearson) negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 73.

Mr. Pearson: I take it vote No. 374 would be concerned with urban renewal projects generally? Does the minister consider that the Red river flood project in Winnipeg, Manitoba, is an urban renewal project?

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: When this item was before the committee a couple of days ago I wanted to deal with the question of Indian houses and lending under the National Housing Act to Indian people for construction and reconstruction of houses.

Before I proceed, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might through you express to the minister my heartfelt appreciation and congratulations for having recognized the other day the contribution I make in the house, by his presentation of a statistical analysis of the various items raised. I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is equally appreciative of the fact that the minister thinks the hon. member is also an active, efficient and capable representative of his constituency. I am sure my own constituents will be gratified to know that I have been given the signal honour of such recognition by the Minister of Public Works.

Perhaps on balance, Mr. Chairman, one might be permitted to place on the record in a brief way some other statistics along the same line. I undertook to do a somewhat similar amount of work to that done by the Minister of Public Works. I discovered that of those members who support his particular party, there have been 16 who so far during this session have not uttered one single solitary word on anything except perhaps to make some cat-calls or interjections, which they are quite capable of doing from time to time. Therefore I wonder which is the worst, to be a silent rubber stamp of the government, which is what the minister—

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member have nothing to do with the item before the committee for consideration.

Mr. Howard: I was only following the practice engaged in by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who has indicated that he does not know what he is talking about. We find that there is no communion between the Prime Minister and the house leader with regard to the business of the house.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee has under consideration item 374, which reads:

Additional amount for housing research and community planning as contemplated by part V of the National Housing Act, 1954, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $585,900.

The hon. gentleman has been dealing with a matter having to do with the conduct of the business of the house which has already been disposed of by vote of the committee. His remarks are in no way related to the item under discussion. I would ask him to come back to the item, and to stay with it during the course of his remarks.

Mr. Howard: With deference, Mr. Chairman, I would point out to you that the committee decided nothing except that it would not rise and report progress. That was the motion before the committee. Long before the motion was moved by the Leader of the Opposition, he and other Liberal members, and government members as well, were allowed to engage in a discussion of whether this was the proper item to have before the committee. If, as you suggest, it is not proper for me to talk in this way—and I can appreciate that it is extremely embarrassing to the government to find out that members on this side of the house are placing less and less trust in what the government says about house business—then I will depart from that particular course and deal with what I intended to deal with, namely the question of housing loans for Indian people. I hope my remarks will prod some of the 30-odd silent Tory backbenchers into expressing their points of view about something from time to time.

Mr. Johnson: If the hon. member would dry up we would make some progress.

Mr. Grafftey: At least we are in the house.

Mr. Howard: There they go again, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend said if I would dry up we would make some progress. The point is, Mr. Chairman, that these interjections, which as you can appreciate are out of order, are the sole contribution that my hon. friends opposite have to make to debates. All this simply indicates that there are a number of members in the house who are willing to give the government a blank cheque, to let the government do as it pleases, and not concern themselves one bit with the welfare of the people.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Howard: I do not have that much faith in the government, either in this regard or with respect to many other matters.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would not follow your direction and discuss the item now before us. I should like to say a few things along the same lines as the hon. member's comments but it would not be in order. I would ask him to come back to the public works estimates.

An hon. Member: He has no brains.

Mr. Howard: Who is talking about brains?

Mr. Peters: He is sitting on his keeping them warm.

Mr. Howard: You see what happens, Mr. Chairman. Hon. members opposite say "Stay in order" and then they make these inane and asinine cat-calls and interjections which are completely out of order and made for the sole purpose of delay.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the record may I say that I made no interjection or cat-call except to ask the hon. member to come to order.

Mr. Howard: If the hat fits, pull it right down over your ears if you feel like it. The National Housing Act was amended in 1956 to provide that loans may be made to Indians for the purpose of building homes, and reconstructing and bringing homes up to date on Indian reserves, but so far no such loans have been made and I understand that no Indians have applied for loans. Without being derogatory in any way, I think we all agree that generally speaking the standard of homes on Indian reserves is not as high as in communities outside Indian reserves. I think this arises from a variety of reasons, economic, educational and others.

There is great need for an adequate home building program and adequate credit facilities for the Indian people in order that the homes they have at the moment may be brought up to a higher standard. Even though the National Housing Act was amended in 1956 to provide for the making of such loans to Indians, I think the reason no applications for loans have been made is simple. Indian land cannot be mortgaged. It is land held in trust by the crown for the Indian population and it cannot be mortgaged, attached or foreclosed in any way. I think this is the main reason the provision with respect to loans to Indians under the National Housing Act has had no beneficial effects. Their lands cannot be pledged as security, which is the normal basis for the securing of mortgages for the building of homes so far as other people are concerned.

I realize that this is an extremely complex matter and can be easily misunderstood, but I think what must be explored is the possibility of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation working in conjunction with the Indian affairs branch to develop a system of lending money to band councils on the basis of having the natural resources of the band mortgaged as security for the loans. In this regard I am thinking not of the land itself, which I do not think should be attached in any way, but rather of such things as the timber, oil or minerals on the land. If there was default in repayment these natural resources could be leased, sold or rented, as is now done by Indian bands in many instances, in order to recover the amount of any loan that was in default. In the process of relending the money borrowed under the National Housing Act the band council would be able to take as security from the individual band member that person's per capita share of the band fund and I think also the right to possess the property held by the individual Indian on the reserve in order that the band council might protect the resources of the band.

Unless we can do something of this nature I think the presence in the National Housing Act of a section authorizing loans to Indians will continue in the years to come to be of no use whatsoever, because at the moment there is no way in which Indian lands can be mortgaged. If this field has not already been explored I sincerely hope the minister will explore it fully and completely, to ensure the highest possible standard of homes for Indian people on reserves, and through this means attempt to see that the environmental factors of our Indians with respect to home conditions more closely approximate the environmental factors of those of us who are not Indians.

This would be another way of moving toward equality as between Indians and non-Indians. If investigation and study have already been made with regard to the matter of loans to Indians, I would appreciate it if the minister would indicate the results of these studies. On the other hand, if nothing definite has been done so far in this regard I am sure it would be a profitable field to explore, and would assist the Indian people immeasurably in increasing their standard of living.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this is a very important field, and I should like to inquire about two or three things. I am particularly interested in the minister's intentions with regard to the secondary mortgage field. The minister made a statement the other day with regard to five lots of mortgages that the government had decided to dispose of, and indicated that mortgages to the value of $2\frac{1}{2}$ million carrying an effective rate of interest of $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent had not been sold immediately. The minister may not have intended to do so, but I believe he indicated that these houses were in areas where it was difficult to interest private organizations in the buying of these mortgages. There was an indication at that time that perhaps some of these houses were in western Canada. I would not be particularly surprised to find that one of those lots of housing was in the uranium industry region of northern Ontario.

I believe this highlights one of the problems of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in that we have dealt with housing in a rather odd manner. I have always understood that the corporation was given a certain amount of money and that the government as they have done on several occasions, made large additional grants to the corporation with the idea that the money would be placed in a revolving fund for at least the term of the mortgages and that the amount would continue to grow. I was surprised to find that this is not the case.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, would my hon. friend be good enough to indicate to me how his question arises under item 374? The last member, who I understand is to engage in an all day filibuster supported by the hon. member who is speaking—I want the committee to make a note of that—did not touch upon the subject matter of item 374. Now the hon. member who has been speaking, and who is in collusion with the hon. member for Skeena to hold up the work of the committee for another day, should inform me what the question is which arises under item 374, and I would be happy to answer it. The reason I did not answer the hon. member for Skeena was that at no time during the half hour he took did he discuss item 374.

Mr. Howard: I would point out to the minister that he cannot see the clock. I was not more than five minutes.

Mr. Walker: I asked a question of the hon. member who is speaking. Are you just going to sit there? It is not within the purview of the hon. member for Skeena to intervene.

Mr. Howard: If I might have the floor, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have noticed in the Minister of Public Works a disposition to be everything—

Mr. Walker: I asked a question, Mr. Chairman, and I would be very happy to have it answered.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I agree that the minister asked a question of the hon. member for Timiskaming, and when I turned to again recognize that hon. member who had previously had the floor, I did not see him. I saw the hon. member for Skeena, and that was the only person I could see. There was no one else on his feet, so the hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Howard: I want to point out—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the hon. member proceeds, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that the Minister of Public Works made a remark about the Chair. He said, "Are you just sitting there"? I have observed the present chairman's conduct of our proceedings and I think it has been admirable from the time he first took the chair. I do not believe the Minister of Public Works was warranted in this slur which he cast.

Mr. Walker: I, too, am most complimentary of the chairman of this committee. I have nothing but good to say of him. My hon. friend, who is very sensitive to matters which pertain to political capital of any kind, is implying something that was not meant and could not be taken from the context.

Mr. Howard: Now that I have the opportunity I only wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the accusations of the Minister of Public Works about delay and the like are as untrue as anything he has ever said.

Mr. Peters: The minister has asked us, Mr. Chairman, how we relate this discussion to the item before us. Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not have the opportunity of speaking on this subject previously. If he will recall, the last time the subject was under discussion was June 21. There was a great deal of discussion with regard to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on that occasion and the minister engaged in that discussion, particularly the aspect of the matter I am discussing, which is recorded on pages 6851 and 6852 of Hansard. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam raised this question and the minister replied to it. The questions at that time were more specific.

However, Mr. Chairman, I have not asked the minister any questions so far. We may come to that stage. Perhaps the minister would not answer such questions anyway, because what I am trying to discuss is the conduct of the government in relation to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It happens that today is Saturday and, because of that fact, we did not anticipate these estimates would be under discussion at this time. Housing is an important issue to the Canadian people. What the government does with regard to housing in Canada is probably as important as any action the government takes.

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that we had four days to discuss generally the subject of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We are now well past the first item, and we are now on the fifth day of discussion of these estimates. I am simply asking you, Mr. Chairman, to rule that we should discuss item 374. If the hon. member for Timiskaming was not here during the first four days when we were discussing item No. 1, that is something I cannot help.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, confine ourselves to the item which is under discussion. If we could have strict adherence to that rule, Mr. Chairman, as we do when other estimates are under discussion, we would make more progress. My friend says it is important to discuss Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in general, and I agree, but four days were given in this committee to the discussion of item No. 1.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister is quite right in pointing out the need for strict relevancy once we pass item No. 1 of the estimates. The item under consideration deals with housing research and community planning. This is a fairly well defined field which is open to the hon. member for discussion. I would ask him to make his remarks strictly relevant to this item, if he will.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps if we had a temporary lull in the private war between the minister and the two hon. members in the committee I could ask him some questions which I think will be strictly relevant, and to which I hope to get answers.

An hon. Member: For a change.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know the point of that interjection. Perhaps I had better leave it on the record unanswered and ignored, as it should be. Item 374 reads:

Additional amount for housing research and community planning as contemplated by part V of the National Housing Act, 1954, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $585,900.

I wonder if the minister would take a moment, because of the inadequacy of the details which are purported to be given on page 491 but as to which an examination of that page reveals nothing, to tell us exactly how much of this vote is for housing research; what, in a general way, housing research embraces, and so on. I should like to know, too, how much of the item goes into community planning and how community planning is coordinated with the efforts of those having the immediate responsibility, the municipalities and the provinces. If he could do that I think it would serve a useful purpose.

Then I should like him to explain to us the latter part of the item, to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $585,900. If he would do that I would be grateful to him because I must admit that, for my own part, I find the item confusing, particularly in view of the absence in the details of any explanation of the increase in the item to more than four times the amount required last year.

Mr. Walker: I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for that question. The expenses under the item for 1961-62 are set out here in particularity, and I will go over them. First, recurring grants amount to a total of $486,900 and include the Canadian housing design council, the community planning association of Canada, university aid program, starts and completions surveys, Canadian housing statistics information, national research council, dominion bureau of statistics rental housing survey and Ontario research foundation. Non-recurring grants, of which community planning research is one, total $728,000, and administrative charges total $435,000 for a total of $1,649,900.

As to the matter to which the hon. member specifically refers, namely community planning research, the budget this year is in the amount of $109,000.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether the research which has been conducted in this important matter gives us any ground for hope that the cost of construction can be reduced?

Mr. Walker: I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for asking that pertinent question and to say that it is a matter that is of great concern to us. We have had a great deal of assistance from private industries which, through research, are trying to reduce building costs. If there is any information that we are able to make available to them we readily do so, and we encourage them to make inquiries from us.

We have also obtained great assistance from the national research council which in many spheres, in almost anything I ever had anything to do with, has given tremendous service to the public. We are constantly looking for ways and means to reduce costs. Had this not been so I am informed by the head of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that costs would be considerably higher than they are at the present time, and for a comparison we check our costs with costs in the United States.

Mr. Pearson: It has been stated—and I am not supporting the validity of the statement, because I am not qualified to do so—that the standards laid down are so strict that they add to the cost of construction, and that perhaps for that reason they may be considered too strict.

Mr. Winch: I am greatly interested in this phase also, and I hope we can have some comment from the minister on it. As the committee knows, I think I know something about the construction industry. In the past I have been very happy with the standards that have been established by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, as I said just a few days ago, I am very much disturbed by some of the changes I hear about, and I am wondering whether they are recommended by the national research board as being permissible, safe and in line with construction staying on a stable basis for many years. From what I have been able to learn of some of the changes, I would most certainly say that from the point of view of good standards in home construction, you are going to have a shack town instead of a decent settlement in the future if some of these rumours are correct. I should certainly like to hear from the minister on the maintenance of proper standards. Perhaps at the same time he could tell us about the issuance of minimum standards in a form that can be readily understood. They certainly cannot be readily understood at the present time.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, that shows how we can have divergent points of view. The Leader of the Opposition has heard that the standards were too strict—

Mr. McIlraith: No, he did not say that.

Mr. Walker: —and the hon. member for Vancouver East has said that they are not strict enough. All I can say is that we have had these standards created by experts across the country, together with the national research council which has been formulating the national building code. I would certainly prefer the stricture of the Leader of the Opposition that we are too strict rather than the suggestion that we are not strict enough. The only way we can raise the standards of housing and thus induce further building is by keeping up the standards. By keeping up the standards we feel we are not in any way increasing the intrinsic costs.

Mr. Pearson: I hope I will not be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. I did not suggest that the standards were too strict. I said it had been alleged—indeed it has been reported to me in the past—that the standards in certain respects were perhaps too strict in relation to the necessity for reducing the cost of construction. I was thinking particularly of the standards in lumber. I am not associating myself with that point of view because I just do not know. I was asking for information.

Mr. Walker: Thank you.

Mr. McIlraith: I wanted to pursue a bit further the questions I asked the minister. Under the research part of the estimate he referred to recurring grants amounting to some $486,000. From the information he gave about those grants I was not quite clear as to how many of them were directed to research in the field of building materials and how many to research in the field of housing conditions generally. Is he able in any way to give me an approximate division in that sense between the various grants, as to what amounts would go directly into research concerned with housing materials and how much would go into research on housing conditions or what might more properly be called the social aspect?

Mr. Walker: Directly for the purpose which my hon. friend has suggested is the grant of the national research council of $122,900. In connection with the other matters may I say this. As my hon. friend knows, it is research too. The Canadian housing design council gets a grant of $27,000; the community planning association of Canada, $67,000; university aid program, $72,000; starts and completions surveys, $41,000; Canadian housing statistics, $12,000; information, $145,000; national research council, $122,900.

Mr. McIlraith: From that answer I take it that the one item concerned with the research into building materials would be the national research council item?

Mr. Walker: Quite so.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the others would be substantially if not wholly directed to research into housing conditions and information about housing generally, or research other than that into building materials. I think I am correct in that view?

Mr. Walker: Yes, that is approximately correct.

Mr. McIlraith: I was appreciative of the minister's remarks about the work of the national research council in this field of research. I have found that to be my experience over quite a number of years. I certainly wish to express my concurrence in the view put forward as to the quality of the work which the national research council does in this field and in related fields.

I noticed that the minister made no reference to the forest products laboratory. I am not up to date in my information about it and do not know whether they are doing research work on housing materials. If they are not doing it at this time, may I suggest to the minister that he consider the possibility of having the forest products laboratory do work that is directly related to building materials for housing. I think he will find that the record of that laboratory is rather good. Because of its significance not only to the users of the products on which it does research but to the forest industry generally in this country, I think it is a very good organization and that it makes a substantial contribution. I would ask the minister to examine the possibility of co-ordinating the research work provided for by this item more closely with the work of the forest products laboratory, and if they have facilities which might properly be directed to this end, that such direction be given.

Turning to the grant for community planning, may I say that this is a problem on which one could spend a great deal of time. A great deal of public attention is being directed to this subject. It is not my intention at this stage of the estimates to get into a lengthy discussion, but bearing in mind that it is the municipalities and the provinces which have the primary responsibility in this field, can the minister explain the increase this year in terms of the grants which are being made? The grants appear to be sharply increased. I have not the comparative figures for last year, but the whole item in the estimates is multiplied by four compared with what it was last year. Can the minister assure us that these grants are being made in such a way that they will add to the good work which is already being done in many areas by the provinces and municipalities? Can he assure us that the work is being well co-ordinated among the various authorities so that this extra sum will add to the total of the work done and not represent duplication in any respect?

Mr. Walker: In regard to the forest products laboratory, we are already co-ordinated with the laboratory, which happens to be next door to us. They do our tests on plywood and on the other products we consider placing in our specifications, free of charge. We find it very helpful, and it is also helpful for them to get us to accept specifications for Canadian material. All in all, we have a happy relationship.

In reply to the question asked about the budget, the budget last year amounted to $1,158,035 and this year it is $1,649,900.

Mr. McIlraith: Could the minister answer the latter part of my question about community planning?

Mr. Walker: Yes, the amount in respect of community planning last year was $75,000 and this year it is $67,000. Last year the actual expenditure amounted to $69,317.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understood the minister, in answer to the first question I asked today he indicated that grants under the community planning part of this vote amounted to $728,000. It is this point I should like to have clarified.

Mr. Walker: There is a distinction. The recurring grant to the community planning association of Canada this year amounts to $67,000. On the other hand the non-recurring grant, the grant in respect of community planning research, amounts to $109,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one further question. I should like to ask the minister if he would look into the possibility of setting out details of this estimate in a better form next year. I think the form in which the detail is set out under this vote is not as clear as it might be, and that it could be improved.

Mr. Peters: It would be a point of order to ask the minister just how he is justifying the remarks he has been making either under the particulars or under the item itself. The remarks he has made indicate to me that I was not out of order when making my original remarks, and I think possibly it would be wise to continue on this subject because I think in this particular respect the department has probably not kept up with the thinking or the needs of some of our communities.

One thing which appears to me to be self evident is that the planning which went into the central mortgage and housing development in Elliot Lake was at fault. A terrific expense was imposed on many of the miners in that area in order to do something which was demanded of them by this act when it was probably not necessary to incur such expense, and not to their advantage to do so. The government knew. The officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation knew. They were more aware than anyone else of the fact that Elliot Lake was a temporary proposition with a very doubtful future. They made this evident in the requirements they imposed in asking the companies to guarantee beyond a very limited period the loans which were made at that time. Even so, even knowing this, standards were set for the building of houses which would probably be advantageous only if more permanent buildings were required. Why should such standards have been set at a time when it appeared to the officials of the department that this township was not going to be as permanent as had once been indicated?

Such mistakes are repeated in other areas. We are told that houses are to be built in the city of North Bay in connection with defence requirements. The units to be built by the department are being planned in several locations, and I presume they will be built in accordance with the standards which apply to normal housing. I think it is generally accepted, even by the people who will be living in these houses, that there is not likely to be a 20-year tenancy. The Bomarc missile base in North Bay will not be as permanent as that, in all likelihood. Military minds can probably see what is likely to be the lifetime of that community as it is being planned. I do not believe it is necessary or desirable to have these houses built in accordance with plans which are thought to be desirable when houses are to last for 50 or 60 years. I think much more temporary arrangements could be made, and that these would be satisfactory for the housing of these people.

I should like to know what work the department has done in the matter of planning in so far as the relationship between the cost of acquisition of a site and the cost of the house to be built on it is concerned. It appears to me unreasonable to build a $10,000 or $12,000 house on a piece of land which costs $10,000, for example. The department must have worked out a formula in connection with the relationship between the value of the house and the cost of acquiring the land on which it is built.

Of course this situation is governed to some extent by municipal bylaws. Certain zoning bylaws call for the erection of certain types of house, but the department has no doubt done some work on this question. I am interested to learn what the results have been, and whether there is a formula or relationship between the cost of acquiring the land and the price of building to be built on the land.

In relation to the work which the minister said would be done at North Bay—he referred to projects located in several areas—I understand that the options and planning have already begun in regard to a 200 unit project, and that consideration is being given to the sites required for the remainder of the total of 575 homes. I should like to know what the department's thinking is in regard to fitting this program into the housing program of the municipality, and what advantage or disadvantage there is in keeping the military housing project separate from the municipality. I understand when this course is followed the military project is only connected to the municipality in order to obtain municipal facilities such as sewer and water services. Is there a formula which has been developed in this regard and, if so, what are the advantages?

It seems to me that it would have been advantageous in past years if during the planning of low cost housing projects consideration had been given to including them as part and parcel of the municipality rather than locating them in isolated areas. Such a course, I suggest, would have been advantageous to any urban renewal program carried out at a later date, after the lifetime of those low cost housing units, which was considered at the time they were built to be very limited. Had that course been followed the whole area would have benefited by a total urban renewal program rather than one which concerns only certain streets, areas and zones, and which involves great difficulty because of the fact that the low cost houses have decreased the value of surrounding properties.

I should like to know whether this department has considered this program in those terms, with particular reference to the project at North Bay. I should also like to know why in the planning and development of this and similar projects the same consideration was not given as was given the development of areas such as Elliot Lake and Bancroft, where very high standards were demanded in respect to buildings because the officials of the department were of the opinion that it would be advantageous to do so; and I suggest that is so because of the financing arrangements that were made with the companies involved.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 374 carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries I wonder whether the minister on reflection intends to give this committee information in respect to the subject I raised earlier, concerning loans to Indian people for the new homes and the reconstruction of existing homes in reserves; or is the minister still of the opinion that this is not the appropriate item in relation to which that subject should be discussed?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 374 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries I should like to point out that, as recorded at page 6503 of Hansard for June 17, 1961, when we were considering the first item of these estimates, the minister suggested that this subject should be taken up during the committee's consideration of this vote. I should like to read that portion of Hansard to which I refer, which is as follows:

> Mr. Herridge: I have been very quiescent during the initial stages of this discussion. Before this vote carries, is the minister going to reply to a few of the questions that were put, or is he going to reply on the appropriate items?
> Mr. Walker: On appropriate items.

We have now reached the vote in respect of at least one portion of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation operations and are asking specific questions in regard to matters which the minister said should be discussed at this time, yet he now says that these subjects should have been taken up at the time of our consideration of the first item. This indicates to me that the minister is being furtive and secretive about matters which he does not intend the public should know.

Item agreed to.

577. To reimburse Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for losses sustained by it during the fiscal year 1960-61 as a result of the operation of federal-provincial projects undertaken under section 36 of the National Housing Act, 1954, $253,790.

Mr. Peters: Is the minister going to comment in respect to this item?

Item agreed to.

National capital commission—

375. Operation and maintenance of parks, parkways and grounds adjoining government buildings at Ottawa and Hull, and general administration, $2,311,240.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, in respect to vote 375 I should like to ask one or two questions.

Mr. Howard: Now he is shaking his hands in glee.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the minister, not the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Howard: Yes, certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: This vote dealing with the national capital commission involves a subject which I am sure is of great interest to all members of the House of Commons. It is not my purpose now, and members supporting the government will be interested to know this, to take time to make a speech. However, I should like to comment in respect to one or two individual items and, as our consideration continues, to ask certain questions.

At the outset I want to express my regret that the annual report of the national capital commission is not available to hon. members at a time when this item is being discussed by the committee. Over the years the national capital commission report has been prepared in such a way as to give information of great interest to hon. members. In spite of the deficiencies which have resulted from the competition provided by the extensive art work in the publications put out by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, it has contained a good deal of information which members of parliament who provide the funds, are entitled to have.

I know that an uncovered copy of this report was tabled in June. On the last day these estimates were before the committee the minister was kind enough to let me have his copy for a few minutes, during which time I only had the opportunity of making a very superficial examination. I hope the minister will look into this matter to see if the printing of the report can be completed in order that it may be distributed to members. It seems to me that the delay between the tabling of the report and its distribution to hon. members is wholly unreasonable and improper. I wonder whether the minister can give us some explanation as to this delay.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I handed my copy to the hon. member for Ottawa West on the day to which he refers, but at that time, fortunately or unfortunately, the estimates concerning the national capital commission were not being considered. I am not sure whether the hon. member gave that copy back to me.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes, I returned it to you that same day.

Mr. Walker: I understand copies have been available for some two weeks. I wonder whether the hon. member asked for a copy. I certainly do not remember him asking me for one.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, to clarify the situation I should like to state that I have been asking at the distribution office regularly for a copy in the ordinary way, but it has simply not been available to me.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Walker: Copies of the first part of that report have been available for some time. Part 2 of the report is available except for the report of the Auditor General, and we have not been able to complete it for that reason.

Mr. McIlraith: Do I understand—

Mr. Walker: You can have my copy.

Mr. McIlraith: Do I understand the minister correctly when he says copies are available? For some reason that is not apparent they have not been distributed to hon. members. I have been trying to get a copy.

Mr. Walker: I am just the minister. The hon. member will appreciate this, particularly with respect to the question of distribution. I understand that at least 75 copies were sent to the house some time ago.

Mr. McIlraith: I will not pursue the matter further. I certainly was not able to get one of the 75 copies. I was trying to get a copy. I look forward to this report, as I have over a number of years. I consider it a report of great interest, if not national, certainly of local interest. I have always looked forward to getting my copy. Apart from seeing the one the minister had, which he was kind enough to let me have for a few minutes when his estimates were last before the house a week or so ago, I have not seen a copy. Perhaps we can leave the matter for the minister to look into further and see whether distribution can be made.

Mr. Walker: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: I am sure that the residents of the national capital and all other Canadians who are interested in the national capital development, have noticed with pleasure the progress made up to now in the implementation of the plan.

Since we are at present considering the item relative to the operation and maintenance of parks and parkways, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the staff and all the members of the commission for the excellent work they are doing in this city. We are very proud of our parks and parkways; tourists who visit the national capital never have anything but words of praise for the way the flowers and shrubbery are kept and for the fine condition of the grounds around government buildings.

I therefore commend all members of the commission and all those responsible for the maintenance and lay-out of those parks.

The national capital program provides for projects to be carried out in the immediate future, and others are long term projects.

I want, at this time, to congratulate the commission for having undertaken the important project of relocating the railway tracks and Union station. That, to my mind, is the key to the master capital plan. It was announced earlier in the press that within four years, Union station would be located about two miles from the parliament buildings. All the railroad tracks across the city will disappear; the level crossings will be eliminated, and new throughways and boulevards will be laid out where those tracks are now.

I read with great pleasure in the papers, about ten days ago, that the commission had decided to run the railways underground in the city. From the Ottawa river the route would go under the Rideau canal to the south of the city via the Carleton university campus. I think that is a sound decision, though it may cost rather more to have those tracks running through a tunnel. From an aesthetic point of view, it will mean a great deal to the capital.

As far as railroad relocation is concerned, I hope that the commission is now considering a similar plan for the city of Hull. We know that in four years from now, when Union station has been moved a few miles away from its present location, the railway on the Quebec side will also have to change its route, because trains will no longer be using the interprovincial bridge. Railway traffic will be concentrated on a single branch line. I hope the commission will proceed in the same way on the Quebec side as on the Ottawa side. I hope consideration will be given to building a tunnel for the railroad tracks west of Montcalm street and beyond Alexandre Tache boulevard. The same might be done on the north side of the city of Hull, towards which much of the traffic will have to be routed when the new bridge is built. At that time, I think it would be very wise to build a tunnel for the railroad tracks across Hull.

May I also say to the house that I am most satisfied with the attitude adopted by the commission in purchasing all the land on the Ottawa side in the green belt surrounding the national capital. Such a step was essential both for sound administration and as a means of rushing in a scientific way the boundaries of the capital area.

I hope the commission will adopt the same policy on the Quebec side and will take immediate steps for the creation of a green belt in that area.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, before the one o'clock recess, I made a few brief remarks on the administration of the national capital.

I should now like to discuss a subject of great concern to my constituents and to myself, namely the development of the Gatineau park.

I am sure the majority of hon. members who have visited the park will agree with me that we would feel more comfortable this afternoon in Gatineau park than in this house.

A great many Canadians are on holidays at this time, enjoying the charms and facilities available to them as a result of the development of Gatineau park.

Gatineau park is only partly developed.

The scheme for the development of this park was outlined in 1937. First there was the planning stage, then land was purchased, and today, part of the park has been completed.

On this day of July 1, the 94th anniversary of confederation, I think it is appropriate to express the hope, that in 1967, six years hence, or 30 years after development of this park was initiated, the 1937 dream will come true and Gatineau park will be completed.

Let us not forget that this is the only national park in the province of Quebec.

At this point, I should like to suggest to the minister and to the members of the national capital commission that they urge the federal government to approach the government of the province of Quebec and ask that the land now owned by the province be set aside for the Gatineau park.

This is certainly the best time to come to an agreement with Quebec in that connection, for, today, Quebec is really part of the confederation.

Ten or 15 years ago, various members of the commission tried to reach an agreement with the province of Quebec with regard to provincially-owned land which could be used to complete the park development. But no agreement could be reached.

I believe the commission should take further steps to settle this important question.

The agreement could be on two points. First of all, we should obtain for the park all the lands belonging to the lands and forest department of the province of Quebec; and secondly, the N.C.C. should let the province have the right of way which it holds on a property formerly owned by the Hull electric company, where the latter ran its street cars between Hull and Aylmer. Furthermore the town of Aylmer and all the area between Hull and Aylmer need a second highway.

I think the commission should take steps to make such an exchange with Quebec, thereby simultaneously solving two problems: that of the Gatineau park, and the traffic problem between Hull and Aylmer.

Mr. Chairman, in the last few years, the funds appropriated for the development of the Gatineau park have been reduced. I realize that some of the projects involved in the national capital development program are more urgent than others. However, in view of the present unemployment in the Hull district, the riding of Gatineau and the neighbouring area, it seems to me that the government should increase its expenses instead of reducing them. Such a development could provide a great deal of work for labourers. I feel that the commission authorities would be wise to undertake the continuation of the parkway that goes from Hull to the Champlain look-out because, after all, that is the first stretch of the Gatineau parkway. The commission should extend it not only to lake Philippe but to the north limit of the park in the riding of Pontiac.

However, I should like to express my appreciation to the national capital commission for having granted recently a contract for the paving of the road between Wakefield and Masham to lake Philippe. The house is no doubt aware of the fact that all necessary facilities are to be found at lake Philippe and that thousands of tourists spend their days and week ends at that lake. The paving of those three miles of road is truly beneficial to the people who go to that fine lake.

I would have a few suggestions to make to the commission concerning the development of that park. There are some 30 lakes within the park. Some of them are quite large and offer good fishing since tourists find there the species of fish they are looking for. We have in that park, only a few miles from the capital, salmon trout, bass, pike and pickerel.

In my opinion, the commission should have a biological survey carried out immediately in those lakes and have all non-sport fish destroyed. It should also see to the construction of a fish-breeding establishment in order to stock those lakes with appropriate fish. Thus we would have lakes well provided with fish for the tourists, when the construction of parkways and roads will have opened the area to the public.

I should like also to say a few words about the prison camp to be opened in a few days, if it is not already opened. It is located in the riding of Gatineau, or rather in the riding of Pontiac, but in the Gatineau park.

Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make on this subject. I am aware that the national capital commission is not responsible for this project for it comes under the Department of Justice. However, since it is essential that good relations exist between the national capital commission and those who reside near the park, I suggest the commission should not be responsible for this prisoners' camp.

People throughout the area are against the prison camp. The Gatineau county council, the chambers of commerce, schoolboards and town councils have passed resolutions which were sent to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to protest the establishment of such a camp in the area.

Can you imagine, Mr. Chairman, what it means to have from 80 to 100 prisoners in such a camp? It means that work which should normally be done by local people, who have a right to work and a good many of whom are unemployed because they have agreed to work for the national capital commission for the building of this camp. Well, that work will not be carried out by them any more. In my region, we have unemployed heads of families to whom it is very difficult to explain that the government prefers to have the work done by prisoners, by former criminals rather than by our honest people. That is why I should not want the commission to bear the responsibility for that camp in Gatineau park. Fortunately, the camp will not be set up in the constituency of Gatineau, but rather in the Gatineau park, that is to say, in the constituency of Pontiac-Temiscamingue. It is not for me to express here the views of the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau), but I do know—

Mr. Martineau: He can express his own views.

Mr. Leduc: —that some of the voters in the constituency of Pontiac-Temiscamingue, which is close to mine, came to see me to say they were not satisfied either. I should like the public to know that the commission is not responsible for the setting up of that camp.

Now, I would like to make a few more brief remarks in connection with zoning and building regulations in municipalities located within the national capital area. The N.C.C. makes available to municipalities the services of expert town planners for the preparation of zoning plans and proposals for building regulations.

It is deplorable that some municipalities within the limits of the national capital have no zoning nor building regulations. I understand that in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario some municipalities cannot afford the services of expert town-planners for that kind of work. But fortunately, within the limits of the national capital, services of such experts are offered free of charge to all municipal councils. I would ask the commission to exert pressure, or at least to do what can be done to inform the people in those various municipalities so that they will ask the commission for the services of the town planners to prepare adequate plans.

There are unfortunately, quite close to Hull city limits, villages which are developing into real slum villages. Why? Because those municipalities have no zoning or building regulations to control building in the limits of their own territory.

I know that at this time there is serious work being done in Quebec to help and advise municipalities in taking zoning and urban development measures. I hope the commission will do its best to see that all the municipalities in the national capital area have their own zoning and construction programs as soon as possible and that the bylaws they adopt are strictly enforced.

Mr. Denis: No match-box post offices.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, it would also be advisable, I think, to construct a building for the Gatineau park management staff. I know that the department has provided temporary buildings, but with the expansion that is now evident, the national capital commission should give immediate consideration to properly housing the employees of the Gatineau park administration in buildings fit for such a park.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking on this item, but in view of the remarks just made by my hon. colleague from Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), I feel I should give the house my views on this matter.

It goes without saying that I fully agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Gatineau, and especially with those pertaining to the beauties of the Gatineau park and of the Pontiac-Temiscamingue and Gatineau ridings. As a matter of fact, I am the first to support his views. I fully support some of his suggestions concerning the development of the park and the building of roads through it, so that the greatest possible number of citizens may enjoy the natural beauties that are to be found there. I am happy to say to the hon. gentleman that his comments on this matter are greatly appreciated.

However, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member raised a question about which I feel, he did not do justice in his speech. I refer to the use of prisoners to carry out work within the Gatineau park.

I should ask the hon. member for Gatineau to refer particularly to the statements made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) about this matter. In reply to a question about the consequences of setting up correctional working camps, and more particularly about the work to be carried out in the Gatineau park, in co-operation with the national capital commission, the Minister of Justice stated as follows, as recorded on page 1 of the English Hansard for December 21, 1960:

> The government believes in the principles underlying such rehabilitation projects and their use for resources conservation purposes. However, in the study of each particular project, we require that the following test be applied: Is it expected that the project, within about ten years, would be carried out by regular workers and paid for out of public funds? If so, it is not undertaken by prisoners.

When discussing the estimates of the justice department the same question was dealt with and the Minister of Justice stated on June 9, 1961, as will be found in Hansard:

> During the coming months it is intended to place the emphasis upon the development of minimum security institutions. The committee will have gathered from my previous remarks that the pressure for medium security institutions has in some measure been relieved, and our greatest need is for institutions in which the benefits of minimum security conditions can be brought to bear upon those inmates who have responded to our new rehabilitation methods. The necessary provision has now been made so that, across the country, we shall be opening five correctional work camps, each designed to provide accommodation and training for 80 inmates. These camps—

The minister there listed the various locations where those camps would be set up and mentioned the Gatineau park, in Quebec.

And the minister went on:

I would like to assure the house that none of the men held in these institutions will be engaged upon work which would deprive other Canadians of employment. None of the projects which they undertake would be commenced within ten years if they had to be paid for out of tax moneys at the current rates of civilian pay.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice indicated on two different occasions that the work carried out under that program would be of a kind which, anyway, is not planned for the next ten years and far from delaying the development of the Gatineau park, will rather accelerate this project.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that no unemployed worker in the area will be deprived of a job, because of those works the purpose of which is to establish those very facilities the hon. member for Gatineau himself has been asking for.

In addition, there is no doubt that the establishment of a prison camp will create jobs for a number of guards and caterers, the latter having to supply the inmates of the institution with the required services and commodities. I therefore feel that if we adopt that position, far from depriving the local people of jobs, we will on the contrary create additional jobs.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that recently some officers of the Department of Justice went to my hon. friend's riding to explain the objectives of that department when they establish such correctional work camps.

The hon. member for Gatineau has referred to complaints he has apparently received from his constituents. Personally, I can say here that I have never received any complaint from anyone in my constituency. Quite to the contrary, municipal authorities wrote to congratulate this government for undertaking work that will considerably help the development of an area which, in the opinion of all, including the hon. member for Gatineau, is quite promising from the viewpoint of tourist attractions of all kinds.

I also take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) to see that the national capital commission carries on with this worth-while project of the Gatineau park development, so that not only the citizens of our district, but all the citizens of this country may fully benefit from the natural attractions of the Gatineau park, which all of us praise.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: I rise just to ask a question or two of the minister. However, before doing so I must express my full appreciation of the work that has been undertaken throughout the years by the capital commission for the planned beautification of Ottawa and its environs. As a matter of fact I have no hesitation in saying that practically everything Ottawa has with respect to beautiful gardens, drives, lawns and parks is the result of the activity of the capital commission. I think much credit should be given to that robust, energetic and very capable person General Kennedy and his colleagues.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, I must be getting on in years because 44 years ago I never thought I would speak a good word for a general again after being carted about 100 miles across France in a G.S. wagon in order to be court-martialled for supposedly giving a platoon a wrong order in action. As soon as the court saw me, of course, they knew I was innocent and the charge was dismissed.

However, I must say also that I wish to compliment the person, whoever it is, who is responsible for the decoration around the grounds of parliament for this holiday season. I hear some comment and I can well understand it; but honestly I am giving my opinion. I think we have more colour, greater effect, and more holiday and festive atmosphere for the least expense than we have had for a good many years. I have had a look at these decorations. I find that, best of all, the flags, the poles and the portable cement blocks will serve for many future national holidays, festive occasions, welcomes to visitors from overseas and so on. I like the idea of being able to use these materials over and over again. As I say, I have seen some heavy expenditures, on occasions, on things which could not be used again.

Now I come to my question. I have had a number of visits from residents in the Sussex street district, in addition to considerable correspondence from them. I have heard from the owners of property and private homes on Sussex Street who are concerned about the possibility of the expropriation of that property by the national capital commission. This is a natural concern. I understand these people are reconciled to their property being expropriated if they can be convinced that it is necessary for the beautification of Ottawa as part of the national capital commission plan, but they have heard reports from reliable sources that over the years representatives of the French government have been approaching the appropriate persons in the federal government with a view to having a site expropriated opposite the present French embassy for the building of a chancellery. These people are concerned if property is to be expropriated for that purpose. I understand and there are a number of civil servants who have reason to believe that representations have been made at a high level for the expropriation of property for that purpose.

These people claim there is ample room in the grounds of the French embassy for extra buildings to serve the great and friendly nation of France. I can hardly credit why people should come to me on occasions in respect to such matters as this, but, as I say, I have had correspondence dealing with this question, in addition to a number of visits, and I undertook to raise the matter in the house and ask the minister whether it is correct to say that representations have been made on behalf of the French government in this connection to any department of the government of Canada for the expropriation of certain land for the construction of a chancellery or other building for the French government.

Mr. Walker: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his remarks. The national capital commission over-all plan has for many years envisaged making Sussex drive from the parliament buildings to government house a processional drive or, as I stated at one time, we should like to preserve the good that was there and improve what is not good. This is a plan which has long been outstanding. I can tell the hon. member that as far as any government outside Canada is concerned representations such as he has described have played no part in any such plan. No representations were made by the commission at the time this plan was envisaged. If any formal representations have been made on behalf of any foreign government they have not been made to the national capital commission.

Perhaps I might say one further thing. I am not, in all humility, as the minister responsible for the national capital commission, able to accept credit for the wonderful decorations outside the parliament buildings to help us celebrate Dominion day. However, in all modesty, I can accept congratulations as the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. McIlraith: I have no desire to debate matters having to do with the Department of Public Works, but I cannot help observing that there have been small criticisms of certain actions such as the tearing up of the lovely lawns cared for by the national capital commission. The Department of Public Works has come along to dig ditches, excavate and put in temporary wires. There are all kinds of side issues and altogether the situation is not as happy as the minister would have us think. Perhaps if I press the subject further, Mr. Chairman, you would call me out of order, and I am sure that in the spirit of the holiday no one would like that to happen.

I should like to ask the minister a few questions with regard to the position of chairman of the commission. It is very important, I think the committee would agree, that the chairman of the board should be endowed with a blend of natural qualities. He should be sufficiently artistic to visualize development of an area and at the same time he must be practical enough to be able to carry out the practical work required to be done. Then, above all other capacities, he must be able to co-ordinate his activities with those of the other authorities, provincial and municipal, engaged in his field in such a way as to obtain the greatest effect from the total resources available. It seems to me that all this requires great qualities of mind and character including patience and, indeed, wisdom beyond that given to most of us.

We have had a succession of very fine chairmen of this commission and I hope the one to be appointed in the future will be of the same high calibre. The present chairman has been the general manager of the commission for many years and I think we would all wish to publicly acknowledge the good work he has done over the whole of this period. My understanding is that his present position as chairman is of a temporary nature and that his tenure expires some time this autumn. I assume the minister is not able to tell us at this stage the name of whoever is destined to be his successor, but if the hon. gentleman has any information on this subject which he feels he can properly release at this time I should be glad to have it.

While I am making reference to the present chairman of the commission in his former capacity as general manager, I might also refer to the fact that we have with us today on the floor of the chamber, I believe, for the first time, the new general manager. I can only say that I wish him well in the years ahead. I wish him all those qualities which are required to carry on this work, not the least of which may be patience.

I do not know whether the minister wishes to answer my questions as they arise. I have one or two more to ask.

Mr. Walker: I shall answer them all at the same time.

Mr. McIlraith: I should appreciate it if the minister could throw some light on this question of the chairmanship of the commission, because I can tell the hon. gentleman that if the appointment is not made before the election there will be appointed a man of the very finest calibre; and I hope that even if the appointment is made before the election the position will be filled by a man of the same qualities.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the hon. gentleman this question. If, after the election, he were to find himself unemployed would he be a candidate for the position?

Mr. McIlraith: No. But after the election, my leader authorizes me to say, I shall have the fullest possible say about the appointment of the chairman and he will be of the highest calibre.

I wish to raise another matter having to do with the composition of the board. The composition of the board has been changed from time to time but the latest change made involved the dropping of the representatives of the cities of Ottawa and Hull. While these are only two of many municipalities involved they are the two largest. I like to stress every time I speak on this subject the necessity for good co-ordination and good relationships among the municipal bodies concerned and this commission. I would hope that the minister would consider this point and, overlooking whatever the vicissitudes may be at any given moment in dealing with this subject, would consider submitting to the house an amendment to the act providing that the officers holding the positions of mayor of Hull and mayor of Ottawa be on the commission. That is something of which we should not lose sight and I hope the minister will give it consideration.

There is one other question which I should like to raise. The whole question of expropriation has become increasingly important these last few years as the use of expropriation has increased sharply for national capital commission purposes, for federal public works' purposes, and indeed in the provincial government legislative field, as well as for municipal purposes. This is a difficult subject and there is no doubt at all that experience has revealed many weaknesses in the existing procedure. I had understood that new legislation on this subject was being brought forward at this session. While it has not been brought forward I wonder whether the minister would state exactly what the position of the government is with respect to it. It seems to me that this legislation is overdue and that a statement by the minister should be made at this session. These days when we hear so much about the bill of rights, I sometimes think, in keeping with the spirit of the bill of rights, we might modernize this legislation a bit to bring it more up to date.

Would the minister advise the house what acreage in the green belt development has been acquired and what acreage is yet to be acquired, and, of the acreage yet to be acquired, what portion of it is now under expropriation proceedings, in what area and to what extent is it intended to continue to attempt to negotiate without expropriation? I would ask him to give us the amount paid to date for property acquired for the green belt as well as his estimate of the amount required to complete the acquisition of the balance of the property.

Then, as to Sussex street, I have some specific questions I should like to ask. What is the estimated cost of expropriation of land by the national capital commission between Sussex drive and Thomas street? Is the minister in a position to develop further at this stage the plans for the use of the lands to be expropriated?

Will any of the buildings on the lands to be expropriated be preserved, or is it intended to replace them all? Will the minister clarify the position of the government concerning the future use of this land for embassy sites? There has been talk from time to time, one way and another, on this point and the situation is quite obscure. Perhaps he could clarify it.

Then there is the question that arises as to whether or not any of this area is to be used as a park site. If that is so, would the minister elaborate a bit on the nature of the park development to take place there, and tell us what expected use will be made of that park, bearing in mind its proximity to other park areas, namely, Rockcliffe park.

Has the minister considered the possibility under our housing legislation of proceeding to develop part of the area outside the area being taken by the national capital commission so that the housing standards in that part of the area could be raised? The standards in part of the area now are very good but there are some other areas in close proximity where the standards are not as good as they might be. It seems to me the housing legislation we have would permit of an advantageous use of funds voted under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in conjunction with the provinces and municipalities to undertake certain works to bring that adjacent area into better relationship to the proposed new development for Sussex street.

Perhaps at this stage I should give the minister an opportunity to reply to my questions. I have attempted to state them concisely and specifically but I realize they have covered a somewhat wide range.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one remark to the minister. In my opinion, it is high time that the government put an end to the construction of post offices which look like soap boxes.

I understand that recently the minister called himself the "government's plumber."

I would suggest that he stick to plumbing in the construction of post offices and I would advise him not to seek the advice of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) on questions of design because, when he did, the results were rather poor.

In addition, I rise on a question of privilege on behalf of plumbers. The minister should not pretend that he is a plumber because those tradesmen are industrious, they have good taste and they are neither arrogant nor proud.

Before calling himself a plumber, I think the minister should ask the plumber's union so that the latter may decide whether he deserves to become one of their numbers.

In conclusion, I would ask the minister not to associate himself with any trade because all those people have marked qualities we admire.

(Text):

Mr. Walker: I want to thank the hon. member for St. Denis for his usual courteous and helpful suggestions. I know my hon. friend is a champion bowler, there is no question about that title. I guess I cannot compete in the same realm, and I admit that.

In reply to my friend the hon. member for Essex West, may I say this—

An hon. Member: You mean Ottawa West.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Ottawa West. Excuse me, but I can never quite get away from the benign influence of the hon. member for Essex East who sits close to the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am being very quiet now.

Mr. Walker: In respect to the Expropriation Act I will have to leave it to the Minister of Justice. I have not followed sufficiently close to know whether this legislation is to be brought down this session. I have not seen it on the order paper as yet.

An hon. Member: It is there.

Mr. Walker: I have not noticed it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a bill introduced by the member for Essex East.

Mr. Walker: That is something new. The acreage to be acquired is 673 parcels of 6,818 acres. We have under option at the present time 72 parcels of 2,860 acres. The amount already purchased involves 598 parcels of 24,722 acres.

The Sussex drive development program, as the hon. member for Ottawa West knows, is still under consideration. When the original Greber plan of the national capital commission, or the federal district commission as it was then called, was brought in some years ago it contemplated embassy sites somewhere along Sussex street. But I can assure the hon. member that during my tenure of office in any event, the national capital commission has made no such plans nor has it come forward with any such plans.

I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West that we should have a very distinguished man to succeed General Howard Kennedy, of whom I think very highly, and also Mr. A. K. Hay, who has given a lifetime of distinguished service to the national capital commission. Mr. Alan Hay is a wonderful type of man. It is a great credit to any country to have such a public servant. It is through his own insistent request that we shall be forced to allow him to terminate his services as chairman of this commission on September 30 of this year. It was only at our urgent request that he has stayed on as long as he has. I hope by that time to be able to announce to parliament and to the people of Canada the appointment of a distinguished successor who will maintain the excellent tradition established by the former chairmen of this commission.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Ottawa West advocating—I take it he was advocating it—the appointment of my distinguished friend and his political enemy, the mayor of Ottawa, to the national capital commission. If that was what he was doing today it is unique. It shows how broadminded he really is. I can say though that it was our predecessors in office, the St. Laurent government and Mr. St. Laurent himself who insisted that the National Capital Act should be amended so that neither the mayor of Ottawa nor the mayor of Hull would of necessity or as a matter of right be members of this commission. The former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, felt that there would be a distinct conflict of interest between the duties of the mayor of Ottawa as such, or the mayor of Hull as such, and the interests of the national capital commission as such. Therefore, section 3 of the act states that as a statutory right Ottawa should have at least two representatives on the commission and Hull one. I think this answers the questions the hon. member asked.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one point I think I should clarify. I refer to the minister's reference to the former prime minister. I think his comment went farther than the facts warrant. I am aware that the draft bill prepared by the previous government did not make provision for the appointment of the mayor of Ottawa and the mayor of Hull as members of the commission. I am aware of that fact but I believe that a more careful examination will indicate to the minister that his other remarks when he was purporting to speak for the former prime minister were not in accordance with the facts. I think he would not wish to leave them just the way they were expressed. I think on examination he will find the facts are more closely as I state them on that point. I am aware that the bill submitted, but not dealt with by the former government, did omit the provision for the appointment for the mayor of Ottawa and the mayor of Hull to the commission, but I am not by any means satisfied that the bill would not have been changed, or that the provision would not have been changed, before or during its submission to the House of Commons. I think the minister will agree with me that it is fair to leave the matter that way.

Mr. Walker: May I say one word there. I think I know whereof I speak. We inherited the draft from the St. Laurent government and all we did was to put it through. This was the suggestion of the former prime minister himself. It was his suggestion that the change I have outlined should take place.

Mr. McIlraith: I thought I made it clear that this clause was in the draft bill prepared by the former government, but to go beyond that and say what the minister has said were the views of the prime minister of Canada at that time is to say something that I think is not in accordance with the facts. It certainly is not in accordance with my understanding and discussion at that time. The minister went beyond what I thought was the position of the prime minister of Canada at that time, who was pretty careful in these things. I do not want to rethresh old straw because I do not think it is germane at the moment. Surely the minister would wish to leave the matter there. My remarks still stand about him giving this matter further consideration in the future. Despite the views the minister may have at the moment I think this must be viewed as a long term matter. We have constantly to keep before us the absolute necessity of effective co-ordination and good working relationships with the councils of all municipalities in the area.

There is one other matter that the minister passed over a bit lightly, namely the Expropriation Act. While technically the Expropriation Act may come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, it is almost of exclusive concern of the Minister of Public Works because he heads up the two large expropriating bodies in Canada, namely the national capital commission and the Department of Public Works. I would hope that he would concern himself directly with this problem because the legislation does need modernizing. While it may be a difficult subject to deal with I would hope that he would address himself to the problem. I ask him to do so. I remind him that he seems to have overlooked a very important fact in this connection, namely that very early in this session my colleague from Essex East introduced a bill to amend the Expropriation Act in one very important particular. I think I should draw this to the attention of the minister because he seems to have overlooked it. The explanatory note of the bill reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to amend the Expropriation Act so as to require the minister, in the name of the crown, to give notice of intention to all interested parties of the crown's intention to take or acquire lands or any interest therein.
> This procedure would be in accordance with the principles recognized and declared in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

On this anniversary of the bill of rights I think the Minister of Public Works would do well to take note of the point raised by my colleague in Bill No. C-63. I hope that he will have it embodied in the new bill when it comes forward.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Peters: Before the item carries may I say I have been interested in the remarks of the hon. members from the capital area. I am sorry there are not more of them with us today because a number of things have been raised today that would be of interest to them and of which the commission should take note.

I congratulate the commission on the work that it has done, particularly in this adventure for citizenship in which the Rotary club and the national capital commission have jointly co-operated because it has given opportunity to members from areas other than those directly connected with the national capital commission jurisdiction to see some of the work and projects that are being undertaken. I also congratulate them on the tour of the national capital commission area which they arranged recently, advantage of which was taken by some members of the house. It provided an opportunity to see some of the developments that are taking place in the area.

I recommend strongly that the request of the hon. member for Ottawa West that Charlotte Whitton be appointed to the commission be given consideration by the government. This might be a hardship on the commission because city council and the board of control have undergone hardship, but I do think there is an obligation to bring together the commission and the city of Ottawa. The beautification of the city of Ottawa and works in that regard are in the main the responsibility of the national capital commission and I think there should be more co-operation with respect to some of the things that are going on in the area.

I support the hon. member for Ottawa West with regard to the matter of expropriation and also the question of how extensive the green belt is going to be. I have received some representations regarding disputes from lawyers in the area involved in certain property deals. Real estate deals are going on continually in what is considered to be the green belt area and these lawyers find that commercial enterprises are being established in an area where it had been indicated that expropriation was going to take place. The hon. member for Carleton does not need to shake his head. The area I am referring to is in the county of Russell across the Rideau river. There is considerable misunderstanding on the part of people there. They are not being allowed to build homes on the land while at the same time motels, golf driving ranges and so on are being established. In my opinion and in the opinion of many of the lawyers involved this has created an opportunity for some people to make money to which they probably should not have been entitled.

I should also like to congratulate the commission on the parks that come under their jurisdiction. I would simply request that they take care that they do not follow the practice of the province of Ontario which has continually increased the entrance fee to its parks over the past few years. If the government is going to provide the commission with close to $9 million this year, the parks should be made available to the largest number of people possible so that they can enjoy the benefits. I do not believe it is expected that these parks will be self sustaining. We intend to continue to spend money for the maintenance and upkeep of these parks because it is not expected that the revenue will be sufficient for that purpose.

There has been a great deal of discussion this afternoon about Sussex street. I think Sussex street is not in too bad shape. What I object to particularly is the condition of Wellington street in front of the parliament buildings. It seems to me that some consideration should be given to this street by the national capital commission because they seem to be one of the very few departments of government that really spend a lot of money, time and effort on planning. If they decide to do something about Wellington street, possibly it is within their jurisdiction to consider the matter of providing parking facilities off parliament hill. There seems to be no reason why they could not erect a building to provide parking facilities for the cars that normally park on the hill. Fees could be collected for the cars stored in such a building. Certainly the people who work here, senators and even members of parliament should be able to pay for parking facilities.

It seems to me that expediency has prevailed over aesthetic values because the hill should be a place of trees, gardens and parks. Many of the little parking lots that have been established on the hill have been placed there as temporary expedients pending the solution of what is obviously a very complicated problem. If the commission were to make a strong enough recommendation for off-the-hill parking, I think arrangements could probably be made for facilities on the other side of Wellington street that would meet my desire to have attractive government buildings on that street and at the same time would be functional as far as parking is concerned. The problem is a temporary one but so far it has not been solved. The amount of parking on the hill is very restricted and cannot be extended to any great extent. In my view the present situation detracts from the appearance of parliament hill.

There is another problem to which I should like the commission to give some consideration. Complaints have been made to me by a number of people respecting certain areas in Gatineau park. In particular I have reference to the Ottawa ski club area. I have received many complaints from young people that if they want to go into that area in the winter they have to pay a sum of money to enter the area, even though the commission assists in maintaining the roads. I think this problem could easily be eliminated if the commission would sit down with officials of the Ottawa ski club and other organizations similarly involved. I believe that much more co-operative arrangements could be worked out which would serve the needs of the community. It may be that the commission might see fit to buy the Ottawa ski club facilities because it seems to me that they are winter facilities used by the people for their enjoyment in the same way that the facilities of a place like lac Philippe are used by the people in the summer. I think these matters should be given some consideration and I know that if the commission finds these suggestions worth while consideration will be given to them.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to explain very briefly what control the national capital commission has over the location and design of new government buildings. I am particularly interested in the national war museum and I have brought up this matter on several occasions. I know that the operation of the museum comes under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and that the matter of a new building would come under the Department of Public Works. However, if the national capital commission has any say as to the location and planning of new buildings, can the minister tell us whether they have any plan in mind for the provision of a new building for the national war museum? I find this is a very popular place with tourists, especially young people, but the present building is certainly too small and does not do justice to many of the fine exhibits there.

Mr. Walker: I shall look into that.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Public Works. We now turn to a consideration of—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: There would have to be unanimous consent of the committee given to any such direction. Is the committee prepared to give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Peters.]

The Deputy Chairman: We turn now to the estimates of the Department of Forestry, item No. 152.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

152. Departmental administration, $1,090,452.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the province of Quebec has 25 per cent of Canada's productive forests. Forests are most important to this country. First, they are a source of substantial income for the pulp, paper and lumber industry. Second, there is a close relation between our forests and our waterways, because the former control and regulate the flow of surface waters and at the same time constitute water reserves. Third, they are ideal hunting and fishing grounds. So we must protect our forests.

In addition to the funds spent by the provincial and federal governments through the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming), we have 4-H clubs accomplishing fine work in co-operation with the Quebec government in particular.

Our legislation should me made more stringent in order to put a stop to the negligence of those who are responsible for forest fires.

Second, the sale of Christmas trees should be closely supervised. In my opinion, there is abuse in that field.

Third, our youth should be taught in schools to respect our trees.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has taken steps through his officials or the civil service commission, to recruit forestry engineers or scientists in the universities of the province of Quebec, in view of the fact that there are not enough bilingual civil servants in the forestry department considering the important role which the province of Quebec is called upon to play since it has 25 per cent of Canada's productive forests.

I should also like to ask the minister whether the government intends to appoint, in the near future, a French speaking and bilingual assistant deputy minister to the Department of Forestry.

(Text):

Mr. Badanai: I cannot let the estimates of this important department go by without making a few observations. I rise also to extend to the new minister, or shall I say the first minister, of forestry, my sincere congratulations upon his appointment and best wishes for the successful administration of a department which is of great importance to my constituency. My constituency is economically dependent, to a very large extent, on forests and forest products.

I had the great pleasure, Mr. Chairman, of introducing the minister to the people of Fort William on his first visit to the lakehead on May 24 when he addressed the Fort William Canadian club. It was a gathering of a cross-section of the business, professional and trades people of both cities, including a special group interested in the forest industry. Measured by the reaction of press, radio and television, the minister's visit was a great success. His speech, which contained promises of plans for rapid expansion of research activities in forest products marketing, was well received. I should say also that his visit provided an excellent opportunity for the minister to get personally acquainted with some of our people directly and indirectly interested in the success of federal forestry policy.

The pulp and paper industry is one of the major employers of labour in our district. The same can be said, of course, for the whole of northwestern Ontario. A great number of our farmers are dependent for a goodly portion of their income upon the operation of woodlots. I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister, who has many years of practical experience in woods operations, will take into account the welfare of these farmers by rendering some form of federal assistance in marketing their wood. I express the hope, too, that he will explore the possibility for improving production and management as well as the possibility of developing an industry related to farming in forestry. These possibilities should be carefully investigated with a view to bettering rural community life by stabilizing farm population. An aggressive federal Department of Forestry, in co-operation with the provinces, may well undertake these developments with a view to bringing about a new era for the woodlot farmers of Canada.

The government should make credit available to these woodlot farmers to improve their holdings. A better system of approving loans than that which the farm credit corporation used in assessing the value of farm holdings in the district of Thunder bay should be adopted. Because of the distorted method of determining whether or not an applicant is eligible for a loan, very few applicants were able to qualify.

An economic survey of northwestern Ontario issued by the Ontario department of economics contains some very interesting data concerning the income of pulp and paper workers, which is shown to be well above the average for industrial and construction workers. The forests of Thunder bay have built the towns of Red Rock, Terrace Bay, Nipigon, Long Lac and Marathon. There should be no need, really, to stress the importance of the pulp and paper and lumber industries to the well being of Canada. The evidence of this fact is there for everyone to see. The forest industry alone of the great national, basic industries receives no subsidy. It is not seeking any. Yet, when you compare the annual production from the forest industry with the annual production of agriculture and mining, you find without doubt this industry produces the greatest total buying power and contributes vastly more to a favourable trade balance, supports the greatest export trade and produces the largest tax revenues if we combine the taxes levied by both provincial and federal governments.

Our federal government spends approximately $6 million each year on forest administration and research, $25 million on mining administration, research and subsidies; $80 million in agriculture administration, research and subsidies.

What are the revenues from these basic industries? Federal and provincial governments together receive a $230 million annual revenue from agriculture of which they spend $150 million. From the forests these two senior governments receive $275 million of which they spend a combined total of $45 million. From the figures it can be seen that we can afford to be a little more generous towards the basic industry for which we should be very thankful.

Mr. D. W. Ambridge, president of Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company, speaking at the annual lakehead district credit union banquet, recently recounted some of his observations on a recent European tour that he had made as a member of a government delegation to investigate common market countries. Mr. Ambridge made the statement that amazing development was evident in Europe. I wish to quote from the Thursday, June 22 issue of the Fort William Times Journal just a few remarks from his address:

"—Today Europe's economy is progressing much faster than ours," he remarked.

He said he was impressed with the close co-operation between government, industry and labour.

"What we've got to realize in Canada . . . is that we have no great ticket to prosperity."

Mr. Ambridge said Finland will soon launch 600,000 tons of newsprint on the world market and has every intention of pushing out Canada. He added the Finns built paper mills with loans from the world bank as a step in alleviating the unemployment situation.

"We have to take note of these things," he urged. "We have to be alive to the fact we can not prosper without effort."

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Badanai: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will he say who that was he was quoting? I refer to what he has just finished reading.

Mr. Badanai: I was quoting Mr. D. W. Ambridge, president of the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company.

The reorganization of this department with a minister having practical knowledge of wood species is a progressive step towards a better management of our forests and effective co-ordination of federal and provincial responsibilities for the advancement of a truly Canadian forest policy. Our forests are not inexhaustible. Here I wish to quote from an article written for the Fort William Times Journal by someone who had made a study of the forest problems of northwestern Ontario:

> What seems to be lacking is a more scientific approach to reforestation and more centralized planning based on a better knowledge of future markets.
> Foresters admit considerable planting is done on a trial basis. If the trees survive, those in charge guessed right. If they don't, the reasons for failure are assessed with a questionable degree of accuracy, and the results recorded.
> Research and its practical applications are lagging far behind every day work in the field. Studies of soil, insects and climatic conditions are vital to successful reforestation.
> Another aspect is relating types of trees to be planted to markets which can be expected when they mature.
> Foresters state the district cut of spruce will soon reach the limits at which the species can be harvested in perpetuity under the present rate of reforestation. A high percentage of spruce is necessary for the making of newsprint.

The forestry industry one of the great national basic industries of Canada, is generally conceded to be making products that are essential to human needs and human progress. Paper is the basis of civilization, the very currency of culture. One could say that paper is the modern salesman, and its use in advertising has permitted the development of mass production. It is the mass medium of advertising products. Notwithstanding radio and television, newspaper advertising is still considered to be the supreme medium by which to convey messages from manufacturers, shopkeepers and dealers to prospective purchasers. I know that newspapers are vital to our civilization. Their influence has changed all merchandising and housekeeping methods, and has changed them for the better. In short, through the pulp and paper industry Canada's forest resources are contributing to human progress both at home and abroad.

This is a country which, more than any other with the possible exception of Sweden, depends on trees for a variety of reasons, and this dependence is being impressed more and more on many people. Trees not only are a means of providing cash income through lumbering operations but they benefit the economy indirectly through tourists and conservation of soil and water.

At a time when Canada is stimulating its economy by boosting its exports, trees play a most important part. If you were to ask what the chief export for this country was, in all probability the average person would answer by saying, "wheat". Actually the export of grain is no longer the No. 1 export commodity on the books of the Department of Trade and Commerce. According to figures released early in the year the value of newsprint exported in the first 11 months of 1960 was well over $700 million or twice the value of wheat exported during the same period. We therefore find great satisfaction in the agreement of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick to co-ordinate their resources for fighting forest fires.

I have indicated that this is an industry which provides not only a balance to our economy by means of exports, but also jobs for tens of thousands of workers. However, I must warn you, Mr. Chairman, that there are signs which should be disturbing to the Minister of Labour because automation is literally in the woods. I am informed that there is under development a pulpwood harvesting machine which is reputed to be able to climb and bark a full tree, then measure it and cut it to length. It can move forward at a speed of 1½ miles per hour; it weighs 14 tons, requires only one operator and one attendant and haul roads. It will process two 40-foot trees per minute. While it may take a few years for this latest development in automation to take place, such a change will have a considerable effect in the lakehead district which now keeps approximately 10,000 men employed in the bush.

Another disturbing suggestion which has made the rounds is that within 10 or 15 years our pulp and paper industry will face stiff competition from the Soviet union. It is no secret that the U.S.S.R. has extensive forests, particularly in Siberia, the resources of which have never been tapped. Great Britain is already buying lumber from that country and from European countries where forests are more intensively cultivated and managed than in any of our ten provinces and the productivity of which is, consequently, much higher.

I also point out that our best customer for forests products, the United States, has gone into forest planting in a big way. In order that hon. members may have an idea of the scale of this operation, perhaps I should say first of all that Ontario, which is perhaps one of the most forest conscious provinces of Canada, has a program for the reforestation of 60,000 acres for the year 1961. Forest planting in the United States in 1960 amounted to no less than 2,137,460 acres or 35 times the 1961 Ontario figure and that year was by no means exceptional. The United States foresters are doing a tremendous job. Among the biggest planters in that country were the state of Georgia with 330,196 acres; Florida with 196,963; Louisiana with 190,751; South Carolina, 168,251; Alabama, 186,148; Mississippi, 171,105; and Oregon with 120,597 acres.

I submit that the likely effect of all this forest planting in the United States on our newsprint industry in a few years will be unprecedented competition, and we should be prepared to meet this by doubling our efforts to expand our planting of the types of trees which can successfully compete with the species found in the northern states.

We welcome the statement which the minister made upon the introduction of his estimates to the effect that there is to be an expansion of the money to be devoted to research in the forest industries and into possible new export markets. The need for a considerable expansion in the field of forest product research is urgent. The minister well recognized the importance of this in his statement to the house. It is also an acknowledgement that our forests deserve better recognition. It is to be hoped that the administration will be such that forestry in Canada will be enhanced in all its aspects to benefit, first, the people of the country who are its shareholders and, second, those who depend directly on the forests for their livelihood; and that the pulpwood farmers may receive a fair price for their pulpwood, and fair treatment from provincial governments. In some cases settlers are paying more per cord for wood to the government than pulpwood companies. This is an area into which the minister might well inquire.

I conclude by saying to the minister that we on this side wish him good luck.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, may I also join with my colleagues in extending congratulations to the minister on his appointment to this very important portfolio of Minister of Forestry. Since his appointment, the minister has visited our province of British Columbia and his speeches have been well received. I wish to assure him that we look forward to seeing more of him.

I wish to say a few words on the need to provide greater and better forest fire protection. In view of the great number of forest fires which are raging across the country at this moment, I suggest that what I have to say can be classed as urgent. British Columbia has a very large stake in timber and in forestry products. The value of our lumber production and saw mill products in 1958 amounted to $356 million according to figures prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics. In 1960 we expect that the value of our lumber production will have reached an astronomical $738 million, an increase of $68 million over 1959. The next most productive province in 1958, by way of comparison, was Quebec with $76 million. It is therefore obvious that forestry is British Columbia's major industry. However, this major industry suffers very greatly each year because of inadequate forest fire protection. On a national basis, the cost of forest fire fighting amounted to $7.7 million in 1958, and the total damage and fire fighting costs for the same year were calculated to be $22.2 million, an amount almost twice the total budget for the Department of Forestry for this year.

We in British Columbia suffered disastrously in 1958 because in that year we had the worst fire season in history. Fire fighting costs and damage amounted to $13 million, almost equal to the total budget for this department. Huge though these sums might be, they still do not take into account such value as damage to soil, streamflow, wildlife, recreation and tourist facilities. Recent events from British Columbia to Newfoundland indicate that this is going to be another very bad year for this country, because the June 24 issue of the Vancouver Province devoted almost its entire front page to news about forest fires. The headline was, and I quote: "Huge Water Bomber Crashes, 4 Die". Another headline was "Flying 'Fire Engine' Just a Ghost Now." And then, on the second page were more headlines, and I quote again: "Forest Risk puts 3,000 Out of Work." On the same page was another headline reading: "Newfoundland Fires Drive 2,000 from Homes." If I remember correctly, yesterday's banner from the Toronto Telegram read: "Forest Fires Worst in Years."

What, then, can we do to provide adequate fire protection bearing in mind that the major share of the responsibility lies with the provincial government? I think, Mr. Chairman, that the minister should consider the establishment of a national forest fire service similar in concept to our recently established Canadian marine service. This will be composed of a highly mobile fleet of suitable aircraft such as Otters and helicopters. The usefulness of such an airborne fire fighting service has been well demonstrated in the province of Ontario, where up to this present year there has been a steady decrease in the number of forest fires, climaxed in 1959 when only 5,279 acres were burnt over. This figure represents the lowest loss in three decades and it clearly demonstrates what can be done by a program of public education and effective fire fighting measures. Ontario has a fleet of six Otters and 39 Beavers which are specially designed to scoop up water as the aircraft taxis over the lake. The water is then dispersed over the fire in an effective wetting action. In many cases two or three well placed loads have doused the fire to such an extent that an incoming ground crew had only to extinguish the smouldering embers. So effective has been this technique that the fire loss in Ontario has been reduced from an average of 75 acres per fire in the 1949-58 decade to an average of five acres per fire in 1959.

We in British Columbia have had similar good results with water bombing. The water bomber which crashed on June 24 started its work in very dramatic fashion. On June 17, one week before it crashed, the Vancouver Province carried the following article:

> Water bomber proves worth by hitting fire
> The big Martin Mars water bomber passed its first real test Friday when nearly 50,000 gallons were dropped on a difficult forest fire at Espinosa inlet, near Tahsis, on Vancouver island.
> It made eight drops to dampen and cool the fire sufficiently to allow ground crews in to control it.
> The fire, on three acres of a steep, narrow valley in an operation of the Stoltze and Sons Logging Company Limited, was fanned by strong winds and quickly covered about 40 acres.

This technique of containment emphasizes that there must be two ingredients for effective fire protection, namely, early spotting of the fire, and immediate preventive action by air, followed by prompt action by ground personnel. Because ground personnel must be brought in to ensure that the fire is completely out, I suggest that helicopters should be an integral part of the national forest fire service.

I think that the establishment of such a service is well within the resources of the federal government. I note that approximately $6.8 million will be contributed this year to the provinces for fire protection, forest inventory, reforestry action and other aspects of forest management. Twenty four Otters with spare parts would cost only $3.6 million. We could have these aircraft stationed across Canada at strategic locations. More might be necessary, but 24 would be a very good start. We could enter an agreement with the provinces concerned to fly and maintain the aircraft, or we could assume full responsibility for this service and reduce the yearly grants which we would make in the future to the provinces.

I can envisage all sorts of interesting arrangements being worked out with the provinces. For example, the provinces could provide the helicopters and the manpower required to deal with the fires on the ground because obtaining crews could be accomplished more easily by the local authorities. If we had an effective air fire service then fires would be checked in their early stages. We would not require the large number of men required in the past, some of whom were not trained in this activity and were often commandeered to do this type of thing. A small highly trained corps of fire fighters working in conjunction with the air service which I have suggested should go a long way toward reducing the damage caused by forest fires.

The minister announced in Nanaimo in April of this year that army and air force personnel would be available to help fight forest fires. I am pleased with that announcement, particularly as I urged this move last year during the debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. However, I have had second thoughts on this proposal because, if we were to use service personnel and aircraft not specifically designed for fire fighting we might be depriving the armed forces of men and equipment at a time when they should be deployed elsewhere. However, until such time as we do establish an alternative we, of course, welcome the assistance of the army and the air force. None the less, I think that a separate service is preferable, and my suggestion of creating a national forest fire service has the advantage of providing not only a further stimulus to our aircraft industry but also something which is of particular and urgent national need.

(Translation):

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, we are at present on item No. 1 of the estimates of the new Department of Forestry. Some would have preferred it to be named the "Department of Forest Research" or "Department of Silviculture" since paragraph 5 of section 92 of the British North America Act gives the provinces the exclusive power to administer as they see fit the forests within their boundaries and the federal government has responsibility in that field only as concerns the administration of forests in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Pursuant to Bill C-82, clause 6, 1960, an act respecting the Department of Forestry, the federal government:

> Shall provide for the conduct of research relating to the protection, management and utilization of the forest resources;
> May undertake, promote or recommend measures for the encouragement of public co-operation in the protection and wise use of the forest resources. With the approval of the governor in council, may enter into agreements with the government of any province, etc.—

Mr. Chairman, forest industry occupies a most important position in the economy of my riding, of the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole.

It gives me pleasure to congratulate the first incumbent of the portfolio of the new Department of Forestry, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Flemming) and I know that he has had practical experience in the production and marketing of forest products.

Mr. Chairman, over 40 per cent of the total area of the ten provinces is productive forest lands. It is nearly four times the area under cultivation, which gives an idea of the extent of our forest resources.

The pulp and paper industry is Canada's foremost manufacturing industry, and the lumbering, plywood and veneer industries are also very important.

Those industries are spread out across Canada from coast to coast, and apart from producing materials of great value, they rank among our main sources of employment.

Mr. Chairman, wood, wood products and paper are responsible for a much greater part of Canada's active trade balance than any other group of goods registered in federal statistics. Moreover, a considerable part of this active trade balance is made up of American funds.

In September 1959, the world food and agricultural organization produced a report on paper and paper products and stated, in brief, that the demand for paper and paper products, which was of the order of 56 million metric tons in 1955, would reach 88 million metric tons by 1965 and 134 million metric tons by 1975.

Mr. Chairman, Canada now supplies approximately 16 per cent of the world demand. If we want to maintain that share, we shall have to sell 14 million metric tons by 1965, which means raising our production by 50 per cent in relation to the basic year 1955. Around 1975, we will have to supply 21 million metric tons, which means raising our production by 123 per cent in relation to the basic year.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the introduction, on page 1, of "The Outlook for the Canadian Forest Industries", published in March 1957 by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, and I quote:

> Even in Canada, few realize the country's dependence upon its forest resources. Great construction projects, especially in connection with power, metal mining, oil and, recently, natural gas, have received great publicity. Yet they are small by comparison. Today, one of every 12 Canadians working in the nation's goods-producing industries is concerned with forestry or the manufacture of forest products. More than one third of Canada's total export earnings comes from the sale elsewhere of logs, paper, wood pulp, and lumber and its related products. Of all the manufacturing industries in Canada, that of pulp and paper stands first in terms of wages paid, first in new investment and first in net value of output. Its production in dollar terms is greater than that of the nation's wheat crop; more than twice that of all the nation's metal mines. In 1954, Canada's saw mills, with the second largest industrial wage bill, ran third in export earnings and fourth in net value of production.

Mr. Chairman, at this point of our discussion on the estimates of the Department of Forestry, I should like to give some figures concerning the forest industry, first of all with regard to the number of establishments, and then with regard to the number of people employed in those industries and the salaries and wages paid. Those figures, which relate to the year 1959, were given to me by the dominion bureau of statistics, forest products division.

Mr. Chairman, the first figures I quote are in relation to the whole of Canada and the second to the province of Quebec which I represent here like other hon. members.

In 1959, the lumber industry in Canada comprised 8,885 different firms, 1,575 of which were in the province of Quebec.

As far as the pulp and paper industry is concerned, we had 127 mills in Canada, of which 54 were located in Quebec.

Canadian industries using wood as their raw material numbered 4,079 of which 1,504 were in Quebec.

Veneer and plywood plants numbered 72 in Canada and 24 in the province of Quebec.

The following figures, Mr. Chairman, concern the number of persons employed as well as the salaries and wages paid by those industries.

As far as the forest industry proper is concerned, the number of employees in 1959, equalled 82,551 men in a single year, for a total amount of salaries and wages of $347,406,000. For the same industry, we had in the province of Quebec, for the equivalent of a year, 30,850 employees who earned a total of $117,741,000.

In 1959, there were 65,028 people working in the pulp and paper industry and the total salaries paid out was $322,311,000. As for the province of Quebec, there were 27,239 employees who earned a total of $131,913,000.

In 1959, 48,659 people derived their livelihood from the lumber industry in Canada and the total salaries paid out by that industry amounted to $144,759,000. For the same period, that industry employed 7,963 people in the province of Quebec and paid a total of $16,900,070 in salaries.

There were in the country 11,607 people with gross earnings of $40,600,058 in the veneer and plywood industry. In the province of Quebec, that industry ensured the livelihood of 2,609 people and paid out a total of $7.3 million in salaries.

In 1958, there were 73,159 people employed in the industry where wood is used as a raw material; they earned $226,882,000. The corresponding figures for the province of Quebec were 23,464 employees and $64,636,000.

Mr. Chairman, the forest industry is most important in the riding of Labelle which I represent in this house. On March 23 last, I stated in the house, as reported on page 3284 of Hansard, during consideration of another department's estimates, that many farmers of my riding have to work in the forest industry to supplement the insufficiency of the income they get from the sale of their agricultural products. That industry employs several thousand people. There is a veneer and plywood mill in Mont Laurier, a furniture manufacture in L'Annonciation and, in Thurso, where I live, a pulp and paper mill and a cabinet-making department. Besides, there are several saw mills, planing mills and sash and door manufacturers elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about the sale and distribution of forestry products. I regret that the federal government has not seen fit to take action on a recommendation we find on page 669 of the third report of the mines, forests and waters committee which was tabled in the house on July 4, 1959 and which reads as follows:

> Your committee feels that Canada cannot afford to neglect the vast potential Asiatic markets for the sale of lumber and pulpwood. It recommends that open-minded negotiations be undertaken with those countries. Our traditional share of the British and American markets is undergoing a change and we should look into the situation. Your committee recommends the establishment of a sales branch within the proposed forestry department. Such a branch would second the efforts of the Department of Trade and Commerce to promote the sale of our wood products.

Mr. Chairman, the sale of lumber and of our veneer and plywood products faces stronger competition on our traditional markets in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

In the United Kingdom our soft lumber has to compete with the products of the Soviet block and the Scandinavian countries. Besides having to compete in Europe against trade areas such as the common market, the outer seven, the Soviet bloc and others which are developing over there, in order to remove tariff barriers within their territories where services, labour and capital will be able to move as if there were no international boundaries, it is to be expected that tariff barriers will be set up against the countries which are not part of the areas concerned.

Mr. Chairman, in order to show the importance of our forest product exports, I shall quote figures given to me by the forestry division of the dominion bureau of statistics.

In 1959, we exported to Great Britain 671,359,000 f.b.m. of timber, or a total value of $53,052,264. In the same year, we exported to the United States 3,485,512,000 f.b.m. of timber, or a total value of $259,581,652. For the same year, our exports of plywood to the United Kingdom reached 1,517,000 f.b.m., valued at $41,337, while our exports to the United States reached 495,343,000 f.b.m., or $16,973,153.

Again in 1959, we exported to the United Kingdom 155,298,000 f.b.m. of plywood, averaging three quarters of an inch thick, for a value of $10,476,336. During the same year, we exported 28,814,000 f.b.m. of plywood of a total value of $4,596,826 to the U.S.

Mr. Chairman, as far as our domestic markets and the sales of our soft and hardwood species are concerned, it is a well known fact that when construction is up, so is the demand for our wood products. But as family housing construction declined last year, our lumber producers were also affected.

At this point of my remarks, and in relation with the competition on the lumber market, I should like to quote an excerpt from the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects:

To assume that the marketing of Canadian forest products will present no serious problem would be naive.

Then there is also the possibility that the manufacture of newsprint and other pulps from alternative materials will become an economic reality; that potential markets in a number of relatively underdeveloped countries will be shut off by the erection there of newsprint mills based on extensive local resources such as bagasse (sugar-cane waste) or tropical hardwoods—

But the most disconcerting question mark of all has to do with the possible competition of countries behind the iron curtain and especially Russia whose forest resources are tremendous.

Mr. Chairman, I see on pages 225 and 226 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, that the number of civil servants in the administrative branch of the Department of Forestry has increased from 110 in 1960-61 to 188 in 1961-62. I should hope that French speaking or bilingual employees are in adequate number to give satisfaction and justice to the thousands of French speaking Canadians engaged in the production of forest products in Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, in March 1961, the Minister of Forestry announced the appointment of the following senior officials in his department: Mr. H. W. Beall, Ottawa, executive director of the new department; Mr. J. H. Jenkins, Vancouver, director of research on forest products; Mr. D. R. Redmond, Upper Musquodoboit, N.S., director of forestry research and Mr. M. L. Prebble, Saint John, N.B., director of forest entomology and pathology.

I should like to quote a few excerpts from an editoral written by Mr. Jean Taillefer, parliamentary reporter of Le Droit, under the title: "A matter of efficiency". This article appeared in Le Droit of March 13, 1961. I quote:

It is to be noted, though, that no one from Quebec has been appointed to any of the higher positions.

The lack of Quebec representation is all the more surprising since forestry is one of the main industries of that province. It ranks second on a national scale, having 88,000 square miles of developed forest land. Only Ontario, with 101,000 square miles has more forest land than Quebec. Can we, therefore, believe that Quebec has no experts in that field?

Why is it so important to have bilingual personnel? For a very simple reason, which has nothing to do with emotionalism—efficiency.

Mr. Chairman, it should not be forgotten that the province of Quebec has a great number of French speaking forest producers, operating on a medium or a small scale, and I hope that the minister will see to it that somebody from Quebec is appointed when other important appointments are made in his department.

(Text):

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to note the increase in forestry over the last year, which coincides with the time that the new minister has been in office. We from the maritime area were very proud to see a member from our area take the portfolio of forestry. We recognize that in the minister who now holds that post we have a man who knows the forest industry and is very interested in the development of what is one of our most important Atlantic industries.

I have before me an article in the Cape Breton Post of Friday December 30, 1960, referring to a speech by Mr. R. M. Fowler, the president of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association and the newsprint association of Canada. In the article Mr. Fowler is reported as having said that 1960 was a very good year in forestry and his figures showed an increase of 5 per cent in the output of the Canadian pulp and paper industry last year. Mr. Fowler also pointed out that newsprint production in 1960 was a record at about 6,735,000 tons, 4 per cent above the previous high of 1956. Quoting Mr. Fowler, the article goes on to say:

This increase was the largest shown in any of the last 13 years and was more than the modest amount of new productive capacity which became available in Canada during the year. As a result, newsprint operating ratios averaged about 88.5 per cent compared with 85 per cent of a smaller capacity in 1959.

He also went on to point out that shipments overseas were almost 20 per cent higher than in 1959, with increases to the United Kingdom, Australia and South America being particularly large. Speaking of the future he said that he expected to see substantial increases in the markets for Canadian newsprint and paper products generally.

The matter of forestry is very important to me because in my riding at the present time there is being constructed a pulp mill which will have a marked effect upon the province of Nova Scotia in the years ahead. In 1959, at the invitation of the government of Nova Scotia and with the assistance provided by the government, Stora Kopperberg of Sweden and the Scott Paper people of the United States combined to form Nova Scotia Pulp Limited and began construction of a $40 million mill. The target date for the operation of the mill is January, 1962. The mill will produce 250 tons per day and 125,000 tons a year of high grade pulp. It will utilize 250,000 cords a year of eight-foot pulpwood sticks, almost 800 cords a day and at peak times some 2,000 cords a day. If this pulpwood were stacked in a continuous four-foot pile, it would be some 380 miles long. It would extend from Cape North in Inverness county to Yarmouth at the other end of the province. Most of the wood, it is estimated, will come from the seven eastern counties of Nova Scotia where there are some 3.3 million acres of productive forest land. About 1 million of these acres are owned by the crown in the right of the province and the balance is privately owned.

One of the reasons the provincial government was so interested in bringing Stora Kopperberg into the province was that this firm had been, for many years, operating in Sweden and had learned there the most modern and best ways of forest management. Under its contract with the province, it will set up a proper forest management operation on the crown lands and will assist private woodlot owners in every way possible to farm their wood lands in the most productive manner in terms of the pulp which will be needed in the years ahead. Under the plan divisional foresters will be set up at New Glasgow, Port Hawkesbury and Baddeck.

The impact of this new mill upon the economy of the province can be illustrated by the fact that the pulp cut in Nova Scotia in 1958 was some 270,874 cords, and in 1959 was 288,029 cords. If we add to this the 250,000 cords that will be required by Nova Scotia Pulp Limited each year, it will be seen that the new mill will almost double the demand for pulpwood in the province of Nova Scotia. It has been estimated that the new money involved, in the hands of the people cutting pulp alone, will be in excess of some $10 million a year. In addition to the new market which has been developed this way in eastern Nova Scotia, over the last year we have seen a very marked increase in the demand for pulpwood for export. New markets have opened up in Europe, particularly in western Germany and shipments are being made now from Louisburg and it is proposed there will be some from Whycocomagh in Inverness county. I have before the Minister of Public Works now proposals to provide special wharfage facilities at Whycocomagh, Louisburg and Port Hastings to facilitate the shipment of this pulp. I hope that something can be provided at these centres as soon as possible to assist this rapidly growing industry.

I notice that all members when speaking on the estimates of this department referred to the necessity, in terms of the future of Canada, of forest management plans which will provide for the very substantial need for forest products in the future. There was a time when Canada could afford to waste its forest products, but that time has now gone. We must look forward in the years ahead to ensuring that we have a sufficient cut to meet the new markets and the new demands which are opening up. Apropos of that, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that in the province of Nova Scotia, more than in any other province, this is a particularly important question. I spoke a moment ago of the large market for pulpwood there will be in the province after January, 1962.

It is interesting to note that Nova Scotia has a rather small productive forested land compared with other provinces. Nova Scotia has some 9,668,000 acres of productive forested land. Our neighbours in New Brunswick have some 15,237,000 acres. Nova Scotia has less than 10 per cent of the forested land of Quebec where there is over 140 million acres of productive forested land. The province of Ontario has some 106 million acres of forested land. It will be seen that the necessity for forest management and the preservation of our forests, is much more important and urgent in Nova Scotia than in any other part of Canada because in our province trees are scarcer than elsewhere in relation to the demand that is now developing for pulpwood and for forest products in general. In Nova Scotia every tree must be properly utilized in the years ahead.

However, Mr. Chairman, the difficulties of forest management in Nova Scotia are greater than they are in the other provinces. In Nova Scotia, there is a relatively small part of the forested area which is owned by the crown. About 20 per cent of the forested area in Nova Scotia is crown land. This can be contrasted with about 50 per cent crown ownership in New Brunswick and some 90 per cent in the province of Quebec. The putting into operation of plans for forest management and tree farming is much easier, of course, in provinces where large acreages are owned by the crown and arrangements can easily be made for the development of publicly owned land. The job is much more difficult where, as in Nova Scotia, the task is to bring to the attention of private woodlot owners how important modern woodlot management is for immediate use and for the preservation of our forests for the future. This is a very difficult problem which will have to be worked out between the province and the woodlot owners. However, we will have the leadership of Nova Scotia Pulp Limited in solving this problem, and they have some of the best experts in the world in the field of forest management.

I was very pleased, Mr. Chairman, to see the quick way in which the new Department of Forestry, under this new minister, has responded to the need for the development of better forestry practices in Canada, and has generally stimulated the forest industry. The program whereby this government pays 50 per cent of the cost of access roads to be built into timberlands will be particularly helpful in Nova Scotia. I understand that under the program now in effect some 130 miles of boundary line in Inverness county will be cleaned out, some 90 miles in Richmond county, about 90 miles in Cape Breton county and similar mileages in other counties in eastern Nova Scotia. This will facilitate forest management, the preservation of the forest in case of forest fire, and generally give access to the timberlands for the development of better timber operations. While fire is a very dangerous thing in any part of Canada, it is particularly to be feared in Nova Scotia where our forests are so small in relation to the market that is to be developed in the province. I note that 50 per cent of the cost of the equipment for fire protection is now provided by the Department of Forestry. I hope that close liaison will continue between the department of lands and forests in Nova Scotia and the federal Department of Forestry in providing better forest protection in the province of Nova Scotia. The department of lands and forests under the able administration of the Hon. E. Haliburton in Nova Scotia, has a big job ahead in the organizational work which must be done to help the woodlot owners provide the pulpwood for the new mill. As I have said, it represents a doubling of last year's pulpwood cut.

The province will have to initiate an extensive project of education among the private woodlot owners. I think this should be in two forms. There should certainly be adult education among the farmers who own woodlots now directed toward efficient woodlot management and there should be education in the schools so that our young people will learn proper forest management techniques. Above all, our young people should learn to appreciate the need for proper forest management in the province. I was very pleased to note the special grant that has been provided by the Department of Forestry for emergency work in Cape Breton Island in the months immediately ahead, when extra work will be needed because of the unfortunate mine closings. The money set aside to be used along with the contributions of the department of lands and forests in Nova Scotia will certainly give a big impetus to the work that the provinces must do in establishing a satisfactory forestry corps, in providing trees that can be planted on privately owned lands and otherwise in the development of woodlot management practice.

I know it is not within the authority of the federal department to originate very much in a direct way in forestry management practices as this is a matter under the authority and aegis of the province. However, I should like to see the minister do everything he can to assist Nova Scotia in the big job that is ahead in the establishment of illustration stations to teach forest management methods in woodland replanting and so on. Certainly as I watch this new industry mushrooming in the province and realize what a great boom it will give to all of eastern Nova Scotia, it is with particular pleasure that I see as head of the federal Department of Forestry such a good friend of Nova Scotia and such a well known, warmly liked and respected leader from the maritime provinces.

Mr. Peters: I hope the minister this afternoon, in introducing his estimates for the first time in this new department, will take into consideration some of the officials he has in the gallery and see to it that they are rewarded for having to be here on July 1 which normally should be a holiday for them.

I also hope the minister will take into consideration some of the remarks that have been made, particularly those by such veteran foresters as the hon. member for Kootenay West who is probably one of the only members of the committee who is completely familiar with modernization in the forest industry, controlling and operating as he does a large tract of forest that is not subject to any of the abuses that occur in my area. He has told me on a number of occasions that his land will now produce more lumber than it did when he first started to operate that forest. That certainly is not the situation in my part of the country. This is one of the reasons why I am so pleased that this ministry has been set up and why I suggest that consideration should be given to that type of forest control.

I was very much surprised a few years ago to find that a company with which I was negotiating on behalf of their workers informed me that they expected to be out of that area in five years. The reason I was surprised was that this operation had been continuing under the same company for something over 40 years. It seemed to me that if they had cut that long ago on their first limit, they would soon be ready to go back and to start recutting the area which they had previously cut over. I think this was a legitimate hope, and the hope that most Canadians have, namely that our forest industry, because it is renewable, has renewed itself and that we have as much forest today as we had many years ago.

In this case the manager had practised many of the best forms of forest culture without going into such things as assisting nature in reforestation which many of these operators have said is of no value. However, he informed me that it will be at least 90 years before they will be able to make any economical cut of lumber off the first limits this company went over. This seems to me to be something which should be of immediate importance to the department and about which they should try to do something right away.

We have listened many times to those who are interested in silviculture tell us that the forest will regenerate in those areas where reforestation has taken place, that reforestation is a natural thing and that there is not any necessity to help nature along. For those who say this and who think this, may I say that all they have to do is to look a few miles from the city of Ottawa or up the Ottawa valley. They may be surprised to find what has happened to the white pine industry that years ago gave this region such security when it was thought this forest would be perpetual. They only have to look up the Ottawa valley now and note the very limited forests and stands of white pine.

It is quite true that in my area of northern Ontario red pine and jack pine will have a certain amount of regeneration themselves. But because this is a renewable resource, because it is one of the resources that we have and can leave to our children, it behooves us not only to leave it in as good shape as we received it but to leave it in much better shape, and to give consideration to the needs that are already apparent and will become increasingly apparent as the years go by.

This means, of course, that we must concentrate on conservation, and that we must use some of the other resources. We must look to the maintaining and conserving of our water and water resources or we are not going to be able to reforest many of these areas which the Minister of Agriculture now hopes will be brought under an agricultural program for reforestation. If we do not practise conservation in some of the allied fields, this is not going to be possible and we are going to find that the land which has been cut over—and quite a bit of it in northern Ontario is now completely barren—will grow only scrub forest products for many years to come and that it will be another generation or two before anything of any value is produced in those areas.

I know of one small area where the timber was burnt over and jack pine came up. One of the sad parts of the situation is this. Those interested in silviculture would say that so many seeds germinated in that area and so many live trees were produced per square foot or per square yard whatever they measure it by; and while this was true, those trees reached a height of only 10 feet or 12 feet. They were a very poor type of tree. Fire got into them and they were burnt to the ground. In five or six years they came up again. By this time the trees that had burnt and fallen as a result of the previous fire, again caught fire. This is the sort of thing that has been going on. It has happened three or four times in my lifetime. There is nothing growing in that particular area and it has produced absolutely nothing.

This department has many facets, in my opinion. It has many opportunities to do a great deal of good for Canada and for the Canadian people, and the least of them is not the tourist industry. Of course, the problem we are going to have with a federal forestry department is that it is competing with terrifically rich provincial counterparts. The one in Ontario is probably the most expensive department we have. It is a department that does not take in enough money to pay for its expenditures. It is a particular department that has all types of public facilities for spreading its doctrine or its information. Its educational field is almost unlimited. The federal government is, without doubt, going to have trouble in co-ordinating some of the activities of these departments. One of them would be the problem with the tourist industry. It has been maintained by bush operators that if you allow the tourists in, of course, they will create terrific fire hazards and the limits will suffer as a result of tourist travelling through the bush. However, we have in Ontario, I am sure, been able to solve this to a great extent by having fire ratings, and I am pleased to note that the federal government is now co-ordinating these fire services and fire protection services through the forest research division.

We have found that if you post a rating to the tourist industry and the rating remains medium, the difficulties, for which it does not follow the tourists are responsible, seem to be eliminated to an extent. The travelling of the tourist population through the forests does as much good as it does harm, in my opinion, because the tourists then see the advantages of forest control, the need for reforestation and the need for roads and other facilities. I hope to live to see the day when many of these areas which are now well cut over, and particularly those which are not, but which are in the process of being cut, may be driven into by car. I hope to see the day when we shall find permanent residences in the forests, and permanent towns, and when the forests will be managed in such a way that we shall have a sustained yield in perpetuity. This can be done, and it has been done in other countries. There is no reason why we should not begin at once working towards perpetuity in the yield of our forest products.

This involves more than the maintenance of the forests. It may be necessary to change the type of tree which we have produced, as has been necessary in the United States. It may be that in a few years we shall have to plant trees of the type they have been planting in some of the southern states and these can be adapted to our climate. Many of these trees can be used in the production of pulp and paper. They have short life span. They will produce much faster than the trees we now use. It is true they produce an inferior grade of paper, but the advantage of the rapid growth and the rapid production of these trees may make it necessary for the department to be aware of their potential and the adaptability of these trees to our area.

There is another field which affects us in northern Ontario and that is in relation to the utilization of forest products. Our white pine industry has had between a 60 per cent and 65 per cent utilization of its products. In other countries it is reported that the utilization sometimes goes up as high as 100 per cent or 98 per cent. They even utilize the leaves, in some cases, they tell me, and put them to some use. In northern Ontario in recent years we have been able to take advantage of developments that are taking place in countries such as Sweden. Some of our manufacturers have gone to Sweden and to Germany and have been able to buy equipment in those countries and learn the know-how necessary to operate plants, and they are now producing a number of varieties of wood products which are not in competition with the lumber industry. Abitibi is to be congratulated on this, particularly on the development of their chip board plant at Sturgeon Falls. The Jamar Plywood company at Sturgeon Falls has been using poplar wood for making veneer. They are now using a birch veneer face and producing an exceptionally nice type of plywood which is readily saleable at reasonable prices. In previous years in areas that were cut over either the birch was cut and left on the ground or it was not cut at all, and many of the old trees, when the spruce and pine were cut down, died because the protection was taken away from them. Those trees that are now useable are being used for this type of veneer. This has produced a whole new industry and provided employment for a great number of employees who could not be employed in the only other industry, that of mining. So, if the government is watching these developments, as are many in the lumbermen's association, the Ontario provincial forestry department and other associations, I am quite sure processes can be developed which will lead to a much greater utilization of our forest resources. This would, of course, also assist in developing and promoting new industries and new types of products such as we have seen develop in the last few years.

I do not know how much work the federal government has done in the past in relation to some of these projects. I was interested in the process which A. J. McFadden were using of taking very short step lumber from their white pine mill, short pieces which would otherwise be useless because of their size, cutting out anything which was of no use and putting them together by an electronic glue process, producing a board four by eight or four by 12 or four by 16. This produced an acceptable product, one suitable for a number of uses. They immediately ran into the problem of maintaining the same moisture content on one side of the board as on the other. It was used for external purposes. The government, it seems to me, could have given them a great deal of assistance at first if they had been active in this particular field.

The federal government, also through the forestry branch, could give more assistance than has been available to the lumber industry in the marketing of lumber products. In eastern Canada, in eastern Ontario, we have been plagued in recent years by the fact that traditional markets in the United States and Asia were lost, in the main, to the west coast. They were immediately in competition with producers in eastern Canada. It appears to me that the federal government, through their own department, in this way will be able to assess much better than it has in the past the necessity of developing a market in China and in the other countries of Asia for the lumber that is produced on the west coast. This lumber, if it is dumped out of its traditional markets into eastern Canada, will seriously affect the prices both of eastern and western lumber.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre referred to fire control. This has become one of the greatest blights of the forest industry.

It is one that can eliminate a complete limit, so that a company almost overnight loses its means of survival. Weather, electrical storms, factors over which man has no control at all are playing a great role in this field. I was interested in the hon. member's suggestion that we should use more aircraft, and that we should bring this activity under federal control. I hope the hon. member is right, but I should be very surprised if the federal government is in any position to do anything about fire control in the provincial field unless it be through an increase in the contributions to the provinces in this particular field. It seems to me that fires can be fought only by people on the ground. If these individuals are not placed at the scene of the fire as quickly as possible the fire gets out of control and very little can be done about it at that stage.

I recommend to the government that rather than going into a program of buying aircraft to be used in a national fire protection service, it should increase its appropriations to the provinces, assisting them to continue the work now being done. In my opinion most of the provinces, although I can really only speak for the two, in regard to which I have made observations, are doing a great deal in this field and have proven capable of carrying on, unless of course a province is hit by a disaster such as appears to have hit the province of Newfoundland. The fire prevention techniques used there have had little effect. People there are being accused of setting the fires deliberately for the purpose of creating work. Similar accusations have been made in respect of the province of Ontario, as well as other provinces.

I think this area of fighting forest fires is one in which the federal government should make more contributions. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre when he suggests army personnel should be used wherever possible and when the necessity arises, but I suggest the army is not the best agency in this regard. While the army contains a readily available force and its personnel are capable of taking orders and doing the job, which is not the case very often in respect to men who are commandeered in areas to fight fires, it is not the most effective agency which could be used. Incidentally, among the individuals commandeered to fight fires in specific areas are included white collar workers and the like who are not accustomed to using shovels and the other tools, such as pumps, used to fight fires, and do not make good fire fighters even in cases of emergency. I do agree that army personnel should be used but suggest, however, that the major contribution this government could make toward fire fighting lies in the field of research and the provision of assistance to the provinces.

One of the last subjects to which I wish to refer has relation to a government agency such as the industrial development bank through which financial assistance can be given to companies not in a position to expend the necessary amounts of money for the installation of efficient fire fighting equipment. Many mills now operating in the province of Ontario are poorly equipped in this regard, and perhaps not sufficiently informed as to the proper use of the equipment they have so as to make full use of it, or the equipment which they might acquire if funds were made available for that purpose.

This department can give assistance to these companies in two ways. First, by conducting a survey regarding the anticipated yield over the next few years which these different mills should enjoy. In other words, the department should help these companies assess their anticipated yields and instruct them in the efficient and advantageous operation of their mills in this regard.

For example, in northern Ontario there are a number of portable mills in operation. They are usually put in on a limited cut basis and under normal circumstances take only the cream of the crop leaving the rest standing in the area. As a result it is not advantageous for anyone else to come in and service the limit as I believe it should be serviced. It might be much more advantageous to these companies to put in mills even smaller than portable mills. The portable mills now in use are portable only in the sense that they can be moved with a great deal of effort by truck, but some of them in my area cut up to 100,000 feet per day. I am sure the minister will agree that type of mill is not portable in the normal sense.

The modernization program which I have suggested can be undertaken only if the companies involved are provided with new sources of money. I suggest that in many cases they do not possess the necessary information to convince the officials of the industrial development bank that their operations are such to warrant the lending of the amount of money required.

They are not in possession of that type of information only because they have neglected to hire accountants and agents to provide them with it. Officials of this department or other experts are much more able to assess the situation and make recommendations which, if followed, could possibly lead to the continuation of a successful industry upon which communities have depended for many years.

I hope the minister in closing the debate will indicate that he is receiving co-operation from provincial governments in the implementation of this necessarily continuous program in an attempt to perpetuate the yield from this type of operation so that those industries which have failed in the past years can be rejuvenated and put back into production with resultant benefit to the communities which have depended upon them for their livelihood.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I have to rise on a question of privilege in connection with certain remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming in referring to the member for Kootenay West. In view of that hon. member's kindly and glowing references to my forestry activities I should not like the impression created that I am in any sense of the word a capitalist, because I am a socialist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: I am a socialist who looks upon himself as a trustee for the nation until the advent of democratic socialism.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question. Would the description feudal lord be a little more appropriate?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend that my remarks be construed to mean that anyone connected with the forest industry was a capitalist. I should think anyone interested in that field would be well aware of the fact that most socialistic countries manage their forests in a very efficient manner. I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West is advocating a program followed by most socialist countries—Sweden is a good example—of up to date, advantageous and efficient forestry control.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I cannot compete with the hon. member for Kootenay West either as a member of the feudal class or as a socialist, because my connection with the forest industry was quite a long time ago and highly proletarian. I worked in a box factory once at Norwood for 20 cents per hour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: And subsequently spent a summer timber cruising at $35 per month.

An hon. Member: You were overpaid.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was quite a long time ago when the dollar stretched much further than it does at the present time.

I did not intend to speak on this subject but am prompted to do so after listening to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, because I want to reinforce an excellent point he made. Before doing that I should like to say a word or two about an observation made by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

It so happens, as every hon. member of this house knows, that there have been very serious fires in my constituency which actually destroyed some of the houses in one of the settlements and threatened the total existence of a great many others. Happily the rain we had there two or three days ago seems to have removed the threat. Unless there is a good deal more rain—and there has been very little in Newfoundland since a year ago this spring—that threat is bound to persist.

The appeal made by the hon. member for Timiskaming, and possibly by other hon. members when I was not in the chamber is one in which I should like to join heartily. I believe that anything the new Department of Forestry can do to aid in research into more effective methods of fighting fires will be one of the most productive expenditures of public money that can possibly be made in this country because it still happens, notwithstanding our great mineral wealth and all the other resources of this country, that the two greatest crops we grow in Canada are trees and grain; and if we look after our basic soil and our basic resources we can continue to grow them for all time. It seems that this year, because of weather conditions, both of them are seriously threatened. We know that millions and millions of dollars of public funds have been expended over the years in research into the various aspects of the wheat industry, and we know that all that has been spent has been more than repaid many times over in additional returns not merely to the farmers but to the whole Canadian economy. The forest industry is, I suppose, today the biggest single source of income to the Canadian people as a whole if we look at all of its ramifications. It is indeed fitting that at this time we should be recognizing that fact by having a separate department of government, though we all recognize that the jurisdiction that belongs to this department as compared with the jurisdiction of the provinces is very limited indeed. For my part I am not going to expect the minister to work miracles. He, of course has a very real personal knowledge —a lifetime knowledge—of the forest industry himself, and though I do not agree with his politics, I find him an agreeable person. Although I do not expect miracles, I am sure he is going to bring that practical experience to the administration of his department and mix it with the scientific knowledge that already exists and the great scientific knowledge that we hope will be developed in the years to come.

I am not going to make a general discourse about the industry. What I rose to do was to speak about two things: One was this fire situation which in the province of Newfoundland—and apparently in some of the other provinces as well because there have been very serious fires in northern Ontario, in Manitoba, and in British Columbia—is serious indeed. We do know that these forest fires do not destroy the timber; at least they do not always destroy it or they do not generally destroy it. We also know that the greatest possible care has to be taken to harvest that timber at the right time after there has been a fire, and sometimes exceptional measures must be taken to do that. I am speaking now particularly of Newfoundland. I admit that this will primarily be a problem for the provincial government and for the two paper companies and the other interests that have title or leases. The situation will vary in each particular case. I plead with the department to give, as I am sure they can and intend to, every possible co-operation to the government of Newfoundland and to the government of any other province that needs it in ensuring that the burnt timber will be harvested at the right time and in the most effective way so that we can minimize to the greatest degree possible this very serious loss that there is going to be in any event. No one in the circumstances we have had in this last little while could have done more than was done.

In this context, sir, perhaps you would permit me to say that I think everyone in the area concerned appreciated enormously the ready co-operation of the armed forces of Canada, of the armed forces of the United States which were most helpful in the area, and also the generous and unsolicited co-operation extended by the government of the province of Quebec, the only province which really has a common boundary with the province of Newfoundland and which has a great deal of effective fire fighting equipment, some of which was made available. As the member for the district in which those fires took place I should like to say that this help from the government of Canada, the government of the United States and the government of Quebec was deeply appreciated by the people and will not be forgotten.

I rose also to say a word or two about the subject mentioned by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. He pointed out that in addition to this new mill in Cape Breton there was also developing in Europe a market for pulpwood, and that is true. He appealed to the minister, though, of course, it is not directly this minister's responsibility, to offer his support to any steps that might be required to provide shipping facilities for that pulpwood. Actually the minister—and I am glad he is in the house and can hear me—who would have to provide those facilities is the Minister of Public Works. But this minister has not the same intimate relationship, either officially or in his past experience of forestry, that the Minister of Forestry has, and I am sure he will be the first to admit it. But there is not any question whatsoever that all over eastern Canada—and I am sure the Minister of Forestry knows this also—there is a great deal of over-mature timber which the pulp and paper companies have not been able to absorb because it was not as conveniently situated or for some other reason, and which should be cut as quickly as possible or it is going not merely to perish itself but do harm to the forest because if over-mature timber is allowed to stand and then to fall I am told it is a much greater prey to disease than is young healthy timber. This is of the utmost importance.

I admit that in the management of those forests the provinces and the companies concerned have the prime responsibility. But particularly in some of the provinces which are anxious to have federal co-operation there is a great deal that a wise federal department can do to help. I thing I can say, although I am not in any way authorized to speak for the provincial authority, that in Newfoundland there will be a ready welcome for any assistance that the minister and his department are able to offer in this respect.

I should like to say also, sir, just as I said to the Minister of Public Works the other day when his estimates were before the house—I think it bears repetition because the point is exactly that which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond was seeking to make as well—it so happens that a wharf had to be replaced in the northern part of my riding because it had been there for many years and it had rotted away. It was going to cost a very large sum of money. I confess when the project came before me as a member of the previous government I gasped a little at the amount in relation to the size of the place and wondered whether it was really going to return—not to the treasury, because those wharves do not return perhaps very much to the treasury, but to the economy—an amount commensurate with the cost. A wharf was built by the present government at a place called Carmanville and millions of cords of pulpwood that no one had any idea were going to be cut and shipped over that wharf are being shipped over it to Italy at this very moment and a good price is being received. This is wood that is surplus to the requirements of either the companies in Newfoundland. It is wood that is mostly over-mature and that would be a dead loss to the Canadian economy if it were not cut. In that whole strait shore area of my constituency it has kept dozens of men and their families off unemployment insurance and off relief in the past winter.

There is another area in my riding called Goose bay, not the Goose Bay in Labrador but Goose bay on the island of Newfoundland, where a similar operation is about to commence. In this particular area around a settlement called Lethbridge, not that more recent place in Alberta which is perhaps somewhat better known but the original Lethbridge, there is a great deal of timber that should also be cut and salvaged before it becomes over-mature. A useful industry can be developed there that will do for that area what has been done by the development at Carmanville, but a wharf somewhere in that bay is going to be needed in order to make it possible to ship that timber economically.

I know this is not the minister's responsibility, but I am suggesting to him that he give his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, a nudge every once in a while to find out whether that minister's engineers are really working hard enough at this project and getting ahead with it. It is for that reason that I rose to speak. I am often labelled in this house as a free trader, but I know that we would all rather have our pulpwood wholly processed in Canada instead of shipping it as pulpwood, but the minister knows and I know that if we have not got the plant to do it and we have over-mature wood for which there is a cash market we are crazy not to take it.

With the great prosperity that has developed in Europe as a result of the common market and with the vastly increased market there, there is a chance for us in eastern Canada to have a good cash crop, such as the wheat crop has been in the past to the west, that will help to tide us over until the time when we can get processing plants in eastern Canada to process all the wood there. The fact that this wood is being produced and that means are being found to produce it and ship it would encourage people to come in there with capital and build processing plants. I suggest that any and every kind of encouragement that the Minister of Forestry gives, both within the cabinet and with the provincial governments of the eastern provinces, particularly the province of Newfoundland, will be very welcome indeed and will, I am sure, bring a great return to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Keays: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does the province of Newfoundland permit the export of wood cut on crown lands?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is permitted but under very strict control as, of course, there should be. We do not want young growing timber exported before its time, but in Newfoundland, as I am sure is the case in practically all the other provinces, there is the most rigorous kind of forest management applied, and I would not advocate anything else.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, my remarks at this time will be rather brief. I should like to extend my congratulations and best wishes to the minister on his assumption of this highly important portfolio. In the Niagara peninsula we do not have any forests and we have very few woodlots. However, we have eight paper mills, some of which are very large, and the supply of pulpwood is most important to us. It comes in by boat and it also comes in by rail.

A great deal has been said today about pulpwood so I will not deal with that matter but I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the scarcity of hardwood which is becoming acute in the province of Ontario. Just recently the seaway authority had reason to purchase substantial quantities of oak timbers and they were just not to be found in this country. As a result, on three occasions large orders for oak timbers had to go to the United States.

I bring to the attention of the minister the need to take action as to this problem. I am thinking in terms of trees such as oak, ash, beech and hickory which used to grow extensively in the province of Ontario but at the present time seem to be almost dying out. There are other kinds of valuable trees such as the sycamore, plane tree, basswood and hard chestnut which are almost things of the past. I feel that attention should be given to trying to bring trees of this type into production again.

I should also like to refer to our shade trees. Too often we see trees planted along city streets and around houses that are just not suitable from the point of view of growing and becoming proper shade trees. When one visits some of the old estates in Ontario one will see beautiful trees growing there of types that are almost extinct in other parts of the country.

In conjunction with the department of lands and forests of the province I believe the minister should give consideration to the three points I have mentioned, the scarcity of hardwood timber in the province of Ontario, the scarcity of special trees such as basswood, chestnut and walnut, which used to grow in great profusion and are now almost a thing of the past, and the matter of shade trees because they too are not receiving the attention that they should. Varieties that are most suitable for planting are sometimes hard to get.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming). No doubt it was because of his great qualities that he was appointed minister immediately after his election to the House of Commons. I should think he has been quite lucky to find a job after losing the one he had in his province of New Brunswick. My only wish is, that Canada's unemployed could find jobs as easily as the Minister of Forestry.

Unfortunately for him, his employment will not last very long, I am afraid, since following the next general election, he will have to be satisfied, if he is not defeated, with being a private member.

Mr. Pigeon: What about Restigouche-Madawaska?

Mr. Denis: However, I want to warn the minister that he will experience much difficulty in the discharge of his duties, because about half the amounts the house has to vote for the good administration of his department are related to joint agreements. The minister undoubtedly knows that all the Conservative members of parliament from the province of Quebec have criticized the joint agreements in their province. He is also aware of the fact that those gentlemen have voted in favour of those estimates. Indeed, they are always in favour of them in Ottawa and against them in the province of Quebec. That is their way of gaining popularity and winning elections at all costs.

Mr. Pigeon: Could I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to tell the story of the speaker who was asked, during a political meeting, whether he was for or against prohibition. He replied: "Some of my friends are in favour of prohibition, others are against, and I support my friends."

The Conservative members from the province of Quebec adopted the same attitude when they wholeheartedly supported—

(Text):

Mr. Keays: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member whether he is confusing "timbre" and timber?

[Mr. Smith (Lincoln).]

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I want to convince the house that the Minister of Forestry will find it quite difficult to get along with members from Quebec, since they criticize outside this house half the budget that the house is called upon to vote. They used to do it at the time of the Union Nationale. I would like to have the following information from the Minister of Forestry. As I told him, he is intelligent and hard working, so I am sure he will be glad to give us these statistics.

I should like the minister to tell us what amount has been spent by the federal government in all the provinces, under items 153 and 154, since those agreements with the provinces came into effect.

I want the people to know how much money the province of Quebec has lost as a result of that famous attitude held by some people of my province, that joint agreements should be refused because they were presumed to encroach upon provincial autonomy.

I should like the minister to tell us how much this false understanding of automomy cost us. In addition, I should like to know whether, since it came into power, the new Liberal government of the province of Quebec has accepted to participate in joint agreements to get its share of the money spent in Ottawa and which derives from the taxes paid not only by the people of Quebec but by those of the other provinces.

I should like the Minister of Forestry to give us the statistics on joint agreements from the beginning.

I see that last year and in the previous years there was another item concerning joint agreements for the control of bud worms and other insects. I understand the government made payments in this connection to various provinces. At least, I know New Brunswick received some every year, or almost every year, as the Minister of Forestry undoubtedly is aware, since he was the premier of that province. He also knows that New Brunswick forests are next to or very close to those of Quebec.

I should like the minister to tell the house what amounts were paid New Brunswick for insect control, and how much Quebec received from Ottawa in that connection, because in the years past that pest plagued Quebec forests and my impression is that the cost of the air spraying done then was borne exclusively by the private companies and by the province of Quebec.

Therefore, I should appreciate it to learn from the Minister of Forestry what are the amounts received by the province of Quebec through joint agreements on assistance to fight disease due to insects or cutworm.

I take this opportunity to wish him once more every success in his department. Like the other speakers who preceded me, I deplore the fact that he did not give French Canadians a fair share of higher positions, especially when the Quebec forest industry ranks among the most important in this country. It would only have been decent and normal to appoint to the higher echelons of that department a few French Canadians or at least Canadians who know and talk French.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 152 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I should like, if possible, to get from the officials of the minister the information I asked concerning the amount of money paid under joint agreements under items 153 and 154 as well as the item on assistance to control tree diseases. There is no such item this year but the Department of Forestry is authorized I believe to make arrangements with the various provinces to assist in fighting those diseases.

(Text):

Mr. Flemming (Royal): I think in a moment or two I would be able to give the hon. gentleman the information which he has just requested concerning the amount of money paid under these various headings to the province of Quebec. However, it will take a few minutes to get it ready.

Mr. Denis: Since the inception of the agreement, not only this year but last year.

Mr. Flemming (Royal): I think we can furnish the information.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the committee would like to pass a few items while we are waiting.

Mr. Denis: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we stand this item?

Mr. Habel: No.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, since the minister is taking a few minutes to find those figures, I would like to tell him that we were pleased to see the setting up of a department of forestry. Like previous speakers, I hope the minister, who is said to be an expert in that field, will find a means of making an important contribution to the conservation of Canadian forests, which are no doubt one of the main resources we have in Canada.

At this stage, I should like to pay tribute to two paper companies located in my constituency. For several years those companies have been experimenting with reforestation. The Spruce Falls Pulp & Paper Company, for example, has a whole experimentation establishment at Moonbeam; I think the Minister of Forestry would find highly interesting a visit to that establishment which started several years ago and whose results are said to be extraordinary. I should like to mention also the Abitibi Pulp & Paper Company which operates wood limits in my constituency and which also looks after reforestation.

No doubt both firms will be happy to know that the government has decided to set up a department of forestry. However, like the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine), I regret that when a delegation came to meet the minister recently, it was not found possible to raise the amount of the grant to that organization, to enable it to pursue research in reforestation.

I hope the minister will be able to sway his colleagues in the cabinet in order that in a future budget—if the minister is still in office—a favourable reply can be given to the Ontario forestry association.

(Text):

Mr. Flemming (Royal): The information which the hon. gentleman from St. Denis requested is that Quebec is participating in fire protection and in all access road agreements at the present time. It has never asked for or received any money for spruce budworm spraying. Total contributions to all provinces up to now under these general headings mentioned by the hon. gentleman has been $18,-801,302. The amount that has been paid to Quebec this year is $464,438.86. The total amount paid for spruce budworm spraying in New Brunswick since inception of that plan, which as the hon. gentleman has stated has been in operation since 1951 I believe, has been $4,224,967 and the payment to British Columbia was $83,927. Speaking in general terms, the total amount paid for budworm spraying in New Brunswick since that pest made its appearance there has been something of the order of $12 million.

Mr. Denis: Does the amount of $18 million include the two items, No. 153 and No. 154.

Mr. Flemming (Royal): The answer is yes. It also includes the access roads for this year which is something in the order of $4 million.

Item agreed to.

153. Contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory, reforestation and forest fire protection in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $2,650,000.

Mr. Peters: How extensive a program is expected to be undertaken in forest inventory by the federal department? A number of years ago a complete inventory was taken in the province of Saskatchewan. This inventory allowed them to decide what they had to do for their forest industry. They can now relate their current inventory to that previous inventory and find what position they are in with relation to it. Is there any intention of doing in that field a complete national inventory by provinces as of 1961?

Mr. Flemming (Royal): The amount to be paid for the sharing of this inventory or the cost of inventory this year is $796,000. That is for the current year.

Mr. Peters: How extensive an operation is that going to be? When you finish it with one of the provinces, will that be the complete physical inventory of the forest in that province or is this just a continuous thing that we put money into, a partial inventory?

Mr. Flemming (Royal): I am informed that in the initial year something like 1,100,000 square miles was completely inventoried by seven provinces across Canada. Since that time we have continued to participate and the recommendation is that we shall continue to participate to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost, although it may be necessary that an over-all saving be applied since we feel that this is work of such a nature that it should be fairly well continued year after year. May I mention this additional point. I am sure the committee will be interested to know that the establishment of a pulp mill in Nova Scotia, the point raised by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond was partially at least due to the fact that up to date, almost up to the minute inventory information was available to those people who were interested in establishing that plant at that time.

Mr. Denis: The minister just mentioned the amount of money paid to the province of Quebec by virtue of those joint agreements. Will he be good enough to tell us in what years those amounts were paid to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Flemming (Royal): The answer is the current fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

155. Grant to Canadian forestry association, $20,000.

Mr. Peters: I believe all Ontario members probably received the letter from the Ontario forestry association in which they point out the terms of reference of the department itself. They ask that the annual grant of $20,000 be increased to $100,000. I will not go into the particulars, but they point out that the Ontario government contributes $10,000. They also point out that their total budget is something over $1 million annually, that the members donate $472,000 and that the federal government contribution at the present time amounts to only 4 per cent of the total. They have requested that this grant be increased to $100,000. Has the minister given consideration to this request from the Ontario forestry association? If so, is there contemplation of supplementing this grant through supplementary estimates?

Mr. Flemming (Royal): In answer to the hon. member for Timiskaming I would say that in the estimates for the fiscal year—not the current one but the next one—the department is giving very careful consideration to the request of the Canadian forestry association. It is not contemplated that there will be any additional item except the $20,000 during the current year.

Item agreed to.

Forest research branch—

157. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $367,725.

Mr. Peters: What is the progress with regard to the buildings that we now have and are now assembling for the department? What progress are we making on the location?

Mr. Flemming (Royal): If we had a little bit more time, I think we could get the information as to just where the acquisition is contemplated. I shall be glad to get the information and send it to the hon. member. Oh, I have it now. It comes under various items. I wonder whether I could mail the total to my hon. friend so that he would have all the information about the matter. There is another item. The same thing is listed under another heading. We should be glad to give the information now but it would take time to sort it out.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Forestry.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Denis: May I ask the leader of the house to be more gentle with me than with some of my colleagues and tell me the business of the house for next week?

Mr. Churchill: A courteous question requires a courteous reply. I am happy to inform the hon. member that on Monday we shall begin with Bill No. C-92 which has to do with the Criminal Code and consider an amendment suggested by the Senate. The second item would be the bill to amend the Excise Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Churchill: No. I am addressing my remarks to the hon. member for St. Denis. The Excise Act. The third item would be the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act. The next would be the bill to amend the Customs Tariff followed by the amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act.

We shall have available on Monday the resolution with regard to the Canadian National Railway finances which, by consent, could be considered that day. After that would be the act respecting the civil service of Canada and then Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Churchill: I doubt whether we shall be able to reach it on Monday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it clear that on Tuesday we shall definitely take up, as the Minister said on Friday, the Bank of Canada Act?

Mr. Churchill: That is correct. On Tuesday we shall deal with any unfinished items from Monday's order of business, for example, the C.N.R. financing bill if it passes the resolution stage. I presume the Income Tax Act would then become available, so it is obvious now it would be possible to complete the business next week.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish to make sure that the Bank of Canada Act will definitely come up on Tuesday. Is that clear?

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

It being five minutes past six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

608. Contribution to Nova Scotia, in accordance with such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, in respect of a program of forest stand improvement which will provide employment in Cape Breton, $280,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 3, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

BILL OF RIGHTS

AMENDMENT RESPECTING NATURALIZED CANADIAN CITIZENS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-119, to amend the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, this bill is being introduced at the present time because I have recently had my attention drawn to the case of a naturalized Canadian citizen of German origin with a Canadian born wife and three Canadian born children who is obliged to live abroad by the nature of his employment as one of the greatest living authorities in his field. Unless the law is changed this Canadian citizen will be deprived of his citizenship under section 18 of the citizenship act, though no similar penalty would attach to a natural born Canadian citizen in the same circumstances.

The effect of the bill, if passed, would be to place naturalized citizens on a basis of complete legal equality with natural born citizens of Canada. Since all parties in the house have at one time or another advocated equality of Canadian citizenship, and since the present law works an injustice against naturalized citizens, I would hope that the house might see fit to dispose of this bill favourably before the present session is concluded.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's explanation is now becoming advocacy of the bill. I think he should limit himself to explanation.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): At the risk of lengthening the explanation, may I ask the hon. gentleman if there are any other purposes, effects or implications of the bill he proposes to introduce.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had intended to add that I hoped the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, until this bill has been disposed of by parliament, would not deprive any Canadian of citizenship under section 18 of the act. That was all I had intended to add.

Mr. Fulton: And there are no other effects or implications?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will not give a legal interpretation. The minister can do that himself.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-120, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Pursuant to the report of the committee of ways and means which was adopted in the house on Friday, June 30, I ask leave now to introduce a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to present the said bill?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Before the minister is given leave, I wonder whether I could ask him if the bill is ready for distribution in both official languages.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand that the bill is ready for distribution. I speak subject to correction with regard to the French edition, but I will make immediate inquiries. I know there are copies of the bill in English immediately available.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): In view of the approach of the adjournment of this session, may I ask what is in the bill that was not announced in the budget resolutions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member will have a copy of the bill in a moment, and I think that would be the best way to meet his inquiry. The bill is the usual type of bill to amend the Income Tax Act following the budget resolutions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL CORPORATION, NATIONAL CONFERENCE, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

Motion for Papers

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada and in relation thereto,—

1. To provide for the constitution of a corporation called the national centennial administration;
2. To provide for the establishment of a national conference on Canada's centennial;
3. To provide for the objects, purposes and powers of the administration and of the conference; and
4. To enact such financial provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of the whole later this day to consider the following proposed resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1961 not exceeding $178,900,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1962; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $76,800,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $76,800,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system; and to provide further in respect of the refunding of matured, maturing and callable obligations of the said company, for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $230,000,000 in lieu of the present amount of $200,000,000.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

COLUMBIA RIVER POWER DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 154—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice and the minister of lands and forests of the province of British Columbia on the subject of the Columbia river power development since January 1, 1961.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would have to express some reservations with regard to this motion. The greater part of the correspondence referred to relates to details which it was understood would have to be determined between Canada and British Columbia before the treaty could be brought into effect, and it would not be appropriate to produce such correspondence at this stage. However, there is some correspondence not of a confidential nature, being formal advice to British Columbia of the conclusion of negotiations and our intention to sign the treaty with their knowledge and approval, and their acknowledgment of this correspondence.

I would be prepared to accept this motion and, subject to ascertaining the attitude of the British Columbia government, produce the correspondence I latterly referred to.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member accept the reservation expressed by the minister?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the Minister of Justice, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION OF UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether it is a fact that the under secretary of state has handed in his resignation and, if so, on what date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other day when a question was asked in this regard I said I had no knowledge of this matter. I became aware only on Saturday that the resignation was being considered. I received today a letter dated July 1, 1961, written by the under secretary of state, and with the leave of the house I shall read that letter:

Ottawa, July 1, 1961

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

As I wish to return to private practice of law, I hereby tender to you, and through you, to his excellency the governor general in council, my resignation, to become effective on September 5, 1961, as under secretary of state and deputy registrar general and also as member of the copyright appeal board. I would refer in this connection to sections 3 (1) and 6 (1) of the Department of State Act, c. 77 R.S.C. 1952, to section 50 of the Copyright Act, c. 55 R.S.C. 1952, to order in council P.C. 265, of January 19, 1949 and to order in council P.C. 2283, of May 9, 1949.

As the Secretary of State well knows, the only reason for my resignation is my desire to take advantage of an offer, which I consider quite interesting, to return to law practice. I think I can say that my relations with you, with my minister and his predecessors and with the government generally and my own colleagues have been excellent. No wonder, therefore, that it was with considerable hesitation and regret that I took the decision which I did. I shall always cherish the memory of my nearly twenty-three years' service with the government of Canada (more than ten in the Department of Justice and the rest in the Department of the Secretary of State), to which I owe invaluable training and knowledge.

I would like, incidentally, to take this opportunity to thank you and the government for the recent increase in my salary. It is perhaps an unfortunate coincidence that I reached my decision to resign soon thereafter.

I sincerely thank you, sir, and your colleagues for the confidence with which you have honoured me.

Yours very truly,
Charles Stein.

P.S.: Though I have marked this letter "Confidential", I need hardly say that, as far as I am concerned, you are quite at liberty, sir, to quote it publicly in whole or in part, should you deem it appropriate.

AGRICULTURE

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR DECLARATION AS DISASTER AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): There is a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps I should be concerned, Mr. Speaker, that the welcome back seems stronger from one part of the house than from the other.

An hon. Member: How long are you staying?

Mr. Argue: I have a question that I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the national emergency which the disastrous crop conditions in the prairie provinces constitute, will the government consider declaring this a disaster area so that additional moneys may be paid to farmers who suffer total crop loss as well as to livestock producers who also suffer widespread loss of income?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Lest there be any misunderstanding, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I join in the welcome by the opposition to the hon. gentleman newly returned from the fields of prophecy.

Concerning the western situation may I say that during his absence—his enforced absence, I know—this matter has received very full consideration. On Sunday, representatives of the federal government, namely the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence, met with the ministers of agriculture of the three western provinces. The whole situation is being carefully canvassed and considered.

Mr. Argue: If I may do so, I should like to put my question in another away. Has the government given any consideration to declaring this a disaster area so that in addition to prairie farm assistance, moneys may be paid to farmers directly? I do not recall any statement having been made on this point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The matter is not a novelty. It has been raised previously. All these matters are under consideration.

FIRES

NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. In view of the disastrous fires raging in the forests of northwestern Ontario, with half a million acres involved, including the destruction of various logging and tourist camps and the closing of five mines in the Red Lake district, is the minister in a position to inform the house whether his department has taken any measure of assistance to the area?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. gentleman in sending me a copy of the question. I can quite understand his interest, concern, and even anxiety in connection with the very serious situation referred to in his question. The official answer, I might say, is as follows.

The Department of Forestry has not participated directly in fighting forest fires in the area referred to. Our contribution to the provinces in forest fire protection has been restricted to research programs and financial assistance under the agreements toward capital expenditures required for fire protection, including purchase of equipment, construction of ranger stations, lookout towers, roads and trails and the like. We are watching the situation with great concern, but up to date no representations have been received from the province of Ontario, which is responsible for the protection of its forests, for any extra assistance.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the high unemployment in the area, has the Minister of Labour considered whether his department might encourage the employment of men in this area to fight this catastrophe?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, of course my department, through the national employment service, is at all times encouraging employers to hire people for work that is available.

FISHERIES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Margaret Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he can yet make a statement concerning the fishing season in lobster district 7B.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of her intention to ask this question. I have been keeping a very close watch on the lobster fisheries, as the opening in this district in particular was so long delayed by ice conditions this spring. Fishing was very slow at first but has picked up remarkably well, and by July 5, the official date of closing, the average catch throughout the whole district will be almost that of a normal year. There are, of course, local areas which are exceptions to this, but even in these areas the catches will not be much below average, and the districts must be considered as whole units.

I would add that the requests received that no further extension be granted far outnumber those requests for a further extension. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, there will be no further extension granted beyond July 5 in lobster districts 7A and 7B.

COMBINES

COMMUNITY CONCERTS LTD.—REPORTED MONOPOLY IN ENTERTAINMENT FIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I might emphasize, in fairness, that this is not a conspiracy. Members of the cabinet do not indulge in conspiracies with the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Has the minister or any of his officials received complaints or information to the effect that Community Concerts of Canada, Limited, a subsidiary of Community Concerts, Incorporated, of New York, has such a monopoly or near monopoly of the entertainment field that talented Canadian artists not willing to pay tribute to this organization are, in effect, denied an opportunity to be heard in their own land?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for the notice of his intention to ask this question, which I certainly never heard before that there might be a conspiracy. I have to advise the hon. member that according to my information no such complaint or information has been received, not recently at any rate.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a supplementary question. Would he ask the director of the combines investigation branch just to look into this matter?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on receipt of notice of the question I did check with the director, and it was as a result of his information that I said we have not received such a complaint in the recent past. I think I recall some time ago having the matter brought to my attention and I believe the correspondence was replied to, but certainly nothing of recent date has come to my attention or been received in the branch.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should say that my suggestion that an earlier question and answer sounded like a conspiracy was no more serious than the question to which it referred.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL DISPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

On June 8 last, the minister indicated that his department had decided to offer for industrial purposes part of the Soulanges canal for a period of one month. Now that the 30 day period has expired, could the minister indicate whether he has received any offers from industrial firms for that part of the Soulanges canal which is known as Pointe Cascades? In the affirmative, what are those offers? In the negative, is he now prepared to surrender the whole canal property to the government of the province of Quebec?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member for the time being is that we did receive offers. We are considering them and will reach a decision within two or three days.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. Could the minister indicate what type of offer is under consideration, and how many workers would be likely to be employed by the industries involved?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I think this last question should rather be placed on the order paper.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether he is in a position to report to the house about the negotiations or lack of negotiations between the air line flight attendants association and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at this time I can only say that discussions seeking a settlement of this dispute between the representatives of the flight attendants union and the officials of Trans-Canada Air Lines were broken off on Friday. However, officials of my department are in touch with both parties, and it is hoped that discussions will be resumed soon. In view of that fact, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is not desirable to comment further in respect to this situation at this time.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether either of the parties has indicated or set a date as to either a lockout or a strike.

Mr. Starr: It was my understanding that a date was to be arrived at today. Any announcement which may have been made in that regard has not been drawn to my attention.

[Later:]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Transport any knowledge of steps taken by Trans-Canada Air Lines to replace its present stewardesses and hostesses with untrained personnel? Is this in keeping with our concept of protection and safety of passengers?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I know about this is what I have read in the newspapers. I would not care to comment on newspaper articles.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF FLORENCE COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the federal government made a proposal to the Dominion Coal Company of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation for stretching out the work at the Florence mines in Cape Breton, and, if so, what attitude was taken by the company?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take that question as notice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question to be taken as notice at the same time. Will the Prime Minister take note of the dispatch in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of July 1, to this effect that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys informed the Chronicle-Herald that the company had declined the federal proposition as impractical?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF PHARMACEUTICAL REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Mr. J. F. Holland, president of the Manitoba pharmaceutical association, protesting the fact that no member of the pharmaceutical profession has been included on the royal commission on health care? If so, is consideration being given to adding an additional member from that profession?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot state with assurance that the particular person to whom the hon. member has referred has communicated with me, but there have been communications received from the pharmaceutical association to that effect. I suggest that the reason for the non-inclusion of a representative of that profession is the simple fact that having regard to all the considerations before the government in determining the members of a commission and the various professions which might consider, and with good reason, that they should be included, they cannot all be included. However, the pharmaceutical association, as pointed out in a letter directed to one of its officials will have every opportunity of placing before the commission, to the fullest extent, any suggestions, recommendations and ideas that association has in mind, and will also be given the opportunity to place before the commission in the fullest detail, all those things which would have been placed before it had it been possible to include not only a representative of the pharmaceutical association on the royal commission but also representatives of one or two other groups which have sought membership thereon.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the announcement in respect to this royal commission was made on December 18, 1960, has the Prime Minister any comment to make regarding a statement attributed to the chairman of that royal commission to the effect that there would be no report available before two years from the date of the first sitting?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make on that. So far as the commission is concerned, I am very hopeful there will be a preliminary report available at a much earlier date, because after all we are most anxious to have any recommendations that it may make in regard to this important matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the Prime Minister.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REPORTED REPAIRING OF MOTORS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether any action is being planned by the government to prevent the newly established practice of automobile factories in Canada sending motors to the United States for repair purposes, thus robbing Canadian workers of employment which they have enjoyed over a long period of years.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of that question and I had the answer available on Saturday, but in his absence did not give it. I am not in a position to give that answer now except to say the Canadian automobiles chamber of commerce stated that there is no foundation for that question; that the four leading Canadian automobile factories are indeed carrying out their repair work in Canada. So far as the Volkswagen company is concerned, it is making plans and provisions for such work to be done here as well.

AIRPORTS

PITT MEADOWS, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Transport whether he can inform the house if the proposed development of the Pitt Meadows airport has got under way yet and, if not, what is the proposed starting date?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been submitted to treasury board, and as soon as a decision on principle is reached there the department will be in a position to start work on this air field when the needs of aviation in the Vancouver area justify this undertaking.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INCOME TAX ACT—DELAY IN FIRST READING OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the minister presented a bill to amend the Income Tax Act consisting of 36 pages just a few moments ago, would the minister indicate why first reading of this bill was not given, as is usual in this house, immediately after the resolution relating thereto was approved?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question the propriety of the hon. member when he refers to matters relating to a first reading, because first reading of a bill is not a debatable matter. If the hon. member wishes to complain about the procedure that has been followed I suppose he is entitled to do so when the bill comes before this house, but this would not appear to be the appropriate time.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege I should like to raise a question as to whether it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to ask that this bill be proceeded with before the proposed adjournment of this session of parliament. I should also like to ask whether the items contained in the 36 page bill which has just been presented to us this morning have been made known—

Mr. Churchill: What is the purpose of your question?

Mr. Benidickson: —prior to this time to the taxpayers concerned, and to those individuals who concern themselves with taxpayers' interests, such as the Canadian tax foundation, the Canadian chamber of commerce—

Mr. Churchill: There is no privilege involved here.

Mr. Benidickson: —and accountants and lawyers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suppose the hon. member is entitled to ask a question relating to the business of the house, but he will recall that the house has given leave for second reading of this bill some time later this day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not later this day.

Mr. Benidickson: No, not later this day.

Mr. Speaker: I beg your pardon, at the next sitting of the house. However, what the hon. member is asking of the minister now is, in effect, when he proposes to proceed with second reading. Perhaps if the hon. member wishes to ask that question it would be appropriate for him to do so.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that will, of course, be a matter to be arranged with the leader of the house and announced when we are considering the business of the house. However, I do wish to correct one very serious misstatement made by the hon. member. He said it was the practice to introduce Income Tax Act bills immediately after the budget resolution respecting the Income Tax Act had been reported. He is quite mistaken in that.

Mr. Benidickson: I said almost always.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can remember one occasion when one of my predecessors, at a time when the hon. member was, as I recall it, parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance, allowed a week or more to expire between the report of the resolution and the introduction of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, but not approaching an adjournment.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport having to do with the resolution on the order paper concerning the measure authorizing capital expenditure for the Canadian National Railway. Is that bill ready for distribution?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the resolution has been agreed to. The bill will be brought before the house when the government decides to bring it in.

Mr. Benidickson: What does the minister mean by "agreed to"?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader a question. Bearing in mind that the indication as to business for today included the Canadian National Railways financing bill, which was given first reading this morning—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIlraith: The resolution was dealt with this morning. I should like the house leader to indicate whether it is intended to proceed with the bill today. I have reference to his indication of the business for today as found toward the bottom of the first column on page 7393 of Hansard. Would the house leader clarify what measure he had in mind there and what stage of consideration?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The house has already given consent to proceed with consideration of the resolution later today.

Mr. Benidickson: But we did not agree to the resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any such consent has been given. As will be seen from the order paper, the motion was to go into committee of the whole at the next sitting, and that was passed without any discussion or any qualification.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The Speaker asked for unanimous consent for consideration later this day.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, you expressly dealt with this matter. You put the resolution with unanimous consent, and you paused to wait for any objections, that the resolution be taken up later this day. That is the resolution that was passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the circumstances I think I owe Your Honour an apology, and I make it at once.

Mr. McIlraith: I am seeking to have the house leader clarify how far he intends to go with this measure today. That was the purpose of my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution standing on the order paper in my name. We hope to carry it just as far today as the house is prepared to go. The resolution is ready for debate and the bill is ready to be introduced as soon as the resolution is adopted. If the house wishes to proceed to the later stages of the bill today, we will be very happy indeed if the house will do so.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to thank the Minister of Finance for now giving the information I was seeking to get. I had understood from the earlier answer that the bill was not going to be proceeded with.

Mr. Benidickson: The resolution only came forward on June 30.

Mr. McIlraith: I was seeking to find out if the bill was ready and what the plan of the government was as to when it would come forward for consideration.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the bill in fact ready? I ask that of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the bill is in fact ready.

Mr. Benidickson: The income tax bill was not ready at the same stage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a further question. In doing so I want to compliment him upon his tremendous imitative powers, and I trust he will imitate as well in substance as in form. Will the minister tell the house whether the bill is ready and prepared in French and in English as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the bill is ready and prepared in French and English as well.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether the bill will be filibustered in the same way as the Pine Point railway measure?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we should proceed to the orders of the day before dancing as well as singing takes place.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REPORTED CANADIAN OBJECTIONS TO INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs based upon a United Press report that instructions were agreed upon by the British and Soviet co-chairmen on Saturday after seven weeks of hassling, and that a move to give the international control commission of Laos more air and ground equipment to supervise the cease fire ran into new trouble yesterday when Canadian objections stopped the fresh instructions half way to Vientiane.

Is the minister in a position to say that the basis for the Canadian objection was as further reported, that the instructions given by the two co-chairmen would have afforded to one member of the commission a veto that, in the opinion of Canada, would have limited the successful operation of the commission in Laos?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week the co-chairmen met with the representatives of Canada, India and Poland to discuss the provision of helicopters, light aircraft, road transport and other essential equipment for the truce supervisory commission in Laos. At this meeting the Canadian representative took the position that the commission should be given the authority to obtain the equipment it requires from whatever source it considers best, by purchase if necessary and that such equipment must be entirely under the commission's control and at its disposal at all times.

Newspaper accounts of the results of that meeting are misleading in that they indicate that agreement had been reached by the co-chairmen that equipment would be under the commission's own control. The implication was that the commission was to be provided with equipment, but in fact all that happened at the meeting was a co-chairmen's decision to send yet another request for information to Vientiane without taking any practical steps to make equipment available. In addition, the objectional features were retained, namely the dependence upon the agreement of the parties in Laos and the failure to take cognizance of offers already made. I refer to the offers by the United States and by France.

The Canadian representative has continued to argue vigorously that steps should be taken to enable the commission to obtain the essential equipment it needs without further delay so that it may be in a position to carry out an effective supervision of the cease-fire. As I pointed out earlier, both at Geneva and in my statement to the house on June 23, the commission would be rendered impotent and ineffective if it is made dependent on the Laotian parties for the transport it requires to carry out its task.

The government is continuing its efforts to ensure that suitable arrangements are made to provide the commission with the aircraft and other equipment it requires. The responsibility for providing this equipment rests, of course, on the two co-chairmen of the Geneva conference, namely the United Kingdom and the Soviet union. There must be clear-cut action on their part if equipment is to be supplied, and supplied under the control of the commission. Canada will do her best to see that this commission functions effectively, but under present conditions the Canadian people would be quite wrong to expect that the commission can do its job properly.

UNITED NATIONS

ANGOLA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he give us any information on conditions in Angola at the present time? More particularly, would he care to comment on the statement of the premier of Portugal that Portugal has no intention of complying with the United Nations security council resolution calling for a halt to repressive measures in Angola?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I dealt with the situation in Angola last week during the absence of the hon. member for Assiniboia. There has been a committee, I think of five nations, set up by the United Nations to investigate the whole situation in Angola. That commission has not yet reported. There is very little doubt that this whole situation will be one of the main topics discussed at the next meeting of the general assembly of the United Nations. Canada made her position perfectly clear by voting for the setting up of this committee.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister comment on the statement of the premier of Portugal that any attack on its policies in Africa constitutes an attack on NATO?

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not the opinion of the Canadian government.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether, since over seven months have elapsed since the policy was first announced and the two weeks that he gave himself have also elapsed, the minister is now in a position to lay before the house the regulations governing aid for shipbuilding.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since I asked my question of the Minister of Transport I have had an opportunity of looking at Hansard, and I should now like to ask him whether he has any comment on the answer he gave to my similar question last Monday, June 26, when he said, as reported at page 7038 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, just about a week ago I said in the house that these regulations should be ready within two weeks or ten days. They will be ready in accordance with what I said last week.

What is the reason for the new delay?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I am an optimist and I must confess that I was one, two or three days ahead of the time. I am just as anxious as anybody in the house to have these regulations completed. It is an extremely complicated document to draft, and at least seven or eight people were working on it all week long. The regulations will be ready very soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister if he does not think it would be better to get the regulations ready before announcing policy?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

TRANSPORT

PINE POINT RAILWAY—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the agreement between the Canadian National Railways, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company Limited and Pine Point Mines Limited been completed? I refer to the agreement upon which the resolution which the minister introduced the other day was based. Are the negotiations concerning this agreement completed?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, negotiations are not completed. Discussions have been going on for a long time. All the major points have been cleared. There is only one minor matter that has still to be agreed to, but it has nothing to do with the main principle of the agreement. It is only a detail matter and should be dealt with very shortly.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister not think that by the introduction of the resolution and then the bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter about which the hon. member is now inquiring would more properly come up on the resolution or the bill when it comes up rather than now. It is rather a matter for argument.

Mr. Chevrier: I asked the question on Saturday and I was told that I should ask the question when the Minister of Transport was in his seat. Now that the minister is in his seat some other reasons are given why I cannot pursue the matter. I have obtained one answer. I should like to ask a supplementary question. I will not ask it unless I am permitted.

Mr. Speaker: The reason I objected to the question basically was that it was an argument rather than a question. If the hon. member has a supplementary question to clarify the answer which the minister has given, which was an answer to his original question, I will permit it.

Mr. Chevrier: I will ask the supplementary question, if I may. Does the minister intend to introduce the bill in the house for discussion and consideration even though the agreement is not completed?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the bill will be introduced when the government places it on the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-115, to amend the Excise Act.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the Criminal Code amendment? I thought that was announced as the first item.

Mr. Fulton: It has just been passed while my hon. friend was otherwise engaged.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill was discussed last Thursday night. It has to do with a minor amendment in respect of cigarettes. The hon. member for Trinity spoke effectively, I thought, on Thursday night. I refer all hon. members to his remarks, which I will not repeat, concerning the great promises that were made by the government to the tobacco industry in the election campaign of 1958. The measure now before us is a very small mouse by way of legislative enactment when one compares it with the statements made by the Prime Minister in that election campaign, quoted by the hon. member for Trinity, to those interested in this industry.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that this measure is generally endorsed by the tobacco growers. I do not for a moment propose to criticize it. I simply wish to ask some of the government members from tobacco growing areas, perhaps the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Wratten), where the Prime Minister's speech was delivered in 1958 and in which he obviously attempted to entice the voters by indicating that his government would do something in a very important way for the benefit of this industry, to comment on the picayune nature of the amendments in this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Order. I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the minister when he speaks give any indication of the evidence on which a statement could be based that this provision would increase the use of tobacco, and is it also a fact that the tobacco companies have denied that this will happen? Will the minister also indicate whether the tobacco companies have all been in favour of this change and, if not, why they have some doubts about it?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we were over all these points—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Pearson: That does not make any difference. I have asked the minister a question. The fact that we may have talked about the matter before surely does not exempt him from replying to my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is evident that the Leader of the Opposition feels under no obligation to be acquainted with what has already been said. It is all on record. I said that the points have been raised, and I will be glad to go over them again as I did on Thursday evening when we were previously on this measure. This measure has been asked for and warmly welcomed by the tobacco growers. It has been estimated that this measure is likely, as I said at that time, to increase the consumption of tobacco by an additional ten million pounds per annum, by reason of putting more tobacco in each cigarette.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said on Thursday evening in reply to similar questions, of the tobacco companies, one company has been asking for this provision for several years, has been urging it strongly for several years. One other tobacco company, since the resolution was announced in the budget speech, has asked that it be not proceeded with, and, alternatively, asked for a delay in the effective date until July 1, 1962, to afford more time to instal the machinery to make the longer cigarettes. Another tobacco firm has asked simply for a deferment of the effective date until July 1 to allow them to instal the machinery.

These are the representations we have had. An amendment which I introduced, and which was approved in the committee of ways and means and then in the house last Thursday evening, constituted a compromise in relation to the effective date. It will be recalled that the original resolution proposed that the effective date of the change be made January 1, 1962 to allow all the firms some six months for the purpose of accommodating themselves and their equipment to the change. A further three months have been added to that time by the amendment, so these firms now have nine months in which to accommodate themselves and their equipment to the change.

I may say in reply to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that this measure has been urged on us by representatives of the tobacco growers. Let there be no doubt in his mind that it is warmly welcomed by them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Schedule amended.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has indicated, Mr. Chairman, he has determined that this provision should not become effective on the date originally announced, that is January 1, 1962, but should be deferred until April 1, 1962. If these budget amendments are of consequence to the industry and to the growers of raw tobacco, as the minister says they are, why is it that we have a delayed budget, delayed by three months past the normal date? We know that the minister is industrious, that he is prepared to review these matters, and does. Why is it that only after he introduces his budget does he find it necessary to amend his intention as indicated in clause 2 of the bill to the extent of three months?

This is an important industry. What has been lacking in the liaison between the Department of Finance, the government and the industry which left the government in ignorance to the extent that they did not realize that without the necessary amendment to the budget proposals, a deferment of three months, some of these manufacturers would be embarrassed? Why was there a lack of liaison, a lack of information and the long delayed budget that required this amendment? Why did the minister not know this provision would have a deleterious effect upon at least two of the principal cigarette manufacturers in this country?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there has been no delay and there has been no lack of proper liaison. We did not go out and tell the manufacturers that we were going to introduce a change in this commodity tax. We received representations on the subject, and we would not have been discharging our duty in the proper constitutional manner if we had entered into discussions on the basis of this amendment being introduced. We receive representations and we make calculations. In this case we allowed six months for adjustment to the change, and that appeared to be adequate.

However, we have received representations from two quarters since asking for more time to acquire the machinery to equip their plants for this purpose. We have met this request part way. We chose the date of April 1 because it is still ahead of planting time. The request of the manufacturers would have taken us beyond the planting season, to July. This is a measure introduced not to benefit particular companies but to benefit the tobacco growers.

Mr. Pearson: I asked the minister a few moments ago about the possibility of this change resulting in an increase in the production of tobacco, which is something of great importance to the growers. He has said it is estimated that the increase might be as high as ten million pounds. I would ask the minister who made that estimate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The representations in relation to the anticipated increase in the consumption of tobacco have been made to us both by the flue cured tobacco growers and also by one of the manufacturers. It is a matter that has been the occasion of representations.

Mr. Pearson: Is it a fact that other manufacturers have indicated to the minister that this change is not likely to result in any increase in the production of tobacco?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One manufacturer, to my knowledge, has within the last week expressed that opinion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What tobacco growers organization has indicated that this would mean an increase of nine million or ten million pounds?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Ontario flue cured tobacco growers association.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I doubt that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not tying it to a specific figure; I say that we had representations from them that this plan would lead to an expansion of consumption. We had representations from one of the manufacturers, and this manufacturer was quite definite in his estimate. The representations of the Ontario flue cured tobacco association were also quite clear that this would result in a very substantial increase in tobacco consumption in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said I doubt that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do you know more than they do?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know more than the minister does about this subject, Mr. Chairman. I doubt that any tobacco organization has made representations of that kind at all. That is what I said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I made the statement that representatives of the Ontario flue cured tobacco growers association have represented to me in my office, in my hearing, in my presence, that this measure would result in a substantial increase in the consumption of tobacco in Canada. They gave me a demonstration of how it would work out.

Mr. Pearson: The minister just said it was estimated that there would be an increase of 10 million pounds. Now he says "a substantial increase".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I made it quite clear that we have had representations, as I said, from both the flue cured tobacco growers association and a manufacturer that this would result in a substantial increase. I said further that the manufacturer estimated it would result in an increase of 10 million pounds annually in consumption. I said also that the Ontario flue cured tobacco growers association had supported the representation that this would result in a substantial increase. Here is what the brief of the Ontario flue cured tobacco growers marketing board contained:

> This extra amount of tobacco could mean the sale of an additional 6 million to 8 million pounds of raw leaf tobacco annually for an added income to tobacco producers of $3 million to $4 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It "could mean" that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To continue:

> To further trace it down, it could mean about $1,000 more income each year to each Ontario tobacco producer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Precisely. They did not say it would; they said it could. That is altogether different from what the minister told this committee today and on Saturday.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pearson: It now appears that the facts are that the producers organization said that it could mean a substantial increase. It appears that one company has said it would mean an increase of presumably 10 million pounds, while another company has said it would mean no increase at all in their view.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-118, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Tax on premiums in respect of insurance with British or foreign company.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with the amendments to the Excise Tax Act involved here may I say this. We well know that the principal item of tax reduction relates to the elimination of the 7½ per cent tax on automobiles. There are a number of other items in the bill. I wonder whether the minister, having given us a figure as to the tax loss forecast on the automobile tax, which I think he said was $55 million for the current fiscal year and would be perhaps $100 million in a full fiscal year—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we deal with this matter under clause 7, subsection 1. There is a consequential amendment in clause 4 of the bill, but the principal clause in relation to the repeal of the excise tax on motor cars is clause 7, subsection 1.

Mr. Benidickson: I am aware of that fact, Mr. Chairman. However, I made the observation I did because I thought the minister should give us a general review of all the items that will be affected by the proposed changes and indicate with respect to each one the possible dollar value in tax concession that is involved here in a budget that he described, a week before he presented it, as an expansionist budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think this is the time or the place to undertake a review of that kind. It was done in the course of the presentation of the budget speech. In that speech there is a chapter beginning at page 6662 under the heading "Sales and Excise Taxes". Then, of course, later in the speech I dealt with changes in revenue in the chapter entitled "The 1961-62 Balance of Ways and Means", commencing at page 6665.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was not a speech; it was a book.

Mr. Benidickson: I am, of course, familiar with that. We are now, however, as members of parliament looking in a detailed way at the proposals of the minister when he introduces in parliament a bill to make effective the matters to which he referred in that long speech on June 20. In courtesy to this committee which is going into detail I think he should give us the type of information I have requested, namely the estimate given to him by officials after long study, as I well know, as to the consequence to the treasury of the reductions in sales tax that relate to the various items that appear in the schedule and the clauses of the bill we are now reviewing.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would that procedure not be preferable under each clause of the bill?

Mr. Benidickson: I could rise on each item and ask the same question, but I thought it would make for more orderly procedure if the minister would perhaps expand a bit on the statement that I agree he made in a restricted way on June 20. I have, of course, noted his remarks as found at page 6662 of Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I draw the attention of the hon. member to what I said in the budget speech as found in the second column of page 6665:

> The effect of the proposed changes in sales and excise taxes will be $66 million in a full year and $55 million in 1961-62.

I shall be pleased to give the hon. gentleman the estimate with respect to each of these changes in order. I may say that on the first clause, the one with which we are dealing now, the revenue increase is likely to be insignificant. The present tax produces about $16,000 per year.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that the minister is referring to his broad remarks and that he refuses to give details with respect to individual proposals.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all, Mr. Chairman; I said the very opposite. I said I would be prepared to give the estimates with respect to each of these matters as we come to them in an orderly way in the bill. We are dealing with clause 1. I have given the estimate available on the effects of the changes in clause 1.

Mr. Benidickson: As reported on page 6665 of Hansard, the minister in his speech on budget night, to which he has referred me, said concerning the amendments that relate to this bill:

> The effect of the proposed changes in sales and excise taxes will be $66 million in a full year and $55 million in 1961-62. The total tax reductions therefore will be—

The minister included some concessions with regard to income tax and said the total tax reductions would be about $100 million in a full year. I say that, having before us at this time the details of his proposals with respect to the Excise Tax Act, it would be orderly, proper and informative to hear from the minister, apart from the automobile tax concession, his estimate in dollars of the tax reductions that will be involved in the principal items. Most of them appear in the schedule. They do not appear in clauses of the bill; they appear in an amendment to a complicated section, and I wonder whether we could have a little more detail from the minister as to the principal tax concessions that he thinks are involved in the bill he has placed before us.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already given the hon. member the aggregate result, which is the total that he asked for. I have also indicated that we are prepared to give him in detail the estimate with respect to each of these matters in the orderly and usual way when we come to them.

I may say in general, however, that the other changes apart from the excise tax on motor cars balance themselves out, broadly speaking, in their revenue effects. There are some further exemptions proposed in the clauses. There are some cases where an increase in the tax is involved. Adding together the increases and the exemptions we have a balancing. So that in the result the estimated loss of revenue, as I indicated in the budget speech, is $55 million for the present year and $66 million in a full year. As to any particular detail with regard to any of these changes, we will be glad to furnish it to the hon. member as we come to each item. I have already given the information concerning the revenue implications of clause 1.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to indicate that this provision contained in clause 1 would bring a relatively small amount of revenue to the treasury. Then what is the purpose of the clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To stop a manifest injustice to Canadian insurance companies and Canadian insurance agents. I may say—

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister explain the injustice again?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What we are trying to reach and penalize here is the practice of some persons of writing insurance on property or risks in Canada with companies that are not authorized to do business in Canada, or with companies that are authorized to do business in Canada but through persons who are not agents qualified to do business in Canada.

I dealt with this problem in the budget speech. We have reason to believe that something of this kind has been going on. We have not been able to ascertain precisely its scale, but it is enough to have given rise to strong representations from insurance agents as well as insurance companies lawfully authorized to do business in Canada.

I point out that if the result of this proposed tax to be applied in such cases were to yield a substantial revenue it would not accomplish the result we are seeking to achieve here, because we wish to put a stop to a practice that we think is very unfair and improper.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the minister for his explanation. That is what I wanted him to state for the record. I think I can properly add the comment that the section is mainly applicable to fire insurance and automobile insurance, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is to apply to all classes of insurance with the exceptions stated here, which are life insurance, personal accident insurance, sickness insurance or insurance against marine risks, and insurance against nuclear risks to the extent that such insurance against nuclear risks is not available in Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: And to clear up the situation in order to protect Canadian insurance companies and Canadian underwriters; that is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There is reason to believe that Canadian companies are losing premiums and Canadian insurance agents are losing commissions that they would otherwise gain if this business were properly written in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister indicated that he felt it is related to recent discussions held at a high level across the country concerning foreign ownership of some of our important corporations. Did the minister indicate that he felt perhaps some of our foreign owned corporations had ignored Canadian insurance opportunities and had rather automatically, on a package basis, insured their Canadian subsidiaries through their own foreign insurance agencies, and this is a step to discourage that practice? Is that part of the aim of this amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It certainly is. It is designed to do more than discourage that, Mr. Chairman; it is designed to put a stop, as far as it is possible to do so, to the writing of insurance outside Canada on risks of this kind in Canada, either through companies that are not authorized to do business in Canada or through companies that are authorized to do business in Canada but through agents who are not authorized to do business in Canada. I dealt with the matter, I think rather fully, in the budget speech. It is to be found at page 6663 of Hansard.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate whether he has considered the application of this amendment in a particular way to, say, the Allstate company, which I think is a subsidiary of Sears-Roebuck of the United States? We discussed the inroads of this company in the insurance business in the estimates committee. Would the minister say whether this type of business, which undertakes insurance offerings in a retail store, in its relationship to Canadian consumers, is involved in the amendments before us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would be proper on my part to comment on the business operations of any particular company designated by name. In the budget speech I think I made quite clear the circumstances which have given rise to this amendment and the purposes that we have in mind. I said:

> There appears to be an increasing tendency on the part of non-resident corporations carrying on business in Canada, and also Canadian corporations which are controlled outside of Canada, to arrange their fire and casualty insurance in respect of risks in Canada either with insurers which are not authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or with insurers that are so authorized but through agents or brokers located outside Canada. Undoubtedly these practices stem from a desire to make all insurance arrangements at the head office of the corporation or at the head office of the parent corporation, as the case may be, rather than from any lack of adequate insurance facilities in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, surely the minister has given consideration to the number of people who have insured themselves through the Allstate company, shall I say as one illustration? I understand that one of our prominent business houses, the ex Robert Simpson company, by reason of an association with the Sears organization in Toronto, provides a retail store service selling automobile insurance. It has made some progress in selling insurance which I understand is really taken care of finally by the head office in Chicago. Will this service be affected, and does this measure relate to insurance policies that have been purchased by a great number of Canadians from the Allstate company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that would depend on the extent to which the company in question is authorized and licensed to do business in Canada, and the extent to which those individuals who are transacting the business immediately over the counter are so authorized and qualified.

Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. McIlraith: With respect to clause 4, I take it we can discuss anything which can be discussed under it under clause 7?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is right, and I think clause 7 is the better clause for the discussion which my hon. friend has in mind.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Joint and several ability of licensed purchaser and vendor.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, with reference to clause 6 would the parliamentary secretary tell me when section 68 was added to the act? Perhaps I could indicate the basis for asking that question, which is that I have before me what purports to be an up to date act, but it does not include this section.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the only information I have in this regard has relation to the marginal note in the last consolidation which shows it as new in 1959; chapter 23, section 10.

Mr. McIlraith: If the parliamentary secretary has it before him and it is not too lengthy, I wonder if he would mind reading it. I obtained what I thought was the excise tax act with amendments up to date but section 68 is not included.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman like section 68 put on the record?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Section 68 reads as follows:

> Where a purchaser of goods from a wholesaler, producer, manufacturer or importer has falsely represented that the goods were intended for a use rendering them exempt from tax under any provision of this act, the wholesaler, producer, manufacturer or importer, as the case may be is entitled to recover from the purchaser the taxes paid by him under this act in respect of those goods.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in respect to clause 7 the committee will note, as has been noted by the observations of the member for Ottawa West, that we are a little short of information on the righthand page of the bill, because clause 7 says:

> Section 1 of schedule I to the said act is repealed.

There is no explanatory note in this regard. In view of the fact that this bill has come to us, as all will admit, with very little advance notice, perhaps the parliamentary secretary will now provide that information which is not provided in the bill, and perhaps in particular, in respect to subclause 2 of clause 7, he could indicate the volume of trade relating to these lighters, because I understand there is an increase in the protection which will provide that the duty in no case will be less than 10 cents per article. Perhaps he could also indicate who will be affected in our trade relations by this proposal and the volume of business we do, not only on the export side but on the import side, with the important trading nations involved?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as a result of the hon. member's experience as parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance, I am sure he will remember that it has never been the practice to provide explanatory notes in relation to schedules of bills. It has been the uniform practice not to put in explanatory notes. In fact the budget resolutions which precede such bills are the explanatory notes. I will be glad to draw my hon. friend's attention to the particular budget resolution which applies in each case. Subclause 2 to which he refers, relates to resolution No. 4.

The hon. member has asked a question in relation to the volume of trade and I might say that in recent years the average has been just under or over 5 million lighters sold each year. I have the breakdown here for the three years 1957, 1958 and 1959. I will give these figures indicating the year, the imports, the domestic production and then the totals. In 1957 the imports amounted to 3,747,924 and the domestic to 618,869, totalling 4,364,793; 1958, 4,145,292 and 541,266, making a total of 4,686,558.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it the second figure relates to domestic?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, the second figure relates to domestic. In 1959 imports amounted to 4,714,800 and the domestic to 642,182, making a total of 5,356,982.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary did not indicate our trading partner which might be most affected by this proposed change.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think our imports are mainly from Japan and the United States.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could tell us what the range of cost is in regard to these items, because the impact of the import will vary and will depend a good deal upon the sale price average.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that the average duty paid value of an imported lighter is in the vicinity of 25 cents, while the average value of a Canadian made lighter is about $1.60. In respect to domestic lighters under the general rate of 10 per cent the excise tax has been as much as six to seven times the amount which was borne by imported lighters.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words what the government is seeking to do here is to impose something more in the nature of a specific tax rather than a percentage tax?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is endeavouring to equalize the situation as between imported and domestic lighters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It amounts to a 40 per cent tax.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in respect to this clause I should like to say a word or two regarding two articles mentioned on page 5 of the bill, shingles and prepared roofing for buildings. In the district which I represent we grow a very high quality red cedar and there has developed in recent years quite a good industry for the sale of split cedar shakes—not singles, but split cedar shakes. Would those split cedar shakes which are sold commercially to people who want to build in most instances quite expensive homes, and are very popular, be considered as shingles or as prepared roofing for buildings?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I say to the hon. gentleman that the only change made in this particular part of the schedule is to delete therefrom the word "doors". As it previously read it was "lumber, sash, doors." Doors are being eliminated and, as the hon. gentleman will see by reference to page 4, are put in a separate category with door and window screens. Therefore there is no change in the situation. As to the particular matter to which the hon. gentleman refers, I am told that in any event they would be exempt.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister with respect to the items mentioned here, which of course vary a great deal. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River indicated at the resolution stage, in the cooperation we extended at that time that we would expect full explanation of these items on the bill, I think we should take each of the items separately and have an explanation of each from the parliamentary secretary so we can see what the real implications are and so that there will be something on Hansard for the public to see.

Mr. Benidickson: That was part of my purpose originally. We are dealing with building materials in clause 8. I think the officers of the Canadian Construction Association have indicated that these professed reductions in taxation are really inconsequential to that industry. They may be valuable in that they conform to reductions which have taken place in the past and therefore there is no disagreement between one type of product that goes into construction and another. But in so far as any expansionist program of the government is concerned in its tax reductions announced in the current budget, what actual expansion is likely to occur in trade and in production of those items which are referred to under the heading of building materials?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, if it is the wish of the committee to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Bonavista-Twillingate I think it would be satisfactory. The changes, of course, in this schedule are only those which are indicated in the bill by the black marginal line. We might, if it is the wish of the committee, deal with each of those separately. My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River has suggested that these are not of great value.

Mr. Benidickson: I say the construction industry president said that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): With that I would take immediate issue and say many of these are of very substantial value to the building industry, as will be apparent as we go along. My hon. friend chooses to use the word "expansionist". This is a word which I venture to suggest to him applies, and applies very vividly, to the whole of this budget. These are only part of the whole budget which in its essence is the word he used.

Mr. Pickersgill: The parliamentary secretary has mentioned an expansionist budget. Of course he could not have chosen a more opportune time to use that word, since the first word in this clause is "blowers". Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would do a little blowing and show just precisely what the expansion is in "blowers for use in warm air systems for the heating of buildings". This is the expression used in the clause. I think it may be appropriate because I suspect, sir, that is a pretty good description of this expansionist budget.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the parliamentary secretary was going to explain this item.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I shall be glad to. The particular change here relates to blowers for use in warm air systems for the heating of buildings. This subclause proposes to make all blowers used in warm air heating systems unconditionally exempt from sales tax. The present administrative practice is that such blowers when sold with furnaces are regarded as a component of these furnaces and held to be exempt from sales tax. This is because schedule III provides a sales tax exemption for furnaces for the heating of buildings. However, the recent change in the form of construction of some of the warm air heating systems puts the blower in the duct work some distance away from the furnace. As a result the blower is purchased separately and is no longer regarded as a part of the furnace, and thus it becomes taxable. The proposed exemption specifically mentioning blowers will ensure that all blowers receive the same sales tax treatment whether sold with or without furnaces.

This is likely to mean a revenue loss of $40,000 approximately. As the committee will see, really what it does is to remove an anomaly that arises by reason of the new type of hot air furnace.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I thought we were going to call these items one by one?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions referring to page 6 of this clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would my hon. friend not agree that we should take them up consecutively? We have taken blowers; now we come to doors. I think we would make much more progress if we could do this consecutively. If Your Honour would refer to each of the items, perhaps by the first word, then we could have an explanation from the parliamentary secretary about what it involves, because there was no debate at the resolution stage and there really ought to be an explanation in Hansard of what is involved.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The next item deals with doors for buildings and door and window screens. This is purely for clarification purposes and to make clear that the doors are doors for buildings. It was put in previously with lumber, sash and so on, and doubt arose as to whether other forms of doors were included or whether it was simply doors for buildings.

Mr. Pickersgill: What other forms of doors did the parliamentary secretary have in mind?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There are all kinds of doors, even doors for trailers, I suppose.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is very easy to say there are all kinds of doors. Which type of door is taxable?

An hon. Member: A door to a cell.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I refer to a door in some moving vehicle such as a trailer, which is not intended to be covered by any item which is set forth in building materials. This is purely for clarification purposes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let us suppose, for example, that a board fence is built around someone's property and he puts a door in that board fence. Would that door be taxable or free?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would think that would be a gate and not a door, but if it were held to be a door then this particular section would not apply to it.

Mr. McIlraith: Is not the point of this change that it clarifies the situation where doors in the former schedule related to lumber and the section now does not relate to lumber, it also relates to other kinds of materials? We have a great many aluminum doors being used in ordinary buildings. Is this not the kind of situation that is attempted to be covered?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It now covers doors for buildings generally.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are practical problems that can easily arise. I can illustrate very clearly what they are because it so happens that in my own house in Bonavista bay I have a door which I bought and put on two trestles, and it is my dining table. Would that door be taxable or not? That door was bought as building material. It so happens that it was bought with the other lumber bought to build my house, but it is not part of the building itself. It is not attached to the building and it is not used as a door.

Is that door taxable? Am I going to have some snooper come around some day to collect 10 per cent on that door because it is not hinged to a door frame? This is the sort of thing that does arise.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would have thought the hon. gentleman would have offered to pay tax in relation to that item. If it were bought for an exempt purpose, namely for use as a building material and was converted to another use, then at that stage it would become taxable. I should think the hon. member would be very willing to pay the tax at the time the change in use was entered into.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman has contradicted himself, because at the time I bought it, according to the hon. gentleman's explanation, this door was lumber and therefore was exempt. Therefore I would not consider any tax exigible because of ex post facto legislation of this sort. I am suggesting that this legislation will create situations such as the one I have just described, and that we ought to be very clear that we are not going to create impossible administrative problems for the Department of National Revenue.

How is the lumber merchant who has to collect these taxes going to decide? How is the wholesaler going to decide at the stage at which these taxes are collected? I think the administrative problem here is much greater than the draftsmen seemed to realize when this was drafted. After all, the sales tax is not paid at the retail level. It is paid, as the hon. gentleman knows, at a much earlier stage. How is the person who pays the tax going to know, now that a member of parliament has set the fashion for the use of doors as tables, that this may not become the rage all over the country, and how is the problem going to be dealt with?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think the hon. member need have no concern about it having retroactive effect, because if he will look at clause 9 of the bill he will see that the day upon which this clause comes into force is the 21st day of June, 1961. Rather than creating administrative difficulties, as the hon. member seems to fear, the belief is that this will relieve administrative difficulties. I do not think the fact that the hon. member has disclosed what he uses as his dining room table in Bonavista bay is going to create a rage for such tables across the country. I do not think the Department of National Revenue is likely to encounter any difficulty on that ground.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am genuinely concerned about this matter. I am not in the least concerned about my dining table; I merely used it as an example. I am genuinely concerned, however, about whether a much greater problem of enforcement is not being created than the problem the government is seeking to solve. In view of the fact that the tax is paid at the level at which it is paid by a person who cannot know what the end use is necessarily going to be, how is it going to be determined that certain of these articles which normally are for the purpose of being incorporated into buildings are not going to be so used and therefore should be taxed, and how indeed is this tax going to be collected?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is actually a relieving section involving the widening of the present exemption. I think it must be recognized by the hon. member that the use for other purposes of doors designed primarily for buildings would be very limited indeed, and that really any problem in the administration of such other uses does not in fact arise.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would it not be simpler just to put in the words "doors and door and window screens" and not put in this limitation with respect to use in buildings? I really do agree with the parliamentary secretary's last observation that the number of people who use doors or window screens for other purposes than for buildings is so small and the amount of tax that would be lost is so infinitesimally small that creating this distinction is simply going to create a lot of involuntary lawbreakers.

Screens are used for other purposes. As hon. members know, I was brought up on a homestead and we used screens and windows in cold frames. They were not part of a building, and surely we are not going to go around trying to collect the tiny amount of tax involved in these cases. Would it not be better to strike out "for buildings" altogether and simply say "doors and door and window screens"?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The situation then would be that this clause would relate to and be dependent upon the heading "building materials". The hon. gentleman realizes that in this particular schedule we are dealing only with building materials. There are a lot of other components including vehicles and apparatus generally that have doors. It might well be said that there are forms of mouse traps that have doors.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are not doors that are building materials.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Trains and airplanes have doors. The intention here is to make clear that these are doors for buildings so that we do not have to rely wholly upon the simple heading of "building materials". I think the hon. member would concede that it would be bad drafting practice if one had to rely wholly upon a heading to provide the limitation within the sections which follow that particular heading.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can see that the parliamentary secretary would have some point if the heading were not there, but obviously motor car doors or train doors would not be building materials at all, so that would explain itself. I am really quite seriously troubled by the idea of saying "doors for buildings" if it is intended to be construed as meaning doors that are used in buildings; but if it is intended to apply to every door that might be used for a building then I would not see any difficulty.

For example, from time to time I have seen doors of a certain kind used on delivery vans. They are the same kind of doors that are used in some buildings. I should think it would be the height of nonsense for the Department of National Revenue to be paying high salaries to people to go around and collect tax on the handful of doors used in the country for that sort of purpose.

If we are quite clear that what is meant by this language is doors that are capable of being used on buildings; doors that are, in other words, really building materials, and that all of them are exempt, then I would have no further quarrel, but if there is going to be some attempt made to collect the tax in the case of doors of that kind that are not actually incorporated into a building you are going to have an absolutely impossible administrative situation, and parliament should not allow these things to develop if they can be envisaged in advance. Perhaps it is not the function of an opposition to do so, but in this case I am trying to save the government from another embarrassment in addition to the many it already has.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When the committee recessed at one o'clock the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had raised a number of questions relating to the item dealing with doors for buildings, and had suggested that perhaps we might rely entirely upon the heading of this clause for building materials. My hon. friend shakes his head, but at least that is how I interpreted the hon. gentleman's comment.

I should like to say only that this is designed to simplify generally the administration. There are many types of doors which are not doors for buildings. The intention here, of course, is not to pursue in detail, as one could not do, those doors which are designed generally for buildings. This whole schedule has many end use items. Indeed, practically each of them is of an end use character. If one were to pursue each one to the nth degree of course it would become administratively impossible.

This amendment will enable the department to rely upon the section itself and not rely only upon the heading. In this way it will provide for administrative simplicity, as well as make it clear that it does not apply to those types of doors mentioned this morning, for mouse traps, trains and trailers, all types of doors which are not intended to be covered by the particular item under building materials.

Mr. Benidickson: Disregarding the reference to mouse traps, this morning reference was made to the fact that doors apply to trailers. When I occupied the position of parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance I think I exerted some influence in securing a reduction in cost to the consumers who purchased trailers. At that time we had indeed an expansionist program. At that time workers were moving across the country seeking and finding work. I refer to miners, construction, hydro workers and others. Under those circumstances it was most important, if they were to occupy temporary dwellings, that they should have the lowest possible tax impost on their housing arrangements. As one coming from northern Ontario I felt this was important.

In so far as trailers are concerned, as a result of the feeling that the consumer should be of some importance, an important reduction in the sales tax was arranged. This morning when we came to this item of doors for buildings it was a representative of the government who referred with some disdain to mobile homes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Not at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Trailers, shall I say.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): For illustration only.

Mr. Benidickson: For illustration only, but I want to say that when the economy was expanding people tend to join new industries and live in what I thought was referred to disdainfully by the parliamentary secretary as trailers. Inevitably annexes are added to these trailers. A tax reduction was provided on trailers some years ago, for which I take some credit. How would the doors for these annexes now be treated? I feel that they would be out of court because this morning the representative of the government spoke rather assertively about trailers.

In the resource industries of this country, in the new areas of development, it has now become a practice that people bring in trailers for the purposes of having adequate dwelling places and then, as permanency is assured, they must add to the trailers and they put on annexes. As to doors and window screens with respect to such annexes as those with which I am familiar in all this new resource development area, are these items going to be denied the tax exemption? The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate very properly advanced the suggestion this morning that this defining language—and I am thinking particularly of the words "for buildings"—could perhaps be discarded. I say this because I am familiar with the kind of dwellings that have developed when there was real expansion in this economy and when people were living in trailers such as those to which the parliamentary secretary referred this morning.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the hon. gentleman is speaking of that essential and significant type of annex of which I think he is speaking, then it obviously is a building which has very high utility, and doors for such a building I think would unquestionably be exempt. The hon. gentleman has spoken of me as being disdainful of trailers. How he could have reached that conclusion I really do not know. I think it only illustrates the fact that he was grasping in some way at a straw in order to criticize this particular section of the legislation. The hon. gentleman knows, of course, that at the present time there is in the schedule an exemption which applies to trailers, and which reads as follows:

Seventy five per cent of the sale price if manufactured in Canada, or 75 per cent of the duty paid value if imported, of trailers for use as homes.

That is the existing exemption.

Mr. Benidickson: That is something I was influential in bringing into force.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman takes the credit for that and I will not deny him the bow which he gives to himself in relation to it. I am glad that he had that influence in those days.

An hon. Member: We are glad to know he did something.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman is an old favourite of mine, so I will not pursue that matter further. I would only say to him that the type of annex to which he refers, and which has a type of door with an exterior turn knob and an interior hook, I am sure would qualify under this exemption.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: I am very glad to have that assurance, Mr. Chairman, for this reason. Where there is some assurance of employment we know what happens. Everyone who experiences the movement to his constituency of these trailer camp workers knows that if there is a continuance of employment they require what I would call annexes to the custom built trailer machine and the doors that apply to it. I am glad to be assured that the doors and the window screens, if needed by these people, will have the tax exemption, although the parliamentary secretary this morning rather gave the indication that trailer people were the kind of people who had doors that would not be covered under this item.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready to proceed to the consideration of ducts for warm air?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I still have a word or two to say about doors, particularly since the hon. member for Carleton has brought in the question of end use. If we could have an assurance that the government intends that all doors that are sold as building materials are going to be exempt, or that all doors that really are building materials are going to be exempt, and that there is not going to be any foolish effort to find out that a door here or there may have been used as a table or a screen here or there may have been used in a garden for a cold frame, or a window used for that purpose, I think it would be of assistance; in other words, that the wholesaler or the manufacturer from whom the tax is collected, knowing that this is a building material, will know that it is exempt from tax and will not later on have someone come and try to collect the tax because the end use was not the use that is normally given to the article. If that assurance were given I think it would not be worth while pursuing the matter any further. If the parliamentary secretary could give that kind of assurance I think it would be reassuring to those from whom the tax will be collected.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I can give my hon. friend that assurance immediately. There is certainly no intention of following each particular door. The only qualification at all that I would make is that if suddenly a rage developed, as a result of what my hon. friend said this morning, and people generally in cottages across the country were to adopt doors as a new form of dining room tables, there might have to be reconsideration of the matter. But I say to my hon. friend that there is no intention of following through at all. When a door is made ostensibly and obviously for the purpose of being incorporated into a building, then the odd case where it may be put to some other use is not going to be followed through. If suddenly some new technique developed and it was used for other purposes, that would have to be considered and reported to parliament.

The Deputy Chairman: Ducts for warm air.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would give his explanation of this item.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, I should be glad to do so. This really adds ventilation systems to the exemption. All finished ducts for warm air and ventilation systems will hereafter be exempt from sales tax. The exemption will not apply to sheet metal or other metals or hardware which enter into the manufacture of these ducts. That is the situation at present in relation to the more limited exemption. The committee will recall that in 1960 an exemption from sales tax was provided for:

Ducts for warm air systems for heating buildings, but not including materials used in their manufacture;

Subsequently difficulty was encountered by the industry in attempting to ascertain what portion of a manufacturer's output actually qualified for the exemption. The problem arose when some ducts were incorporated in ventilation systems, in which instance they were ruled to be taxable. To differentiate between taxable and non-taxable ducts became a troublesome and costly operation for the industry. The proposed change will do away with the problem by exempting all ducts for warm air and ventilation systems for buildings. As I have mentioned before, the materials entering into the manufacture of these ducts remain taxable, but the value added by the transformation of these materials into ducts will be exempt from sales tax. In other words it does away with a tax on the labour and other aspects which are needed to transform them into the finished product. The expectation is that the extension of this existing exemption, applying only as it now does to the warm air ducts, to ventilation will amount to some $70,000 in a full year.

Mr. Benidickson: Tax concession?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Tax concession.

Mr. Pickersgill: This definitely is a new concession.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the parliamentary secretary proceed with fuel tanks now?

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope that we may have the same explanation with respect to fuel tanks.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The purpose of this subclause is to provide that propane bulk tanks be given the same sales tax treatment as that enjoyed by fuel oil tanks when both types of tanks are used with furnaces for the heating of buildings and are directly connected with such furnaces.

Mr. Benidickson: What would it cost in a full year?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In a full year it is expected it will cost about $175,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the parliamentary secretary now go on to lumber, and so on.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I explained this morning, Mr. Chairman, this involves no change except the removal of doors from the particular section. That is the matter upon which we had considerable discussion earlier.

Mr. Benidickson: The next item we get to, Mr. Chairman, is precast concrete piles, and so on. To what extent are we voting a tax loss here, a tax gain to the taxpayer?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is expected to be a tax loss of about $75,000 in the full year.

The Deputy Chairman: Have we covered precast concrete piles now to the satisfaction of the committee? Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: We go on now to page 6, item (g).

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman; I think the next item is prepared dry concrete mixes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This section recommends that the existing sales tax exemption for "cement and additives for concrete" be extended to dry concrete mixes. These dry concrete mixes may incorporate two or more of the following ingredients, sand, gravel, cement and additives for concrete, all of which are now individually exempt. They may also contain a bonding agent, which is taxable. These ingredients may be packaged separately or mixed in one compound, but in any case they are sold as a unit and are ready for use and have been considered to be taxable.

As concrete made on the site or premixed, wet concrete is not taxable it is intended to provide similar treatment for dry concrete mixes and all materials which enter into their manufacture. The revenue consideration would be very difficult to estimate. It is probably not large, but I do not have any actual estimate for the committee. In the consideration of the balance of ways and means no actual estimate has been given.

Mr. Benidickson: On the next item, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether my hon. friend would permit me to ask another question on this matter. Could the parliamentary secretary say whether these dry concrete mixes are made in Canada or whether they are imported?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): They are made in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exclusively?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In large part. I am not able to give the proportion, but in large part they are made in Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: And they are becoming very popular.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And they are becoming very popular, as my hon. friend from Ottawa West says.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we might revert to the subject of fuel tanks. I had to be unavoidably absent to answer a telephone call. My question is, are propane tanks that are used for the curing of tobacco, which are connected to a tobacco kiln, exempt from this taxation?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am informed that they do not come under the particular section that is involved here, but they do come under another schedule of the act dealing with machinery and apparatus that in the opinion of the minister are to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods.

Mr. McBain: Will they be exempt from taxation under that other clause?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am so advised.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, I rose on this item when the matter was previously under discussion, but I forgot this question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. member on the item concerning fuel tanks?

Mr. Habel: Yes. The government, which calls itself expansionist this year, certainly must have expanded to a certain extent because last year the hon. member for Nickel Belt was urging that this exemption be given. Our riding will indeed be pleased to see that at least this year the government has expanded enough to accept what was suggested by the opposition last year.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman will appreciate, of course, that the government is glad to take advice no matter from what source it comes.

Mr. Habel: Not always.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

The Deputy Chairman: Would the parliamentary secretary proceed now to the item on page 6, milk and cream bottles, milk and cream cans.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. We were hoping to have an explanation with respect to prepared roofings for buildings.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is only for clarification, Mr. Chairman. The exemption adds the words "for buildings" to this exemption, so that it clarifies what obviously is the case in view of the fact that the item appears under the heading "building materials". This will be administered in the same way as I have indicated to the committee will be the case in respect to doors. The word "exclusive" is not used; therefore a follow-up check in each case is not in contemplation.

Mr. Benidickson: What would be the effect on tax revenue?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think it will be impossible to make any forecast. This really does not change the law in any way. This is simply a clarification. There is in fact no change in the revenue situation.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the item on milk containers?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the next item is room thermostats. Is this significant in trade?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: Is it significant in an expansionist budget, and to what extent is tax relief involved in this item?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is significant to the industry concerned, very much so, and is greatly welcomed by that industry. The position is that it involves a reduction in sales tax revenue which will be from $25,000 to $40,000 in a full year. The position is that this particular section proposes that all thermostats for use with permanent heating systems for the heating of buildings be exempt from sales tax.

The present administrative practice is to regard thermostatic controls sold with furnaces as components of those furnaces. As such they are exempt from sales tax under the general exemption for furnaces for the heating of buildings. However, when thermostats are sold independently they are taxable. In the session of 1960 a sales tax exemption was provided for electric heating equipment for use on a system using 200 volts or greater and permanently installed as part of an electrical heating system for buildings. However, the exemption specifically precluded from its benefits all wiring leading to and from such electrical equipment as well as other materials connected to it. This resulted in thermostatic controls on this type of equipment being ruled as taxable.

The exemption proposed under this subclause will render all thermostats for use with permanent heating systems and materials entering into their manufacture, exempt from sale tax. Consequently thermostats for permanent heating equipment sold independently of furnaces will become exempt. As I have indicated, it involves a loss in revenue of between $25,000 and $40,000 a year.

Mr. Benidickson: Could I ask the parliamentary secretary whether these thermostats are made in Canada in the main, or are they mostly imported?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): They are made mainly in Canada, I am advised.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the parliamentary secretary go on with the item on page 6 concerning milk and cream bottles, etc.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before we go on to subsection 2, I should like to ask one question for clarification. Does this subsection 1 as reworded include all the items under building materials? That is to say, is this the complete law so far as the exemption of building materials from sales tax is concerned?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this reproduces the old section as it deals with building materials, and includes all changes to which attention has now been drawn.

Mr. Benidickson: How much does the overall tax forsaken amount to in dollars? I heard the figure $40,000 mentioned in respect to one item but very little about the others, and should like to know what is involved.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, there is a substantial amount involved. The amount involved in respect to blowers for furnaces is $40,000; in respect to thermostats, $25,000 to $40,000; in respect to fuel tanks, $175,000; in respect to air conditioning ducts, $70,000; concrete piles, $75,000, amounting in total to something in the neighbourhood of between $400,000 to $500,000 per year. I might say that this has been welcomed very greatly by the industry.

Mr. Benidickson: Their spokesmen have said it is minimal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to make sure that any taxpayers who want to know what the exempted items are can be sure that so far as building materials are concerned, they are all specified in this subsection?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I believe the hon. gentleman is correct.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item in respect to milk and cream bottles, milk and cream cans and milk and cream plastic bags carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this item simply extends the existing exemptions for containers for milk and cream to cover the new type of container, namely plastic bags.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the extensions I think will be welcome to the extent that they will help to relieve the pressure of higher costs on what are already becoming expensive products, and I refer to milk, cream and butter. Unfortunately while we have a very difficult situation in the dairy industry at the same time milk in its fluid form for consumption and butter are expensive products from the point of view of the consumer, and any extension in the exemption, such as the one contained here, will be welcomed. However, there is one point which is of concern to me and I should like the parliamentary secretary to clarify it. It will be noted that milk and cream bottles are exempted from excise tax, but paper cartons are not exempted, at least under this section. Are they exempted under any other section, and if they are, under what section?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, they are exempted under the usual coverings section.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the parliamentary secretary read that exemption?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Those cartons are exempted under the section we are now dealing with, and particularly under the phrase "usual coverings or usual containers to be used exclusively for covering or containing goods not subject to consumption or sales tax". This does not include coverings designed for dispensing goods for sale or designed for repeated use, but again that is subject to certain exceptions and the hon. gentlemen will see that bottles, cans and now plastic bags are among those exceptions. There being no exception in relation to those cardboard containers, so they fall under the general heading.

Mr. McIlraith: As I heard the clause read, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to be as simple as the hon. member suggests. I hope his explanation is full and complete, but as I understand the general words at the conclusion of paragraph (g) they refer to materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of the foregoing coverings and containers not subject to consumption or sales tax.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think if the hon. gentleman follows down that page he will note that the exceptions relate to those types of coverings and containers which are designed for repeated use. The ordinary cardboard container to which we have become accustomed is not designed for repeated use, so it comes under the general coverings section at the beginning.

Mr. McIlraith: I understand the usual coverings to be limited to those items set out and enumerated by letters.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, no.

Mr. McIlraith: If I am not right in that then of course that clarifies the position.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman I think has this in fact in reverse. This section applies to the usual coverings and does not include usual coverings which are designed for repeated use except the enumerated coverings. I think that is where the only difference of opinion can lie. The cardboard cartons are not designed for repeated use.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry to be persistent on this point, but I take it that the parliamentary secretary is trying to explain that cartons come under an earlier part of the schedule, where we are dealing with coverings or containers designed for dispensing goods?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, these particular containers come within the first two and a half lines of the section in respect of usual coverings or usual containers to be used exclusively for covering or containing goods not subject to consumption or sales tax. Subsequent portions of this section deal only with those coverings which are designed for dispensing goods for sale or for repeated use.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: What will be the amount to the farmers of this exemption from sales tax for milk bottles and plastic bags?

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, it would be very difficult to give a specific figure as to the actual losses in revenue which will result. These plastic containers for milk and cream have only come into use very recently and are not used to any great extent across the country now. Indeed, I think they are in use in only a few localities. It seemed very appropriate to put them in the same position as the usual type of container. As I have said, it would be very difficult to say exactly what the amount of revenue loss would be by reason of this inclusion.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Was there a tax before on milk and cream glass bottles, in other words, on ordinary bottles?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, no, of the ordinary type. If this amendment were not introduced there would be a tax upon milk and cream plastic bags because they are not interpreted as coming within the existing exemption in regard to milk and cream bottles and milk and cream cans. Actually this is a widening of the exemption and will be helpful to the dairy industry in both its aspects, to the farmer and to the retailer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the tax collector in fact been collecting the taxes up to now, or is this just in anticipation of the fact that these plastic bags may be taxable?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is a new article just coming into use, and my understanding is that those which have been used are subject to tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not an answer to the question I asked.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am advised that in respect of those which have been used to the present time there has been a tax charged in conformity with the laws enacted by parliament, and the tax has been collected.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the parliamentary secretary find out how much in toto has been collected in taxes in this regard?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That would be very difficult to do. One would have to go back over a considerable number of sales tax reports. I will see whether there is any information available in this regard and, if so, send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Pickersgill: That should not take very long, because the parliamentary secretary has suggested that this is a new article just coming into use and presumably there are not more than one or two manufacturers in Canada from whom the tax in this regard is collected. If the department's records are as up to date as they should be it should not take very long to find out approximately how much has been collected.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I assure the hon. member that the department's records are up to date in all particulars. I shall see what the situation is and endeavour—

Mr. Pickersgill: Including Jean Talon hospital?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On another occasion I will debate that matter with my hon. friend.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that item (g) of clause 2 deals with a specialized field. The parliamentary secretary to the minister says that this was not previously covered in clause 2 of schedule 3 of the act. I refer to the usual exemption. Is the parliamentary secretary saying that this amendment is required for the purpose of making clear that milk and cream bottles, milk and cream cans, milk and cream plastic bags and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of those articles from now on will be exempt from sales tax, which was not the case under the previous legislation having to do with usual coverage?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, that is correct, Mr. Chairman. These plastic bags for the sale of milk and cream do not come within the existing classification, which speaks of bottles and cans. They equally do not come within the first general section which I read earlier in response to the question of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa West, which deals with disposable coverings and containers. This item, therefore, gives a tax concession which has not heretofore existed.

Mr. Benidickson: We are dealing here with a throw-away article as against an article for repeated use?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am advised that these particular articles come within the classification relating to dispensing goods for sale.

Mr. Benidickson: Throw-aways.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready to discuss feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock and for fur bearing or laboratory animals?

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps we can have an explanation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I knew what my hon. friend was going to ask about this. Perhaps I could describe the clause as an act for the relief of the parliamentary secretary from embarrassment, because in Hansard of 1960, at page 4674, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I told him that the restriction which was then applied to animals "whose pelts have commercial value" would be removed. Then when the bill was up, at page 4853 of Hansard of 1960, I hid my blushes and told the house that the draftsmen thought the words should be retained to conform to what had been in the resolution. I went on at that time and added these words:

> I am advised, however, that the presence of these words in the bill in fact imposes no restriction on the exemption.

Later, at page 4854, I said:

> Therefore, while my answer was erroneous the net effect is the same and in fact there is no real restriction on the exemption by the continuation of the particular words.

After the 1960 amendment was passed it was discovered that there were special feeds sold for mice and rats and hamsters which are used for testing purposes in laboratories. Consequently the second statement which I made to the house was not fully accurate. Some of those feeds are found to be taxable under the existing exemption. This proposed exemption will provided freedom from sales tax for all feeds for fur bearing animals. I can only say to the committee that I very deeply regret that I should have unintentionally misled the committee of the house last year, and I describe this clause again as an act for the relief of the parliamentary secretary from embarrassment.

Mr. Benidickson: As the parliamentary secretary was good enough to point out, I raised this question in the house last year. I do not think it involves anything of great consequence to our taxpayers. I appreciate the parliamentary secretary's generosity in pointing out an inaccuracy that may have been involved in his explanation at the committee stage of the budget resolutions and the bills consequent thereon last year. It is my understanding that from the announcement of the budget resolutions the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue generally interpret the imposition of taxes upon individual taxpayers according to the intent of the resolution and its administration. Has the Department of National Revenue administered the sales tax in accordance with what the parliamentary secretary says was his intent last year or, on the contrary, have they felt obliged to ask for an amendment to the legislation because they felt that the interpretation of the statute last year did not give them the authority to tax in the way that is provided for in the legislation before us?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I regret to have to advise the hon. gentleman that the Department of National Revenue did not take the words of the parliamentary secretary, or give them the value which he would have liked to attach to them, and they have interpreted the law strictly in relation to the item. I should add perhaps that the draft, in order to make absolutely clear what is intended, adds the words "or laboratory" after the words "fur bearing animals". This is not in the resolution, and this makes it absolutely clear what is intended in respect of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the parliamentary secretary may unwittingly have got himself in for another lot of embarrassment. Of course I am not a draftsman and obviously neither is he, but it seems to me that again it is a question of end use. If it means that feeds for animals that might be laboratory animals are not to be taxable, whether the hamster is used for laboratory purposes or is a pet, then I do not think he moved in any difficulty; but if the tax collector is going to try to collect the tax from children who have hamsters as pets but not in the case where the feed is fed to hamsters in the laboratories, I say this would be a shocking waste of the bureaucrat's time and this attempt to tax the pets of our children would be absurd.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not sure whether I can define a hamster as either a furbearing or a laboratory animal, but it is either. In either case, whichever it may be, food of the type referred to here would be exempt.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words there is not going to be any attempt made to tax the food of white mice if they are owned by children and are not in a laboratory.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, not at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quite sure after his experience last year that the language is such that that will not be the unexpected result, as happened last year?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman will notice that this does not say "for use in a laboratory". It says "laboratory animals".

Mr. Pickersgill: That does raise a nice question of semantics. "Laboratory" is not an adjective; it is a noun. What is a laboratory animal? Has the hon. gentleman looked at the dictionary to find out what a laboratory animals is? Would it not be a lot simpler to say "or other animals" and cut out all these attempts to qualify; or is the hon. gentleman afraid that it might include food for some kind of animal that the treasury is very anxious to tax? I cannot really conceive of any kind of animal food, apart from those that are here stated, that anyone would want to tax. What kind of animals that are neither fur bearing nor laboratory animals, whatever a laboratory animal is, eat food that is subject to tax where the treasury is going to lose something? It just seems to me that there is a lot of nonsense here, to quote the minister's second favourite word.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the parliamentary secretary not think this language with reference to laboratory animals is unnecessarily overstated? It will not produce for the crown revenue of consequence and it might make lawbreakers out of some of us who encourage our children to have poultry, cattle and other stock as a hobby, and who perhaps might be ignorant of the obligation to pay a tax for feed. In particular, is it not a possibility that the vendor of these feeds is unnecessarily put under an obligation to question all purchasers in order to see that this technical language is adhered to?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The committee seems to be under a misapprehension as to the purpose of the amendment, which is to expand, not to contract.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The situation is that most foods for animal pets come under the section of the Excise Tax Act dealing with foodstuffs; under the provision with respect to meats, canned, frozen, smoked or dried; under the provision respecting biscuits, which covers dog biscuits and things of that kind. This particular section has provided an exemption on feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock and for fur bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value. We are eliminating the words "whose pelts have commercial value". We are broadening the provision to cover all fur bearing animals whether or not their pelts have commercial value. We are adding to it because there are some animals which are not fur bearing. We are adding the words "or laboratory". What we are doing is expanding the exemption very considerably, and I think the committee should have regard to that fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not agree with that statement at all. The parliamentary secretary said that last year he thought it included laboratory animals, so he is not expanding it very much. He is only expanding it to include laboratory animals, but I put this question to him. Apart from fur bearing animals or laboratory animals, what animals are there whose feed it is still proposed to tax? What kind of animals are these; snakes, snails? With respect to any animal that has any fur, it is obviously clear that the food for it cannot be taxed, and the food for any animal used in a laboratory cannot be taxed. The feed for poultry, cattle and other stock cannot be taxed. What are these mysterious animals on which the treasury is going to collect a tax to help the minister pay his deficit? What are these animals? Name them. If there are none, strike out the adjectives altogether so that it will read "feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock and for animals". Then there will be no doubt. It will be simple, and it will not turn the tax collectors into schizophrenics trying to figure out whether a particular animal is a taxable animal or a non-taxable animal.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the hon. gentleman were correct he could take no exception to the draftsmanship as it stands. If there are in fact no fur bearing or laboratory animals which are not exempt, then the hon. member has no case and he should be satisfied to let it stand as it is.

Mr. Benidickson: We rely on the good intentions of the administration in office for full information in matters of this kind. What are the classes that might be taxable and which are excluded under this definition? I think the administration owes it to the opposition, because of the administration's relationship with the officials of the taxing departments, to tell us why we have this kind of definition.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this is one of those situations which grow. It may be that there are comparatively few or, indeed, there may be none. I can only say to hon. gentleman opposite that as a result of the best consideration which was given to the matter by the Department of National Revenue and by the draftsmen of the bill, this seemed to be a reasonable approach to the matter. I have tried to be completely and absolutely frank with the committee and to indicate the position in which I found myself last year. It may be that the dropping of those words would accomplish the desired result, but without detailed consideration of that point by the department and by the draftsmen of the bill I would feel reluctant so to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would this include bird seed? A bird is not a fur bearing animal, and many birds are not laboratory animals. Is bird seed to be taxable? Would it include food for goldfish?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not clear about goldfish but bird seed is exempt under another section, I am advised, and I think probably feed for goldfish—

Mr. Pickersgill: What about goldfish? How much does the treasury collect from the tax on food for goldfish?

Mr. Benidickson: How much does the treasury want to collect?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I do not have that information this afternoon. I am not sure what the position is with respect to goldfish. I can ask as many questions as hon. gentlemen opposite in relation to this matter. It is obviously not possible to answer all questions of that type on each particular item that may be before the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: What we are doing here is making the tax laws of the country. We are saying what people have to pay into the treasury, and surely we should know—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member seems to be more interested in goldfish than anything else.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know this government hates to have to explain its conduct at any time in any circumstances. We have had plenty of evidence of that in very recent times with respect to much more important things than goldfish, but that is no excuse for loosely drafted legislation. The parliamentary secretary has admitted that this part was pretty loosely drafted last year, and he has given a very frank explanation which I think does him credit. I am not criticizing him at all. I am saying that the language is still loose and still uncertain. If the treasury does not know of any animal feed for any animals that they want to tax, they do not need to put these adjectives in at all. All they need to do is to say feed for poultry, cattle, other stock and for animals. Then, there would be do doubt about it. The tax collector would not have to scratch his head and wonder if this animal was fur bearing or a laboratory animal or a pet or what it was.

I say, in the interests of clarity, unless there is some large lot of animal foods for some kind of mysterious animal that the parliamentary secretary has not heard about—perhaps pink elephants, but I suppose they are fur bearing, I do not know—why use restrictive language? Surely the government had something in mind in using these adjectival phrases to restrict the legislation. What is it? What are these animals? I think we ought to know or else we ought to say there will be no tax on food for animals, and let it go at that. Then, the law would be simple and clear and everybody would understand it. At lot of problems of administration could not arise.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would give consideration to this suggestion. I think the restrictive language is unnecessary. In the absence of any evidence that we are going to get important tax revenues by not having a broadened phraseology such as that suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, why could we not have no reference in the introductory words that might apply to pet fish, inconsequential as that might be to the tax revenues? Let us make it clear that those who buy feeds for these purposes are not going to be lawbreakers. Let us make it clear for the vendor of all these feeds that he knows where he stands when he sells all these feeds, that they are tax exempt.

Perhaps before we conclude some of the clauses, the parliamentary secretary who has in front of him the officials of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue, could give reconsideration to the matter, and my suggestion would be that we allow this clause to stand.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, of course, knows very well how these exemptions arise. They arise from representations which are made from time to time by people in the industry who are affected. The only representation which was made subsequent to the amendment which was passed last year, and which in itself extended the exemption considerably, was one which was made on behalf of those who are producing certain feeds for mice, rats and hamsters in laboratories. They found they were caught under the very expanded language which existed at that time. It was to meet their situation, and the only situation of which the Department of National Revenue is aware, that this amended language was adopted. If there were other situations, and I think there probably are none, they could be met easily as has been done in this instance.

This is being done to meet particular circumstances. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I think, should recognize that there has been, on the part of those who have been involved in this question, the utmost good faith in attempting to be frank and straightforward and honourable with the committee. Apparently that is not the way to get along.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I resent that statement by the parliamentary secretary very much. It is our duty as an opposition—of course the hon. gentleman never had the advantage of sitting in the opposition—to ensure so far as we are able that the tax laws are in clear and simple language. Here is one particular law that was not in clear and simple language last year and which resulted in a misunderstanding and, as the hon. gentleman described, embarrassment for himself. He is now seeking to correct this situation by adopting other language that is not clear and simple and which is almost certainly going to result in further embarrassment.

There is one simple way to clear this whole thing up. The hon. gentleman has in front of him one of the officers from the Department of National Revenue. Let the parliamentary secretary tell us of any animal food that is taxed at the present time except those foods for laboratory animals. Surely the department knows what it is taxing, and if there is no other animal food being taxed, then there should not be a tax instituted by wording of a restrictive character. If he would drop these two adjectives so that the provision would just refer to animals, then the whole thing would be clear and there would not be any possibility of a situation arising in the next 12 months such as that which has arisen in the last 12 months. It seems to me this is a reasonable request and a simple proposition. If food for goldfish or some other animals is being taxed, and the government still want it to be taxed, surely they know what it is, they know where the tax is being collected, and they should tell us.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is quite obvious, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. gentlemen that I have consulted with the officials who are here. So far as fur bearing or laboratory animals are concerned, they are not able to give me any exact illustration. It may be that there are some animals in zoos, I do not know. Such officials as are here are not, of course, engaged in the day to day, immediate administration of these items. This provision has been considered in some detail and, with respect, I suggest to the hon. gentlemen that there having been one, solitary representation in relation to it, they ought to be satisfied to allow the measure to pass on its present basis without further ado.

Mr. Benidickson: The parliamentary secretary made reference to zoos. So far as I know zoos are almost always under the jurisdiction of organizations that are non-profit organizations. Certainly, we would not want to impose a sales tax on food for animals in the zoos of this country. I think we should encourage those organizations that have this interest and encourage them to enlarge their stable in these zoos. He thought that perhaps zoos might not be exempted.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I said there might be; I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend. I shall be glad to get him any type of information he wishes in relation to the proposal. If my hon. friend wants to examine the problem in relation to goldfish or any of these details, I shall be glad to get him all the information in due course.

Mr. Benidickson: My suggestion to the parliamentary secretary was that he accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and be willing to eliminate the restrictive words in this new paragraph. This new paragraph in connection with feeds for animals involve four lines of definition—too wordy. My suggestion also was that we could go on with other clauses of this bill and that the parliamentary secretary might, in due time, feel that inasmuch as there was no consequential product that would become taxable because of the restriction of the language, he might allow this clause to stand until the language is clarified. Who is interested in taxing mice, rats, hamsters, pet fish and so on? Let us not have in parliament this restriction of language, if we have intent, that would make a possibility that some of these irrelevant items might be exempt from tax.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready to go on to the next item?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: It is on page 7, "Preparations, chemicals, or poisons".

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I thought we were on "Feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock".

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. That was the item we just had under consideration.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to deal for a moment with this next item "Forest products when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer" because I am interested in it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I say to the hon. gentleman that there is no change in that at all.

Mr. Herridge: I wanted to ask just a question or two because I represent some farmers who sell from 1 million to 2 million or 3 million feet of lumber and timber materials a year. I want to ask whether these are exempt: all lumber produced under these circumstances in any quantity, timbers, pulpwood, cordwood for stove purposes, poles, fence posts, piling, ties, cedar boughs, ornamental trees, bean poles, float logs, boomsticks and shakebolts. I want to make certain that they all come under that classification.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has mentioned a great number of articles of the forest. All the first ones which I followed I am assured are exempt. Then I confess that I got lost with the hon. gentleman's list. I think the hon. gentleman would not wish me to give legal opinions on the floor of the House of Commons. I should be glad to get the hon. gentleman all the necessary information. Indeed I think most of the items he has mentioned, if not all of them, are exempt. With such a long list it is very difficult to follow them all.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to point out that they are all forest products produced and sold by individual settlers or farmers in my constituency. Every one of the items I have mentioned is in that category. I just asked the question: Do they come under this clause? They are all forest products, every one of them. I mentioned cedar boughs, for instance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I did not catch the item mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Herridge: I mentioned cedar boughs, b-o-u-g-h-s. They clip two or three feet off the end of the cedar bough and they ship them to the undertakers in the various towns and the cities on the prairies. They are used for ornamental purposes. As to bean poles, there is quite a market for them now, for stringer beans, scarlet runners and things of that kind. Then there are float logs; they are cedar logs supplied for holding up floats on which machinery is placed. Then there are boomsticks. Boomsticks are logs supplied for forming bag booms.

Mr. Pickersgill: Such as they have on the Ottawa river.

Mr. Herridge: Then there are shakebolts. They are split sections of cedar logs averaging from two feet to three feet in length from which shakes are later split or sawn. However, they are forest products. I mention the matter because this was brought to my attention and some question was raised about this clause. Then there are railroad ties. I think we are fairly certain of the more or less stable products. However, there are some products here that are not manufactured or not sold generally by farmers from their woodlots and so on, but these products are all sold by settlers or farmers in my constituency off the forested portion of their properties.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I say first that there has been no amendment to this particular section, and I do not know whether we are in order in discussing it. The general heading is "Forest products when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer". The hon. gentleman can interpret that as well as I can. He then mentions a long list of items. Some of them are not produced in my constituency. I am not familiar with them. I would not wish on the floor of the House of Commons to seek to give an opinion in respect of the tax status of each of those items. If they come within the generic heading "Forest products when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer", then obviously they are tax exempt.

I am sure the hon. gentleman will be fair enough to realize that when he mentions a particular type of forest product with which I am not familiar, it will perhaps be difficult for me to give him a specific answer in relation to it. From listening to the list, so far as I can see I would say the products he mentions probably are all exempt. However, I should be glad to make a detailed inquiry on his behalf, particularly in view of the fact that this item is not being amended by the proposed legislation.

Mr. Herridge: I wish the parliamentary secretary would do that. I can assure him that they are all forest products and that they are all produced by settlers or individual farmers. I wanted to be quite certain about one or two of them which are rather unusual.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If that be the case, then there could be no question that they are sales tax exempt.

The Deputy Chairman: We now turn to page 7, "Preparations, chemicals or poisons".

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, could the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) tell the house if chemicals used in the production of poisons for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture are exempt from excise tax? Could he also tell us if the materials that are used in the production of poisons against small animals such as rats and field mice that gnaw fruit trees in winter are exempt from that same tax?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Boulanger: I asked the question because the text is not clear. In fact, it reads as follows:

—for pest control purposes—

Can we consider small animals like rats and field mice as pests? If I understand correctly, a pest—

Mr. Morissette: You know what a pest is.

Mr. Boulanger: It is an animal which resembles the hon. member who has just spoken.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have not the French text in front of me. In the English version the language is "poisons for pest control". That certainly would clearly cover what the hon. member has in mind. I would think that the word "parasite", en français, would cover it as well.

The Deputy Chairman: The next item for consideration is—

Mr. Pickersgill: The parliamentary secretary has not told us how much of this is really new.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This paragraph clarifies the existing exemption for and I quote:

Preparations, chemicals or poisons for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

This exemption was intended as a relief for the farmer by providing an exemption for poisons and insecticides. Recently the manufacturers have claimed that it is applicable to a number of pharmaceuticals on the ground that their use in treating skin diseases and internal disorders caused by bacteria, internal parasites and similar infections is, in fact, the control of a pest. This interpretation would broaden the existing exemption beyond what was originally intended and would also exempt drugs and medicines which are taxable when used in the treatment of human and animal diseases. The particular amendment is for the purpose of clarification and assuring that it conforms with what was the original intention of parliament.

The Deputy Chairman: The next item, as I was pointing out, is "Self-propelled, self-unloading forage wagons". Is there any explanation on the part of the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This covers a reasonably newly designed item of farm machinery and adds that to farm machinery exemption. It exempts a self-propelled wagon fitted with a mechanical device for unloading. The use of the equipment of course, as hon. gentlemen realize, speeds up the operation of transporting forage from the field and unloading it in a storage location. These vehicles have not been produced in Canada to any extent until quite recently.

Generally items of farm machinery are exempt from sales tax. They are covered by the wording of tariff items 409 and 409a and some other items which are listed in schedule III of the Excise Tax Act. However these particular forage wagons did not qualify under the wording of the tariff item and special mention is made in schedule III to make them exempt. It is very difficult to determine what the result of the exemption may be upon the revenue. It is probably not large, but it could be considerable if the popularity of these vehicles grows.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Will the exemption from excise tax on this machinery result in an increase in the price of milk? As you know, in the past three years, the price of milk has come down 40 or 45 cents per hundred pounds.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I confess I am unable to relate what the hon. gentleman says, dealing with the price of milk, to the sales tax exemption on forage wagons. This sales tax exemption will reduce the cost of production for farmers, and by reducing the cost of production for farmers it will, I hope, enable them to make a larger profit. I think it has nothing to do with what the selling price of milk may be.

Mr. Benidickson: In subclause 3 of clause 8 of this bill we are dealing with items under the heading "farm and forest". In the budget presented by the Minister of Finance, on the tariff side—and we have not had an opportunity to come to that yet—there are porposals which in the opinion of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture will increase the cost of production in agriculture, about which the parliamentary secretary just mentioned. I refer to the increase in tariff protection on nails.

In so far as the "farm and forest" schedule is concerned, belatedly referring it back to subclause 1 "building materials", what is the consistency in the proposals advanced now, relating sales tax to tariff? What is the consistency of certain reductions in schedule III under the heading "farm and forest" in relation to our discussion on certain items of reduction under the schedule "building materials" in subclause 1?

Would the parliamentary secretary explain to the committee, so that we may explain it to the farming community and answer the brief presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, why on the other side of the tax field, the tariff side, after this budget, it is likely that for instance the cost of nails to the farmer will increase? What is the relationship between reductions under this "farm and forest" schedule and the other side of the budget picture which, in the opinion of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, involves farmers in increased costs because of an increase in the price of nails?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as I understand the hon. gentleman's comment it is that in another bill there is an increase in tariff. The hon. gentleman wants me to reconcile an increase in tariff on nails with the elimination of sales tax on self-propelled forage wagons.

Mr. Benidickson: No, on the whole of subsection 3.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman is giving me a rather considerable task in asking me to reconcile those matters, which in my submission to the committee do not really relate. When we come to the question of the Customs Tariff and the item dealing with nails I will be glad to discuss that matter with the hon. gentleman, or the minister will be glad to discuss it with him, and I believe will satisfy him that the action proposed in respect of nails is one which is to the advantage of all Canadians, the producers of nails and the consumers of nails alike. I think at this stage, when we are dealing with self-propelled forage wagons, that is about all I can say.

Mr. Benidickson: I was not, of course, directing my comment to the item related to self-propelled forage wagons, preparations, chemicals, or feeds for poultry. I was referring to the heading of the subsection, which covers sales tax benefits or otherwise that are available to farm and forest people.

I simply thought it appropriate at this stage to ask the parliamentary secretary about the other side of the budget picture, when under another bill that will come before us, perhaps tomorrow, added protection will be given to the manufacturers of nails which has been protested by the farming community. I thought it quite appropriate, when we are dealing with certain eliminations of sales tax in the farm and forest field, to ask how this will compensate in dollars and cents value the farming community in relation to an impost they expect as a result of the tarif increase on nails.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The whole situation with respect to nails will be dealt with in the committee when we reach the Customs Tariff. I will be glad to discuss the matter with the hon. gentleman at that time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we now proceed to the item dealing with additives for fuel oil for heating, etc.?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before we go to the particular items under that heading of "miscellaneous" I should like for a moment to express the disappointment I think is felt by everyone connected with the fishing industry because of the omission of certain tax relief they have been seeking in order to put the fishing industry on a somewhat comparable basis with other primary industries in the country.

The minister received representations from the Fisheries Council of Canada long before the budget with respect to certain changes they hoped would be made in the sales tax in this particular legislation. There was, as the minister well knows, a change made in 1939 with regard to diesel fuel supplied to draggers and trawlers measuring at least 45 feet in length and licensed by the Department of Fisheries. It is very difficult for those engaged in the fishing industry to understand why the fuel oil used by fishermen who can afford a boat measuring 45 feet or longer should be exempt from sales tax and it should not be the case with smaller boats.

There was a great hope that the fishermen of these smaller boats which cannot make a five-day voyage would be treated on the same basis as fishermen with larger vessels. I cannot find anything in the language here that would suggest this change has been made.

I am not an expert on this matter but just want to be sure that this request has been refused. I would be even happier if told that I am not reading the bill carefully enough and that in fact it has been done. If that is the case, I will sit down at once and allow the parliamentary secretary to tell me so.

There was also representation made that the excise tax on diesel fuel oil used in internal combustion engines to generate electricity for commercial fishing industries should be dropped, as has been the case in regard to certain other primary industries. Again I make the same remark in that regard; if by any chance I have not found the change and it is here, I would be very happy indeed to hear about it. If there is no change in that regard then I must express regret that it has not been changed. This was done in respect to the logging and mining industries and it is very hard for fishermen to understand why they should not be treated in the same way. I am sure the parliamentary secretary can understand that feeling.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He is very anxious to go fishing anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The parliamentary secretary is very anxious to go fishing.

Mr. Pickersgill: The parliamentary secretary is no more anxious to go fishing than the member for Bonavista-Twillingate is anxious to go to the fishing parts of this country instead of sitting here. I should like to be able to go and tell the fishermen that the government at long last has met some of the requests of the fishing industry. If it has I do not want to waste the time of the committee, but if it has not I want to make a plea that in the next budget, if we are ever to have another budget from this government—

Mr. McIlraith: You will not.

Mr. Pickersgill: —the government should do just what it has failed to do this year, that is, to pay some attention to the representations received from the fisheries council.

Mr. Benidickson: They will not have another chance. This is their last chance.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is something that is not of very great interest to the fishing industries in my constituency and perhaps in any part of Newfoundland, but it is of importance to certain northern fisheries in which an hon. member accused me the other day of taking no interest at a time when we were debating the Pine Point railway, which is apparently another vision like the Columbia river, according to what we were told this morning. The fisheries council asked that the sales and excise taxes be removed from certain vehicles such as snowmobiles and track type vehicles for use in respect of the northern fisheries in the wintertime. I cannot find in this bill any indication that this change has been made, but I would be very glad if told that this has been done. If it has not been done I hope if there is another budget presented by this government that consideration will be given to this change.

I know that the parliamentary secretary does not like any reference to nails.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Only on appropriate occasions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest this is an appropriate occasion. According to the brief presented by the Fisheries Council of Canada nails are plentifully used in the construction of sardine weirs and lobster traps and, therefore, a request was made that nails for this purpose should also be exempted from tax. It does seem to me that the time has arrived when some attention should be given to these requests of the fisheries council. I take this opportunity to record those requests and to say that I hope they will not be ignored much longer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the particular section with which we are now dealing has reference to only two matters, additives to fuel oil and seismic shot hole casings, and does not deal with the matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred. Those matters are not new matters. I believe they have been referred to governments for some period of time, and I have no doubt that when my hon. friend occupied a position on the treasury benches representations in respect to these matters were made to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the hon. gentleman that they were not, because at that time there was no exemption in respect of diesel fuel used by the lumber and mining industries, and it is only because of this exemption to the lumber and mining industries that the fishermen find it impossible to understand why they are not to be treated equally. This is a matter that has arisen since the present government came into office.

In respect to the question regarding this northern equipment, I am not able to say for sure whether representations were made five years ago, but I would be very doubtful that they were. There has been great development each year in the kind of machinery used for this purpose.

Regarding the other questions, I am not sure there was ever any such representation made before, but I would be very surprised to find that there was.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): From what the hon. gentleman said earlier he realizes there is a very serious end use problem in relation to some of the matters he has raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very well aware of that fact, but hope that the hon. gentleman is not insinuating that fishermen, if they had a tax exemption, would use diesel oil to go on holidays, because the average fisherman operating a small vessel must work all the time during the fishing season to make a living and does not have the opportunity of taking a pleasure cruise.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I make no insinuations at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a clause of the excise tax bill which is headed "Miscellaneous". We in the opposition do not receive regularly all the representations which are made to the government, in the course of a year, prior to its presentation of a budget. I should like the parliamentary secretary to give this committee, during the consideration of these items, information as to what representations have been made by individuals interested in the matter of the cost of living, particularly the less well off sectors of the economy, in respect to sales tax on food products such as margarine. I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell us whether the government has received representations throughout the year and what decisions have been made in this regard. I can find nothing included in this bill changing the sales tax in respect to margarine, and should like to know the reason why this has not been changed.

I should also like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether or not representations have been received during the year from soft drink manufacturers regarding the elimination of sales tax on their products and, if so, I should like to know why those representations have not caused this administration to revise the law in this respect.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has dealt with two hardy perennial matters. The first deals with margarine and, as the hon. gentleman has said, there is no change in this bill in that regard. I was interested in noting that the hon. gentleman apparently advocated the elimination of sales tax on margarine and trust he was speaking in that respect for his party.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not say that at all. I asked for information in regard to whether the government had received representations of this kind.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As the hon. gentleman knows, during the years he was parliamentary secretary representations were received in this regard and they continue to be received.

Representations also have been received in regard to the sales tax on soft drinks but the decision is as indicated in the bill before the committee.

Mr. Benidickson: No action.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Are we now on item 4, page 7 of the English version?

The Chairman: We are now on the fuel oil item.

(Text):

Mr. Boulanger: I did not refer to this item, but the item which has reference to materials such as drain tile not exceeding four inches in diameter. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary why this has been limited to drain tile not exceeding four inches, because many farmers use much larger tiles in the construction of culverts, and would appreciate an exemption of tax in that regard.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In respect of this item, Mr. Chairman, there is no change. It will be remembered that I dealt with the matter before the committee last year. My recollection is that there is another item. Drain tiles for agricultural purposes are exempt whatever their diameter may be.

Mr. Benidickson: What page is that?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is page 30 of the consolidation of August, 1960 of the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Boulanger: Since last year—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think it has an earlier history. I was informed on this when it was before the committee last year. Because this is not a new item I have not informed myself this year. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the exact date. I shall be glad to look into it and write my hon. friend.

Mr. Boulanger: Last year, or it may be two years ago, I was in contact with a farmer who paid a tax on tile especially for drainage. I made representations at that time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think this goes back to an earlier date than that but I would have to look into the details.

Mr. McIlraith: Some time prior to the 1957 revision.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think it goes back quite a little time. "Drain tile for agricultural purposes" as an exemption goes back quite a few years.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member raises quite an important point. I have had questions about this from my own riding. I refer the parliamentary secretary to the bill before us. This, of course, refers to present law. In subparagraph (3) he will find reference to drain tiles for agricultural purposes. When we come to consider subparagraph (4) on page 7 of the bill before us we shall see a reference to drain tiles not exceeding four inches in inside diameter and 12 inches in length. Perhaps at a convenient time the parliamentary secretary would explain to the hon. member who raised this question the difference between the exemption in one subparagraph and the other.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If they are drain tile for agricultural purposes they are exempt whatever their diameter and whatever their length. If they are for other purposes, then they are exempt only if they do not exceed four inches in inside diameter and 12 inches in length.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed with the next item having to do with seismic shot-hole casing and materials used in the manufacture thereof?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I confess that until this was raised I did not know what a seismic shot-hole casing was. It is something that is used in tests to register vibration waves from underground explosions set off to determine the nature of subsoil geological formations in locations where oil and gas reserves are likely to be found. Recently a Canadian manufacturer commenced manufacturing these casings out of wax saturated paper.

This product competes with similar imported articles of steel which are not subject to sales tax as they enter Canada under tariff item 399a or 848, enumerated in schedule III to the Excise Tax Act. Under existing legislation, the Canadian product is subject to sales tax while the imported article is exempt from the levy. The proposed amendment will rectify the situation by making all seismic shot-hole casing and the materials used in its manufacture exempt from sales tax.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed with the next item having to do with laminated timber for bridges which is to be found on page 8 of the bill?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this is simply to provide for equal treatment between the various types of materials which are used in bridges.

Municipalities are exempt from sales tax on their purchases of structural steel and aluminum for bridges and precast concrete shapes for bridges in public highway systems. However, sawn and glued laminated timber which is often used in bridge construction as a material alternative to structural steel and aluminum has been held to be taxable. From a competitive point of view, sawn and glued laminated timber is just as strong and durable as structural steel and aluminum, or so I am advised, and it is said to offer the advantage of lower maintenance costs. It would appear that a number of municipalities have shown interest in using it instead of its metal counterparts.

The exemption of laminated timber purchased by municipalities for incorporation in bridge structures would put this product on the same sales tax basis as its competitors, aluminum and steel. Moreover the materials entering into the manufacture of laminated timber such as glue and other required chemicals will also be exempt.

Mr. Benidickson: We are dealing here in a broad way, Mr. Chairman, with the portion of schedule III of the act which refers to exemptions of sales tax for municipalities. I recall very vividly that when the Minister of Finance was in opposition he was a very strong spokesman for the idea that all the goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale should not be subject to federal sales tax. Under the present regime we have had very few exemptions. Indeed, we have had increases in the over-all sales tax. It has gone from 10 per cent to 11 per cent on the items that are not covered here, and some others. Before we pass this paragraph we should hear from the spokesmen for the administration about their present views with respect to the propriety of taxing goods sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale and in particular when a greater impost is involved today on some items than was the case in 1956 and 1957, when the Minister of Finance and others had so much to say about the injustice of taxing items purchased by municipalities and school boards which were subject to federal sales tax.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have already dealt with the only item which is actually changed in this particular schedule; but the hon. member is, of course, well aware of the rather substantial number of items which have been changed since 1957. The Minister of Finance has been responsible for the inclusion in this particular schedule of a large number of items which have meant a great deal to municipalities across Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: But the Minister of Finance said none of them should be subject to tax.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: At the next sitting of the house.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that the schedule to Bill C-116, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, now before the house, be amended by adding thereto the following:

Tariff item 209e, potassium chloride, British preferential tariff, free, most-favoured-nation tariff, free, general tariff, 25 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963);

Tariff item 210i, sodium hypochlorite in solution, British preferential tariff, 15 per cent, most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent, general tariff, 30 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963);

Tariff item 263e, compounds of tetramethyl lead, in which tetramethyl lead is the preponderant constituent by weight, British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent, most-favoured-nation tariff, 12½ per cent, general tariff, 25 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963).

The Chairman: For the information of hon. members, this resolution is printed at page 4 of Votes and Proceedings for Friday, June 30, 1961.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the house was good enough to permit me to offer a word of explanation of this particular item on Saturday morning. The explanation is to be found at page 7352 of Hansard. In the budget speech I made reference to the fact that there were negotiations pending under the provisions of GATT with respect to sodium hypochlorite laundry bleach and I hoped that the negotiations might be concluded prior to the passage of the resolutions in the committee of ways and means. Actually the resolutions were reported out of the committee at noon on Friday. On Friday afternoon I received a message from Mr. Hector McKinnon, who has been conducting negotiations with the representatives of the United States at Geneva on this subject, that he had arrived at a package deal. It is contained in the amendment now put forward and which is to be found on page 4 of Votes and Proceedings of June 30.

In effect we are proposing three temporary items. The committee is aware that at the present time the tariff board is conducting under a reference a review of all the items in the Customs Tariff pertaining to chemicals. It was thought desirable that, pending this review of the entire chemical section of the tariff, the rates that have been applicable to sodium hypochlorite hitherto according to the general understanding should continue. However, we observe that there are three items involved here. As I say, these represent a package agreement with the United States in this regard.

Each of these items is temporary. Each of the three comes into effect, it is proposed, on July 3, 1961, and continues in effect until December 31, 1963. By that time it is expected that we shall have the report of the tariff board following its review of the whole field of chemicals and we shall be in a position then, with the assistance of the board's recommendations, to deal with these and other items.

The procedure on these matters, I am told, is that if the committee of ways and means approves this amendment the committee then reports the resolution as adopted and then I shall introduce a motion in the house to refer this amendment to the committee of the whole on the bill which is to follow.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister would be the first to agree that this notice comes late to us. I think it is appropriate perhaps that these provisions should be incorporated in the amendments to the Customs Tariff. I take it that we will have full opportunity for debate in the same way as we will with respect to all the schedules that are associated with Bill No. C-116 amending the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is quite so. When these various steps are taken it will be just as though the resolution had been reported last Friday with this addition to it. When we are in committee of the whole on the bill to amend the Customs Tariff, this will be introduced there and will be open to debate in committee of the whole.

Resolution reported and concurred in and referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. C-116, to amend the Customs Tariff.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-116, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a very few observations with regard to the fishing industry on the second reading of this bill along lines similar to those I made in committee on the excise tax bill and to draw attention to the recommendations that were made to the minister on February 16 by the Fisheries Council of Canada. I have a copy of their letter in my hand at the present time. I should like to save the time of the committee by reading certain sections of this letter and by making their requests my own.

The fisheries council points out that the fishing industry derives two thirds of its income from sales made in the export market. Indeed, so far as I know there is no industry that depends more for its prosperity on the export market than the fishing industry does. One half of its total income is derived from sales in the United States. This really gives emphasis to two points, first, that the industry must sell on world markets in competition with other large fish producing nations and, second, that in the fishery we are very dependent on the United States market.

Then the letter goes on to point out how increasingly difficult it is in that industry to compete with countries such as Iceland, France, Norway, Denmark, Japan and Peru which have lower standards of living and where the degree of subsidization of the fishing industry exceeds anything ever thought of in Canada. This is simply to emphasize the fact that the fishing industry, if it is to survive at all much less provide a decent income for those engaged in it, has to be competitive. It is true also that the costs, as the fisheries council points out, have been advancing faster than the prices received for the product. That is not true in every case but in most cases.

One of the difficulties is that there has been inability to modernize the fleet, particularly on the east coast, and notwithstanding the announcements made repeatedly by the government they still have not brought forward their regulations for the aid they propose to give in this field. I am not going into the problems we have with competition right in our own waters because this is not really strictly relevant.

I go on from there to the budget proposals that were made to the minister so far as the Customs Tariff is concerned. I have already said something about those so far as excise tax is concerned. I should like to run over them briefly. The first was with respect to tariff item 682 which provides for the free entry of fishing nets and nets of all kinds. This is an item which is bound under GATT and the fisheries council was disturbed that there might be some attempt made to impose a tariff in this respect. However, I understand that fear was not in fact realized, I am happy to say.

Then, they went on to make representations with respect to some items that had a duty that should not have a duty. I want to say in general terms at this point that it does seem to me the time has come when the fishing industry should be put on a genuine basis of equality with the farm industry in respect of its instruments of production. This ought to be our goal. I come to these particular items. One was trawl doors. I am not going into the details of them. Another item was inflatable life rafts and a third was aluminum fishboxes and pen boards. It seems to me that, in view of the importance of these items in the export industry, there was a very good case for giving consideration to them.

Under tariff item 418, they ask that certain changes should be made in respect of machinery and apparatus and parts thereof for use exclusively in the manufacture of fishmeal, liquid fish and fish solubles, stock and poultry food and fertilizers from fish and waste products thereof. They endorse certain suggestions for negotiations under GATT in this regard.

The next item was a proposal for a change in item 211x. Then there was another suggestion with respect to vessels, item 439g. There was another in respect of cordage in combination with metal strands; another with respect to recording paper. I am not going to take the time of the committee to read these. There was another very important one with respect to salt fish driers. I may say that there is nothing more important than getting the cost of salt fish driers down to the lowest possible figure because our whole competitive position in the salt fish market depends on getting the cost of our product down to a competitive level with other producers.

I have in my hand a bulletin of the Fisheries Council of Canada, which appeared on June 26. The fisheries council was very disappointed in the budget so far as the Customs Tariff was concerned. They said that action taken in respect of the duty on anchors ignored the advice of the council. It should be made clear that the duty would not apply to commercial fishermen. In future there will be a 15 per cent duty applied on all anchors of less than 40 pounds in weight from the commonwealth or most favoured nation countries. Those weighing 40 pounds or more will continue to come in duty free. Surely, this government is not so much in need of revenue that it has to apply a duty on small anchors.

Then, of course, there was the admission of live trout for commercial trout farms. The council was pleased with that but it is not going to help the fishing industry generally very much. Machinery for use in making nets or netting is placed on the free list from most favoured nation countries, a reduction from a 5 per cent rate, for which they were glad. They said these were the only tariff changes of any direct interest to the fishing industry. I do feel, sir, that anyone who like me represents a community that is dependent on the fishing industry for its livelihood, is justified in expressing the disappointment that the fishing industry is not treated in the same way that the farmers are treated in respect of taxes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—British preferential tariff.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister did deal with this at the resolution stage, but to be quite clear I take it that the term "specified port" is wide enough to include all places, whether seaport or airport, as the case may be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the purpose of the clause.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that, by the provisions of clause 1, we are just regularizing what has been the practice, and whether or not goods came in by air at one port or another it has been the practice of the department to grant the British preferential tariff. We are just making sure now that if an import arrives by air or otherwise it will receive the same classification as if it had been brought in at one of the lake or seaports, is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct; this modernizes the clause in keeping with the practice that, in fairness, has been observed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Benidickson: I should like your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to when we will have an opportunity of considering the various items in the schedule. We did deal with some items at the resolution stage, and I, for one, have no more questions in respect of the items we discussed last Thursday. Is it appropriate now to consider item by item the amendments to the Customs Tariff schedule that relate to resolution No. 3, or would we do so after carrying this clause and coming to the schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It might facilitate the discussion, now that we have reached clause 3, if we turned now, before completing consideration of clauses 3 and 4, to the schedule and dealt with the schedule. I shall have, as I indicated earlier, an amendment to add another part, being part IV of the schedule.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it the items in the schedule would be called item by item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If that is the wish of the committee.

The Chairman: I shall call the items in the schedule, part I, item 522.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Part I relates to the textile items and we spent some considerable time in committee on these. I think the committee might be willing to take this part a page at a time.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with part I, I think last Thursday the minister indicated that these items involved some renegotiation of our commitments under GATT and that the quid pro quo was to be found in this part. I think the minister also indicated to us then that perhaps, in so far as trade volume was concerned, tariff item 568 represented the major item, namely the knitted garment item. We had a fairly full discussion about this item and I am not going to be repetitious. However, I take it that we have here in a package the result of the desire of Canada to renegotiate after certain tariff board recommendations have come down: I take it that we have here the changes that the government believes necessary as a result of those tariff board recommendations. We also have in the same package the tariff changes with respect to textiles that are necessary because we had certain obligations to other trading nations in GATT and they are all contained in this part I. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Part I consists entirely of textile items in the tariff. As I explained the other night, these changes arise out of three reports made by the tariff board. They have all been the subject of negotiation with the countries in whose favour these items were bound. The result is that we have arrived at agreement under the terms of GATT. This is a case where the compensation to which other countries were entitled was found entirely within the scope of the changes proposed. In other words, we have here a balance or, as I have called it, a package deal satisfactory to the countries which are interested under GATT in the terms of our tariff on textiles.

Mr. Benidickson: May I say this just for clarification? I wish to be completely assured that, when the government acted after receiving the reports of the tariff board with respect to textiles and when it felt obliged under its treaty obligations to deal with other countries, every quid pro quo which adjusts our tariff import rates with respect to textiles is to be found in the section with which we are now dealing. Am I right in that assumption? In other words, we are not trading textiles for apples or other products in any shape or form here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These items all relate to textiles, Mr. Chairman. The textile items have all been concentrated in this particular part I of the schedule to the bill. There are none but textile items involved here. This contains the entire package deal made in accordance with the provisions of GATT in relation to the changes in the textile items in the tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the latter part of the minister's statement is clear. However, I want to be absolutely sure that, in so far as any opportunities given to exporters of products other than textiles are concerned, we cannot find elsewhere in these schedules anything that relates to the changes that the minister proposes to us with respect to textiles other than in this package.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could expedite matters by asking one or two questions which are on my mind but which are not fully applicable to the first item. I can specify the items as I go along and put the question now.

In the new schedule before us I noticed considerable reference to the end use as a method of defining the item for tariff purposes. It is a practice which, as a matter of principle, is probably quite undesirable but which unfortunately is necessary in the kind of society in which we live. For that reason I have no particular objection to it, although it does not make for a tidy way of enacting legislation.

I would draw the minister's attention to item 534c which reads as follows:

Blankets, blanketing and lapping for use by textile manufacturers on machines used in the manufacture of textiles.

I think everyone will agree that it is desirable to help the textile industry in its production costs and this is apparently an attempt to do so, as the items are free under the British preferential tariff, free under the most-favoured-nation tariff, and free under the general tariff. My question on that item is this. Is any of this material covered by this item manufactured in Canada? Also, from which country do the imports come? That is to say, do they come from countries under the British preferential tariff, the most-favoured-nation tariff or the general tariff?

Then the next item with which I am concerned, namely item 562j, reads as follows:

Bolting cloth for sifting flour in flour mills.

This is a wholly new item. It is free under the British preferential tariff, free under the most-favoured-nation tariff and the general tariff is 45 per cent. If this item is free under the most-favoured-nation tariff and free under the British preferential tariff, I take it that it is not made in Canada. If it is not made in Canada, why do we apply such a high tariff rate against it as that shown in the general tariff column?

If I understand correctly from the method of defining the item by reference to the end use of the product, our interest would be to assist the flour milling firms; and that interest would be to assist them in order to enable them to keep down the cost of flour both to the Canadian consumers and for export. In both areas I think all hon. members will agree that it is desirable that the cost of flour be kept down. We have just had an increase in the flour prices as a result of this very budget with which we are dealing. It is also well recognized that our flour milling firms are having great difficulty in the export field. Can the minister explain that apparent inconsistency in item 562j?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First of all, may I comment on the matter of end use items. I suppose it would be a happier world for those who have to draw tariff items or administer them if it were not necessary at times to have resort to the so-called end use items. However, the fact is that, distasteful as it sometimes is to legislate in terms of end use, it is the only way very often in which to achieve justice, and to accomplish the goal desired by parliament. So far as these items in the present bill are concerned, I am informed that there has not been any extension of the end use principle, so that there should not be any more difficulty in administration in this regard than there has been hitherto.

The first item mentioned by the hon. member was item 534c. Here the principal source of imports is the United States. The United Kingdom is second, and it is a relatively small second in comparison with the volume and value of imports coming from the United States. In this case the change was requested by Canadian blanket manufacturers to preclude the possibility of blankets and blanketing being imported by Canadian manufacturers for further processing into blankets, clothing and other manufactured articles for resale. In relation to 562j—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, just before the minister leaves item 534c could I put another subsidiary question to him. Is any of this material made in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand it is not.

Mr. Benidickson: That is why it is free.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 562j, bolting cloth for sifting flour in flour mills. I am informed that this material is not made in Canada. The leading countries which have been the source of these imports have been Switzerland and the United States, both of which have most-favoured-nation status. So that in this item we have now the proposal for free entry for B.P. and m.f.n. rates. The general tariff is of little consequence because so far as I know there is nothing coming into Canada under the general item anyway.

Mr. McIlraith: And nothing made in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; I mentioned that earlier.

Mr. McIlraith: I just do not understand the logic of this. If we do not make in Canada bolting cloth for sifting flour in flour mills, and we draft the item in the language in which it is drafted, surely our interest is to enable these flour mills to get the cheapest possible bolting cloth they can.

I realize there is very little importing done under the general tariff, but surely if it is free under the most-favoured-nation and British preferential tariffs we should not put this prohibitive general tariff on it in case some country that we are not aware of at the moment does start production of this cloth, and our interest is in getting the cloth in at the cheapest possible price for the flour mills.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are getting the cloth at the cheapest possible price now by reason of free entry under the B.P. and m.f.n. rates. This is the way in which we establish the fact that value is attached to the m.f.n. rate when we negotiate. The fact that the general rate is 45 per cent is not hurting anybody now because I am told there are no imports, or virtually no imports from the general rate countries. This is the way we establish the value of concessions to those countries that are on an m.f.n. basis.

Mr. McIlraith: In other words the minister is using some gentle persuasion to have them move into the most-favoured-nation groupings or to bargain with us for better concessions for admission of our products into their countries. If that is the case I have no quarrel with the minister on this occasion.

Mr. Benidickson: On that point, I take it that this 45 per cent rate would perhaps be important in connection with our outlook on trade, say with China or Russia. Russia is not in the most-favoured-nation tariff group, is it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Both Russia and China enjoy most-favoured-nation status.

The Chairman: Shall page 3 of the schedule carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall page 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall part II of the schedule carry?

Mr. Benidickson: With regard to part II, I think the minister indicated that this involved additional international negotiations under our treaty arrangements. Would the minister explain a little further the quid pro quo basis? I should like a more detailed explanation than the minister gave in his budget speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I pointed out on Thursday evening when we were dealing with this matter in the committee of ways and means, the items that are embraced within part II of the schedule to the bill are items that are bound under GATT and the changes in the rates that are bound under GATT of course have been negotiated. Agreement has been reached with all of the countries in whose favour these items were bound. There have been various individual discussions and there have been negotiations which have resulted in agreement. The terms of agreement are found entirely within the terms of part II of the schedule. In other words, while there have been various discussions with respect to different items, we have in the end arrived at an agreement and part II embraces the totality of both the increases and the concessions, so that we have arrived at a series of agreements in regard to such items with the countries in whose favour they were bound.

The Chairman: Shall part II carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. With respect to textiles—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing here respecting textiles.

Mr. Benidickson: No, but with respect to textiles we were informed that the trading involved concessions on our part. As compensation we paid solely by concession, relating to textile items. With respect to the items in this schedule could the minister indicate what were the principal items of Canadian export where there was a necessity to make a concession in order to make it more advantageous to certain producers in Canada. I ask this question in light of these changes in rates.

I refer primarily of the items relating to poultry. In order to increase our impost against imports of poultry, what industries which normally exported products from Canada were given a less advantageous position in the export market?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we can put aside the poultry item at once. The poultry item was the subject of separate negotiation entirely and here we have a rate with respect to eviscerated poultry and a rate with respect to live poultry. This is all it is, a package deal negotiated with the United States, so that we now have reciprocity in rates. As I am sure the hon. member is aware, this has been hailed by Canadian poultry producers as being of very great advantage to them.

As to the other items on which increases are involved, may I say that as a result of various negotiations we have agreement with respect to all of those. The hon. member can go through the list and find where the decreases are which we used as concessions. The hon. member asks his question as though these were export items. That is not the basis, Mr. Chairman. Many of these are items on which there is no export by Canadians. This is a matter of our having obtained agreement on the part of these countries to our increasing the tariff on other items in part II in return for decreases in the items that I am now about to read: 9b, quails partridges and squabs; 105k, mint flavoured pineapples; 152e pineapple juice; 187c, photographic dry plates; 197h, filter paper for use in the manufacture of vacuum bags.

Mr. Benidickson: What are the dollar values of imports of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I just complete the list?

It continues: 199m, paper backing for carpets; 425b, engines and parts for power mowers; 427e, machines and parts for making cigars and cigarettes; 438h (2), motorcycles with an engine capacity of more than 250cc.; 463d, lenses and shutters for projectors; 658, video tape not including video taped commercials.

Those are the concessions in return for which we have obtained agreement to the increase in the other items.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Has there been any change with respect to the tariff on turkey eggs for hatching?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no change in the tariff on turkey eggs, Mr. Chairman. Turkey poults, baby ducklings and goslings are classified under item 9c. Baby chicks are classified under 9d. There is no change in the rates on either item.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Have the Quebec and eastern Ontario poultry farmers not asked the minister to change the tariff on turkey eggs for hatching?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we have had representations from some of those engaged in the business of producing turkey hatching eggs seeking an increase in the duty thereon, but I am told that there have been some differences of view among those in the business with regard to an increase in the tariff protection in respect to turkey eggs for hatching.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I thought the minister in his last statement intended to indicate first of all that the poultry items resolved themselves by the concession back and forth within that trade group. I think he referred to item 425a and said that perhaps in this schedule power lawn mowers represented a concession we had given. In so far as the first item is concerned, it looks to me to be the very opposite, that we have increased our tariff rates. Then, with respect to item 427e, automatic machines—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think it is item 425b to which the hon. gentleman should be referring.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought the minister referred to item 425a, and then said the concession had regard to item 425b, air cooled internal combustion engines. What was the over-all involvement to the trade regarding the renegotiation of this particular part of the amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is one correction I should like to make in my remarks made earlier. I may have given the committee to understand that the items on poultry had been completely balanced. That is not so. We have, of course, a substantial advantage in the changes made here for Canadian poultry producers, and this was part of the wider negotiations which included some of the items which I have read to the committee as being items upon which we made concessions in order to obtain the substantial advantage which is provided here in respect of poultry.

The hon. member asked a question in respect of item 425b. I am told that there are no import statistics available in this regard. I might say that our purpose with respect to items 425a and 425b was to enable Canadian producers of these power lawn mowers to compete more effectively with the foreign competition to which they have been subject. Many of these parts were found not to be made in Canada. This result has been achieved by a reduction in the tariff on parts and an increase in the tariff on finished machines and will result in the production of more of the finished machines in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: That would be the explanation in regard to the reduction in the tariff in relation to item 425b (2) where the rate for the most-favoured-nation, and I assume that is the United States, goes down from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. Would that be largely the components of the item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

The Chairman: Shall part II carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall part III carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which will add a part IV.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that the amendment of which the minister gave notice in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the one which was discussed earlier this afternoon and is in the same form as that which appears at page 4 of Votes and Proceedings of last Friday. It adds three items to the bill; these will comprise part IV of the schedule. As I say, it is in precisely the same form as in Votes and Proceedings. I shall now ask my colleague the Minister of Defence Production to move it.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move:

That the schedule to Bill No. C-116, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, be amended by adding thereto the following:

PART IV

Tariff item 209e, potassium chloride, British preferential tariff, free, most-favoured-nation tariff, free, general tariff, 25 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963);

Tariff item 210i, sodium hypochlorite in solution, British preferential tariff, 15 per cent, most-favoured-nation tariff, 20 per cent, general tariff, 30 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963);

Tariff item 263e, compounds of tetramethyl lead, in which tetramethyl lead is the preponderant constituent by weight, British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent, most-favoured-nation tariff, 12½ per cent, general tariff, 25 per cent, (applicable July 3, 1961 to December 31, 1963).

Mr. McIlraith: Before the amendment is dealt with, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that we do not have the benefit in respect to this part of the extension of an indication regarding the tariff position prior to the budget. Is the minister in a position to give us that indication now, item by item in relation to each of the three, and explain the significance of the applicable dates regarding the materials described in the three items?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I dealt with the latter point when we were in or going into the committee of ways and means earlier this afternoon. It is done this way so that the items, which are now under review of the tariff board in the chemicals reference, may be the occasion of study by the tariff board, and we may have the benefit of their recommendations before these items expire at the end of December, 1963.

Mr. McIlraith: What happens when they expire?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are being made to expire then so that parliament may be in a position to deal with them at that time in the light of the report which is expected to be received from the tariff board prior to that date.

Mr. McIlraith: Assuming parliament does not do that, what will happen?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The items will then expire.

Mr. McIlraith: The items will then come in free.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am going to deal now with the first question asked by the hon. gentleman. I wish to point out that these are all new items being taken out of other items of the Customs Tariff. May I say that the Canadian item in respect to which the tariff has been increased is the middle one, 210i, sodium hypochlorite in solution. The other two, 209e with respect to potassium chloride and 263e relating to compounds of tetramethyl lead, were the items on which we have agreed to reductions in return for agreement on the part of the United States to the increase in the tariff on sodium hypochlorite in solution. To give a comparison, Mr. Chairman, the rates at the present time on potassium chloride are—I will just give the three under the regular headings—free, 15 per cent, 25 per cent, so that it will be seen that the general rate remains unchanged; the m.f.n. is reduced from 15 per cent to free, and the B.P. rate continues free.

On the second item, the present rates are free, 12½ per cent, 25 per cent, or free, free, 15 per cent. The alternative figures depend on the size of the bottle in which the sodium hypochlorite comes.

Mr. Benidickson: Is it free to the most-favoured-nation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am going to speak on that. This means that the British preferential rate today is free in both cases and will become 15 per cent. The m.f.n. rate is 12½ per cent in one case and free in the other. It will become 20 per cent. The general tariff is 25 per cent in one case and 15 in another, and it becomes 30 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: For the record, when the minister says "in one case" what does he mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Depending on the size of the bottle. These two alternatives, for example, depend on the size of the bottle.

With respect to the third item, 263e, the present rates are B.P., 15 per cent; m.f.n., 20 per cent; and general, 25 per cent. Therefore it will be seen that the B.P. rate is reduced from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent and the m.f.n. rate from 20 per cent to 12½ per cent and the general rate remains unchanged at 25 per cent.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to the amendment, we in the opposition are in an awkward position. This may involve trade of some substance. We are not opposing the amendment. Everyone in the committee knows that we are perhaps approaching an adjournment of the house. The minister made an announcement today concerning this matter. His announcement has not been available to the public. Will the minister indicate to this committee what representations pro and con have come to his knowledge in connection with these items because obviously the rates are rather radically adjusted. The minister indicated they required some negotiation abroad because of our treaty commitments. To what extent has he heard from citizens of the country interested either in increasing the rates or decreasing them? Will he be frank with the committee at this late stage of the session and indicate, particularly to the opposition, what is the consensus in connection with these matters as it has been presented to him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall always be frank with the committee. I made explicit reference to the matter in the budget speech on June 20, so that there has been opportunity for anyone interested in the item to make representations in the light of the statement I made in the budget speech. But one thing that was not completed at the time of the budget speech was the GATT negotiations. I gave the house a full report at the time on the course of the negotiations, and last Saturday I reported the conclusion of the negotiations and the terms of the agreement reached.

As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Chairman, this all arises out of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which involved the classification under a particular item of the Canadian tariff of sodium hypochlorite in solution. The decision of the supreme court turned on the classification. The result of the decision was to upset the departmental rulings of recent years on this commodity. The rates that had been applicable were B.P., 15 per cent and m.f.n., 20 per cent. This change came right in the middle of the hearings of the tariff board on the chemicals reference, and it was represented to us, and convincingly, that unless the protection were restored it would mean closing down a very large Canadian plant; that in the face of competition the Canadian producers would not be able to carry on; that they would simply have to buy their sodium hypochlorite in solution from the United States. This would involve jobs for a good many Canadians. We felt that the present terms of tariff entry of sodium hypochlorite in solution were fair and reasonable; that is to say, 15 per cent B.P. and 20 per cent m.f.n. We thought it was most regrettable also that this change which denied to our Canadian producers the protection under which they had carried on business for years should be suddenly withdrawn while the whole question was before the tariff board. Therefore the action that we proposed was one that would reinstate the tariff protection but not indefinitely; to put a time limit on it, as we have done in this amendment, so that the whole question can be reviewed at a time when we can be reasonably confident that we will have received the report of the tariff board.

We then set to work to negotiate with the countries concerned. Following extensive negotiations carried on at Geneva by Mr. Hector McKinnon, who is leading the Canadian team in the current GATT negotiations there, and who commands so much esteem and respect on the part of hon. members in all parts of the house, we arrived only last Friday at the agreement. I mentioned the wire from Mr. McKinnon announcing the agreement arrived on Friday afternoon. Therefore we moved just as swiftly as it was possible to do. I put the notice of motion on Votes and Proceedings that afternoon.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we have had extensive requests for the reinstatement of the rates. Firms and associations that made representations requesting the former rate be reinstated are quite numerous.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time.

Mr. Benidickson: Next sitting of the house.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CLASSES OF LOANS, INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-117, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a few very brief remarks to make on this bill. The principle of the bill is to extend the definition of industrial enterprise or, in other words, to extend effectively the authority of the industrial development bank by permitting it to lend to any industry whereas formerly the bank was limited with regard to those classes of industry it could assist. There are other consequential amendments and there is an increase in the amount of money available for lending.

I think all hon. members will agree that it is desirable that the jurisdiction and authority of the bank should be extended. There is no quarrel with that purpose. What concerns me is that the principle involves not merely the extension of the authority of the bank to lend but goes so far as to permit the bank to lend to a business or undertaking of any kind. In other words, there are the widest possible ramifications.

In the final analysis the industrial development bank is using the taxpayers' money to lend to business. The bank has a good record and over the years has done a great deal for the economy of the country. But I for one cannot let second reading pass without expressing my displeasure at the way the principle of extending the activity of the bank is being carried out by the government. For instance, speaking only for myself I cannot accept without a word of protest the principle that the taxpayers' money should be gathered by the taxing authorities and made available through the industrial development bank for lending to any business whatever.

When taxation is bearing so heavily on our people, as it is and of necessity must with our expenditures at such a high level, surely it is not proper that money taken from the taxpayers should be used for lending to any business whatever. It is the principle arising out of the use of that very broad word any that causes me difficulty.

I know it is a bad thing in arguing on a matter of principle to use particular references. It is a poor way to argue but perhaps it does have the merit of bringing attention to the point at issue. Surely our taxpayers are not to be taxed, for instance, for the purpose of making their money available by way of loans for the development of race tracks, however pleasant these places may be to a great many of us. Surely that is not a desirable principle, and yet that is exactly what is being done by this kind of legislation. Surely it is not desirable that the taxpayers' money should be lent to certain limited types of amusement places which do not meet the requirements of most taxpayers in this country. I could go on and drag in other examples that would probably make the legislation look a little ridiculous in this context. However, I will content myself with illustrating the point as I have and expressing my regret that the government saw fit to use this particular method in the desirable extension of authority under the act. Surely the principle could have been carried out in a better way, in a manner that would more accurately express the wishes of the Canadian people, because it seems to me that this way completely ignores the rights of the taxpayers who are providing the funds.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on second reading of the bill may I say that I think there is one point which has not been brought to the attention of the house even though I am sure all hon. members realize it. The president of the industrial development bank is the same Mr. Coyne who has created quite a furor around the house in the last number of weeks. Mr. Coyne is the president of the bank and evidently the government is very happy with the way that the bank has been operated. Evidently Mr. Coyne's policies have been very highly suspect in other areas but so far as the industrial development bank is concerned everything seems to be going fine.

Quite frankly, before the bill comes to a vote I should like to know just what the relationship has been between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the president of the industrial development bank. We know what the relationship has been between the Minister of Finance and the president of the Bank of Canada, but before a measure like this is passed surely we should know whether the president is in agreement with these particular provisions and whether the board of directors was brought into this whole field. In view of the rather astounding revelations which have taken place with regard to the other position of Mr. Coyne over the last number of months, I really wonder exactly what his position would be as president of this particular institution in which we are making such a very great change.

For example, Mr. Coyne has been called restrictionist. As president of the industrial development bank he has increased the amount of money lent by 26 per cent and the number of loans by 24 per cent. It is rather interesting to note that the bank lending rate went from 6½ per cent to 7 per cent in September, 1959, and was brought down to 6½ per cent again by September 1960. It would seem that the president of the industrial development bank is following the suggestion of the Minister of Finance about lowering interest rates.

Mr. McIlraith: He is leading.

Mr. Pitman: It appears to me that it is the president of the Bank of Canada who seems to be getting into all the trouble. In the remarks which the minister made to the house he referred to the full support of the government. Evidently the president of the industrial development bank has the full support of the government. The bank has expanded its operations considerably over the past few years. I assume these are the activities of the same Mr. Coyne. The borrowing authority has been extended from three times the aggregate of capital plus reserve funds to five times the aggregate and it would seem that this is the old easy money policy. I should like to know whether Mr. Coyne concurred in this. If he did, certainly here is easy money. Here are the expansionist theories of the Minister of Finance and the government right in the one area where Mr. Coyne reigns supreme. When the minister spoke at the resolution stage he said, as found at page 7312 of Hansard:

> —it is the hope of the government that in this way the industrial development bank can also contribute to the retention in Canada of the ownership and control of Canadian businesses.

Mr. Coyne has been wandering right across the country suggesting this and yet the Minister of Finance puts forward the fact that the industrial development bank is going to put Mr. Coyne's views into action by providing opportunities for Canadian businessmen.

Mr. Nesbitt: Those views are not indigenous to Mr. Coyne alone.

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, I did not hear that.

Mr. Nesbitt: Those views do not entirely belong to Mr. Coyne alone.

Mr. Pitman: These were certainly some of the main points Mr. Coyne was making in his speeches and it was evidently his speeches which were causing a great deal of embarrassment to the government. We can only assume that some of these ideas were the ones which brought about the concern of the men on the treasury benches. I do not like to open the hatch to a debate on Mr. Coyne, especially when we are going to hear a great deal about him tomorrow. Nevertheless, I think there are some interesting aspects to this whole business when we realize that we are going about the process of extending the scope of the industrial development bank. We are in the process of extending the amount of money the bank would have to lend under a president whom we have been told is completely incompetent. I feel this is rather disturbing. Is Mr. Coyne going to remain as president of the industrial development bank? In the annual report, he is listed as president, not because he is president of the Bank of Canada but simply because he is president. I rather suspect he is president of the industrial development bank because he is president of the Bank of Canada.

The office of president of the industrial development bank is not included in the legislation which we are going to be reviewing once again tomorrow. I feel this is a matter of great interest in connection with the bill now before us. We should have a full explanation as to what the position is in regard to Mr. Coyne, not as president of the Bank of Canada but as president of the industrial development bank. It would seem to me that the confidence of the business community is at stake. Certainly, I should like to know whether or not the board of directors and the president of the industrial development bank were made aware of the government's scheme. We are told that Mr. Coyne did not even know what was in the budget until he opened his newspaper the next morning, at which time evidently he was at Stratford.

We have before us a bill to change an enterprise under the jurisdiction of a man who does not even know what is going to happen to that enterprise. Has he been told how the scope of the bank is going to be extended? I think the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) had a very good point. I wonder what Mr. Coyne would say? He has been the head of the organization for six and a half years and he must know something about the activities of this bank, where its weaknesses lie, and so on. We understand from the minister that Mr. Coyne knew nothing of what was in the budget. Presumably, he did not know what was going to happen to the industrial development bank either. While we are discussing this bill during the next few minutes I hope we will hear about Mr. Coyne, not so much as president of the Bank of Canada but as president of the industrial development bank.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise just briefly, Mr. Speaker, to express our support of this measure because, in our opinion, it is an extension of the use of social capital for the development of this country and its enterprises. I suppose that basically the purpose of the bill is to extend the definition of industrial enterprise to include an industry, trade or business of any kind. I am pleased to see this amendment proposed. Personally, I have had some knowledge, from a local point of view, of the application or administration of the industrial development bank and the purpose it has served, particularly in the forest industry in the area which I have the honour to represent.

For a considerable time, Mr. Speaker, I have considered it was somewhat limited in its scope and opportunities for making loans or various grants to industries or businesses. I have been under the impression that the larger companies, on the whole, have been best able to take advantage of this legislation. I trust that the amendments contained in this bill will mean that the bank will have an opportunity in the future to assist to a greater extent than in the past the medium and small sized businesses in the country.

I am pleased also to note the increase in capital to $50 million, and consequently the increase that can be made in aggregate loans, investments, guarantees and other liabilities. In considering this bill, I am somewhat inclined to be parochial in my approach. I can see great opportunities for the, shall I say, very sound application of the terms of this bill to the district which I have the honour to represent, to a number of industries and businesses that have been denied that opportunity to date. I am thinking particularly of the development of tourist resorts and places that provide recreational facilities, things of that type. When the minister replies, I should like him to give us a little more information in that connection. Will these amendments make it possible to assist that type of industry or business, whatever you like to call it?

In conclusion, let me say that I believe this is a progressive step and we support it.

Mr. Harris Rogers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of these amendments and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I have been interested in this subject for some time. When the minister introduced the resolution last Friday, as recorded at page 7310 of Hansard, he gave a full explanation of this measure. I would hope, unlike the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), that this bill would not take too long to pass.

The question that arises in my mind is, is this the answer to many of our problems? Will it go far enough? I should like to quote a part of the resolution which introduced this measure:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act to enlarge the classes of loans that may be made under the act so as to include therein all business enterprises without limitation as to the kind of business carried on.

Now, in analysing that part of the resolution, I should think that this would empower the bank to take at least a calculated risk in connection with applications that envisage, for instance, the development of our resources and which would help our unemployment problem. In addition, this measure would aid Canadian control of companies. For instance, I have one company in mind that is very dear to my heart, the Alberta Pulp Mill. This company is composed of 46 sound businessmen who have spent upwards of $200,000 in making surveys on the ground and from the air of certain timber limits. They have made application and will get a licence for 6,000 square miles of a species of white spruce which they tell me will compare with that in any area on the North American continent. At the moment, this company is at the stage where it needs from $150,000 to $200,000 to get a feasibility report. This money is available in the United States but it does mean losing Canadian control. There may be some risk involved, but I think it is a calculated risk.

On the other hand, there have been three feasibility reports made in this area by the same engineers, and they tell me that this particular area is better than either of the others. I hope that these amendments will provide a means for developing our own resources so that Canadians will be employed and Canadian control of the companies will be maintained. I think that this is something that we must foster, for the reason that I think we are lacking in this respect. If we ever want to attract Canadian money into our own resources, I think this is setting a pattern that can be followed.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, last Friday when the resolution was before us the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) indicated that we in this party would certainly have no objection to this legislation. Indeed we have advocated this type of thing for some time. In my remarks in connection with the budget I mentioned that, if we had in this country an expansionist government, I was surprised that in the legislative program announced last November there was no reference to expanding in this desirable field.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat, namely the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Rogers) asked the question: Will this bill go far enough? That is indeed an interesting question. It relates to the expansionist idea that this administration may have had at the time they asked us to assemble here last November and the fact that we find nine months later that something as important as this only now comes before us. What has happened in this cabinet which is supposed to be a cabinet that had some vision and some expansionist tendencies as outlined by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) so recently? Rumours have been going around that they had done some thinking along the lines of expansion beyond what is presented to us in this bill. I refer to a date as far back as February 18, 1961, when the Financial Post contained an article under the heading "Ottawa Studies Plan to Lend Risk Capital".

From its Ottawa staff, the Financial Post surmised that specific proposals for setting up a new $1 billion national development corporation which could supply risk capital for Canadian ventures were before the cabinet. What has happened to that proposal in an expansionist government referred to by the Minister of Finance just prior to the introduction of his budget? This article went on to say that it was believed that this corporation to be sponsored by the government would be intended to take a far more aggressive role than the industrial development bank, a federal agency established in 1944 to fill what appeared to be a gap in the existing financial machinery of this country, according to official descriptions of its position. Is this not a puny effort if this proposal was considered by an expansionist government in February as suggested by this article?

To indicate that it was not only one of our friends in the press gallery who had heard of this activity, I refer to another. I refer to an article of Mr. Peter Dempson of the Toronto Telegram which is not unfriendly to the present administration. His report dated May 25, prior to the budget, states this:

> One of the main provisions in the budget will be the financing of a national development fund, designed to stimulate the economy and create jobs. Reports have suggested the fund may run from $500 million to $1 billion.

We have the result. We have this bill. This advancement in the role of the industrial development bank, is of course, approved on this side. It is in accord with a resolution of this party presented in January at our national rally. It does not go as far as we suggested in our resolution at that time. However, it is significant that the government did not have it in mind when they proposed legislation for this session last November. It is also significant that it appears to be in the Coyne budget presented to the Minister of Finance last February, although some of the items in the Coyne budget are not acceptable to those of us on this side. However, what surprises me is this, and I hope that the minister, when he replies, will give us information on this point. We are increasing—and I say we agree to increase it—the capital of the industrial development bank. But what is the obligation with respect to non-budgetary transactions and net cash requirements of the government for the current fiscal year as a result of this decision? At page 6666 of Hansard I note in the budget speech of the minister a reference to his cash requirements. Hon. members will recollect that it was a cash requirement beyond the budgetary items of $1 billion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not in addition to the budget.

Mr. Benidickson: A cash requirement including the deficit.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Including the deficit.

Mr. Benidickson: It was a cash requirement including the deficit of $1 billion. There was, of course, this interesting dash. There is just an item of a dash in connection with exchange fund liabilities; no figure is given for that item. But regardless of that, I find nothing here that relates to the supply of capital, either on a budgetary basis or a cash basis, during the fiscal year for the industrial development bank and its proposed expansion which would be in accord with the bill before us.

I ask the minister to tell us something about that matter. Is this going to be printing press money that supplies the capital that will be available under the terms of this statute or in what way is this to be financed through the Bank of Canada? It is known to this house that, at our rally and following the rally in January of this year, this party took the position that the industrial development bank should be separated from the Bank of Canada. I find here that in the bill—and of course, we shall discuss the individual clauses later—there is a continuation of the stipulation that the executive committee of the bank will be those persons who happen to belong to the executive committee of the Bank of Canada. I hope that hon. members of the house will seriously consider whether that is a desirable feature which should continue in the legislation concerning the industrial development bank.

I conclude by saying again that we approve the enlargement of lending opportunities of this bank. I compliment the administration for enlarging the area of entitlement of businesses which may obtain loans from the bank. Last year, and I think the year before, I had on the order paper a bill to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act for the purpose of enlarging borrowers' entitlement. This measure goes even further than my amendment.

While we approve this bill in principle, I do hope the Minister of Finance will explain to the house how the capital is to be provided; how the loan money is to be provided; whether or not this involves real money provided by the government in addition to the statement on non-budgetary transactions and net cash requirements referred to at page 6666 of Hansard; whether this involves printing press money, and so on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, if no one else wishes to take part in the debate there are a few observations I should like to make to support what has been said by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River, particularly with respect to the regional aspect of the activities of the industrial development bank.

I recall very well that when the industrial development bank was first established in 1944 by the Mackenzie King government as part of its program for reconstruction after the war and for maintenance of the full employment which continued after the war until 1957 there was a great deal of criticism from those hon. gentlemen opposite now sitting on the treasury benches but who were on this side of the house at that time. There were a few of them. Their criticism was that this was more or less socialistic; that it was interfering with the legitimate scope of the chartered banks and other lending institutions, and that it should be viewed with a great deal of concern.

Notwithstanding those criticisms the Mackenzie King government went ahead with this legislation. We find, as in so many other things, that after four years of floundering around in uncertainty this government comes along and says these excellent measures that were put into operation by the Liberal government can now be improved and extended. They hope that by doing that they will get for themselves the credit for these measures.

We get this from these great latter day apostles of free enterprise. Perhaps that slogan we got from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) after his return from London on that occasion when he had to have two planes to make sure he got here for the Tory convention—that slogan of free enterprise against socialism—did not apply in this field. I say this because we now find these great apostles of free enterprise, led by that great champion of Bay street, the present Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fleming), asking us to extend the scope of the industrial development bank across the whole spectrum of lending for every conceivable legitimate purpose. I assume certain illegitimate activities would still be viewed with some disfavour in the lending policy of the industrial development bank.

I think it is worth underlining that there is quite a difference between the profession of hon. gentlemen opposite on the hustings in these great windy speeches that are made from time to time and the kind of measures they bring before us in this house.

An hon. Member: We are listening to one now.

Mr. Pickersgill: This measure was designed originally—and I trust it will be used in the future—only to supplement the existing private lending institutions. I do not think, with the bankrupt state of the treasury of this country at the present time, the government would be justified in seeking to supplant private lending institutions.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister made that all clear the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister's words are so inconsistent with the conduct of the government that there are very few objective people in this country who pay much attention any more to the minister's words. We are seeking to find out what the line of action of the minister is going to be, not his words.

It seems to me the industrial development bank has filled and will continue to fill a useful purpose in providing lending money in a field that is at the present time not adequately covered by any of the existing private institutions. But I do not think that in a desperate effort to regain the confidence of certain sections of the community, which this government has so obviously lost, it should with this or any other institution indulge in reckless lending of public money for unsound projects. I think that kind of warning needs to be made at a time when we approve in principle what is after all only an extension of a Liberal measure. Mr. Speaker, there are certain other observations I have to make. In order to be consecutive in dealing with them, may I call it six o'clock? I see it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for dinner I had just concluded certain general observations of a more or less historical character about the industrial development bank and had recalled that it was part of a great program for the transformation of our economy from wartime to peacetime under Mr. Mackenzie King, Mr. Ilsley and Mr. C. D. Howe, which worked perhaps better than any similar transformation in any other country of the world, and which laid the foundation for 12 years of full employment in this country and a steadily expanding economy which, unfortunately, has not been continued in the past four years.

I also pointed out that at the time the industrial development bank was established those of the hon. gentlemen opposite who were here at that time had very grave misgivings about it because they regarded it as a rather dangerous experiment of state intervention in the field of lending. It is interesting to note now that they are seeking to expand its powers under the flag of free enterprise.

I did not rise primarily to give this historical review and to put this in its proper perspective so much as to refer to one difficulty inherent in the Canadian economy and in the nature of our country, and to draw attention to the fact that we have constantly to take thought to overcome this difficulty. That difficulty is that there is in our financial and commercial world a constant tendency to centralize, which a wise government presided over by wise ministers and by a wise treasury should always seek to offset. This has had to be done in the fields of taxation through equalization; and in the field of making capital available, it has to be done through a great variety of devices, of which the industrial development bank is one.

If the industrial development bank is to be governed by purely commercial criteria in the allotment of its loans it will in fact be doing little more than duplicating or replacing private lending institutions. If it is to perform a useful function in our society it will have to do more than supply middle term capital which was one of the original purposes. It will have to seek to provide capital in such areas and ways that it will tend to offset to some degree the tendency to financial centralization which is, as I say, a thoroughly natural feature of our economy, but one which, if we are to have a healthy economy with reasonable equality of opportunity and advantage across the country we must constantly seek to offset.

In suggesting that I am not suggesting any argument on behalf of state ownership or anything that may even be vaguely described as socialism. I merely suggest that the principle of equalization, which has been followed by every constructive government from Sir John A. Macdonald down to the present, is one which should constantly and conscientiously be followed.

I know as well as anyone how difficult it is to do this effectively because there is no doubt that, other things being equal, it is much easier to start an effective industry within 40 miles of Montreal or Toronto than within 40 miles of St. John's, Newfoundland, or in the province of Saskatchewan, or some other relatively sparsely settled part of the country where one must overcome the disabilities of transportation, small markets, and so on.

As I say, if the industrial development bank is to be governed by purely commercial criteria, practically all its lending will be done in central Canada and that is certainly not desirable. I suggest it is very important that it should focus its interest primarily on two sectors of the economy. First, it should focus on small businesses which are not operating on a scale where they can go themselves directly into the capital market offering bonds or debentures, or where they have other forms of ready access to private capital. It should concentrate primarily on those businesses which are not large enough to bear the additional expense of floating their own loans, but which are soundly run and which have real opportunities for expansion and which can fill a need sometimes very much more effectively than much larger businesses because there are people involved who are more directly interested in getting results. In other words, properly conceived this can promote real private enterprise as opposed to large scale corporate endeavour in a very effective way. That is one area.

The other area is in respect to regional development. It is even harder to accomplish results in this area. Very often the scale of loans required by businesses in this field is so low that it really would not be worth while for the bank to engage in the activity. I know this from personal experience which I have had with potential borrowers in the province of Newfoundland. Two or three cases have come to my notice over the years I have represented Bonavista-Twillingate. I know that these applications were made to the industrial development bank and the view taken by the bank was that these looked like pretty sound propositions but the amount of the loan was so small and the cost of necessary supervision of the loan so high that it was not worth while to make the loan. Yet at the same time these loans were required for a longer period than that for which the chartered banks normally lend. I do feel that in this field some technique should be worked out which I do not think has been worked out yet. This need is not being met—though another very important one is by these government guaranteed loans to small businesses that were inaugurated a few months ago—and it will not be met by the industrial development bank under its existing practices. But I would think there might be some possibility of having some co-operative arrangement between the chartered banks and the industrial development bank whereby the chartered banks, which have their branches all over the country could act as agents for the industrial development bank in assessing and supervising some of the smaller loans so that it would not be necessary for the industrial development bank to have a staff of its own for the purpose and all the travelling expenses and other charges of that sort which would increase the overhead and make unsatisfactory top heavy arrangements. If the commercial banker felt that the risk was good enough that his bank was prepared to provide the annual working capital for the business which was required and if he were satisfied that it looked like a business that was good for expansion, the industrial development bank would not just automatically take their word but would at least count on the chartered banks or credit unions in certain cases supervising these loans and in that way cut down the cost of the overhead.

There is one thing that I think anyone who has had any experience in government or with any large scale organization must become impressed with all the time and that is the great necessity of avoiding unnecessary overhead expenditures. There is always a tendency to have too many people producing too many files and checking up too often. I sometimes think that we could reduce taxes and reduce the cost of government a great deal more if we were willing to take a chance a little oftener on some things and had far less of the accounting and checking than we have at the present time on small matters. I know, of course, what a scandal can be made if someone purloins $20 from the treasury, but sometimes you know you really wonder whether you should spend $500 or $1,000 a year on the off-chance that someone will get $20 from the treasury once in a while. A great deal of that sort of thing does go on in government no matter who is in the government.

As I say, if this industrial development bank, extending its scope over a much wider range of business, is going to have a real impact it has to take perhaps a little more risk than it has been taking up to now. The fact is, of course, it has been very well and prudently run by very able people. It is quite evident that the government must have that view because notwithstanding what the government is seeking to do with the president of the industrial development bank at the present time they still want the president of it to go on running the bank. I am not advocating recklessness or imprudence at all; quite the contrary. But I am saying that perhaps a somewhat greater degree of calculated risk will have to be taken if indeed these amendments are to realize that greater degree of expansion which Mr. Coyne was anxious to have when he recommended these changes to the government, which the government has now seen fit to bring before us and ask us to approve.

As I say, the measure of the expansion will be the measure of a reasonable degree of risk taken in this venture. I suggest that where the greatest risks should be taken are in the two areas I have mentioned: first, in the provision of capital for relatively small businesses that have not got the scope, and necessarily have not got it, to raise capital that large businesses do have by floating their own bonds and debentures; second, in seeking to offset this tendency toward commercial and financial centralization which is, as I say, an inevitable aspect of the kind of country we have and which it should always be the duty of every statesmanlike government to seek to offset.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few observations on the bill which relates to a subject that has been of interest to myself and I know to a number of other hon. members of the house. It has been pointed out by the previous speaker and by others that the industrial development bank as it exists at the present time and as it has existed over the years has not been entirely satisfactory. While it may have been in the first place, in later years I do not feel that it has met the needs of the community or of the country and for that reason these very welcome changes to the act have been made.

It has always been my understanding that the original intention of the act was that the industrial development bank should supplement ordinary commercial credit channels. However, certainly in many instances, this has not been the case. I know that many of us around here have heard that it is much easier for companies to get loans from the commercial banks than it ever was to get them from the industrial development bank in the past. I heard one person put it rather picturesquely. He said it was easier to get teeth out of a hen than it was to get a loan from the industrial development bank. That may perhaps be stretching the point a little but it does reflect the view of the public in general toward this institution.

Other hon. members have pointed out some of the advantages of the changes in the act. I do not wish to take up the time of the house in dwelling on and repeating them. It is very fine and very commendable indeed to have all businesses included. The amendments to the act will be of great assistance. They will provide much greater assistance to small and medium-sized businesses and the like. There is one important point that I do not think has been dealt with. I refer to the fact that under the new terms, as I undersand them, we will be able not only to provide additional financing for the development of our resources but will also help to keep our resources in Canadian hands, which is certainly most important.

There are a great many resources in this country. Our primary industries include mining in all its branches, forest industries and the like. Many of these industries have very good propositions from time to time but many have difficulty in raising capital through the ordinary commercial channels. As all hon. members know, there can be only a limited amount of risk capital available in a country like Canada because of our small population and the limited savings of our people. Countries such as the United States and others in Europe have much larger amounts of money available for risk capital. Many parts of the world, for political reasons and others, are not places in which people wish to invest their money. I think everybody knows this is a self-evident fact, but I think it sometimes does not hurt to repeat it. There are few countries in the world where people from abroad can invest their money with a great degree of safety. Canada is certainly one of those countries, probably the leading one. In many other parts of the world where people used to invest risk capital they are not anxious to do so now. Some governments have recently become pretty nationalistic and are expropriating capital, and the political climate in those countries is not good for such ventures. As a result people from abroad are looking to this country, and have been as we all know, as a place in which to invest risk capital. I should like to cite one example. I will not name the company because that would probably not be fair. In 1958 a company was formed in one of the eastern Canadian provinces and it had very large proven deposits of a highly valuable mineral. It was a little difficult to obtain credit from the normal sources at that time for reasons which hon. members will know, and this particular company applied to the industrial development bank for assistance.

It is my understanding that, to say the least, they were given a very cursory hearing and turned down.

The result was that this particular mining company had to turn to United States and European capital which was obtained very quickly, but the situation now is that ownership and control of this great and very valuable resource is completely in foreign hands. What is more, the terms under which capital was borrowed to develop the mine were such that in the opinion of many the resource was virtually stolen.

It is just this kind of thing that the amendments to the act will now prevent. They will do so in two ways. In one case it may be done by the guaranteeing of the bonds of a company, as is already done by some provincial governments, and if the industrial development bank can guarantee the bonds of a company it may provide sufficient capital to go ahead with the enterprise. In the case of a larger enterprise, as may well happen on many occasions, the fact that the bonds and perhaps other current and long term liabilities of the company are guaranteed will greatly facilitate the sale of common or preferred shares in such a company because once the long or short term liabilities are guaranteed by the industrial development bank the element of risk disappears to a great extent with the result that additional capital is made more easily available.

There is always a limited amount of risk capital available in a country like Canada but there is always additional capital available for less risky projects. If the liabilities of these companies which are attempting to develop our resources should be guaranteed, it would make it much easier for them to obtain additional capital right here in Canada rather than having to go abroad to find capital, thus losing control of the resource as took place in the example to which I referred. As I have already said, I think the amendments to the act are most commendable and will do a great deal to develop our own resources and keep them in the hands of Canadians.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) makes a speech I wonder whether I could put a question to him which he could answer in the course of his remarks. In view of the character of the bill and the fact that it is of considerable importance and has many clauses, it would seem to me that the proper course in accordance with regular practice would be for the bill to be sent to the banking and commerce committee. In that event I would hope it would be possible for us to ask the president of the industrial development bank to come before that committee to give his views with regard to the bill and possibly, if the minister would graciously allow, his comments on other matters as well. At any rate, it might be possible for certain members of that committee, who are alert, vigilant and concerned with the public interest, to put questions to him on matters that might have some relationship to the industrial development bank bill.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like also to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and put a question to the minister which he can answer when he replies. I take it this is the measure that provides for an increase in the resources of the bank from $160 million to $400 million as announced in the budget. I should like the minister to direct his attention to this question when he replies. What provision, if any, is made in this legislation for depressed areas? In other words, it seemed to us that in increasing the resources of the bank by a substantial amount as is being done in the legislation some consideration should be given to assisting depressed areas.

The minister will remember that at one time he announced a policy having to do with assistance over a period of one year to industries which would locate in depressed areas. I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) the other day when he spoke on the budget how many industries had established themselves in these depressed areas and he was unable to give me a reply although he said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had given some indication as to the number of companies that had applied for assistance. I think he did give the number of applicants but I am sure the house would be quite interested in the effect of the policy which the minister announced earlier.

The point in which I am interested now is, what provision is made in this legislation to come to the assistance of depressed areas by means of special depreciation and otherwise? Would the minister also be good enough to tell us the number of industries that did establish themselves in depressed areas by virtue of the earlier announcement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and also concurred in, I believe, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must confess to some surprise at some of the statements that have been made in the course of this debate having regard to the course of the debate at the resolution stage on June 30. I began by being surprised at the views expressed by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). He may not have been aware that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) speaking on the resolution stage of this measure on June 30, said, as found at page 7312 of Hansard:

> ...we on this side have been advocating for some time now an expansion of the functions and activities of this very useful piece of machinery...

The hon. member for Ottawa West expressed some concern at the removal of the limitations written into the present act and defining those industries that may qualify for loans from the industrial development bank. He seemed to expect that the bank was now going to lend money to race courses.

The act has hitherto defined in fairly explicit terms those industrial enterprises which qualify for loans under the act. There are four categories of them and in the course of administration those categories have become rather rigidly interpreted. There have been many requests for the removal of those rigidities and a widening of the scope of those industries which qualify for loans from the bank. This is part of the background.

When the government proposes in this measure to remove the existing limitations on the industries which qualify, it is not necessary for the hon. member to assume that the result is going to be the throwing around of public money on things like race courses. There are many enterprises that certainly regard themselves as equally worthy of loans from the industrial development bank as those that have been defined hitherto as qualifying. There have been many of them. For instance, rural telephone companies have not qualified. Then, there are the enterprises that are engaged in the tourist industry. There have been many requests for loans for motels, hotels and tourist establishments, and so one could go on. I mention these examples, Mr. Speaker, to disabuse the minds of hon. members of the idea that the enlargement of the scope of qualifying industrial enterprises under this bill is intended to embrace things that might be regarded by some people as frivolous. This is a serious attempt to make the industrial development bank more serviceable to the Canadian economy.

Now, sir, it should not be thought, either, that the bank in exercising the wide powers conferred upon it under this measure is going to throw to the winds those proper considerations and that discretion which any banker ought to observe. I have been at pains to stress this fact both in the budget speech and in speaking to the resolution on June 30. The bank must still use a banker's judgment and decide whether or not applicants are really creditworthy. In this regard, let me say that there is here no thought of just casting away the proper restraint.

However, at the same time I must say, hearkening to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that there has been not a little criticism directed at the operations of the industrial development bank. It is the hope of the government that with the enlargement of the powers under this act, the enlargement of the lending resources of the bank and the enlargement of the definition of industrial enterprises which may qualify for loans under the act, the bank will be in a position, as I have said, to be more serviceable to the Canadian economy.

There is no thought, Mr. Speaker, of having the bank duplicate existing credit facilities. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) evidently was not acquainted with what I endeavoured to say on this matter at the resolution stage on June 30. I was at some pains then to stress the fact that this institution, because it has access to public funds, should not be duplicating the facilities offered by private institutions. I recall to the minds of hon. members the fact that these safeguards are written right into this act itself. This is not something that is left to the good judgment of those who are administering the affairs of the bank. This is a safeguard that is written right into the terms of the act itself and it abides there. It is not changed by this present amending bill. Section 15 of the act reads:

(1) Subject to section 14, where in the opinion of the board

(a) a person is engaged or about to engage in an industrial enterprise in Canada,

(b) credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions,

An applicant who goes to the industrial development bank must establish, and it is proper that he should establish, that credit or other financial resources are not otherwise available to him on reasonable terms and conditions. If he is able to obtain commercial credit from a chartered bank, that is where he should go. If a large industry is able to meet its capital needs in the financial market, it is to the financial market that it should go. This institution is intended, and in its functions and scope is still intended, to fill what is otherwise a gap in the credit institutions of this country. It is not intended to duplicate the functions of the chartered banks in extending commercial credit for short periods. It is not intended to duplicate or provide substitute credit facilities for those larger institutions which are in a position to raise money by bond or debenture issues on the market. This institution is intended principally to provide for those small and medium size institutions, loans in an area and for a term not otherwise available.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked about the application of the lending provisions of this act in regions where there has been an inadequate development of secondary industry. He has not acquainted himself with what I endeavoured to say on this subject at the resolution stage on June 30. At that time we heard a very effective plea by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) for the exercise of the functions of the bank in relation to assistance for the development of secondary industries in areas like his in Nova Scotia. In commenting on the submission made by the hon. member, I was at pains to stress that this ought to be regarded as one of the functions of the industrial development bank. I alluded to the fact that in the last five years the number of local offices of the industrial development bank has been enlarged from four to thirteen. This enlargement has been carried out with a view to making the services of the bank available in those regions on a much more local basis than had previously been possible.

For my part, I welcome this expansion of the localizing effect of the increase in the number of branches. It will enable those who are giving local administration to the affairs of the bank to be more intelligently acquainted with the needs of the local areas. I entirely endorse the plea made on Friday by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, that the functions of this bank should be directed consciously toward assisting in the provision of the needed credit for the development of secondary industry in those areas.

There were several other questions asked about the way in which the increase in capital is to be met. The answer is right in the terms of the bill itself, but the rules of the house preclude me from drawing attention to the specific provisions of the clauses of the bill. However, the answers are there. The purpose of this measure was praised by all sections of the house last Friday. I hope the measure will continue to enjoy the support of hon. members in all parts of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if he will be good enough to deal with the question which I asked.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I overlooked the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East, and I will give him the benefit of the doubt and assume for the moment that the question was seriously asked. It is the hope of the government that following second reading of the bill the house shall resolve itself into committee of the whole and proceed at once with consideration of the bill. It is not a long bill. If we follow the course of the discussion of this bill, including last Friday's debate on the resolution stage, we find it is not a contentious bill. It is a bill that is very clear. Having regard to the fact that its principle and its purpose have been supported by members in all parts of the house I think, on reflection, hon. members will agree it would be needless delay to refer the bill to a standing select committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister refuse to let the bill go before a committee because that will afford members an opportunity to ask the governor of the Bank of Canada, who is president of the industrial development bank, to give them the benefit of his experience?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reasons for following the normal course of the house in these matters are clear. I think the house is not likely to be distracted by the unusual course that the hon. member for Essex East temptingly invites the house to take.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is the normal course.

Mr. Chevrier: I asked the minister a question to which he failed to reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is not the committee, Mr. Speaker. I answered the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are dealing here with an amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act. The hon. member wished to ask some questions about another measure altogether. We must ask that here, and in the committee, we deal with the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the minister omitted to reply to one question which I put to him, Mr. Speaker. He dealt with one of the questions I had asked but he did not deal with the other one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will deal with questions in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the bill is considered in committee the hon. member will have an opportunity to put his questions.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Carried on division.

Mr. Benidickson: There are unanswered questions. That is why it was agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—"Industrial enterprise".

Mr. Chevrier: In his reply to a question which I put to the minister earlier, he said that it ought to be one of the functions of the bank to provide assistance to the development of secondary industry in depressed areas. The question I asked earlier had to do with an announcement made by the Minister of Labour some weeks or months ago having to do with assistance to depressed areas and also the statement made by the Minister of Finance during the budget debate. I wonder whether the minister would answer the question which was this. How many industries have in fact established themselves in depressed areas because of the assistance given by the government to those industries which would receive accelerated depreciation for a year over a period of three years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is asking about something, of course, that lies outside the scope of this bill. He is asking about a measure that was introduced and announced in the budget of December 20, 1960. I have not the precise figures. That measure is not administered by the department of which I have the honour to be minister. It is administered under the Department of Trade and Commerce. In my budget speech I gave some indication of the quickening interest that has been shown in the accelerated depreciation provisions that were there offered. However, that is in the budget speech. I have not specific information about the number of industries that are established.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is quite right, Mr. Chairman. The question I put to him is outside of the scope of this measure. But on the other hand, since under this measure the minister says it ought to be one of the functions of the bank to come to the assistance and development of secondary industries in depressed areas we are naturally—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I said "in areas in which secondary industry had not been developed". I did not use the expression "depressed areas".

Mr. Chevrier: I took it down and I thought the minister had used it. However, it is not of immediate consequence at the moment. The point is that I think the committee would be interested in knowing what has been the benefit of the earlier measure, because it is not inconsistent with what is happening here. It is true that the minister put on record the number of applications that had been received from industry. While I realize that he has not at his finger tips the number of industries that have taken advantage of the measure I wonder whether, during the course of the discussion, the minister could not obtain this information for the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I doubt it, Mr. Chairman. I am sure my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be glad to supply any information that the hon. member for Laurier or any other hon. member may wish in that regard. However, I have not that information here. It is not in my department. I may say that there will be proper occasion for hon. members to obtain that information.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to deal with something that took place during my absence when the minister was making his concluding remarks on second reading. In the course of which reference was made to what I had said this afternoon. I perhaps should explain to the committee the reason for my absence. Mr. Speaker was presiding over a meeting of the committee dealing with the procedure of the house and I was summoned to attend that meeting. I attended it, as I thought was my duty, but it meant that I was absent while the minister was replying on second reading. In that reply I am told that he made reference to the position I had taken as to the principle of the bill. If I am correctly informed, he stated the position that I was supposed to have taken quite differently from what the facts warrant.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has been misinformed.

Mr. McIlraith: I would ask the minister to wait until he hears me out before deciding whether or not I have been misinformed. If the belligerent little minister could observe the rules of the house and have some manners in debate, perhaps we could get on more expeditiously.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stick to the facts.

Mr. McIlraith: I will stick to the facts and I will debate the point. It is relevant to this clause. I will insist on the right to have the point stated. Although I have not had an opportunity of seeing the minister's remarks in print because it is not possible to do so under the rules of the house, I am told that the minister represented me as having taken a position that was inconsistent with that which was taken by the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke on second reading of this bill. However unpleasant it may be to the minister to hear this, the rest of the committee is entitled to hear it. May I say that the position I took was wholly consistent with that of the Leader of the Opposition. If the minister had done me the honour of paying attention to my remarks when I was making them, he would have known this. I had made it clear that I thought the objective of the bill was wholly desirable but I expressed regret that, in achieving that desirable objective or seeking to bring it about, he had expressed the bill in the language used in it.

I had gone on to point out that the widening of the activities of the industrial development bank took place under this bill in two main ways. One was by increasing the amount of money available for them and the other was in increasing the types of business or enterprise to which they could make loans by redefinition of the term "industrial enterprise" in clause 1 of the bill. I had expressed regret that in that redefinition he had chosen this particular method because, in addition to achieving the wholly desirable objective of making more money available to this bank for the laudable purposes for which it is provided, he had done it by way of making any industry, trade or other business available as potential borrowers.

I had pointed out that this use of the word any had opened up the possibility of using taxpayers' money by way of loan for certain types of business which did not contribute anything substantial to the economy of this country or to the development of the country and which I was sure hon. members on all sides of the house would not wish to see helped with taxpayers' money. That was the point I had made. There is nothing in that point inconsistent with the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition on second reading. I thought I owed it to the committee to make that perfectly clear.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, I regret that I was not able to be in the house when the minister was making his remarks so that I could have heard them precisely, but with the vicissitudes of the business of the house being conducted as it is and, as perhaps of necessity it must be, during the closing days of this part of the session, I could not help being absent. I hope the apology in that respect is accepted.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was absent for 40 minutes attending the same committee as the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I have just one question to ask the minister. Was this amending bill, and particularly the clause that applies to all businesses without limitation, introduced by the government on the recommendation of the president of the industrial development bank or is it the result of the minister's own observation of circumstances in the country and the application of the industrial development bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is introduced as a result of a government decision but there have been discussions with the authorities of the bank.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I raised a matter to which the minister did not immediately address himself. He gave the impression that he did not regard the suggestion as a serious one and dismissed it somewhat summarily. I believe it is an important suggestion and I am going to renew it at this time.

First of all I want to say that, as the Leader of the Opposition indicated, the principle of this bill is one which we strongly support, not only because of the improvements that are made in the operations of the industrial development bank but because our own experience has indicated that the bill in its original form served a useful purpose and in the light of existing economic conditions in the country the improvements are calculated to meet the new economic situation that faces us.

There have been many complaints, of course, about the administration of the industrial development bank. It has been charged by would-be borrowers and others that the bank exercised a restrictionist policy and on that account it was not possible for them to get the kind of credit they required to enable them to maintain their industrial enterprises.

It would be interesting, in the light of the kind of experience that the bank will have in the future, for hon. members to know in much greater detail than we have had from the minister what has been the experience of the bank in the past with regard to this matter. There is an office of the industrial development bank in the city of London which I suppose is intended to serve the district from London to Windsor and from London to Hamilton. The minister, in mentioning that there would be four new branches in the bank's operations, did not say what other places—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say there would be four new branches.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I understood there would be four new branches.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then perhaps the minister would be good enough to tell us what he did say. I certainly understood him to say there would be four new branches and the purpose of the enlargement of the operations of the bank was to meet local conditions in the country more effectively than has hitherto been the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said that in the last five years the number of branches had increased from four to 13.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister. He says now that the number of branches which have been in existence will continue and there will be no addition to their number. I had hoped that in view of the fact that an effort is being made in my own city of Windsor to get new industry, and particularly a whole series of small industries, the importance of that city would be recognized in any new branches that were going to be set up. However the minister indicates that there are not going to be any new branches.

As I say, there have been complaints about the criteria established by the bank in the past in the loans it has made to enterprises covered by this bill. The minister has said that a new spirit is to be engendered in the administration of the industrial development bank; an attempt is going to be made to recognize special conditions and special situations. One would hope that the special situations the hon. gentleman had in mind would be those chronically depressed areas in the country that come within the mischief of the minister's anaemic double depreciation program announced in the baby budget and about which we have heard so little ever since.

Because we want to make sure that the criteria to be established in the future meet the conditions and the objectives laid down by the minister in the statement he made a few moments ago I think we must have more information than is now available to us. It is all very well for a minister of the crown piloting a bill of this sort through the house to speak generously and perhaps even extravagantly of his intentions. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to say that under this administration an attempt is going to be made to bring the potential power of this measure into areas where such credit has not been available at the hands of the crown. However, one often finds that the declarations made by members of a government before an act is passed are not in practice fully supported by those who are called upon to administer the act once it is passed. That certainly might well be the case in the future. One way of determining that would be to know in advance what criteria are going to be employed. Is special attention going to be paid to chronically unemployed areas? Is an attempt going to be made to use this measure to provide for an alleviation of unemployment in areas that are depressed? Is this bill really going to meet the very laudable objectives which the minister has postulated? I suggest that one way of getting an answer to this series of questions would be for the minister to agree to send this bill to the banking and commerce committee.

The minister has turned down that request. He made the perfectly obvious remark that the bill would ultimately go to the committee of the whole. Of course every hon. member was aware of that procedure. The question was whether the bill would go to a standing committee of the house, and that is certainly not an unusual request. Bills much less complicated than this which have been introduced by the minister have been sent to the banking and commerce committee. The minister the other day sent to that committee a group of bills having to do with trust companies and the like. We had a very valuable discussion in that committee. That discussion certainly elicited information which had not been forthcoming from the minister in his statements in this house.

I am sure that if we had before that committee on this bill the new directors, particularly the new directors who are now in the government service, as well as the old directors now in the government service, we would have a much more detailed description of their intended functions. We would have a more precise appreciation of the criteria which they would employ than we have obtained from the minister. We would have an opportunity of ascertaining in greater detail and with greater precision why loans in the past, under some of the very same authority now provided in this bill, have not been extended. We would be able particularly to ascertain what are going to be the future intentions of the directors in this regard.

The deputy minister of trade and commerce, or whoever happens to be the deputy minister at the time, is going to be made a director. I think that is a wise suggestion. It would be very useful to have him give us an indication of the plans, in the light of the pronouncement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the increase in Canada's export trade, because many of the industries that can benefit from this kind of legislation will be industries, as I know from my own community, of the smaller type seeking outlets in Canada's external markets.

It would also, of course, be interesting to learn from the president of the bank what his experience has been with regard to the administration of this act and the criteria he, as president of the bank, envisages for the operations in the future. After all, the governor of the Bank of Canada continues to be the president of the industrial development bank. Notwithstanding the vicissitudes which may have crept into the structure of the government of Canada within recent weeks the present governor of the Bank of Canada continues to be the president of the industrial development bank.

We are entitled as members of parliament to have from that individual an accounting of his stewardship and administration as head of this bank as well as an indication of the kind of policy he and his colleagues on the board of directors intend to pursue in furthering the objectives of this bank in respect of which the lending facilities are to be increased from $100 million to $400 million. That represents a very large increase and surely we are entitled to have from those who are going to administer this an indication of how they are going to apply it particularly in the chronically unemployed areas such as those I have mentioned.

It cannot be argued that the minister has satisfied the committee or the house in respect to the kind of question I am asking now. Surely he cannot deny us the opportunity of eliciting further information in this regard. What objection can there be to having this bill sent to the banking and commerce committee in accordance with our traditional practice? I can very well envisage what the minister would say if he were in the opposition and this situation were confronting another administration. I can recall some of the declamations which he has made in the past in respect to matters involving the same kind of principle that now agitates me. How he would have complained about the treatment of parliament by the government if the government of that day had restricted its responses only to those who were actually in the executive arm of government.

The Minister of Finance is a busy man and could not possibly know all that one would expect an administrator of the industrial development bank to know. This measure can be a very important measure for improving our economic conditions, for alleviating unemployment, for setting in motion the productive processes of much new industry in Canada, but the only way that can be done is by industry learning, through the members of the banking and commerce committee, what the intentions of the administrators are.

It is all very well for the minister to take the position that he has laid down the very broad lines involved in this legislation but it is not the broad lines we want; we want the details which the Minister of Finance has not given. He has spoken in laudatory terms of the general intentions but he has not given us any indication as to the character of industry that will be assisted. He has not told us of the percentage of an applicant's capital set-up which will be required, for instance, to make it possible for that industry to qualify. What are the criteria in that regard? How much equity will an industry be required to have before that industry will be able to qualify for a loan under this act?

In clause 3 of the bill—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have not reached that yet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that, but I say that in clause 3 of the bill provision is being made for by-laws of the company, yet the minister has not told us about those. Provision will be made for regulations governing the administration of this act but we have had no indication as to what those regulations will be. These questions are the kind which normally, under our system of government, are answered in an appropriate standing committee of this house.

I ask the Minister of Finance once again to allow this bill to go to the committee where we can obtain the kind of answers which we have not been receiving from the minister in the general statements which he has made. If the minister takes the position that he cannot send this bill to the committee because the present head of the industrial development bank is the governor of the Bank of Canada, I suggest that is not a response to which the approval of this house can be given.

The law of this country is such that the present governor continues to be the president of the industrial development bank, and whatever his opportunity may be for future public service is not the question involved. The question is, what has been his experience? He must have had something to do with the framing of this bill because it is inconceivable that the Minister of Finance should have created a bill increasing the available amount of money for credit purposes from $100 million to $400 million without it having been discussed with the members of the board of directors of the industrial development bank. Undoubtedly the board of directors as presently constituted have discussed this matter, and undoubtedly they have made recommendations to the minister with regard to the increase in the amount of credit to be provided under this amending bill.

That being the case, Mr. Chairman, what possible reason could the minister have for not allowing this bill to go to the standing committee of this house thereby affording to members of that committee the opportunity of finding out from the directors, and particularly from the president who has had such close and intimate association with this bank, the answers to these important questions. There can be no reason but one, and I shall not suggest that reason.

I ask the minister, in the interests of giving to this country the kind of information which we are entitled to have, to recognize what our practice has been, to recognize what he himself has done with regard to many bills of lesser importance than this during the course of the present session when he sent those bills to the standing committee. If that has been done in the past why can it not be done with regard to a measure about which the minister says he has such high hopes, and about which we too have high hopes?

There is to be the kind of administration necessary to make this act as effective as the minister would like it to be, but he will not be administering it; it will be administered while he is preoccupied with all sorts of other questions. That being the case, once again I make an appeal to him to recognize the rights of hon. members to have further information which can only be obtained apparently through one of the standing committees of this house. The minister should not hesitate or at all be concerned about letting the president of the industrial development bank come to the committee at least for the purpose of discussing the amendments proposed to this act. He could put all the reservations he wishes on the scope of questioning, which will be considered by this house. I ask him to distinguish this bill from another bill and to recognize that the governor of the bank can supply hon. members with information which the minister thus far has not given them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member, as he must well know, are entirely out of order. The house has already decided that this bill should go to the committee of the whole. That is the decision of the house and it is binding. It is not open to the hon. member to raise arguments in the committee that the house should have taken a course different from the one which it took in referring this bill to the committee of the whole. Therefore I submit his remarks are out of order. It is here we are following the normal course and here that hon. members are to be given such information as the committee may require with reference to the terms of this particular measure.

Some hon. members opposite made statements that might lead one to think that they were the fathers of the ideas in the bill;—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that there was strong support for the bill on their part. There was even a suggestion that at the national convention of the Liberal party in January, such ideas as have found their way into this bill for enlarging the scope, usefulness and resources of the industrial development bank had been adopted here. If I am to interpret the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East now he is questioning the measure at every turn. He is not prepared—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no questioning of this measure at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then, why does he put up this smokescreen? Let us go ahead with this measure which he seemed to favour at one stage of the day but which seems to have lost his favour now. He said in one breath that hon. members opposite favour the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We favour the principle of this bill very much.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate announced on his part that the bill was adopted on division so it is quite clear he was not for the principle of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, sir, the minister has made a statement which is totally false.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member said "on division".

Mr. Pickersgill: Your Honour asked whether this bill should be sent to the committee of the whole and I said "on division". I said "on division" precisely because the minister had refused the request of my hon. friend from Essex East that the bill should not be sent immediately to the committee of the whole but should be sent, as it should have been and as it would have been in any other session, to the banking and commerce committee. The only reason it is not being sent, as every member of this committee knows, is that the minister is afraid to have the president of the industrial development bank appear before that standing committee. For the minister to get up and make totally false statements about the attitude taken by other hon. members in this committee does him no particular credit.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it will add nothing to the weight to be attached to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat for him now to suggest that he was not putting himself on record squarely "on division" a while ago. He was heard on this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He explained why.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All right, then. If the hon. gentleman is in favour of the bill now can we not go on with it without having the hon. member for Essex East seek to divert us from proceeding with a measure which I thought at one stage he was supporting?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has once more twisted and turned and tried to change the record. No one in this house opposed the second reading of this bill. It passed unanimously and no one said "on division"; but when Your Honour put the subsequent motion that it be sent to the committee of the whole, a motion which is purely procedural and which was the procedure which the government was using to evade responsibility, I said "on division". I said "on division" because we want this bill to go to the banking and commerce committee so that we will be sure it will do what the Liberal party in its rally wanted it to do, namely to be genuinely expansionist, and not reflect the phoney kind of wordy expansion which is the only expansion we have ever got from the Minister of Finance, and that only since June 14.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is questioning the terms of the measure, which are the terms in which parliament is called upon to legislate, we shall have an opportunity later on to put him on record on it.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I shall not let my remarks wander out of order, but I do wish to state my sincere regret that this house has taken this decision; that it is not sending this bill to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pitman: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the hon. member recognizes it is the case that there is nothing to prevent the house taking a decision now that this bill be sent to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Pitman: I say this. I support the hon. member for Essex East most sincerely in his contention.

The Minister of Finance stood in his place just a few minutes ago and said that he was surprised that we on this side of the house did not know certain things. The hon. member for Ottawa West had to come back into the house and redefine what he had said. The only way that we can get this kind of information is in a committee.

We have had a great deal of criticism. The hon. member for Oxford, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and the hon. member for Halton all rose in their places and said that in the past the bank had not been doing the things it should be doing. Therefore, we want the bill, which the Minister of Finance says is going to provide employment, to go before the committee.

There are a number of things which I think the committee of the whole should know. For example, why was it that the bank made a profit of nearly $2 million last year and yet wrote off only $35,000 in bad debts. This is a very small amount in terms of the amount of risk involved. I think that a bank which is being supported by the government of Canada should be willing to take risks. This is what hon. members are saying in the house and yet the minister will not allow us to bring before the committee the president of the industrial development bank who happens also to be the governor of the Bank of Canada. He will not allow us to question this man with some freedom in order to find out what things have been going wrong with the administration of the act in the past so that they can be rectified in the future.

There are a number of things we would like to know. The character of the president of the industrial development bank has been virtually assassinated in this house. Yet, it would appear that his proposals were accepted by this government when it came to revising and amending this act. I think we on this side are justified in asking why the government is going to accept the proposals of the president of the industrial development bank and why, on the other hand, it considers that he was completely incompetent when it came to running the Bank of Canada. I think we should know to what extent there has been rapport among the Minister of Finance this government and the president of the industrial development bank.

Mr. Benidickson: Who appoints the directors?

Mr. Pitman: That is a very good point, Mr. Chairman. Hon. gentlemen opposite have appointed those directors. They will not allow them to be summoned before the committee so that they can be examined.

This house is entitled to information. The House of Commons is not here to be common; it is here to lead common people in the solution of their common problems. This can be done only when members of the House of Commons have information. The only place they can obtain this information is in a committee of this house set up for that purpose.

What the hon. member for Essex East is suggesting is not an irrational delaying tactic. It would take only one or two meetings, perhaps two or three days. It appears that we are going to be here for a few days in July. It would take a very short time to find out exactly what has been going wrong with this legislation, why there has been criticism from all sides of the house. In fact, this is the strange part of it. More criticism has been voiced to the right of Mr. Speaker than has been voiced on this side of the house. At least three members from the other side stood in their places and criticized the bank for what it has not done. I do not think one member of the opposition has done this. Everything that has been said on this side of the house has been of a laudatory nature and we have sought fuller information. We have said that in the past the industrial development bank has performed a great service but that, on the other hand, we felt there should be an opportunity to provide a better service. There have been other suggestions from this side of the house having to do with regional development and the development of depressed areas. This government will not even accept the possibility that perhaps there may be a few people who could give some suggestions with respect to this bill which might well give more employment in depressed areas and which might well help the economies of these regions which today are not enjoying the same degree of prosperity as other parts of Canada.

The government is engaging in a form of closure, although I hate to use that word. It is depriving the members of this house of the knowledge necessary to fully inform them of the affairs of this country.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Peterborough—

Mr. Churchill: One party.

Mr. Chevrier: —in trying to impress upon the minister certain points which I believe have already been brought forcefully to his attention but on which I should like to insist. It strikes me that the Minister of Finance is being highly technical tonight. He has said to the committee on several occasions that what we are discussing is entirely out of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is.

Mr. Chevrier: I say to him and those who sit behind him that it is not out of order. We are perfectly within our rights in dealing with this matter, having regard to what the minister has already said. The minister said earlier that it ought to be—he did not say it would be—one of the functions of the bank to assist secondary industry particularly in depressed areas in this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not use the expression "depressed areas" at all.

Mr. Chevrier: That is why I say the minister is being very technical in objecting to what is being put to him from this side of the house. After all, if it is the intention of the government to use the bank as an instrument to come to the assistance of secondary industry, whether it be in depressed areas or elsewhere, then there should be no objection on the part of the minister in submitting this matter to the banking and commerce committee. My experience has been that these matters are referred to that committee from time to time and here is an occasion when there should be no objection whatever on the part of the Minister of Finance.

The present president of the industrial development bank has not resigned from that office. He has not been asked by the Minister of Finance to resign from that position. Therefore there should be no objection to calling him before a committee so that the country will know what the government has in mind with reference to assistance to secondary industry, with reference to what the minister said ought to be one of the functions of the bank, the assistance of depressed areas.

Let me say to the minister and to his colleagues on the other side of the house that it is quite proper at any time in the proceedings for the minister and the government to determine that a matter, notwithstanding that it is in committee of the whole, should be referred to another committee, for instance, the banking and commerce committee, so that the measure can be studied. It seems to us that that would be the only logical step in this instance. It seems to us that that would be a way for the government to show its sincerity because the president of the bank could then be called as a witness and we could examine him on what the bank has in mind with reference to depressed areas. If that is not done, then we will not know what is in the mind of the government. We will not know what is in the mind of the bank with reference to these all important matters, most of which have been referred to in the budget. I ask the minister again to reconsider the situation and to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East and submit the bill to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I ask you to regard the situation in which we find ourselves. It was a decision of the house that this bill be referred to the committee of the whole for consideration and the purpose of such consideration is not to debate another course or to open up the decision that the house has taken but so that the house may in committee of the whole review the clauses of the bill seriatim. What we have listened to has not been a discussion of the bill but an attack on the decision of the house. It does not rest with any of the committees of the house, whether they be select committees or committees of the whole house, to attack a decision of the house itself. We are sitting in committee of the whole on the bill because the house has so decided and I would respectfully submit that this discussion is out of order and we should now be discussing clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Is the hon. member speaking to the point of order?

Mr. Benidickson: I did not think there was a point of order. I am speaking generally with respect to clause 1. I wish to indicate in speaking to clause 1—

The Chairman: Order. The minister has raised a point of order and has apparently asked the Chair to make a ruling. If we are through with the discussion which has taken place and the committee is now proceeding to discuss clause 1, the chairman will not have to make any ruling, which might be the best course to follow.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, it is true that a decision has been taken by the house, but nothing prevents the committee from asking the house to reconsider that decision. The members have merely asked the minister to submit this decision again to the house so as to have this bill referred to the banking and commerce committee. I do not feel the minister is justified in saying that we are out of order when we suggest that the house should have a further opportunity of reviewing this decision, so that it may rule that the matter be referred to the banking and commerce committee. This is entirely in keeping with standing orders.

(Text):

The Chairman: It seems to me that the committee has been directed by the house to study the bill clause by clause, and that is the only duty of the committee. It could be put to the house, of course, to refer the bill to a special committee instead of to the committee of the whole but the committee of the whole has been directed to proceed with the study of this bill clause by clause. I would not rule that all the remarks that have been made were out of order, but I would say that to discuss only whether we should consider the bill in committee of the whole now would certainly not be relevant.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I had risen to speak to the point of order and perhaps you will allow me to say something now. The doctrine which the Minister of Finance has laid down is, I think, so unusual—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Sound.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that I am surprised that even he would have put it forward. I cannot lay my hands on the particular reference and I may be wrong but I think that on one occasion the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was no mean parliamentarian when in the ranks of the opposition, did this very thing on a bill that came before the house some years ago. I may be wrong in identifying the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Green: I think you are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says that he thinks I am. I was trying to pay him a left-handed compliment and the compliment still stands. I am glad he is in the house because he will be able to give the Minister of Finance the kind of advice that will perhaps enable the Minister of Finance to secure quicker passage of this measure than would otherwise be the case.

It is true that the house did decide on division that we would go into committee of the whole and discuss this bill, but I would submit that on the first clause it is open to any hon. member at any time to suggest that there are considerations which the house might wish to reconsider and that as a result of those new factors or further elucidations the house might wish to reverse its decision. There is certainly nothing in the rules that prevents the house reversing its decision.

We are not saying that the decision taken by the house on the procedural point is objectionable. All we are saying is this. After further consideration, does the minister not think that for the reasons that have been further given this bill should be sent to the banking and commerce committee? It would certainly be in order for me to propose that we rise and report progress to consider this particular matter and to give the government an opportunity to look into the arguments that have been made in favour of this proposal. That would certainly be perfectly in order. If that is in order, what can be regarded as out of order in the suggestion that is being made on the first clause of the bill that we reconsider the procedural decision and that we send the bill to the banking and commerce committee? I do not know of any rule that precludes this interpretation. I would be very grateful if Your Honour could indicate where in our rules it is suggested that, on the first clause of a bill, it is not open to the house to suggest that we might have a reconsideration of the procedural decision made a few moments ago and that the bill, contrary to that decision and contrary to the earlier intention of the house, be sent to the banking and commerce committee.

I know of no rule which precludes that. I would be grateful if you could indicate such a rule. The Minister of Finance has produced no authority. He has made a blind assertion, as he always does on procedural questions, as though his mere observation had all the quality of an infallible judgment. I say to Your Honour that if he could advance some reasons for the position the Minister of Finance takes, that would be a different matter. I would be very surprised if there is anything in our rules which would render out of order a proposal that has been made that this matter be referred to the banking and commerce committee so that the governor of the Bank of Canada, the president of the industrial development bank, one of those who has assisted in the formulation of this measure, be heard by the banking and commerce committee, thus affording us an opportunity of examination which is not open at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may speak to the point of order as well and recall to the mind of the Secretary of State for External Affairs what I have frequently referred to in this house since I came over to this side and he went over to that side of the house, as the well known Howard Green rule, I would say that this rule is that on clause 1 of a bill there was allowed a general consideration of all the circumstances. I do not think a month ever went by in all the years the Secretary of State for External Affairs sat on this side that he did not reiterate what I call the Howard Green rule with varying degrees of eloquence and force. I can remember very few occasions when he did not succeed in getting his way by sheer weight of words and by his persistent personality.

It seems to me that with the weight of that precedent and with the weight of the author of that precedent here in the committee this evening, the suggestion of the Minister of Finance should not be followed. As the hon. member for Essex East has said, the minister considers himself much more infallible than the Pope and, as a matter of fact, is almost invariably wrong, as Your Honour has found in your own experience because there has been no minister in the history of the Canadian parliament who has been overruled by the Chair so often as the present Minister of Finance on points of order.

Mr. Macdonnell: This is irresponsible.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a historical fact and it can easily be verified by checking the rulings, but I admit it is slightly irrelevant.

What is relevant is that my hon. friends have been asserting from this side of the house that they cannot give to this measure the kind of detailed and careful examination that it evidently requires unless we can call before a committee those people who have been carrying out these operations which have been so unsatisfactory to certain backbenchers opposite as the hon. member for Peterborough pointed out. In this way, we could find out why these operations have been unsatisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite. It was not anyone on this side of the house who complained of the abuses in the administration of the industrial development bank. It was the backbenchers over there who were complaining.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member please discuss the point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: Precisely, sir, the point of order is that it is surely competent to us on this side of the house to suggest that if we are to do our duty as members conscientiously and give to this bill the kind of attention which hon. members opposite seem to think it requires, then we have to have witnesses before us who can speak at first hand, not at second hand as the Minister of Finance does; and not only at second hand but I think it would not be an exaggeration to say with some prejudice in this particular case.

It does seem to me, sir, that to suggest we cannot propose this procedure, and to suggest that in proposing it we are opposing the bill, is seeking to deny a measure of freedom of speech at which I am sure Your Honour would not wish to connive.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I speak to the point of order? If we are going to submit the decisions of the house to review every ten minutes, then we are going to reduce the whole procedure of this house to absurdity and we will not be out of here before Christmas. How often do hon. gentlemen opposite wish to revise the decisions of the house?

The Chairman: The house has adopted the motion of the Minister of Finance that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the bill. This is the first point. Going into committee of the whole on the bill means that this committee has the power to consider the bill clause by clause and rule 59 (2) applies which says that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. This is the only mandate of the committee to consider the bill clause by clause.

Of course, the house itself can change the decision which it has made. At the time the motion was put it could have been defeated. There may be other opportunities to submit the idea of the hon. member for Essex East which others have indicated they would like to support. However, this could not be done in the committee of the whole.

There remains only one point which has been raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and that is as to the scope of the discussion on clause 1 of the bill. I know that the practice has grown over the years of allowing a certain degree of latitude in the discussion of clause 1. Of course, this has not changed the rule which calls for strict relevancy. I do not believe any chairman or Speaker has indicated that even this would allow a discussion as wide as the one which takes place on second reading. I am quite sure, in any event, that I am not taking away from any member any essential right in saying that the discussion of the decision which the house has taken on this bill is out of order in committee of the whole. I do not think I am preventing any member from using all his rights at the proper time.

I would hope that the discussion would be confined to the bill. The only thing the committee can do is report the bill or report progress thereon.

Mr. Caron: In order to make the procedure completely in order, I move:

> That the committee rise, report progress and ask the house to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee for further study.

The Chairman: It seems obvious to me that part of the motion is out of order. I think the hon. member may move that the committee rise and report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house, but the reference of the bill to the banking and commerce committee for further study is something for the house to decide.

Mr. Caron: I think, Mr. Chairman, the committee always has the right to make suggestions to the house. We do not order the house, but we report progress and ask the house to do something. We are not ordering the house but are requesting the house to take this decision. This is a point which has been taken up in the committee and the committee has a right to report exactly what has been done in the committee. I do not believe that it is out of order. I think it is within the standing order of the house.

Mr. Churchill: You are out of order.

Mr. Caron: That is what you say.

Mr. Churchill: Question.

The Chairman: I have indicated a view as to part of the amendment. The hon. member has not convinced me that I was wrong. If nobody objects, I will put the amendment "as is".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The motion is clearly out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caron: How is that?

The Chairman: This is my view. Otherwise the hon. member may delete the last part of his motion.

Mr. Caron: I am just asking; I am not ordering.

The Chairman: I am suggesting; I am not ordering either. I am suggesting that the hon. member delete some words contained in his motion so that it will be in order.

Mr. Caron: I think it is within the standing order.

The Chairman: If the hon. member insists on leaving the words in the motion, I shall have to declare his motion out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I believe that the government should have an opportunity of considering the proposal I made, namely that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —so that the governor of the Bank of Canada might be heard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): For that reason I move:

That the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suggest that the hon. member is out of order as we have just had a similar motion, and it can be moved only once.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Chevrier: No. That motion is perfectly in order.

The Chairman: Order. The other motion was ruled out of order because of something else. The motion made by the hon. member for Essex East is not debatable. I will therefore put it to the committee now.

Motion (Mr. Martin, Essex East) negatived: Yeas 21; nays 62.

The Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. McIlraith: May I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to a matter arising out of the vote. I think it is not desirable that the practice of permitting members, after those who voted for a motion have been counted, to come in and join the ones who are voting against it. I merely draw your attention to that practice and express the hope that you will indicate that it is not in order.

The Chairman: I think the rule is clear that when the question has been put no member should enter the chamber or leave his place.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am not allowed to discuss the question of referring this important bill to the banking and commerce committee. However, I wish to say that, as we all know, this bill follows not an announcement of a legislative program as far back as last November, as would be announced in the speech from the throne but it was announced and referred to by the Minister of Finance when he made his late budget speech on June 20. Earlier tonight the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the style of the Minister of Finance of twisting and turning in some of his arguments. Before we proceed too far with respect to some of the clauses of this bill, I wish to give a good illustration of the kind of twisting and turning of which the Minister of Finance is capable. I refer to page 6646 and 6647 of Hansard where, in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, we find in bold letters reference to the industrial development bank. As found at page 6646 of Hansard the minister stated as follows:

The scale of the bank's lending to small and medium sized businesses has been expanding rapidly. In its last fiscal year the bank made 740 loans amounting to $38 million, as compared with 221 totalling $17 million five years earlier.

An hon. Member: What is the matter with that?

Mr. Benidickson: What is the matter with that? I say it is twisting and turning. If one looks at the last available report provided to us by the industrial development bank one can see immediately the special pleading, the rather dishonest pleading, that is contained in those words given to us on budget night.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has said that dishonest words were used to the house in the budget speech.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member just used those words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Dishonest pleading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said dishonest words were used in the budget speech. That is clearly unparliamentary and I ask that the hon. member be required to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Benidickson: If the minister quibbles, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly prepared to take away the word "dishonest" and I will say "improper pleading". I say that it was twisting and turning, when he referred to the proposed amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act, to quote figures in the way he quoted them. I will illustrate why I am making this statement. In this special pleading on budget night the minister referred to the loan approvals of the industrial development bank for the year ended 1955, when they amounted to $17 million. But did he tell his colleagues in this house or tell the country that in the following year, namely 1956, the total loan approvals of the industrial development bank amounted to $39 million?

Mr. Habel: He would not say that.

Mr. Benidickson: He did not say that. Of course, he was not responsible for the bank or the directors of the bank in 1956. When the minister is speaking on budget night I think he should give the people of this country the full facts. As I observe the last available report, in no year during the successive four years reported here have there been loan approvals by the industrial development bank to equal those in 1956 which the minister in his statement skipped and overlooked. In the final year of 1960, when we had a considerable increase in gross national product, even if not in real terms, the loan approvals by the industrial development bank were still lower than they were in the last year of the previous administration, namely 1956. I say that was special pleading. I say that his words which I have quoted from Hansard as contained in his budget speech were not a proper presentation by any minister of finance when he indicates that he proposes to enlarge the authority of a bank and give some statistical quotations in that important speech to the nation.

In addition to that I wish to refer to the matter of the authority of the government with respect to interest rates charged by this crown corporation. I raised this matter two or three weeks ago. Again I say that the minister was twisting and turning because he interrupted my speech and attempted to take credit for going to the commercial banks of this country and getting a very slight reduction in the prime rate of borrowing within the last few weeks.

I raised the question: why does not the government, which is in control of the industrial development bank and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, reduce its interest rates in this field? The minister said, "We recently reduced our rates to borrowers from the industrial development bank". I was lucky enough to have in front of me a record that the last reduction of the interest rate of the industrial development bank in connection with lending to institutions which seek its resources was not recent; it was last September, long before the minister takes credit for going to the commercial banks, saying that he nudged them into a reduction of their rate to borrowers.

Therefore I say that before we get too far in discussion of the clauses of this bill we should ask the minister why he chose 1955 as his yardstick when he said there had been a great advance from $17 million to $38 million in 1960. Why in this much publicized speech did he not refer to the fact that in 1956 the lending by the industrial development bank actually exceeded the last year under his guidance?

The minister nominates the directors and I assume, knowing he is a man of initiative, energy and a fair amount of pugnacity, he has a great deal to do with the progress of this bank. I say it was misleading to this house to use the figures he did use in his budget speech, and I think that is no guide to us when we are asked to expand the lending powers of the bank.

In addition to that, when I spoke on second reading I thought I asked a very important question, which has not yet been referred to. I asked: where are the funds going to come from which are to enlarge the capital of this bank, not only the capital stock of the bank but the scale under which the bank will operate? I think that was a pertinent question. I asked: is this going to come out of the printing presses of this nation or is it going to come out of a responsible monetary policy of the government? That was a pertinent question and it has not yet been referred to by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it was referred to. It was precisely that question I had in mind when I said the answer was in the bill. If the hon. member will take the trouble to read the bill he will find his answer there.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, I have read the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But the hon. member chose to ask the question without bothering to find the answer in the bill. It was his question I had in mind—

Mr. Benidickson: I have read clauses 6 and 7.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —when I said the rules of the house preclude me from referring to the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has worked himself up into quite a lather tonight with the statistics which I gave in the budget speech. He must have in his hand the annual report of the Bank of Canada and I think he has been engaging in a little twisting and turning here.

The hon. member read only part of my statement from the budget speech. Even when he got around to referring to it, he read only part of the sentence. In that sentence I not only dealt with the amounts but I dealt with the number of loans, and he chose just conveniently to drop from the reading of the sentence what I said about the number of loans. This is the sentence from my budget speech, appearing in the first column on page 6647 of Hansard for June 20:

> In its last fiscal year the bank made 740 loans amounting to $38 million, as compared with 221 totalling $17 million five years earlier.

That is the complete sentence. The hon. member did not choose to make any comparison in the number of loans. Had he chosen to be fair with the committee he would have, I think, gone on to say that the number of loans in the year he has chosen to talk about, 1956, was only 349. That was the increase from 1955 to 1956, from a total of 221 to 349. I was drawing attention to the fact that the number in the last fiscal year ended September 30, 1960, was 740, so there has been a steady increase.

When the hon. member picks out the year 1956 he is not picking out a typical year or a year that illustrates the upward trend over the years. He picked a year which was a flash in the pan, because in that particular year there were abnormal loans made to commercial air services. They amounted in that year, 1956, to $11,406,000. That was the reason why in that particular year, with abnormally large loans to commercial air services, there was a swollen result. What happened the next year? Loans made to commercial air services dropped back to $3,742,000. In 1958 the amount was $158,000.

The year the hon. member put forward was not a typical year at all. I was giving information to indicate the growth in the operations of the bank for the information of the house.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Directors' fees.

Mr. Benidickson: Clause 3 has reference to directors' fees. We realize that the personnel of the board will be enlarged; we also see it is possible, under the by-laws of the bank, to set the aggregate amount of the fees paid to directors. I think when this statute is up for review the minister should indicate what these by-laws are at present.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Benidickson: What are the by-laws at present? I do not want details as to individual directors or anything of that kind, but what are the by-laws under which directors formerly, in the aggregate, could have received $10,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The by-laws set the fee of a director at $100 for attending a directors' meeting, and they set the fee at $50 for attending a meeting of the executive committee. Of course those directors who are officials of either the Bank of Canada or the government do not qualify for those fees.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask one question on this clause relating to directors' fees. Are these directors' fees to be entirely under the control of the bank or is the government going to have anything to say about them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, section 11, subsection (2) of the act provides that no by-law is effective until approved by the governor in council, and upon becoming effective it shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words it is the governor in council which decides in the final analysis what these fees are going to be, even though, as I understand it, they are not paid out of the treasury but out of the profits of the bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The board of directors of the bank passes the by-laws which provide the fees payable to the directors, but the section which I have read provides that no by-law is effective until approved by the governor in council.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the minister if the directors fees are to be paid out of the funds of the bank or out of the treasury of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are to be paid out of the funds of the industrial development bank.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why does the government feel it is necessary for the governor in council to determine what these fees shall be beyond the figure of $20,000? Perhaps I have not made my question very clear. The minister is asking parliament to say that the fees paid to directors shall not exceed $20,000 in any fiscal year. That is a reasonable provision for parliament to make. Surely if the government is going to appoint the kind of individuals as directors of this bank, within the scope of a $20,000 fee, those individuals ought to be able to make decisions instead of requiring the time of the cabinet to decide precisely what these things should be. I wonder why the minister feels it is necessary to have this kind of provision.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, section 11, subsection (2) was passed by this parliament at the session of 1944-45. It is part of that act which won such plaudits from the hon. member in his speech earlier in the day. This government has great respect for parliament and does not propose to take away from parliament or ask parliament to reduce any of its authority. It has commended itself to the wisdom of parliament from the enactment of this measure 17 years ago that the by-laws passed by the board require the approval of the governor in council, and the present government is not asking for any change in that provision.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am singularly unimpressed with that argument because the effect of it is that the bill Mr. Ilsley recommended to this parliament in 1940 was so perfect that it should not be amended at all.

There is no doubt that when this institution was set up for the first time as a new institution, as a bold experiment which hon. gentlemen opposite regarded at that time as bordering upon socialism, and which they now praise so highly and wish to extend, the governor in council quite rightly felt that parliament ought to keep an eye on how it got started, and so on. As the minister has just said, it has been going for 17 years. During those 17 years the number of details which the governor in council must consider have increased vastly. No one knows that better than I do, because I was secretary to the cabinet at one time, and I know that it is a great mistake to have unimportant details occupying the time of ministers. When things become detailed and established it is far better to put the responsibility on someone and deal with that individual if he does not discharge that responsibility properly. It seems to me that to have by-laws of this nature dealing with the sum of $20,000 distributed over a number of directors who are going to be lending $400 million, shows a singular lack of perspective in light of the problems which the cabinet today has to face. I suggest to the minister that there is no earthly reason why details of this sort should occupy the time of anyone except the directors, if competent directors are to be appointed. If competent directors are not going to be appointed then they certainly should not be entrusted with the lending of $400 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government is quite satisfied with provisions of section 11, subsection (2) and is not asking parliament to amend it in the manner indicated by the hon. member for the purpose of removing the requirement that the cabinet shall approve by-laws passed by the board of directors of the bank.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the minister how the directors fees are ascertained at the moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I just gave that information to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River within the last two or three minutes.

Mr. Chevrier: Did you give the amount of the fees?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of clause 3 is to add a mandatory director, the deputy minister of trade and commerce. It should also be noted that the deputy minister of finance is also, and has been, what I refer to as a mandatory director of the industrial development bank. Would the minister indicate to the committee his views as to responsibilities of these deputy ministers appointed under this clause regarding the reporting to ministers of the crown with respect to the meetings of the directors of a crown company of this nature?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in adopting clause 2 of the bill the committee is approving the proposal that there be additions to the executive committee. Clause 3 deals with the payment of fees for attendance at meetings of the board by persons other than those who are officials of the bank or of the government. The deputy ministers, and there are now to be two on the board, will sit with the governor and deputy governor of the bank and two directors from outside both the bank and government services, who will be drawn from business. This enlarged executive committee then will, in the opinion of the government, be a much more effective committee for the transaction of the business of the bank than has been the committee of four hitherto. It is expected that the committee will become much more active than it has been, holding more meetings, and that is part of the reason for the increase in the maximum provided in clause 3.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not with us tonight. However his deputy is to be added to the board and we cannot ask that minister what he expects in the way of responsibility on the part of his deputy relating to reports on meetings of the industrial development bank. However, what does the Minister of Finance expect from his deputy in a routine way in relation to the matter of reporting on decisions made by the board of directors?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, the deputy minister is expected to act responsibly in relation to this particular, as in relation to his other duties whether it is a matter of ordinary routine business coming before the executive committee of the industrial development bank or whether it is special business coming before that executive committee.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the deputy minister of finance, who has been for a long time what I refer to as a mandatory director of the industrial development bank, report to the Minister of Finance in a routine way by perhaps sending him copies of the minutes of the directors' meetings as they take place?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, it is not the practice of either this bank or the Bank of Canada to send out copies of these minutes.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Habel: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that this government, which was elected because it promised to cut expenses, now ask us to increase the aggregate amount of the fees paid to the directors of the industrial development bank from $10,000 to $20,000. That proves how inconsistent this government is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there will be more members in that committee. Moreover, the committee intends to meet much more frequently.

Mr. Boulanger: I hope that when the question of fees for the members of parliament are discussed, the minister will be as generous.

(Text):

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Executive committee of the board.

Mr. Caron: I should like to ask the minister why the words "the person for the time being holding the office of deputy minister of trade and commerce" appear in the clause? Why do they not simply say "the person holding the office of deputy minister of trade and commerce"?

Mr. Benidickson: Another head to fall.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because the draftsman of the legislation considered it proper to make reference to the deputy minister to make clear it is not the man who happens to be deputy minister at the time the legislation is passed but the man who from time to time or at any particular time holds the office of deputy minister; in other words, it is an appointment ex officio.

Mr. Caron: If they wanted that why did they not say "from time to time may be deputy minister of trade and commerce" instead of "for the time being"? It seems to me that since it is expressed in that way it might be possible to simply put him out if they are not satisfied with his decisions and put somebody else in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is perfectly obvious that what the draftsman, an experienced and competent man, had in mind is that ex officio the deputy minister becomes a member of the executive committee of the industrial development bank and when he ceases to be deputy minister he thereupon ipso facto ceases to be a member of the executive committee of the industrial development bank.

Mr. Caron: Would it not be easier, then, to say "ex officio" instead of "for the time being"? I am not a lawyer. It may be that lawyers find ways to put certain things. It may not be difficult for them but it may be difficult for others to understand what is meant. They are used to going to court to fight over things and they want loopholes somewhere. If the draftsman meant "ex officio" he should have put in "ex officio" or "from time to time" instead of "for the time being".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the usual expression in such cases, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Clause 4 is very important, in that most of us realize that the final decisions in this enlarged financial institution will be made not by the directors who may provide a little window dressing. They might meet no more than six or seven times a year, if that often. The final decisions will perhaps be under the jurisdiction of the executive committee.

As I indicated when I spoke on second reading, this party would like to see a separation of the industrial development bank from the Bank of Canada. That is not provided in this bill. But bearing that in mind, I should like to know just how close is the link between the executive committee of the industrial development bank and the Bank of Canada? I take it that the directors of the Bank of Canada who comprise the executive committee of the bank do not necessarily have to be permanent employees of the Bank of Canada. But unless one is a member of the executive committee of the Bank of Canada I take it that one is not eligible to be on the executive committee of the industrial development bank.

Will the minister explain to us his policy with respect to appointments of the directors of the Bank of Canada and the opportunity for directors whose names will appear on the report of the industrial development bank in some substantial number ever to have any place on the executive committee of the industrial development bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member can familiarize himself with the provisions of the statute. He knows, I am sure, from having read the Bank of Canada Act, that the executive committee of the Bank of Canada consists of the governor, the deputy governor, the deputy minister of finance and one member of the board selected by the board. The executive committee of the industrial development bank hitherto has been the same as the executive committee of the Bank of Canada. We are proposing now to enlarge it by the addition of two members, one being the deputy minister of trade and commerce, the other being an additional member from the board of the Bank of Canada. It will now become an executive committee of six.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Benidickson: Since the resignation of Mr. Bryden, who is a member of the executive committee of the Bank of Canada in his place who is not a permanent official?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Bruce Hill, M.C.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Capitalization.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, subclause 2 of this clause provides that the Bank of Canada shall subscribe a certain amount of money. I should like to ascertain from the minister whether this clause and other clauses of the bill were discussed by him with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not discuss clauses specifically with the governor of the Bank of Canada. The governor of the Bank of Canada was consulted with regard to the proposals in general and approved certain of them. Obviously, Mr. Chairman, I cannot disclose what particular views the governor expressed because they are given in confidence; but the proposals in general were discussed with the governor. He was consulted about them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says that these proposals in a general way were discussed with the governor of the Bank of Canada. The minister, however, did not answer my question. My question was whether the minister himself discussed these proposals in a general way with the governor of the Bank of Canada? When the minister is replying perhaps he would give an indication to the committee about what time of the year this discussion took place with the governor of the Bank of Canada. Did it take place directly? If it did not take place directly, what time did it take place vicariously?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the particular meeting to which I refer and at which the governor and I were both present took place I would judge about six weeks ago, or around that time. I can look up the date precisely. It is a matter of record. It was a meeting attended by a number of persons. Apart from that, I did not have occasion to discuss this measure personally with the governor but there was consultation with the governor through the usual channels.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister say whether these discussions took place between May 16 and May 30, or was it before May 16?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman, before that. But if the hon. member is very anxious to know the date of this I think I can ascertain it. I do not like to see him suffer from frustrated curiosity, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for his great concern about my interests. I should like to have the date because I think it might have a very important bearing on matters that engage the attention of this house. Could the minister say that this bill was inspired as a result of a document submitted by the governor of the Bank of Canada about the middle of February, a document which has—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I identify the document? The minister is so eager to reply. I have not even identified the document. I said a document that was sent to him some time about the middle of February and a document which was made available for public scrutiny by the governor of the Bank of Canada a few days ago. In that document of the governor of the Bank of Canada I am sure that the minister found confirmation, if not inspiration, for the bill that is before us, and since the minister has great confidence in the governor because the governor as president of the industrial development bank continues to be a member of the board of directors, I would have thought that the minister at least owes to the governor of the Bank of Canada the attributing to him of those suggestions which find their incorporation in this measure. I think a tribute from the Minister of Finance to the governor of the Bank of Canada along this line would reveal the generous quality of the minister's mind and heart, and this is an opportunity for him to rise above controversy and pay credit where credit is due.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, nothing ever gives the Minister of Finance greater pleasure than to pay credit where credit is due. I think we have just witnessed an amazing demonstration of modesty on the part of the hon. member for Essex East. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you do not lay too much store by this sudden outburst of modesty on the part of the hon. member for Essex East because I am quite sure that in a less offhand moment he will be back, probably before this bill has run its course, claiming that he himself is the source, author and inspiration for the ideas in the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has a vision into the future that I recognize sometimes serves him well and it may be that there is some modicum of truth in what he is saying but I am certainly not going to be the one who is going to attest to that. I simply want to say that the minister presents a bill under which the governor of the Bank of Canada, still the governor of the Bank of Canada under the law of this country, is to serve as president of the industrial development bank, a function which he now exercises, and I am inviting the minister to say whether or not at this particular juncture he does not feel it desirable, in the light of this document of the middle of February, to acknowledge the proper paternity of this bill.

After all, this is a measure of the greatest importance. It is a measure which, as the minister said some time ago during the course of our discussion tonight, offers potential assistance to industrial enterprises in this country. We are entitled to know, if we cannot obtain it through interrogations in a standing committee of the house, whether or not only in general discussions but in other discussions there has been the closest collaboration between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the bank in this matter. If there was not, it would be amazing to find the Minister of Finance piloting a bill tonight authorizing that the present governor of the Bank of Canada shall continue as president of the industrial development bank. If there was not that close collaboration and if the minister did not have confidence in the governor of the Bank of Canada, he would owe this house the duty of explaining why he continues to have the governor of the Bank of Canada remain as president of the industrial development bank.

The minister can only take the position that he has confidence in the governor of the bank. If he has no confidence, then he has no right to ask this house to continue as president of the industrial development bank the governor of the Bank of Canada. We conclude, therefore, that because the minister continues the governor in that capacity he has confidence in the governor and has confidence in the recommendations that the governor has made with respect to this particular bill. If this is not the situation, now is the time for the minister to tell us. He can sit there looking at me with that benevolent smile that sometimes covers his countenance, but this is legislation of the greatest importance and he owes it to the Canadian people to say whether my statement of the facts is correct.

I assume that the minister has confidence in the governor of the Bank of Canada; otherwise he would not continue him as president of the industrial development bank. I assume, moreover, that the minister has consulted the governor not only in a general way but on the essential details of this bill in connection with which the governor is to continue as the presiding officer of the board of directors. Let the minister deny now that he has no confidence in the governor of the Bank of Canada. If the minister stays in his seat and makes no reply, as he may well do and as he has done on other occasions, then we will conclude that the minister has no confidence in the governor. If that conclusion is drawn, then the minister will stand indicted for bringing forward a bill under which the president of the bank continues in that capacity.

The minister cannot have it both ways. He is caught in a dilemma tonight. He is caught in a dilemma and his ministerial colleagues are caught in that dilemma with him. They have been criticizing the governor of the Bank of Canada and are about to take steps to strip him of his office. Yet they come to this house tonight asking us to pass this bill and included in the provisions of the bill is a recommendation that there be a board of directors and that on that board of directors is to be found as the continuing president of the industrial development bank the present governor of the Bank of Canada. The minister cannot laugh that off. I am sure that the minister forgot—

The Chairman: Order. May I remind the hon. member that clause 6 deals only with the capitalization of the industrial development bank.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I say to you that this clause is a clause in which the Bank of Canada is called upon to subscribe a very considerable amount of money. That can only have been done with the authorization of the governor of the bank. We have now elicited from the Minister of Finance that there has been general consultation. The point that I am making now, having extracted that reply from the Minister of Finance, is whether or not he has confidence in the present governor for the purpose of this act. If he does not have that confidence, then I say that the minister has no right to ask the house to pass a bill providing for the inclusion of the governor of the Bank of Canada as president of the industrial development bank. I submit that is very relevant to this particular clause and the minister should not be allowed to refuse to reply under the guise that what I have said is not relevant or not in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am sure there are many times when all of us think that the hon. member for Essex East really missed his calling. No circus performer could have outdone him in this latest exhibition. He asks me to say whether this flight of his imagination represents a statement of fact. I say it is not a statement of fact. It is just about as foreign to fact as any of the statements that the hon. member makes from time to time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is not a statement of fact?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Everything you said. There is nothing in the bill that says that the governor of the Bank of Canada is to continue as president of the industrial development bank. The hon. member would have those who read the record or have the fortune or misfortune to listen to his speech believe that this bill contains such a provision. It does not, and when the parliament of Canada sees fit to act on another measure and the term of office of the governor of the Bank of Canada comes to a close his term of office as president of the industrial development bank will ipso facto at the same time come to an end. He holds the office of president of the industrial development bank simply ex officio as governor of the Bank of Canada. That is very, very plain and I am sure the hon. member well knows that simple fact.

The hon. gentleman talks about consultations. I said that I sat in on one meeting at which the governor of the bank was present when the general proposals of this measure were discussed. I do not recall the exact date but it was probably about a couple of months ago, in that range. I did not have any further discussions with the governor about it. As for his memorandum of last February, which he improperly made public recently, I say that while he made a reference to the functions of the industrial development bank, this present measure does not correspond precisely with the proposals that the governor put forward in that memorandum. What is more, he was not the only person who was putting forward suggestions for the revision of the basic terms of the Industrial Development Bank Act to make that bank more effective in serving the needs of the Canadian economy. There were many people putting forward such suggestions, including many people in the government and members in this house supporting the government. The hon. member for Essex East does not need to arrogate to himself the inspiration for suggesting that the industrial development bank might be improved, nor need he ride on the coat tails of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have had an amazing statement from the Minister of Finance. The minister is apparently piloting legislation, the terms of which he has not read or of which he has not a full appreciation. He speaks of coming events. The Minister of Finance has no authority, even though he may be a member of a government with a large majority in this house, to envision what course this parliament will take with regard to other measures or a particular measure that may be coming before it tomorrow. The fact is that we must presume that everyone in this house will give careful, conscientious and responsible consideration to any bill that will be presented by the minister tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why don't you give this bill such consideration?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has no right to arrogate to himself a knowledge of what will happen. The fact is that at the present time, under the law passed by this parliament, the governor of the Bank of Canada is still the governor of the Bank of Canada. No words of the Minister of Finance by way of prophecy, by way of expression of his venom and hatred and his hostility, can change the law of the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is quite unparliamentary for an hon. member, as the hon. member must know, to impute hatred to any member of this house. I make it quite clear that there is no hatred toward anybody in my soul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will withdraw. If that offends the minister, I will say he has not in his soul the qualities that constitute hatred. I will say this: The Minister of Finance, by his manner in approaching this problem tonight and on other occasions, has revealed a hostility toward the governor of the Bank of Canada that is not warranted by the declared facts given to this house over the course of the last few days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false accusation.

Mr. Churchill: Are you going to make the same speech tomorrow?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says something about the same speech tomorrow. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is a member of a government which, I know, does not like anyone in the opposition to stand up for the rights of individuals in this free country.

The Chairman: Order; may I suggest to the hon. member that this discussion is entirely irrelevant. I submit that we will not be able to avoid anticipating another debate if we continue in this vein. I would say there is nothing in this bill that concerns the governor of the Bank of Canada because those provisions of the Industrial Development Bank Act which concern the governor of the Bank of Canada are not being amended by this bill. I suggest to the committee generally, therefore, that we might make more progress if we discussed the bill which is properly before the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I accept your suggestion and I was provoked into this extraneous argument only by the irrelevancy of the Minister of Finance.

The argument I was making a few moments ago before we had this irrelevant intervention, was that the minister owes it to the committee to say if he has confidence in the governor of the bank. Otherwise, he could not have brought before us this bill tonight. I would remind the committee of the provisions of clause 3 of this bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are dealing with clause 6.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am now dealing with the question relating to the point of order and also to the argument that I made with regard to clause 6. Clause 3 provides:

> The directors, other than the governor and deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister of finance and the deputy minister of trade and commerce, are entitled to receive for attendance at meetings of the board and meetings of the executive committee such fees as may be fixed by the by-laws of the bank, but the aggregate amount of the fees paid to all directors exclusive of expenses shall not exceed twenty thousand dollars in any fiscal year.

In the clause we are now discussing, clause 6, provision is made that the Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the said 500,000 shares at par and shall pay the amount of such subscription at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine. The present governor of the bank is a member of that board. The present governor of the bank is covered by the provisions of clause 3 which I have already recited. The minister owes it to the committee to say whether or not he has confidence in this governor or he has no right to bring forward this bill which provides for the inclusion of the present governor. The minister cannot for one moment argue that he has the right to anticipate events which may or may not take place. The minister must assume that the law of the land shall be respected and the law of the land makes provision for the governor of the Bank of Canada as president of the industrial development bank.

A few moments ago the minister made the argument that I was engaged in an argument of fiction. I say to him that there is no fiction in clause 3. There is no fiction in clause 6. The provisions therein contained deal with the Bank of Canada and with the governor of the bank. The minister must tell the committee now whether or not he has sufficient confidence in the present governor to warrant that gentleman retaining the trust of this parliament under the provisions of this bill. This is as clear a situation as could possibly be revealed and the minister must tell the committee now whether or not he has that confidence. If he has no confidence in the governor, then he should say so. In that event, he should repeal clause 3 of the bill; that is the situation.

The Chairman: Order; the hon. member indicated that he was accepting the ruling of the Chair, but afterwards discussed its validity. I must, therefore, point out to him that in my view clause 3 does not change anything so far as the governor of the Bank of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not, Mr. Chairman. That is the whole point.

The Chairman: It was for this reason I indicated it was not relevant to discuss the functions of the governor or even the person occupying this post because this bill changes nothing in the Industrial Development Bank Act in so far as the governor of the Bank of Canada is concerned and his functions in this bank. I again beg the committee to try to be relevant in discussing this clause 6. It seems to me that in due course all these matters will be discussed in a more appropriate fashion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, you are not suggesting, I take it, that I have not the right to ask the Minister of Finance if he has confidence in an official who is going to exercise a position of trust under this act, and who happens to be the governor of the Bank of Canada?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Essex East knows that it is not in accordance with the practice to put questions to the Chair. However, if it is by way of elucidation of the ruling I have made, I would say that he would have the right to put that question but not when we are discussing the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been looking at the speech from the throne in order to see whether we have in it any indication that any legislation of this sort was to be expected at the present session of parliament and I find here a reference to a measure. Perhaps it would be better to read it and use the language which the government put in the mouth of His Excellency:

> My ministers are convinced that additional medium term credit facilities for small businesses would enable many private projects to go forward this winter all across Canada, providing substantial additional employment. Moreover, this addition to our credit legislation will constitute a continuing stimulus to the growth of Canadian private enterprise.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Benidickson: That was in the blue baby budget.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that the reference was to the bill that we considered before Christmas and before the baby budget, namely the bill to establish guaranteed bank loans to assist small business. The question I should like to ask the minister is whether at the time that legislation was brought before the house the government had in contemplation the need of this present legislation that is now being brought before the house. If the answer to my first question is in the negative,—as I assume it is, as otherwise I imagine that the government would have put that into the speech from the throne as well—when did the government reach the conclusion, and for what reason, that in addition to these guaranteed bank loans this increased capital in the industrial development bank to be supplied by the Bank of Canada was also necessary? In other words, when did the government come to the conclusion that this particular measure was necessary?

Mr. Benidickson: They were not expansionists in November.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 6 concerns the increase in capitalization of the industrial development bank and the subscriptions in terms of shares.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. McIlraith: Is the minister going to answer the question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no intention of disclosing what goes on in cabinet.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister has an obligation to the house—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: In the throne speech the house was led to believe—

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that this question is not relevant to clause 6. This is another side issue. This clause deals only with the capitalization and whether it should be increased as suggested by the proposed new section 12.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Chairman, I cannot have heard you aright. Here we are being asked to authorize an increase in the use of funds. It is true that they are not coming out of the treasury but are coming out of an institution which is owned by the people of Canada, namely the Bank of Canada. Although the shares are held by the Minister of Finance the capital is owned by the people of Canada. This parliament is being asked to increase that capital. I cannot believe that Your Honour suggests to me that I cannot ask why it is being increased and when the government reached the conclusion that an increase was necessary.

For the minister to suggest that to answer those questions would be to disclose secrets of the cabinet is simply not correct. If I talked in the way the minister did, I would say that it is nonsense and rubbish. I am not asking the minister to reveal who was for it and who was against it or what the arguments pro and con were in the cabinet, as that would be quite improper. I am asking when the government reached the conclusion that this additional capital for the industrial development bank was necessary as a supplement to the other legislation brought into this parliament last November.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What has that to do with the matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman wants to know what that has to do with the matter?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a perfectly proper matter for debate. I think we should like to know—

The Chairman: I agree with the hon. member that the question, as he has just put it, would be relevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was sure that Your Honour did so; and it is relevant. I should like to know when this idea dawned upon the government that this measure was necessary in addition to the measure that we were asked to adopt last November. Surely this measure was just as necessary last November as was the other measure.

An hon. Member: Read Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or did the government not think it was necessary? Or is this measure being introduced because the government feels that the other measure has not yielded the results that were expected? This is the point that I am trying to get at. I should like to know when the government came to the conclusion that this particular legislation was really necessary, and what new circumstances, between November and June, when this was introduced, arose which led the government to that conclusion. After all, the government is asking us for our approval. They are the suppliants. We are entitled to be told what these new circumstances are that led them to this conclusion. That is all I am asking the minister.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely we are going to have some answer about the crucial clause in this whole bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reasons for asking the house to legislate for the purpose of amending the Industrial Development Bank Act in the terms of this bill have been given to the house first in the budget speech, then in the discussion on the resolution stage on June 30 and again today. All hon. members are aware of the reasons. As a matter of fact, last Friday members in all parts of the house, including the Leader of the Opposition spoke warmly in approbation of this measure and the terms of it. The hon. member apparently does not wish this measure to be passed tonight.

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have had endless repetition and irrelevancies tonight. One would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that last Friday the house was ready to deal with this bill with expedition because everybody seemed to declare himself for it. But tonight we have been everywhere but on the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Everybody has been on the bill but the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): After due consideration of this question and of all the many questions related to it, the government reached its conclusion to submit this measure to the house in the proper time and that was announced in the budget speech on June 20.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just want to draw your attention to the fact that the minister has made one of those usual speeches of his in which he shows his great disrespect for anyone else's opinion in this parliament except his own and in which he constantly asserts that everybody knows these things and therefore it is not necessary to state what they are.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should have made one exception.

Mr. Pickersgill: The plain fact is, of course, that my friend the Leader of the Opposition was the only member of the Liberal party who spoke on this measure at the resolution stage, and he was the only member who spoke because he wanted to see the bill. We approved the principle of this bill. We approved it at the Liberal rally last January because last January the Liberal party thought this kind of measure was necessary. At that time the government did not think so. At that time the government had not had this new vision of expansion that suddenly dawned upon the Minister of Finance on June 14, that red letter day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you are for it, why do you hold it up?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, the minister will recall an occasion when a great expansionist measure—the last great expansionist measure that there was before this parliament—was into this house and when the minister was himself one of those who did his best to prevent that project which maintained full employment for another year in this country. The minister actually had to leave the house because he defied the Chair in his efforts to prevent that project.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

The Chairman: Order. May I again ask hon. members to make an effort to discuss clause 6 of the bill and not take every opportunity to discuss extraneous matters.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, sir, this could all have been avoided if the minister had politely and properly answered the questions that were put to him instead of making these abusive speeches about members of parliament. I would remind Your Honour that the debate on this bill to increase the capital of this institutions to $400 million has so far consumed about 2½ hours of the time of parliament. If the minister considers that is excessive debate, as he is now suggesting, it is certainly a long road he has walked from the day he walked the length of this chamber—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —when he was professing to uphold the rights of parliament for which he now has so little regard. The minister should tell us when and why he or the government came to the conclusion that this measure was necessary, and what the new circumstances were between November and June. That is the kind of information we are perfectly entitled to have in this committee before making available this very large sum of public money.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I regret to say the hon. member has refused to answer my question of a previous day as to whether he is still supporting Mr. Coyne in his bid for leadership of the Liberal party.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the hon. gentleman was going to ask a question, sir, but he has not. I have asked the Minister of Finance a question that has relevancy to the bill before us and I suggest the Minister of Finance should reply to the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already done so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: Apparently the Minister of Finance is not going to answer the very important question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I have referred to this matter previously. I wish to raise this question, and I do so with all modesty. I do not claim to know how the Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the shares as provided in clause 6 amending section 12(2). It reads:

> The Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the said 500,000 shares at par and shall pay the amount of such subscription at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine.

The board, of course, is the board of directors of the bank. This committee is surely interested in this clause and the subsequent clause, which I think are the two most important clauses in the bill. The explanatory note with respect to clause 6 says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to increase the authorized capital of the bank from $25 million to $50 million.

Then we have to read a bit beyond into clause 7.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Go ahead and take up the rest of the time.

Mr. Benidickson: We find in clause 7—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Stall till 10.30.

Mr. Pickersgill: Respect for parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: —that there is a reference to the liability of the bank—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is obstruction.

Mr. Benidickson: —which goes from three times to five times the aggregate amount of the paid up capital, etc. As a very modest member of this committee—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Looking at the clock.

Mr. Benidickson: —I am hoping that the minister will explain to us, no matter who is governor of this bank, whether it is the present—

An hon. Member: Time-killer Bill.

Mr. Benidickson: —governor or someone else, just how the Bank of Canada—and we are all modest and uninformed people in some of these financial matters—is going to subscribe for the additional $25 million involved. What kind of money do they use? Do they use money that they print, or where does it come from? Does it come from borrowings that are provided by the government of Canada; and if provided by the government of Canada, why does it not appear in the budget statement with respect to cash required in the current fiscal year?

Then of course we want to know where five times the amount of capital is going to come from. Is this going to come from, as I said originally, the printing presses of the country, or what is the basis of subscribing to this capital? I thought the minister was rather rude to me when he said, "Look at the bill". I am now looking at clauses 6 and 7 —

An hon. Member: One minute to go, Bill.

Mr. Benidickson: —and I am perfectly in order in asking the Minister of Finance to explain, in layman's language, I hope, how the Bank of Canada is going to subscribe $25 million. Where does the money come from? In what manner is it provided? I am of course anticipating, but in clause 7 we have this multiple of five times the amount of the paid up capital that is provided for in clause 6. Will the minister explain to all of us interested in this very important financial transaction just how this operates.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will be pleased to answer the question which the hon. member has now asked three times in the same speech. The money that is to be provided here is an additional $25 million. The legislation imposes the duty upon the Bank of Canada to provide this additional capital. The money will be provided, in obedience to the legislation enacted by this parliament, in the currency of Canada in the manner determined by the bank in accordance with section 12 of the act as amended by clause 6 of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Does that mean the printing presses?

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Ten thirty.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A fine example of deliberate obstruction by those opposite who want to hold up the passage of this bill. Deliberate obstruction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I take it that tomorrow we will deal with the Bank of Canada Act, as announced earlier. If we complete consideration of that act what business will the house take thereafter?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will start with such third readings as appear on the order paper, followed by the Bank of Canada Act which is Bill No. C-114; then a continuation of the study of the Industrial Development Bank Act amendment, Bill No. C-117; then the C.N.R. financing resolution which is on the order paper today; the Civil Service Act, which is Bill No. C-71, and Bill No. C-72 dealing with the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the house leader indicate whether or not the government is yet in a position to inform the public of its tax intentions related to the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Churchill: I am outlining the order of business only for tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

90205-6—472

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 4, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the house leader would like to propose a temporary adjournment or suspension in view of the difficulty with the lighting.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if it is only for a short interval. Have you any suggestion as to when the lights may be on?

Mr. Speaker: My information is that the interruption will be reasonably short. Perhaps the lights will be on before we could remove the canvas from the windows.

Mr. Churchill: I therefore move the temporary adjournment of the house, Mr. Speaker, to resume at the call of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: It is suggested by the house leader that the house suspend its sitting to reconvene at the call of the Chair. I shall have to call the yeas and nays. Those in favour of suspension please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. This sitting stands suspended to reconvene at the call of the Chair, to be signified by the ringing of the bell.

At 11.20 a.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 11.50 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, last evening in a speech in Toronto the Prime Minister referred to the seriousness of the international situation. I believe he said it was more serious now than it has been since 1945. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment on this prediction.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I referred among other things to a statement made by Lord Home only a few days ago to that effect, namely that these next six months are going to be one of the most difficult and dangerous periods through which we have passed since the last war. I referred to the refusal on the part of the U.S.S.R. to enter into an agreement outlawing the testing of nuclear weapons, to the apparent endeavour of Mr. Khrushchev to emasculate if not destroy the United Nations, and to the threatening if not bellicose statements he has made in recent months.

Coupled with his statement that in the absence of agreement with the west the U.S.S.R. would sign a separate treaty with East Germany and turn over to East Germany control of the access routes to West Berlin, these circumstances taken together reveal the gravity of the situation. Since 1945, there has not been, in the opinion of the leaders of the various free world nations, a situation more serious to contemplate. There is always, of course, the fact that the U.S.S.R. must be deterred from taking precipitate action by the overwhelming fear of nuclear war.

I said further that I felt that the unity of the western alliance, as the Leader of the Opposition has said on more than one occasion, must be strengthened and that, in so far as the nations joined together for freedom are concerned, I hoped they would arrive at a basis of agreement among themselves so that a united stand would be taken and negotiations could continue and be pressed forward, but that negotiation could not be acceptable to the western world if it were to include the acceptance of Soviet abrogation of or unilateral interference with allied rights in West Berlin or the sacrifice of the freedom of the people of that city.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in expressing appreciation for the Prime Minister's sober but realistic statement, and especially his views that this is the time for the west to stand firm without, of course, provocation, may I ask the Prime Minister whether Canada is being kept informed of these developments from day to day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman, with his great experience in external affairs, knows, there is continuing consultation. I am hopeful that as a result of consultation not only the nations particularly affected by the treaty agreements in West Berlin but all the NATO nations will be able to arrive at an agreed position which will not deny negotiation, which will not be rigid and unbending, but which at the same time will not sacrifice the freedom of the people of West Berlin who rely upon NATO to ensure and maintain those things without which freedom everywhere in the world would be challenged.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. In view of what the Prime Minister has just said may I ask whether he sees any prospect for a meeting of the heads of government of those countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No direct consideration has yet been given to that matter.

CANADIAN ARCTIC—INSTALLATION BY U.S. OF ATOMIC POWERED WEATHER STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is based on an article in the Washington Post of June 30 which suggests that a recently developed atomic powered weather station is to be shortly installed in the Arctic. Has the Canadian government authorized the installation by the United States of an atomic powered weather station in the Canadian Arctic?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a telegram from the citizens' committee of Springhill, Nova Scotia, pointing out that 40 per cent of the work force of that community is unemployed and requesting that provisions similar to the program for Cape Breton island be applied to that community for immediate works projects. If so, has the Prime Minister made any decision on this request, and could he advise the house accordingly?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had a telegram on my desk this morning from the source mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. Naturally there has not yet been time to give consideration to the request or its purport.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY LIGHTING SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister take under consideration the study of a plan for an emergency lighting system for the House of Commons, so the house can carry on without undue interruption when there is a power failure?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I have already done so, Mr. Speaker.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF FLORENCE COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is in a position now to answer the question I asked yesterday, which the Prime Minister took as notice.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had expected to be able to answer that question this morning. I will do so tomorrow morning, if that is satisfactory to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REPORTED INCREASED PRICES IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Would the minister care to comment on a Toronto report that automobile prices are inching higher in that community despite the rebate dealers are receiving in respect to the abolition of the 7½ per cent excise tax? This appeared in a story on page 20 of this morning's Globe and Mail.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the article, Mr. Speaker. I have no information which would confirm the purport of the article as related to the house by the hon. gentleman. I made it very clear in the budget speech that we expected the benefits of the excise tax removal would be passed on by manufacturers and dealers to the consumer. In the representations which they made to us previously the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce always gave the government the assurance that the benefit of any tax reduction or removal would be passed on to the consumer.

We have taken steps also to assist the dealers in this regard so they would not have cars on their floors on which the tax has been paid without having any opportunity of recovering the tax. That problem does not exist, and I can see no justification whatsoever for any failure to pass on to the consumer the full benefit of the removal of the excise tax.

AUTOMOBILES—REFORTED REPAIRING OF MOTORS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked me a question and I said I did not then have the complete answer. The question had to do with an allegation that there was a growing practice of automobile factories in Canada sending motors to the United States to be repaired.

The Canadian automobile chamber of commerce has informed the government that the six companies manufacturing automobiles in Canada do not send motors to the United States for repairs. This work is done in Canada. I mentioned Volkswagen yesterday, and I may have been in error in what I said then. Volkswagen have installed facilities in Canada for reconditioning motors for their cars.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—APPEARANCE OF GOVERNOR BEFORE BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a question of the hon. member for York North, the chairman of the banking and commerce committee. Can the hon. member say, now that the printed transcript of the evidence given at the meeting of June 22 is available, when the steering committee of that committee will meet to decide whether or not to recommend that the governor of the Bank of Canada be called before the committee?

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North): The committee will be called when this house has referred this matter to the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Does the hon. gentleman not recall having made a commitment to call the steering committee to consider that question? May I have an answer to that question in view of the discussion which will take place later today?

Mr. Cathers: That is quite correct. We decided to have a meeting of the steering committee on that matter, and we will give that consideration.

AIRPORTS

MONTREAL—PROVISION OF LUGGAGE CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister intend to make rolling baskets available to travellers at the Montreal international air terminal?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to tell my hon. friend that rolling baskets such as are used in super-markets have been ordered and will be made available to travellers within a few days.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PREMIER BENNETT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister inform the house whether he has arranged a meeting with Premier Bennett during his stay in Ottawa while attending the national Social Credit convention?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker; no such meeting has been arranged. I gather that the premier is in Ottawa for other purposes than discussions with the federal government on matters of mutual interest, and I thought it best not to interrupt his program while he is here in the city on other business.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—VISIT BY INSPECTOR TO JEAN TALON HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. On two occasions the minister has said that the inspectors who visited the Jean Talon hospital were concerned with routine proceedings. I should like to know if those routine proceedings are now completed.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I said on two or three occasions in the house that it has not been public policy to make public any of the secret matters concerning an income taxpayer's file. I have said that an income tax inspector visited this hospital, but I do not feel I can go any further than that.

Mr. Deschatelets: A supplementary question. Would the minister say whether the report of those routine proceedings was referred to the Department of Justice?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I will not go any further than I have gone, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Renfrew North.

BRIDGES

ROLPHTON-DES JOACHIMS—INQUIRY AS TO LIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he has decided to have Conservative lights on the interprovincial bridge between Rolphton and Des Joachims?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): No, but does the hon. member think it would be a good idea?

Mr. Forgie: Yes, I do, provided they would continue to be lighted.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-118, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-116, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

The house resumed, from Monday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the second reading of Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a week ago when speaking at the hour of adjournment I had made reference to a document almost six pages long, a letter dated June 26, 1961, appearing over the signature of the governor of the Bank of Canada. At that time I called it a contemptible document deserving only the greatest scorn and condemnation. Those were words of the moment, giving my reaction in the first instance to the spirit and intent of this remarkable letter.

A week's reflection, Mr. Speaker, makes me wonder at the moderation of my language at that time. If he be the true author of this letter, then Governor Coyne has literally taken leave of his senses. He has lost all sense of proportion as between himself as governor of the Bank of Canada, the government and parliament. I will return to this letter later.

Previously I had said that the governor was responsible for the turn of events. He is the one who on June 13 issued a statement to the press when the board of directors was actually considering the matter of his resignation or continuation in office as governor of the bank. This statement which he published had been well prepared in advance, ready for distribution. At that moment Governor Coyne repudiated the responsibility and duty of his office. He was challenging the government; he was entering into the political arena.

This statement was followed by other letters, each progressively worse, not to mention the press conference in the middle of the night. If all this was not cause enough to have the governor sacked, then the letter of June 26 really stripped James Coyne of any vestige of any claim whatsoever to remain at his post. I need not emphasize his breaches of a clear duty when he published confidential memoranda and letters addressed to him or by him as governor of the Bank of Canada.

What has been the public reaction to Mr. Coyne's course of conduct? It has emphasized that the responsibility and supremacy of the elected government in a democracy require that its public servants be seen but not heard on matters of policy except on specific request of the government. The higher the position of the public servant, the more important it is that he should not cross this boundary and transgress on the prerogatives of the elected government which employs him. Perhaps the governor has felt that his position, if one measures it by salary and pension benefits, puts him far above the government. After all, there is a vast difference between his salary and pension and that of a minister of the crown, and indeed even more if compared with the salary and pension of a member of this house. If Governor Coyne has any such ideas, then indeed he is living in a world of his own far removed from reality.

Now, we know that Governor Coyne did transgress. In months past he has made a number of speeches and pronouncements on Canadian economic difficulties and on economic policy which overstepped the bounds of his office. We have had no evidence at any time, either from himself or from others, that he was ever requested to make such speeches on behalf of the government. In fact ever since May 30, when his resignation was asked for, Mr. Coyne has gone even further in refusing to resign unless forced to do so by an act of parliament.

At this point one may pause and ask why has the governor set himself up against the government? Why has he entered the political arena? Why in fact has he arrogated to himself the functions and duties of a leader of the opposition? His criticisms have been in the same vein and tenor. As a matter of fact there are one or two significant points or questions which arise, and I think we should explore them a little.

First of all, who advised the governor to step over the line and defy the government, yea, even more, parliament, to fire him by an act of parliament? That was a political step which could be motivated, I suggest, sir, only by political considerations. Second, on June 26 there appeared that notorious letter, written in a language and style far removed from that usual with the governor, even those letters of June 9, June 13 and June 16; much more violent, with a good deal of personal invective.

Concurrently, let us recall the debates of June 26 and particularly the speeches by certain members of the official opposition. First of all, the Leader of the Opposition made the request for the appearance of Governor Coyne before the banking and commerce committee. I will not mention the rest of his speech; it was a lot of back room stuff, much of which we have heard in the past in one form or another.

Then we heard from the hon. member for Essex East in his own inimitable style of thunderous indignation, which at times sounds as hollow as are some of his arguments, in which he preached the same message. He was not quite as courteous as the Leader of the Opposition; and we all know, of course, that the hon. member for Essex East feels that he can get as rough as he likes in his posturing and in the booming, sonorous phrases and so on that accompany his speeches on such occasions.

But, Mr. Speaker, we then come to the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to which I have made reference in another debate. I leave aside any aspect of personal motives because, after all, the rules of conduct in this house preclude me from attributing any malice to the hon. member, and I would not do so; but for pure, unadulterated invective against the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate put on quite a performance. In doing so he may have unwittingly drawn back the curtain at least part way on who has been guiding and advising Mr. Coyne.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not known for plagiarizing the ideas or statements of others. His mind is quite agile enough both in quality and in quantity to provide him with sufficient ideas for those few times, so he says, when he is on his feet in this house. Let us compare the letter of June 26 and the hon. member's speech of the same day, a speech delivered a strikingly short time after the letter was made public. Let us see what a remarkable parallel of ideas there is between the speech and the letter. Oh, we heard a great deal of talk that there was not going to be any budget, that there was going to be a snap election. We heard about that from the hon. member; we also read about it in the letter.

We heard from the hon. member about the use of a printing press to finance the government's program. We also read about that in the letter. We also heard something, and in this instance I thought the hon. member was treading on dangerous ground, about the quality of the appointments of directors of the Bank of Canada. We also heard read comments about what had happened to the present directors. Unless the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate drew his inspiration from the letter—and I might inquire when he got his first copy of it—then he certainly was most familiar with the thinking of the governor.

I am prepared to go as far as to say that certain members of the official opposition have been consulting with and advising Mr. Coyne in this deplorable affair. We know from his own admissions that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate discussed this matter with the governor in the interval between June 13 and June 26, but I should like to know about the period between May 30 and June 13. Was there consultation? If I have been unfair, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have not been actively advising or consulting with the governor, then certainly it is someone in the hierarchy of the Liberal party, and the pipe line to hon. members opposite is short and direct.

This whole affair, Mr. Speaker, has been a politically inspired move; but would it not be ironic because we know there are many in the Liberal camp who blamed Mr. Coyne for wrongfully advising Mr. Harris in 1957, and who say that as a result of that advice the Liberal party was voted out of office. They had a great love for office, and I am just wondering how far they have been prepared to go to even the score. They could not do anything about it up to now. Oh, some hon. members opposite have done some sniping at the governor, but what a wonderful opportunity was presented after May 30, after a plan that Machiavelli might have admired.

Mr. Hellyer: Do you mean the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pearson: Are you having fun?

Mr. Lambert: What about the question of advising Mr. Coyne to take this action? It was obvious to all that Mr. Coyne would have to go, but could they not use the position taken by the governor to berate the Minister of Finance. We know just how much certain members of the opposition love the Minister of Finance, but in order to achieve this end Mr. Coyne would have to go through a political guillotine. But why worry? They had already had too much to do with him. He had harmed the Liberals in 1957, and while retribution might be a little delayed, how certain it was this time. Perhaps Mr. Coyne will wonder whether his head is in a sack because he has been made a dupe for political purposes.

A good deal has been said about the pension matter, which was first raised publicly by Mr. Coyne and was seized upon by the press because of its very nature. The emphasis on this matter is that of Mr. Coyne and his alone. He is the one who upgraded it. The Minister of Finance, who as spokesman for the government has been a welcome contrast to the governor in his restraint in dealing with this matter, has made his personal position clear. Notwithstanding this, the opposition have attacked the Minister of Finance because of Mr. Bryden's resignation. This hue and cry was taken up by Mr. Coyne on June 26, and there again I wonder about the parallel in thinking.

However, Mr. Bryden has made his position quite clear. In a statement on June 28, which has been made public, he has quite clearly set forth just where he stood. He has refuted that canard that he resigned for reasons of disagreement with the Minister of Finance.

I should like to refer to this document and put some of it on the record. Mr. Bryden says that he was first appointed a director of the Bank of Canada on March 1, 1958 for a three-year term. However, in October, 1960 he advised the executive committee that because he was taking an appointment with the Canadian life insurance officers association in May, 1961, he would have to give up his executive directorship in the bank. He indicated to the Minister of Finance at that time that in the light of this fact it might be desirable to replace him as a director of the Bank of Canada. On the other hand, he was prepared to stay as a director of the Bank of Canada if this might prove possible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he now quoting from the letter of resignation or from the published statement?

Mr. Lambert: I have referred to the public statement. As of March 1, 1961 Mr. Bryden was reappointed to the board and on March 20 he was re-elected executive director. However, on March 29, 1961, after consultation with his doctor, Mr. Bryden felt it was necessary to retire from the board. The reasons given were included in his letter of resignation which went forward on April 4. The substance of this letter was reported to the house by the Minister of Finance on May 30 in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition. Then Mr. Bryden says:

> There was some suggestion at that time that these were not the real reasons. I confirmed your statement then and do so again now.

Further down on the same page he says:

> Reference has been made by Mr. Coyne in a recent letter to you—

That is June 26.

> —that I told you about a possible change in these provisions six months before the directors acted in February 1960. The letter I addressed to you on April 7, 1961 gives in chronological sequence the meetings and discussions relating to both salaries and pensions which led up to the approval by the board of amendments to the pension fund by law. I continue to regard this letter as a confidential communication. At Mr. Coyne's request I subsequently sent a copy of this letter to him in his capacity as governor of the bank, since I was still technically a director of the bank at the date the letter was written.

Here again we have a breach of confidence, Mr. Speaker. Then Mr. Bryden says:

> I had two conversations with you with respect to pensions. The first was in August 1959, when in a very casual conversation I said that a subcommittee of the board was giving consideration to the bank's pension fund and to salaries. No reference was made to the special provisions dealing with the pensions of the governor and deputy governor and in fact no details at all were mentioned because, at that time, the board's subcommittee had barely started to work.
> The second conversation with you was on March 21, 1961, when I mentioned in another connection, the action taken by the board on February 15, 1960, with regard to the special pension provisions for the governor and deputy governor. You were surprised to learn of this and I was also surprised that you did not know of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that will put in a clear light the information that was made available to the Minister of Finance with regard to this minor affair of the pension of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The amendment before the house is that this matter be referred to the banking and commerce committee. What is the purpose of this amendment? It is not to afford the governor an opportunity to put forward his point of view; that is not the true purpose of it. Certain groups in the opposition will be there to make statements. We know how they behave in certain committees; I might even use the term "bully boys" of the house committees. We know how they lean on chairmen, and how the rules are not written for them except when they are advantageous to them. This is the true purpose of this amendment, so these members can get their views on the record, not the views of the governor.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I would revert to an argument I used the other night. Since when has a public servant a right to demand of parliament that he be heard before a committee before parliament can arrive at a decision as to his tenure of office?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since the foundation of British justice.

Mr. Lambert: If this procedure applies to the governor of the Bank of Canada in his exalted position, in the eyes of some people, then why not to the lowliest civil servant?

Mr. Pearson: They have the opportunity to be heard now.

Mr. Lambert: They have not the right to demand a hearing before a parliamentary committee. There is nobody here who is denying the governor of the Bank of Canada a public hearing. He has all these advocates opposite, and he certainly has availed himself of the facilities of the Bank of Canada in order to put forward his story.

Mr. Pearson: Read the bill of rights.

Mr. Lambert: I know it is not possible, Mr. Speaker, to quote editorials in connection with matters of this kind. However, as an indication of the public attitude I would refer hon. members to an editorial that appeared in the Edmonton Journal of June 17. Having referred to the conduct of the governor of the Bank of Canada, the editorial indicates that the governor has a clear duty to resign when requested to do so by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government. The editorial concludes with these words:

> No tears need be shed over his dismissal.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Once again we find ourselves discussing the affairs of Mr. Coyne. It is rather interesting to note that there has been such a delay in bringing this bill forward. The Minister of Finance when introducing this measure stated, as reported at page 7040 of Hansard:

> As I said, this measure presents the issue in a clear and direct form. Other questions can be resolved in due course and at the proper time. All other questions depend on the outcome of this issue before parliament. The issue presented by this measure is essential; the decision on it must precede anything else.

We were led to believe that this bill would be brought before the house in due course, that is in a day or so. However, the debate on this measure has not been continued since June 26. We wonder why. Could it be that the government was reluctant to bring this measure forward before the first anniversary of the bill of rights which they so proudly brought into effect last July 1? One might very well wonder.

There was a time in this country when the government of Canada governed. We may be at odds with our friends to the left as to how they governed, but certainly there was an interest in governing. There was some quiet measure of efficiency as a government tried to run this country. The problem today is that this government does not wish to govern. It would far rather carry on the country's affairs in a semihysterical state of electioneering. I recall hearing a commentator on the C.B.C. say that the Prime Minister enjoys electioneering. They enjoyed it in 1957, and there was another election in 1958. There would have been another one in 1959 and 1960 if they had not thought the electors of this nation would feel they were being rather ridiculous.

It is rather fantastic that with a huge majority, this government cannot sit down and start governing this country in something resembling a normal fashion. We stagger drunkenly from crisis to crisis.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should remind the hon. member that the matter under debate is the second reading of Bill No. C-114, an act respecting the Bank of Canada, and the amendment thereto to refer the subject matter to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I appreciate you bringing this to my attention, and I shall continue immediately in that vein.

We in this group want to see Mr. Coyne given a fair opportunity to come before the elected representatives of the people. I think this government, perhaps more than previous governments, has brought before this house the importance of committees. Committees are the only place where one can really find out what has been happening. After being told how important committees are we are denied, for the second time in two days, the right to bring before a committee something of the utmost importance to the people of this nation.

I should think the people on the right of Mr. Speaker would be even more concerned, because it is a well known fact that those supporting the government are somewhat circumscribed in their opportunities to participate in debate or ask questions to secure information in this house. I have discovered, in the few months I have been here, that it is only in committee that you can make a real, definitive exploration of those things which need to be explored before any bill can rightly be put through this parliament. We talk about Mr. Coyne and the method by which he has made his views known. This is simply because he has no other sounding board. Give him a sounding board; then he will not need to send out his missives from the Bank of Canada.

I find it rather humorous that members on the other side of the house have been complaining about the cost of Mr. Coyne's letters going forth from the Bank of Canada offices. May I use the computation of a colleague of the Minister of Finance that it costs $20,000 a day to run this house. Because of the bungling and ineptness of this government we have already gone through two days on this question and may go on to three, so I would say there was $40,000 to $60,000 of this country's money wasted. The Minister of Finance is far ahead of the governor of the Bank of Canada in the cost to this nation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I did not say the Minister of Finance made any such statement. I said the Minister of Public Works made a statement in regard to the cost of running this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member said the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pitman: Even Mr. Coyne's critics have been appalled by the minister's action. We do not need to read what they said on the day the Minister of Finance made his statement. One of the critics has even suggested that this bill would not stand up in a court of law, that it is indeed void of legality to say nothing of not containing any element of mercy. What good behaviour has been transgressed by the governor of the Bank of Canada? No judge sitting on the bench across this nation has any reason to feel that his position is secure if a bill can be brought before this parliament removing a man who has been put in on the basis of good behaviour, with no explanation being given to members of the house and no opportunity for that man to be heard. There is an outraged sense of justice on the part of the people of this nation at what happened in this house over the last week.

I should like to bring before this house one or two reports from the press. The Ottawa Journal, in an editorial which largely supported this government, had this to say:

> And yet might it not be the wise thing—the best course politically—for the government to give Mr. Coyne his "day in court", to bring him before a committee and have him state his case and then be cross-examined by competent cross-examiners not only on his course over the past two years but about the several statements he has been making over the past few weeks.

And further:

> The government we say again has not handled this case impressively—

That is an understatement.

> —it waited too long to act and then acted to fumble—certainly to fumble and show little sensitivity when it dragged in the irrelevance of Mr. Coyne's pension as one reason, even if only (as Mr. Fleming says) the fifth one for Mr. Coyne's dismissal.

May I read an excerpt from the editorial page of the Peterborough Examiner.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, but I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford.

> In his latest open letter to the Minister of Finance, Donald Fleming, the governor of the Bank of Canada makes a number of inferences which cannot pass unnoticed and which must be investigated before the dispute between these two men is disposed of summarily. We refer to Mr. Coyne's inferences that Mr. Fleming and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now transgressing the rules. It seems to me that the editorial is commenting on the Minister of Finance and his conduct in parliament and not on the public issue.

Mr. Pitman: I should be very glad to state definitely that here is another indication that the people across this nation are concerned about the action of this parliament and the way in which Mr. Coyne is being treated.

We have heard a great deal of the fact that Mr. Coyne's speeches have been a cause of great embarrassment to this government, and that the Minister of Finance has told Mr. Coyne to stop making speeches. Yet when one reads the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the speeches of the Minister of Finance, one finds a considerable area of agreement. For example, a speech which the minister himself gave to the Economic club in Chicago could have been written by Mr. Coyne. The minister took it upon himself to lecture his American cohorts about the fact that Canada had a large deficit with the United States which translated into American terms would be $10 billion to $20 billion. On that occasion the Minister of Finance said:

I suspect that if you had a deficit of this magnitude, instead of the present 3 billion figure, it would be treated as a matter of really serious concern, even if the deficit were matched, as is the case in Canada, by a corresponding inflow of external capital.

A month later Mr. Coyne was addressing the Economic club of New York, and he stated as follows:

Without your surplus with Canada . . . your deficit on current account during this period would have been 13 billion instead of one billion dollars.

Mr. Fleming in the same speech stated:

Too much foreign investment in Canada in certain forms or too much borrowing abroad by various Canadian entities can have unfavourable consequences to the economy. That is one reason why many Canadians have been giving searching thought to the whole subject of external investment in Canada.

A full year ago Mr. Coyne stated:

In other words we are incurring foreign debt to pay for both a level of capital spending and a standard of comfort which were higher than would be justified by our own earning capacity.

The Minister of Finance speaks of the opposition talking out of both sides of our mouths. He told the Economic club of Chicago in the same speech:

But I emphasize as strongly as I can that this increase in the withholding tax on certain types of investment—

This was after the baby budget.

—hitherto exempt is not an indication of any desire on Canada's part to interfere with the creative investment of American or other outside capital in Canadian industry and commerce. Nor do I believe it will have this effect.

That is certainly not the indication we received last December when the baby budget was brought down and this withholding tax was given some consideration by this government. Of course the key word here is "creative" in the phrase "creative investment". However, I suspect this government would not be able to recognize creative investment if it saw it.

To go on, may I say this. Just four months ago the Minister of Finance was saying in the same speech:

I should mention, however, that there are a few facts associated with external investment which do give us concern. The first arises from the implications of external ownership in some of our industries.

Five months previously Mr. Coyne was saying this. He spelled it out:

By the end of 1957, foreign companies and other foreign investors had a controlling interest in 56 per cent of all manufacturing industry in Canada—

And he went on to show the extent to which United States concerns control our economy. This is a sidelight, and a very interesting one. One of the first speeches Mr. Coyne made quoted the Minister of Finance in a very interesting way. I will bet no attempt was made to close off this speech. Here I am quoting Mr. Coyne who is quoting the Minister of Finance:

I should like to remind you of some recent remarks by the Hon. Donald Fleming, Minister of Finance. In a speech at Shawinigan, Quebec, on November 4, 1959—

I remind the house that this was some time after the governor had angrily rejected any attempts on the part of the government to ease up the money policy of the Bank of Canada.

—the minister said, "No government, excepting one possessing complete totalitarian powers can compel free men to lend it money."

In comment one might suggest that some sense of direction, some sense of urgency, some extent of confidence might have encouraged people to lend this government money. The quotation continues:

"The interest rates which governments in a free society must pay depend upon the interplay of forces of supply and demand".

These are the words he is quoting of the Minister of Finance, and the demand of the government is for some $700 million at the moment. Then he tells us that interest rates are coming down.

He—

That is the Minister of Finance.

—pointed out that—

And here is a very interesting comment which Mr. Coyne was relating.

—"There is no short cut for any government to lower interest rates on its borrowings".

That is a rather interesting comment after the remarks that have been made in this house over the last few weeks.

He also noted that "Prevailing high interest rates have not interfered with the process of economic growth either in Canada or elsewhere."

This was Mr. Coyne quoting the Minister of Finance in 1959. I can say that speech was no doubt applauded by the Minister of Finance. When did the change come? When did the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada begin to embarrass this government? The change came when the governor of the Bank of Canada said that full employment was possible if the government was ready to take the initiative, was ready to use fiscal policy, if it was ready to accept its responsibilities as the government of this nation. That is when this government became very, very embarrassed. This government has made a fetish of giving every reason on earth why it has not solved the problem of unemployment, and finally it came up with the slogan of socialism versus free enterprise. It blames its complete ineptitude on the problems in the United States, on the problem in Europe and on larger families. Then Mr. Coyne came along and said it could be done, and when he said that Mr. Coyne had to shut up or go.

An hon. Member: Do you agree with his suggestions?

Mr. Pitman: No, I do not agree with his suggestions, but in the words of Voltaire I agree with his right to make them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pitman: This government put through a bill of rights. In my travels around various parts of Canada I have seen this bill of rights hanging on the walls of schools and in auditoriums, indicating this government's concern for the rights of the individual. If this amendment is not passed I hope all those Canadian people who have sent for the bill of rights on parchment and on sheepskin will turn that bill of rights against the wall until this administration is put out of office.

We want to see Mr. Coyne. We have a number of questions we would like to ask him. The only way those questions can be answered is by having Mr. Coyne appear before the banking and commerce committee. This government was very concerned about closure, but this is worse than closure. Closure relates to the right to debate a matter in this house. This government is determined not to allow even information to be obtained so a debate can be carried on in this house. I should like to have some questions answered, and they are not going to be answered in this house unless we have Mr. Coyne before a committee. What has been the relationship of the bank—

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pitman: I certainly will.

Mr. Grafftey: Getting down to specifics, could he inform the house what questions he would ask Mr. Coyne—

Mr. Pitman: I would be very glad to inform the house of the specifics.

Mr. Grafftey: Specifically, what questions could you ask that have not already been asked and answered?

Mr. Pitman: I will be very glad to inform the house of the specific questions. Did the governor of the Bank of Canada turn down a formal proposal, or was this just some crackpot scheme, in 1957-58 when he was asked to ease the money supply? That is what I would ask.

Mr. Grafftey: You can ask that in the house.

Mr. Pitman: I would like to know what has been the co-operation of the governor of the Bank of Canada with the government in the last four years. The whole record of this government over the last four years is one of growing ineptitude. Let us find out why. We certainly have not yet found out in this house. We are dependent entirely upon the statements of the Minister of Finance. What has been the relationship of the bank and this Minister of Finance? We have not found out yet. We have only found out what the Minister of Finance says has been the relationship. What have been the conversations between the minister and the governor of the Bank of Canada?

I would like to bring some of the bankers of this country before the banking and commerce committee. Let us ask them what they think of the policies of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Let us bring some of the directors of the Bank of Canada before the committee. On one side we have it said that the government put pressure on those directors to have the governor resign. On the other side it is said that these governors all want to get rid of Mr. Coyne. That has not been resolved in this house. Are those enough questions for the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi?

An hon. Member: It is too much for him.

Mr. Pitman: I would like to bring the assistant to the deputy minister of finance before this committee and ask him, did he not feel it was proper to report such an important change in the pension of the governor to the Minister of Finance or his deputy.

An hon. Member: The minister said he made that report.

Mr. Pitman: Well, let us not get into the problem of what the minister has said in this house. It is rather interesting; there is almost a dramatic quality about this whole affair. The governor of the Bank of Canada was at Stratford the night the Minister of Finance was carrying on his perorations in this house. He might well have remembered those lines from Hamlet about the "insolence of office", because here we have Hamlet himself delaying and delaying for four years. Now in conclusion I might say he has picked up the poison-tipped sword, but this sword has two edges. He can use the power of parliament, without giving it information, to destroy the governor of the Bank of Canada; but this sword can also destroy this government.

It can destroy this government, because there is one thing about the people of Canada on which I think we must all agree; that they have a sense of fair play. It has perhaps come from the feudal system—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pitman: —the teachings of chivalry; it has perhaps come from the playing fields of England; but it has become ingrained in the Canadian character. It is this sense of fair play that has apparently been violently outraged by this government.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote against this amendment, and I would like to take the time of the house just for a moment or two to explain why. To me the matter is simple. I have listened to the discussion, including the somewhat impassioned rhetoric of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I believe that I am just as concerned about British justice as any of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am familiar with the old quotation from Voltaire and indeed have often used it myself. But to me, Mr. Speaker, this matter is being blown up out of all recognition. Judging from what I have heard about the committee, nothing would be foreign to the committee; it would survey the whole area of political and economic life. However, that is by the way.

Why do I say it is simple? I hear all these well remembered phrases about fair play, a day in court, and so on and so on. I say, what is the argument? Usually when we talk about a man having his day in court and getting fair play it is because there is some question affecting him; we are afraid something is going to be done which will be an injustice to him. What is going to be done here? The governor of the Bank of Canada is going to be relieved of his post.

I have not heard anyone in this house say that this should not be done. However, I shall content myself with quoting what the Leader of the Opposition said the other day on that point. I will read from page 7050 of Hansard. The Leader of the Opposition said this:

> I said, of course, that if there is a dispute between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government, the governor should resign. I said that in the House of Commons at a time when the minister was defending the governor against that kind of action. Then the next question was:

This, by the way, was in the television broadcast:

> "Do you think he should resign now?"
> My answer was this:
> "I say his usefulness is over as governor."

Then the Leader of the Opposition continued:

> Of course that is true, Mr. Speaker. His usefulness has been destroyed by the government.

Mr. Pearson: Read on.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will, if the Leader of the Opposition wishes. He then said:

> Then I went on:
> "But Mr. Coyne apparently is determined to defend himself against certain charges which he believes reflect on his integrity."

Does the Leader of the Opposition wish me to read further?

Mr. Pearson: And he was therefore entitled to appear before a committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Leader of the Opposition continued in the television broadcast:

> "And that is why surely Mr. Coyne should have his day in court—"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not want the Leader of the Opposition to feel that I was not going to deal with that question. I was, and I am. The quotation continues:

> "—should have his day in court, and by in court I don't mean issuing statements which he feels are necessary because he isn't permitted to appear before a committee—and he states in one of his statements that he hasn't been allowed to appear before the banking and commerce committee to discuss the Bank of Canada report for four years."

There might be two reasons why he should appear before a committee. One would be, if it was sought to contend that the governor of the bank should not be relieved of his duties. I have disposed of that to my satisfaction. Second, that the governor should be allowed to defend aspersions on his character. That is covered by the words of the Leader of the Opposition which I have just read. On that my answer is this. I consider that the Minister of Finance, in most difficult circumstances, conducted himself with great restraint; that his criticisms of Mr. Coyne were not criticisms of character but were criticisms of judgment. He criticized certain things which Mr. Coyne has done, things which I too would criticize. But as to Mr. Coyne's character, as to his truthfulness, as to his honour in business affairs, as to any other quality which we usually consider as entering into the element of character, the Minister of Finance has studiously refrained from making any criticism.

I maintain there is no substantial difference between us on the issue of whether or not Mr. Coyne should be removed. The Leader of the Opposition has left us in no doubt about that, and it has not been advanced as one of the reasons why the house should support this amendment. As to Mr. Coyne appearing before the committee to defend his character, I have answered that point to the best of my capacity.

Furthermore, it seems to me that this country has had enough of Mr. Coyne. We have had statement piled upon statement, press interview piled upon press interview, on and on and on. If any man ever had his case placed before the public I would say it is Mr. Coyne. For these two reasons I shall vote against the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Pearson) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the main motion.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the issue which is now before the house is a simple one. We are being asked to remove from office one of the half dozen or so public servants in this country who previous parliaments decided should hold office for a term of years during good behaviour. In other words these public servants were not to be removable by the government but only by parliament, and only after misbehaviour had been proven. On June 14, at page 6334 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition, recognizing this point, is reported as saying:

> The issue before us, Mr. Speaker, is very important but a very simple one. If the government ask parliament to remove the governor of the Bank of Canada because the governor has in fact prevented them from implementing their monetary and financial policies, and if that can be established through a parliamentary inquiry, then, of course, we on this side would support his removal. That has been the relationship we have put forward all along and we would support it now. That has been the relationship, that has been the doctrine which has been opposed by the government.

The Leader of the Opposition repeated this position when he spoke on second reading of the bill. I should like to put on the record his words which are to be found at page 7054 of Hansard for June 26 of this year. They are as follows:

If the government were convinced that the governor of the bank was really obstructing government policies—and they claim to be convinced now; it is a kind of ex post facto conversion or conviction—parliament, as I have said, should have been fully informed, but it was not informed, and the governor of the Bank of Canada as head of an institution responsible to parliament, should have been given a full opportunity to explain his position and defend it. If he could not or would not explain his position and defend it satisfactorily, then and only then parliament should act.

This, sir, is exactly the position which was taken by a distinguished parliamentarian in this house on August 11, 1956. I should like to put his words on Hansard. They are to be found at page 7458 of Hansard of that date, and I quote:

This parliament, surely, is a court of appeal with respect to any matter, any problem, that lies within the whole scope of federal jurisdiction in this country. Any problem that arises surely ought to be able to find its way for discussion at some time or another on to the floor of the House of Commons. And for my part, Mr. Chairman, I reject completely the doctrine that the Prime Minister enunciated yesterday that parliament has no right to sit as a court of appeal when objection is taken to the exercise by the Bank of Canada of its powers in any particular way. If Canadians feel that those powers have been exercised in any way that they disapprove of, then, surely, this parliament is the forum before which they ought to be able to bring their complaints.

The distinguished parliamentarian who uttered those words was none other than the hon. member for Eglinton, now the Minister of Finance. Far from recognizing that parliament is a court of appeal, as he said it was in 1956, the minister now refuses any information to parliament except that which he gives himself.

In what the minister has told us he has given no evidence whatever of misbehaviour in the legal sense of the term. Surely there is an obligation, there is an onus which lies on the government and on the minister to disprove the statements that have been made. There is an onus on the government to establish misbehaviour. The minister has not stated one single instance, with the possible exception of some unexplained incident in 1957, when the governor of the Bank has failed to perform the duties entrusted to him by parliament, or when he has thwarted government policy.

The minister has indicated that he did not like some of the speeches which were made by Mr. Coyne. None the less he defended Mr. Coyne's right to make those speeches as late as February of this year. What is more, once he spoke to Mr. Coyne about the speeches, Mr. Coyne ceased immediately to make them.

Then the minister said, in a statement that the house has heard, that Mr. Coyne did not possess the confidence of financial institutions by and large. Apparently, he meant the chartered banks of this country. Perhaps the minister thinks the government is responsible to the chartered banks, but we think the minister is responsible to parliament. This parliament has the right to know whether the minister was yielding to pressure from the chartered banks.

These are the questions that parliament, as the court of appeal to which the Minister of Finance referred in 1956, should be allowed to decide after hearing all the evidence. But the minister, who is the accuser, makes himself the court of appeal, and parliament is left to be the executioner.

What is a court of appeal? A court of appeal is one that has all of the evidence before it, the evidence on both sides. A court of appeal is one that hears all the arguments through counsel. A court of appeal is one that has the benefit of the parties appearing before it. If parliament is to be a court of appeal, then parliament is lacking those ingredients which make it a court of appeal. The minister said also that parliament was to be a forum. Where is the forum in this case? Where are the parties who are entitled to be heard? We have heard from but one of these parties.

Then sir, as has already been said but bears repetition, what of the bill of rights? What of the bill of rights that was passed by this government and about which so much has been said concerning the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms? Section 2 of that bill reads in part as follows:

—no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to . . .

(e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

I read that section for a purpose. Why did I read it? I read it because under the Bank of Canada Act Mr. Coyne has the right to remain as governor of the bank for a period of seven years unless the government can establish misbehaviour before this high court of parliament, which the minister called a court of appeal, a forum in which all persons have a right to be heard. Mr. Coyne, in the words of the bill of rights, has asked parliament for a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations. The government headed by the Prime Minister, who is the author of the bill of rights, is asking parliament now to deny him that hearing, and in defiance of the bill of rights to condemn him unheard.

(Translation):

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the problem now before the house, stripped of all rhetoric of which, it seems to me, there has been an abundant use, amounts to nothing much after all. It is by reverting to its basic principle that one can determine specifically and objectively what should be the stand taken by the house.

The purpose of the act we are called upon to pass is simply to provide that the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant.

What are the inherent responsibilities of that office and, consequently, what were the duties of the incumbent up to now?

I feel that the first question that should come to our mind is the following: Is the government justified or not in demanding that the monetary policy be subordinate to its economic and fiscal policy?

In my opinion, that is beyond all question. First of all, for a reason of principle that, I think, should be the basis of all discussion and on which everybody seems to agree, namely the sovereignty of parliament.

The government is formed by the parliamentary majority which, in its turn, is elected by the people it represents. Contrary to what has been said, the governor of the Bank of Canada, on the other hand, is an official. Section 7 states:

—is the chief executive officer.

The governor of the Bank of Canada is elected by the directors who are appointed by the governor in council for a term of three years. The election of the governor, whose term of office is seven years, must also be approved by the governor in council. The deputy minister of finance is ex officio a member of the executive committee and of the board of directors but he does not have the right to vote.

The governor of the bank has the power to veto any decision taken by the executive committee or the board of directors but his veto can be disallowed by the governor in council.

What inference should be drawn from the facts recalled and which are the very spirit of this act called the Bank of Canada Act. The inference is, contrary to what we have heard during this debate, that the governor of the Bank of Canada, as far as his appointment is concerned, as far as his actions and the decisions he is called upon to make within the two boards he presides are concerned, is responsible to the governor in council for all activities within the limits of the powers invested in him.

The fact that the government appoints the directors and, through them, the governor, who is an official, the fact that the deputy minister of finance is a full member of the executive committee as well as of the board of directors, the fact that the governor's veto is subordinate to the approval of the governor in council, all those are legal factors which show that the government has authority over the Bank of Canada and its governor.

This authority should not only be a word; it implies that the government has the duty to define its fiscal and economic policy and that the monetary policy for which the governor is responsible is a consequence of the first and should be subordinate to it.

This is the basic principle neglected by Mr. Coyne, the one he discarded two or three years ago, and this is why of his own free will he has put himself in the position of an outlaw. Finally this is the basic reason why this bill, simple as it is—though full of consequence—should be adopted by the house without hesitation.

Besides, this is in my opinion the principle behind the establishment of that institution, and here I refer to the report of the royal commission following which the Bank of Canada was created, and also to the views expressed by the representatives of the three groups in the House of Commons at that time, in 1934.

First of all, the commission, in its report of 1933, page 63, stipulated as follows:

It is rather easy to expect too much or too little from the operation of a central bank, which is both an instrument and a force.

As an instrument, it enables the government, with whom supreme authority with regard to money matters necessarily rests, to follow a national policy.

As an authority, the central bank has certain powers which it may use to attain the aims of a national policy.

In other words, the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada must be subordinate to the national policy for which the government is responsible both to parliament and to the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dorion: If my learned friends in the opposition understand what I just said, and what the report provides for, I should congratulate them, trusting that they will immediately vote for the bill introduced by the Minister of Finance.

I continue reading from the report:

Of course, the bank should work in close co-operation with the government in all matters concerning the external value of this country's currency, and with regard to the administration of a national policy in this field, the bank should have the government's backing for its foreign exchange operations.

And what were the reactions of hon. members who examined the bank's plan?

(Text):

Mr. Benidickson: Now we are coming to something.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, I shall give only a few quotations in order to prove beyond doubt that all parties in the house at that time expressed the unanimous opinion that the purpose of that legislation was to subordinate the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada to the economic and fiscal policies of the government itself.

First of all, let us consider the views of Mr. Woodsworth who has here a certain number of spiritual sons who have made lengthy and, in my opinion, amazing statements on this problem. As reported in Hansard of March 9, 1934 Mr. Woodsworth stated the following:

It would be an impossible situation if the authority of the governor of the bank were to be superior to that of the government of this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Dorion: And Mr. Woodsworth went on to say:

We in this corner—and I hope we shall be joined by at least some members of the Liberal party—

I wonder whether he was a prophet, in view of the situation developing today and indicating that the Liberal party will join the C.C.F. party.

—would like to provide that when there is a clash, the government must have the last word because in the long run the government is responsible to the people. It may very well be that sometimes democracy may make mistakes in its decisions—

And Mr. Woodsworth added:

—but that is the only way in which higher levels can be attained.

What is the view expressed by Mr. Mackenzie King on June 21, 1934? This is what he said then:

You will almost certainly, sooner or later, have a conflict between financial and fiscal policies, the former in the control of private interests, the latter in the control of the government. If there is a conflict anywhere, my feeling is that the view that ought to prevail is the view of the administration of the day, not the view of any institution privately owned and controlled.

In other words, Mackenzie King recognized the supremacy of government and parliament over the decisions of the governor of the Bank of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. Benidickson: And the present Minister of Finance has said the opposite for four years.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Now, Mr. Speaker, this basic principle is essential to the efficiency of a healthy democracy. Mr. Coyne has scoffed at it with an impudence which borders on insubordination and which can only lead to anarchy.

Consequently, in view of the principles on which the Bank of Canada has been founded, of the spirit which inspired the adoption of that act, of the statements made by all party leaders, the government has no alternative today, in the face of such antagonism between Mr. Coyne's monetary policy and the government's economic and fiscal policy, but to cause the removal of Mr. Coyne from his present office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are perfectly right, that has always been our attitude.

Mr. Dorion: Then what is the purpose of this debate? If that is what you want, why should we waste hours debating this question? What is your position? Do you accept the principles we have just set forth and which are the very principles of this bill we are asking you to approve today?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the stand taken by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Grafftey: They blow hot and cold at the same time.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that it is not the stand taken by the Minister of Finance. It was most interesting to read over—it is always pleasant to hear the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) —the remarks he and his leader made in the house last March. They both agreed that there was a discrepancy between the Minister of Finance's policy and Mr. Coyne's monetary policy. I have here statements which were made in that connection.

First of all, the representative of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) made the following statement which I find on page 3246 of Hansard of March 22, 1961:

However, we do know that ever since this government took office there has been a growing conflict between the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and government policy generally.

A little further, he went on as follows:

We know there is conflict between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance about what should be done, one taking a course of action that is in reality critical of the government in office and the other, namely the Minister of Finance, sitting idly by—

Well, that such a disagreement exists has been recognized by both opposition parties. Yet today they would like to have maintained in his position a man who, on their own admission, constitutes an obstacle to the expansionist policy of the government, an obstacle to measures passed by this parliament, which are likely to be opposed by Mr. Coyne's opinion, attitude and philosophy.

Is there not but one possible solution—to have Mr. Coyne replaced by a person prepared to obey the law, to respect the spirit of the law; a person who would understand that his duty is to act according to policy and not make policy, because policy belongs to the people and to their representatives. It is up to them to define and defend policy in this house and to ensure that it is implemented.

Let us see what the Leader of the Opposition had to say on March 22, 1961.

It will be no surprise to the committee, Mr. Chairman, when I say that we feel that in this field of monetary policy there has been a shocking lack of co-ordination between the government and the Bank of Canada, the bank which is responsible for action in the monetary field, though in our view the government itself must remain responsible ultimately for the policies within which action is taken.

And he added:

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the minister is correct in saying that their policies should be parallel and harmonious; and surely it is the responsibility of any government to take steps to ensure, by accepting responsibility for policy, that these policies are parallel and harmonious.

Well, what are we doing now? Opposition members do admit that there is a difference, a basic difference. On their own admission, it is up to the government to see to it that fiscal and monetary policies are parallel and harmonious. And, while we want to push aside the obstacle standing in the way, while we want to clear the road to allow for this co-operation requested by the opposition, at that very moment hon. gentlemen opposite say: No. Stop it. You cannot do that. On the one hand, you are duty bound to make sure that the way is clear and on the other hand we shall prevent your blocking our own policies.

Such is the kind of consistency we find.

We have been asked: "But why not let Mr. Coyne be heard?"

[Mr. Dorion.]

Who has not heard him in the last two years? Not only have we heard him, not only has he indulged his volubility, not only has he made his views known—had he been content with expressing his views on matters pertaining to his duties or to monetary policy, perhaps he should not be criticized—but, according to the well known expression, he laid down the law for the king, he placed himself above the king. He is above parliament. In his speeches, he kept making statements on matters of fiscal and financial policies which are the sole responsibility of parliament and the government. A person of the type of Mr. Coyne should not be substituted for them until such day as we are ready to accept the financial dictatorship of the Bank of Canada. And that day is far away, thank God.

He was heard particularly in the other place. We have their report from which I will now quote the following excerpt:

(Text):

With regard to the role of monetary and fiscal policy, attention must be directed to an important weakness which has developed in this country. There has been a serious lack of co-ordination between those two powerful instruments of economic policy. This lack of co-ordination has made it much more difficult, if not impossible, to influence the movement of interest rates, exchange rates, money supply and capital flows in the directions which help to maintain high levels of employment and production and the resultant impact on the economy are hard to reconcile with an effective use of integrated monetary and fiscal policies. There have been needless divergencies and uncertainties. The idea that monetary and fiscal policies are differently determined and can be independently pursued is incompatible with the realities of a highly complex money and exchange economy in which the operations of government play so large a role.

(Translation):

In other words, here is an admission—not an admission but rather a report made after that witness, whose evidence was requested here, had appeared there and expressed his views.

What was the result? The conclusion was drawn that there was profound disagreement. Who is responsible for that disagreement? Who should dictate Canada's policy? Who are those who have been elected by the people to define this country's policy? Is it Mr. Coyne or the government now at the head of this country? If there was disagreement and if such disagreement had to disappear, well, it was up to that official, who stood in the way of any reconciliation of the policies, to leave of his own will, without waiting until we had to resort to this legislation, which is the only logical, reasonable and unavoidable remedy at this government's disposal.

Besides, Mr. Coyne said so himself before the committee on banking and commerce, in 1956, and his evidence is quoted in the Globe and Mail of June 28, 1961:

(Text):

If the government of the day were sufficiently displeased with the bank or the management of the bank they could put in motion steps which would bring about a change in management. At some stage in that process, if the government were so determined as to make a real issue of it, a public issue presumably, the governor would have to resign.

(Translation):

Those were his own words. He saw at that time where his duty lay, what were the duties of his office. He knew he should not assume responsibilities beyond his own jurisdiction and he said: "The government could put in motion steps which would bring about a change in management if management opposes the government's policies." More than that, he admitted that, under such circumstances, the governor should resign.

Why does he not resign? Why?

These are strange coincidences, and I would give as an example that letter of Mr. Coyne dated June 26, 1961, released at the very moment an amendment was moved here to have Mr. Coyne heard by a parliamentary committee, when all the factors required for a judgment had already been gathered, when my hon. friends opposite had made the pronouncement that there was disharmony. They had pronounced judgment as far back as last March and they wanted afterwards to argue the case. Such was the ridiculous and inconsistent position in which they put themselves.

At the very moment that amendment was moved, the same day, practically at the same time, Mr. Coyne was writing a letter, which showed his state of mind and which by another strange coincidence came to the same conclusions as the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition. A strange coincidence indeed.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Dorion: I am not used to judging things on coincidences only. But we might be about to prove that perhaps there was more than just a coincidence there.

In any case, what did that letter say? I quote the last paragraph of the first page.

(Text):

The point which I am concerned to bring before public opinion—

(Translation):

You will see what kind of an inquiry was intended, whether it was an inquiry to further the business of government or of parliament, or whether it was a forum to be put at the disposal of Mr. Coyne, who far from being the accused, as some contended, far from relying on the bill of rights, would have become the accuser against the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and parliament itself.

(Text):

The point which I am concerned to bring before public opinion, and which you, Mr. Fleming, and the government are trying to prevent me from bringing before a parliamentary committee is that the position of the governor of Canada's central bank will be destroyed and the whole institution will become merely an arm of a political machine if the governor is to be terrorized into resigning whenever the government of the day wants him to, without any issue of policy being raised—

(Translation):

Which is in direct contradiction with what my hon. friends opposite had to say in their remarks.

(Text):

—without the government stating its monetary policy in parliament or elsewhere, and without the government accepting responsibility for monetary policy.

(Translation):

And further on:

(Text):

The fact that the government has not yet accepted its proper responsibility but has sought and is still seeking merely to dominate the governor, both the present governor and, by implication, and precedent, all future governors, too,—

(Translation):

That gentleman is rich in virtuality. He stands, not only for the present governor but also for the past and the future governors until the end of time. He bears the cross of all those people. What a martyr.

(Text):

—makes it important that there be a searching inquiry into the facts underlying the present situation and the true motives of you, Mr. Fleming, and the government.

(Translation):

Since when does one have the right to question the motives underlying government policy? Yet, that is the opportunity our friends opposite wished to give him, that is to question the government.

Is that monetary policy? Is that the machinery he gave that institution? Is that working and talking within the limits of his administrative capacity as set out and defined by the act?

Well, to accuse the Minister of Finance, they would use the bill of rights, not for the protection of the accused but in favour of the accuser. That is the meaning of what was said.

(Text):

The sudden and unexplained demand for my resignation on May 30, the appearance of haste and urgency, and the blackmailing tactics used—

Governor of Bank of Canada

(Translation):

What fine language for a public servant.

(Text):

—suggested that the present government had a plan—

(Translation):

And a public servant prepared to co-operate at that.

(Text):

—to call a snap election, without a budget, or perhaps immediately after the budget speech was made, and subvert the Bank of Canada under a new governor of their own choosing to assist them in financing expenditures and programs not authorized by parliament.

(Translation):

Countless and groundless charges, without verbal or written evidence, and without proofs by witnesses.

(Text):

I was warned about this danger by a man—

(Translation):

Here is something interesting.

(Text):

—whose opinions I value and who said in such circumstances the governor of the bank would have a duty not to resign.

(Translation):

Since when may the governor of the Bank of Canada, whose powers, responsibilities and rights are defined by statute, since when may an executive officer, as he is defined in the act, who is bound by his oath and is surrounded by a board of directors and an executive committee, who moreover is bound to some extent to the Minister of Finance since the deputy minister has deliberative voice with both the board of directors and the executive committee, since when may this gentleman wave aside the advisers given to him by the law, the people the government has regularly appointed and who, under the act, have legal powers of consultation and direction? Since when does he have the right to turn away from them to go and consult a very dear friend, who, by the way, did him a great disservice by suggesting to him the policy he has followed?

Moreover those advisers provided by the act, those directors, are appointed for three years and, incidentally, I read in one of Mr. Coyne's speeches or letters that he got exercised over the fact that new directors had been appointed by this government.

What was wrong with replacing their predecessors when their term of office expired? It is the law. It is authorized by the act and because we implemented the act, because, pursuant to that act, we appointed directors we had the right to appoint, here is a man who protests because we caused him to lose his friends, the former directors who surrounded him and who cultivated that spirit of dictatorship and tyranny which characterizes his letters and his attitudes.

Now, those directors, who are empowered to act, who sit on the board of directors, who have duties to perform, have also told him: "Sir, you must resign".

What does he do? He remains there. He clings to a course of action that constitutes an obstacle to the pursuit of government policy. What is more, he is sowing distrust; by his action, by the stand he is taking, he is sowing the seeds of distrust, he is setting up around the Bank of Canada a wall of distrust which, if this situation is allowed to drag on indefinitely, might be seriously detrimental to that institution.

That is how this man is setting personal interest above public interest. And yet he is relatively well paid to look after public interest.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is the situation in which we find ourselves today. Before closing my remarks, I should simply like to quote an opinion which I think sums up all the others. I should like to refer to an article which appeared three or four days ago in Le Devoir, over the signature of its editor, Mr. Filion, who said in substance: "In the face of the situation in which he finds himself, the only course open to Mr. Coyne is to resign."

For, after all, Mr. Coyne should remember that later on he will not be the one who will have to justify his stand before the people, and to answer for the policies of this government; that will be a responsibility of this government. He has absolutely no responsibility before the people, and yet he would have liked to be heard, yes, and to what purpose? Not to defend himself, as you can see, but to make charges and then attempt to justify these charges. Such is not, thank goodness, the purport of the bill of rights. It is just the reverse, and that is why we could not accept the suggestion put forward by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I say we have here the case of an administrative officer who, for two years, has been advocating fiscal policy, economic policy, financial policy, to the point where one of the documents which he forwarded to us was described even by opposition members, as "the Coyne budget". Can there be any more palpable or concrete evidence of the fact that we are dealing with a man who, constantly overstepping the duties and limitations ascribed to him by law, has endeavoured to lecture the government, to oppose its policies and, in the exercise of his monetary policy, to impede the development programs and the economic and fiscal policy of this government.

Mr. Speaker, is parliament to be denied its own rights and prerogatives which, by the way, are always so eloquently set forth by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) —incidentally, let me say here that I always enjoy listening to him, and he is at his best when reciting the great principles which are the basis of that democracy in which we all share. Well then, I say to him that it is precisely because of those principles, because of the supremacy that the government must enjoy, and of the fact that it will have to give an account of its stewardship to the people of Canada, that a public servant must not exceed his duties, must remain at his assigned station in the hierarchy of administrative functions, and that as soon as he oversteps those bounds and ventures into the field of politics, not only does he violate the obligations he has assumed by reason of his oath, but he acts counter to those fundamental principles that were so eloquently expounded by the hon. member.

That is the reason why this bill is before us. It has been introduced because we want order restored in the household, because we want everybody in his proper place, and because we want no obstacle to stand in the way of the policy for which the government is accountable and which the government wants to translate into action not only through its legislation but by the practical application of that legislation. This is something that requires the unreserved assistance of the country's monetary policy. That is why I feel that the house should, of common accord, support the legislation that is now before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I used to be told by my father that it was a good thing always to make a noise in the woods if you wanted to keep up your courage. When I was listening to the very interesting and eloquent address delivered by the Secretary of State—

An hon. Member: You lost your courage.

Mr. Herridge: —my mind started to drift back to years ago. I remember very well indeed listening to the late Premier Maurice Duplessis in the other place at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. While I was sitting here listening to the minister I thought, how similar is the voice, how alike is the manner. I think I must congratulate him. His fervour was equal. His style, logic and form of debate were identical.

Other members of our group have placed our position fully before the house with respect to this bill and all the circumstances surrounding it, but the curtain of silence is soon to be lowered on this unprecedented parliamentary drama. I say "drama", Mr. Speaker, because wherever you get a clash of personalities such as we have between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, where you have a clash with respect to a conception of principles that exists between the government and the opposition, you have all the ingredients and setting for a drama. That is why I say this has been an unprecedented parliamentary drama.

I wish to briefly explain and review the position of this party in view of the vote that will be taken, I presume, in a few minutes. First of all I must say that we in this group sincerely regret this unseemly development in the public life of Canada which may damage future relations among parliaments and governments and government agencies. This is an unprecedented situation, and I am sure that any fair person who has read the newspapers, who has received correspondence from the type of individual who is concerned about this kind of development, will realize that it has caused serious and obvious concern to the country and may cause damage to our institutions in the future.

Second, we believe that principles have been violated and that the house, as has been stated so well by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Laurier and other speakers, should have had the opportunity to know all the facts before being called upon to make a decision by voting on this legislation. That opportunity has been denied by the government.

Mr. Brunsden: Oh, fiddlesticks.

Mr. Herridge: That opportunity has been denied by the government because it has refused to refer this bill to the banking and commerce committee and give that committee the opportunity of hearing Mr. Coyne and any other witnesses it might wish to call before it. We in this group believe it is impossible to know all the facts and circumstances surrounding this unfortunate development without hearing all sides of the question.

Mr. Brunsden: Where have you been for the last two weeks?

Mr. Herridge: The refusal of the government to allow this bill to be sent to the banking and commerce committee is without precedent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will agree with me that the house disposed of the question of sending the subject matter of the bill to the banking and commerce committee, and I would hope that the hon. member would not refer to that specific proposal again.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I have just disposed of it also. Third, we believe that the principles of justice and fair play were violated by the government's action and that the government's action to some extent has undermined the very foundations of the bill of human rights and fundamental freedoms, by its denial to a Canadian of a hearing before he is sentenced by the passage of this legislation. We think that is fundamental.

While this group does not agree with all of Mr. Coyne's views, we have a high respect for Mr. Coyne as a public servant of apparently strong convictions and considerable strength of character who has been willing to sacrifice his personal interests to advance views that he regards as being in the interests of the country. Mr. Coyne has taken the hard path instead of the easy path. The easy path would have been for Mr. Coyne to agree with the government, to have been putty in the hands of the Minister of Finance, and thus avoided this unfortunate incident.

Because of the circumstances surrounding this situation, because of the violation of the principles I have mentioned, and to indicate our belief in and support for those principles which have been violated by the introduction of this bill and the procedure on the part of the government respecting it, we in this group intend to vote against the measure.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Secretary of State that there can be no doubt about the final jurisdiction of this parliament in all matters that come within its authority under section 91 of the British North America Act. That is not the issue before us.

The governor of the Bank of Canada has been the object of considerable criticism from a number of us in the Liberal party during the course of the last two years. No one has been more critical of some of his policies and some of his attitudes than the Leader of the Opposition. As the Minister of Finance recalled the other day, the governor of the Bank of Canada went to him and complained about the way I had dealt with him in the industrial relations committee when I questioned his conduct regarding the operations of the investment committee of the unemployment insurance commission. It will be recalled that in the month of March, at a time when the Minister of Finance did not take issue, I criticized the governor of the Bank of Canada for making public declarations outside of the monetary policy field in a manner that suggested that there were differences between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada. There was never any suggestion by the Minister of Finance that there was any difference between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government of Canada along the lines I had suggested. As a matter of fact, on February 21, with regard to speeches made by the governor of the Bank of Canada in fields outside of monetary policy, the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 2258 of Hansard for February 21, 1961:

> Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have no right of censorship over the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He does not refer them to me. Why should he do so? This is a free country. He makes his own speeches and chooses his own themes. I read these speeches afterwards as does the Leader of the Opposition. It is sometimes forgotten by hon. members opposite that this is a free country.

I ask, by way of parenthesis, whether or not this government has forgotten that this is a free country. The Minister of Finance then went on to say:

> I trust that I am not to be held responsible for what may be said by the governor of the Bank of Canada when he exercises his right as a citizen to make speeches.

We took issue with that position. We quarrelled with that position, and said that there could not be two sovereignties in this country. Yet the Minister of Finance, up until a few weeks ago only, at no time remonstrated against the right of the governor of the bank publicly to take issue on matters of government policy in areas where this parliament has not given him primary and exclusive authority. We do not stand as protagonists of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We would like to find out the reasons for some of these speeches. We would like to find out also what went on between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada regarding other matters not touched upon or disclosed in those speeches. We would like to find out what relationship has prevailed in latter days between the directors of the bank and the Minister of Finance. We would like to have from him, in committee where we can cross-examine him as is our right, a statement concerning the propriety of intervening in matters relating to the bank through the intervention of government appointed directors, amongst whom is a former Conservative candidate. These are the things we would like to examine in regard to this matter.

Our attitude toward this bill of attainder—and that is all it is, this bill that recognizes the very opposite that is implicit in the rule of law, in the due process concept in the bill of rights—is that it is a bill we shall vote against for the reasons I am going to explain. The usefulness of the governor of the Bank of Canada has been destroyed by the acts of this government. This is clear. The issue now before us is not whether the governor shall continue in office; that has been established clearly. The issue is whether he is to be denied the opportunity of acquainting this parliament, through one of its proper instruments, a committee, with his side of the dispute. The issue is whether this parliament is to be denied the opportunity of sifting the facts in a matter so vital to Canada's financial integrity.

It is because in this bill before us, Mr. Speaker, we have a violation of the spirit and letter of the bill of rights that we shall vote against this bill and not because we do not recognize the fact that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the government of this country have destroyed the usefulness of the governor of the bank. I would ask the Prime Minister who was not here during the full discussion of this bill, to recall his words last July 1 when the bill of rights was introduced into this house. He said, among other things, that no one shall be denied the right of a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of justice. I ask this house not to forget the words of Professor Scott who, before the bill of rights committee, said that the right to be heard is a principle of natural justice. The right not to be judged by someone who is biased in this case is a principle of natural justice.

We do not deny the right of the Minister of Finance to put forward his side of the case, but we do deny to the Minister of Finance the right to put forward not only his side of the case but that of the man he is accusing, the governor of the Bank of Canada. We want to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and the directors of the bank so we can find out the particulars of the pension arrangements made for the governor, made by a board of directors the majority of whom are appointees of this government and supporters of this government. We want to know the circumstances because we have grave doubts about certain aspects of that pension and we have not had from the Minister of Finance anything that would satisfy our curiosity in this regard. We are to be denied that right, however, because this Minister of Finance, supporting a government that proposed the bill of rights, says the way justice is to be meted out is by listening to the case of the prosecutor, listening to the prosecutor give the evidence for the accused, and then for the same prosecutor to give final judgement. I would remind the Minister of Finance that justice must not only be done but it also must appear to be done.

Mr. Nugent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are certain aspects of this problem that we must now examine in connection with this whole matter.

Mr. Nugent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have not yet been given one serious reason why the Minister of Finance took the unprecedented step of asking the governor of the bank to resign on May 30. As I pointed out a moment ago, we were told on February 21 that the minister strongly supported the declared position of the governor of the Bank of Canada in those areas outside of the monetary field. There was therefore, no issue between February 21 last and May 30 of this year. We do know that there was no difference in monetary policy between the governor and the Minister of Finance for the simple reason that the Minister of Finance said this government took the position that under no circumstances could it in any way be held responsible for monetary policy. This field had been given exclusively to the governor of the Bank of Canada under the Bank of Canada Act.

However, today we have had an amazing display of cabinet solidarity. We heard the Secretary of State speaking on behalf of the government. I compliment him for the way in which he spoke, not for his arguments but for the form in which he expressed them. He expressed a doctrine with regard to the relationship of the government to the Bank of Canada in the monetary policy field for which we have been contending here all along. This was the position of former ministers of finance, Mr. Harris, Mr. Abbott, Mr. Dunning, Mr. Rhodes, of the former governor, Graham Towers, and the present governor of the Bank of Canada. I tell the Secretary of State that when he comes to read his speech he will find how he differs from the spokesman for the government, the Minister of Finance.

On February 1, 1960, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) made these remarks on this very point as reported on page 550 of Hansard for that date:

> On this very point, would the minister not agree that the position taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada is diametrically opposed to the minister's own position?

The Minister of Finance said:

> That observation is, of course, just plain nonsense.

Mr. Speaker, I compare what the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) said this afternoon regarding bank monetary policy and the relation of that policy to the government with this declaration and with the repeated stand taken by the Minister of Finance.

On March 18 the minister met with the governor and, according to his own account, he met with him only to tell him that some of his cabinet colleagues did not like some of his speeches.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not the Minister of Finance but some of his colleagues: the Prime Minister, I presume and I suppose the Minister of National Health and Welfare and maybe the Solicitor General.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is not telling the truth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then the governor undertook not to make any more speeches in areas outside of monetary policy. When he went before the manpower committee of the Senate, and was asked for details about some of the proposals he had made in at least five speeches outside Ottawa, the governor refused to give them. We have since learned that the reason for that refusal was that he had indicated to the Minister of Finance, who asked him for the first time, that he would agree not to make speeches in these areas.

We are entitled also to inquire about the relations between the governor and the board of directors. According to the governor on March 20 last, two days after he had seen the Minister of Finance, he sought their advice. He sought to inquire whether or not he should resign as a result of the discussion he had had a few days previously with the Minister of Finance. On March 20 the directors unanimously said that his conduct was in harmony with their views and that he should not take any steps involving resignation.

Then we have this further evidence from Mr. Bryden, the close friend of the Minister of Finance, one of his political supporters, and of course a man of the greatest integrity—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —who said in a statement to the press on June 15 that all during the time at least that he was a director the governor had his support and the confidence of the board. That was a statement made by Mr. Bryden on June 15. So according to the evidence we have before us with regard to this bill of attainder, the totalitarian technique, which denies an accused the right at least to be heard, we find that between April 4 and May 30 there was nothing to disturb the happy relationship that apparently existed between the governor and the board of directors of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what the governor said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then suddenly on May 30, without any warning, everything changed. The Minister of Finance by-passed the board of directors and resorted to the unprecedented step of calling in the governor and asking him to resign immediately and quietly. What authority did the Minister of Finance have for taking a step like that? What is there in the Bank of Canada Act that gives the Minister of Finance the right to impair the important position of managerial objectivity that the Bank of Canada must have in relation to matters that come within its authority?

We are certainly entitled to ask: Why did this happen? But the minister would have us believe that the one reason why this happened was that the minister was going to bring down the budget and that he would adopt policies which the governor would not accept, although we know that there are in that budget many things which along with the document of February 15 of this year shows clearly the influence of the governor of the Bank of Canada on the budget. We know that there was a huge deficit and that there were huge borrowing requirements. We know that in 1958 and in 1959 the governor of the Bank of Canada supported the Minister of Finance and did not register any strong opinion against these deficits. What reason was there for suspecting that the governor of the Bank of Canada would take a different position in 1961? As a matter of fact, we know that in 1960 the governor of the Bank of Canada increased the money supply by 16 per cent during the period of a few months. We know that he made every effort to support the bond conversion scheme of the Minister of Finance which is at the root of so much of the problem that has provoked this difference between the governor and the minister.

There is one vital mysterious element in this whole episode that we must examine. On May 15 the Minister of Finance met here in Ottawa with the presidents of the commercial banks or their representatives. This was almost two weeks before the minister asked the governor to resign. I ask the Minister of Finance—and this is the kind of question I should like to ask in detail in a committee—what went on at that meeting of May 15 in the minister's office. In order to understand what might have gone on, one should not forget the incidents in the fall of 1960 when the minister returned from England and then met his colleagues who had been working on their estimates. The minister found that his colleagues were embarking upon an expansionist program, that they had inflated their departmental estimates,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and that they were embarking upon a spending program which did not meet the considered views of the Minister of Finance. What did the Minister of Finance do?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is so ridiculous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The parliamentary secretary says "This is so ridiculous". I am glad to know that he is a member of the cabinet and knows about all of these things. Not only did the minister find that his colleagues were embarking upon a spending program, but he found that the Prime Minister was in support of this spending program of his colleagues. The Minister of Finance then "laid it on the line."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He threatened to resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a well known fact. It is known in Ottawa, Toronto and all over this country. The Minister of Finance said, "I will not go for this spending program; and if this is going to be the policy of the government you had better get another minister of finance".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is not a word of truth in that statement.

Mr. Benidickson: But he stayed on, although overruled.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And so, this being the case, the bankers of Canada—and one could name them—came to Ottawa and saw the Prime Minister. They had heard about this dispute between the Minister of Finance and some of his colleagues. They were opposed to a spending program and they wanted the Prime Minister to know that they proposed to take strong issue with any effort that would go contrary to the wishes and point of view of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have listened—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is this a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am rising on a question of privilege at this moment simply to say that the hon. gentleman must have secured his information from the informant of Mr. Coyne, who is wrong in every particular.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister, of course, may make all the denials he wishes to make. I am stating these things. He can take the appropriate opportunity to deny them. I say that the bankers, friends of the Tory party, came down and asked the Prime Minister to support the position taken by the Minister of Finance. So when the Minister of Finance met these bankers on May 15 in his office in Ottawa, he was speaking to a group of men who had reason to place their confidence in the Minister of Finance, if not in the other members of the government of our country. Why did the Minister of Finance call these bankers together on May 15? They were called together so that the Minister of Finance could do this; and this is rumour and the Minister of Finance knows this is the case. This is not now only rumour, this is established fact.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If so, it is not stated in the last ten minutes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister asked the banks to reduce their prime rate of interest. That was the first request made by the Minister of Finance to the bankers. Such a request amounted to asking the banks to reduce or to cut down their revenues. The bank presidents argued that they could not do this unless there was an expansion in the money supply. There could be no expansion of the money supply without the concurrence of the Bank of Canada. The minister left the bankers, the men with whom he has been consorting. He then took steps to bring about the opportunity for an increase in the money supply, by seeing to it that the wishes of the Prime Minister and others would be met in removing the present governor from the office of governor of the Bank of Canada. That, I say, is the real story behind this situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is off his rocker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend may take issue with that but if he is so sure of his position let us go before the committee; let us find out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suggest that we—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. More: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman who is speaking continually refers to a committee of the house. That matter has been settled and the hon. member is violating the rules of the house in referring to it now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not going to talk about a committee. I am going to talk about something else that concerns my hon. friend.

Mr. Benidickson: The Secretary of State referred to it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have followed the hon. member's argument with a good deal of care, as I did the speeches of the other hon. members, having regard to the decision taken by the house. In my opinion unless a speech advocates a reference of this matter to the banking and commerce committee it does not clash with the decision already taken on the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have said that the minister indicated to the bankers that it was necessary, in order to get a reduction in the prime rate of interest, that there be an expansion in the money supply. It was clear that the course he was about to take was the way in which that could most effectively be done.

It is not without significance that on May 30 the Minister of Finance decided to move on two fronts. On that day in this house he used these words which will be found at page 5571 of Hansard:

> —I think it is by now a matter of knowledge on the part of hon. members that the various chartered banks of the country are reducing the prime rate of interest on loans as of June 1 to 5½ per cent.

If my hon. friend does not at once recognize the relevancy of that announcement in regard to the argument I have made and the sequence of events of that day, then of course he is resorting to a subterfuge in not answering the implications of what I am saying is the case. It was not very long after that very announcement that the Minister of Finance told the governor of the Bank of Canada that he had to go. The price for the friendship of the bankers was the dismissal of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a complete falsehood.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend will have his opportunity to deny it, and the most effective way in which he could deny it would be to confront the governor of the bank and the board of directors and let the true facts of this situation be exposed. That is what the minister should do instead of putting forward the reasons we get from him in this bill.

What reasons do we get from this Minister of Finance for the course this government is taking? We recognize that this situation is inevitable now because of his acts, because of the intransigency of the policies this government has pursued. What are the real reasons for this action? Five reasons have been given to us by the Minister of Finance. Let us examine those five reasons and see how hollow they are. Who does he think is going to accept these reasons in face of the background of the situation which he described the other day, beginning with his conversation with the governor of the Bank of Canada in November of 1957?

The first reason the minister puts forward is the public speeches made by the governor.

The public speeches made by the governor could not be a serious issue on May 30 because Mr. Coyne, on March 18, had agreed to remain silent. Of course, the speeches that Mr. Coyne had been making were not the reason. He remained silent, as I have indicated, from March 18 onwards. As we know from what I have already quoted, the Minister of Finance took the position throughout that the governor had the right to make these speeches; that he was a free citizen, notwithstanding the contentions which I and other hon. members made with regard to the impropriety of the governor of the Bank of Canada speaking in these areas apparently contrary to declared government policy.

I say to the minister that the answer to the second reason put forward by the government is that on February 21, 1961 the minister had accused the opposition, not the governor, of having brought the Bank of Canada into the centre of controversy. When we discussed the impropriety of the governor of the Bank of Canada making these speeches the minister said we were bringing the Bank of Canada into political controversy. He now acknowledges the impropriety of the governor's speeches. I say to him that if he felt as he said he did only the other day—this was something that he denied all through the piece, however—he should have taken the decisive step in November, 1957—

Mr. Benidickson: Quietly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to remove the governor from office quietly, without offence to the governor's family, so there could be no divergence between the government's position and that of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The answer to the third reason of the minister is that it is quite clear, after having seen the budget, that there was in fact no incompatibility between Mr. Coyne and the budget and that on May 30 the government was not, to use the minister's words, about to embark upon a far-reaching program which would be opposed by the governor. I say this because some of the proposals of Mr. Coyne as revealed to the country—and I say improperly so—in his memorandum of February 15 show a remarkable similarity to some of the minister's views as revealed in the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you think they are similar you have gone astray.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And we now know, as a result of the discussion in this house last evening, it was the views of the governor of the Bank of Canada which influenced the minister in the formulation of the amendments now before the house regarding the industrial development bank.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no truth in that, either.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says, "There is no truth in that, either". Let us have a committee to determine whether there is truth in that statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are just making false charges; that is all you are doing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A further reason the minister gives is the failure of the governor to disclose to the minister his pension arrangements. I do not in any way support those pension arrangements, but I wish to know all the facts in relation to them.

Mr. Pearson: A Tory pension.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, a Tory pension. Let not the Prime Minister forget and let not hon. gentlemen opposite forget that this pension was provided not by a Liberal government, not by a board of directors of the Bank of Canada appointed by a Liberal government, but for the most part by men appointed by the right hon. gentleman. They were the ones who formulated the pension arrangements. The one who took the initiative was the close friend of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Bryden. The Minister of Finance now wishes us to believe that he did not know of this pension until a short time ago. It is true that Mr. Bryden made a statement the other day and said that he did not write to the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: Coyne said he did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —within six months, as was indicated by Mr. Coyne. He may not have written but I ask the Minister of Finance to come before a committee of this house. Let us examine him and Mr. Bryden to determine whether or not there was some discussion between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Bryden.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member for Essex East resume his seat?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised before in the house. I made a statement, which the hon. member is now calling into question in breach of the rules of the house, and said that I knew nothing of this pension until the spring of 1961. The hon. member is now circumventing that and in an indirect way is seeking to call into question the word of an hon. member of the house.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to in any way violate the rules of this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member thinks I am, I say to him let us call Mr. Bryden; let us call the Minister of Finance; let us call two other directors and let us ascertain whether or not the Minister of Finance knew about these pension arrangements within ten days of their first being proposed by Mr. Bryden at the meeting of the board of directors.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a repetition of what has been attempted before by the hon. member seeking to circumvent the rules of this house. This was the subject of a ruling in this house some days ago and subsequently there was withdrawal. This is not the first time this matter has arisen. It has been ruled that the hon. member must accept a statement made by another member of this house as to a matter within his knowledge. That statement is that I knew nothing of this pension until the spring of 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): To save time, if the hon. gentleman wishes me to withdraw that I shall do so because that is the practice under our rules. But I say to the minister this: his assistant deputy minister was at that meeting and it is inconceivable that that able public official did not advise the deputy minister and the Minister of Finance of what took place at that meeting. In any event, let us go to the committee and find out whether that is the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is paying only lip service to the rule of the house when he repeats his statement in that form. The simple proposition is that the house has always accepted that an hon. member making a statement in his place on a matter within his own knowledge should have his statement accepted by other hon. members. This does not prevent other hon. members from drawing the attention of the house to inconsistencies, but it does prevent them from challenging directly such a statement made by an hon. member on facts within his knowledge.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I accept your suggestion without any reservations so as to save time.

The final reason which the minister gave for the dismissal of the governor was this, and I quote the hon. gentleman's word as reported at pages 7043 and 7044:

He did not possess the confidence of Canadian financial institutions with which the Bank of Canada must work.

That reason is clear, and the facts which I have recited with regard to the meeting of May 16 confirm my interpretation. It also is confirmed by the incident involved in the representations made by the bankers of Canada to the Prime Minister of this country in the dispute which the Minister of Finance had with his colleagues when he threatened to resign unless they embarked upon his restrictive program in the late fall of 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has said that there was a dispute and that I have threatened to resign in that dispute. I have already said today that there is no truth in that statement, and here again the hon. member is violating the rules of this house in making up statements which are denied by those who should have knowledge of them. I say that the statement he has made is untrue, and I suppose I should know as well as anyone whether it is true or not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising to make an explanation. He is entitled to do so at the conclusion of the hon. member's speech, but during the speech only by permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It seems to me that the situation before us is this: the minister takes one position, the governor of the bank takes another. Some of us find that some of the facts in this situation are not clear. Some of us have views as to what actually took place. The directors of the bank have a responsibility in this matter, as have the deputy minister of finance and the assistant deputy minister of finance. These men have not been heard. Their point of view has been expressed through a prejudiced party or through a party whose point of view is partisan, the Minister of Finance. We cannot resolve this matter, a matter which touches the vitals of our financial integrity, merely on the say so of a government with a big majority behind it. That is no way to resolve this problem, and no one stated this in principle better than the Prime Minister when he said, as reported at page 5643 of Hansard of July 1, 1960:

—I rise for the purpose of speaking on a subject on which I have spoken through the years, which has to do with the maintenance and preservation of freedom against governments, however powerful they may be;

[Mr. Speaker.]

That is what is in issue now. This is a powerful government. It has a tremendous majority. Why, then, should it be afraid to test its expression of opinion against those who take issue with it? What has the government to be afraid of?

I have before me the Canadian Bill of Rights, distributed all over this country at the instance of an imaginative organizing body in Bracken house and printed by the Queen's printer. This bill of rights sets out various articles to guarantee that all are given a fair hearing, that there is to be a presumption of innocence, long recognized under our common law. We have at the bottom a statement signed by the Prime Minister. I close what I have to say by repeating what the Prime Minister said, and I ask him to remember these words and to recognize their bearing on the issue now before us:

I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope hon. gentlemen will support this, too:

This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and mankind.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): After the magnificent and eloquent speech of the hon. Secretary of State it is difficult for anyone to say anything original at this stage of the debate. But all this spurious indignation, the furious and verbose play acting of the hon. gentleman who represents Essex East requires someone to place the issues before the house in perspective, and that I propose to do in a deliberate and, I hope, orderly way. If I succeed, it will certainly be in striking contrast to the contribution made by the hon. member for Essex East, for I say that never in the history of parliament has this House of Commons heard so much fiction uttered in the course of 40 minutes.

The hon. gentleman put up one man of straw after the other, only to knock them down. The greater the falsity of the assertion, the closer the hon. gentleman clasped it to his bosom. The hon. gentleman said the Minister of Finance had threatened to resign. I have been closely associated with the Minister of Finance and I know something of the situation, and I can only say that on the part of the hon. member for Essex East this is but a question of the wish being father to the thought. The hon. gentleman closed his play acting oration with a quotation from the bill of rights. Oh, I find it touching, this conversion of the hon. gentleman, because I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons in former days when the hon. member for Lake Centre, later the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, and still later the private hon. member for Prince Albert raised this issue on the floor of the house from his seat opposite. The hon. gentleman who is now leader of this government when a private member representing at various times the constituencies referred to raised the question of a Canadian bill of rights, and received from the four horsemen who now sit opposite nothing but scorn. That same hon. gentleman is now the right hon. Prime Minister, the man who a year ago on July 1 triumphed over the scorn of those hon. gentlemen opposite and who placed that great statute upon the statute books of this country. Yes, the hon. member from Essex East would have us believe this afternoon that he has been converted. Well, I do not think the conversion is quite what it was of another Paul on the road to Damascus, but if there be such a conversion in this instance I certainly know there will be some backsliding and probably before the day is out.

Sir, the real issue before this house is a simple and direct one and is capable of only one answer. All the tortuous and incoherent reasoning of the hon. gentleman from Essex East cannot conceal the simple issue. Can a governor, any governor, of the Bank of Canada be continued in office after he has lost the confidence of his board of directors—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the issue.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): —and lost the confidence of the government, after he has lost the confidence of the business and financial community with which he must be most intimately associated?

Mr. Benidickson: When did he lose that confidence?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This afternoon the hon. member for Essex East indicated, as he has done on previous occasions, that there cannot be two sovereignties. Of course not. I could not agree more. In fact it is almost the only thing the hon. gentleman said with which I do agree. But what is happening in this House of Commons this afternoon?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And he quoted that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What is happening is that this sovereign parliament, the elected representatives of the people, the only sovereign authority, the court of appeal if you like, to use the phrase that the hon. gentleman from Laurier quoted from the Minister of Finance, is being asked to exercise its sovereignty. If the hon. gentleman from Essex East and his colleagues practise what they preach, let them vote for this bill. If they believe that there cannot be two sovereignties, that is the only course they can take. I suggest to them that they desist from the support of a man who with an impropriety never before known in Canadian history uses the full resources of a great national institution, the Bank of Canada, to wage war against the elected representatives, the elected government of the people. Sir, to paraphrase Lord Durham, I say you cannot have two governments warring within the bosom of a single state.

Let hon. gentlemen opposite then support our system of responsible government, not a bureaucratic revolution, for such is the continuing Coyne artillery barrage from his Wellington street bastion. Even Mr. Coyne himself says in the letter which he released on June 26 to the press at least an hour before it was received by its intended recipient, the Minister of Finance:

> ... an honest difference of opinion proved to be unbridgeable, then it would be the duty of the governor to resign ...

Can any reasonable man believe that the differences disclosed in this debate are capable of being bridged?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who suggested that?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely, after what has transpired, it would be the height of folly to suggest that this government, or indeed any government, and Mr. Coyne could ever work together again. If that be true, sir, then either Mr. Coyne or this government must go. And, sir, it is not our system of government that one bureaucrat can bring down a government. Governments in our nation do not go at the behest of a financier. Only this House of Commons or the people can accomplish the defeat of a responsible government. Can there then be any answer but that Mr. Coyne shall go? In due course this government will submit its record to the people. By that record we on this side are proud to stand and I believe we will survive.

My hon. friends opposite say Mr. Coyne is entitled to be heard. Superficially, sir, the argument perhaps is an appealing one; but it is not one which will stand the test of analysis. Our system of government, as I have said, is responsible government. This means simply that a ministry takes a decision and submits that decision to the will of the elected representatives of the people. By the will of those elected representatives a government lives or dies. And, sir, when the vote comes this government will live.

A confrontation of the government and a public servant, warring within a single camp —such a proposal is totally foreign to our concept of responsible government.

Exalted though Mr. Coyne's position may be, I say that he is entitled to no higher right than any other public servant and no higher right than hon. gentlemen opposite accorded, shall we say, to General McNaughton when they took away his command, or to General Stuart or to Bob Pitt, whose only offence was that he offended the hon. gentleman from Bonavista-Twillingate. This government, sir, believes in one law for all, one law for the exalted and for the humble, not a special situation for Mr. Coyne.

Under our system of government, I repeat, the government takes a stand. It places that stand before the House of Commons. It explains it to the House of Commons, which is its master, and by the decision of that house, and ultimately of the people, a government lives or dies.

But, oh, say my hon. friends opposite, poor Mr. Coyne has had no forum. Well, what do they call the news headlines that this gentleman has created during these past three weeks? Has any Canadian public servant in all of our history ever had the opportunity that Mr. Coyne has had of presenting his side of the case to the public? Is there anything in the world that he could say that he has not said? After all, he has used the complete public relations resources of the Bank of Canada to further his case. How many thousands of dollars of the people's money have been used to further the insurrection of one man who has no backing from his own staff, and who has had the active opposition of his board of directors? These resources have been used to further his insurrection against the elected representatives of the people. Sir, he has not lacked a hearing. He has had every opportunity to be heard up and down and across the land. But my hon. friends say that he stands accused. We have here a situation where they say, "—the bill of rights shall be his protector." I have already indicated what I think of the sudden interest of hon. gentlemen opposite in the bill of rights. It really fascinates me. You would think now when they talk about it today that they had invented it instead of being, when they were in power, members of a government that over the years tried to prevent a bill of rights from being enacted. The bill of rights, sir, was never intended to and does not invade our system of responsible government. This argument about the bill of rights is the phoniest smokescreen of any that has been raised in this whole debate. I say let us be done with this nonsensical argument.

The only accusations of which I am aware are those which are being hurled constantly from his Wellington street bastion by Mr. Coyne directed at the Minister of Finance. The latest blast which was released on June 26 is so false, so false to my personal knowledge, so biased, so biased to my personal knowledge, so devoid of all principle and common sense that it is unbelieveable that a man in his position could have ever written it.

Mr. Coyne has had many days in which to court the headlines of this country in pursuit of his one objective, namely that of destroying the elected government of Canada. Today that government takes its case to the high court of parliament and it lays its case on the line. Does this House of Commons want Mr. Coyne or does it want this government? Sir, it is as simple as that. No government, Liberal or Progressive Conservative, or any other government that might be elected in Canada, could tolerate any type of insurrection no matter how exalted may be the insurrectionist.

The unhappiest fact of all is that hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to exploit this incident for purely political purposes. They seek to exploit the defiance of government policy by the governor of the Bank of Canada, his equal defiance of his own board of directors, his defiance of leading Canadian businessmen on the board of directors drawn from every province of Canada and from every walk of life. I say to this house with great seriousness that hon. gentlemen opposite have shown a very scant regard for the future, for the integrity, the independence of a great national institution, the Bank of Canada.

To me, sir, the most deeply regretted situation of all this whole Coyne controversy has been the willingness of the governor to make a political football out of the institution to which he has devoted most of his mature life, or perhaps I should say his adult life, and of which he has been the directing head for 6½ years. I include in that regret the present utter impropriety in using the great resources and public relations facilities of the central bank to foster a political dispute.

It has been the governor who has shown a reckless disregard of the consequences to an important national institution. It has been the Minister of Finance and the government who have demonstrated patience, consideration, dignity and statesmanship. In true Louis XIV style the governor has adopted the attitude, "La banque, c'est moi". He has shown a determination that if down he goes, as down now he must go, he will pull down with him the institution that gave him his opportunity and which is of such vital importance to Canada.

What has happened to his judgment is something that I simply cannot understand. Hon. gentlemen opposite need no words of mine to convince them of the intransigence of James E. Coyne. Members on the front bench opposite are not unaware of the fact that the present Minister of Finance is not the first minister of finance to find Mr. Coyne difficult, brooding and unco-operative. But, sir, what is most important is the fact that all except the most purely formal relations between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the financial community had come to an end. There has been almost a total breach between Mr. Coyne and the banking and other financial institutions of this country. Is everyone out of step except Mr. Coyne?

The hon. member for Essex East tried this afternoon to suggest that in some way there had been a conspiracy. He tried to arouse suspicion. I say to him that this is not worthy, that that is not in fact the situation. What has happened has not been a case of bogeymen of evil financiers who have been attacking Mr. Coyne. What has existed has been a total incompatibility of personal relations, a brooding, moody, ivory-tower attitude on the part of the governor, one man lonely in his majesty, one man against all the economists of government and financial institutions and, as we saw last autumn, against practically all the economists of the universities.

As this situation became increasingly apparent, as the governor more and more recklessly involved the Bank of Canada in political controversy, as increasing evidence mounted that our economy was suffering from the stubborn refusal of the governor to adopt flexible policies needed to give the economy a renewed stimulus, what was the government to do? It could have stood back until December 31 and merely let the whole sorry Coyne era disappear into an unlamented and unmourned past. It could have exercised a further restraint. It could have exercised a patience already severely taxed. Certainly that would have been the easy way. What it did was to act honourably. What it did was to tell Mr. Coyne that his term would not be renewed, that there were only 6½ months to run and that he stood in the way of the implementation of a comprehensive, sound and responsible economic program designed to raise levels of employment and production in Canada. This is what Mr. Coyne sought to prejudge and to prejudice in the public mind by a blast in which he described it as "mysterious and alarming". We may test what he has to say by this comment. Do any other Canadians consider the budget "mysterious and alarming"?

Mr. Coyne decided, as I have said, that he was greater than the government, that his personal future was more important than that of the Bank of Canada, and he declared war on the government and sought to bring it down. Not for a moment, sir, do I deny Mr. Coyne's right as a citizen to resign and to campaign to the limit against the government but I do dispute most vigorously the right of any servant of the crown to remain in office and to declare war on Her Majesty's ministers who have the confidence of this House of Commons, and to use the full resources of a great crown agency to fight his personal battle. I say that in all the history of parliamentary government I know of no counterpart of the utter impropriety of Mr. Coyne's actions, of his total disregard of the principles upon which responsible government is based. Let him step aside and use his own not inconsiderable resources and not the Bank of Canada's resources to fight his personal battle.

In my view what is now the most important aspect of this whole issue is to have appointed a new governor as soon as possible whose high qualities will command the confidence of the public and the business community alike.

From the recital of events given to the house last week by the Minister of Finance, it is abundantly clear that the Minister of Finance and the government have been running interference for Mr. Coyne for at least three years, endeavouring to protect him from the consequences of his own folly and, as it now appears, from the advice he was receiving from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. They were protecting him despite the fact that he was persisting in public utterances at variance with, indeed almost in defiance of, government policy, that his utterances were entirely outside the field of monetary policy and were entrenching entirely upon matters within the exclusive prerogatives of the government, that he was embroiling the Bank of Canada in political controversy, that he was becoming increasingly at loggerheads, as I have said, with the whole financial community with whom the national interest required that he work on a day to day basis of mutual trust and confidence. Small thanks indeed have the Minister of Finance and the government received from Mr. Coyne and his political commissar opposite, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, for the protection accorded to him sometimes in acutely embarrassing situations.

Governor of Bank of Canada

The last letter addressed by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance, dated June 26 but, it is to be noted, released on that day by every Bank of Canada office in every part of Canada, is the most outrageous and unprincipled document I have ever read. The recklessness of his charges, the baselessness of his conjectures and diatribes, the lurid, hysterical language, were described by one newspaper as equalling a paper-back mystery thriller. I doubt the comparison for I have never read such a thriller which so completely departed from reality.

He states categorically that "the budget was rewritten after my statement". From personal knowledge I know that not to be the case. Yes, of course, editorial changes are always made in a budget up to perhaps 48 hours before its delivery but as to the main principles of this last budget they had been fully settled before Mr. Coyne was asked to resign and remained unchanged thereafter.

Words like "blackmail", "subversion", "ulterior", "political puppets", "degraded" abound in this letter which is as atrocious in its bad taste as it is in its utter falsity. He says in this letter that he was warned of a certain danger "by a man whose opinions I value". Hon. members who have sat in the House of Commons with him do not quite share Mr. Coyne's evaluation of the opinions of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

It is the role of the government and of parliament to govern. Majority rule in this House of Commons must not be frustrated, I say, by opposition infiltration into sensitive public service areas, seeking to set at nought government policy. I say, let the elected representatives govern, not some invisible and irresponsible group headed by the grey eminence from Bonavista-Twillingate.

Quite a bit has been said about the pension aspects of this whole matter. This is but an incident, the fifth and last matter mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his discussion on May 30. Yet, so sensitive was Mr. Coyne that he tried to boil it into the principal issue. Sensitive—yes, but methinks the laddie doth protest too much.

In so far as my farmers and civil servants in Carleton are concerned, $25,000 a year is a lot of pension for a man of 50. However, I suppose it is nice if you can get it. This needs to be said, sir: Mr. Coyne at age 50 wants more for not working—for not working, mark you—than we pay the puisne judges of the Supreme Court of Canada for working until age 75. We pay the judges of that court $22,500 for working to age 75 and yet Mr. Coyne wants $2,500 more for not working at age 50. The governor of the Bank of Canada is a very important officer, but the people of this country have a high appreciation of our Supreme Court of Canada. We pay the deputy minister of finance, a most important official, $23,000 for working until 65, but Mr. Coyne wants $2,000 more for not working at age 50. There must be some sense of proportion, some relativity, and it is immaterial to me what the directors approved. I say only that I am ready to face my electors of Carleton at any time on my view in respect of this particular matter.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: Just who gave him the pension?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking.

Of all the aspects of the speeches that have been made by hon. members from the other side of the house, hon. gentlemen opposite have indulged in more fence straddling over the Coyne memorandum of February 16 than any other aspect. I make no further comment upon the utter impropriety of the release of this rather fantastic document, except to say that this direct and deliberate breach of confidence and privilege is a measure of the reliance which ought to be placed in Mr. Coyne. At times—

Mr. Pearson: Hidden report.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I hear the Leader of the Opposition say "hidden report". The hon. gentleman certainly never at any time when he was a minister of the crown saw to it that there was a release of any report from the governor of the Bank of Canada to any of the ministers of finance with whom he served in the government.

At times, hon. gentlemen opposite seem to want to get into bed with Mr. Coyne and then they want to be divorced rapidly. They are unable to make up their minds. I put this question to the hon. gentlemen who may speak. Do they adopt the Coyne memorandum or do they not? If it had been presented to them, what would they have adopted of its proposals? What would they have done with this memorandum? Let the Leader of the Opposition, great internationalist that he is, say if he would impose at once a 10 per cent surtariff on all goods whether free or dutiable alike. I think his Sifton allies would be interested in the hon. gentleman's comment.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman asked me a question, and the answer is no, I would not.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): So, the hon. gentleman says no. He is now in the clear with his Sifton friends. In order to adopt this particular proposal, we would not only have to denounce GATT but we would have to denounce every trade treaty that this country has entered into under a Liberal government or a Progressive Conservative government. Should we denounce our treaties with the United Kingdom, with the United States, with Australia, and stand alone in the world? Mr. Coyne would have us in a position of magnificent isolation. Not only would we have to denounce our trade treaties, but Mr. Coyne would have us denounce all our tax conventions, terminate all agreements in respect of non-resident withholding taxes and raise the rate to 30 per cent. My hon. friend says, "and without a hearing".

Canada has never had the reputation of being a treaty breaker. I doubt if the country will go along with Mr. Coyne or any of his Liberal allies opposite and give them the opportunity to blacken our international name. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in the budget debate and since, have asserted that tax reductions are a desirable stimulus in times of economic slowdown. What does their erstwhile comrade in arms, Mr. Coyne, say? He advocates an immediate 3 per cent increase in the corporate and income tax. Do my hon. friends adopt that policy? Once you submit the whole of Mr. Coyne's memorandum to critical analysis of this type, you find that obviously it is not all bad and equally obviously it has many features which are totally impractical, some actually mischievous, some so harebrained that it is almost impossible to believe the memorandum was composed by a man who has spent a large part of his life in the field of economics.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I guess "Pick" wrote that too.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, perhaps it was the ex-clerk of the privy council who played a large part in its composition.

I am afraid, sir, that those who read this memorandum carefully and reflect upon its proposals will have portrayed more vividly than any words of mine the problems endured by the Minister of Finance in endeavouring to deal with this governor. By his own words he has depicted his true competence, his prejudice and his recklessness with regard to the consequences of the measures he advocates. He wants higher levels of taxation and, to use his own words, "without apology". The full extent of the increases are difficult to deduce from the memorandum, but it is clear that they are massive. These increases would be particularly substantial in respect of the oil industry and the mining industry. Depletion allowances would be reduced, if not done away with. Regrettable and damaging, sir, would be the consequences to many communities in various parts of Canada.

Mr. Coyne's memorandum displays what I might describe as his morbid dislike, almost hatred, of foreigners. This has permeated all his advice to the government. His recklessness in this respect would lead Canada to the brink of disaster. One might go on examining this fantastic memorandum. I only repeat that out of his own mouth is he condemned. The quality of the advice which he is capable of tendering to any government is here exposed for all to see.

Hon. gentlemen opposite naturally seek to defeat this government. That is their right, indeed that is their obligation and that is the democratic way. What I am totally unable to comprehend, however, is how they can give their support to an attempted coup, a coup d'etat, whereby one public servant, violating every principle and ideal of the public service, seeks to bring down the government and usurp the role of this House of Commons. This is not the Canadian way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what we are trying to do, and you know it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is precisely what hon. gentlemen are trying to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are trying to get the facts.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the reports from the grapevine be true, hon. gentlemen opposite will seek to go behind the backs of the elected representatives and seek to have a few old men in another place serve their particular purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Well, sir, if there is one principle that matters, in my view it is the maintenance and preservation of the integrity of the Bank of Canada in the image which Graham Towers gave it. With an utter disregard for consequences, Mr. Coyne suggested that a new governor would be subverted and his ghostwriter in this house apparently said the new governor would be a "stooge". I say, sir, that words like that work a grave national disservice. Let us all remember that Canada is much greater than any one of us; that all of us will pass from this scene but hope we will leave Canada stronger and more united.

This I know: No man will be appointed to the role of governor of the Bank of Canada by this government who is not a strong, vigorous and experienced person capable of giving to the Bank of Canada real and effective leadership, leadership of the type which has been denied to it in these last years. This government believes in the significant role of the Bank of Canada, and as soon as this parliament disposes of Mr. Coyne, that bank will be placed in the soundest position in which it has been since the days of Graham Towers. To that end, I suggest we direct all our efforts.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary rose, he said, to set the issues in perspective. If that was his purpose, he has failed miserably. He sought to erect a straw man out of tangential issues and has completely ignored the two overriding ones. They are first, fundamental justice, the right of the accused to be heard; and second, government responsibility. The parliamentary secretary said our system is responsible government. May I say that there is nothing responsible about this government. In this case it might be more accurate to say a government lack of responsibility, a government which has never been big enough to take responsibility for the unpleasant. Of course, when things go well, it is thanks to government intervention, but when things go badly, it is the fault of someone else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: This has been true from the very outset.

An hon. Member: Look at the gallery.

Mr. Pearson: All you care about is the gallery.

Mr. Hellyer: I have great sympathy with the gallery. They have had to listen to the limit of their physical endurance to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: First after the government was elected the scapegoat was the Liberals; it was the legacy they were left. Then it was external influences beyond their control, they said, which kept them from running the Canadian economy properly. Now at last it is the governor of the Bank of Canada. Again the government refuses to accept its responsibility and has looked for a scapegoat. It is this insistence on always finding a scapegoat which is so objectionable, Mr. Speaker. This attitude of the government reminds me of a quotation from Morrow:

> Any party which takes credit for the rain must not be surprised if its opponents blame it for the drought.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the government has got itself into a box and has chosen a cheap and, as it hopes, an easy way to lay this blame on the shoulders of someone else. The government has been in constant trouble. The evidence is everywhere. There have been many reports. Here is just a sample. This appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of January 6, 1961 in an article by Mr. Jack McArthur, the financial editor. I quote it in part:

> Painted into a Corner
> Here's where it gets funny.
>
> Mr. Fleming, although he apparently would like to reduce interest rates, has painted himself into a corner.
>
> He has said often and loudly that money policy is a responsibility of the Bank of Canada—and that the federal government has no control over the bank.
>
> He has not even been willing to comment on the central bank's money supply and interest policies.
>
> How can he possibly now try to persuade the Bank of Canada to listen to him? So he and the government must try to run their own private interest rate policy and pretend the Bank of Canada isn't there.
> If that isn't good for a real laugh—and a few tears—then nothing is.

Having been painted into a corner, what is the government to do? The depth of the desperation is shown very clearly by simply comparing the statements of the Minister of Finance in this year's budget with those of last year. This year he proposes as visionary that which last year he said was impossible. One example which has been stated in this house is that of manipulation of the foreign exchange fund. Whereas a year ago he said that it was a speculation with no assurance of success, this year he says rather than by direct government controls, subsidies, quotas or tariffs he would undertake a manipulation which would bring down the exchange rate by indirect methods. Precisely, however, a year ago he said this type of thing would likely lead to direct controls. Now he has made a right angle turn.

This raises a very fundamental question. I was interested in listening to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) this morning. He also seems to be a recent convert. At noon I was reading in Hansard a statement of his where a new policy was being embarked on, and he insisted that the governor of the Bank of Canada be brought to a committee to discuss the issue, that this was in all fairness the only way in which it could be dealt with. Today he takes an entirely different attitude. I remember also, in that same committee at the time the bank act was revised, the hon. gentleman's insisting that some limitation be put on the power of the Bank of Canada to increase the money supply. He it was who feared an irresponsible government. He it was who feared the possibility of some future government starting the printing presses and going into a wild inflation of the Canadian currency. What has happened in the intervening years to change his mind? Was he more visionary then than now? Or was it simply that he could foresee at that time a government of the calibre and lack of responsibility of the present government?

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: What he has said about me at that time is quite true. But will he remember also that at that time I think it was clearly brought out beyond peradventure by the words of the minister of finance and the governor of the bank that if and when a difference of opinion occurred between them it was the duty of the governor of the bank to resign?

Mr. Hellyer: That is quite true. But the government of the day accepted its responsibility and did so promptly. It never tried to hide behind some outside body. I will deal later with what the government could do if it wished to have a machinery which would permit this without the very deplorable situation which has now occurred.

The hon. member for Greenwood of that day would have had grave and serious reservations about the possibilities underlined by the budget of this year. He would want to know what is behind this move. He would want to know the nature and the extent of the alleged obstruction which must be steamrollered out of the way with unseemly haste.

The other fundamental question, Mr. Speaker, is that of fundamental justice. The governor of the bank has been accused of obstructing government policy. The supporting evidence has not been produced. How can this procedure be squared with the bill of rights? I recall July 1, 1960, bill of rights day. The Prime Minister was at his best. The Prime Minister was most eloquent. How our hearts beat with pride and with joy on this great date of bringing in a new era of rights and freedoms for the average Canadian citizen.

Mr. Benidickson: Each individual.

Mr. Hellyer: For an instant he had me convinced that the bill of rights, which I believed in the depth of my heart to be a farce, might in reality be a substantive bill. But where is the bill of rights today? Where are the champions of fundamental rights and human freedoms today?

An hon. Member: In the government.

Mr. Hellyer: To their shame they now applaud tyranny. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue cited a strange doctrine today. If we gave the governor of the Bank of Canada a chance to be heard, he said we would then have to give the same right to every other government employee, to every clerk. What a red herring that is, Mr. Speaker. Civil servants are employees of the government and they have a right of appeal. The governor of the bank, on the other hand, is responsible to the parliament of Canada. If the government wishes to introduce an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act in order to change the relationship between the governor and the government, it has the right to do so. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but if it believes it should be done, it has the responsibility to do so. Many people have made this suggestion. Indeed, perhaps that is the type of bill which should be before the house now instead of the one we have at present. In the meantime, the rule of law must apply. The law states that the governor shall hold office for seven years during good behaviour.

Mr. Woolliams: He has not behaved well.

Mr. Hellyer: The Minister of Finance has not made any categorical accusation of misbehaviour. The accusations are by innuendo; the charges are by inference. If parliament passes this law without hearing the evidence it will be flouting two of its own laws. It will by inference have accused a man of misbehaviour and found him guilty without giving him the benefit of trial. It will also flagrantly disregard the bill of rights, which explicitly denies a statute taking away rights and freedoms which had existed long before the fair weather champions opposite chose to espouse them.

The Secretary of State has stated in his loudest voice that the issue before us today is the issue of the supremacy of parliament. That is not the real issue, Mr. Speaker. There is no question about the supremacy of parliament. The real issue—and it is the same issue embodied in the bill of rights—is the duty and responsibility of parliament not to pass laws taking away from the individual the fundamental right to a fair hearing.

I must oppose this procedure, Mr. Speaker, because I must stand on the principle of the right of a free man to be heard before the court that condemns him.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the latter having priority.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the particular circumstances, I wonder whether we could get unanimous agreement to proceed with order No. 3 on today's order paper under private bills?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry; Bill No. S-2 has been on the order paper for a very long time. There seems no good reason why it should not be proceeded with. I am afraid there is not unanimous consent.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company—Mr Woolliams—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with this, I think the hon. gentleman who replied when I suggested that we get unanimous agreement to proceed with order No. 3 misunderstood our approach. There is a particular reason for getting this bill respecting the Canadian Legion through today. We are not in any way trying to delay the passage of other bills, but owing to particular circumstances I was asked to ask whether unanimous consent could not be given. Unanimous consent has not been given, therefore, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East:

That the house do now revert to item No. 3 as listed under private bills on today's order paper.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might say a word. I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I was going to rule on the motion. I cannot accept it because the house has decided to go into committee of the whole on the first item, which has to do with the Aurora Pipe Line Company. The hon. member will understand, therefore, that the decision which he suggests now is one for the house to make and not the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since I took exception to giving unanimous consent to proceed with the third item on the order paper, perhaps I may be permitted to say a word. It did seem to me that there had been a tendency far too often to pass over some of those contentious measures instead of disposing of them, as in my belief the house should. But if, as the hon. member for Kootenay West says, there is some particular reason for disposing of item No. 3 first, and if it would be understood that the whole hour was not going to be consumed in doing so, I would then be very happy indeed to withdraw any objection I took. If there was no objection in any other quarter of the committee I would be willing to move that we rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again on this bill so that we could carry out the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Woolliams: As sponsor of the bill—

The Chairman: Is the hon. member formally moving his motion?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I think we ought to hear the hon. member who sponsors the bill before we do that.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps I may say this, Mr. Chairman, and I think I can be brief. The export of the substance in reference to the pipe line itself has been approved by the Alberta conservation board and by the Alberta government and, as it means so much to the economy of Alberta, I do sincerely hope that we can proceed with this matter and complete it today.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Regier: No. I move:

That we rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house.

Motion (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 7; nays, 135.

The Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bow River, who is the sponsor of the bill, made some comments during an earlier stage about a motion just dealt with and we have read in the newspapers about the subject matter with respect to which the hon. member for Bow River was talking. Would he be kind enough to give the committee in a formal way at this stage the information which I am sure he has at his fingertips regarding the Alberta gas and oil conservation board?

Mr. Nugent: Would you listen to it if he gave you any information?

Mr. Howard: I would tell the hon. member that I would have more pleasure listening to the hon. member for Bow River than I would to my friend who just made that interjection. I wonder whether the hon. member for Bow River would give the committee in formation in a formal way about the decision which I am led to believe by the newspapers was made recently by the Alberta gas and oil conservation board and also by the Alberta government?

Mr. Woolliams: Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I can say in a few sentences that the application to export condensate and the by-products of gas was approved by the Alberta conservation board which has jurisdiction in that regard in the province of Alberta. The application of the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company was approved and the decision of that board has been approved by the provincial cabinet of Alberta. It is just that simple.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am still concerned about this matter. I realize that the Alberta government is interested in the matter and the people of Alberta obviously have an interest. In the national sense we in the federal parliament also have an interest in the problem. We are also aware, of course, that the national energy board will have to make some decision on the matter of export of gas in the same way as the Alberta gas and oil conservation board did. I should have liked to have a little more information on what the results of this decision will mean to us.

Although the Alberta board may have made a decision on this matter, I would point out that our opposition to the bill originally was twofold. First, we believe that Canadians wherever possible—and certainly in setting up a new company it should be possible—should have control of the company. Second, we believe that industries arising out of the development and processing of the condensate should be established in Canada to encourage the development of secondary industry.

I understand that there has been a change in the plans of the company. Originally it contemplated sending the condensate to Chicago where markets had been arranged on a tentative basis. I understand it is now proposed to serve different markets with these condensates. I should like to know from the sponsor whether this means that the development of secondary industry based on the condensate will be in Canada or just where these industries are going to be located. I presume that the Alberta board was interested in this problem and made a decision on that matter.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to supplant the hon. member for Timiskaming but I had hoped that the hon. member for Bow River would be able to answer this particularly important question. At the initial stages some months ago argument for the passage of the bill was based upon certain markets being in existence. Is it a fact that these markets are not now in existence? Have the markets changed or altered somewhat? Will the products to be shipped by Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company and by Aurora Pipe Line Company as is contemplated be sent to markets somewhere else? Has there been an alteration? I think these are very important questions especially in view of the desire of everyone in the house to promote the development of industry in Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: I certainly want to co-operate in every way and I can only say that when my good friend from Macleod had another bill with reference to a railway line before the house he pointed out that the same by-products were being exported to the United States. Condensate, of course, is a high form of crude petroleum. As I pointed out, it is a surplus commodity in the province of Alberta and it is a case of exporting it. The fact is that we have a surplus in the province of Alberta. The hon. member for Skeena will appreciate that those are the points that will come before the national energy board and will be ironed out at that time on the basis of proper evidence. There is no doubt that if this pipe line is allowed to proceed export will be to a different part of the United States from that mentioned earlier. This is a surplus commodity. It is a by-product of natural gas. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, we have a reserve in the province of Alberta of some 23 trillion cubic feet and the demand in Canada, even projecting, would amount to about only 10 billion cubic feet per year. It is a surplus commodity as are beef from the foothills of the Rockies and wheat as I have said on previous occasions. It is a commodity to be exported by a pipe line. As I pointed out on previous occasions, in order to export it across an interprovincial or international border it is necessary to form a special company. That was why Hudson Bay Oil and Gas came here to parliament. As a matter of law, we had to come to parliament to ask for incorporation.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one question of the sponsor? Is the sponsor of this bill in a position to give any guarantee to the committee that the majority of the directors of the subsidiary of Hudson Bay will be Canadian citizens?

Mr. Woolliams: I am very happy to answer that question. I can give that undertaking. The directors of Hudson Bay and the directors of Hudson Bay Oil and Gas have given an undertaking, which I am certainly willing to give today to this committee. I appreciate that fair question put to me by the hon. member.

Mr. Broome: I am pleased with the announcement the hon. member has just made. However, I am still opposed to this bill and I shall vote against it. I hope it does come to a vote. I particularly resent the management of the company stating how Canadian they are in their outlook when they offer $28 million-plus of bonds to the Canadian people and suggest this is the proper way for the Canadian public to participate in their operations, and yet they are content to have something like less than 3 per cent equity stock ownership in Canada. I hope we never have another company come to this parliament with that philosophy behind them, because if they do they will run into hot water.

Mr. Kindt: I wish to speak for only one minute. The last time this bill was before the committee, I rose in my place and tried to present to this committee the importance of this measure in respect of the industrial development of western Canada. There is today a new Shell Oil plant under construction some 14 miles south of Pincher Creek. This plant is drawing from a number of gas wells in that area. When that gas is processed some of the by-products will be ethane, methane, propane, butane and hydrogen sulphide. Certain of these by-products are a drug on the market. We have such an abundance of them that we must export them. The only alternative is to touch a match to the gas and have it flaring out of a pipe extended into the air. I would rather have these by-products exported than see the gas burnt and wasted.

I wish to close by saying that now that the directors are to be Canadian, as announced by the hon. member for Bow River, I shall support this bill right down the line.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Provisional directors.

Mr. Howard: In looking at the way this clause is worded and comparing it with other private bills, and after talking to members of the legal profession, it seems to me that there is a difference between the words "first" as used here in relation to the persons named as directors, and the word "provisional" as used in other bills. The members of the legal profession tell me that the word "first" does not make much sense in law and that the word "provisional" is the proper word to use. I see you shaking your head, Mr. Chairman, and I do not know whether you are agreeing or disagreeing with what I am saying or whether you are indicating I am not in order.

The Chairman: The hon. member is in order.

Mr. Howard: Since the word "provisional" is used in the marginal notes, I would think that the word "provisional" would be more properly used in the clause itself. I just put that thought forward, and perhaps the hon. member for Bow River or others would desire to say something about it. Perhaps the word "provisional" would be better understood than the word "first" if a problem ever arose. I may have been misinformed as to the use of these two words.

Mr. Woolliams: I am happy to answer that question, I think it is a fair one. When you are incorporating companies that do not have to come to parliament, you always have provisional directors. They are the original promoters or organizers of the company. They are called provisional directors. Actually, these terms are synonymous. The term "first directors" is used as I understand it from legal counsel who drafted the bill for the company, and this is the form that was used on other occasions. I think I am right on that point. However, I believe the terms are synonymous. The point is well taken. I think the legal advice the hon. member for Skeena has received was probably correct. Provisional directors exist in all companies where the company is to be a provincial company or where you get leave of the Secretary of State to form a company. In this case, the first directors are the provisional directors of the company. These first directors are the directors who take over and organize the company if it is granted incorporation by parliament.

Mr. Howard: I do not wish to belabour the point, Mr. Chairman, but I would point out with respect to Bill No. S-16, sponsored by the hon. member for Davenport, which is one that parliament dealt with a short time ago, the word "provisional" is used in clause 2. The clause states that the persons named in section 1 shall be the provisional directors. I only mention this because I would not wish to see any great difficulties caused in the future as a result of the use of this word. If, in fact, "first" means "provisional" and the gentlemen mentioned in clause 1 of the bill are only the provisional officers engaged in the mechanical operation of forming the company and the shareholders will then elect their own directors, then that is quite acceptable.

In so far as the directors of the company subsequent to the first or provisional ones are concerned, I am assuming that they will be Canadian citizens as a result of the reply of the sponsor of the bill to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver East. In my opinion, this should not be left to chance, as it were. If we are concerned about this sort of thing, perhaps we should take a more direct approach to it rather than, as I say, leaving it up in the air. I am not, however, doubting the word of the hon. member for Bow River. If we are establishing Canadian companies in Canada, with this concept of Canadian control, I wonder if the hon. member for Bow River has any suggestions for approaching that problem more directly than is done in clause 2?

Mr. Woolliams: All I can say by way of reply is that this is the form used in previous bills incorporating pipe lines. It is a point to consider. The original or first directors are set out in the clause and they, as I have said, are the first directors of the company. I have given one of the hon. member's colleagues an undertaking that the company will be manned by Canadian directors.

Mr. Peters: I have appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River so far. He is being more co-operative and not at all like his previous self. I am pleased also with the remarks he has made in respect of these directors. This answers some of the problems we have had in mind in reconciling the sale of these refinery products in the export market. It seems that this is part of the problem connected with the lack of secondary industries in Canada. If the directors of this company are Canadians, then this probably would eliminate many of the doubts we have as to whether or not these vital natural resources are going to be used to the advantage of the Canadian economy. With that thought in mind I should like to move the following amendment:

That clause 2 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause to be numbered 2:

"All of the directors of the company shall at all times be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada."

Amendment agreed to: Yeas, 55; nays, nil.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment carried.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Regier: I wish to assure the committee that I intend to take only half a minute. However, I feel that it is a bit of a contempt of parliament for the Alberta energy board to have taken the measures it has taken and also for the cabinet of the government of Alberta to have taken the measures it has taken in this regard before allowing the parliament of Canada to reach a decision. They have given all the rights to the parent company even though, I will admit, they have not dealt with the Aurora Pipe Line Company as such. However, they were completely aware of the implications of their actions. They were also aware of the fact that this matter was before the House of Commons at the time they made their decision. I do not know whether there is any proper procedure but I would say that the Alberta energy board and the Alberta government are guilty of being in contempt of this House of Commons because they took action which completely nullified any decision that we may make either one way or the other.

Mr. Howard: I should like to follow along with that line of reasoning very briefly, Mr. Chairman. You will recall that, at previous stages of discussion of this bill, numerous arguments were made that what parliament should do is merely to pass the bill without question or discussion because we have a national energy board, because it was established by parliament because it had certain functions and responsibilities and so on. It was argued that we should therefore entirely give up the right to make a determination of these matters to a board which has been established by parliament.

As you will know, Mr. Chairman, we objected to that line of reasoning as not being valid. What the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has just said, in my opinion, has even more force than our argument previously because the board that made the decision in this regard is not a board that has any responsibility to the parliament of Canada. It is one established by the legislative assembly of the province of Alberta and the provincial government is involved in that particular decision.

It is true, of course, that the government of Alberta cannot grant licences for or deal with exportation to another country or to another province. Here the national energy board comes into the picture. However, I think the Alberta gas and oil conservation board is perhaps not entirely to blame in this regard, but rather that Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company has acted a bit contemptuously also, knowing full well that as the promoter or parent company of Aurora Pipe Line Company, it had applied or petitioned for a private bill to establish this company. Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company also knew full well that the matter had not been dealt with by parliament. Yet at the same time as this legislative action was not completed it proceeded, as I say in a contemptuous way for the feelings of parliament, to make applications and to process those applications before the Alberta conservation board, without having any statutory approval of the particular company which it was fostering and promoting.

It is a bit contemptuous of and a bit of an affront to parliament for a private company so to petition, to plead and to argue for the establishment or the incorporation of a certain company to do certain things and then, without regard to what decision parliament might make, to proceed on its own hook to get authority from other sources to do some of the things with which Aurora Pipe Line Company will be connected.

It would seem to me that parliament should concern itself more with the activities of private companies, especially those controlled in the United States, as is Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company and as this company will be. Parliament should concern itself with the activities of those companies especially when they are handled in this particular manner, especially when a petition is made to incorporate a particular company because the law requires it—that is to say, the National Energy Board Act requires it—and then by the back door they go somewhere else and proceed just as if parliament had endorsed and authorized the establishment of this particular company.

On that basis alone I would be inclined to object to the passage of the bill and to vote against it regardless of the merits that exist for voting against it in the field of international control. I think it should not go unnoticed that Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company have acted in this way, as is probably typical of companies of this type controlled by what the Prime Minister referred to, generously or ungenerously, as Texas buccaneers. I think that this is an indication of the manner in which they are wont to operate and I do not think that parliament should let it go unnoticed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Woolliams moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just before the motion is put to the house, may I say this. I have no intention of dragging the house through the formal procedure of a division, but I merely wish to place on record that I intend to vote against the incorporation of this particular company for the variety of reasons we have given in the past and particularly because of the contempt with which Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company seems to treat the people and natural resources of this nation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Howard: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion (Mr. Woolliams) agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

Mr. W. G. Beech (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could proceed with item No. 3 on the agenda, the bill respecting the Canadian Legion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): It seems very strange to me that the hon. member should now ask to proceed with this item when he voted against proceeding with it a while ago.

Mr. Peters: He voted against proceeding with it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South suggests that we take item No. 3 before item No. 2. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN LEGION

The house in committee on Bill No. S-23, respecting the Canadian Legion—Mr. Beech —Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. Herridge: If we have the time, Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say that this amendment is intended to recognize 35 years of service on the part of the Canadian Legion to veterans, their dependents and communities across Canada. This work has been carried on through their branches and their councils in dominion and provincial commands. The results are seen in the veterans charter, amendments thereto and the multitude of community projects undertaken by the Canadian Legion. Their good work has been supported by numerous ladies' auxiliaries. I might say on behalf of this group that we are very pleased to see this amending bill pass this afternoon.

Mr. Benidickson: I simply wish to say with respect to this bill, Mr. Chairman, that it is true it could have come before the committee last week. In the hour devoted to legislation of this type I took up some time of the house to emphasize the importance of the legislation with which we were then dealing.

Some hon. members of the committee have wondered why I did not take a stand on the original motion during private members' hour today consistent with the majority of the members of my party. First of all I would say we are dealing with private legislation and no responsibility exists, as far as I know, for party solidarity. Second, I wanted further information with respect to the decision of the energy board of the province of Alberta on the other bill. However, I wish to say that last week I had no intention whatsoever of delaying the progress of this bill relating to the Canadian Legion. On the contrary, in the veterans affairs committee I have given evidence of my interest in advancing the activities of this association.

Mr. Winch: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Benidickson: In view of what I have heard behind the scenes concerning my remarks last week on another bill of consequence I might say I felt obliged to vote as I did. If I may say so, I did this with the full indulgence of my leader. We are anxious to expedite the passing of the Canadian Legion bill.

THE CUMBERLAND RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY AND THE SYDNEY AND LOUISBURG RAILWAY COMPANY

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. S-19, respecting The Cumberland Railway and Coal Company and the Sydney and Louisburg Railway Company (Without amendment)—Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would consider going on with Bill No. S-19, or is it contentious?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: Will this bill take only a few minutes?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It is not quite six o'clock. I think the motion should not be put in the absence of unanimous consent.

Mr. Churchill: Was unanimous consent not given?

Mr. Speaker: I think not. There was objection on my left.

Mr. Crouse: Would you please tell us who was objecting, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of the bill is not here. I think it requires more examination than could be given to it in a minute. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) wants the rules adhered to.

Mr. Benidickson: There was not unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour for consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the order of business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada. Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may we call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

On clause 1—Office of governor deemed vacant.

Mr. Pearson: We are now in committee stage on this short but very important bill which deals with the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada and which states that it shall be deemed to have become vacant "immediately upon the coming into force of this act". That is all, but that is a lot.

In the first place, I should like to point out, in contradiction to some of the things which were said about this office of governor this afternoon, that the governor of the Bank of Canada is not a civil servant. A lot of the argument which was based on that this afternoon has, of course, no validity at all. I should also like to point out that this bill, in a sense, though in a very wrong sense, does represent an acceptance by the government of some responsibility, if not for monetary policy, then at least for the governor of the Bank of Canada. This afternoon we heard an extraordinary statement from the Secretary of State—extraordinary in relation to the statements we have heard from the Minister of Finance—that the government does, indeed, have responsibility for monetary policy and, in that sense, for the governor of the Bank of Canada whose office is to be vacated as a result of this bill. I say this was a most extraordinary statement because it has been denied vehemently and repeatedly by the Minister of Finance. Perhaps those two ministers might get together in the interest of cabinet solidarity and decide what is the position of the government in this vital matter.

In committee we can ask some questions. I know this is a procedure which is deprecated by the hon. member for Edmonton West who objected to having this matter sent to a committee—not, of course, to the committee of the whole, but to a committee—because it would mean that "the bully boys of the Liberal party," which I think was the expression he used, would ask questions. To him it was a terrible thing that the masses of Tories in committee were going to be overridden by the bully boys in the Liberal party, so little confidence has he, apparently, in the ability of the majority to take care of itself.

We are in committee now. I can assure the hon. member for Edmonton West we have no Machiavellian purpose in the questioning we intend to put to the minister. As a matter of fact, the hon. member carried Machiavellianism to absurd lengths this afternoon when he said this whole business which is now before us, this bill in committee, was nothing less than a subtle plot on the part of the Liberals to get rid of Mr. Coyne. That is a new interpretation of this issue. Mr. Coyne offended us, presumably, in the elections of 1957 and 1958 so we are getting rid of Mr. Coyne by luring him into this situation. That, Mr. Chairman, is something very new indeed, and in its absurdity it is only equalled by some of the statements the hon. member for Carleton made this afternoon.

On March 21, 1957, the hon. member for Eglinton—he was not then minister of finance—had this to say as reported in Hansard at page 2557:

—the Minister of Finance, so far as we are concerned—

He is speaking of the minister of finance of that day. The hon. member was talking about the Bank of Canada matters.

—is not going to hide behind the policy of the Bank of Canada. He is going to bear his own responsibility.

Well, the present Minister of Finance is going to bear his own responsibility in this matter today and we intend to examine him on this very short bill in a way which I hope will elicit or bring to light some of the issues in this matter which have not been brought to light so far, so that we may be enlightened with regard to some matters about which we have only had partial, subjective and prejudiced evidence. We are, of course, within our rights in cross-examining the minister on all aspects of this bill which is designed to vacate the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada. It would, of course, have been much easier, much more effective in every way, besides being fairer to the government and to the governor of the Bank of Canada if this matter could have been submitted to the kind of committee where all those concerned might have been questioned. That is not possible, but we have at least the opportunity in committee of the whole to question the minister himself. The minister will not, of course, object to that, because he himself invited it, and in order to anticipate any difficulty which might conceivably arise in the hours ahead I should like to put on record the words of the minister on this point as reported at page 7096 of Hansard of June 26. The hon. member for Timmins was speaking, and had this to say:

The Minister of Finance said that parliament must decide, but we must decide in the dark; we must decide blindly; we must decide just on the statement of the minister. We are not allowed even to get the minister before a committee where he can be cross-examined.

Then the minister replied:

Yes; you will have the committee of the whole after second reading—

For cross-examination, and that, of course, Mr. Chairman, is what we propose to do.

Mr. Benidickson: That is our present position.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is adding some words; he should not be attributing all the words to me.

Mr. Pearson: I am quoting exactly what the minister said at page 7096 of Hansard:

Yes; you will have the committee of the whole after second reading.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member added the words "for cross-examination".

Mr. Pearson: Well, the hon. member for Timmins said:

We are not allowed even to get the minister before a committee where he can be cross-examined.

The Minister of Finance said:

Yes; you will have the committee of the whole after second reading.

For what purpose did the Minister of Finance think we were going to have the committee of the whole after second reading except that of the cross-examination referred to by the hon. member for Timmins.

Mr. Benidickson: Just one-sided.

Mr. Pearson: It is, of course, a one-sided examination but we shall do the best we can with it in the absence of other witnesses who might be able to throw some light on these matters.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this matter was first brought into the House of Commons on June 14 as found at page 6326 of Hansard. The Minister of Justice intervened at that time and had this to say:

Legislation to amend the Bank of Canada Act itself will be introduced shortly.

That was a plain and categorical statement but like so many statements which come from hon. members on the treasury benches, it had no foundation whatever in fact because this is not legislation to amend the Bank of Canada Act which the Minister of Justice said would be introduced shortly. It is not even legislation which had been introduced shortly. If the government had been anxious to clear up this matter quickly they would have introduced this legislation at once; they would have allowed it to go before a committee. It could have been dealt with in committee; it could have been brought up and dealt with on third reading and the matter would have been cleared up one way or the other. That was not done. It has been allowed to drag on. On June 14 the Minister of Justice said that legislation to amend the Bank of Canada Act itself would be introduced shortly. We have not got that, and apparently there was never an attempt to do that. That was just an argument made by the Minister of Justice. The legislation we have is merely this:

The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

I repeat "shall be deemed to have become vacant". This is an office not of a civil servant but of a high public official appointed not at pleasure but for good conduct, which office will be deemed to have become vacant by an act of parliament, if it is passed by parliament.

There are lawyers who have already said that an office which has been vacated in this way by an act of parliament can be filled only by an act of parliament. I leave the lawyers to argue that and perhaps we shall have some argument on it before the evening is over. But I ask the government and the minister why the Bank of Canada Act itself was not amended to deal with this matter, as the Minister of Justice said it would be? Why was it done in this way? If this crisis had to arise—and it did not have to arise but the government assured that it did arise—if this situation had to be dealt with by legislation—and the government again assured that it had to be dealt with by legislation—why was not advantage taken of this unhappy opportunity to amend the Bank of Canada Act so that a situation of this kind could not arise in the future? That was not done. The government preferred to operate in this other way.

Why was our Bank of Canada Act not brought into conformity with the bank of England act under which a situation of this kind could not arise? There the minister of finance, or the chancellor of the exchequer, who is responsible in this area of policy, may, in a dispute with the governor of the bank of England, impose his views on the government of the day on monetary policy in writing, and if the governor of the bank of England disagrees and there is no way of resolving that disagreement, he resigns in writing and his resignation can become the subject of public and parliamentary information and discussion.

In this situation the responsibility for monetary policy is firmly fixed on the government, as the Secretary of State said this afternoon it should be fixed on the government, and as the Minister of Finance said yesterday it was not fixed on the government. The governor of the Bank of Canada who is being thrown out of his jobs by this bill without a hearing before the parliament which is throwing him out of his job has written, "the bank"—that is, the Bank of Canada—"must take into consideration any views on monetary policy expressed by the government and in the event of a sufficiently serious difference of opinion on a matter of an important point of policy it would be the duty of the governor to resign". That, of course, is a doctrine we accepted long before the present government paid even lip service to it, but in this case, Mr. Chairman, the governor of the Bank of Canada denied that there is the kind of dispute that justifies this type of legislation. He asks for evidence to refute the statements he has made. He asks for a hearing before this kind of legislation is passed.

The idea expressed by the governor of the Bank of Canada, which is the idea we have expressed in this house, is a sound one and embodying this idea—and this might have been done at this time to avoid this kind of unhappy crisis in the future—the bank of England act reads, and I quote section 4(1):

The treasury may from time to time give such directions to the bank as, after consultation with the governor of the bank, they think necessary in the public interest.

Does the minister accept that as the responsibility of the government? He does not; the Secretary of State does.

Section 4(2) reads:

Subject to any such directions, the affairs of the bank shall be managed by the board of directors in accordance with such provisions (if any) in that behalf as may be continued in any charter of the bank for the time being in force and any bylaws made thereunder.

Instead of that kind of approach to this situation, when the government by its policy and by its tactics made such a situation inevitable, the government preferred to bring in the kind of bill we have before us. They preferred to declare this office vacant, by this bill and to discharge a high public official who holds office not at pleasure. I heard the hon. member for Carleton this afternoon try to assimilate the position of the governor of the Bank of Canada with a military officer who might be discharged in wartime. Of all the fantastic comparisons that probably is the most ridiculous that has been made in this house for many years. No doubt he brought that particular military officer into his argument because that officer ran once as a Liberal candidate. But the idea that a public official such as the governor of the Bank of Canada holding his office on good behaviour should be assimilated to a military officer who should be discharged if he defaults in his duty in wartime, not by parliament but by the army or by the Department of National Defence, is just as ridiculous as the idea that a civil servant who has a protection, who has an appeal against injustice on dismissal should be assimilated with an official such as the governor of the Bank of Canada who holds his office on good behaviour, just as a judge holds his office on good behaviour and not as a deputy minister who holds his office at pleasure.

If you are to discharge by act of parliament as we are doing in this bill an official like the governor who holds his office on good behaviour, surely, Mr. Chairman, there must be evidence of misconduct to justify this kind of parliamentary action and the man who is charged with misconduct must surely be given a chance to defend himself before a committee of the parliament which is being asked to throw him out of his job. That is simple, elementary justice, and that is the issue in this bill. That justice has been denied to the governor whose office is being vacated by this bill and it is being denied without evidence having been brought forward to support the government's contention that there has been a fundamental difference of opinion between the governor and the government over all these years, a fundamental difference of policy discovered in the last month or two by the Minister of Finance who over the years before had been defending this governor against criticism from this side.

The Minister of Finance said in this house on February 21, as found at page 2266 of Hansard:

> Since this government came into office there has never been the slightest interference with the bank's monetary policy.

This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Carleton say that over all these years the governor of the bank has been frustrating the economic, fiscal and other policies of the government, including monetary policies, and in spite of all that the Minister of Finance says, "Since this government came into office there has never been the slightest interference with the bank's monetary policy". Why this sudden interference on May 30 to the extent of asking the governor of the bank to resign without an opportunity to appear before a committee of the House of Commons which is being asked by legislation to throw him out of his job?

On February 21, 1961, the minister said in the same debate, as found at page 2257 of Hansard, that the government's position regarding the Bank of Canada is comparable to that with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and that the government must keep its hands off the latter. That was the minister's doctrine of non-interference until May 30, 1961. What happened then? We hope during this committee hearing to have some light thrown on what happened then. We were told again this afternoon that it was a question of irreconcilability in regard to questions of fiscal and monetary policies. We did not hear anything about this until the last two or three weeks, and in the charges which have been levelled by the minister in the last two or three weeks against the governor of the Bank of Canada, charges which we asked to be brought before a committee of this house so that all parties could deal with them, and some of which were mentioned this afternoon, there is one major and specific charge levelled by the minister against the governor of the bank which might, if it could be substantiated, justify the government in asking for the governor's resignation. Here is the charge that was made by the Minister of Finance the other day:

> That request—

This was the request made in 1957-58.

> —which was designed by the government to ease tight money—

This is an important charge, an important accusation.

> —was rejected by the governor firmly and angrily.

Let the minister, before this committee hearing is over, give us some evidence to support those words because we have no evidence. He has given us no evidence yet. On the contrary, on February 14, 1958, this was denied by the minister. I put these words on Hansard the other day and they bear repeating in respect of this one concrete, serious charge that the governor of the Bank of Canada rejected firmly and angrily a request from the government designed to ease tight money. On that point the Minister of Finance had this to say on February 14, 1958:

> Money is more plentiful, credit is somewhat easier and interest rates have been reduced to a remarkable extent in recent months.

Let the minister reconcile that statement with his charges levelled against the governor of the Bank of Canada, the main charge in his indictment which asks the House of Commons, because of that major charge, to pass an act of parliament, without referring it to a committee, to throw the governor of the Bank of Canada out of his job.

Then there is the general charge which the minister repeated so often, and I quote it from page 6314 of Hansard, that the governor had "a rigid attitude on the maintenance of high interest rates". The minister has spent a lot of time in this house defending the governor and defending the government against our charge that there were high interest rates and trying to prove as recently as last February that those interest rates were lower than comparable rates in the United States and in the United Kingdom. Now he accuses the governor of the Bank of Canada of a rigid attitude on the maintenance of high interest rates.

Then, of course, we come to another clause in the indictment which has brought this bill before us, that the governor made speeches. That has been dealt with pretty effectively this afternoon. I will come back to the speeches a little later.

As far as interest rates are concerned, the minister said in February of this year, as found at page 2267 of Hansard, in an effort to exonerate the government and, indeed, to exonerate the governor from this charge of high interest rates:

> Interest rates are determined ... in this free economy in the light of thousands of transactions. It is a matter of the operation of the forces of supply and demand within quite limited statutory restrictions.

When the minister was specifically asked by the hon. member for Welland a couple of weeks ago, as found at page 6812 of Hansard, whether he had ever asked the governor to increase the money supply or to reduce interest rates he refused to reply. He said that was confidential information. We must not be told anything about that. Perhaps he will say something about that tonight.

We have also not only the minister's silence on this matter, not only the minister's contradiction of himself on this matter, but we have this sweeping denial of these charges by the governor in his statement of June 15 in which he said:

> I repeat again that at no time has the Minister of Finance criticized or expressed a difference of opinion with the monetary policy being pursued by the Bank of Canada which, the bank and its board of directors were entitled to assume, carried the tacit approval of the government.

Over all these years the governor of the bank and the directors of the bank carried on and the only criticism the bank received on its monetary policy was from this side. The minister defended the bank and the bank had every right to assume that its policy was in consonance with the policy of the government. Then suddenly on May 30 the governor has to resign.

[Mr. Pearson.]

If the Minister of Finance now states that Mr. Coyne would not follow expansionist money policies, that he would not follow the expansionist money policies of this recent budget which provided for $65 million of tax reduction for expansion, how does he explain his statement on February 21 as found at page 2265 of Hansard? These are all questions which I expect the minister to deal with in the course of this committee discussion. How does he explain his statement on that date about the increase of the money supply in 1960 over 1959? How does he explain this statement, as recorded at page 2266 of Hansard for February 21, 1961:

> The figure at December 31, 1960, is by far the largest on record and it is 5.5 per cent higher than the corresponding figure at the end of 1959.

Was the minister sincere? Was he telling the truth when he made that statement? If so, that means there was no disagreement between the governor and the government on the level of the money supply at least until February 21, 1961. What happened after that time? When the minister, according to his remarks reported at page 2267 of Hansard, defended the adequacy of interest rates and said that they were lower in Canada than in the United Kingdom and close to those of the United States, was he sincere? Was he telling the truth? If so, Mr. Chairman, there was no disagreement between the government and the governor on interest rates until after February 21, 1961.

When the minister, at page 2268, denied that the Bank of Canada had subordinated monetary policy to the interest of debt management, and when he defended the debt management policy of the government, including the conversion loan, was he sincere then? Was he telling the truth? If the answer is yes, then there was no disagreement between the government and the governor on the relations between debt management and monetary policy or on debt management policy itself. All of these things were fine in February of this year when we debated this matter. What has happened since that time to make the minister so drastically change his mind in regard to the policy of the governor of the bank that he had to throw him out of his job by an act of parliament without giving the governor a chance to be heard by a committee of this house?

When the Minister of Finance said a little earlier last year, on March 31, 1960, as reported at page 2673 of Hansard, that to contain inflationary pressures the government had reduced its borrowings and held a firm check on the expansion of government expenditures, was that in opposition to Mr.

Coyne's views? Did the government disapprove of the fact that the bank increased the money supply between April and October, 1958 to help the conversion loan?

Then, Mr. Chairman, leaving the minister for a moment, to expose the hollow hypocrisy of this present attack on the governor, let us look at the Prime Minister's remarks on the "Nation's Business" on October 8, 1959, at a time when hon. gentlemen opposite tell us now the difference between the governor and the government had become irreconcilable. Having stated at that time that the economic climate had changed from one of recession to one of dynamic recovery, phenomenal economic recovery, the Prime Minister went on to say that this made money harder and more costly than heretofore; that interest rates had materially increased because the commercial banks had restricted their lending operations. Did he blame this on the governor of the bank or Bank of Canada? He blamed it then on the commercial banks.

Then, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> In the first year after the government took office, there was a significant increase in the money supply in Canada. We were fighting recession.

This was the very year, that first year after he took office, that the Minister of Finance now tries to tell us he asked the governor of the Bank of Canada to increase the money supply and was firmly and angrily rejected by the governor of the bank. This is the main clause in his indictment against this governor whom he would now throw out of office without a chance of being heard before the banking and commerce committee of this house so that the governor could give his version of some of these statements.

The Prime Minister went on, in boasting about what the government had done to fight the recession by increasing the money supply, to say that it is the Bank of Canada, not the government that controls the money supply in Canada. From the end of June, 1957 until October 1, 1959, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance boasted that the money supply in chartered bank accounts had gone up from $11.5 billion to $13 billion and that in the past year the money supply had remained comparatively stable as a bulwark against inflation. Does that look as though the government were opposed to the policy of the Bank of Canada? The whole thing, Mr. Chairman, is arrant hypocrisy got together these last few weeks to buttress a case levelled against the governor of the Bank of Canada for some other reason, and to conceal the government's own confusion and their own ineptitude in the face of economic problems that were mounting.

There is no misconduct that can be levelled against the governor of the Bank of Canada who can be removed only for misconduct in monetary policy. Has there been any misconduct in what he has been saying in the last few years? If so would that justify his removal from office? Well, there was a meeting between the governor and the minister on March 18. We have heard quite a bit about that. At that meeting I believe the deputy minister of finance was present. I should like to ask the minister—and no doubt he will give us the information when he comes to reply to these questions—what were the subjects discussed during this meeting, other than the public speeches made by the governor? We know that the public speeches made by the governor were discussed. I ask the minister, did he personally object at that time to these speeches or did he make representations on behalf of his colleagues? What were those representations, and was this the first occasion, in March, 1961, that the Minister of Finance, either on his own behalf or on behalf of his colleagues, took exception to the speeches made by the governor of the Bank of Canada?

At page 6352 of Hansard for June 14, the minister is reported as saying:

> I have been told by certain members of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, to whom the governor is in a certain sense responsible, that some of them had given him warnings about these speeches.

I wonder if the minister would mind elaborating on that a little bit? He had been told by some directors that they had been warning the governor about his speeches. In March, then, he told the governor to make no more speeches of this kind, after the governor had been speaking for some years on these subjects and certainly since 1959 and at a time when those speeches were questioned in this House of Commons by the opposition and not a word of criticism came from the government. There was nothing but a defence of the right of this man to make these speeches. Now, the minister has the effrontery to put this forward as one of the reasons why the governor should be thrown out of his job without a chance to be heard in his own defence before a committee of this house.

When the minister defended the right of the governor to make public speeches, as he did in February of this year, on the ground that Mr. Coyne was a citizen of a free country and the minister had no right of censorship, was the minister sincere at that time? Was he telling us the truth? If he was, Mr. Chairman, that means that until February 21, 1961 at least, the governor's speeches were not an issue. Why did they become an issue after February 21? Since on February 21, 1961 the minister had told the house he had no right of censorship over the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada, when and why did he change his mind about this right of censorship which he repudiated a few short months ago? Since the minister now claims he had been for a long time of the opinion that these speeches were putting the government in an embarrassing position and that the bank was becoming a centre of political controversy, why did the minister wait until March, 1961 to raise the issue with the governor?

Having raised the issue on March 18, did the governor agree to remain silent and not make any more speeches? When the governor acepted the minister's request on March 18, could the minister expect from the governor any more than that? Did he not feel that the issue had been satisfactorily settled? If so, why did he drag it up on May 30 along with the pension? There are a good many other things we want to bring up in this committee discussion, Mr. Chairman. One is the relationship of the directors, not only to the governor over this issue but the relationship of the directors to the minister, and the contact that they had with the minister. It is quite clear that all contacts, and all communications, effective consultation and communication between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the minister, had disappeared over the years. I admit that it was an impossible arrangement. However, I believe that the minister had more to do with that responsibility and with that negative relationship, than had the governor himself.

But while that relationship did not exist between the governor and the minister, apparently a very close relationship existed between some of the directors of the board and the minister and perhaps the minister will explain that kind of relationship. But that kind of relationship was not close enough, so we are told now by the minister, to inform the minister that this Tory board of directors voted an increased pension to the governor of the Bank of Canada in February, 1960.

Under a pension committee headed by Mr. Bryden who had been working on this subject for a long time or for some months, this Tory subcommittee and this Tory board voted this increased pension to the governor of the Bank of Canada in February, 1960. Yet the minister now tells us he heard nothing about it until the spring of 1961. That is a shocking state of affairs. The assistant deputy minister was at the meeting of the board when the pensions were increased by this Tory board of directors. The deputy minister was at the next meeting when the minutes of the previous meeting were read out. The assistant deputy minister knew about it. The deputy minister knew about it. But the minister tells us he did not know about it.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister was not reading the minutes.

Mr. Pearson: Not knowing about it until the spring of 1961, on May 30, he raised this matter as one of the reasons why the governor of the Bank of Canada should immediately resign. And so the story goes, Mr. Chairman. There are a great many points we hope to raise during this committee discussion.

Mr. Drysdale: What about the oath of secrecy?

Mr. Pearson: Someone says "What about the oath of secrecy?" The minister has referred to many of these discussions in the House of Commons. This is the House of Commons. This House of Commons is being asked to take action by legislation to throw a man out of his job; I refer to the governor of the Bank of Canada. We have a right to find out what is behind this action and to get all the information. The minister himself says the House of Commons is a court of appeal. We have not only a right but a duty to get this information. We should have been very glad indeed if this matter could have been sent to a committee where it could have been gone into in great detail, where the witnesses could have been called. In the light of the report of that committee the House of Commons could then have been asked to take action. That committee, that evidence and that investigation are as much the right of the government as the governor of the Bank of Canada. Why is it that the government has flatly refused to allow this kind of investigation? What has it to hide? What has it to conceal?

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister is vulnerable.

Mr. Pearson: We are now in committee of the whole. In this committee of the whole the minister has invited cross-examination. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that he is going to get it.

Mr. Regier: Before the minister replies to the Leader of the Opposition I should like to ask him to include in his reply an answer to what appears to me to be a rather important matter. From the budget papers or the budget we have learned that the minister this year will have to apply to the money market of Canada for an amount in excess of $2 billion. This is to cover his ordinary operating loss as a result, as I have indicated previously, of poor housekeeping in an amount of, as he put it, between $600 million and $700 million. This amount includes also hundreds of millions of dollars or almost a billion dollars in advances to the industrial development bank, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the unemployment insurance commission, the Canadian National Railways and the like. In addition, I understand there is about $1 billion of indebtedness of the government that is falling due within the current fiscal year.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the exchange?

Mr. Regier: In other words, as I add it up, the minister will have to appeal on the money market for an amount that equals roughly—

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Regier: —a third of the budget of the minister, a little over $2 billion.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member is inaccurate and out of order.

Mr. Regier: No; I am not inaccurate. I am only quoting back the actual statistics supplied to the house by the minister—

Mr. Benidickson: Just think of the gamble on the exchange fund.

Mr. Regier: —in his papers and in the speech he made. The parliamentary secretary will not deny that the minister admitted he was going to have an operating deficit of between $600 million and $700 million. The reports indicate that he will need $1 billion in order to meet the obligations of this government that are falling due in this fiscal year.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is dealing with matters which are not pertinent at all to the bill before the committee.

Mr. Regier: Speaking on the point of order, may I say this. I have now asserted that the minister will have these needs for the current fiscal year. What I should like to know is this. Have these needs been discussed with the governor of the Bank of Canada, the man most involved in meeting these needs of the government of the day? Is it possible that the governor of the Bank of Canada opposed the measures recommended by the government in order to meet this horrible obligation we are now facing in our national financial affairs?

Mr. Benidickson: The government did not dare present this bill to him.

Mr. Regier: I should like to know what advice the governor of the Bank of Canada gave to the government as to how to get itself out of this horrible mess. Is this maybe not the basic reason why the governor's head must now roll?

The minister has carefully avoided informing the Canadian people how he is intending to meet this unusual and unprecedented need of his. This need has not been exceeded by either the emergency of wartime or even the emergency caused by the bond conversion. This is a most exceptional need that the government has brought us to. Has this need been discussed with the governor of the Bank of Canada and is this at the root of the clash? Am I right in assuming that the governor of the Bank of Canada advised the government and the minister that the only way out of this predicament is a vast expansion of the economic life of the Canadian nation, and that this was the only possible way of either raising the money by means of borrowing without increasing interest rates or of avoiding inflation by adding to the amount of money in circulation? If I look over the releases—

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member is asking a great many questions and giving no answers. Would he care to give some of the answers?

Mr. Regier: I am unable to give any of the answers—

Mr. Brunsden: Of course you are not able to give them.

Mr. Regier: —because this House of Commons has been denied the answers to some of these very basic and fundamental questions. We are being asked to dismiss an official, as we have been often told, of this parliament of Canada and yet we have not been given any evidence as to why that official of ours ought to be dismissed other than the bland assertions of the minister. We know the minister is a politician. We know he is doing his utmost to defend the mismanagement of the government as we have found it over the past four years. He has now come to the end of the line. I would like to know what consultations have been held with the governor of the Bank of Canada as to meeting the needs of the government in the current fiscal year in the field of borrowings or in the field of inflation.

I would also like to ask the minister to explain why, in replying to questions on orders of the day, he said he thought Mr. Rasminsky might have discussed the potential devaluation of the Canadian dollar with officials of the international monetary fund on the day we were presented with the budget.

Did the minister in fact reveal to Mr. Rasminsky, a deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, the contents of the budget? If he did not, how could he say that he did not know; maybe Mr. Rasminsky discussed on that day with officials of the international monetary fund the implications of his proposals to devaluate the Canadian dollar. To me that was a very clear indication that Mr. Rasminsky was advised of the contents of the budget, and yet the minister has continually insisted that the governor of the bank was not consulted with regard to the contents of the budget.

There is something here that calls for an explanation. In my opinion the minister has no right to consult with a deputy governor of the Bank of Canada upon the contents of a proposed budget without having consulted with the governor of the Bank of Canada in the first place.

I would also like to have confirmation—

Mr. Benidickson: Maybe there was a conspiracy here.

Mr. Regier: —of what I understood to be the claim made by the minister some time ago, that he has already presented a number of budgets to this house without holding prior consultation as to the contents and the effects of such budgets with a man most responsible for the implementation of government policy, namely the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I would also like the minister to say whether or not he believes that a tie in and the closest co-ordination between monetary and fiscal policies are essential. If the minister will admit that they are essential, that the two cannot be divorced, why then is he suddenly so excited about the governor of the Bank of Canada taking an interest in the fiscal policy of the government?

It appears to me, as it did to hon. members of the other place as revealed in their report on manpower, and it has been advocated by many leading Canadians, that we must recognize the need for the closest tie in between monetary and fiscal policy. Hitherto the minister has always informed us that there is no relationship between the two; the government is responsible for fiscal policy, the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible for monetary policy, and never the twain shall meet. It is now very obvious that they never have met. The governor of the Bank of Canada has at least realized the need for some correlation in this respect and he has advocated many measures of major consequence, with many of which, as we have often indicated, we do not agree; but at least he has acted as a responsible Canadian ought to have acted in the circumstances. The Minister of Finance has yet to prove himself to be a responsible Canadian in this regard.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out during the course of his remarks the contradictions which were revealed this afternoon between some of the statements made by the Secretary of State and the minister, and also between statements made by the hon. member for Carleton and the minister. I should like to take a few moments to dwell on this feature of the discussion which took place this afternoon.

The Secretary of State in his speech made a number of statements which in my opinion are in complete contradiction with the minister and are in entire disagreement with him. For instance, at one stage he stated that the question was very simple: has the government the right to insist that monetary policy should be a function of the economic and fiscal policy of the government? He said, "This appears to me to be incontestable". A little later on he stated, "Monetary policy must be subordinated to national policy, for which the government alone is responsible".

I should like to refer the committee to some of the statements made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, February 21 of this year. As reported at page 2258 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I say that the responsibility owed by the Bank of Canada is to parliament. It is not an ultimate responsibility. It is a direct responsibility.

Further, at page 2260 of Hansard of the same day the minister stated:

> Can the government change the management of the bank? It cannot... The government has no power whatsoever, once appointments are made, to change them; only parliament can do that.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Another hon. Member: That is what we are doing now.

Mr. Benidickson: Parliament includes the opposition.

Mr. Chevrier: Then again, at page 2262 of Hansard the minister stated:

> That will point very clearly to the fact that the government as such has no power to exercise over the Bank of Canada. It rests with parliament. Parliament can always alter the legislation. But short of that, the bank in these matters has the responsibility.

Still further, at page 2265 of Hansard the minister said:

> The government has not been given by parliament any power or authority over the bank or its senior officials or directors in that situation.

A little further down the page this statement appears:

The government has no voice whatever in this matter of money supply. Consequently, in whatever the Leader of the Opposition had to say yesterday by way of criticism in relation to money supply, those are matters over which the government has no control and whether or not the hon. gentleman realizes it—I think he must realize it—his criticisms were directed at the Bank of Canada and not at the government. The government has no power to add to or subtract from or change this money supply or currency that the Bank of Canada is given the sole power to create.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not what he said when interest rates were coming down.

Mr. Chevrier: That is so. Neither is that what the Secretary of State said this afternoon. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he agrees with this statement made by the Secretary of State this afternoon, which I took down:

(Translation):

I feel that the first question that should come to our mind is the following: Is the government justified or not in demanding that the monetary policy be subordinate to its economic and fiscal policy?

In my opinion, that is beyond all question.

(Text):

Does the Minister of Finance accept that opinion expressed by his colleague the Secretary of State?

I turn to the next statement made by the Secretary of State.

(Translation):

In other words, the Bank of Canada's monetary policy must be subordinate to the national policy for which the government is responsible, both before parliament and the people.

(Text):

Again, I ask the question: does the Minister of Finance agree with or accept this opinion expressed by his colleague the Secretary of State? Before I proceed further I think we should obtain from the Minister of Finance a reply to those two questions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have had this evening a continuation of this afternoon's debate carried on, as far as hon. members opposite are concerned, just as though the bill had never been given second reading. The house, by its vote at five o'clock this afternoon, approved the principle of the bill, and the principle of the bill is, I take it, that the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to become vacant on the coming into force of this act.

I can appreciate the problem of the Leader of the Opposition. He had already spoken in the debate on second reading and he could not making another speech this afternoon. He has taken advantage of the sitting of the committee this evening not for the purpose of seeking to make use of the committee procedure for the reasons for which this procedure was designed, but disregarding completely the effect of second reading this afternoon—

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that you do not need assistance from the Minister of Finance in deciding whether or not we are in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Continuing my observations, Mr. Chairman, I say that most of what the Leader of the Opposition had to say in committee this evening was altogether out of order.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order. That is a reflection on the Chair. I spoke, Mr. Chairman, and you did not interrupt me or call me to order. The Minister of Finance now says I was out of order. That is a reflection on yourself and I hope you will call the Minister of Finance to order.

The Chairman: I cannot agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the statement made by the minister was a reflection on the Chair, because it seems the general practice in this house to discuss whether some hon. members adhere to the rules or not. I did not take the remarks of the minister as raising a formal point of order and I shall therefore not go further. If a point of order should formally be raised I will deal with it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had assumed that the Leader of the Opposition would tonight have brought forward his series of questions, and I am ready this evening to endeavour to the satisfaction of the committee, if I can, to answer any questions which are relevant to the clause of the bill, but I would observe that in this committee, at this committee stage, we are examining this particular clause, which happens to be the only clause in the bill, and that the house has already recorded its approval of the principle of this measure.

I was asked in the first place by the Leader of the Opposition why this bill had not been brought forward as an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act. I should have thought the reason was obvious. This is a bill brought forward for a particular purpose. It is not continuing legislation. It is not the kind of legislation which purports to have continuing effects in the future. Therefore it was deemed appropriate, in the light of the best legislative counsel available, to bring forward this measure as a separate bill, having regard to the fact that it has an immediate purpose.

As to the questions concerning such a situation in the future or other situations to which the present circumstances may give rise, I have already on another occasion announced that the government will shortly be appointing a royal commission to study all questions relating to banking, including the Bank of Canada, credit, money and other questions in this country, and it will be within the purview of that royal commission to examine all questions in relation to the operation of the Bank of Canada which bear upon the need for any legislative change in the terms of that act.

Some of the questions asked tonight are obviously questions which I am precluded from answering in the way in which some of them were asked without divulging communications which are of a confidential nature. We have already faced this question with regard to several of the motions put forward by hon. members opposite for production of papers of interest at various stages of this subject. The house has reaffirmed the principle in relation to those motions that where communications are of a confidential nature, as are communications passing between the Minister of Finance on the one hand and the governor of the Bank of Canada on the other, that confidence must be preserved. I must respect the decision of the house in that regard. It would be very tempting indeed to follow the governor of the Bank of Canada in the course he has taken. He has felt himself at liberty to forget and ignore the confidential nature of some of the communications, which he has, without any leave whatever and in a very improper manner, made public.

I do not intend to follow that improper and irresponsible course. Communications which are confidential must have their confidential nature respected. The governor has chosen to make public certain things in those communications which he considers, evidently, might be of advantage to him. Perhaps there are communications which have passed between us which, for equal reasons, I might find it to my advantage and to the advantage of the government to make public in that way. But there is a principle involved here which must be respected not only for its intrinsic merit in this situation but for the sake of all future relationships between confidential advisers of the government and ministers of the crown.

Let me turn briefly in this regard to the question put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, because here is an example. That hon. member asked me specifically to disclose the advice given by Mr. Coyne to the government in relation to certain questions of debt management with respect to the money-raising program for the present year. It would be highly improper on my part to disclose advice given to me or to the government by the adviser in this respect, which is the Bank of Canada. I have to say that in this field of debt management the government takes its responsibility. I made that very clear when I spoke in this house on June 26. In the field of debt management, the Bank of Canada acts as adviser to the government. The government will take its responsibility for whatever advice it takes from its adviser and acts upon, or whatever advice it does not take and does not act upon. This is the responsibility of the government and that responsibility will be discharged. It would be very unfair either to the adviser in this particular case or the advisers of the government in other cases if ministers were to disclose in the house advice of a very confidential nature given to them in this regard.

Mr. Pearson: Hidden.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition in one of his most senseless and unthinking interruptions says "hidden". Yes, Mr. Chairman, confidential advice to the government remains hidden and it remains hidden for very good reasons of public policy. It has always been so under our system of government.

Mr. Pearson: Until the Prime Minister disclosed it in 1958.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Advice given to ministers by confidential advisers, Mr. Chairman, is of such a nature that that confidence must be respected; otherwise our system of government would break down. These are questions of public policy and it is the intention of the government to respect constitutional usage in this regard.

I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition some further questions in regard to the relationship of the government's program, this program which was announced in the budget, to the reasons given to the governor of the bank on May 30 for asking for his resignation. Hon. members by this time have had full opportunity to examine the program and to realize that this is a program of such a nature that two things stand out in it. First, that this program can not be implemented unless there is effective co-operation between the authorities in the fiscal and the monetary fields in Canada. I have made that very clear. I am asked tonight if I do not think it is proper that there should be co-operation. I certainly do think that co-operation is desirable. I certainly do think, Mr. Chairman, that we will not have, as the report of the Senate committee on employment said not long ago, and that we cannot have the effective use of those means that have been created for dealing, broadly speaking, in the governmental sphere with our economic problems unless there is effective co-ordination of policy in the fiscal field with policy in the monetary field.

Mr. Chevrier: When was there not that co-ordination?

Mr. Benidickson: That has always been the situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That has not been the situation.

Mr. Benidickson: Since when?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For some considerable time.

Mr. Benidickson: What date?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I have already said and say again—

Mr. Benidickson: What date?

Mr. Pearson: Swallow your own words.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the hon. members had asked me questions which I was to answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since 1957?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When I try to answer questions the agitated gentlemen are not interested in the answers at all. They are not interested in answers; they are not interested in information.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is not giving information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think they were ever interested in obtaining information on this subject. They do not seem very interested in it now.

An hon. Member: They have closed minds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have said there were two reasons which stand out in the relationship between the government's program and the reasons given on May 30 to the governor for asking for his resignation. I have mentioned one, Mr. Chairman, the necessity for co-ordination and co-operation between those responsible in the monetary field and those responsible in the field of fiscal policy, and that, Mr. Chairman, means effective co-operation between the government, principally the Department of Finance, on the one hand, and the Bank of Canada on the other.

The other reason, Mr. Chairman, has been quite obvious to hon. members and that is that the kind of program we put forward, the comprehensive program that was put before the house in the budget speech, was quite at odds with the kind of approach the governor of the Bank of Canada had been declaring on his own behalf in his speeches on fiscal policy over a period of some 18 months, in the course of which he made public speeches numbering I believe, 13 altogether.

We have been over this subject before, Mr. Chairman, and I have had occasion to point out in detail to those who needed it—and I think it was very obvious without this detailed pointing up—it was obvious to all hon. members who were interested in approaching the question, what these fundamental differences were. I can take hon. members opposite back to the budget speech. After making the speech I concluded with a review of those fundamental difference, Mr. Chairman—I say fundamental differences—between the approach contained in the budget speech on the one hand and the approach to fiscal questions which the governor of the Bank of Canada has declared in this long series of public utterances on his part.

Mr. Chairman, those were the fundamental differences. It was quite clear that it would be quite out of keeping with respect for the sincerity with which the governor held these views that he declared to ask him then to put aside his views and to co-operate fully in the implementation of a program in which obviously he could not be expected to believe. Now, there was the situation. Back of this was a long history of the activities of the governor which had the effect of bringing the Bank of Canada into the realm of political controversy, not without assistance from the opposition in this house. Every time the governor of the bank made a speech outside the house which obviously was not in accord with government policy—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why did you not say so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —hon. members opposite were not slow to bring the question on to the floor of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We had in 1960 and we had again in 1961 major debates in this house on supply motions in relation to fiscal and monetary policy, and in each case what gave rise to those debates, precipitated by amendments introduced by the opposition, were speeches made by the governor of the Bank of Canada which hon. members opposite sought to exploit to the embarrassment of the government, knowing full well that the governor spoke for himself and that he was declaring policy in the fiscal field, a field that belongs not to the Bank of Canada, but to the government, a very controversial field in our political system and a field into which the governor ought not to have strayed, and because they knew—

Mr. Benidickson: But you said you would not reprimand him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —full well, Mr. Chairman, that the views declared by the governor of the Bank of Canada were at odds with the views of the government they brought them to the floor of this house. There would have been no point citing what the governor of the bank had to say outside if he were saying things that were in his proper sphere or saying things in accord with government policy. There would not have been any occasion for hon. members opposite to engage in this form of political exploitation of the excesses and of the errors of the governor of the Bank of Canada, but hon. members opposite, of course, were looking for every opportunity and so they involved this very important national institution, the Bank of Canada, in political controversy. Although they knew perfectly well that the governor spoke for himself and not for the government, they sought to embarrass the government in this way, and this went on and on. How the governor of the Bank of Canada could remain oblivious to this I will never understand. Anybody whose office is just across the road on Wellington street must surely have some passing familiarity with the contents of Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He was encouraged by your defence of him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not defend the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Chairman. I did not. I was not defending what the governor of the Bank of Canada said. There is the point, Mr. Chairman. I did not defend what the governor of the Bank of Canada said. Hon. members opposite were doing their best to pin on the government and principally through the Minister of Finance some association with or responsibility for what the governor of the Bank of Canada was saying. They knew perfectly well that I was not responsible for what he said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what you said on February 21.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When they talk about my defending the governor of the Bank of Canada, I have not defended what the governor of the Bank of Canada said. I made it very clear that I took no responsibility for what he said because I was never consulted about what he did say or about his acceptance of engagements to deliver public addresses. Never was I consulted. Never did I know when the next speech was coming. I did not know at any time. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I have taken no responsibility at any time for any of these speeches made by the governor of the Bank of Canada, and in doing so I have kept the record straight and I have invited the house to have regard for the proper areas of responsibility in the system created by parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman I rise, on a question of privilege. The Minister of Finance is a person for whom we have a right to hold a great deal of respect and certainly we would hope that what he says in one part of the session is going to be consistent with what he says—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: —in another part of the session.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: My question of privilege—

The Chairman: Order. I fail to see any question of privilege in trying to compare speeches made by the Minister of Finance. This is a matter for argument and the hon. member will have his turn in due course.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. At this point I suggest to you—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: I am speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor and I am not yielding the floor to the hon. member for the purpose of questions because there are some questions ahead of his which I am trying to answer, and hon. members opposite will not prevent me from answering them.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: I know you want to be fair, Mr. Chairman, and I want to be brief.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member please resume his seat? I have indicated to the hon. member that if he wants to compare statements made by the Minister of Finance that would not be a question of privilege. If the hon. member is rising on something else I will hear him but I trust that if his purpose is the one I suspect it is he will not insist.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, my point was to refer you, sir—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, your ruling is being defied.

Mr. Benidickson: My point was to refer you, sir, to page 2258 of Hansard of February 21, 1961 so that you may see whether or not the privileges of this house are being abused by what the Minister of Finance is now saying.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if I may continue to answer the questions which were asked earlier, I have made comments on this matter of the speeches which the governor made and which did embroil the Bank of Canada in political controversy. Let there be no doubt about its having been a political controversy because it was brought on the floor of the house by the opposition for the purpose of trying to embarrass the government. I do not think any person who is aware of what goes on in the country could possibly question that, least of all the opposition who are responsible for bringing these questions on the floor of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why not?

Mr. Pickersgill: What is an opposition for?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All right, they say they were entitled to bring them here but they are not entitled to have brought them here and then to say that the governor's statements have not involved the Bank of Canada in a political controversy. So, Mr. Chairman, I think it is not good conduct on the part of a public servant who is an officer of the Bank of Canada to embroil the institution of which he is the head in a political controversy. The Leader of the Opposition asked questions about what is good behaviour. I say it is not good behaviour for the governor of the Bank of Canada to embroil the Bank of Canada in a political controversy.

Before I leave this subject of the speeches, Mr. Chairman, let me make it very clear that both when I talked to the governor on March 18 and when I talked to him on May 30 the governor made it very clear that he took back nothing of what he had said in those speeches. He did tell me on one occasion that he was sorry they had caused the government embarrassment, but he made it very clear by the plainest assertion that he took back nothing of what he had said in those speeches.

The Leader of the Opposition asks the house to conclude that the offences were completely expiated because after March 18 the governor did not indulge in any more public speeches. I gave the house the reasons when I spoke in the house on June 26. He told me that he did not have any more public speaking engagements. This was at the same time as he was telling me that he took back nothing that he had said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You allowed this to go on for three years.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will repeat what I have said on two previous occasions since the 13th of June and which I regret having to repeat again. I repeat it only because these questions tonight are repetitious. They are simply going over ground that has already been fully covered on more than one occasion. In relation to this matter of these speeches, I did not know at any time when more speeches were coming. The reason that I had some talk with the members of the board of the bank was that I felt they were the proper persons to take this matter in hand, and I did find that these directors were themselves becoming increasingly concerned over the way in which the governor in the course of his speeches was involved and was involving the bank in this whole realm of political controversy in the fiscal field.

I was asked to deal with the question of monetary policy and I would be pleased to deal with it because hon. members opposite have striven so hard to make it appear that there have been changes of view in this situation or that there have been differences of views on the part of government spokesmen. They are overlooking some of the essential facts which must be taken into account in this regard by anyone who makes any attempt at arriving at a fair judgment in these matters.

I went over this situation in my report to the house on June 26. I pointed out what happened in the winter of 1957-58. I had entertained the opinion when in opposition, and had so expressed myself in debate, that there was a responsibility on the part of the government in the field of monetary policy. Hon. members opposite have quoted what I said in this respect in a debate in the house in 1956. That was an opinion which I certainly held at that time. It was an opinion which I held when the Prime Minister invited me to become Minister of Finance in the new government. That was an opinion which I held when in that 1957-58 fall and winter I had my talk with the governor in this respect, and I have told the house about the discussion which we had. Reference was made tonight to page 7040 of Hansard where I said:

> In the winter of 1957-58 I conveyed to him a request—

This was not my idea; this was a request of the government which I conveyed to the governor.

> —for an easing of the requirements respecting the liquidity reserves of the chartered banks.

Here was one of the basic elements in the tight money policy which we had attacked when we were in opposition. Then I proceeded, Mr. Chairman, as reported at page 7040 of Hansard for June 26, 1961:

> That request, which was designed by the government to ease tight money, was rejected by the governor firmly and angrily.

The Leader of the Opposition tonight has asked me to comment further on that subject. Well, Mr. Chairman, without going into the realm of communications between us, let me say that this meeting took place in my office on this floor in this building. There were several others from the Bank of Canada there besides the governor, and there was also the deputy minister of finance. I conveyed to the governor this request from the government. I told him it was from the government, Mr. Chairman. I have to tell you again that that request of the government was rejected firmly, yes, and angrily. It was made very clear, Mr. Chairman, and what has happened since in relation to monetary policy and what I have said since in this house in relation to monetary policy, has to be seen in that setting. It was made very clear to me in that meeting that the governor of the Bank of Canada felt quite free to reject requests of the government in relation to monetary measures. This was made very clear to me.

As I said speaking in the house on June 26, this brought me up pretty short, to be told firmly, flatly and angrily that this request from the government was rejected.

Mr. Hellyer: When was that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said it was in the 1957-1958 period, in that range.

Mr. Hellyer: It took you four years to do anything about it, almost until the next general election.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member wishes to give the answers, Mr. Chairman, let him proceed. If he has the answers then I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition asked me for them. I am trying to answer the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. member for Trinity has the answers that he thinks the Leader of the Opposition needs, why does he not take the Leader of the Opposition aside and give him all this information which the hon. member thinks he has?

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Pearson: We have had a most extraordinary performance from the minister, and I will deal with one point at this moment. I will try to deal with some of the other points a little later. The minister, in these last five or ten minutes, got very vehement in order to vindicate himself of the charge that this angry rejection by the governor of the Bank of Canada of his request on behalf of the government for an easing of monetary matters was a false charge. He has said that he, on behalf of the government, asked the governor to do this and the governor angrily and firmly rejected this request.

A few moments ago I quoted from the Canadian Press story a statement by the minister, but perhaps it would be even more impressive if I quoted from Hansard of that period to show how, to use the ministers' favourite word, absurd and nonsensical his argument is. On January 25, 1958, as reported at page 3804 of Hansard a question was asked of the minister by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. The question reads:

> I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of the necessity for easing further the tight money policy, has the government given consideration to the need for easier credit and a reduction in the prevailing bank interest rates?

That is the kind of policy in which the minister now says he asked the governor of the Bank of Canada to co-operate and which was firmly and angrily rejected. I continue reading the question:

> I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I have added the word "further" after the word "easing" in the copy of the question which I sent to the minister as notice.

This was the reply of the Minister of Finance:

> I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of his question. I did notice that the word "further" was very properly added to his question. The answer to his question is yes, the government has taken steps toward easing the former policy, easing credit and lowering interest rates in Canada during the last six months, and hopes to see this beneficial trend continue.

This was the policy for which the minister now claims the Bank of Canada was responsible, not the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is again mistaken.

Mr. Pearson: This is monetary policy. The governor having taken the action which the minister on this occasion boasted about, the minister now four years or three and a half years later says that the request was angrily and firmly rejected.

What did the minister say during the budget speech of that year referring to monetary events of the preceding year? What did he have to say about this matter in his speech on June 17, 1958, which he now says was so angrily and firmly rejected by the governor of the Bank of Canada? This is what the minister had to say as recorded at page 1234 of Hansard of that date in his review of monetary policy while presenting the budget:

> Monetary policy also changed in the latter part of 1957. The money supply was expanded rapidly after mid-August, and partly for this reason and partly because of a reduction of demand in certain credit fields, monetary conditions in Canada generally became easier and interest rates declined substantially. Banks have now for some time been in a position to meet all creditworthy demands for commercial and personal loans. Market rates of interest in almost all categories of borrowing have declined substantially.

Presumably, it is for that action, Mr. Chairman, in 1957 and 1958 that the governor of the Bank of Canada is to be fired without a trial in 1961.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to resume what I was saying by way of answer to the questions of the Leader of the Opposition, and I am indebted to him now for his intervention and for these references because they point out what I was in the process of saying. So far as the effect on the conditions to which he referred, such as interest rates, is concerned, there are elements in monetary policy and there are elements in fiscal policy that have a bearing on this area of our economic life. The results which we are seeking to achieve now in the program of easing interest rates in Canada, I pointed out, require co-operative action in both fields. What I was referring to in the first answer that the Leader of the Opposition ascribed to me tonight was what the government had done in the field of fiscal policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Monetary policy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, fiscal policy, Mr. Chairman; so far as monetary policy is concerned, from the time the governor made it clear to me that he took no direction, dictation or indeed requests from the government in relation to monetary policy, I gave the house information from time to time about money supply and questions of that kind. However, it was not for me, having regard to that situation, to take responsibility for the monetary policy. I took responsibility for fiscal policy, and what was done in that field, and that was our responsibility. I will defend what we did in the field of fiscal policy, but I am not going to have hon. members opposite ascribing to me things that have happened in a field in which I had no authority.

Let me take you back now, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, first I wish to answer the Leader of the Opposition. No, I will not accept a question now. I will be glad to accept questions later, but if I may I should like to complete my answers to the earlier questions of the Leader of the Opposition.

I referred to this experience we had in the 1957-58 period and I have said on June 26 that that sent me scurrying to the statutes to examine them to see where authority lay.

Mr. Benidickson: Did you speak in the campaign of 1957 without looking at the statutes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had to come to the conclusion, after an exhaustive study of the statute, that parliament had not given to the government authority over the Bank of Canada in relation to the question of money supply. I have drawn attention in this house during various debates to the terms of the Bank of Canada Act which give to the Bank of Canada and to the Bank of Canada alone the power to create money in Canada. Questions of money supply, therefore, are under the Bank of Canada.

Here was the situation from that point on. As I pointed out in speaking in this House of Commons on June 26, from that point on the governor of the Bank of Canada and other authorities in the bank were always ready to discuss monetary policy. They were always prepared to explain it and to defend it. But, Mr. Chairman, the stage had been set at the very beginning in this meeting of 1957-58. I have told the house frankly that in this situation we had to consider whether we would try to force the issue at that time, and we decided that we would try to live with this situation until December 31, 1961. I pointed out that we had co-operation from the bank authorities in the field of debt management, the servicing of the public debt and these other matters on which the bank acts as adviser. But, Mr. Chairman, in relation to monetary policy the relationship was established in that meeting in 1957-58 or towards the end of 1957 and that is the way in which the matter rested.

If we had been able to look into some crystal ball and had seen that we would be faced in the spring and early summer of 1961 with the situation which has now arisen, obviously we would not have waited. If we were going to have an issue like this raised in parliament, it would have been better had it been raised earlier. However, we thought this situation could be lived with and we were concerned, above all other things, that no harm should be done to the Bank of Canada because of its importance as a national institution.

Mr. Benidickson: Regardless of the economic growth and the unemployed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I just wish, Mr. Chairman, that some hon. members opposite had had some of the same concern for the effectiveness of and the public respect for the Bank of Canada as an institution.

There is perhaps one other matter on which I have not yet touched. I think it was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in relation to the discussions between Mr. Rasminsky, deputy governor of the Bank of Canada and Canada's representative on the executive board of the international monetary fund at the time of the budget. This question was asked of me by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on two occasions. I gave him an answer. He asked me to look into some further detailed aspects. I have obtained the information. I have brought it into the house each day now for a week but he has not asked me for it. Perhaps he will not mind if I give the information now—

Mr. Benidickson: I thought the minister would give it in due course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that there was no right to discuss budget questions with Mr. Rasminsky without the approval of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I agree. Mr. Rasminsky has been completely loyal to the institution that he serves. Mr. Rasminsky is the manager of the exchange fund which is a government fund. The government takes full responsibility for management of the exchange fund but the manager of it is Mr. Rasminsky.

Mr. Rasminsky was going to Washington at the time of the budget and I authorized him to acquaint Mr. Per Jacobsson, managing director of the international monetary fund, with the nature of the proposals in the budget in regard to the external value of the Canadian currency. In justice to Mr. Rasminsky I wish to make it very clear that he was not consulted about the budget as such. He was acquainted with the contents of two chapters in the budget in relation to the proposals in the budget in regard to the external value of the dollar so that he might discuss these with Mr. Per Jacobsson.

He had a confidential meeting with Mr. Jacobsson late in the afternoon of Tuesday, June 20. On Wednesday, June 21 there was a meeting of the executive board of the international monetary fund where Mr. Rasminsky, the budget then having been made public, was in a position to review with his fellow executive directors of the fund exactly what was proposed in the program announced in the budget speech in this regard.

That is the whole matter. When I was asked in the house questions or rather was not asked questions but was faced with an assertion by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate later, based on a news report out of Washington on the basis of which he made an assertion that we were in trouble with the international monetary fund, I then made a firm denial and I repeat that denial now.

I think I have dealt with the questions that have been asked thus far, Mr. Chairman, I shall now be glad to answer any further questions hon. members may wish to ask. I think the hon. member for Trinity should probably have the first opportunity.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister sits down, would he confirm—I think I have him right—that the exchange provisions of the budget were told the director of the international monetary fund, an international organization, before the budget was made public?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in confidence the general nature of the proposals were made known to Mr. Jacobsson late in the afternoon of Tuesday, June 20.

Mr. Benidickson: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you not a bright boy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: From what the minister has said in reply to questions put from this side of the chamber, it is quite clear that he has not only backwatered considerably during the course of this discussion,—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: —that he has not only reversed himself but that he has also swallowed himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: In the light of what the minister has just said, I would ask him to explain these statements which appear in answer to questions he was asked in the house. On November 13, 1957, he was asked this question by the then hon. member for Coast-Capilano:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Actually it is a repetition of a question he was asked last Monday in Oakville, which he refused to answer on the ground that he could not answer it outside the House of Commons. Since he is now inside the House of Commons I should like to ask him, has there been a clash of opinions between the Bank of Canada and the government on economic policy?
> Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am not aware of anything that could be called a clash.

During the whole period that he has answered our questions he has left the impression that the comprehensive program of the government, on the one hand, was not receiving co-operation and collaboration from the Bank of Canada, on the other.

On November 21, 1957 the then hon. member for Coast-Capilano asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, in his absence, I put a question to the Minister of Finance about a C.B.C. report of a speech made by the Minister of Justice at the University of British Columbia. The Minister of Finance pleaded ignorance of what was in the mind of the Minister of Justice—
>
> Mr. Fleming: No, he did not.
>
> Mr. Sinclair: Now I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what are these definite steps which have been taken by a Conservative government to relax monetary restrictions of the Bank of Canada.
>
> Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the dispatch on which the C.B.C. news story is based, but I understand it was a report of a speech which I made at the University of British Columbia on Tuesday. In the course of that speech I said the government had been moving in the matter of monetary policy and credit restrictions ever since we took office. I outlined the various measures we have taken, including the provision of $150 million of new credit for housing loans. I also pointed out that there had been continuous review of monetary policies and discussions with the Bank of Canada with regard to credit restrictions and monetary policy generally.
> I emphasized that the results of these discussions, and of the policies followed by this government since taking office, were now becoming evident in the reductions in interest rates which have been reported recently and which should do much to create an economic climate in which the restrictive trends initiated by the previous government would be reversed, and the Canadian economy could move forward again on that sound program of expansion which is the goal of this government.

How does the minister explain away that statement, together with the earlier answer which he himself gave? I come back to the two questions which I put to the minister earlier and which he did not answer. The questions were as to whether he agreed with two of the statements made by his colleague, the Secretary of State, which in my opinion, were clearly in complete contradiction to what the minister had said. I am now asking the minister, in the light of the two questions which I put on Hansard, whether he accepts the opinion of the Secretary of State in this respect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, let me begin with the matters raised by the hon. member regarding the 1957-58 period. The answer which the hon. member has quoted draws attention to some of the fiscal steps that were taken in that period which had the effect of easing conditions and relieving some of the rigours of the tight money policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was in August, 1957 that we moved first to provide $150 million under the provisions of the National Housing Act to assist in providing credit by way of mortgage loans for the construction of houses in Canada. The answer also refers to other measures that we had either taken or were in the course of taking in the fiscal field. Reference is made in one of the answers to what was being done in the monetary field. But here, Mr. Chairman, we are back again on the same question. It is true that the Bank of Canada was doing certain things in the monetary field. I have never said they were not. It is true that some of the things they did were parallel to what the government was doing in the fiscal field. But the government was not given control over monetary policy. It was not given authority over monetary policy. That is the point, and that point has not registered with hon. members opposite.

The hon. member for Laurier also asks me to make comment on the views expressed this afternoon by my colleague, the Secretary of State, in one of the most effective, forceful, eloquent and convincing speeches heard in the house for a long time. One of the things I enjoyed about that speech was the way it completely flattened out hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pearson: It flattened out the Minister of Finance too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all. I am asked to make comment on this question. It brings one back to the question of responsibility in relation to monetary policy. I am sorry that the hon. member for Laurier thinks I did not deal with his question earlier. I thought I was dealing with it when I made comment on this matter of authority in this field.

The fact is—and here I am coming back to what I said in my report to the house on June 26—that if you have under the existing system, under the existing act, someone at the bank directing the affairs of the bank who is co-operative, then I suppose you can have, under the existing system and under the existing statute, the same kind of effective co-operation that you had when Mr. Graham Towers was governor of the bank.

These questions about the relative areas of responsibility, fiscal on the one hand and monetary on the other, did not arise in the days of Mr. Graham Towers' governorship except in an academic sense. He came to the banking and commerce committee on one occasion. My esteemed friend, the hon. member for Greenwood, asked him questions on this subject, but everyone knew that these were academic questions because there had been no situation in which the friction had arisen; in which there was lack of co-operation between the authorities in the fiscal field and the authorities in the monetary field.

It is only when you have a situation such as we have, to my very great regret, under the existing governor that you are thrown back on the provisions that parliament has written in the statute. The fact is that where you do not get co-operation; where you do not get people working together; where you do not get the effective meshing together of fiscal policy and monetary policy, then the Bank of Canada Act in its terms today does not give the government authority in this field. It gives the government power to appoint the governor, but not to remove him. It gives the government power to appoint directors, but not to remove them. I pointed this out in the debate in this house on February 22 last.

Hon. members opposite were told these things very plainly and the Leader of the Opposition and I had a debate on this subject. But there is the situation. If we are to be governed by the terms of the statute, then there is the situation where the government has no authority to impose, under the present system, its will on the Bank of Canada in relation to monetary policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what the Secretary of State said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not, hon. members opposite seem to agree, a desirable situation. It could only arise under the present statute where you have the chief authority at the bank going his own way. Here is where the division has come. We had to recognize these limitations on the authority of the government and hope that in due time there would be an opportunity to effect an improvement in that regard. I am quite sure that an improvement will be coming if parliament sees fit to adopt this present measure.

Mr. Benidickson: It has taken you four years to change the law.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as needed improvements in the language of the statute are concerned, we will have the benefit of a detailed study by a royal commission of this and other questions in the banking field. So far as what is needed under the present system and under the present statute is concerned, that is an effective co-operation in the monetary and fiscal fields, I think we can look forward to that once this bill is adopted.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I believe most of us will agree that we have been playing the game of round and round and round we go, especially when listening to the minister. However, as we play the game we occasionally make a slip. I do not wish to quote the minister inaccurately but I believe he told us a little while ago that on the afternoon of the day on which he presented the contents of the budget—which of course was brought down in the evening—Mr. Jacobsson, the head of the international monetary fund—who is not a Canadian but a foreigner—had been informed of the main tenor of a certain portion of the budget.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Regier: If I am wrong I hope the minister will immediately interrupt me. However, if I heard the minister correctly, I think in the light of all our parliamentary institutions and history the minister now owes his resignation as minister to the people of the country.

Mr. Benidickson: He has been wrong all along.

Mr. Regier: The minister can perhaps argue that he had reasons, and perhaps very good reasons in his opinion, for not revealing the contents of the budget to the governor of the Bank of Canada. He may advance reasons why he had every rightful cause to reveal certain portions of the budget to Mr. Rasminsky—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Regier: —but he has no excuse—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. I do not see how the hon. member can relate these remarks to the bill. It may be he can relate some of his remarks to this bill, but certainly not the subject he is pursuing at the moment. I say this because we are not concerned with the conduct of the minister. We are concerned with a very simple bill that has to do only with Mr. Coyne and not with the budget.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman, I submit to you with respect, has the right to do exactly what he is doing. He is replying to a statement made by the Minister of Finance who said that Mr. Jacobsson, as he calls him, had had certain discussions with Mr. Rasminsky in Washington concerning the monetary fund, and surely if the Minister of Finance had the right to give the details of those conversations in the committee, the hon. member who is speaking now has the right to deal with the same subject matter.

The Chairman: The hon. member replied to the remarks made by the minister. But now he is discussing whether this would bring about the resignation of the Minister of Finance. We are certainly not going to discuss this matter, which has no connection whatsoever with the bill which is before the committee. I will add this: up to now, practically everything has been allowed, but if hon. members take advantage of the leniency of the Chair the Chair will have to be stricter in applying the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I respectfully suggest to you that the ruling which you seemed to have in mind was one which, I am sure, one would have had to contest. The Minister of Finance has said there is certain information which because of its very nature he cannot give to this committee. The minister referred to certain information which he would regard as privileged, information which would be of concern only to an official of the government of Canada and himself or other members of the government. Yet we have had now, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has pointed out, a revelation from the Minister of Finance that he gave information to the director of a foreign corporation, a corporation not having anything to do directly with the government of Canada. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that was a ground for asking for the resignation of the Minister of Finance. Then you made the observation, Mr. Chairman, that we were not concerned in this committee with the conduct of the Minister of Finance. I suggest, with great respect, that not only is this a matter which comes within our purview, but that the conduct of the Minister of Finance is very germane to this discussion. How can we discuss the conduct of the governor of the Bank of Canada, how can we discuss whether the government's contentions regarding that official are sound, unless we can examine the conduct of the Minister of Finance and of the government as a whole? If you, Mr. Chairman, were to take the position that the conduct of the Minister of Finance is not an issue, hon. gentlemen may not agree with what is said about that conduct, but if you take the position that we cannot discuss the conduct of the Minister of Finance, then not only are we being denied the right of a committee, but we are denied the right of free discussion in this committee of the whole.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is about time somebody made a comment on this make-believe exhibition on the part of the hon. member for Essex East. It is about time some limit was put on the humbug he has been offering the committee. The committee is being asked to believe now that there was disclosure of some budget secret in some improper way.

An hon. Member: You said it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Essex East, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Laurier—I leave out the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—those three members were members of the previous government when it decided to make a change in the value of the dollar on two occasions—

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam rises on a point of order.

An hon. Member: The minister has the floor.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Essex East was discussing a point of order and I presumed the hon. minister was, too. Apparently it is very difficult to distinguish a speech from the discussion of a point of order. I understood that the minister was speaking to the point of order. If he is not, then of course, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam may continue his remarks, but in that case, before he does so, I think I should point out both to the hon. minister and to the hon. member for Essex East that if we were justified in discussing any extraneous matter which might come into the debate, forgetting completely the purpose for which we are now in committee, it would certainly not be a good rule to follow. I am not saying the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam may not raise the question somewhere else or on some other occasion, but he may certainly not do so at this time, because anything that might happen would distract us from the purpose for which we are here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was about to conclude what I was saying—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —with respect to what the hon. member for Essex East said in raising his point of order. I am not saying whether or not it was a valid point of order. I am saying that it left an impression which needs to be corrected, and I do so with regard to the fact that on two occasions when hon. members opposite were in office the value of the Canadian dollar was changed, and it was changed in consultation with the international monetary fund before this information was made public in Canada—while it was still highly secret in Canada.

Mr. Regier: I hardly know whether to continue debating the point of order, whether to continue my original remarks or whether to speak to a question of privilege. However, this is a matter of the most serious consequence. It has been admitted by the minister in this debate that a non-Canadian has been informed of certain contents of the budget before the Canadian parliament was informed of them. I feel this is a matter of such great significance that members of this parliament ought to consider this in the quieter moments of the night and that the house ought to deal with this tomorrow.

Therefore, I move:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to deal with this question at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More obstruction.

Mr. Starr: Closure by the C.C.F.

Amendment (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 6; nays, 132.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Before you announce the result of the vote, Mr. Chairman, I draw to your attention the fact that the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Hull were in the house and did not vote. I would ask, therefore, that their votes be recorded in the negative.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Hull is rising.

Mr. Caron: It was decided in 1926 when Mr. Bourassa remained in the house and refused to vote that an hon. member has the right to remain in the house and not vote. The minister has no right to raise this question at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, before beginning what I have to say I wish to tell the Minister of Finance at once that I resent the statement he made with reference to two hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is true.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says "it is true". Well, it is also true that the Prime Minister is not in his seat. This is a debate during which he should be present.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this instance it is not a case of his being in the house and not voting.

Mr. Chevrier: I come back to the two questions I asked the Minister of Finance earlier and which I submit he has not answered. I ask the minister whether he subscribes to the statement made by the Secretary of State in this part of his speech where he said:

(Translation):

I feel that the first question that should come to our mind is the following: Is the government justified or not in demanding that the monetary policy be subordinate to its economic and fiscal policy?

In my opinion, that is beyond all question.

(Text):

Does the minister subscribe to that opinion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have dealt with that subject twice already; but I will be glad to do it a third time in deference to the hon. gentleman. What my colleague was saying in effect this afternoon was that monetary policy cannot be divorced and isolated from fiscal policy and the other ingredients that we embrace broadly in speaking on economic policy. I think that is right and I think that is one of the elements that we recognize as being necessary, that is, to say, effective co-operation in regard to the program which was announced in the budget speech.

The hon. member himself was good enough to quote some remarks I made in this house on June 21 and on other occasions in emphasizing that the responsibility and the authority rested in parliament and when parliament had not given to the government effective authority under the present legislation over monetary policy, or over the Bank of Canada in relation to monetary policy, then obviously if a situation like the present one should arise, there is only one thing the government can do and that is to come to parliament; and that is why the government has come to parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, that is certainly not an answer and it is certainly a complete contradiction of what the minister said himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all.

Mr. Chevrier: Not on June 21, as he stated, but on February 21, 1961 when he said as reported at page 2258 of Hansard—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was speaking of February 21.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said June 21.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry; I meant to say February. I was referring to the debate we had on the supply motion in relation to economic policy.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, then, the statement made by the Minister of Finance on that occasion, and many statements made by him, were in complete contradiction of what was said here. I put this—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has not understood.

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly understand there has been a contradiction between what the hon. member has said tonight and what he said on February 21.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: And what he said in the month of June.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, not a bit; relax.

Mr. Chevrier: I cite what the minister is reported to have said at page 2258 of Hansard:

I say that the responsibility owed by the Bank of Canada is to parliament. It is not an ultimate responsibility. It is a direct responsibility.

And then again:

The government has no power whatsoever, once appointments are made, to change them; only parliament can do that.

And still further;—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is exactly what I said tonight.

Mr. Chevrier: This is certainly in complete contradiction of what the Secretary of State has said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: It is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I again ask the minister this question: Does he subscribe to this additional statement made by the Secretary of State?

(Translation):

In other words, the Bank of Canada's monetary policy must be subordinate to the national policy for which the government is responsible, both before parliament and the people.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is because of that fact that we are here asking parliament to take action in the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, it think the two questions which the hon. member for Laurier has asked, based upon excerpts from the speech this afternoon of the Secretary of State, touch one of the vital points in the matter before the house, and to which the Minister of Finance has addressed himself in such an unsatisfactory manner; for the fact is that the Minister of Finance today has reiterated his views as to the responsibility of the government in the field of monetary policy in a manner different from that of any other previous minister of finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Different from Mr. Harris; different from Mr. Abbott; different from Mr. Ilsley; different from Mr. Dunning; different from Mr. Rhodes; different from Lord Cobbald; different from Mr. Towers; and different from the statement made in the banking and commerce committee in 1956 by the present governor of the bank.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the hon. member for Laurier has just pointed out, we have taken issue with the view which the Minister of Finance has stated as to the ultimate responsibility of government in our country regarding all policies taken by all agencies, including the Bank of Canada. We had a correct statement of the true constitutional position this afternoon by the Secretary of State. The hon. member for Laurier has quoted some statements from that speech in support of the position taken by the Secretary of State in this regard but we have a most amazing situation now. The Minister of Finance has persisted in his narrow, archaic view of the responsibility of the government, and he has that position directly challenged by the Secretary of State.

Under our constitutional practice that kind of division in the cabinet cannot go unnoticed and cannot be allowed, constitutionally, to be perpetuated. Under our constitution either the Secretary of State resigns or the Minister of Finance resigns. So there can be no doubt about the position of the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Laurier has quoted from one observation made at page 2258 of Hansard of February 21 with regard to the minister's view of this matter, and I now quote another one which will be found at page 2256. I will then contrast it with some of the excerpts of the speech of the Secretary of State and if we are not then impressed with the disagreement between these two ministers I shall be very surprised.

An hon. Member: You will be surprised.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An hon. gentleman says that I will be surprised. Hon. gentlemen are in such a following mood that no matter what the Minister of Finance does they will follow blindly, whether or not it is in the interests of the country. Here is what the Minister of Finance said—

Mr. Drysdale: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drysdale: I should like to raise a point of order. I understood that we were on the committee aspect of this particular bill, and I should like to read from May's Parliamentary Practice, 16th edition, which has this to say:

The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill—

Mr. Pickersgill: What page?

Mr. Drysdale: Page 538;

The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable. The rules as to the admissibility of amendments are explained in detail ... below, but the general powers of a committee and the limitations by which it is bound should be clearly borne in mind.

1. A committee is bound by the decision of the house, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

It is my contention, Mr. Chairman, and I should like your ruling on this particular point, that we have gone over the principle of the bill ad nauseam on second reading and the opposition are now assuming the guise of asking what they contend are questions. I have heard hardly any questions dealing with the bill. I think they know the principle and I would suggest that they are entitled to speak only to this particular clause of the bill. I suggest that the hon. member for Essex East is out of order in the way he is discussing this particular clause.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that you did not take this point of order seriously. I would simply point out that if the hon. gentleman's contention were to be accepted it would be a denial of what the Minister of Finance said would be afforded the members of the committee. First of all, we have been denied the right to go to a standing committee of this house and now that that has been decided the government through some of its spokesmen, and we have heard just one, is trying to restrict our right in the committee of the whole.

Mr. Drysdale: I am just seeking to enforce the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not saying that is the position you are supporting, Mr. Chairman, I am simply indicating by the intervention that has been made what is the obvious intent of the administration with regard to this debate. Not only are we going to be denied the right to examine the governor and the board of directors in a standing committee of this house—

Mr. Drysdale: You never attend committees.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but if members of the Conservative party in this house have their way we are going to be denied the right to pursue a line of interrogation of our own intent with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More play acting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I for one do not propose to have that kind of closure applied to me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mock heroics.

The Chairman: Order. I thought the hon. member was speaking to the point of order. I certainly should like him to speak to the point which was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Drysdale: There is no answer.

The Chairman: I have indicated before my view that this is a very important question and I certainly should like the committee to give its views on this matter of the discussion in committee on clause 1 of a bill. Evidently this bill presents a special problem because there is only one clause, but since the point has been raised I would ask the hon. member for Essex East to discuss the merits or demerits of the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since you invite me, I do so. I had thought the point of order possessed so little merit that it did not require comment but since you have asked me I shall be very glad to do so. It will be recalled that this afternoon the Secretary of State made a speech in which he took a different position as to the responsibility of the government in the field of monetary policy—

Mr. Drysdale: On second reading.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in supporting the bill. In endeavouring to determine whether or not this bill should pass, the hon. member for Laurier has been trying to indicate a difference in point of view between the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State. What I am now doing is pursuing that point by examining further other statements of the Secretary of State and relating them to the stated policy of the government in the monetary field as stated by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Drysdale: Discuss the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have before us a bill of one clause and it is our practice on the first clause there is permitted the most general kind of discussion. On that point alone, of course, I would contend with confidence that there can be no doubt about the propriety of the kind of act in which I am now engaged—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "Act" is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and which the Leader of the Opposition and the member for Laurier pursued earlier today. To take any other view, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure this would be very much in Your Honour's mind, would mean that the assurances given the house by the Minister of Finance before the bill was projected in its present form are now to be reneged on by the government giving support to the raising of a point of order that has all the elements, I say, of intended closure.

Mr. Drysdale: Have you anything on the point of order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More bunk.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These lovers of freedom cannot stand by and listen to someone else. That is the reason they will not let Mr. Coyne go to the committee and be examined. We are called bully-boys but I think it is clear who are the bully-boys of the House of Commons tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: You are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): First of all, the practice is that on the first clause the most general kind of discussion is permitted.

Mr. Drysdale: Cite some authority.

Mr. Pickersgill: Howard Green.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to repeated requests for a committee of the house to go into this whole matter, we were told by the government before the bill was brought forward that the committee of the whole house was the place where this question would be aired, this place referred to as the final court of appeal by the Minister of Finance on another occasion. Now, because I am endeavouring first of all to show what the Minister of Finance's view of the responsibility of the government in the field of monetary policy is, because I am endeavouring to establish that that is not the view of his colleague, the Secretary of State, and because that difference is of very great relevance to the whole issue involved in the bill, it cannot seriously be argued that this line of pursuit and this form of interrogation and commentary are not within our rules. That is my submission.

I would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that the point was so obvious that no one would dare raise it or that no one would cause us to dwell on it.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, if you will forgive me, I should like to raise the very obvious point that no one would dare raise. I refer again to May 16th edition, page 551 where reference is made to proceedings in committee of the whole house, in these words:

> Proceedings on a bill begin by the chairman calling the first clause. The calling of a clause by the chairman brings it under the consideration of the committee, but does not entitle a member to speak generally upon the clause, as there is no question before the committee until an amendment has been moved, or the question proposed "that the clause stand part of the bill".

The hon. member has referred to the Secretary of State speaking this afternoon on second reading of the bill and he seeks to use the minister's statements on second reading to enforce his right to speak now when we are examining the bill clause by clause. I would suggest there has been a great deal of latitude for hon. members to make every observation which they should have made on second reading and I think the time has now come when we should get down to the examination of the clause, whether we have to do it word by word or by whatever other method is necessary.

Mr. Denis: There is nothing at all in the clause.

Mr. Drysdale: Well, pass it.

The Chairman: Order. There is one point that remains doubtful in my mind, the assertion by the hon. member for Essex East that the Minister of Finance indicated that such a discussion would be pertinent. I would not wish to dismiss this without hearing what the Minister of Finance has to say on this particular point. If, of course, there is some agreement of some kind, I think it would be the duty of the Chair to accept it. Before I deal with the problem, perhaps the Minister of Finance would assist the Chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no agreement of any kind, as is quite obvious, between the opposition and the government in this house. There is anything but agreement these days. In this regard, of course, the situation is that the house, by a decisive vote at five o'clock this afternoon, recorded its approval of the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill is, therefore, no longer in issue and remarks that relate to the principle of the bill are quite out of order in this committee.

Now, that leaves us on the clause, and the question then simply concerns the extent of the discussion on the clause of a bill. Even if there is, which I am not prepared to concede in the way in which the hon. member is arguing it, some latitude allowed on the first clause of a bill, the fact is that that latitude never has been regarded as extending to the reopening of the debate on the principle of the bill. This is what hon. members opposite are doing. They are quite within their rights, Mr. Chairman, in discussing matters related to the clause. They are quite at liberty to ask questions relating to the clause. As I said earlier, I will be happy to answer such questions as are relevant to the clause to the best of my ability.

Mr. Pearson: This clause about which the minister talks, and about which he is allowing us to ask him some questions, declares that the office of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant. This is the clause which discharges the governor of the Bank of Canada. We have the right in committee to try to ascertain the reasons for taking this action. We have already stated, Mr. Chairman, that if the government had seen fit to submit this matter to a committee of the house where witnesses could be called and evidence taken, that would be the best way to get the truth in connection with this matter. The government would not do that. The government now, by an act, and without a hearing, is going to discharge the governor.

The main reason the minister has given is that the government cannot co-operate with the governor in the field of monetary policy, among other things. This afternoon the Secretary of State said the government had responsibility for monetary policy. The minister has said dozens of times that the government has no responsibility for monetary policy. Until we can find out whether the governor is, in fact, being thrown out of his job because he would not co-operate in regard to monetary policy, are we not right in trying to reconcile these differences of opinion between two members of the same government? Until we try to do that, how can we get to the heart of this charge that the governor of the bank would not co-operate with the government of the country in the field of monetary policy?

The Chairman: Is this still on the point of order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to express, very respectfully, the hope that you would not entirely rule out of order what the hon. member for Essex East was saying a while ago—I mean within the last ten or 15 minutes—because he was so wrong I was hoping I would have the opportunity to put him right. He has misinterpreted what has been said in the past both by myself and other ministers of finance, including the minister of finance and prime minister in the recent Liberal administration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do I understand now that I am saved by my classmate who takes issue with one of the backbenchers who sought to deny me the right to speak? Am I to be allowed to continue?

The Chairman: I do not believe the Minister of Finance intended to indicate a ruling. Again, if there is agreement, I am willing to follow it. We are still on the point of order, and I understand the hon. member for Laurier wishes to speak to the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I do have something to say in speaking to the point of order. However, the point of order has been made far easier by the statement which has been made by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has made a statement in which he has indicated clearly he is inviting the hon. member for Essex East to continue his argument. Therefore, by implication, he declares that that argument is in order.

However, I did not rise, sir, for the purpose of saying that. I rose to put on Hansard, in answer to what was said by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, a statement which can be found in May's 16th edition, page 539, the first part of which the hon. member omitted to read. This citation reads, in part:

> It will be seen, however, that in spite of these limitations a committee has, in practice, considerable power over a bill. John Moore, a member of the Long Parliament states in his unpublished diary that "No committee can destroy a bill, but they may lay it down." Thus, while a bill cannot be withdrawn in committee, for this requires the leave of the house, a committee of the whole house can indirectly achieve this object by reporting progress, without asking leave to sit again, and so putting an end to its existence. This course is equivalent to refusing to proceed with the bill. Again, notwithstanding the rule which forbids the moving of an amendment which is destructive of the principle of the bill, there is nothing to prevent a committee of the whole house from negativing a clause or clauses, the omission of which may nullify or destroy the bill, and reporting the bill, as amended, to the house. In a standing committee, a motion may be moved "That the committee do not proceed further with the consideration of the bill", or an essential clause may be negatived. A standing committee has, in fact, disagreed to all the clauses of a bill and made a special report to the house.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member did not read what he should have read when he raised the point of order.

An hon. Member: There is another important paragraph.

Mr. Chevrier: The author comes to the conclusion that, in spite of the limitations to which the hon. member has referred, the committee still has considerable power over a bill. As has been stated already, this is a bill of an extraordinary nature. It is a bill with far-reaching effects. It is a bill which seeks to discharge, not an ordinary servant but a public servant of the crown and the greatest latitude I submit, with deference, should be allowed in the discussion of this matter. We should be allowed to put the questions which we intend to put and which we have now just begun to put so that we may get answers from the minister. With all respect, sir, I say that the hon. member for Essex East was in order in the discussion he was pursuing.

The Chairman: As I said before, this is a very difficult point of order. I have been thinking of the procedure which is followed generally without any formal objections being raised. I must say that I would have preferred the point to be raised on a bill other than this one. However, there is no doubt but that, the purpose of the committee is to examine the clauses of the bill one by one and the details of the bill are to be considered. I refer hon. members to standing order 78.

The problem raised is one of relevancy and not of procedure, as the hon. member for Laurier has suggested by citing this paragraph from May, page 539, the paragraph coming after the one which was quoted by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. Standing order 59, paragraph 2 states that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. These are the two general rules that we find in our standing orders. There is, of course, the other general rule to the effect that we cannot revive or discuss a problem which has been disposed of by the house. The house has made a decision on the second reading of this bill or has reached a decision. It is therefore difficult to take it that in committee of the whole the same wide scope of debate should be allowed as is allowed on second reading when we are discussing the principle.

I will not say what is the exact scope of debate at this time. However, I should give some indication as to where I would think hon. members would be out of bounds, subject to clarification if necessary. For instance, I would say that many of the remarks made tonight have had to do with the principle of the bill which has been disposed of. I would think that these remarks would not be in order. I would say that reviving the debate on second reading in some points only for the purpose of trying to reconcile or to oppose views would not be in order. I would also say that reviewing the whole monetary or fiscal policy would be out of order unless these matters were related to the difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

It has been pointed out that the most general kind of discussion is generally allowed on clause 1 of the bill. I will not subscribe to this rather sweeping statement. I have checked on Hansard in previous years. I note that general debate, not unlimited debate has been allowed on clause 1. No decision has been made as to the exact scope. I do not wish to go further than that for the time being. I suggest that a problem is presented here. If there is co-operation on all sides in an effort to be practical and not to revive the debate on second reading, I suggest that we can get along without making a formal ruling and without deciding that this practice has not been in accordance with the standing orders. I do not wish to say whether we should follow it now or whether a view should be expressed by the house that we should abandon it. For the time being I simply give this indication in asking the co-operation of all hon. members in order that the discussion may not extend too far afield.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am speaking in opposition to this bill. The argument I am going to make is in opposition to the sole clause in this bill. As I had been indicating, the Minister of Finance, as found at page 2256 of Hansard for Tuesday, February 21, stated the following which I think is the most comprehensive statement he has made on this business of responsibility for monetary policy which, of course, goes to the very essence of the bill before us. This is the speech of the Minister of Finance:

> Mr. Speaker, I think that these are words that will help to put this subject into its proper focus and perspective. However, Mr. Speaker, the issue that the Liberal opposition has chosen to raise in this debate is an issue as to where responsibility lies with respect to monetary policy in Canada. The Leader of the Opposition has certainly striven to the utmost to create maximum confusion on this subject and then exploit it. Let me leave no doubt in the mind of any hon. member in this house, Mr. Speaker, the government is always prepared to assume its responsibility. It will always measure up to that responsibility and will hold itself accountable to parliament at all times. We have given abundant evidence of that respectful relationship. And, sir, so far as I am personally concerned in this relationship that the minister of finance has with the Bank of Canada, I also give the house full assurance that any matters on which the minister of finance has responsibility, has any duty cast upon him, so long as I have the honour to hold this office that responsibility will be accepted. There will be no attempt to deny or reduce it. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to pretend before this house that I have the power in certain areas that I do not, as minister of finance, possess. I do not think it is proper on an issue of this kind for the Leader of the Opposition to pretend that the power or authority which exists is held by the government or the minister of finance when in fact parliament has legislated otherwise. The government is not omnipotent; parliament is, within the terms of the British North America Act and federal jurisdiction. The government's power in all matters financial is derived from parliament; it depends upon enactments.
> Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition sought yesterday to create or present an issue as though it lay between the government and the Bank of Canada. I shall have something to say on this subject. I say, Mr. Speaker, and this is the keynote of what I am about to submit, that in the field of monetary policy parliament has given the essential authority to the Bank of Canada and not to the government or to the minister of finance. When we look for the place where power resides with respect to money supply in Canada we find that parliament has given no power to the government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition criticized monetary policy yesterday he was not, as he tried to represent, criticizing the government. He was criticizing the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Go on; read the next sentence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All right. I shall read the next sentence. It has no relevancy; but if it will please my hon. friend to quote his further words I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Read on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Very well. I shall do so.

> The Leader of the Opposition added the pretence, for his own partisan purpose, that the government has responsibility.

That is precisely our position, namely that the government has ultimate responsibility.

We are supported in that position by the Secretary of State who said this afternoon as follows:

(Translation):

The minister is right, of course, when he says that their policies should be parallel and harmonious, but it is surely the duty of the government to take steps in order to ensure, while accepting responsibility for policies, that they are parallel and harmonious.

(Text):

Then the Secretary of State continued as follows, and I ask the Secretary of State to listen to this.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was a very good speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Secretary of State continued:

(Translation):

—I will give only a few quotations to prove clearly that all the parties represented in the House of Commons at that time expressed the unanimous opinion that the principle of that act was to subordinate the Bank of Canada's monetary policy to the economic and fiscal policy of the government itself.

(Text):

That statement is in direct contradiction to the statement of the Minister of Finance on February 21.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't be so absurd.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "Don't be absurd". I saw what happened today. I saw the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance when the Secretary of State was speaking. The Minister of Finance looked over at the Secretary of State and he seemed to be saying to the Prime Minister, "Unbelievable".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it was not that, at any rate the Minister of Finance was so greatly embarrassed by that expression of disagreement by his colleague—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of order or privilege. The hon. member is asking the committee to believe that this afternoon I used the expression "Unbelievable". The expression that I conveyed by my looks and by my words this afternoon, so far as the speech of my colleague the Secretary of State was concerned, was "Admirable", "Magnificent".

An hon. Member: And contradictory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, Mr. Chairman, you will recognize at once how improper this point of order was. In view of the character of this debate I express the hope that when a minister of the crown or any one of us takes issue with anything or raises points of order which are fictitious, the Chair will be vigilant in seeing that synthetic points of order like that one are not permitted to be pursued. What really happened, I think, was this and I perhaps did my hon. friend an injustice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You certainly did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister did not say "Unbelievable". When he heard the Secretary of State correctly state the relationship of the government in the field of monetary policy—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, you have not understood.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —what he said to the Prime Minister was "Rubbish". I say in this instance the Secretary of State was not guilty of speaking rubbish. He was—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are though.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —stating the correct position, a position that has been taken by every one of my hon. friend's predecessors. He is the only man occupying the post of minister of finance who has abdicated the responsibilities of government such as the one that concerns the Bank of Canada primarily and ultimately, as it should in this case, the government of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member give me the floor for two minutes—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —to expose the hon. gentleman in the statement he has just made?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend give me the opportunity to reply to further observations he has made in this regard? He can have the floor afterwards.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are making statements that are just not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the Minister of Finance to contain himself. It is true his conduct is now being examined, but he should show the calm that is expected of one who by manner can prove he is not guilty.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speakman: May I call to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East and the committee that standing order 59(2) says that the debate shall be relevant. May I quote from the bill. The explanatory note says:

The purpose of this bill is to provide that a vacancy—

And so on. I believe the hon. member for Essex East has departed very far from the purport of the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And farther still from the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, may I finish my argument and see whether I have departed very far from the bill.

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member continues may I just say this to him. I indicated some time ago that I did not consider relevant a discussion of the speeches made this afternoon with regard to certain points in order to ascertain whether or not they could be reconciled. I do not wish to lay down too strict a line. I am simply warning the hon. member that it seems to me he has not taken this view into consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure Your Honour will not take exception to what I am about to say. But I wish to say this, because this debate is by no means over. We intend in this house—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in this party to resort to every legitimate method open to us to ensure that we will not be denied the right of fully examining this matter in this committee of the whole to every possible extent.

An hon. Member: Sabotaging the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let that be regarded as a statement of our intention in this debate, no matter what the consequences are.

Mr. Grafftey: Filibuster.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You are taking over, eh, Paul?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says what we have said now has no relevancy. Let us examine how futile this argument is.

Mr. Hees: Oh, oh, a new leader.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen opposite, including the Minister of Transport—

Mr. Hees: Trade and commerce, Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —should be listening and trying to learn something.

Mr. Chevrier: He has been demoted. He is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This bill says:

> The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

I am opposed to this bill—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, there are many ways of imposing closure and hon. gentlemen tonight—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You know them all. You applied every one of them in 1956.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and hon. gentlemen tonight—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: Run for the flag.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I know that you are going to take every precaution to see that we are given every opportunity of expressing our views. One way of imposing closure is by an overwhelming majority—

Mr. Grafftey: It is by filibustering.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —of the government of Canada to prevent hon. members from expressing themselves. I want to serve notice on the Conservative party that none of us in the Liberal party is going to be denied the right of exposing this government in this matter to the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: It doesn't seem to have any effect on you.

Some hon. Members: Bravo.

Mr. Hees: Leader Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So that—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Essex East has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —our intentions in this regard will not come as a surprise, let me say we can stay here for weeks—

Some hon. Members: So can we.

Mr. Ricard: What do you think we are doing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in order to entangle—

Mr. Drysdale: You are entangled already.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in order to disentangle and dissect, to demonstrate to the people of Canada the real truth behind this act; that the government is taking this way of getting rid of the governor of the Bank of Canada by way of a bill of attainder.

Mr. Grafftey: Threatened filibuster.

Mr. Benidickson: It was exchange operations; that was the reason for it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member by what method he proposes, as he just said, to dissect the people of Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The removal of the governor from office can be requested on several grounds—

Some hon. Members: Ten thirty.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It can be requested on the ground that he has pursued a monetary policy that is contrary to the policy of the government.

Mr. Drysdale: And violation of the oath of secrecy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What we are seeking to establish here is that this could not possibly arise in this instance because the Minister of Finance has said that this government under no condition is in any way responsible for monetary policy.

Some hon. Members: Ten thirty.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That being the case, how can it be argued that the governor of the Bank of Canada should be removed because he has taken issue with the government in the field of monetary policy? That is the reason why the hon. member for Laurier has been contrasting the statement of the Secretary of State with the declared policy of the Minister of Finance. It is because these two statements are different and these two ministers differ that under our constitutional practice there is no doubt as to what should happen. That is that the Secretary of State or the Minister of Finance should resign. That is the clear, constitutional responsibility.

An hon. Member: Or the whole government.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Don't hold your breath waiting for that to happen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no doubt that will not happen, because if there was ever a government that failed to have regard for its constitutional responsibility, it is this government that tonight seeks to impose its will upon the rest of us.

Mr. Benidickson: It was exchange operations.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Paul, are you Wayne and Shuster?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the business for tomorrow will be a continuation of the debate on Bill No. C-114, followed by the other legislative items that I announced last evening.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not call that a debate.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.N.R. GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAX, HALIFAX

Question No. 263—Mr. Morris:

1. Does the Canadian National Railways pay grants to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on Canadian National Railways property?

2. If so, what is the formula used in the payment of such grants, and is the formula related to the so-called commercial tax rate or to the residential tax rate applied by the city of Halifax to taxpayers?

3. What was the total grant paid by the Canadian National Railways to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on Canadian National Railways properties in (a) 1956 (b) 1957 (c) 1958 (d) 1959 (e) 1960?

4. What was the total accepted value of Canadian National Railways properties on which the 1960 grant to the city of Halifax was based, what portion represented land, and what portion represented buildings?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

Question

1. Yes.

2. Valuation: Railway roadway, according to average value of adjoining lands. Land, other than roadway, at actual value. Buildings, stations, freight sheds, offices, warehouses, elevators, hotels, roundhouses and machine repair and other shops at actual value.

Rate: 50 per cent of the merged average rate of taxation for the five year period immediately preceding the commencement year of the agreement. "Merged rate"—means the effective rate if the residential and commercial rates were not operative.

Note: Land and buildings thereon, under lease are excluded from the grant. Valuations are revised annually to allow for changes in holdings and leaseholds.

3. Railway: 1956, $75,000.00; 1957, $75,348.53; 1958, $75,615.81; 1959, $82,305.00; 1960, $84,884.37.

Hotels: 1956, $21,168.13; 1957, $21,278.58; 1958, $63,500.00; 1959, $63,500.00; 1960, $53,500.00.

House: 1956, $583.50; 1957, $729.25; 1958, $652.75; 1959, $727.35; 1960, $849.75.

Office Building: 1956, $9,013.93; 1957, $10,003.26; 1958, $10,003.26; 1959, $10,003.26; 1960, $10,217.86.

4. Grant: Land, $3,765,200; buildings, $1,727,560; Total, $5,492,760.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 5, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Second report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. McBain.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS TO BE MOVED

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I, following the practice that I have adopted in these matters, ask leave to give the house notice of an amendment that I shall be introducing to Bill No. C-120, an act to amend the Income Tax Act when it is reached in committee. The amendment will be that the bill be amended by striking out lines 41 and 42 on page 7 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

—the year in which it was received, from duties that shall be deemed to have been performed by him in Canada in that year, unless it can be established, by subsequent—

The other change is simply a textual one. In clause 23 of the bill, line 33, at page 19, the word "is" should read "are".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF FIFTH MEETING OF CANADA-U.S. INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house may I table the report of the fifth meeting of the Canada-United States interparliamentary group held recently in Washington. These are copies in English and in French. I have not had an opportunity of speaking to the house leader or to hon. members about this report. In the past, however, it has been printed as an appendix to Hansard. If the Prime Minister would like to see that practice continued, this would be the appropriate time to deal with it.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this organization, unofficial as it is, since its inception two years ago has made an exceptional contribution to an understanding by legislators not only of Canada but of the United States of those problems that affect us. I am sure the house would want the inclusion of this report as an appendix to Hansard so there will be available to all hon. members a record of the outstanding deliberations that took place just recently.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a good idea to put this report in as an appendix to Hansard as the record of a meeting which is another stage in the development of a piece of international machinery that could be of great benefit to both countries concerned.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we think it is appropriate that this report should be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed, then, that the report now tabled be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of report referred to above, see appendix A.]

APPLICATION FOR RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION, B.C.-YUKON

Question No. 434—Mr. Howard:

Has the Pacific Northern Railway Company made any application to the Canadian government for a licence to build a railway through any part of British Columbia or the Yukon Territory and, if so, what was the date of the application, the route covered, and the decision of the government with respect thereto?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that no such application has been received.

[Mr. Herridge.]

TEACHER'S RESIDENCE, CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 435—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1957, has a teacher's residence been built on or for the Caughnawaga Indian reserve?
2. If so: (a) what was the cost of the building? (b) the name and address of the contractor? (c) was any of the material or work found to be defective or not in accordance with the specifications, and, if so, what are the details surrounding this?
3. What was the cost of bringing the residence up to standard or replacing the defective materials?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this question be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

[Later:]

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have permission to revert to question No. 435.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Tassé: The answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes.
2. (a) $77,765.38.
   (b) Simeon Marcil, St. Chrysostome, P.Q.
   (c) Yes. The building was inspected by departmental architects on June 14, 1961 and the deficiencies, all of which were minor, were noted.
3. The deficiencies are being corrected by the contractor at no cost to the department.

CHARTERED BANKS MERGER

Question No. 436—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Has the Minister of Finance been approached by any of the existing chartered banks with a view to exploring the possible approval of another banks' merger?
2. If so, which banks made such approach, and when was it made?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I stated last week in reply to a similar question, there are no such applications. I have not received any.

SUMMONS FOR FAILURE TO ANSWER CENSUS QUESTIONS

Question No. 438—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Has the minister any information to give to the house on a summons served on Mr. Jacques Roy, a Vancouver T.V. and radio commentator, in connection with his answers to questions on the census?
2. Would the minister advise whether this is the only case of summons being issued in connection with failure to answer questions on the census form?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this case was heard in Vancouver court on Wednesday, June 28, 1961 and at the request of defence counsel was adjourned until Thursday, July 6, 1961 at 2.30 p.m. As the matter is sub judice it would be inappropriate for me to comment further.

This is the only case where proceedings are going forward at the moment. There are a small number of cases of refusal being investigated. The bureau is not interested in securing fines or imprisonment, but rather in securing the information required under the law. Every effort is made to avoid court action, which is taken only as a last resort.

NATIONAL MUSEUM—CITIZENSHIP OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 439—Mr. Herridge:

1. As of March 10, 1959, did any employees of (a) the natural history branch (b) the human history branch, of the national museum, not hold British or Canadian citizenship?
2. If so, what were their names, the positions held, in what branch of the museum, on what date were they first employed, and what citizenship did each hold?
3. Are any of these people still employed by the museum?
4. If so, in what position and branch of the museum, and what are the duties of each?

Starred Questions

5. How many appointments have been made to the staffs of (a) the museum of natural history (b) the museum of human history, since March 10, 1959?
6. Have any of these persons not held Canadian or British citizenship at the time of their appointment?
7. If so: (a) what is the name of each such person? (b) in what branch is each employed, and what positions has each held on what dates? (c) What citizenship does each person hold?
8. Were any of these appointments to the museum staff not made through the usual civil service competition?
9. If so, (a) which ones (b) on what authority were they appointed, and on what date?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes to both (a) and (b). The answer to part 3 is yes. The answer to part 5 is (a) 15 and (b) 12. The answer to part 6 is 2. The answer to part 8 is no. Part 9 is therefore not applicable.

The answers to parts 2, 4 and 7 are lengthy, and if it meets with the approval of the hon. member and the house, Mr. Speaker, may I have these answers printed in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

APPENDIX "C"

Duties Performed by Persons shown in Appendices A and B

Q. 2

H. A. Crum: Associate curator, cryptogamic botany: studies the taxonomy, ecology and distribution of Canadian bryophytes both in the field and in the laboratory; prepares for publication occasional papers and monographs based on original research; selects material to be retained in the cryptogamic herbarium and supervises the preparation and arrangement of specimens of mosses, liverworts, lichens and algae; improves the herbarium by restudying older collections and revising determinations; makes material available for study through loans and exchanges; determines specimens for other botanists; answers inquiries from the public.

W. Langston, Jr.: Curator of vertebrate palaeontology: research on fossil vertebrates, including geological, taxonomic, anatomical and biological aspects; publication of scientific reports and popular articles in this field; supervision of the museum collection of fossil vertebrates, including acquisition, records, identification, labelling and arrangement; design and supervision of preparation of museum exhibits in vertebrate palaeontology, including the writing of labels; direction of the laboratory of vertebrate palaeontology, where specimens are prepared for study and exhibition (three preparators and one artist); direction of museum expeditions for the collection of fossils; maintenance of knowledge of recent advances in vertebrate palaeontology, through reading current literature and through contacts with other workers in Canada and abroad; delivering of popular lectures and radio and television expositions on fossils.

R. S. MacNeish: As senior archaeologist, to be responsible to the director for the planning of program, and the general administration of the archaeology section; to plan and carry out research in archaeology, including the preparation of reports; to advise the archaeological staff on their research; to be curator of the archaeology collection, and to supervise directly the work of the cataloguer and the storemen; to supervise from a scientific standpoint the preparation of archaeological exhibits; to prepare popular articles and give lectures in archaeology; to answer inquiries in archaeology from specialists and from the public.

L. Oschinsky: Under direction, to plan and carry out anthropological studies in various parts of Canada and to analyse material on this subject held in the national museum; to prepare technical correspondence, reports and scientific papers thereon; to provide guidance on exhibition of materials; as required, to assist with and present lectures or prepare educational information for the public; as required, to supervise professional and subordinate staff; to perform other related duties as required.

A. Balikci: To plan and carry out research in social anthropology and ethnography, including field work; to prepare reports on his research, and reviews of related work; to act as curator of parts of the ethnological collections; to assist in the preparation of ethnological exhibits; to answer inquiries in ethnology from specialists, and from the public; to prepare popular articles and to give lectures in his special field.

T. Twarecki: Under direction, to prepare and catalogue anthropological collections of the human history branch; to assist in the restoration work on all difficult material and to maintain proper storage conditions to protect specimens against decay, insects, drought and other forms of deterioration; to make materials available for exhibits and scientific study and to be responsible for the receiving and shipping of specimens; as required, to lecture on the restoration of specimens; to conduct correspondence in connection with the duties, and to perform other related duties as required.

Q. 7

P. M. Youngman: Under direction, to plan and undertake research and field investigations on Canadian mammals, particularly in the fields of taxonomy and distribution; to collect, identify, and direct the cataloguing and arrangement of mammal specimens in the collection; to supervise the use of the collection by others; to prepare scientific and popular reports on mammals; to give lectures; to represent the national museum at meetings dealing with mammalogy; to participate in the planning and preparation of exhibits of mammals.

A. H. Clarke, Jr.: Under direction of the chief of the zoology section to carry out research on the taxonomy, distribution and ecology of one or more phyla of invertebrate animals other than the arthropoda; to undertake field investigations on the invertebrate fauna of Canada, and to collect specimens for study and exhibition; to act as curator of part of the museum collection of invertebrates, including the mollusca; to prepare scientific reports and popular articles within the field of study; to give lectures and demonstrations; to assist in planning exhibits; to make routine identifications of invertebrates submitted by the public, other scientists and agencies; to perform other related duties.

A. D. DeBlois: To plan, organize and carry out studies in linguistics, which includes field work and the collection of material for, and supervision of, research; to present to the public by lectures, speeches or other media educational data concerning the subject matter; to prepare reports and manuscripts on this subject; to answer public inquiries and correspondence; to perform other related duties.

HOMER STEVENS—ISSUE OF DIPLOMATIC PASSPORT

Question No. 441—Mr. Howard:

Was a Mr. Homer Stevens, secretary treasurer of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union, provided with a special diplomatic passport in 1957, and, if so, upon what date was the said passport issued, and for what purpose was it issued and used?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is no.

SOULANGES CANAL—TENDERS FOR PURCHASE OF EAST END

Question No. 442—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the Department of Transport receive tenders from industry in relation to the purchase of the east end of the Soulanges canal at Pointe des Cascades?
2. If so, what is the list of names, addresses, and amounts of such bidders?
3. How many employees are likely to be engaged in each case?
4. What action has the government taken on these tenders?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Stand.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport the fact that on Monday he indicated that he had received tenders. I wonder why he could not answer question No. 442 rather than having it stand.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, when I said we had received tenders, that was the fact. We had received tenders, but we have received further tenders since then. We received one yesterday. In order to be able to answer questions of hon. gentlemen my officials have to process these tenders. I will answer this question as soon as we have the complete list for the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: The expiry date was June 30.

SOULANGES CANAL—LETTER RESPECTING SALE OF EAST END

Question No. 443—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the Minister of Transport receive a letter from the municipality of the village of Pointe des Cascades concerning the sale of the eastern end of the Soulanges canal?
2. On what date?
3. What was the purport of the letter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes, from the mayor of the municipality.
2. Received June 6, 1961.
3. The letter indicated that the members of the first council of the municipality of Pointe des Cascades incorporated June 1, 1961 objected to the sale of the canal property at Cascades Point to private interests and recommended that the Soulanges canal property be turned over gratuitously to the province of Quebec.

SOULANGES CANAL—RESOLUTION CONCERNING USE OF EAST END

Question No. 444—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the Minister of Transport receive a copy of a resolution passed by la commission d'expansion industrielle de Vaudreuil-Soulanges concerning the use of the eastern end of the Soulanges canal at Pointe des Cascades?
2. On what date?
3. What was the purport of the resolution?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answers to this question are as follows:

1. There is no record of any copy of a resolution adopted by la commission d'expansion industrielle de Vaudreuil-Soulanges having been received in the department.

2 and 3. Not applicable.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRANTS TO INCORPORATED COMPANIES

Question No. 240—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1950, have any grants been paid to incorporated companies other than crown corporations?
2. If so, with respect to each such company, what is (a) its name, address, and type of business (b) the amount of the grant by period of payment (c) the total amount paid to date (d) the expiry date of the grant (e) the authority for such payment (f) date upon which each grant came into effect (g) the date and nature of any change in the grant?

SUBVENTION PAYMENTS TO INCORPORATED COMPANIES

Question No. 281—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1950, have any subventions been paid to any incorporated companies other than crown corporations?
2. If so, with respect to each such company, what is (a) the amount of the subvention by period of payment (b) the total amount paid to date (c) its name, address, and type of business (d) the expiry date, if any, of the subvention (e) the authority for each such payment (f) the date upon which each subvention came into effect (g) the date and nature of any change in the subventions?

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to mention this matter. This request by the minister for orders for returns relates to questions of mine. There is a third question of a similar nature, No. 282. I wonder whether this would not be in the same category and if it should not be made an order for return.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, question No. 282 applies to loans over an 11-year period to companies other than crown corporations, and requests the details of each. To supply this information would involve unreasonable labour and expense on the part of at least one department.

In Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for example, it would involve the examination of thousands of accounts over an 11-year period. For this reason it does not seem to be appropriate to suggest that the question, as it now stands, be made an order for return.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF MOTION FOR PAPERS APPEARING IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Before orders of the day are called, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the house for leave to proceed with two notices of motion for the production of papers standing in my name to be found at the back of today's Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): In the same way as the previous speaker I also would ask unanimous consent to move the notice of motion for the production of papers which appears in my name in today's Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any objection to proceeding with the three notices of motion for the production of papers which appear at the back of today's Votes and Proceedings, two in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East and one in the name of the hon. member for St. Ann?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Before you ask the house for that consent, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we might have a moment to look at these. We have not seen them yet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. members spoke to me about these questions. I understood that each had been discussed with the minister concerned and that there had been no objection.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): If I understood the hon. member correctly, he mentioned this motion, No. 155, for a copy of plans and the agreement made on May 19, 1961 between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board relating to the Champlain bridge approaches, the Pointe St. Charles dump, and the causeway leading to Ste. Helen island. As far as I am concerned there is no objection to it.

The same applies to the two following motions in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East, Nos. 156 and 157. There is no objection as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that these motions may be proceeded with, notwithstanding the inadequacy of notice?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Dorion.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PLANS AND AGREEMENT RESPECTING CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE APPROACHES, ETC.

Motion No. 155—Mr. Loiselle:

For a copy of plans and the agreement made on May 19, 1961, between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board, relating to the Champlain bridge approaches, Pointe St. Charles dump, and the causeway leading to Ste. Helen island.

Motion agreed to.

BELL ISLAND FERRY SERVICE

Motion No. 156—Mr. McGrath:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Transport and the government of Newfoundland since June 27, 1957, respecting the Bell island ferry service.

Motion agreed to.

BELL ISLAND FERRY SERVICE

Motion No. 157—Mr. McGrath:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian maritime commission and the government of Newfoundland since June 27, 1957, respecting the Bell island ferry service.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Acceptance of this motion is subject to the usual reservation in reference to obtaining permission from the province.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFER TO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer).

Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether his department has come to a decision with regard to the Soulanges canal and whether the government has decided to turn over the entire canal to the Quebec government?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a decision has been made and it will be announced tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CROP CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister anything further to report in respect to the very disastrous crop conditions in western Canada and, in particular, can the minister inform the house whether the government has in mind any action for making direct payments to producers who suffer crop losses or losses in income?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is very pleased to see the hon. member for Assiniboia back in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: As well as the minister.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I should like to remind the long-absent Minister of Agriculture that my return to the House of Commons preceded his.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister was on public business, not personal politics.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia was away on one type of business while I was away in respect to the business of the western farmers.

A meeting of the three western agriculture ministers and their staffs, the premier of Manitoba, the Minister of National Defence and myself representing the federal government, was held last Sunday in Winnipeg. At that time we went over the plans of the various provinces to meet the exceptional drought conditions of this year in the west. We formally went through the plans for the traditional freight assistance for the movement of fodder to cattle. It was made clearly apparent that in many parts of the country there would not be enough fodder to move even if there was freight assistance, so we discussed a program of switching the farmers in western Canada who have cattle herds to feeding grain in preference to fodder.

The federal government also made an offer to the provinces to double its community pasture program whereby the federal government would move grain to the community pastures enabling the doubling of the population if necessary, so that farmers not able to get fodder and who do not have water could bring their cattle to these pastures. The provincial and federal governments agreed that there should be a joint program of extension aimed particularly at the agricultural population of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, to point out the economics of grain feeding as opposed to fodder feeding and how the techniques of switching from one grain to another which is in supply can be used.

We discussed at some length the application of the agricultural prices support legislation, but it was the hope of us all that by certain techniques we could keep the flow of cattle moving to commercial markets in such a way that prices would not drop, so there would be no need to use price supports. The provincial governments expressed gratification in respect to our willingness to use support prices, and we discussed various grades to which it would apply, and so on.

Finally I should like to add a word and say that the situation as far as the cattle industry is concerned is quite serious. Weather conditions have deteriorated during the last 10 days. However, the essential fact to keep in mind is that there is no surplus of beef production in North America. There is no need for prices to decline if the movement of cattle to market is kept under good control. It was the declared intention of the four governments to see that this is done.

In regard to the last question asked by the hon. member in relation to payments, I think I can say that the federal government in 1958, through the words of the Prime Minister and his national agricultural program, among other things offered a program of crop insurance and a program of forage banks. I think the events of the last few months indicate the wisdom of this program, and I am sure the experience this year will convince the provincial governments across Canada that they would be very wise to inaugurate a hard sell campaign, selling crop insurance to farmers to enable farmers to build up a fund to meet this type of emergency, so as not to be faced with the tremendous drop in income such as they are now faced with.

The federal government stands ready at all times to see that everything possible is done to ameliorate conditions in any part of Canada, whether it be Prince Edward Island or the western provinces.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not feel that consideration should be given to cash payments to western producers, not only because of crop losses but also because of the added expense this year of combating the grasshopper and cutworm plagues? My second supplementary question, in view of the minister's reference to crop insurance, is this. I wonder whether the government has under consideration any amendments to the act so the federal government itself might bear part of the liability for crop losses, the whole of which is now shouldered by provincial governments; and has the government considered any change in its 20 per cent payment toward premium costs?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to answer the second part of the question first. The present Crop Insurance Act is enabling legislation which allows any province to set up a scheme suitable to its own needs. The federal government provides 20 per cent of the premium by way of assistance to farmers to induce them to participate. There is nothing to prevent any provincial government from joining with the federal government in giving help by way of a contribution to the farmer's premium.

Second, the government is considering ways and means to improve any and all of our legislation, and this includes the crop insurance legislation. I think it is very clear that if under the terms of the present act there is overpayment on any insurance scheme in the first few years after the insurance plan has been set up there will be a heavy burden, but the fact remains that the federal government has offered to lend such schemes 75 per cent of the cost of any over-call on the scheme.

There has been a suggestion by the province of Manitoba that there be an additional reinsurance provision so that any province would not be seriously jeopardized in its credit arrangements if there was a heavy loss. This particular aspect of the situation is under review.

With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question as to the general loss suffered by farmers, I think this government has demonstrated that whenever there has been a serious loss of income, as in the case of the farmers of Prince Edward Island last fall with regard to their potatoes and as in the case of the western farmers, we have always been ready to consider some suitable means of coming to their assistance. I should like to remind the house that in 1958 and in 1960 the federal government made an acreage payment to western farmers which was opposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and now I have—

Mr. Argue: That is not true. That is a lie.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder whether I might get in a brief remark after the long speech of the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the condemnation by the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan regarding the wholly inefficient way in which the crop insurance scheme is being applied, and owing to the fact that no province other than Manitoba is really participating in the scheme, may I ask the minister if the government will not agree to take steps to provide a crop insurance plan that will apply to all ten provinces and not just to one, that is Manitoba, which took the initiative long before this government acted in the matter?

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member for Essex East is away out on his facts. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island are now actively exploring various crop insurance schemes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what I said.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These programs will be worked out and I am quite positive that under the type of legislation we have, which allows each province to set up a scheme suitable to its own needs, insurance on special crops and on cereal crops will spread all across this country in the next few years. With regard to the words of the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, I think he is just suffering from the fact that in his province they tried to extend crop insurance by a correspondence course rather than going out and selling it across the kitchen table.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the misinformation given to the house by the Minister of Agriculture, may I ask him if it is not a fact that at least eight provinces are not now participating in this anaemic crop insurance scheme of the government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member for Essex East did not hear me say that certain provinces, and I listed them, are now working on plans for crop insurance in their provinces. Therefore the figure of eight provinces not co-operating is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman persists in ignoring the nature of the question. Is it a fact that eight provinces—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think any further debate should be reserved for the estimates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that you allowed the Minister of Agriculture to make extended statements. As we are coming to the adjournment of the session I think we are entitled to place on the record the real facts involved in the situation. I do so by way of a question. I simply ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is seeking to ask a supplementary question which is a repetition of the question he has already asked, and it seems to me that with the number of supplementaries the whole situation has been sufficiently aired.

INQUIRIES RESPECTING CONCENTRATED MILK, SOYBEANS, BUTTER, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister be in a position in the near future to make an announcement concerning the recent request of the concentrated milk producers?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this matter is before the government for decision. As soon as a decision has been arrived at it will be announced in the house.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has yet made a decision and is in a position to announce a floor price on soybeans, and if at this very late date in the year the government is prepared at long last to make a decision with regard to a price for Ontario grown wheat?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the other day in the house I answered a similar question by saying that there are a number of commodities before the government for consideration at the present time for decision on the terms of support price. When a decision is made it will be announced.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should also like to direct a supplementary question to the minister, if I may. Has the government reached a conclusion about the reduction in the consumer price for butter which was forecast by the minister more than six months ago?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer to that question is that by the government's announcement the hon. gentleman will know that a decision has been reached.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF FLORENCE COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just going to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not the question I was going to ask.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, two days ago the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked whether the government had made a proposal to the Dominion Steel and Coal Company for stretching out the work at the Florence colliery and, if so, what attitude had been taken by the company.

I am informed that a meeting was held on Friday, June 23, between representatives of the united mine workers and of the government on the closure of this colliery. At this meeting a proposal was made that some amount of additional work could be made available if complete salvage was made of all the equipment in the mine. It was agreed to refer this proposal to the company for its consideration and advice with the understanding that, if found practical by the company, the government would consider some financial assistance to permit of full recovery.

The proposal was placed before the president of Dominion Steel and Coal Company, and the technical details were also reviewed with the vice president in charge of mining operations. The government did not make any proposal, but simply transmitted to the company for consideration and advice the suggestion made at the meeting. The company advised that, both on general and technical grounds, the complete salvage of all material was not practical, and that the amount of extra employment that might be made available was not sufficient to justify the effort.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. Actually I rose to ask another question which I should like to put now to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

TRADE

SALT FISH—DISPOSAL OF CARRYOVER AND PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he could give a report, either today or at any rate before the adjournment, which we hope will be before too long, on the success of his department in assisting in the disposal of the overhang of salt fish on the market from last year and if he could indicate whether there have been any discussions with the Minister of Fisheries and the fisheries price support board to ensure that there will not be a serious fall in the price of salt fish because of the loss of the Cuban market and other marketing difficulties.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will be glad to look into the question and give the hon. member an answer as soon as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question in view of the announced strike deadline set by the air line flight attendants association in its dispute with Trans-Canada Air Lines. Can the minister inform the house what steps are being taken to ensure that an agreement is reached between the two parties?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Labour has been in constant touch with and on top of the events occurring in this dispute. Because of our interest and concern in the matter, a meeting has been arranged which is being held in Montreal with a mediator from the Department of Labour taking part in the discussions. We hope the parties will come to an agreement as a result of this meeting.

Mr. Howard: Could the minister inform the house of the name of this mediator?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Duquette.

Mr. Howard: In view of the fact that Mr. Duquette was unable to effect a settlement at an earlier stage, does the minister not think that someone of the calibre of Mr. Eric Taylor should attempt a settlement?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, we have been quite successful in the past in our attempts to settle disputes, and we shall continue on that basis.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—REPORTED COURT ACTION BY C.M.H.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and ask him to comment on a press report of this morning to the effect that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have filed an action in the courts to recover some apartments built in Montreal.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had the opportunity of reading that report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES —CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of a Canadian Press dispatch of July 4 stating that an informed source said that the Canadian government has decided to defer joining the organization of American states but intends to play a bigger direct role in Latin American affairs, is the minister in a position to inform the house of the government's position in this matter?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on external affairs about two months ago I dealt with this question. The situation remains as it was explained at that time. The question as to whether or not Canada should join the organization of American states continues to be under examination. We have for quite a long time been strengthening our relations with the Latin American states. We now have either direct or non-resident representation in 18 of the 20 Latin American states, and shortly we may have representation in 19. On August 5 there is to be a meeting in Uruguay of the inter-American economic and social council. Canada will have observers at that meeting.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it intended, as mentioned in the report to which my hon. friend directed his question, that Canada shall be represented at that conference by an observer of cabinet rank? In this connection the minister will recall having said that the government was going to ask the Canadian institute of international affairs what it thought the government should do about the O.A.S. Can the minister now say whether he has received instructions from the institute as to what policy the government should adopt?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member for Essex East asked a question and then distorted the facts and added two or three fish hooks. The hon. gentleman's statement with regard to the Canadian institute of international affairs, as I believe the hon. member very well knows, was quite far removed from the facts. I said in my speech during the debate earlier this session that we were anxious to obtain opinions from Canadians generally, including members of the Canadian institute of international affairs, which does a very useful work in considering various external affairs questions in which that body is concerned. As a result of our request for opinions we have received a great many representations. As yet there has been no decision taken as to what policy will be adopted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister please answer the first part of my question, in which I inquired whether Canada would be represented at the conference in Uruguay on August 5 by someone of cabinet rank?

Mr. Green: That has not yet been decided, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN ARCTIC—INSTALLATION BY U.S. OF ATOMIC POWERED WEATHER STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Laurier asked the following question:

Has the Canadian government authorized the installation by the United States of an atomic powered weather station in the Canadian Arctic?

The answer is that as part of a continuing program of meteorological research in the Arctic, the meteorological branch of the Department of Transport and the United States weather bureau arranged earlier this year for the installation and testing of a new automatic weather reporting device designed in the United States. The electrical energy required to power the device will come not from an atomic reactor but from radioactive isotopes. Heat generated by these isotopes will be converted into electrical power by means of a thermocouple. Plans call for the equipment to be installed on Graham island in the Queen Elizabeth islands, and the information it transmits will be picked up by the weather station at Resolute Bay.

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF FISHERY LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister say whether active negotiations are being carried on at the present time with the nations which are fishing off the east coast of Canada to extend the fishery limit to twelve miles?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this is a question that should more properly be directed to my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In absentia.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Since my colleague has found it necessary to be absent I shall bring this question to his attention to see whether an answer can be brought down for the hon. gentleman.

INCOME TAX

MONTREAL—REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question in French to the Acting Minister of National Revenue.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if the income tax inspectors have been authorized to ask various Montreal parish priests to sign the following letter, as reported in this morning's Le Devoir:

I, the undersigned, parish priest, authorize the income tax officers to modify, annul or change the receipts given in my parish for charitable donations.

That is a monstrosity that cannot be tolerated—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has not given notice of his question it seems to me it might more appropriately go on the order paper.

Mr. Caron: It is a very important matter, Mr. Speaker. It is highly improper for the officers of the department to proceed in the way suggested—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not reflecting in any way on the importance of the matter, but the information sought is not the sort of information an hon. member might expect to have drawn out of a hat. If notice is not given the information requires to be looked up, particularly in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to bring to your attention the fact that this question is one of importance in certain areas of the city of Montreal. If the question raised by the hon. gentleman cannot be answered by the minister at this time it should at least be taken as notice. The practice referred to in the question is certainly contrary to the regular practice of the officers of the department. The acting minister owes it to the house if not to his departmental officials to tell the house whether or not it is a fact that what has been referred to is taking place in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: In view of what the hon. member has said I shall give the minister an opportunity to take the question as notice if he wishes to do so.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in question, and as a consequence I am not in a position to reply at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister take the question as notice?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING UNDERWATER BREATHING APPARATUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the tragic death of a Hamilton lad allegedly from the use of inadequate and dangerous underwater breathing apparatus, can the minister say whether specifications for this type of equipment come within the jurisdiction of his department? If so, does he plan regulations designed to reduce the possibility of similar accidents happening in the future?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have read of this tragic accident, Mr. Speaker. I know my department is very much aware of the various dangers connected with the use of these instruments and toys, and it has been watching very closely the sale of all apparatus of this type. As far as the legal position of the department is concerned and its responsibility in connection with these matters, I shall be pleased to investigate.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED DISCLOSURE OF EXCHANGE SECTION BEFORE PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In the light of the disclosure made in this house yesterday as found at page 7526 of Hansard, namely that a non-Canadian, one Mr. Jacobsson, had been advised of the contents of part of the budget, does he not think the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is asking a question arising out of the debate of yesterday. As nearly as I can make out his question is not seeking factual information but is presenting a point of view which would more appropriately be brought up in the debate which is still continuing.

Mr. Regier: If I may, I should like to say this on the point of order. I believe this matter is within the administrative responsibility of no less a person than the Prime Minister. We had the Minister of Finance admitting that there had been a leak in the budget—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regier: —and I believe I am right in asking for the reaction of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is presenting an argument and not seeking information.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It was clearly stated during the debate yesterday by the Deputy Speaker—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that this was a matter which should not come up in debate. Now that the hon. member raises it in this fashion, he is told that he is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: What is the hon. member's objection? As far as I understand the question that has been asked, it is to suggest to the Prime Minister some impropriety in what was done, and to ask him to comment on it. That is not seeking factual information, in my opinion.

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether I might ask the Prime Minister this question. Is he contemplating any action as a result of the disclosure made yesterday by the Minister of Finance?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no disclosure was made. I can also tell the hon. gentleman that his suggestion regarding the Minister of Finance will receive the contemptuous answer that it deserves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Shame.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my I ask the Minister of Finance whether he disclosed to Mr. Jacobsson—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the interest of hon. members in this matter, because I heard it debated last night. I do not propose to allow the debate to encroach on this period of the day. If the Leader of the Opposition has a question for factual information, although the event transpired some time ago it might conceivably be of such urgency that I would permit it. But as far as discussing the relative merits or demerits of the minister's action is concerned, this procedure is not appropriate for such a discussion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we were told last night by the chairman that we were not permitted to discuss this matter in this debate, that it was irrelevant and out of order. This matter came to our attention not weeks ago but last evening in the course of this debate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think I have a right —and I hope you will agree with me—to ask the Minister of Finance the question that I propose to put to him, namely whether there was a disclosure to Mr. Jacobsson of the international monetary fund of the exchange section of the budget speech before that speech was made in the House of Commons.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Of course it is no. To talk about this as being a leak is just unadulterated nonsense. I made it quite clear in reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that Mr. Rasminsky, who is the Canadian representative on the executive board of the international monetary fund, was authorized by me to indicate confidentially and in only general terms to Mr. Per Jacobsson, the managing director of the international monetary fund, the general nature of the proposal that was to be made in the budget of June 20 in relation to the external value of the Canadian dollar.

It will be remembered that this was a statement of policy on the part of the government, not a statement on a particular measure. That was all that Mr. Jacobsson was made acquainted with in the conversation that Mr. Rasminsky had with Mr. Jacobsson in Washington on Tuesday, June 20. The following morning, as I also said yesterday, Mr. Rasminsky met with his fellow directors of the executive board of the international monetary fund and discussed with them the budget which had then been released and of which copies were then available in Washington; but Mr. Rasminsky until then was not acquainted with the budget. I pointed out last night that he was acquainted with only two chapters in the budget in general terms because of the fact that he is the manager of our exchange fund. This was just a normal consultation in regard to the management of the fund.

Therefore Mr. Speaker, to attempt to picture this as a budget leak is, I say, a travesty of the facts. I point out also, as I did yesterday, that in relation to the value established for the Canadian dollar in accordance with the article of the international monetary fund, on two occasions—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question the propriety of the minister proceeding beyond the bare facts of the questions which were asked. To my mind the whole discussion is not appropriate for this period.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you will permit me to say so, Mr. Speaker, I did so only because of the use of a very accusing term, namely "leak", in relation to the budget.

Mr. Chevrier: What about the Prime Minister's term?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I simply say this, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the use of that term, I thought it only fair that I should say that on two previous occasions in the days of the former government, when the value of the Canadian dollar was changed in relation to the articles of the international monetary fund, there were consultations with the managing director of the fund while this matter was still secret in Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether it is not a fact that when those two changes were made, they were not included in the budget speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the policy that was announced in the budget speech could have been announced at a time other than during the presentation of the budget. That is not the point. It is a question of secrecy as applied to a matter related to the external value of the Canadian dollar and the relationship of that question to the provisions of the international monetary fund. The circumstances are precisely the same in that regard as they were in two previous cases under the former government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the minister and hon. members will leave the matter at that point. I think my original view was correct. Although I may not often be right, I think I was right in suggesting that this matter was not appropriate for orders of the day.

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Office of governor deemed vacant.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that we begin the discussion of this very important bill when so many of the ministers, including the Prime Minister, have seen fit to leave the committee before the discussion begins.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: Last evening we on this side of the chamber did our best to get at some of the reasons underlying this bill of attainder and some explanation for the star chamber procedures which are embodied in it. That was not very easy because the minister, who gives us whatever information he sees fit, has said we are not entitled, in this court of appeal, on this issue, where the truth is not being heard, to what he considers to be confidential information. So we are restricted to what statements he sees fit to make on the various questions that we put to him in connection with a bill that is of such fundamental importance because it involves basic elements of decency, justice and fair play.

Perhaps the most important element in the consideration of this bill in committee is the reason the minister has given for the introduction of the bill, namely the impossibility of securing co-operation from the man whom the bill is designed to fire. The minister made an extraordinary statement last evening, among other extraordinary statements, when he said it was impossible to get that kind of co-operation—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What page?

Mr. Pearson: Page 7521 of Hansard. They did not really try, out of respect for the sincerity of Mr. Coyne. It was quite out of keeping to ask him to put aside his views and co-operate, so they decided instead, out of respect for his sincerity, to demand that he put aside his job.

The one concrete charge levelled in this field of non co-operation, which was contradicted by the minister himself at the time and subsequently but it is still persisted in by the minister and it was repeated at page 7040 of Hansard, is this:

> In the winter of 1957-58 I conveyed to him—

That is the governor:

> —a request for an easing of the requirements respecting the liquidity reserves of chartered banks. That request, which was designed by the government to ease tight money, was rejected by the governor firmly and angrily.

There was certainly no indication at the time that the minister took anything but a favourable view of the policy of the bank. However, we dealt with that point last night and I do not intend to repeat it. I would like to ask the minister certain questions arising out of the statement he has made.

The minister said that this request was made—and it is a very important one, because on this request hangs the government's case—in the winter of 1957-58. I would like to ask the minister precisely when this request was made, not "in the winter of 1957-58". When was it made? Under what circumstances was it made? What were the details of the request made by the government of the governor in this field of monetary policy, for which at that time the government said they had no responsibility?

I would like to ask the minister what reason was given by the governor at that time for, as he puts it, rejecting this particular request. I would like to ask the minister whether he took any further action or made any further request of the governor or any servant of the bank, or any of the banks, respecting this particular matter at that particular time. If so, with what results?

I ask these specific questions of the minister in the light of the statement made on June 15 by the governor of the Bank of Canada when he said:

> I repeat again that at no time has the Minister of Finance criticized or expressed a difference of opinion with the monetary policy being pursued by the Bank of Canada which the bank and its board of directors were entitled to assume carried the tacit approval of the government.

Now the minister has told us there was one time—and he does not give us details of the time, place or circumstances—away back in the winter of 1957-58 when the governor angrily and firmly refused such a request. Now we should like to have information about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I supplied information last night with regard to that occasion. I said it occurred in my office in this building, and I referred to those who were present, other officials of the Bank of Canada as well as the deputy minister of finance.

Mr. Pearson: What date?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall not attempt to fix the date precisely. The occasion was, I would say, very late in 1957. It would be November or December of 1957, and the occasion was one on which I conveyed to the governor a request of the government for a reduction in the liquidity reserve requirements with reference to the chartered banks, which then was 15 per cent, having been advanced to that figure at the time of the imposition of the tight money policy a year and a half earlier.

I have said that this was a definite proposal and a definite request, and it was rejected. It was rejected at the time. The governor said he did not consider it sound that there should be any reduction in the prevailing 15 per cent requirement. He rejected the proposal firmly. As I said last night, he rejected it firmly, flatly and angrily. That made it clear that the governor felt himself under no obligation to give effect to requests of the government with respect to monetary action, because this was a definite request which had obvious and immediate implications for monetary policy.

From that point on, as I have said, the governor having taken that position, I turned to examine precisely my authority in this situation, and I found that under the existing statute I had been given by parliament no express authority to issue directives to the governor of the Bank of Canada in relation to such questions. I found also that the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act are perfectly clear in vesting in the bank the right and authority to create money. There is no authority reserved to the government in that regard.

That has been basic in the relations between the government and the governor from that time to this. I have said that the authorities of the bank—it was not the governor only—were always prepared to indicate what steps they were taking in the monetary field or to defend what they were doing; but as to the authority, it had been clearly established right from the beginning that the government had no authority over the Bank of Canada in relation to such matters.

Mr. Pearson: Well, the minister has not dealt with my question. He has dealt with some things which I did not raise, though they are very interesting. He has indicated, for instance—and this is of some importance in the light of certain disclosures last evening —that he was not sure of his authority in this field, apparently, until this particular incident took place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. This is what I said. In line with what I had said while in opposition, I thought there was some authority possessed by the government in this field. I was brought up very short at that meeting. That led me to examine the statute and to conclude that no authority had been given to the government in this field to give directives to the bank.

Mr. Pearson: Well, until this incident the minister had thought he had some authority in this field. It was not very long before this meeting that he was very clear and certain about the authority of the government in this sphere. When this meeting took place he was of the opinion that he might have some authority, but then he discovered he had no authority or responsibility in the field of monetary policy, at least until last evening.

May I ask the minister whether this clash—and we certainly have the right to call it a clash in view of the terms the minister has used, because this was a request which was firmly and angrily rejected by the governor—took place before or after November 13, 1957? Hon. members may recall that on November 13, 1957 the minister, replying to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano as reported on page 1063 of Hansard, said he was not aware of anything that could be called a clash between the government and the bank.

I should like also to ask the minister, while we are on this basic incident whether a record of any kind was made of this meeting, the conclusions of which were so important in the minds of the government that three and a half years later, based largely on those conclusions, they decided to introduce an act of parliament to discharge the governor of the Bank of Canada without giving him the right to be heard. This obviously was an important meeting. This is the incident upon which the government builds up its accusation. It was years ago, but it is on this basis that the government decided that the governor had to go. As I say, this was obviously a very important meeting because of the important and responsible people who attended it, and I ask if any record was made of this meeting, which the minister thinks may have taken place in December, 1957; whether there is anything which he could disclose from such a record.

I should also like the minister to deal with the other question I have asked him. I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us whether any further requests of this nature were made of the governor or of any servant of the bank, or of any of the banks; and if so, what was the result of any such request which was made subsequent to this meeting which took place some time in the autumn, presumably in December of 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not sure that I followed all the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition, but if I overlook anything perhaps he will draw it to my attention. No communication in writing passed between the governor and myself in relation to this incident. Any communication of such a nature would, of course, have been confidential. I have drawn attention to this matter because it established very clearly the fact that the governor held a different view from the one I had entertained and had expressed while in opposition as to the relationship of the government to monetary policy.

It was made quite clear that the governor made the decisions in relation to action in the monetary field and considered himself under no obligation whatever to accept directives from the government. It was a precise proposal which I put before him, and I did so on behalf of the government. It was not something that I put to him on my own account. It was something which was conveyed to him—and he was so informed—coming from the government. He rejected it. It was perfectly clear that in the view of the governor he was under no obligation whatever in the sphere of monetary action to accept directives from the government. As I say, this proposal which the government put forward was rejected flatly and angrily.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister not agree that the liquidity requirement, and that is what we are talking about, was not approved by the governor but was accepted voluntarily by the chartered banks on the suggestion of the government? Does the minister not recall that in the Bank of Canada report of 1955 there was included the statement that the function of a minimum liquid asset ratio is to increase the effectiveness of monetary policy in moderating a too rapid expansion of credit? A little further on, at page 16 of this report, appears the following statement:

After discussion, the banks have agreed to work to achieve by May 31, 1956 a minimum liquid asset ratio of 15 per cent which they will endeavour to maintain on a daily average basis from June on.

Is the minister really trying to tell this committee that on the basis of this one meeting, in respect to matters about which the minister is so vague that he doesn't even know when it was held and has no record of it, but suggests it was in 1957, sometime in September, the government in 1961 has decided to introduce a bill to discharge the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition would perhaps be closer to accuracy and orderly procedure if he would stick to his questions instead of jumping to conclusions, because the conclusions are so definitely wrong. He does not wait for an answer to get the facts but jumps at conclusions and consequently makes statements which are quite at variance with the facts.

Mr. Hellyer: If he waits for an answer he will grow old in the process.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now, Mr. Chairman, may we proceed with the answers to the questions? The Leader of the Opposition, it was quite obvious as soon as he started, has obtained and accepted in full Mr. Coyne's version of the increase, at the time of the application of the tight money policy, a year and a half before we came into office, in the liquid reserves of chartered banks from 8 per cent to 15 per cent. Mr. Coyne, in the report which the Leader of the Opposition read and on other occasions, has taken the ground that this was agreed to or undertaken voluntarily by the chartered banks.

I have to say that this is a matter of the clearest kind of dispute between Mr. Coyne's version of what happened and the version of the chartered banks, because I had occasion in those days to confer with a number of the chartered banks on this question, and the answers I invariably received from them were that this was imposed upon them by Mr. Coyne and they did not agree to it. They firmly disagreed with the statement which appeared in the report of the governor of the bank which the Leader of the Opposition has read. That is the fact, and that is the difference in the statement in that regard which is wide and complete.

It will be remembered also by hon. members that when the tight money policy was instituted a year and a half before we came into office, this increase from 8 per cent to 15 per cent in the liquid reserves requirement of the chartered banks obliged the chartered banks to market, at a time when the market was not strong, vast holdings of Dominion of Canada bonds, and that the chartered banks in the course of that enforced liquidation sustained very heavy losses. This was a matter, therefore, that the banks regarded as of some considerable importance. They have not forgotten that on that occasion, as they have made very clear, a policy was imposed by the governor of the Bank of Canada which obliged them to liquidate their substantial holdings, running into hundreds of millions of dollars in dominion government bonds, with consequent very heavy losses. From that time on the chartered banks have naturally been much more cautious in their lending policies, because they had no assurance that there would not be a repetition of what had happened to them in that unhappy experience of 1955-56.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, when answering a question the Minister of Finance roams all over. This is evidenced by the fact that the last part of the answer he has just given has nothing whatever to do with the question put by the Leader of the Opposition. He is tending to confuse the issue. My question is, having seen the governor of the Bank of Canada around November, and the governor having taken the position that he did, why did the minister then go to the banks themselves a short time thereafter and ask the banks to do the very thing which he had asked the governor to do and which the governor had said was a matter that belonged to the banks?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What did I ask the banks to do?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You asked the banks to do precisely what you had asked the governor to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did so because the chartered banks—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Please answer the question very simply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —considered in this respect, quite at variance with the statement of Mr. Coyne, that a requirement had been imposed upon them to increase from 8 per cent to 15 per cent, and hold at 15 per cent, their liquid reserves.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What statutory authority was there for that?

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue the matter referred to by the Leader of the Opposition. It seems to me we are seeking a break-through in the wall, although I do not think we are getting very far. Last night I listened to the remarks of the Minister of Finance, and his words had a very familiar ring. I went back to my office and looked up his former words, and found that he was using exactly the same phrases and words as before, just as though it was a replay of the same record. There is no new information forthcoming, and I suggest this is becoming an exercise in futility. I suggest the reason for this is that whenever the Leader of the Opposition seeks to ferret out information the answer is given that the information is confidential. I suggest that the minister is being very selective in regard to what he determines is confidential.

Last night the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked for particular advice which the governor had given to the Minister of Finance in respect to debt management in relation to the present budget. I suggest this is an extremely important matter, because the minister has stated in this house that the reason the governor of the Bank of Canada must go is that the expansion budget which has been presented is opposed by the governor and, therefore, he must be relieved of his duties in order that this expansion budget may be brought to a successful conclusion. The main reason given for his having to go is his lack of co-operation with this expansionist government.

We have no way of finding out what the governor of the Bank of Canada advised in relation to this budget because the Minister of Finance refuses to give the information on the ground that it is confidential. As an example of that, when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked for information, the Minister of Finance said the following, as reported at page 7520 of Hansard of July 4, 1961:

> That hon. member asked me specifically to disclose the advice given by Mr. Coyne to the government in relation to certain questions of debt management with respect to the money-raising program for the present year. It would be highly improper on my part to disclose advice given to me or to the government by the adviser in this respect,—

Then he went on to say the following:

> It would be very unfair either to the adviser in this particular case or the advisers of the government in other cases if ministers were to disclose in the house advice of a very confidential nature given to them in this regard.

When it was suggested that the information was being hidden the minister then said the following, as reported on the same date:

> —it remains hidden for very good reasons of public policy. It has always been so under our system of government.

I should like to point out that although this information is considered confidential, the advice given by the governor of the Bank of Canada in 1957-58 apparently was not confidential, because the Minister of Finance has brought that information to the attention of this house. The minister stated that the governor refused to accept certain proposals by the government, angrily and completely, which apparently brought the Minister of Finance up very short because he went into very great detail, as reported at page 7524 of Hansard of July 4, 1961, to describe what took place at this meeting held in his office in this building, which would appear to be a regular meeting and which would be confidential. I think the minister is being rather selective in considering what is confidential and what is not confidential.

The Leader of the Opposition this morning has presented the one shred of evidence of a real difference between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada which has given rise, four years later, to a desire for his resignation. I should very much like to know why the advice given by the governor of the Bank of Canada in 1957-58, which was revealed by the Minister of Finance, not by the governor of the bank, was not considered to be confidential.

In all the letters of the governor of the Bank of Canada he has stated that there has been complete co-operation without any area of disagreement. He has also stated he was willing to co-operate in regard to the present budget, and that he has desired to co-operate all down the line. Why is it, I ask the Minister of Finance, that the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada in 1961 is confidential but was not confidential back in 1957 and 1958?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has not appreciated the difference in what is involved here. I was asked last night to disclose advice received from the governor of the Bank of Canada in relation to a matter of debt management and I declined to give that information. In that realm the Bank of Canada acts as adviser to the government. The government takes full responsibility for the decisions, and it would be highly improper under such circumstances to disclose the advice received.

The incident which has been discussed here this morning was not a matter of advice on the part of the governor at all. The whole point is that this was the field in which he made decisions. I referred to the fact that a particular request had been made by the government and a decision had been taken by the governor. There is a great difference between advice in the one case and a decision in the other, and it is the decision that I have given to the house.

Mr. Pitman: Would the conversation that took place at that particular meeting in 1957-58 not be regarded as confidential by those who attended the meeting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not gone into it in extended detail. I have given to the house what was an essential fact, that the government made a specific request for a course of action. This is fundamental to what has happened since, and it is fundamental to all this discussion that has gone on at this stage and earlier stages of this matter. The governor gave the answer that I have related to the house. It was a decision; it was an act, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pitman: Would the Minister of Finance state whether at any other time there has been a fundamental disagreement between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada when the governor has angrily refused to co-operate in some proposal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this was the decision—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Answer the question simply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Essex East apparently is going to determine what shall be the questions and what shall be the answers. I suggest to him that he is responsible for his own questions, the hon. member for Peterborough is responsible for his questions, and I am responsible for the answers I am giving to the hon. member for Peterborough. This was the decision that set in their respective places the authority of the government and the authority of the bank. It was made perfectly clear in the light of that decision, a firm decision taken by the governor on that occasion, that the government had no authority to give him directives in relation to action in the monetary field. That was very definite and clear and that was why, as I say—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —having regard to the firm decision that he made at that time in rejecting a government request, I was thrown back on the statute and found in the statute that no express authority was given to the government, to the Minister of Finance, to give such directives. With regard to what the governor has said about co-operation since the request was made for his resignation, may I say that I think anything that was said after May 30 in these letters by the governor has to be read in the light of the fact that he had been asked for his resignation and he was even then building up his case.

As I have said in the house on several occasions already, these letters that he was writing were written in the course of creating self serving evidence. They abound in statements of his virtue. In a situation of this kind what is surely the best guide is not what he has said after the request for his resignation but what he did, and I have related to the house what he did on this occasion which set the pattern and set the positions of government and governor in their places with respect to authority in the field of monetary action.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if this was the first fundamental difference that took place between the government on one hand and the governor on the other hand?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would say yes. This was quite fundamental, Mr. Chairman. It certainly rocked me to find that this request from the government was firmly rejected, and angrily rejected.

Mr. Chevrier: What did the minister do in the face of this attitude taken by the governor?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was nothing I could do. As I have said, I went to the statute to see if I had the authority that previously I had assumed that the government had, which was the basis of the view I had expressed in the house when in opposition, particularly in the debate of 1956, and I found there no express authority given to the government to give directives to the governor of the Bank of Canada.

It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that in this respect the Bank of Canada Act does not follow the terms of the Bank of England act. Under an amendment to the Bank of England act made in 1945, I think it was, express authority is given to the treasury, which means to the chancellor of the exchequer, to give directives to the governor of the Bank of England, but there is no such authority given to the government under our Bank of Canada Act, or given to the Minister of Finance in relation to the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I should like to ask the minister this question. Since there was, as he put it, a fundamental difference between the government on the one hand and the bank on the other, why did he not then ask the governor to resign?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already discussed that point and answered that question at least half a dozen times, I am sure. If we had known at the end of 1957 that in the year 1961 we were going to face the situation with which we are now confronted, then certainly I am quite confident that the government at that time would have decided to ask parliament to deal with this situation if the governor refused to resign. But, Mr. Chairman, we did not foresee that matters would move to this climax. If we had known that, if we had had the benefit of that foreknowledge, then obviously I think my colleagues would have agreed that we should have acted then. We were in a situation then, Mr. Chairman. We wanted above all things to keep the Bank of Canada out of political controversy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You put it in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not the government that put the Bank of Canada into political controversy. It is the governor of the Bank of Canada by his ill-advised series of speeches in the fiscal field—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Which you approved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —exploited by the opposition in this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Which you approved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You did so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East says that I approved the speeches—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You certainly did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I have said in this house and I repeat now that never did I approve those speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Never were they referred to me. Never did I know when he was going to make speeches.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You defended his right to make them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I never defended those speeches. I never defended one word of the content of those speeches. I was not going to have the hon. member for Essex East put me in the position which he would have loved to put me in at that time, of trying to be a censor and throttler. I always explained my position in the house, and the record shows it. Look at the Hansard record for February 21. Never did I take any responsibility for what the governor of the Bank of Canada was saying. Always I disclaimed any responsibility for what the governor was saying.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, when we criticized those speeches in this house the minister attacked us, as he did last night, for daring to criticize them. He came to the defence of the governor's right to make speeches, and now he has the effrontery to get up and say that he did not approve those speeches—

Mr. Chevrier: Hypocrite.

Mr. Pearson: —which caused so much trouble that he asked the governor to resign.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier has just now said—I do not know whether it got on the record—from his seat while the Leader of the Opposition was speaking, "hypocrite".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that earlier myself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That word has been ruled to be unparliamentary. I do not know whether it was directed to the Leader of the Opposition or to myself but it does not matter to whom it was directed. It is unparliamentary and it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the point is that the attitude of the minister has been hypocritical in this matter. I made the statement which the minister said I made and I wish to explain how I came to make it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An explanation of an unparliamentary word is quite out of order. The unparliamentary word must be withdrawn under the rules of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Under the rules of the house, unless closure is to be applied by hon. gentlemen opposite, an hon. member has the right to reply. What I am saying—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no right to repeat an unparliamentary word.

Mr. Chevrier: I point out to the minister that he has swallowed himself, has backtracked and has made a complete turnabout with respect to his attitude in this matter. That is what prompted me to say that the conduct of the minister was hypocritical.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. There is no way on my part of knowing whether or not the word "hypocritical" found its way into the record. I was listening closely to the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. member for Laurier was successful in placing the word "hypocritical" on the record I am sure he would wish to withdraw it, because under our rules it is considered unparliamentary.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I shall abide by your ruling. I withdraw the word. I point out to the minister, however, that he has backtracked and swallowed himself on this issue. Now I turn to the question—

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Is it conceivable that the hon. gentleman does not understand the difference between the Minister of Finance defending the right of the governor to speak and the minister approving what the governor said? Surely the difference is clear as crystal, and both the hon. member for Laurier and the Leader of the Opposition must recognize that.

Mr. Chevrier: Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Greenwood has not been listening to the discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have been listening very closely.

Mr. Chevrier: I suggest that the hon. member for Greenwood has not been listening. An attempt is now being made to fire the governor—

Mr. Pickersgill: Because of his speeches.

Mr. Chevrier: That is precisely what is happening. The minister and the government are trying to fire the governor for making those public speeches which the minister defended over a period of days here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the hon. member not understand the explanation of the minister to the effect that the minister did not defend the speeches but the right of the governor to speak?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt about what the minister said. I direct the attention of hon. members to the words of the Minister of Finance to be found at page 2258 of Hansard of February 21, 1961:

> —may I say that I have no right of censorship over the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He does not refer them to me. Why should he do so? This is a free country. He makes his own speeches and chooses his own themes. I read these speeches afterwards as does the Leader of the Opposition. It is sometimes forgotten by hon. members opposite that this is a free country. I trust that I am not to be held responsible for what may be said by the governor of the Bank of Canada when he exercises his right as a citizen to make speeches.

Surely, after this, the hon. member for Greenwood is not going to defend the minister who put himself in a most ridiculous position in the last few minutes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, there is not a word in what was read by the hon. member for Essex East which indicates approval on the part of the Minister of Finance of the content of the speeches made by the governor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Macdonnell: But that is the point. There is not a word of approval in what was read.

Mr. Chevrier: The point is quite clear, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: I was attempting to ask a question. I had the floor when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Greenwood, who did not like the attitude I was taking. I was attempting to make clear that the minister and the government are trying to fire the governor of the Bank of Canada for exercising the free right of the governor to make these speeches. That is exactly what is happening.

I now come back to the question I wished to ask earlier. In the light of the fundamental difference which the minister tells us existed between the government and the governor, why did not the Minister of Finance amend the Bank of Canada Act to meet the position? I asked the minister why he did not request Mr. Coyne to resign, and the minister in replying gave a long, empty answer. I now put this question. Why did not the minister amend the Bank of Canada Act under the circumstances referred to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I shall begin first with the observations the hon. member for Laurier has made. It will be noticed that he made some accusing observations and then went on to ask a question. I hope when I deal with his observations the hon. member will not say I am delaying an answer to his question. I shall deal with his question.

What I have been saying in the course of this debate is fully consistent with what I said in the house on February 21 in the passage read by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not so. That is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Never, Mr. Chairman, did I assume any responsibility for what the governor said. I have always disclaimed responsibility for what the governor said. On this and on other occasions the governor never submitted to me his speeches. He never asked me if he should or should not accept invitations to go out and make public speeches. He never referred these questions to me. I firmly declined then and on other occasions, when hon. members of the opposition sought to exploit the observations of the governor of the Bank of Canada to accept any responsibility for what the governor was saying.

Hon. members opposite know very well that what the governor was saying was clearly at variance with government policy. As I said yesterday, Mr. Chairman, if it had been in harmony with government policy there would have been no point whatever in their reading the speeches of the governor of the bank or trying to make them an issue in debate on the floor of this house. The point they were trying to put forward was that the governor was out making public speeches not in relation to monetary policy but in relation to fiscal policy, a very thorny subject at any time and one always charged with political differences.

Hon. gentlemen opposite brought this question into the house. Of course they realized that the governor was making speeches on fiscal questions in terms completely at variance with the policies of the government. Hon. members opposite sought to embarrass the government, if they could, by bringing on to the floor of the house the speeches of the governor. They attempted to create confusion and the impression that this was someone speaking with some countenance on the part of the government for what he said.

I have made the record very clear in this respect. Never did I accept any responsibility for anything the governor said. As to the suggestion that I should have muzzled the governor—

Mr. Pearson: The minister muzzled him in March.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that I should have called him in and given him an order—

Mr. Pearson: Which the minister did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —I wish to make it clear that this is exactly what the hon. gentleman opposite wished me to do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister muzzled the governor on March 18.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. gentlemen opposite sought to put me in a position where it would appear that I was telling the governor what he should not say. Mr. Chairman, do you see the position in which the hon. gentlemen opposite wished to place me? They sought to create the impression that I was attempting to use the governor, simply allowing him to say things which might be approved by the government but denying him the right to say things which could not be approved by the government or which could be regarded as being critical of the government or at variance with government policy. That is the position in which hon. gentlemen opposite sought to put me, and I was not willing to be put in that position.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is in a much worse position.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I took the position of disclaiming responsibility for what the governor was saying. As for responsibility of the governor for what he was saying, that responsibility rests solely with the governor. Anyone who holds this high office knows perfectly well that when he goes out and makes public speeches critical of government policy, the responsibility for that course of action is his, and the responsibility for what course of action may follow is, in the first instance, his responsibility because he is the one who has brought this on himself and has done it deliberately.

When I say deliberately, Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt that the governor must have been aware that he was making speeches on fiscal policy that were not in accord with the government's views. We had a situation in which the governor was out telling the people in public speeches to tighten their belts, that there should be a restriction in trade, at a time when the government was seeking to expand Canada's external trade. He addressed himself to questions of investment, asking this country to cut itself off from the inflow of capital, capital which over the years—as I was saying in those days in various speeches, including the budget speech—has done a great deal to assist in the development of the resources of this country.

I had expressed the opinion in various speeches, including the budget speech, that the people of Canada did not wish to see a slowdown in the development of their resources, but wished to go ahead with the development of their resources. This was in line with the view of the Canadian people, which, if you wish to use an expression which has become current in this debate, reflected an expansionist attitude toward the development of Canadian resources.

There can be no doubt in the mind of anyone about the conflict in views here as between those which the governor was declaring from the housetops in a series of public speeches right across the country and those which the government was expressing on such questions.

There has been on my part no inconsistency. The hon. member for Laurier talks about somersaulting. Mr. Chairman, it is not the government that has turned a somersault in this situation; it is the opposition which has done so, particularly the Leader of the Opposition. This is where we have seen the most extraordinary political acrobatics that I am sure this House of Commons is likely to see for many a day.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that when the Leader of the Opposition spoke in that debate we had on February 20, on an opposition amendment to a government motion to resolve the house into committee of supply, he made some statements about this matter, and he made them in the light of the fact that the speeches of the governor were contradictory of government policy in the fiscal field. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that it was against that immediate background, in the very context of that situation, that the Leader of the Opposition said this, as found at page 2201 of Hansard:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

Those are not my words. Those are the words of the Leader of the Opposition. He had evidently forgotten those words.

Mr. Pearson: No, I have not forgotten them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Apparently he has now constituted himself a champion of Mr. Coyne, the man who, as he was saying back on February 20, ought to resign when there is a difference of opinion. He said where there is a difference of opinion the governor ought to resign. Now he is saying that the governor ought not to resign.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, Mr. Chairman, did you hear that? I hope that interjection got into the record of Hansard. When I said that the governor should resign in the light of the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition on February 20, the hon. member for Essex East said "Not at all".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You have confused the issue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East cannot have it both ways. There is a fundamental difference here. Everybody in this House of Commons knows it. The hon. member for Essex East knows it as well as do those members of the House of Commons who are fair in their judgments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He knows it perfectly well, Mr. Chairman. Yet now that we have the very situation about which the Leader of the Opposition was talking on February 20, when he said that under such circumstances the governor ought to resign, they not only do not want him to resign but, when the government is driven to the extreme limit of asking the governor to resign, not only do they fail to support the government and in that way support what the Leader of the Opposition said in this House of Commons on February 20, but they swallow themselves; they turn their backs on what was said by their leader on February 20; they become political acrobats the like of which have not been seen in Barnum and Bailey or any other circus. They now say that not only should the government not have asked for the governor's resignation but, now that the matter is before parliament with the full knowledge that there are these fundamental and far-reaching and irreconcilable differences between the government and the governor—they now say that parliament should not proceed to declare this office vacant. Such is their idea of consistency, Mr. Chairman. I do not think this House of Commons is likely to see a repetition on the part of any other members of the house of such political acrobatics as those we have seen on the part of hon. members opposite in the course of this discussion.

Mr. Deschatelets: Why do you not answer the question? Your speech is over now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Having dealt in part with the observations of the hon. member for Laurier with which he preceded the question he asked, may I say this in relation to the question. He asks me why I did not amend the Bank of Canada Act. May I say that parliament is the body that amends the Bank of Canada Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We could have come to parliament in those days and could have asked parliament to amend the act. I have said already, I think about seven times, that had we foreseen that in 1961 these fundamental differences would move to the point to which they have moved, then certainly we would have acted sooner. Let there be no doubt in the mind of anyone about that matter. However, I have said that we hoped this situation could be lived with until the end of 1961.

That was our hope. If there were not to be a change in the office of governor we would have had to legislate in very precise terms in order to effect what was required in this situation and in a manner in which parliament does not normally legislate. Therefore there was not any possibility, as we saw it, of any final solution of this matter apart from detailed and extensive legislation or a change in the office of governor.

I have said that we hoped to live with this situation until December 31, 1961. That became impossible in the light of the interests of the country in the spring of 1961. Having regard to the necessity for asking parliament to approve a broad and comprehensive program of effective action, the kind of program that required the effective working together of the authorities in the fiscal field and the authorities in the monetary field, and being faced with the necessity of having the most complete co-operation between government and Bank of Canada to implement this program it was for that reason that it became impossible to live with this situation until December 31, next.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister's long harangue reminds me of that species of cuttlefish which, when in fear or in trouble, throws out an inky smokescreen substance and in the resulting darkness and confusion hopes to escape. The minister's 30 minute harangue is not going to allow him to escape from the questions which he will not answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thirty minutes? I spoke for about 10 minutes.

Mr. Pearson: However, the minister's speech makes it necessary for us on this side of the chamber to reply to these inaccurate and hypocritical observations of his.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Wait a minute.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, you have already dealt with this question. I do not know whether there is very much difference between calling a man a hypocrite and saying that he makes hypocritical assertions. If that language is parliamentary, then of course it will have to be parliamentary for all hon. members.

Mr. Pearson: I will withdraw the word "hypocritical", Mr. Chairman, in order to save time. I will put it this way. We shall have to deal with the minister's manipulation of facts and figures.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps on that happy note I should call it one o'clock and leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the minister this morning commenting, as he said, on certain observations on this side of the chamber before he dealt with questions that had been submitted to him require a word or two on my part. I hesitate to go over this old ground again which surely has been covered enough. But the minister quoted my statement, as an example of my inconsistency, that when there is a dispute between the governor of the bank and the government, the governor of course, in those circumstances, should resign. I do not withdraw that statement or any other statement I have made along those lines. That is quite clear, of course. But this situation is not the kind of situation which the minister would have us believe it is.

In the first place the governor of the bank has said he has never refused to co-operate with the government, and the illustrations of non co-operation in the last two years which the minister has brought forward are so absurd that, in default of better evidence than that, we accept the governor's word. If the governor says he has co-operated and the minister says he has not co-operated, surely the only issue is that in a dispute of that kind, before the governor resigns—and if his usefulness is destroyed by the government, naturally he has to resign—he is entitled to his day in court. That is the issue. By "court" I mean an appearance before a committee of the House of Commons which is being asked by legislation to throw him out of his job. Could there be any more simple and elementary issue than that?

The minister says the governor must resign, although he says the governor has co-operated, "because we have in our view had a dispute with him". And that is the end; he is not to be allowed to talk before those who are accusing him. That is the issue and no effort on the part of the minister can conceal or confuse—well, perhaps he can confuse the issue. Another point raised by the minister this morning and which can be dealt with very quickly indeed is that of the speeches made by the governor, which the minister has put forward as a main reason why the governor should resign.

The record on that matter is perfectly clear. It is quite true that the governor made these speeches, from 1959 especially. It is quite true that we criticized some of these speeches in the House of Commons. We were worried about them. It is quite true that the minister was not worried about them, because he did not take issue with any of them in the House of Commons. After years, in March, 1961 the minister finally admitted that he had some responsibility in this matter, having previously disclaimed any responsibility. In March of this year he asked the governor of the bank to stop making these speeches, especially when the governor began to talk about full employment and what could be done to bring about full employment. The governor was told to stop making these speeches, and he stopped making them. That is that.

Then there is the question of consultation and communication between the minister and governor. There is no doubt it has broken down, but the responsibility for that breakdown, again as far as we know—because we have not all the evidence; we cannot depend on any one side—the minister must take his responsibility. He talked about the old days when the governor of the bank was in close and constant touch and consultation with the government of the day, which was a Liberal government. They were Liberal ministers of finance. That is perfectly true. That applied also to this governor who is now being discharged. If this consultation and communication broke down—as obviously it did, because the minister had no consultation with the governor of the bank even to the point of talking with him about the budget—that is a deplorable situation for which the government must take its share of responsibility.

The main reason for this act of parliament, brought forward again by the minister this morning, was the angry and firm refusal of the governor back in November or December, 1957 to take certain action at the direction of the minister in respect of the reserves of the chartered banks; an action which he had no authority to take under the Bank of Canada Act; an action which would have been purely voluntary on his part if he had taken it; an action which the government itself could have taken by intervention in the affairs of the bank or by altering the Bank of Canada Act.

The governor of the Bank of Canada at that time did not take this action, for which he had no statutory authority at all, and the minister because he took this position in 1957, out he goes in 1961. Over all these years the governor has borne the blame for that. There it is, Mr. Chairman. There is the case made by the minister against the governor of the bank.

Mr. Hellyer: There is no case.

Mr. Pearson: We do not know about this case because we get only one side of it. We do not defend, we do not accuse the governor in respect of these matters. All we do is ask that he be given the right to be heard in respect of the charges made against him; charges which have not been supported by effective or impressive evidence in this committee. I should like to ask the minister a few specific questions.

As one of the matters which relates to this bill is the matter of pension, a pension which was provided by a decision of a committee of the board of directors, all nominees of the present government, and approved unanimously by the full board of directors, most of whom were appointed by the present government, this is a pension about which all of us who are worried about the way things are done in these matters should know something. I shall ask the minister two or three questions and then give him the opportunity to reply to them. I should like to ask the minister, first, why he found it necessary to raise this pension question on May 30. He himself stated, in contradiction to what has been stated elsewhere—and this is the kind of contradiction which should have been resolved before a committee where evidence could have been taken—as reported at page 6353 of Hansard that the governor of the bank raised the question of the pension with the words: "Well, what about my pension?" Is that the only way in which this came up, and is it the first way it came up in this discussion? Was that the first time, on May 30, 1961, that the pension issue was ever raised by the minister with the governor of the bank? May I also ask the minister whether the action taken on February 15, 1960, on pensions when this matter was established by the board of directors was approved by all the members of the board of directors? Was any advice given at that time or subsequently to the board of directors of the Bank of Canada by the deputy minister of justice, who is a member of the board, in respect of this action?

I also ask the minister whether he does not receive detailed reports of meetings of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada from his deputy minister who normally attends, or from a representative of the deputy minister. Finally I ask whether it would not be the duty of the minister to read the minutes of all meetings of the board. Perhaps the minister would deal with these questions before I go on to ask him a few others.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The first time there was a discussion between the governor and myself about this pension action was on May 30. I had in the course of the discussion that day mentioned to him that I had become aware of the action taken by the board at its meeting on February 15, 1960—that I had recently become aware of it—and that while I was aware that the minutes of the board showed that he took no part in the discussion of that portion of the subject relating to his own pension, nevertheless, having regard to his high position, and the fact that he was given a very wide veto power under the act, and that a high measure of responsibility in matters affecting his own personal interest was to be expected of anyone holding the high office of governor of the Bank of Canada, the view of the government was that there had been a dereliction in his duty in not seeing that this matter was brought to the attention of the government.

I pointed out to him that this had not been done, and that having regard to the provisions of the act, the by-law as applied to his own pension, by reason of the fact that it had not been gazetted, was of doubtful validity. The governor contended at first that there was no question about the validity of the by-law because, he said, there had been opinions given at one time, some years earlier, that by-laws passed by the board of directors of the bank in relation to pensions for members of the staff and officers of the bank did not require the approval of the governor in council for their validity. I pointed out that if he were right in that contention it still did not touch the point that the by-law had not been published in the Canada Gazette in accordance with one of the provisions of the act. He took the position that gazetting was not essential to the validity of the action taken. That, I think, was the substance of the conversation with regard to the by-law in relation to pensions passed on February 15, 1960. It was later in the conversation, before he left, that he proceeded to ask me the three questions which I related to the house when I spoke on June 14, one of them being: "What about my pension"?

I told him, as I have already related to the house in full detail on this subject, that he must understand that as far as the government is concerned there was no understanding between us that he would be entitled to the pension he claimed under the by-law of February 15, 1960. I made that very clear to him in reply to that question.

The next question asked by the Leader of the Opposition was whether the by-law of February 15, 1960, was approved by all of the directors. My information is that the by-law was approved unanimously. Let me add this, to clarify the situation, because one of the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday would have given a contrary impression: the board at that time was composed of some appointees of the present government and some appointees of the former government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. The proportion at that time was four members appointed by the former government and eight appointed by the present government. The subcommittee of the board which considered this question, according to the record and according to my information, was composed of three members, two drawn from appointees of the present government and one appointee of the former government. As I have said, my information is that the by-law, including the special provision made for the pensions of the governor and deputy governor, was approved unanimously. It should be remembered that the by-law covered many other things in addition to the special pension provision for the governor and the deputy governor. As a matter of fact, this whole matter, as I learned this spring on looking into it, had begun with a general review of the pension by-law of the bank as applied to all members of the staff, of whom there are a good many hundreds. It was only in the course of that review that this proposal to enlarge the pension provision for the governor and deputy governor was raised.

The next question is whether there was some advice given to the board by the deputy minister of justice at that meeting on February 15, 1960.

Mr. Pearson: I meant the deputy minister of finance. I am sorry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I think the Leader of the Opposition will realize he was wrong in saying the deputy minister of justice was a member of the board. He never has been. The deputy minister of finance was not present at that meeting on February 15, 1960. As I have already told the committee, he was suddenly called to Toronto the day before the meeting owing to the unexpected death of a brother-in-law. He was obliged to leave at once and to take full charge of the funeral arrangements. That is the reason he was not present at the meeting on February 15, 1960.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The assistant deputy was there.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The assistant deputy was there but he went on very short notice and did not have the background of information in respect to this matter that the deputy minister had and, as the committee is aware, I was not acquainted with what transpired at that meeting until the spring of 1961.

In regard to the question in so far as advice is concerned, I think I have already answered that because that matter arose during my discussions with the governor on May 30. There had been advice tendered to the governor by the Department of Justice—it was not the deputy minister—on earlier occasions as to whether a by-law of the Bank of Canada relating to pensions required the approval of the governor in council. That was the one issue involved in the opinion, and it did not touch upon the other question I have mentioned as to whether such by-laws also required to be published in the Canada Gazette.

The next question asked by the Leader of the Opposition had reference to whether I receive detailed reports from the deputy minister of justice or, I take it, anyone else, as to what transpires at meetings of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. The answer to that question is no.

The last question was whether the minister is not under some duty—

Mr. Benidickson: The minister referred to the deputy minister of justice and I am sure he meant his own deputy minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I intended to say the deputy minister of finance.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The last question was whether the Minister of Finance was under some duty to read all the minutes of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. The answer is no. It has not been the practice of the bank to issue and circulate copies of minutes of board meetings at all. I am informed, because of the secret nature of the business transacted at meetings of the board of directors, these minutes are not circulated, and the directors going to meetings have on their desks either the minutes or a precis of the minutes of the previous meeting. These meetings are held at what are, by the standards of private business, fairly lengthy intervals. Meetings of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada are held on the average I would say of five times a year, so there is an interval of about two months between meetings.

Mr. Benidickson: All the more reason for reading the minutes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The bank does not issue or circulate the minutes. I have not seen any of the minutes of the board because these proceedings of the board are, of course, secret. This spring, after having been told of the increase in the governor's pension provided by the board, by the by-law of February 15, 1960, I asked for a copy of the by-law and a copy of that portion of the minutes of the meeting at which this subject was discussed.

Mr. Chevrier: What date this spring, did the minister say?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you referring to when I received a copy of the by-law?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would be in April of this year.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we have learned some details about this very unusual action in regard to pensions, taken by the twelve directors, eight of whom were appointed by the Conservative government, on the recommendation, after a good deal of study by the pensions committee of three members, two of whom, including the chairman, were appointed by the Conservative government, and the chairman of which is a close friend—a very reputable gentleman indeed—of the minister himself. That is the origin of the increase in this pension, and other pensions; an increase which I must say has caused a good deal of understandable surprise, as a result of the action by this board of directors.

The minister has also said that the question of pensions at the meeting of May 30, when the governor was asked—that is a mild word—to resign—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is an accurate word.

Mr. Pearson: This matter of pension was raised by the minister first, and only afterwards did the governor ask his question about it. The minister has said this afternoon—and this statement was made before—when he referred to the doubtful validity of the pension, that at a meeting where the governor of the bank was to be asked, and again I use that very mild word, to resign, the minister raised the question of the validity of the pension of the governor, a pension which had been established and increased by a board of directors, eight of the 12 of whom were appointed by this government. That, Mr. Chairman, speaks for itself.

Then the minister says that the governor was guilty, in the words he used, of a dereliction of duty in not bringing this increase to the attention of the minister and the government—an increase which was recommended by the board of directors on February 15, 1960. The governor was to be blamed for not doing this. Let me point out again, Mr. Chairman, that at the meeting where the board of directors took this unusual action in respect to the governor's pension—this Tory board of directors in the majority—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a Tory board of directors.

Mr. Benidickson: It then was two to one.

Mr. Pearson: At this meeting there was in attendance a representative of the Department of Finance in the person of the assistant deputy minister of finance. And then at the next meeting when the minutes of the previous meeting would undoubtedly be read—I take it that is the routine procedure at meetings of board of directors, although I must say I do not sit on meetings of boards of directors very often—the deputy minister of finance was present to hear the minutes of the previous meeting when the decision had been made to increase the pension of the governor. With the assistant deputy minister knowing about it and the deputy minister knowing about it, the minister now blames the governor of the Bank of Canada for not informing him of this increase. That also speaks for itself.

I ask the minister with respect to a matter that did not concern the government directly, but concerned the board of directors of the bank, appointed in the majority by the government, which was conducted directly in accordance with the provisions of the act, why the minister blames the governor for a dereliction of duty rather than his own representatives who were present at meetings when these actions were taken?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not a question of "rather than".

Mr. Pearson: I also ask the minister on what legal basis does he contend that the action taken by the board had to be approved by the government and published in the Canada Gazette? I then ask the minister, and I will give him a chance to answer these questions before I ask him any more, how he learned in April of 1961—not through the deputy minister and not through his assistant deputy minister—about this action taken a year and a half before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I learned about it through Mr. Bryden on March 19, as Mr. Bryden has stated in his letter which was made public last week. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition is acquainted with that. That was the first time I heard of it at all.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the other letter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister say the first time he heard of it was March 21?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I first learned about it on March 19.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If he learned about it for the first time on March 19, will the minister then explain why, if he felt so strongly about it, he did not complain about it to the governor until May 30?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this matter was given very careful consideration—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why not answer the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thought I was answering the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are not answering questions, you are now turning to another subject.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, one can see how anxious the hon. member for Essex East is to obtain the facts and information. He asks a question and before I can utter one sentence he starts making more of his silly and absolutely unreasonable remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never mind the insults, just answer the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. member will reserve his insults for himself and not interfere with the answer to the question.

I made it clear that I heard of this action from Mr. Bryden on March 19. Following that I began to make inquiries. I asked for a copy of the by-law and then a copy of the minutes of the meeting. I then studied the matter very carefully to determine the position. This matter was considered very carefully and it was only after conclusions had been arrived at that it became timely and appropriate to discuss the matter with the governor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is now clear that the minister says he first learned of the action taken by the board on the 19th of March. It is now clear that he did not discuss this matter with the governor until the 30th of May. The minister now gives us the reason that between the 19th of March and the 30th of May he wished to consider the course that would be taken. He will not mind my saying, of course, that it would be very difficulty to convince any reasonable-minded person that it would have taken all that time for the minister to register his objection. Obviously there were other reasons. While the minister takes the position that he did not know of the pension having been decided on until the 19th of March, I suggest to him that he knew before the time that the pension was determined by the board of directors that the board was going to give consideration to an increase in the pension.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask this question. Is it not a fact that before Mr. Bryden took the initiative in the board of directors—

Mr. Benidickson: In 1959.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that Mr. Bryden, the minister's close friend and one of his political workers, had discussed his intention with the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not a fact, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Bryden has made this very clear in response to the aspersions that have been cast by the governor and repeated by certain hon. members of the opposition in this house. An attempt has been made, and by none with more determination than the hon. member for Essex East, to make it appear that the Minister of Finance has misled the house in this respect. There was no discussion between Mr. Bryden and myself about the pension or any pension arrangements for the governor of the bank at all.

Mr. Bryden made it very clear in the statement he issued last week that in the most passing way he simply referred to the fact that he was proposing to have a review of the pension by-law of the bank. There was no reference whatever—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the point. You said a moment ago that was not the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —there was no suggestion whatever of a reference to the pension of the governor of the bank.

Mr. Pearson: Is he not a member of the bank?

Mr. Hellyer: What did you think they were going to do?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is what Mr. Bryden said at page 3 of his letter of June 28, and this is put forward by Mr. Bryden to answer these aspersions and these attempts to mislead and hoodwink people as to what was the discussion. This is what Mr. Bryden said in his letter to me:

> I had two conversations with you with respect to pensions. The first was in August 1959, when in a very casual conversation I said that a subcommittee of the board was giving consideration to the bank's pension fund and to salaries. No reference was made to the special provisions dealing with the pensions of the governor and deputy governor and in fact no details at all were mentioned because, at that time, the board's subcommittee had barely started to work.

There is the complete answer to the hon. member for Essex East and I trust an effective burial for the aspersions he has been casting about.

Mr. Benidickson: You did not indicate that you were offended by the 1957-58 activity of the governor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Pardon?

Mr. Benidickson: My remark was that the minister gave no indication to the chairman of the committee that he had any reservations with respect to pensions that might be provided for the senior officers of the bank with which the minister is trying to tell us the government had a quarrel on monetary policy that originated in November, 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, for what must be at least the twelfth time I repeat that the subject of the pension of the governor was never mentioned. Mr. Bryden continues:

> The second conversation with you was on March 21, 1961, when I mentioned in another connection, the action taken by the board on February 15, 1960, with regard to the special pension provisions for the governor and deputy governor. You were surprised to learn of this and I was also surprised that you did not know of it.

That also is a statement of fact, Mr. Chairman. This was the first time that the question of the increase made in the pension provisions for the governor came to my knowledge and it was in the course of a conversation on a related matter but not directly in regard to pensions that this happened to be mentioned. That was when I first learned of it. You can imagine my surprise, a surprise that so impressed Mr. Bryden that he comments that he was also surprised that I knew nothing of it.

Mr. Benidickson: We have had published one letter from Mr. Bryden to the Minister of Finance and I believe it post-dates the controversy that we are now discussing. What about the letter from Mr. Bryden to the Minister of Finance to which the governor has referred? Mr. Bryden is a close friend of the minister and an appointee of the government. What is the possibility of giving the Canadian people the full facts by producing the letter that has not yet been made available, namely, the earlier letter from Mr. Bryden to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member refers to the letter which has been so grossly misrepresented by the governor of the bank in his recent communications and published statements.

Mr. Hellyer: Let us see it so we can judge for ourselves.

Mr. Benidickson: This is why we should have a committee that could establish the facts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is what Mr. Bryden had to say about that letter by way of correcting the false references to it by the governor of the bank in his recent public statements. This is in Mr. Bryden's letter to me of June 28, 1961.

> Reference has been made by Mr. Coyne in a recent letter to you that I told you about a possible change in these provisions six months before the directors acted in February 1960. The letter I addressed to you on April 7, 1961, gives in chronological sequence the meetings and discussions relating to both salaries and pensions which led up to the approval by the board of amendments to the pension fund by-law. I continue to regard this letter as a confidential communication.

Mr. Benidickson: Are you speaking for yourself or are you quoting Mr. Bryden?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am still reading Mr. Bryden's letter, as I made clear. I repeat:

I continue to regard this letter as a confidential communication. At Mr. Coyne's request I subsequently sent a copy of this letter to him in his capacity as governor of the bank since I was still technically a director of the bank at the date the letter was written.

This is the letter which has been grossly misrepresented by the governor of the bank and referred to by certain hon. members in this house in quoting from the governor's letter which, as I have said, was a gross misrepresentation.

Mr. Pearson: So you say.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Bryden makes it quite clear that he wrote me the letter in confidence and I received that letter in confidence. That confidence has been respected.

Mr. Benidickson: You have referred to it in the house and are obliged to table it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This House of Commons, when confronted with a motion that this correspondence should be tabled, upheld the confidential nature of that correspondence. What the governor did was to ask Mr. Bryden for a copy of this letter and he obtained the letter which was written in confidence and it was given to him because he was the governor and it related to the affairs of the bank. But did the governor respect the confidence? No, he did not, and he did not even refer to it accurately. He grossly misrepresented the contents of the letter and then he tried to make it appear that there had been a hiding of this letter. There never was anything of the kind.

This house has dealt with this question on a motion to produce some days ago and has decided that because of the confidential nature of the communication that confidence should be respected and the privileged nature of the communication should be upheld in this house. This house has upheld the privileged nature of that communication. But that did not prevent the governor from making an entirely untrue statement about the effect of this letter and referring, if you please, to a letter that he had received in confidence and which he well knew had been written to me in confidence. I ask if that is good behaviour on the part of a public official.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister now has said, of course, more than I am sure, on reflection, he would wish to have said. I asked him a few moments ago if there had been any discussion between himself and Mr. Bryden prior to the decisions of the board at Mr. Bryden's initiative to provide for this pension to the governor, the circumstances of which I should like an opportunity of examining the governor upon because I do not like the pension. I am not alone in that in this party. However, I am anxious to find out—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Almost alone.

Mr. Pearson: You gave it to him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am anxious to find out the circumstances that prompted a board of directors, eight of whom were appointed by this government—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And four appointed by you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to take the course they took to which the minister now professes, carrying a white cloak of innocence, to be totally opposed. The minister now has admitted that, prior to the decision of the board, he did have a general discussion about pension matters of the bank with Mr. Bryden.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not a true statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what you said a few moments ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member talks in one breath, Mr. Chairman, about the governor's pension—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have the floor.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then he talks about the general pension by-law; he is talking about two different things.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope, Mr. Chairman, that you will caution the Minister of Finance to contain himself and to speak when he has the right to speak. I am not yielding the floor to him. It is clear from what he said a few moments ago that he has contradicted himself. There was a discussion between himself and Mr. Bryden with regard to the pension arrangements of the bank. This afternoon the minister denied that that situation existed. We have found out that the minister, within the course of 20 minutes, has contradicted himself on this important matter. He says Mr. Bryden has asked him in the recent letter written to the Minister of Finance, to treat as continuing in its confidential character the letter of resignation of Mr. Bryden of April 4.

I suggest to the minister that he had asked Mr. Bryden to provide in this last letter for that very request.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is untrue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says that is not true. I say the minister did suggest that to Mr. Bryden.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; this is something obviously within my knowledge, and I say that I did not ask for that letter. The hon. member says I did, and I say I did not. Under the rules of this house, it does not lie within the right of any hon. member to question the statement of another hon. member in relation to a matter within his knowledge.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the rules of the house, the minister is right. However, the fact is that the minister now, in view of the importance of the Bryden letter, in view of what he has said about comments that have been made by a government official with regard to that letter, owes it to the house and to the country to ask Mr. Bryden, at the earliest possible moment, for permission to divulge the contents of that letter. I am sure Mr. Bryden, who has nothing to be ashamed of in this matter, who acted with the best intentions even though his course may not be fully supported by all of us in this house, would not now take the position that that letter should not be divulged so that we can ascertain the real circumstances in this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said so on June 28, which was last week.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know he said so, and I am suggesting why he said so. Does the minister deny that there was any collaboration between him and Mr. Bryden with regard to this last letter? Does the minister deny that he called Mr. Bryden on the phone and said that there was discussion in the house—you have seen a report in the papers about it, don't you think you ought to write me again and among the things that you ought to suggest is that this letter of April 4 should not be made public? The minister denies that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly do deny that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said you have denied it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member refrain from indulging in these fictional expeditions and tell the truth?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the Minister of Finance not forget that his conduct in this matter is under examination, not that of the governor of the Bank of Canada. We have a right to find out whether or not there was collaboration along the lines I have indicated. Otherwise, why would there be any reluctance to table the letter of April 4?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because it was confidential.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is only fair to Mr. Bryden, and the reason the minister does not want to expose that letter is that it will put him in a different position in regard to this pension proposed by a Tory board of directors. That is the reason, and there is no other. If that is not the reason, then why does not the minister go to his friend and say, I believe this letter of April 4, now that it has been referred to by the governor, now that it has been discussed in the House of Commons by that terrible man from Essex East, should be tabled.

If the minister thinks we are having an inquiry this afternoon, he has a second thought. The minister at every turn is dodging every issue. He is precluding our receiving answers to specific questions. Now he seeks to confuse this whole pension issue which he wishes to create as a separate issue to provide a smokescreen, to provide a screen against his own ineptness in handling these important matters that are now engaging this House of Commons. That is the reason, and it is because of that that we insist on knowing the circumstances the minister has not yet revealed with regard to his part, and the part of his government, with regard to a matter about which now they give the pretence that they are against.

Let it not be forgotten that the man who proposed this pension was a close friend of the minister. Let it not be forgotten that he proposed it to a board of directors, the great majority of whom were supporters of my hon. friend's party. Let it not be forgotten that they were appointees of the Conservative party. They are the ones who are responsible for this pension, and the minister, by no method that he can employ, can hope to escape the responsibility vicariously by putting the responsibility for this pension arrangement onto the shoulders of others. We are not here to defend any individual. We are here trying to ascertain the facts, and we are not able to get those facts from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I doubt, Mr. Chairman, if the truth has ever been handled so lightly in this House of Commons as it has been just now by the hon. member for Essex East. In typical fashion, as he has on various other occasions in the course of this debate, he has set up his straw men, entirely the creatures of his own fiction and imagination, and then proceeded to argue as though his fictional presentation were factual. Well, it is not; it remains fiction as it was from the beginning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Give us a chance to find out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, Mr. Chairman, there are ways of asking questions without making statements that are utterly untrue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not with this minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member and I, I think, are coming to understand each other better. I will say of him that he has uttered this afternoon a series of false charges, one after the other—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —made out of whole cloth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the hon. gentleman has made a statement that I am not going to even ask him to withdraw. I have not made any false charges. I have asked questions of the hon. gentleman who is now under cross-examination. Let him not think that he is the accuser in this situation. In the present instance, in respect of this matter, he is the accused and because of that we have a right to put questions to him in a form that will reveal the true situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I am the accused and the hon. member for Essex East is the accuser, then I say, and repeat, that I am falsely accused. I hope I make myself clear.

For the twentieth time, Mr. Chairman, let me say that never was the subject of the governor's pension discussed with me. Never did I hear reference to the change that has been made by the board of directors in the provision for the governor's pension until late March, 1961, something like 13½ months after the meeting at which this had been done.

The hon. member is following a strange course when he says he does not like the pension but he seems to like the man who is going to get the pension if he can get it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I never said that. If the minister is going to quote me, I would ask him to quote me correctly. What I said was—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is quite clear. The hon. member tried to make us believe that he did not like the pension, but I say he likes the man who is claiming the pension. If the hon. member for Essex East can have his way in this debate, it is quite clear that the governor will get his pension; he will not get it now but they would stall off this discussion, if they could, until December 31, when the period of the governor's term will expire anyway and they will evidently be pleased then to see him come off with this handsome pension.

I have made it quite clear—and I made this very clear to the governor of the bank when I saw him on May 30—that the reaction of the cabinet to this pension, when they heard of it, was one of shock and consternation. That is our view of this pension. We do not hold the governor responsible for actions taken by others. However, we hold him responsible for his own actions or his failure to take action where it is properly to be expected of the governor of the Bank of Canada under such circumstances. It was for that failure that he was held responsible. It is for that failure that he is being judged I say that it is the view of the government, as it has been since we heard of this matter, that is was a dereliction of duty on the part of the governor of the Bank of Canada not to see to it that the government was made acquainted with this handsome increase provided for him on February 15, 1960. After all, the board of directors under the Bank of Canada Act is not completely supreme because that act gives the governor the power of veto, so great are the powers of the governor under this act. If those powers are great, so is the responsibility that goes with them. With great power goes high responsibility, in the view of the government; and that responsibility was not discharged.

I do not hold the governor responsible for actions taken by the directors, but we hold him responsible—a man who had the power of veto—in that he did not at least see to it that the government was made aware of this handsome increase.

When an opinion was given some years ago that the approval of the governor in council to a pension by-law passed by the board of directors of the Bank of Canada was not essential to the validity of that by-law, that opinion did not say that such a by-law, if it affected the governor's personal pension, should not be reported to the governor in council. That is a very different matter. Here we are in the realm of what is the assessment of responsibility. It is in this realm that we should ask whether there has been good conduct on the part of the governor of the Bank of Canada, holding an office than which there is none higher or more important in this country outside the government itself. Mr. Chairman, we say that responsibility was not discharged in a matter affecting the personal interest of the governor of the bank.

It is all very well now for hon. members opposite to try to hide behind a decision of the board of directors. It is all very well for the governor of the Bank of Canada now to try to hide behind a decision of the board of directors. But what of the decision of the board of directors when that same board of directors a month ago asked the governor for his resignation? When it suited the governor on that occasion, he ignored the resolution passed by the board of directors. He defied them, as no decision of the board of directors in that regard was to be construed as binding upon him. But in a matter which affected his personal interest under this by-law, with more than a doubling of his pension involved, an increase from less than $12,000 per annum to $25,000 per annum for life and payable immediately on retirement in this case at 51 years of age—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in that case the governor is prepared to say. "Oh, well, I stand behind the decision of the board of directors". If the decision of the board of governors was something for him to stand behind as of February 15, 1960, what then of June 13, 1961, when the governor defies the same board and then goes out and defames the board in public utterances that the governor then proceeded to issue?

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it not true that there is an arrangement under which the governor would not collect his pension at age 51 if he had other alternative employment at the time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. There is no such arrangement. This is just a red herring that was drawn across the trail by the governor of the bank in one of those recent public statements or letters of his. There is no such thing involved. It is so interesting, Mr. Chairman, to have this red herring put up now. When I asked for his resignation when I met him on May 30, why did the governor in putting to me three questions ask me "What about my pension?"

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us examine him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Anybody with any knowledge at all knows perfectly well that there are no such conditions as those suggested now by the hon. member for Trinity written into this by-law or the claims that the governor makes under it. This is just a red herring, Mr. Chairman; nothing more.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us find out whether it is a red herring.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you don't know yet, you will never know because your mind is blocked.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is brilliant repartee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is obviously an act of mercy that the hon. member for Essex East is kept on in this house as a sort of pensioner. It is quite obvious that, if this is the kind of interpretation he can give to by-laws, it is a good thing he is not thrown out in the world practising law again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me tell my hon. friend that my constituents will send me here long after the hon. gentleman will have left here.

An hon. Member: You had a fairly close call the last time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is smiling.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am laughing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not wish to ruffle him any more. We wish to keep on the subject here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have had occasion at other times to remind him that in the last election, when he came through literally by the skin of his teeth, he did not run as a Liberal. I saw his election signs in Essex East and the word "Liberal" was conspicuously absent. This is the man who just two months previously had run for the leadership of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us examine the governor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member ought to be a little more loyal to his leader.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to make these facts plain. We are engaged in what appears to be constant repetition. I can only say that, so far as my answers have been repetitive, they are repetitive only because the questions have been repetitive.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, let us finish this subject.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Skeena was seeking the floor.

Mr. Howard: I have not that sort of intimate relationship that Mr. Coyne has with members of the Liberal party and I have been watching with amusement some of the activities that have been engaged in recently on both sides. I have not said anything yet on this particular bill at either stage—

Mr. Webster: Don't spoil the record.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend advises me not to spoil the record. I would tell him that the Minister of Finance has dirtied it up enough already that it is not possible to spoil it any more. I would say that my position on this particular matter coincides with that expressed by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the bill. I agree with him that this is not a so-called Fleming v. Coyne dispute or issue. I do not look at it in that sense. I think what it is is a dispute and an issue between what is right and what is wrong; an issue between the rights of an individual to a fair hearing and the smearing attack engaged in by hon. gentlemen opposite from a privileged position in the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: Good gracious; look who is talking. If anybody does that sort of thing, it is you.

Mr. Howard: Here is my hon. friend from Halifax, with that intimate interest in divorce that he has showing through again.

Mr. Peters: He should divorce himself from these serious matters.

Mr. Howard: The Minister of Finance started off with the statement that he was going to present facts to the committee, but he so interlaced those facts with half truths, untruths and fiction that the record now reads like something that would be prepared in a weird tales and fantastic stories publication. Arising out of it all I am forced to have some doubts about the truthfulness and the veracity of the minister himself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: —some serious doubts about them, in view of what he has said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously, Mr. Chairman, the rules of the house are being deliberately broken here—

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member has only said he has his doubts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and I ask that the rules be enforced and the hon. member be invited to withdraw that statement.

The Chairman: This problem has arisen before and it may help the committee if I read citation 145 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 126:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian commons that a statement by an honourable member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately—

I think I should underline this adverb for the hon. member for Skeena:

> —criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible. A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

I suggest that the hon. member for Skeena has done more than temperately criticize statements made by the Minister of Finance and should correct it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure whether this is a proper question of privilege, but it will only take a minute. I have been in this house for 15 years now, 12 of them in opposition. I do recognize that with regard to the opposition we should be very sympathetic with those who take pretty wide latitude and perhaps talk a little irresponsibly at times. But as far as I can remember, only within the last three months would any one have dared in this house to suggest that the Minister of Finance could stray from the truth. These things which are being said opposite—are being said carefully and usually fall short of containing an actual accusation, but I do suggest there are certain decencies which should be preserved in this house and which are in danger of not being preserved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the Minister of Finance observe those decencies.

Mr. Howard: The Minister of Finance is the first one in this house to fail to observe those decencies. Apparently these decencies to which the hon. member for Greenwood has referred, for which he and others have high respect, are not adhered to by the government in the treatment—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Robichaud: Here is an expert getting up.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: There are slurs and slanders against the governor —

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have as much right to get up as anyone else. We have heard a lot of talk about closure, and when I get up, after listening for days to speeches, I am not allowed to speak. The point of order is this. The hon. member for Skeena referred to—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you cannot have two points of order at the same time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —the half truths and untruths spoken by the Minister of Finance. He should withdraw that statement.

The Chairman: I have invited the hon. member to do so and I was hoping he was coming to it.

Mr. Howard: I was proceeding to that point, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. gentleman—what position does this hon. gentleman hold now?—the Solicitor General, interrupted. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance engages in half truths and untruths, but I will withdraw the implication, if it was contained in my remarks, that he has engaged in those sort of things, on his own word. I have my own doubts and my own thoughts.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw it like a man, instead of only half withdrawing it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You would not expect him to withdraw it like a man.

Mr. Howard: Fortunately, Mr. Chairman, this government is not yet in a position to engage in thought control, as much as it would like to do so. It may have that sort of authority and control over hon. members on the other side of the chamber, but heaven forbid that it should go any further.

Mr. Hellyer: They just hide letters.

Mr. Howard: In my opinion what has occurred here is that Mr. Coyne has not been treated in a decent and honest manner by this government, because it has consistently refused to submit this particular question to a committee where Mr. Coyne can be examined under oath, where the Minister of Finance can perhaps be examined under oath, and where other officers of the Bank of Canada can be examined under oath.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The question of the reference to a committee was decided by a vote of the house yesterday and there should be no further reference to that matter during the course of this debate.

An hon. Member: Decency.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not a question that was decided yesterday.

Mr. Howard: We all know the attitude of the Minister of Veterans Affairs on these and other matters also, but I still say that it is because of the refusal of this government to reconsider its position that Mr. Coyne is not being treated in the manner to which the hon. member for Greenwood referred a while ago. It appears that all that is desired with regard to the Bank of Canada is to make it a political puppet or a tool of the government that will jump any time some crackpot minister of finance wants to crack the whip—

Mr. Benidickson: Including the directors.

Mr. Howard: —to operate under direction for political purposes; not for sensible, planned purposes either. I do not know Mr. Coyne. I have never met him. I have never spoken with him. I do not particularly favour his policies, any more than I favour the policies of this Minister of Finance. But I do favour his right to be heard; not the manner of being heard to which he has resorted within the last few weeks—I do not agree with that either.

The Minister of Finance has the right to stand up in this house and to make statements of fact, or what he claims are facts, and when those facts are questioned, to insist upon his parliamentary right of having those statements accepted as true. He has engaged in that activity regularly and continuously. He has, as I said, interlaced them with some fiction, some imagination and hallucinations, and these we have to sift from the facts themselves. But Mr. Coyne does not have an opportunity to present his point of view to the people who are being asked to fire him, and to be examined on that point of view, as has the Minister of Finance who is now in the position of being examined in so far as his activities are concerned. As I said, I disagree with the manner and the course Mr. Coyne has followed in issuing press releases. I disagree with the words of those releases. Many of the words contained in them are as inflammatory as those which the Minister of Finance could employ even in his most gentle moments. But there are some serious charges made in some of these letters which Mr. Coyne has released. One of them is a charge against the Minister of Finance about certain budgetary matters having come to the attention of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the statement that changes were subsequently made in the budget. This is a serious charge to level against the minister. And how does the governor know? Did he see the budget? The minister said he did not—Mr. Coyne is a liar; he did not know things of this sort. Yet if somebody in this house calls the Minister of Finance a liar he immediately runs foul of the rules as was shown a moment ago.

Not only can that word "liar" not be applied to the Minister of Finance or to anybody else, but we cannot even question the degree of truth in an answer or the fullness of an answer given by the Minister of Finance when he rises and says: you must accept my word, because the rules say so. But the rules allow the Minister of Finance and others to cast slurs and accusations against Mr. Coyne for statements he has made publicly in the press. This is a disgraceful way to run the affairs of this nation. Such accusations are disgraceful especially coming from a Minister of Finance who just a few years ago had his bench covered with the union jack, who also some years before that was a Sunday school teacher and an active participant in the United church. For him to engage in an activity of this sort from a privileged position against any individual in society is disgraceful and not in keeping with that sense of decency which the hon. member for Greenwood mentioned a while ago. No wonder the hon. member for Greenwood resigned from the cabinet, if this sort of thing goes on.

Not only is this activity a disgrace to our parliament and to our concept of freedom and rights and a disgrace to what we thought we had enacted when we enacted the bill of rights, but it is also a disgraceful way to deal with a corporation such as the Bank of Canada—to fill it up with toadies who are going to jump every time the government cracks the whip for any unprincipled political reason whatsoever. Let us take a look at some of the directors—some of the people who might become governor after Mr. Coyne has gone. Reference has been made to the number who have been appointed since this government took office. Their names are in the annual report and there is no need to refer to them specifically. The years 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961 are the years when these gentlemen were appointed to these positions. Let us take one of them from my own province of British Columbia, Mr. Frederick Field. He was appointed first, I believe, on December 1, 1958 by this government, then reappointed in 1959 for the normal period. This is how the Bank of Canada is being operated, and this is the purpose of some of these appointments. Here is a gentleman, Mr. Field, who contributed $5,000 to the slush campaign fund of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in 1958. That is evidence of his association with the Tory party. Here is a gentleman, Mr. Field, who kicked in $7,675.88 to the campaign fund of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Here is a gentleman, Mr. Field, who contributed $5,000 toward the election of the hon. member for Cariboo, another Conservative; a gentleman who contributed $3,000 toward the election of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Here is a total of more than $20,000 contributed by one individual, as evidenced by sworn statements, to Conservative campaign funds. Shortly thereafter he ends up by being appointed to the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. Money talks. Money counts. If you contribute to the party we shall see that you are paid off, one way or another.

An hon. Member: How much did you get from Hoffa?

Mr. Howard: How much does this government get from Hoffa? I do not know how much they got from Hoffa but I would say this: I have just as much dislike for Hoffa as I have for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Not only has the government loaded the board of directors with its own pets, its own favourites who will jump when it cracks the whip, but the Minister of Finance is now involved in getting the Bank of Canada infiltrated with his relatives. Here is another pipe line into the operations of the Bank of Canada. Perhaps Mr. Donald Wilson may have had some relationship with the Minister of Finance in some of the things he has discovered about the Bank of Canada.

For a variety of reasons I have no intention of supporting this bill at this stage, or any other stage of the proceedings, unless this government admits to some sense of decency of treatment, some sense of honesty, some sense in keeping with our concept of rights and freedoms. Unless it admits to those and is prepared to refer this bill even at this late date to a committee of this house, I do not intend to vote for it. A government that wants to engage in the trial of an individual by slur and insult, a government that wants to proceed to a conviction by distortion and hypocrisy is wasting its time by asking me to support it on this issue.

Mr. Pearson: A few moments ago the hon. member for Greenwood made a plea for decency in debate. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that the most decent thing to have done in this situation would be to have given the man whom we are being asked by act of parliament to turn out of his job, a chance to appear before a committee of the house.

If there ever was a case made for that procedure to have been followed weeks ago, that case has surely been made and reinforced this afternoon. If that had been done this matter would have been decided a long time ago. It would have been decided after all the evidence had been taken on both sides and witnesses called, witnesses who could contradict each other if necessary. Instead, we get selective confidentiality from the Minister of Finance and selective statements from the Minister of Finance. That, I claim, is not the decent way to proceed in respect to a man with whom we may disagree but with whose right to be heard before he is turned out we do not disagree.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Macdonnell: I endeavoured yesterday briefly to state why I voted against the amendment, and perhaps my chief reason was that I understood the Leader of the Opposition and as far as I know everyone else in this house had reached the conclusion that the governor of the bank could not continue to hold his position. I stated that, and it was not contradicted. Apparently, in the last 24 hours there has been a great change of front.

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member had been in the house at 2.30 he would know that I dealt with that point in the reply I made to the statements of the minister this morning. Of course, the government has destroyed the value of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Of course it has. Of course, the governor of the Bank of Canada cannot continue to serve with this government. But before he is thrown out, surely he is entitled to state his case.

The hon. member is a gentleman and he is a sportsman, and he must realize that when the governor says there is no disagreement and when he had asked for the right to be heard he should, surely, be entitled to that right before we pass this act of parliament discharging him. That is what I mean by decency, and that is why I shall vote against this bill, and for no other reason.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance in dealing with the pension matter said that the governor and not the board of directors, eight of whom were appointed by his government as well as the chairman of the pension committee who is a great friend of his, must take the responsibility for this course of action which was unanimously adopted by the board of directors. It is not the Tory board of directors but the governor who is culpable because he did not stop this action.

In respect to the knowledge of the minister of this matter, we accept his word—he knew nothing about it. However, his friend and confidant, Mr. Bryden, had the following to say, I will read from his letter of June 28, 1961 which was made public:

I had two conversations with you with respect to pensions. The first was in August 1959—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do not stop there, go on.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, of course, I will read the rest of it. It continues as follows:

—when in a very casual conversation I said that a subcommittee of the board was giving consideration to the bank's pension fund—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Read the next sentence.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I intend to.

[Mr. Pearson.]

—and to salaries. No reference was made to the special provisions dealing with the pensions of the governor and deputy governor—

The minister knew that a committee of the bank directors was studying the question of bank pensions, and he knew that in August of 1959. The minister's deputy and his assistant deputy were aware of the action that was taken.

The minister will correct me if I am wrong when I say—this has been stated by the governor—that the deputy minister had given his approval to the pension arrangements one week before the meeting of February 15, 1960. The deputy minister knew about it and the assistant deputy minister knew about it, and the minister knew that a pensions committee of the bank was operating under his friend, Mr. Bryden.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course you did, what do you think we are?

Mr. Pearson: Yet, with the two senior officials of his department with full knowledge of what went on because they attended the meeting when the decision was made, the minister tells us that so little did he know about the workings of this affair and the workings of his department in respect of the Bank of Canada, he knew nothing about this until March 1961. Well, we accept the minister's statement, but that is a strange way to run a department.

Then we have this letter of April 6 from Mr. Bryden which the minister claims that the governor of the bank has distorted. The minister has given his own interpretation of that letter, but surely that is another reason why we should have a committee go into these matters. The minister having claimed that this letter has been mispresented, why does he not remove all doubt by tabling the letter and making it public? He says it is a confidential letter, but he does not mind referring to that confidential letter in giving his own interpretation of it. All he has to do is ask Mr. Bryden, and he is in close touch with him, to give permission to having this letter made public, and I am sure it will be given, then this doubt will be removed. The minister will not do that. The minister cannot expect to have it both ways. If he wants to remove himself from suspicion in these matters let him give us all the facts on the basis of the evidence and documents. Until he does that, we have the right—

Mr. Benidickson: He is concealing the evidence.

Mr. Pearson: —we have the right to assume that the whole story has not been told and that the government will not allow it to be told.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am quite perturbed by this whole matter.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: I am not perturbed particularly because of the fight between Mr. Coyne and the Minister of Finance, because, as I have said before, I think they are both Conservatives with Conservative attitudes, and I still believe that there is very little difference between them, and that difference is purely between two men who cannot get along. However, I am perturbed because I think the minister has been misrepresenting the facts to this committee and to the country in relation to the pension, and I only wish to talk about that aspect of the question.

Mr. Norman Campbell in the Ottawa Citizen of July 4, 1961, had the following to say:

> Had governor James Coyne been contributing to the civil service superannuation fund instead of to the Bank of Canada's own pension fund, he would be eligible for a pension of over $24,000 on his scheduled retirement December 31 next.
>
> The pension would be computed at 2 per cent of salary for each year of service.
>
> This is interesting in light of the fact that the $25,000 pension authorized by the bank's directors was the prime reason first given by finance minister Fleming for seeking Mr. Coyne's resignation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What are you reading from?

Mr. Peters: I am reading from the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is full of false statements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Everyone is false but the minister.

Mr. Peters: I would not say the minister has given false statements to this house but he has confused the facts to such an extent that no one knows what is right and what is wrong. I am quite sure that Norman Campbell sitting in that exalted fourth dimensional position—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: There may be some who say that the position of those in the fourth estate is an eminent position. I suggest it is fourth dimensional, and perhaps that is true as well. To go on with the article, it reads as follows:

> There is an unwritten understanding that no governor of the Bank of Canada, or other senior official, will draw his pension if he goes to a salaried job on retirement—that is, not until he leaves the salaried job.

The article continues:

> That is the reason president Donald Gordon of Canadian National Railways receives no pension from the Bank of Canada, where he was deputy governor.

Is the minister aware—he is a very intelligent man with very intelligent assistants, as I have pointed out on a number of occasions before, particularly his assistant in the house who is familiar with the Civil Service Act and civil service pensions—that this pension is not out of line with pensions under the civil service itself? While it is true that the rate may be a little higher than is normally paid to deputy ministers and others in that category, if the pensions paid to individuals in other categories had the same percentage applied to them those pensions would be considerably higher. The minister has not said that there is anything wrong with the application of this 2 per cent formula. Perhaps I am drawing a supposition similar to that drawn by the hon. member for Essex East, this afternoon—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You must not do that.

Mr. Peters: It is my opinion that because of pensions paid to retired directors of the Bank of Canada, the minister was able to go to the governor of the Bank of Canada and tell him if he did not publish the changes in the Canada Gazette then the payments made to other individuals receiving pension under the new scheme would be illegal. I do not think the change in the pension itself is a factor involved in this fight.

We believe that the pension of $25,000 is unreasonable particularly in relation to the size of pensions being paid to the retired people of this country. We say this pension is much too high in relation to the majority of pensions being paid to other individuals. I do not think that this change in pension was at any time a factor in the position taken by the Minister of Finance regarding the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I am sure if we had the opportunity, as the Senate will have, of finding out some of these facts, we would discover that most of the concern in respect to the governor of the Bank of Canada did not arise because of the philosophical position taken by the governor, but arose because the government intended to achieve control of this bank in that manner. This was a more serious threat to the economy according to the thinking of some of the leading people involved in the situation than was the fact that this man would probably get a $25,000 pension on retirement at such an early age. I think that the minister has not been fair with the committee.

Governor of Bank of Canada

I should like to speculate on what is going to happen to this bill. I think there are only one or two things that can happen. The bill will be put through by the large Conservative majority. They have already called back most of their members and they will use their majority to see that the bill is passed by the house. When the bill goes to the Senate, the Senate may well be threatened that if they take a position contrary to the wishes of the government the Prime Minister will come into the house and say that there has to be Senate reform and parliament will be dissolved and they will go to the country on Senate reform. This will probably be the final outcome of this matter. If it is not, I think the senators will have to give consideration to soft-pedalling the questions they ask. If they do not, they will find out some of the answers that we in this house want.

One question in which I and all Canadians, I think, are interested, is what is wrong with the financial institutions of this country? Why have we not been able to get greater Canadian participation in our national development and what roles does the Bank of Canada play in this field? Canadians will want to know that; the senators, I hope, will want to know that, and we in the House of Commons want to know the answer to that.

We are not particularly interested in whether Mr. Coyne parts his hair one way and Mr. Fleming does not like it or whether Mr. Coyne does not like the looks of Mr. Fleming. We are not particularly interested in this personality clash. In putting this matter before the Canadian people I think we have been unfair in trying to put it on the basis of whether or not a $25,000 pension for this man is too much or not enough. I would also suggest that Mr. Coyne, after his many years of working for the Bank of Canada, probably has as good qualifications to run big business as have some of the other people who have come from that particular field. One man who got very close to the top in the Bank of Canada was Donald Gordon who now has a salary of $75,000 a year and who, unless some decision is made otherwise, will probably continue to serve as the head of Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nobody knows.

Mr. Peters: If the minister is not able to do what he appears to be trying to do, to blacken the personal reputation of Mr. Coyne, I say that Mr. Coyne will be able to get a substantial job and will not need to ask for his pension for a good many years to come.

It has been interesting to note that it has been pointed out in the press that the changes in the pension plan in general covering employees of the Bank of Canada at all levels have resulted in a reduction in the total cost of their pensions to the Canadian people and not an increase. The fact that one pension at the very top has reached the proportions it has has not cost the Canadian people anything and I suggest it is not necessarily going to cost them anything for a number of years to come.

I suggest to the minister that he should rise in his place and tell us whether he really thinks that a pension of $25,000 is too high. If he does think it is too high, will he consider changing the whole scheme of pensions of civil servants which is based on the very simple principle of a contribution of 2 per cent of the earnings of the employee? If there is unfairness at this high rate there must be unfairness throughout all other levels of rates in the pension program.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister one further short question on this matter before he replies? It is this. If the minister thought that the action taken by the board of directors of the bank on this pension matter was improper and if the government, as the minister has told us, received the news of this action 18 months later with shock and consternation, did the government consider either asking the board of directors to reconsider their action instead of blaming the governor for it or asking the board of directors, which took this action that caused shock and consternation, to resign?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to the effect of the by-law and of courses that may be taken to deal with this pension, this question will be dealt with in due course. There are various aspects of this matter that are under consideration relating to the validity of the by-law and this matter is receiving study. The hon. member for Timiskaming—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I might intercede at this point to reflect for a moment on what I thought I heard coming from some area in the house and that was the addressing of the first minister by his first name. Of course, this is very much against the rules as is well known to the member who made the remark. I cannot positively identify who it was but I would ask that member, who should know this rule very well, to desist from this type of interjection.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Timiskaming drew certain inferences from an article in yesterday's issue of the Ottawa Citizen which he read. The portions of the article that he read contained one misstatement after another. Various of them have been raised in discussion here today. The writer of that article keeps going back again and again to assert that the prime reason for asking for the resignation of the governor was this matter of the pension. This was one of five reasons. The article takes us back to the first statement issued by the governor, who gave a very misleading impression of the conference held on May 30. I wish to deal particularly with what that erroneous and misleading article says with regard to the pension. This article seems to suggest that this pension is comparable with those payable in the civil service. I say that is a very misleading presentation.

The superannuation act was amended at the 1960 session of parliament on motion of the government and the effect of that amendment was to increase the superannuation provisions so that persons qualifying under the act might have a pension based on 35 years' contribution at the rate of 2 per cent per annum and with the pension based upon the six best earning years. The highest salary paid in the civil service, as was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Carleton is $24,000 a year. That is the highest salary paid. How anybody can make 70 per cent of that come anywhere near the pension payable to the governor will be a stretching of any mathematical process.

But that tells only a small part of the story. The fact is that these pensions under the superannuation act are payable to persons retiring at age 65. Here is the governor who is able to retire at age 51 and draw a pension of $25,000 per annum. Moreover, the pension payable under the superannuation act is a contributory pension and the rate of contributions was increased last year. But what about this pension, this increase? It was a contributory pension, it is true, when on February 15, 1960, the board of directors of the bank increased it. Up till that time the contributions by the governor had been $1,500 per annum but when his pension rate was more than doubled on that occasion what about the contribution? He does not contribute on a full salary of $50,000 a year. Under the by-law he contributes on only $40,000 of that. I am informed that in 1960 his pension contributions, following the increase on February 15, amounted to a total of $2,287.50 of which $1,500, of course, was deductible from his income for tax purposes and $787.50 was taxable. This year, 1961, if his contributions run a full year, he will contribute $2,400, of which $1,500 will be deductible from income for tax purposes and $900 will be taxable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I look around the civil service of this country and I see a writer in the Ottawa Citizen comparing the pension rights available to the governor under this pension by-law of February 15, 1960 and think of the provisions that are available to civil servants, then I say I do not know of any civil servant in this country who would not jump at the opportunity to trade places with the governor under those circumstances. As a matter of fact, I think most people in this country would jump at the opportunity to trade places with anyone who could retire at age 51 on a pension of $25,000 a year for life.

Mr. Pearson: Fire your board.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already dealt with that subject. I do not know whether or not the Leader of the Opposition paid any attention to that subject. I hope my remarks sank in.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I recall every word.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is another comparison that I think it is not unfair to draw here. I made a return to the house or answered certain questions on June 26 as recorded at page 7032 of Hansard. One of these questions concerned the various pension amending by-laws over the years and the rates of contribution under those.

A question was asked as well on another occasion, about the extent of the pensions paid. I have informed the committee as to the extent of the pension paid to the former governor of the bank, Mr. Graham Towers, after his long service. It is just about the amount that the present governor would have had if there had not been that change in the pension by-laws in February, 1960. It is said in this newspaper article that it is something like an unwritten rule that if the incumbent of this office of governor finds himself a salaried position outside upon retirement he forgos or waives his claim to pension. This is indeed something new, Mr. Chairman. There is no justification for any such assertion.

It may enter into the minds of the directors, and undoubtedly did enter into the minds of directors who voted for this increase in February, 1960, that a governor whose term of office expires cannot expect to step out into another position immediately with a corresponding salary. After all, there are not that many positions in this country that pay a salary of $50,000 a year with a pension of $25,000 per year payable on retirement at whatever age in life that may come. But, Mr. Chairman, there is no foundation whatever for the assertion or allegation that there is some unwritten rule or understanding that if a former governor, in receipt of a pension finds himself a salaried position elsewhere he will forgo or waive the pension to which he is entitled from the bank; that is just made out of somebody's imagination.

I refer hon. members to what I said at page 7178 of Hansard of June 28. There I pointed out that the maximum pension payable today by the Bank of Canada, and as I mentioned at that time this is the pension of the former governor Mr. Graham Towers, is $1,145.83 per month. This is a pension of approximately $13,500 per annum after the long service which Mr. Towers gave as governor of the bank from 1935 until the end of 1954. I think, Mr. Chairman, we should have some regard for a proper basis of comparison and not be misled by the kind of newspaper statements by which the hon. member was evidently misled.

My final comment is this, Mr. Chairman. This present issue is in no sense attributable to any clash of personalities. It is attributable to questions of principle.

Mr. Chevrier: Before I ask some additional questions of the Minister of Finance, I wish to make an observation which I hope the hon. member for Greenwood and the minister will take in good part. During the course of the discussion this afternoon, in giving answers to questions as the minister did a moment ago, he seemed to be of the opinion that everything concerning this matter that comes either from this side or a source other than the government is false. He has said that the article in the Citizen which was written by Mr. Norman Campbell is replete with inaccuracies. He has said it is false; that some of the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition are false; that statements made by the hon. member for Essex East are false. He interrupted the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to say that his statements were nothing but falsehoods.

The hon. member for Greenwood told us the Minister of Finance, in his attitude, could not stray from the truth. He was scandalized a moment ago at some of the things that were said here and thought they should not have been said. He nods his head now by way of agreeing with what I am saying, namely, that the Minister of Finance could not stray from the truth. Well, it seems strange that the truth can only come from that side and that from this side there could not be anything but falsehoods.

Mr. Macdonnell: I did not say that; in fact I was very careful not to say that.

Mr. Chevrier: I am now attributing the last part of what I said to the discussion that has been taking place, and not to the hon. member for Greenwood. What I did say about the hon. member for Greenwood was that he said the Minister of Finance could not stray from the truth.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Macdonnell: That is what I said.

Mr. Chevrier: That is what was said, yes. What I am saying now is this: It seems strange to me that the truth can only come from that side and cannot come from this side. How is it that during the course of this discussion we have been interrupted continually by the minister who has been rising in his place or interrupting from his seat to say, that is not true; that is untrue; that is false. This remark has been made repeatedly during the course of this discussion. He interrupted the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as reported at page 6917 of Hansard, to say this: "When are you going to start telling the truth tonight?" This is only one example of at least ten, if not more, which cover the pages of Hansard.

I am saying now that it seems strange to me that it is possible for those who sit on the other side to use the word "truth" very flippantly in so far as we on this side are concerned, but when we use it concerning those who sit on that side of the house, then it is against the rules; it dare not be used.

I come to the questions which I intended to ask of the minister. I would ask the Minister of Finance this question: According to the governor, at a meeting of the board on March 20 the governor asked the directors whether or not he should resign and all the directors said, no. Has the minister looked at the minutes of the meeting or has he discussed the matter with any of the members of the board of directors to ascertain whether or not that contention of the governor of the bank is accurate?

Another question I should like to put is this. Does the minister agree that the governor, at least until March 20, had the confidence of the board of directors of the bank? What was the relationship between the minister and the board of directors of the bank? Did the minister discuss with any of the directors, with all of them together or with any of them separately, the position or the views on the statements which were made by the governor of the bank before the month of June, 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen a copy of the minutes of the board meeting of March 20, the date to which the hon. member refers. I have said that the only portion of the minutes of the board that I have seen at any time was the extract from the minutes of the meeting of February 15, 1960, which I procured, according to my recollection, in April last.

So far as discussion with members of the board is concerned, may I say this. There are a number of these members of the board of directors with whom I am not personally acquainted and to whom I have never talked at any time. These men were appointed to the board. They were not appointed there on the basis of being told what to do. They were appointed on the basis of their being persons of experience who were put on that board to discharge the functions of directors of the Bank of Canada. I have made no attempt to tell those members of the board of directors what to do. A couple of them—I think probably three of them in all—spoke to me to express their great concern about the speeches which the governor was making and about the way in which they felt he was embroiling the Bank of Canada more and more in political controversy.

Mr. Chevrier: When was this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At various times during, I should say, late in this past winter and leading up to the spring.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before they gave him a vote of confidence?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any vote of confidence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, yes; you certainly are.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If there is a vote of confidence recorded on the board's proceedings I should like to know about it, because I have not heard of it.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not direct his attention to the first question I asked him. May I say to him that when I put it to him he was speaking to his colleague.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I answered the first question.

Mr. Chevrier: I submit to the minister that he did not answer it. The question I put to him was this. According to the governor, at the meeting which was held on March 20 he asked the directors whether or not he should resign and they said no. I am asking the minister whether he inquired of the directors whether or not that contention was accurate. He replied that he had not consulted the minutes. He replied that he had discussions with some of the board members. However, he has not answered the question as to whether or not the statement was accurate. In order to assist him in that matter I ask now whether he had a discussion with the deputy minister of finance, who is a member of the board, concerning this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member put his question on the basis of the minutes when he asked it first and I dealt with that question. If he is asking me about any other source of information, I would say that, from the information I have received there was a quite warm discussion at that meeting concerning the speeches of the governor and quite strong disapproval was expressed not only of the course of his speeches but of the content of his speeches, and he was told that he was embroiling the bank in a political controversy. Indeed, I am informed that he was told on that occasion that he was in political controversy "right up to his neck", or some similar expression was used. As to this matter of his turning around then and asking those who had been speaking in this way if they were asking for his resignation, I have not precise information on this point but I am told that he challenged those who had been expressing themselves to this effect and asked if they wanted his resignation. They said no, that was not their purpose in raising this matter, and that they were expressing their opinions as directors concerning the course of action of the governor. The hon. member can draw his own conclusions. I have certain information as to the loss of confidence on the part of the directors in the governor in the light of these circumstances.

Mr. Chevrier: If the directors were of the view that the governor was in political controversy up to his neck, does it not appear strange to the minister that they would vote confidence in him as they did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They did not vote confidence in him.

Mr. Chevrier: The governor said so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no information that there was any vote at all. It was a matter of discussion. The governor turned to those who had been speaking in this vein and he said in effect, "Do you want my resignation?" or "Do you want me to resign?".

Mr. Chevrier: The governor said that they had voted confidence in him. He made that statement publicly in one of his letters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think he said there was a vote.

Mr. Chevrier: I think so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Can you produce that reference?

Mr. Chevrier: I can look it up. I think that points up the fact that, if we had a committee such as the one we have been requesting during the course of this debate, then without any doubt we would be able to get the truth in so far as this matter is concerned. We have, on the one hand, statements made by the minister that are completely in contradiction to those made by the governor. I should like to ask this additional question. Did the minister discuss the reappointment of Mr. Coyne with the directors before he told the governor on May 30 that the government would not approve his reappointment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not discussed that matter with the board. I have never met the board as a board at any time. However, I was aware of the feeling certainly of some members of the board who had lost confidence in the governor and who were not, as I was informed, prepared to recommend his reappointment on the expiry of this term.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not aware that the resolution asking for the resignation of Mr. Coyne by the directors expressed regret and that it was explained later by Mr. Baribeau that the reason that it was obvious that the governor and the Minister of Finance could not get along? Does the minister not recall that resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I recall the resolution but I do not recall any such statement as that which the hon. member has just made in regard to their view.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There we have the Minister of Finance again, as always, not able to give us succinct answers so that we can get on with the many questions that should properly be addressed to him at the present time. The questions that I am going to ask will not require a speech by my hon. friend. I hope that he will be able to give succinct answers. Does my hon. friend remember the names of the two directors who met with the minister on June 2?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On June 2 and 3 two of the directors came to see me. They were Mr. Hill and Brigadier Patrick.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Were they the same two directors who on May 8 had made arrangements with the minister to meet with him on June 9 to discuss in a preliminary way the appointment of a successor to the governor on the expiry of his term?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. That is not right at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who were the directors who met with him at that time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At what time?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking whether they are the same directors who met with the minister on May 8?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member asked me who were the directors. What is the hon. member asking now?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): First of all, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has mentioned by name two directors with whom he had a meeting on June 2. My next question was, were they the same directors who on May 8 met with him—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have said no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and made arrangements for a meeting on the 9th?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have said no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On May 8 did my hon. friend meet with directors to discuss points that were going to become effective on June 9 with regard to having a vacancy in the office of the governor of the bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this was the first time I had any discussion with Brigadier Patrick in relation to this subject. June 2 was the first time I had seen him in several months, or talked to him in several months. Mr. Bruce Hill, following the resignation of Mr. Bryden, was appointed the member of the board on the executive committee and also on a committee that was appointed to consider the question of a nominee for the office of governor for the new period commencing January 1, 1962. He telephoned me—he did not come to see me—early in May to indicate that he was leaving for Europe and on his return he hoped to have a discussion with me in regard to this subject of the nomination of a governor to take office in the new term.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This was the Mr. Hill I take it, who was a former Conservative candidate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think he does have that distinction, and a very worthy person he is indeed to hold it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend's reply surely should be, "Yes, Mr. Hill was a former Conservative candidate". I do not know why my hon. friend hedges his answer like that. He knows perfectly well, I suggest, that Mr. Hill was a former Conservative candidate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A first-class man too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "A first-class man". There are many Conservatives who deserve that designation. I cannot say that would apply to everyone in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A former president of the Canadian chamber of commerce.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know Bruce Hill very well. My hon. friend says he is president of the chamber of commerce. I know that. I am simply asking these questions. My hon. friend should not be offended just because I ask if one of his friends was a Conservative candidate. Is there anything in that to be ashamed about? If there is, why hesitate? Can the minister say whether he had talks with the governor or any of the directors between June 2 and June 12?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have not seen the governor since May 30.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes or no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have had no talk with him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer is no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He left my office that day asking for time to think the matter over. The next time I heard from him was on the morning of Monday, June 12 when the board was then meeting in Quebec city, when I received from him several letters which had obviously been written with a view to creating self-serving evidence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As far as the governor is concerned, the answer is no. My hon. friend could save our time by just saying yes or no, and the matter would be over. As between the 2nd and the 12th of June, did he see any of the directors?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said earlier, Mr. Chairman—and the hon. member has obviously forgotten it—that I saw Mr. Hill and Brigadier Patrick on the 3rd.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether he discussed with Mr. Hill the text of the resolution which was passed by the board on June 13, prior to its consideration by the board? Was it discussed in his office? Was it written in a letter? Was it discussed over the telephone, or by wire I simply wish to know—and the answer is yes or no—whether or not there was any indication by Mr. Hill as to the nature of the resolution which the Minister of Finance wanted the directors to pass on June 13.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, Mr. Hill telephoned me to tell me of the text of the resolution which he had indicated to the governor the day before that the board of directors were seriously considering, which they hoped it would not be necessary for them to pass because they hoped he would have the good sense to tender his resignation under the circumstances.

Following the meeting of the board on Tuesday, June 13 I was informed—I was given the text of this resolution over the telephone and told that it had been adopted by a vote of 9 to 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Again, Mr. Chairman, the response could have been yes or no—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but the minister wishes to embellish his responses, and there is nothing one can do if he so insists. May I ask the minister if he suggested any changes in the resolution as read over to him by Mr. Hill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it not a fact that Mr. Hill did make a deletion in the resolution as read to the minister, after his talk with the minister?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no knowledge of any deletion whatsoever. I certainly did not make any suggestions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister does not deny that there was a deletion after the talk, does he?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have flatly denied that I knew anything about any deletion. I do not know whether there was any deletion. I never heard of one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not asking the minister whether he had any knowledge. I am asking the minister now whether or not, as a result of that conversation, there was a deletion. That is a different matter altogether.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge of any deletion whatsoever, so how can I have any knowledge of a deletion following the conversation? Certainly there was no talk about a deletion to me and I have never heard of any deletion, nor did I suggest any.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend's first answer should stand. He said he had no knowledge of any deletion. That does not mean he does not now have knowledge of a deletion as a result of his conversation with Mr. Hill.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have said, Mr. Chairman, that I have no knowledge of any deletion, and as far as I know the hon. member is just imagining something. I have no knowledge to this moment of any deletion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, everyone is imagining things; everyone except the minister. Perhaps he is imagining this. I take it that the Minister of Finance has great confidence still in Mr. Bryden. The answer is yes or no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is still standing. I certainly think Mr. Bryden is a very estimable citizen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does my hon. friend agree that Mr. Bryden is a man of good judgment?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not make any judgment in relation to the pension and the by-law of February 15, 1960.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was, not whether he had good judgment in relation to a particular matter but whether the minister's acquaintance with him established in his mind the fact that Mr. Bryden was a man of good judgment.

Mr. Churchill: What has this to do with the bill?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, we shall see.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think Mr. Bryden, like most people, is a man of very good judgment in many ways. Nobody has completely good judgment in all matters. The hon. member for Essex East has good judgment in some matters.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Very few.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a question, always, of how many. I have a very high regard for Mr. Bryden's judgment in general. I am reserving comment on the pension increase of February 15, 1960.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, my hon. friend forgot to mention that Mr. Bryden is an expert in the field of pensions. I believe that is the source of his income. Of course the minister knows more about these things than his good friend, his loyal, political collaborator, Mr. Bryden. But we have this admission from the Minister of Finance, that Mr. Bryden is a man of good judgment. I asknowledge that the minister said none of us is infallible, except the hon. gentleman, and that accounts for the fact that his policies are perfect and that they are so widely accepted throughout the country and throughout the world. May I ask the minister—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think my opinion of the hon. member's judgment is improving.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish I could reciprocate. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Star of June 14 where there is reported with regard to Mr. Bryden—

Mr. Churchill: Relate this to the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On June 14 it was reported:

> Mr. Bryden said while he was a member of the board of directors there was never any great opposition to Mr. Coyne's monetary policies. "By and large the board supported the policy that was being pursued. I certainly had no quarrel with Mr. Coyne's policies," he said.
> Any lack of harmony between sections of the government is not good, he said, but he felt there had been "more smoke than fire" between Mr. Coyne and finance minister Donald Fleming.

Does the minister agree with this statement of this man whose judgment the Minister of Finance has acknowledged to be worthy of special mention?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have the text of any such statement. I do know that I have before me the Toronto Daily Star issue of June 27 and that, in the most shocking way, this newspaper plays up what has been shown in Mr. Bryden's letter to me of June 28 to be a complete misinterpretation of what he said to the Toronto Daily Star on June 27. This was following the extraordinary statement put out by the governor of the bank on June 26. Reference was made in that document to the letter which Mr. Bryden had written to me in April. This newspaper publishes, under a headline, the statement: "Director Backs Coyne Statement". That was an absolutely false statement on the part of the Toronto Daily Star. Mr. Bryden did confirm the fact that he had written that letter to me and the Toronto Daily Star takes that, puts it on the front page, and pretends that that was confirmation of what Mr. Coyne had said about the contents of the letter to me.

That was proven to be completely false by the statement which Mr. Bryden made in his letter to me on June 28 in which Mr. Bryden had made the statement that I quoted earlier this afternoon in reference to this letter, and in which Mr. Bryden sets the record straight and makes it perfectly clear that this use of his April letter by the Toronto Daily Star was absolutely unjustified. It is a complete misrepresentation of what Mr. Bryden said. All he did was to acknowledge that he had written that letter. It was the Toronto Daily Star that went beyond and misrepresented that as being confirmation of Mr. Coyne's statement about the contents of that letter.

Mr. Benidickson: Why are you so nervous about this letter? Why can we not see it in this controversy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member was a parliamentary secretary for several years. In that time he had occasion—or I presume, if his services were used in the department to which he was assigned he had occasion—to know that confidential communications are entitled to have that quality respected not only by the recipient but by those who send them and it would ill behove parliament to break down that kind of confidence just as it ill behoves the governor of a bank to obtain by request a letter written in confidence by a director of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance concerning bank affairs and then to represent that as saying something different from what it did say. We have Mr. Bryden's statement on this matter in his letter of June 28 and the record is now made clear.

Mr. Pearson: We all recognize, of course, the sacredness which is attached by the members of this government to confidential documents, from the events of January 20, 1958. No amount of talk by the minister on that subject is likely to impress us very much. We remember outside pages containing the word "confidential" being torn off and selected passages from a confidential official memorandum read out to this house.

I should now like to ask the minister whether he was in touch on May 8 with one or two members of the board of directors of the bank to make arrangements to meet the minister on June 9 to discuss in a preliminary way the appointment of a successor to the governor on the expiry of his term of office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously the Leader of the Opposition has not been paying any attention to the questions asked by the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Essex East asked that question and I answered it fully.

Mr. Pearson: The minister did not answer that question. The minister merely said these were not the same directors he met on another occasion. I ask him now if he met two directors or one director on May 8 to make arrangements for a meeting on June 9 to discuss the succession to the governorship of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That precise question was asked of me by the hon. member for Essex East, and I answered it fully.

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer it now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are we hearing from Bonavista-Twillingate now?

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if on May 8 when he made an appointment for June 9 to discuss the successor to the governor of the Bank of Canada he had at that time, that would be May 8, decided to ask for his resignation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the committee for repeating what I said earlier, but hon. members will appreciate that if I am to be asked to answer the same question twice, and an answer is insisted upon the second time, I shall have to repeat the answer. I have already said that Mr. Bruce Hill was appointed to this committee, and prior to his leaving for Europe early in May he said he would like to see me when he came back, which was going to be sometime in the early part of June. That is all there was to it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Finance answer this question? Is it not a fact that from November of 1957 until recent days the Minister of Finance completely ignored the governor of the Bank of Canada, and that he by-passed him and carried on his dealings with the bank through other personalities in that organization?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, that is not a fact. There is no truth in that statement.

Mr. Pearson: Is it a fact that the minister, who was completely out of touch and not in communication with the governor of the bank was, in fact, in communication with a member of the board of directors over the terms of a resolution calling for the resignation of the governor, and does he consider it appropriate on his part to establish that kind of contact in those circumstances?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the Leader of the Opposition is referring to the resolution passed by the board of directors on the morning, or at noon, of June 13, I have already dealt with that subject in reply to questions by the hon. member for Essex East, and I may say to him that I am also informed that the members of the board of directors were doing their best to try to persuade the governor of the Bank of Canada in the interest of the Bank of Canada to take in this situation a rational course and not the irrational course he did take.

Mr. Pearson: Is it also true that the minister was trying to persuade the board of directors to persuade the governor to resign?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I asked the governor to resign when I met him on May 30. There has been no further communication on my part to him since. His resignation would properly have been directed to the board of directors. He might perhaps have had the courtesy to tell me what he was going to do, but he did not. That is the way that matter stood. As far as the board of directors is concerned, I have said that two of its members came to see me on June 2 and 3. These were men who were endeavouring in the interest of the Bank of Canada to urge upon the governor of the bank that he should have regard for the interest of the institution in a situation in which it was quite clear it was impossible to expect the circumstances then existing to continue.

Mr. Pearson: Is it a fact that the minister had no contact with the board of directors even through his own deputy minister in the matter of a pension which the board of directors had increased, but when it was a matter of the governor's resignation he was in close contact with the board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. That question is a misrepresentation. The hon. gentleman talks about close consultation. I have never met the board of directors as a board. On the week end when the board members were assembling in Quebec on the Sunday for their meeting of June 12 and 13, the only member of the board that I heard from at all or had any communication with was Mr. Hill, and he was doing his best to try to compose the situation, feeling that it was the interest of the Bank of Canada which should have first consideration.

Mr. Benidickson: When he decided to give his personal advice to the governor of the Bank of Canada, did the minister, using his phrase reported at page 7040 of the House of Commons debates of June 26, 1961, "scurry again" to look at the Bank of Canada Act and find what his rights were? Did he scurry again, as a very able lawyer and a bright boy, to look at the evidence contained in the reports of the House of Commons committee on banking and commerce in 1954 when we together looked very carefully into the responsibilities assigned to the government and to the governor in these matters?

I regard the Minister of Finance as a bright boy, and have always held that opinion of him. However, inasmuch as the Minister of Finance was the chief spokesman for his party when in opposition at the time when the banking laws in this country were being reviewed in 1954 by the standing committee on banking and commerce—and the hon. gentleman's name appears on almost everyone of the 900 pages of the report of that committee —I find it difficult to understand how he can come to parliament in his ministerial office almost four years later and say that in 1957-58 he conveyed to the governor of the Bank of Canada a request for the easing up of the requirements respecting the liquidity reserves of the chartered banks. That statement can be found at page 7040 of Hansard for June 26, 1961, where he also says that, as a bright boy, he then scurried to read the Bank of Canada Act.

The minister had just participated in an election campaign at that time during which both he and the present Prime Minister, both eminent lawyers, had been screaming about the tight money policy. I cannot believe that those two hon. gentlemen were so irresponsible as to go to the Canadian electorate, as they did during the campaign that year, without having read carefully the responsibilities of the government vis-à-vis the governor of the Bank of Canada in connection with monetary policy. However, that is the explanation given by the minister during the current debate.

I suggest to the minister, and challenge him to correct me, that he has shown no inconsistency during any budget debate between his own statements and statements made by the governor of the Bank of Canada. On the contrary, my belief is that only during recent weeks has the minister been defeated by his colleagues in the cabinet in respect to policies regarding which he has not differed from those espoused by the governor. I can refer to them if the minister wishes me to, because some other statements were made by him in the course of presenting his preliminary budget in 1959 to his friends in Toronto.

There was nothing contained in those statements to indicate that the Minister of Finance was then an expansionist. I think he was not then defending the expansionist movement of the cabinet but has now decided that he must knuckle down, because his colleagues overruled him, in an attempt to defeat this public servant who now, because of this difference of opinion in respect to policy, must part company with the government.

Having sat with the Minister of Finance at meetings of the banking and commerce committee in 1954, I should like to ask him whether he recognizes as a principal obligation of the governor of the Bank of Canada that responsibility to issue storm warnings whenever there is a conflict regarding monetary policy on the part of the governor of the bank and fiscal policy as announced by the Minister of Finance? In 1954, the then much admired governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, described the obligation of the governor in practical terms when he said that it was like an aeroplane signal on an automatic instrument warning system.

While I have not agreed during the past three or four years, and have challenged some of the policies of this government which I thought were supported by the bank, I should like to say that I admire the willingness of the governor who is bound to be dislocated, to do that which Mr. Graham Towers suggested in 1954 was a necessary responsible act on the part of the governor of the Bank of Canada; that is, issue a storm warning.

I should like to know whether the Minister of Finance feared that the governor would make an announcemnt by that kind of warning signal which caused him to decide, as he now says, not to present this present budget and its proposals to the current governor of the bank. I suggest that is the essential reason for that somersault and flip-flop reversed position adopted in the present budget.

I suggest that we now have a culprit in the person of the governor who is being asked to resign because the Minister of Finance has somersaulted and completely reversed his position because, as recently as a year ago, the minister suggested that any interference with the exchange rate on the part of the government was a gigantic gamble which the government should not undertake.

I have attempted during the budget debate and by placing questions on the order paper to find out the cost to this country of this interference with the exchange rate. I suggest that interference is the essence of the dispute today. If the Minister of Finance wishes me to demonstrate the accuracy of that suggestion, I should be glad to do so by quoting his own words of September, 1957, as well as his words of 1958 when he suggested he was happy about the monetary situation, and also by quoting his words used in a speech to the Canadian club in Toronto in 1959. I am fully prepared to waste the time of this committee by quoting those words if the minister wishes me to. He has referred to political acrobatics, but I should like to say that I have never witnessed any greater political acrobatics than those demonstrated by the minister just before one o'clock this day.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious from the discussion that there is only one allegedly substantive charge put forward by the minister in respect of monetary policy and that dates back to 1957. He has told us that in 1957 he had a disagreement with the governor of the Bank of Canada when he requested the governor to reduce the liquidity requirements of the chartered banks. The governor, he said, refused, and this is the basis of the argument which he would lead us to believe has persisted throughout four years. The minister did not, however, recommend to parliament changes in the Bank of Canada Act which would have changed the relationship between the governor and the government.

We must assume then either that the actions of the Bank of Canada during the intervening four years did not interfere with the government's over-all plan for the Canadian economy or that the minister was derelict in his duty. It is one or the other, Mr. Chairman. The minister cannot have it both ways. Either the Bank of Canada did not obstruct the government during those four years or the minister was derelict in his duty in not coming to parliament and asking for legislative authority in order to be able to implement the policies of the government, if they had any.

The truth of the matter is that the government did not have any policies throughout those four years. They were completely void of policy. The Bank of Canada did not obstruct them. That is obvious. Surely the minister would not have sat idly by for four years and allowed the bank to run roughshod over some real plan he had for presentation to the Canadian people. The fact of the matter is that he had no real plan. He still has no real plan except the possibility of now turning the printing presses to work to try to print the money to meet the deficit which he and the government have incurred and which is unprecedented in the peacetime history of this country.

Mr. Benidickson: That is why the minister fears hearing Mr. Coyne in a committee of parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: Last evening the minister claimed that it was as a result of government fiscal policy that interest rates declined in 1957 and 1958. I have a very simple question for the minister. If it was as a result of fiscal policy that interest rates declined in 1957 and 1958, why is he not now introducing into the house a similar policy as recommended by the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hellyer: Surely the minister is going to answer that question.

Mr. Benidickson: The question is, who is telling the truth?

Mr. Pearson: I will let the minister answer this other question if he desires to before I ask my final one.

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly he should tell us why he does not introduce a fiscal policy which will reduce interest rates if this is desirable to encourage growth and development in the Canadian economy.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Benidickson: Tell us how to reduce interest rates.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as was made quite clear in the budget debate, which hon. members opposite evidently want to reopen and repeat, it is government policy to seek to bring about by all means open to the government a reduction in the general levels of interest rates in Canada, and if the house gives effect to the policies and programs proposed by the government this goal will be pursued by an effective co-ordination of fiscal and monetary policies.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the governor of the Bank of Canada has said that on May 30 the minister stated he had been instructed to ask for the governor's resignation at once. I ask him, instructed by whom?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): By the government.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister alleging that there was continuous obstruction by the Bank of Canada throughout the four-year period, 1957 to 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have said so many times now that the monetary policy that was pursued throughout this period was the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada. It was the governor's policy. His view of authority in this field was made perfectly clear in the meeting to which I have referred in November, 1957.

Mr. Hellyer: Was this policy out of harmony with what the government was attempting to do?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is obvious that at times it was.

Mr. Hellyer: If that is so, I ask one final question. Why did the minister not introduce in this chamber legislative changes which would have corrected the situation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already answered that question on six, if not seven, previous occasions. If the hon. member has not absorbed the answer yet I will—

Mr. Hellyer: Because you were not doing your job properly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —give the answer again although I do not wish to bore the committee with this repetition. The answer is on the record.

Mr. Hellyer: Because you were not doing your job; you were asleep.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no, that is not the reason at all. The hon. member is quite confused.

Mr. Hellyer: You went into hibernation for four years.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the minister claims hindsight when we know that the essence of this debate is whether the governor of the Bank of Canada was guilty in the late fall of 1957 of not acceding to requests made to him by the minister with regard to monetary policy expansion and at a time when the minister said he had his departmental officials with him. We on this side wanted a parliamentary committee investigation so that we could have all such officials present to give testimony that even by hindsight might be valuable. I refer to something that has been referred to before. I do not apologize for putting it on the record again. When the minister's memory was perhaps clearer and nearer to the situation he said on June 17, 1958, when he presented his budget:

> Monetary policy also changed in the latter part of 1957. The money supply was expanded rapidly after mid-August, and partly for this reason and partly because of a reduction of demand in certain credit fields, monetary conditions in Canada generally became easier and interest rates declined substantially. Banks have now for some time been in a position to meet all credit-worthy demands for commercial and personal loans. Market rates of interest in almost all categories of borrowing have declined substantially.

I say that this was the opinion given to us here and to the nation on June 17, 1958, long after the minister apparently had had his interview in November 1957 with the governor of the Bank of Canada. He expresses, in June 1958 as he always does, complete satisfaction with himself and with the policies that he advances to the nation. There is no indication of criticism anywhere there. But he proposes to say now in 1961 with hindsight that in November of 1957 he would not have approved of the words found in his budget speech of June 1958. Similar statements can be referred to throughout these four years such as in the budget of 1959. We heard today that the minister criticizes the governor of the Bank of Canada for a "tightening of the belt" policy. Let us remember the minister's eloquent conclusion to a recent budget speech when he said, "Work and save, work and save".

Can you find anything more typical of agreement between the Minister of Finance and the challenged statements of the governor of the Bank of Canada than my last quotation from the Minister of Finance? I could continue for some time and carry on quoting the Minister of Finance up to the blue baby budget of 1960. In that last budget in particular the minister referred to discouraging capital investment from foreign lands. In examining three or four budget speeches of the minister I have never found disagreement with the Bank of Canada like we now get on a somersault basis. I say to the minister that it is the minister who has been upset in the cabinet and has not chosen to resign because of the upset. He has been adhering to these policies throughout, but stays in office and tries to find a scapegoat in Mr. Coyne and provides him no hearing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is conjecture on the part of the hon. member and completely imaginative.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, at page 7041 of Hansard for June 26, 1961, the minister is reported as having made this statement:

> We attached, as a government, the highest importance to the bank and its functions.

Later, on the same page, we find this:

> Let me tell the house that as far as my responsibility is concerned I have done my best to carry on in a co-operative attitude.

Now, sir, we remember that under Messrs. Dunning, Ralston, Ilsley, Abbott and Harris, there was regular and systematic consultation with governors Graham Towers and James Coyne on all aspects of economic policy, fiscal policy, monetary policy, and this was continuously carried out. I ask the minister if, after his rebuke to the governor which occurred in March 1958—I might remind the minister in referring to this that the Ottawa Journal of March 14, 1958 carried a headline, "Fleming Rebukes Governor" and that the Gazette of March 15, 1958 carried a headline, "Fleming Rebukes Coyne"—over three years before the request for the resignation, has Mr. Coyne been asked by the minister for any advice whatsoever on any matter of economic, fiscal or monetary policy, until the minister's request for the governor's resignation on May 30, 1961? And by this I mean has the governor been asked for advice, not his deputies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already dealt with that several times. We are just going over the same ground, over and over again.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister's last refusal to answer a very pertinent and important question shows that we are not going to get very far in committee of the whole in securing information from the government which surely is essential before this action which we are asked to take is taken. We get from the minister selected pieces of information from documents of one kind and another. When we refer to a document which he mentions and which he does not want to make available, he says it is confidential. We get one side of the statement, and that is bound to be so because of the nature of the case. This is not the kind of body where we can have both sides put forward. It is quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that we are being told in connection with this matter what the government wants us to know and nothing else. It is quite clear we are going to be asked to take action on this bill without having the kind of information which should be made available in terms of the man who is being accused.

Well, that is it. The government takes responsibility for refusing this kind of information and for refusing to set up the kind of body which would have made it possible for evidence to be taken and witnesses to be heard. The government can take that responsibility if it so desires. We will not take any share of it, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Will you call the yeas and nays?

The Chairman: All those in favour of clause 1, will please stand.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 57; nays, 29.

The Chairman: I declare the clause carried. Shall the title carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Title agreed to on division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on third reading of this bill for only a very few moments. I intend to put the issue, as we see it, before the house on this bill. It is a simple issue, but it is a fundamentally important issue and no smokescreen of any kind, no oratorical invective or exuberance should be allowed to obscure this issue. The issue, Mr. Speaker, is not that of the policy of the person or of the tactics of the governor of the Bank of Canada. The issue is not even whether the governor of the Bank of Canada has co-operated or not co-operated with the government in financial matters in which co-operation from him is desirable, indeed is essential and in some cases is required by law and is certainly required in practice. The governor says he has so co-operated. The minister says that he has not co-operated since at least, November, 1957. This is July, 1961.

But that is not the issue. The issue is one of simply the fundamental right of justice and fair play, the right of a Canadian to be heard before condemnation and to be heard before the body which is condemning him. It is a right enshrined in that clause of the bill of rights which says that no Canadian act of parliament—and we are dealing with a Canadian act of parliament—no Canadian order or rule or regulation or law, shall be construed or applied so as to deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations. By a "hearing" surely is not meant in that clause of the bill of rights the right, in default of a hearing before a court or tribunal, to write letters. So I ask the government this question: How dare it violate this right in this case or in any other case, a government which so often boasts about its devotion to this same bill of rights. In this controversy between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, this right is being denied if we pass this bill because we in this House of Commons by this bill shall have condemned the governor. We shall have thrown him out of his job by act of parliament without giving him an opportunity to state his case before the body which is being asked to take action. That is the issue, Mr. Speaker, and that is the only issue, namely such a right to be heard by or before a body which the Minister of Finance once called the high court of appeal; such a right to be heard in simple, elementary justice.

Oh, the hearing might have taken two or three days, if it had been permitted. It might have been inconvenient. It might have been embarrassing to the government or it might have been embarrassing to the governor. However, we would have had an opportunity in this House of Commons, through an agency of the house, to examine the evidence, to summon witnesses and to get as near to the facts of the case as was humanly possible; and on the basis of the evidence, and only that kind of evidence, would we then have been asked to take the action which is embodied in a bill.

I do not know what would have happened if that procedure had been followed. Surely the government by now must be sorry that they did not follow it. Naturally we on this side of the house are suspicious as a result of the refusal of the government to allow this matter to go to a committee. It flatly refuses to allow any evidence to appear in this House of Commons except that evidence which it wishes to bring forward or the evidence we can get on published documents by the governor of the bank and others.

I know this, Mr. Speaker, and the house must know it. Because we are not giving this hearing to the governor of the Bank of Canada, a high public official, we are violating his basic right to be heard before the tribunal which is being asked to condemn him, and to do so on the basis of evidence supplied in this house by the government alone. When we produce evidence supplied in the press—and that is the only place to which he has access—the Minister of Finance says that it is not true, that it is distorted, that it is false or uses other words of that kind, a procedure which makes it difficult indeed for us to get to the facts of this situation in a way in which we could have done it if there had been a committee.

The fact that the governor, prevented for years from appearing before a commons committee, has circulated letters defending himself against charges which have now been made against him, or the fact that his tactics and some of his statements in his defence may be open to criticism, does not alter his right to be heard. We are the ones on this side who have criticized some of the policies and some of the tactics of the governor in the past, but we now support his right to defend himself against those who accuse him. The House of Commons is being asked to discharge the governor of the Bank of Canada, a public official, who will not resign voluntarily because he asserts that the charges made against him are wrong, that they do him a grave injustice, and that he is entitled to be heard by parliament in respect of those charges before parliament takes action against him. So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that for the House of Commons to take the action recommended in this bill without the governor's being given the opportunity which he seeks to appear before a committee of this house would be an intolerable and indefensible violation of an elementary right of a free Canadian citizen. Because of that fact we will vote against third reading of this bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, prior to the vote being taken on second reading I stated our reasons for voting against the bill at that stage. Since that time we have had an unusually lengthy debate in the committee stage and from our point of view, all we have been able to discover here, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has said, are in some cases, selective and in other cases contradictory answers to a multitude of questions that have been asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) by the members of the opposition.

I think it is correct to say that the Minister of Finance in effect has been going round and round the same selective answers to questions presented to him from this side of the house. Our stand on this issue is similar to that of the official opposition. We maintain that, in a free society, under these circumstances the accused has the right to be heard.

This is apparently a very unusual case in Canadian history. I am inclined to go back and to read the records of the past for guidance in the present and the future. I find that this is a very unusual case in Canadian history. In fact, I could not find a precedent to demonstrate the fallacy of the action of the government on this occasion. While at the first stages of this debate the minister made something of the pension issue and mentioned the use of the frank of the Bank of Canada for the distribution of letters, those are side issues. The main issue is the one mentioned by the leader of the official opposition, namely the right of the person accused to be heard before sentence is pronounced.

While thinking of this question and looking over Canadian records there came to my mind words that have been frequently used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). He has repeatedly stated that the practice and the procedures of this parliament are based on the practice and procedures of what we are proud to term the mother of parliaments. Having those words in mind, I began a long search in the history of the parliament of the United Kingdom. I find there that situations such as this one are somewhat rare in their history. However, I found some records. While the leader of the official opposition gave a very good analysis of this current and immediate situation I was trying to find some further basis upon which to found our argument and our case. I think I have found some thing, Mr. Speaker. I went back and I found a book called, "Corruption Unmasked", written in 1825 or thereabouts. I found a case very comparable to this one. This concerns the East India Company, the governor and directors of which were appointed by the government of Great Britain. I quote from the book:

> The next subject of any interest is the trial of Warren Hastings. This gentleman had presided over India 13 years, and arrived in England on the 16th of June, 1785. On the 26th of the same month, Mr. Burke, who had brought heavy accusations against him in the preceding session, gave notice of his intention to impeach him for high crimes and misdemeanours, alleged to have been committed in India. After long debates in this and succeeding sessions, the prosecution was sanctioned by the commons, and in 1787 articles of impeachment were sent to the lords. The trial was protracted from year to year, till 23rd of April, 1795, when the accused was acquitted, on the payment of his fees, of all the charges preferred against him. The company in consideration of the services of this officer discharged the expenses incurred by the prosecution, amounting to upwards of £70,000 and settled upon him an annuity of £5,000.

Strangely enough that is an amount, in terms of present money value, of about $25,000 a year. Mr. Speaker, the point is this. This gentleman, Mr. Burke, the governor of the East India Company insisted that he had the right to appear before the commons and before the House of Lords. That right was exercised to such an extent that the hearings went on for over nine years. But in the end justice was done to the governor of that company.

My curiosity and interest were stimulated by a phrase used frequently by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). While I would not suggest that he is my mentor, I have found that following his example and practice is to one's political benefit on occasion. I have studied Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 16th edition with regard to what this phrase means. I find this on page 40 in respect to bills of attainder. In effect, that is what this bill is and the hon. member was quite correct when he referred to it as a bill of attainder. This authority says:

> The proceedings of parliament, in passing bills of attainder and of pain and penalties, do not vary from those adopted in regard to other bills; though the parties who are subjected to these proceedings are admitted to defend themselves by counsel and witnesses before both houses.
> Whenever a fitting occasion arises for its exercise, a bill of attainder is, undoubtedly, the highest form of parliamentary judicature, though it has not been employed since the eighteenth century. In impeachments, the commons are but accusers and advocates; while the lords alone are judges of the crime.

Fortunately on this occasion I suppose we could correctly say that to some extent the Senate is the Canadian counterpart of the House of Lords of Great Britain. I trust our Canadian lords will exercise their prerogative and see that British justice is done by hearing the accused. This passage in May's Parliamentary Practice goes on to say:

> On the other hand, in passing bills of attainder, the commons commit themselves by no accusation, nor are their powers directed against the offender: but they are judges of equal jurisdiction, and with the same responsibility, as the lords; and the accused can only be condemned by the united judgment of the crown, the lords, and the commons.

In this respect I suggest that the commons has not had the opportunity to hear the evidence before judgment is passed.

Mr. Hellyer: Because of a tyrannical government.

Mr. Herridge: The passage goes on to say:

> Bills of attainder generally commence in the House of Lords.

Then it goes on to deal with the powers of the commons in this respect. This is an authority upon which the practices and procedures of the parliament of Great Britain are based. Here we read that according to their rules and procedures both houses must hear the accused and the accused must have the opportunity to put forward his defence and have counsel. That practice and procedure, according to the record I have just read, has long been the practice in Great Britain. The Prime Minister has said on a number of occasions that the practices of this house are based on those of the parliament of Great Britain, but in this instance we are departing from that practice.

Then I began to search further. Of course we all know that the constitution of the United States was based in substance on the history, traditions, practices and procedures of the parliament of Great Britain. That was the foundation of the constitution. I read a book entitled "The Liberties of an American" written by Mr. Leo Pfeffer, a very well known advocate in the United States. On page 165 of this book, under a paragraph headed "Bills of attainder" we find the following:

> Both the federal government and the states are forbidden by the constitution to enact bills of attainder. A bill of attainder is an act of the legislature inflicting punishment upon a person or persons who have not been convicted in a judicial trial. It needs little argument to show that punishment by legislative act without judicial trial does not accord with democratic concepts of fair play, besides being inconsistent with the American system of the separation of powers.
> Historically bills of attainder concerned themselves only with punishment, but, as in the case of ex post facto laws, the supreme court held that a disqualification for an office or profession imposed upon individuals by act of the legislature may constitute punishment and thus be a bill of attainder.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I understand the reason why the hon. member for Essex East has constantly referred to this bill as a bill of attainder. For the reasons we stated prior to the vote on second reading, and because during the committee stage of the bill the committee did not have the opportunity to get the facts, to know the truth from both sides, and while we recognize the supremacy of parliament, the issue—as was mentioned by the leader of the official opposition—is the right of the accused to be heard; because the accused has not been afforded the right established by the practice and procedure of the parliament of the United Kingdom, by the practice and procedure of this parliament and, according to him, those rights provided in our bill of rights, this group intends to vote against third reading. However, before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, in view of the unusual circumstances, this unique situation and the unfortunate position in which the government will find itself in the eyes of the country, we would like to hear from the Prime Minister at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, just before the vote is taken I would like to endorse the statements of the last speaker, and particularly his last remark.

[Mr. Herridge.]

This debate is a very important one. This is something that has not happened in Canadian history, as the previous speaker pointed out. It is something that has been done very seldom in England, the mother parliament of our system. Because of the confusion that has been raised on all sides of the house in relation to this matter, and the fact that the Prime Minister has been an outspoken advocate of the rights of the individual and has presented to Canada the picture and the image of someone willing to and capable of defending the rights of each individual in this country, I think he has an obligation to give his reasons for asking the parliament of Canada to take this unusual course. I should also like to know why the Prime Minister did not intervene in the major issue of this matter and allow this question to be examined by a committee of the house where all parties concerned could at least exercise their right under the law to be heard.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I did not intend to participate in this debate until I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a few moments ago give a summary of several days of this argument—a summary of the position of the opposition. I decided to wait until I had found exactly the position in which the opposition had placed itself, and it is with that position that I intend to deal, after having made some initial reference to the bill of rights which, during the last few days has been folded in the arms of the opposition as something which they have espoused in the past.

I think of the days when I brought the bill of rights before this house, and I see them sitting there, the ministers of that day, now in opposition. They ridiculed the bill of rights. They said it was unnecessary. Last year, at one time, they were about to oppose it when it was introduced. I understand that the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) took a very firm stand in this direction but that an hon. member occupying one of the rear seats of the opposition took the view that it would be improper and unjustified on the part of the opposition to oppose the bill of rights. Finally, after days of uncertainty, it received the support of the opposition.

I am glad to see today the degree to which, with the passing months, that which they rejected, that which they ridiculed, that stone they were about to reject as having no basis, in fact has become the cornerstone of their arguments in connection with the removal of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: The rights, not the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman does not even know what the bill of rights contains, of that I am sure. I have heard his observations on this earlier—observations in which he said there is nothing to the bill of rights. Now he is going to interpret that which only last year he stated would never be effective in this country. And in the ensuing months, over and over again, the prophecies of the opposition have proven to be false, in that the bill of rights has become, in fact, a measure whereby the individual, in the preservation of his rights and fundamental freedoms, has received, in the courts, the protection which it provides.

Today we find them, these who ridiculed, these who condemned, these who would have diminished its effect if they could have done so, suddenly become the proponents of the thing which they said was worthless, ineffective, and not legislation of a kind which ought to be placed on the statute books. When I see the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) speaking of the rights of men, talking of bills of attainder and the dangers to individuals of action being taken in that regard, what a transition has taken place in his thinking since he departed from the position of clerk of the privy council to that later of a minister of the crown and, today, of a member of the opposition. Can he forget what he did to Mr. Pitt? Can he forget that? Was he given a trial? I ask the hon. gentleman: what trial did you give him? What offence had he committed, excepting that he denied you the opportunity to occupy the room to which you, in your position, believed you were entitled?

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, the right hon. gentleman has chosen to revive an incident about which he made speeches in the election of 1953 and about which I wrote him a letter to which he never deigned to reply, in which I set out the facts about this matter. I intend when the right hon. gentleman has finished his speech, to put that letter on he record, and we shall see who is telling the truth about this matter.

The right hon. gentleman has made an accusation against my honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, of course, has his right to speak in due course.

Mr. Pickersgill: An attack has been made on my honour—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a question of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Will he state the matter of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman has made an accusation which affects my honour. There is absolutely no truth in his charge that I had anything whatever to do with any action which may have been taken by the head of the Canadian National Railways concerning Mr. Pitt. Those facts have been put on the record, and the right hon. gentleman was sent those facts in a letter to which he did not bother to reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realized the hon. gentleman would become aroused.

Mr. Pickersgill: McCarthyism.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, the hon. gentleman should not speak of that. We recall all the papers of those days and months. We remember the arrogance and the attitude of the hon. gentleman. He says he wrote me a letter to which I did not reply—a letter of the individual in question regarding matters which were self-exculpatory and which were not based on the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not given a hearing either.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind interruptions as long as they are made from a standing position. I can understand the feelings of the hon. gentleman. I realize full well that this is one of those things—that the word "Pitt" is written on the hon. gentleman's heart as "Calais" was on Mary's heart. They talk about the bill of rights, and they talk about the rights of the individual—those who in 1945 and 1946 and 1947 destroyed the rights of individuals in this country by order in council. These are the people who today wrap themselves in the garments of political rectitude; these are the individuals who said to a farmer from the province of Manitoba who had won a case in the courts: you shall not carry on that case—by order in council we declare that whatever the courts may have decided you shall not have your rights. These are the individuals—and several of them are sitting here today—who at that time passed an order in council whereby in an investigation into one company in this country there was set up a commissioner with full power to investigate, inside or outside the law. If this investigating commissioner went beyond the law it stated that there should be no right of action on the part of the individual who had been wronged. I could go on indefinitely, but these are the people to whom today, in the hours of opposition, repentance has come, if we are to believe them.

I shall mention the bill of rights, that bill which has been so ridiculed and spurned. It covers fundamental freedoms and human rights and recognizes in Canada that there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination, certain named human rights and fundamental freedoms, and then states, in so far as the construction of the law is concerned that every law of Canada shall, unless expressly declared by an act of the parliament of Canada operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights. This bill goes on to state that no law shall be construed or applied to authorize or effect the arbitrary detention, imprisonment or exile of any person, impose or authorize the imposition of cruel or unusual treatment or punishment, deprive a person who has been arrested or detained of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention, nor of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay, nor of the right by way of habeas corpus for the determination of the validity of his detention. That strikes home recollections of another day.

One of these hon. gentlemen, and perhaps two of them, were then members of the government in the month of September 1945 when—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, what is the relevancy of the debate presently being engaged in by the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope Your Honour will enforce the rule of relevancy.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point has been taken that the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) are not relevant to the debate on third reading of this bill. As I understand the tenor of the statements of the Prime Minister they are directed toward the proposition that fundamental rights are involved in this bill. I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) also suggest this was the basis of his opposition to the bill on third reading.

I think if the Prime Minister goes into an illustration which brings forth other matters, themselves irrelevant, the scope of the debate is enlarged to the extent that there may be an extended reply, that would not be strictly relevant. Having regard to the position taken by the two previous speakers I do not think I can suggest that the tenor of the argument is irrelevant. However, I do make the observation that while it is in order to illustrate argument, references to extraneous matters which tend to enlarge the scope of the debate are not relevant.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to all these arguments about the bill of rights, and I know it is disturbing to hon. members opposite—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know it is disturbing to hon. members opposite when I make such reference because they do not wish to hear the facts.

I had arrived at the point of mentioning the particular matter of habeas corpus which those apostles of parliamentary government posed today in relation to preservation of the rights of men. I was pointing out that those hon. gentlemen passed an order in council in the month of September, 1945, abolishing the right of habeas corpus, and kept it concealed until February, 1946, in accord with a denial on the part of the then minister of justice that there was in fact a hidden and secret order in council.

I have been reviewing something of the record of those hon. gentlemen in order that the house may have some conception of the degree to which reliance is to be placed upon those apostles in respect to things they today avow as necessary and worthy of maintenance, when they themselves have transgressed each and every one of them during their day.

I made reference to the bill of rights because the subsection thereof to which they apparently make reference is that which states that no person shall be deprived of a right to a fair hearing in accordance—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is in that connection that I intend to particularly refer to Mr. Coyne's rights and obligations being interfered with when the supreme court of parliament has before it his record—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —when the supreme court of parliament has before it his record as set forth—

Mr. Benidickson: Now we have a real demagogue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —as set forth in the letters which he has issued from time to time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In one of those letters he refers to the word of a man—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in whom he places reliance. I look at that individual now and wonder whether I behold in fact the person who dictated certain portions of those letters.

Mr. Pearson: You do not see him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member might better defer his statement in regard to the matter of privilege until the debate can be resumed, as it is now six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when one is defamed by the words of the Prime Minister, one should surely be given a second in which to reply.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member should be allowed an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should be granted time to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: This is unfair.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely the majority will be fair.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should be allowed to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. gentleman resume his seat. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege at the time of the adjournment. By leave of the house the question can be heard now. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the statement the Prime Minister has just made was made by the Minister of Public Works in the form of a direct question to me the other evening. At that time I gave a simple and direct answer which was no; my answer is still no. My reputation, for telling the truth in this house, I stand on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Clear and unequivocal.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has stated his question of privilege and if there is no comment on it I shall now leave the chair.

Mr. Hellyer: The Prime Minister plunged to new depths this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, unless there is some discussion of the business for tomorrow I shall adjourn the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Government orders tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX "A"

REPORT OF FIFTH MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

The fifth meeting of the Canada-United States interparliamentary group was held in Washington and Norfolk, Virginia, from Wednesday, June 7, to Sunday, June 11, both inclusive. Twenty four members of the congress of the United States and 24 members of the parliament of Canada participated.

The group held two plenary sessions and two series of committee meetings on Thursday and Friday. One committee discussed defence and foreign policy, while the other committee discussed economic matters of interest to both countries. The first committee met under the co-chairmanship of Senator Homer Capehart, and later Senator George Aiken, and Speaker Mark Drouin. The second committee was co-chaired by Representative Cornelius Gallagher and Speaker Roland Michener.

The Canadian delegates were welcomed at the opening plenary session on Thursday, June 8, by Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, who underlined the importance of these meetings of legislators as a valuable means of promoting better understanding and appreciation of their mutual problems. Later that morning the Canadian delegates proceeded to the floor of the United States Senate and were welcomed by Senators Aiken, Mansfield, Dirksen, Capehart, Keating, Humphrey, Johnson, Javits, Allott, Fong and Senator Hickey, the presiding officer. The statements of welcome are printed in Appendix "B" of this report.

Representative Gallagher was host at a luncheon in the old supreme court chamber, an historic room of the Capitol building which served as the Senate chamber from 1819 to 1859 and as the supreme court chamber from 1860 to 1935. The wives of the delegates were entertained at luncheon by Mrs. Fulbright and Mrs. Gallagher. Following these luncheons the members of the Canadian delegation and their wives had the honour of being received by the President at the White house.

Later in the afternoon the co-chairmen participated in a ceremony at the zoological gardens of the Smithsonian institute, when a pair of Canadian beavers, the gift of the government of Canada, was formally presented to the director of the institute. The occasion was enlivened by the presence of a baby beaver born to the pair in Washington a few days before. That evening the Canadian delegation and their wives were the guests at a dinner given by the United States delegation.

On Friday, following the conclusion of the business sessions, the Canadian delegates were the guests of Senator Aiken at a luncheon in the old supreme court chamber. Meanwhile the wives of the Canadian delegates enjoyed a very pleasant cruise on the Potomac river on board President Kennedy's yacht, the Honey Fitz. Members of both delegations and their wives left Washington late Friday afternoon for Norfolk, Virginia, where they were the guests of the continental army command for the week end. On Saturday, after the inspection of a guard of honour and the firing of a 19-gun salute, the delegates attended air and ground exercises at Fort Storey and Fort Eustis near Norfolk. The group also visited the national aeronautical space agency for a briefing on "project Mercury" by Mr. Carpenter, one of the seven United States astronauts, and other members of the agency. On the same day, the wives of the delegates visited Jamestown and Williamsburg for a tour of historic sights. Both delegations returned to their respective capitals on Sunday afternoon.

Committee Discussions

The discussions in the committees took place with the same spirit of frankness and respect for divergent views as has characterized discussions at previous meetings. The personnel of the two committees is shown in Appendix "A" of this report. At the closing plenary session on Friday, reports of the two committees were approved for inclusion in a press release. This press release was distributed at a press conference held by the four co-chairmen prior to the departure for Norfolk. The committee reports are reprinted in Appendix "C" of this report.

Conclusions

This latest meeting of the Canada-United States interparliamentary group confirmed once again the usefulness of such exchanges. All delegates, many of whom were attending for the first time, welcomed the opportunities given to them both in the business sessions and on informal occasions for discussions with their United States colleagues. The Canadian delegates wish to express their warm appreciation for the cordial hospitality of President Kennedy, the members of the United States delegation, and the commanding general and officers of the United States continental army command.

As a result of the policy of including new personnel in the delegations for each meeting, 56 members of congress and seventy members of parliament have now taken part in one or more of the meetings held since January, 1959. As on previous occasions, the attendance of the wives of the delegates did much to confirm and strengthen in social exchange the friendships formed in the conferences themselves.

In submitting this report, we also wish to acknowledge the co-operation and express our appreciation for the assistance of officials of the various departments of the Canadian government who helped with the arrangements for the meeting.

Mark R. Drouin — Speaker of the Senate
Roland Michener — Speaker of the House of Commons

Joint Chairmen

APPENDIX "B"

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. Aiken: Mr. President, each year for several years it has been our privilege to have as our guests in congress members of the Canadian parliament. We have with us today 12 members of the house and 12 members of the Senate. We are always glad to have the Canadian delegation with us. We consider our Canadian friends the best friends we have anywhere. The following members are present in the chamber, and I take the opportunity to introduce them to the Senate.

Senate

Hon. Mark R. Drouin, Progressive Conservative party (Quebec), Speaker of the Senate.

Hon. W. R. Brunt, Progressive Conservative party (Ontario).

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Liberal party (Manitoba).

Hon. Sydney J. Smith, Liberal party (British Columbia).

Hon. J. E. Lefrancois, Liberal party (Quebec).

Hon. Lionel Choquette, Progressive Conservative party (Ontario).

House of Commons

Hon. Roland Michener, Progressive Conservative party (Ontario), Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Paul Hellyer, Liberal party (Ontario).

Mr. Egan Chambers, Progressive Conservative party (Quebec).

Mr. Paul Martineau, Progressive Conservative party (Quebec).

Mr. J. M. Forgie, Liberal party (Ontario).

Mr. Gordon H. Aiken, Progressive Conservative party (Ontario).

Mr. C. A. Best, Progressive Conservative party (Ontario).

Mr. R. C. Coates, Progressive Conservative party (Nova Scotia).

Mr. Frank Howard, Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (British Columbia).

Mr. Orville H. Phillips, Progressive Conservative party (Prince Edward Island).

Mr. J. R. Taylor, Progressive Conservative party (British Columbia).

Mr. O. J. Godin, Liberal party (Ontario).

Mr. C. R. Granger, Liberal party (Newfoundland).

Mr. H. P. Lessard, Liberal party (Quebec).

Mr. Lucien Grenier, Progressive Conservative party (Quebec).

Mr. Harris G. Rogers, Progressive Conservative party (Alberta).

Mr. R. R. Southam, Progressive Conservative party (Saskatchewan).

Mr. G. M. Stearns, Progressive Conservative party (Quebec).

We are delighted to have the Canadian delegation with us today and tomorrow. I believe another activity, which we hope will be equally interesting to our guests, is planned for Saturday. (Applause, senators rising.)

Mr. Mansfield: Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished senator from Vermont, who has led the Senate group so ably in our discussions with our Canadian colleagues for the past several years. We are always honored when a delegation from another country comes to visit us. We are especially honored when our Canadian friends do us the honor and the privilege of meeting with us in this chamber. We hope your stay will be happy. We hope that we will be able to reciprocate at least in part for the many kindnesses and courtesies and privileges which you have extended to us on the visits which we have made to your delightful and wonderful country. It is good to have you with us. We hope that this will be just one visit of many.

Mr. Dirksen: Mr. President, in a world that is so full of ugly fevers and contagion today, we can think of nothing quite so comforting and so reassuring as to have a delegation from our neighbouring country come to visit us, to whom we can refer with earnestness and in truth and in fact not only as neighbours, Mr. Speaker, but as friends.

It brings a real note of comfort, as with our eyes, as Ishmael did of old, contemplate the horizons of the world and a sea of troubles, to consider how fortunate we are. We hope that you deem yourself equally fortunate that we are your neighbours. It is great comfort that we can live together in amity and concord without troops and without any other visible military evidences, because of the understanding that we have had for such a long time.

As minority leader, I welcome you to the Senate.

Mr. Capehart: Mr. President, I merely wish to say to these gentlemen that it is a pleasure for us and a great honor to have you here. We hope that you will come very often.

Mr. Keating: Mr. President, as a representative of the state of New York, a considerable part of which borders on our great friends to the north, I wish to extend greetings to this distinguished group. I have spent many happy hours in Canada, and I have always enjoyed my visits there. I have many Canadian friends. I am sure that many of you gentlemen have close friends in the United States. My city of Rochester is to a large extent populated by people who were born in Canada and who cherish their ties to the north. We have very close relations with our Canadian neighbours. The Rochester yacht club sponsors a very spirited contest, as you probably know, with our Canadian friends, in which we have been frequently bested, but we never give up.

I am delighted to note that so many of our guests from the north have elected to sit on this side of the aisle in the Senate. There are a great many vacant chairs here, and we welcome them on this side of the aisle. We congratulate them on their good judgment, and are perfectly delighted to have some of these vacant chairs filled.

I know our friends will not take it amiss when I say that, if we cannot have more Republicans, then there is no one else we would rather have in these chairs, no one else in whose presence we would take greater pride or pleasure than our good friends from the north.

Mr. Humphrey: I too wish to join in extending a friendly and cordial welcome to our fellow parliamentarians from Canada, who are our good friends.

After listening to the lucid comment of my friend from New York, I am reminded of one part of our foreign aid and foreign policy programs, the exchange program. As a member of the Senate on this side of the aisle I would not mind proposing an exchange for some of the regular attendants on that side of the aisle for those I see presently on that side of the aisle. (Laughter)

We welcome you and we want you to know that your presence in the Senate is a source of satisfaction and joy to us.

My state of Minnesota borders on Canada. Many times we have travelled to the great city of Winnipeg. Many of our people make regular journeys over there. Many of your people come to Minnesota.

We are at the other end, so to speak, of the St. Lawrence seaway. We are joined to you not only by the great land mass of the Nort American continent, but also by the great St. Lawrence seaway.

We wish to express our appreciation to our friends from Canada for their leadership in the consummation of this, one of the great public works projects of all time.

Finally, I express my appreciation to them for their leadership in the councils of diplomacy. Canada has demonstrated mature statesmanship, particularly at the United Nations. That leadership has had a very good effect and a very good conditioning upon the deliberations of the United Nations, and we thank you for it. We herald you also for your tremendous economic growth in recent years, and the capacity you have demonstrated of being able to roll with the punches of your economic growth and expansion. We congratulate you upon your prosperity and upon your sharing of the fruits of your production. We also congratulate you upon your population growth. Surely in your great country there is so much room for so many good people.

Frankly, we are happy, as the minority leader said, in these trying days, to have such wonderful good friends, even when you occasionally tell us things that we may not want to hear, even though we may deserve to hear them. We shall reciprocate in kind but in a kindly way.

Mr. Johnston: It is a wonderful thing in this troubled world to have representatives from another nation come to visit us, particularly to have these visits made by people who believe as we do and work along with us in our efforts to make this a better world. If all the nations of the world believed as you do it would be a much better world to live in. So we are thankful today to have you come to visit us here in the United States, as we face the problems that we are facing, and realize that we have you right to the north of us, and that you are our right hand, so to speak, in helping solve the problems of the world. May you continue to grow and not only prosper materially but also prosper in giving all the people the liberties that belong to them. God bless you and may you continue to grow is the wish of all the senators at this time.

Mr. Javits: Mr. President, I wish to join my colleague from New York in welcoming the Canadian parliamentarians, and to express on this rare occasion my appreciation for the many long-standing favours conferred upon my state through my person.

When I was attorney general I had the opportunity to co-operate with your authorities in finding and punishing rascals in the security field. I received enormous co-operation from your officials. During the war, as an army officer, I worked with your minister of munitions. In more recent days I had the honour of dining with Prime Minister Diefenbaker and his cabinet, including the late departed and lamented Mr. Smith, a very dear friend of mine, and a wonderful man.

I have also visited and participated in the inauguration of power projects connected with the seaway, and in the Niagara frontier area, where we are working together.

As my tribute, as a senator from the state of New York, to the great Dominion of Canada, a great, stanch, and true friend, as has been so eloquently stated by my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from New York (Mr. Keating), I may say that we have demonstrated that free peoples can work together in a discipline, nothwithstanding the fact that self interest may often dictate our pulling apart.

In the final analysis, no matter how frank you may be with us—and even critical at times—we all know that, like a couple who are married, this has all got to be lived with until there is a better day or a sunnier side to our relations, because we are indissolubly linked together.

I think it is this deep conviction which we all carry, and which is so particularly true in the States which border on Canada that represents one of the enormous strengths of freedom throughout the world. I do not think any nation in the world, even behind the iron curtain, doubts that Canada and the United States will always stand together, and that any hopes of separating them in any way are bound to be dashed. This is one of the most enormous strengths which freedom has.

I am delighted to welcome you and to speak to you in that spirit.

Mr. Allott: Mr. President, I have had the honor this morning, in the absence of the co-chairman of our delegation, the senator from Vermont (Mr. Aiken), to welcome our distinguished visitors to Washington and to the United States. To do this again would be, indeed, surplusage. However, for the Record, I think perhaps it should be said that this particular meeting has been of unique value, a value which is not found in any other type of meeting. That unique value is that members of the House of Representatives and members of the U. S. Senate, and members of the House of Commons and members of the Canadian Senate, are able to meet together and discuss frankly every phase of our relationships—our cultural relationships, our tourist relationships, our economic relationships, our common interest in matters of defence, our common interests in the salvation of freedom throughout the world; and to do this frankly, without any fear of having spoken something which is contrary to the spirit of our respective governments, because none of us can speak for our governments, even though two distinguished Speakers of the parliament of Canada are here.

So if in the days ahead it should be asked what we hope to accomplish by this meeting it may be said we hope to accomplish the great area of understanding which friends seek—and understanding which is based upon giving and taking, and giving and forgiving; an area which we know will lead to more fruitful relationships in every respect between our countries.

The unique value of this meeting is that we meet without fear of doing something which may be taken as binding upon our governments. We meet in a spirit of friendship and frankness, which brings to all of us an education as to the desires and the possibilities of the future. That is something which we need.

Again, I welcome our Canadian friends to Washington and to the United States.

Mr. Fong: Mr. President, I join with other senators in welcoming the members of the Canadian parliament to our hall and to our country. I was a member of the interparliamentary committee which went to Canada in February. We received from the members of the Canadian parliament a most cordial and hospitable welcome, a welcome much unlike, as I told them, the first welcome I received from the Canadian people, when I was deported from Canada in 1929. That incident took place when I was a member of the R.O.T.C. team from the University of Hawaii. We went to Camp Perry, Ohio, and then crossed the Detroit river in an attempt to go to Windsor. At that time the Canadians told me I had to post a bond if I wanted to enter Canada. So I returned to the United States, at the invitation of the Canadian government, and they paid my transportation fare of five cents across the Detroit river. (Laughter).

Mr. President, the meetings which the interparliamentary committee held in Canada in February were most fruitful. I was much impressed with the earnestness and the seriousness of the views of our neighbours across the border. I know that their problems and our problems can be solved most amicably. I came away from that meeting with a better concept of their problems, knowing that the differences which exist between the United States and Canada are minor compared with the may things which we have in common.

We in this hemisphere have mutual problems, and we know that by discussing them together from time to time, as we did in Canada in February, and now, again, in the United States, we shall be able to solve them.

I look forward to long lasting friendship and amity with the Canadian people. I know that this friendship will endure to all eternity. I thank the representatives of the Canadian parliament for coming to visit us. I know that our deliberations will be fruitful for both the United States and Canada.

Again, I convey my welcome to the Canadian parliamentarians, and am grateful to them for having taken the time to come and visit us.

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Hickey in the Chair): The Chair joins in the hearty welcome accorded by senators to our brethren from our northern neighbour; and trusts that their sojourn in our capital city will prove both pleasant and profitable.

APPENDIX "C"

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Report of Defence and Foreign Policy Committee

1. Western Hemisphere Co-operation:

(a) Canadian participation in the O.A.S

United States members supported President Kennedy's recent suggestion that Canada consider joining the O.A.S. Canadian members agreed that Canada and the United States must stand together in supporting common objectives within the hemisphere, to raise standards of living and help meet the communist threat. The problem for Canada is to decide whether joining the O.A.S. would be in the best interest of Canada and the western hemisphere. This question is the subject of lively public discussion in Canada at the present time.

Among the arguments advanced in favour of Canada's association with the O.A.S. were the assistance which Canada might be able to give toward raising living standards in Latin America, the additional weight of Canadian leadership and stability in hemispheric policy discussions, removal of the anomaly of Canadian participation in NATO but not in O.A.S., and removal of doubt about Canada's support of the principles on which O.A.S. is founded.

Among the arguments mentioned in opposition to Canadian participation in O.A.S. were the limitations on Canada's resources, the risk that Canada's position in O.A.S. would either be labeled as that of a satellite of the United States or would be harmful to United States prestige to the extent that Canada's attitudes diverged from that of the United States on significant issues, and finally the loss of Canada's ability to present an uncommitted view on problems arising in the hemisphere.

(b) Cuba: There was complete agreement on the serious threat which communist influence in Cuba presents to the whole hemisphere. With respect to methods of countering this danger, however, there were two basically different approaches. Some felt that the situation warranted drastic measures. Others believed the Cuban revolution was brought about by underlying causes which are to be found in many other areas in Latin America. These unhealthy tendencies must be dealt with on a long term basis through programs of economic assistance, information, cultural interchange, and foreign policies in the interest of the freedom and economic opportunity of mankind. The committee agreed that there is need for expressing to the peoples of less developed countries the social objectives of our society. To compete successfully with the communists in the emerging countries we must explain our system in terms of social justice as well as personal freedom.

2. Strengthening NATO:

There was full agreement of the necessity of strengthening the conventional forces assigned to NATO. It was noted that both Canada and the United States have met their NATO force goals. Several specific NATO defence problems were discussed: the desirability of having small nuclear weapons for tactical use; the inhibition on the use of major nuclear weapons in the absence of adequate conventional forces; the question of control by a multi-national organization over a NATO nuclear strategic force; and the necessity of making the United States nuclear retaliatory weapons invulnerable. It was recognized that if the Soviet union moved at any time in force to cut off access to West Berlin, NATO would be ready to respond with the necessary force.

3. China Policy:

The committee discussed trade with communist China. The members were agreed that there should be no trade in strategic goods. The Canadian members, however, stated that in Canada there was general support for a policy of trade with China in non-strategic goods on the grounds that to cut off all trade would not weaken the hold of the Chinese communist party and that trade helps maintain the strength of the Canadian economy. The view was also expressed that it can assist in some measure to preserve a small reservoir of good will in China which could be of long term benefit to the west. Some United States members, while acknowledging that the United States does trade in certain non-strategic commodities with countries of eastern Europe, were of the view that trade materially assists the Chinese in reaching their economic objectives, raises moral issues on which the United States public feels deeply and strengthens the Chinese position in Asia. The Canadian chairman referred with pleasure to the statement made in the House of Commons the previous day by the Prime Minister regarding the happy solution to the difficulty which had arisen over the supply from United States sources of grain unloading equipment and the committee agreed that this was a good example of continuing co-operation between the two countries.

The committee also discussed the closely related questions of diplomatic recognition of communist China and its representation in the United Nations. While neither Canada nor the United States has yet recognized the People's Republic of China, it was generally agreed that the issue of representation in the United Nations would soon confront the two nations and that at the forthcoming meeting of the general assembly there would likely be increased support for seating representatives of communist China. The "two China" concept was also considered as a possible solution for the representation of China. It was pointed out that the admission of a Chinese communist delegation to the United Nations would be interpreted in many places in the United States as an act of appeasement and might lead to strong demands that the United States leave the United Nations. The Canadian members pointed out that Canadian public opinion is divided on the issue.

4. Disarmament

The committee agreed that disarmament negotiations must be continued despite the difficulties and lack of concrete progress so far. Recognizing the growing military potential of communist China, probably independent of Russia, it was suggested that at some future time provision might be made for communist China to participate in realistic disarmament discussions. Confirming the continuing need to seek agreement on banning nuclear tests under adequate safeguards, the committee was concerned as to how long the United States should postpone the testing which is required to advance nuclear capability in the face of Russia's refusal to negotiate an agreement in good faith. Only by thorough inspection around the world could each side be certain that the other was not secretly taking the lead in more efficient weapons. Canadian members reported that public opinion in Canada now was against resumption of nuclear tests, but could change in the face of continued Russian rejection of inspection and the growing possibility of the Russians conducting secret tests.

5. Defence Production Sharing

In view of the interdependent nature of the economic as well as the military aspects of the common defence effort, the committee confirmed the need for a strong industrial base in Canada as an essential part of North American defence. The defence production sharing program continues to provide opportunities for Canadian industry to participate on an equitable basis with United States industry in defence development and production. The committee noted that since the initiation of the program, Canada continued to procure more defence items in the United States than the United States procured in Canada. It was agreed that efforts should be continued to strengthen the Canadian portion of the common defence production base through increased United States defence procurement in Canada.

Report of the Committee on Trade and Economic Matters

Aid to Underdeveloped Countries

There was a general discussion on the principles which should govern aid to underdeveloped countries and the problems of implementing aid programs. It was agreed that there was need for more effective preparation and planning of aid programs and that proper training of personnel administering them was also important. Reference was made to the desirability of close co-operation between Canada and the United States as contributing countries, both in determining a fair sharing of the burden and in promoting effective administration. The United States delegation pointed out that the United States was now contributing about 1 per cent of its gross national product to foreign aid programs, and the suggestion was made by the United States delegation that this percentage might be a target toward which other countries might aim. It was agreed that this aid was necessary in furtherance of the aims of the developed nations in accepting their responsibility toward the underdeveloped countries.

Boundary Waters

In the discussion of the Columbia river, the Canadian delegation observed that there were certain problems in Canada that had to be resolved before ratification of the treaty by parliament could take place. In this connection, it was pointed out that the province of British Columbia had made the necessary amendments to its water act, and had authorized the British Columbia power commission to apply for a licence to construct the Canadian works provided for under the treaty. It was also understood that the preconstruction engineering would be completed later this year. It was hoped, therefore, that the project would not be delayed unduly.

Concerning the Passamaquoddy tidal power project, a member of the United States delegation asked for an expression of Canadian views, in the light of the international joint commission report. A member of the Canadian delegation responded that the report indicated an unfavourable cost benefit ratio which in turn suggested that the project would be uneconomical at this time. The United States delegation thought it might be useful to continue studies of the project.

The United States delegation urged the desirability of a joint study of potential traffic on the Richelieu-Champlain waterway and of improvements to handle this traffic. Such a study was of some urgency due to possible alternative action by the United States on the Hudson-Erie waterway.

Tourism

There was a discussion on the balance of tourist expenditures between Canada and the United States. It was pointed out that in 1958 and 1959 Canadian tourist expenditures in the United States were $413 million and $448 million, respectively, while United States tourist expenditures in Canada were $309 million and $351 million. Thus, there was an annual Canadian deficit of approximately $100 million in each of these years. With this in mind, the Canadian delegation expressed concern over the legislation now pending in the United States congress to reduce the import duty exemption accorded to returning United States tourists from $500 to $100. Both delegations recognized the seriousness of the problem and discussed several ways in which the present imbalance might be improved, including expanded Canadian tourist promotion and better arrangements for air travel on Canadian and United States transborder carriers.

Trade

The committee discussed trade with the Sino-Soviet bloc with particular reference to trade with communist China. The Canadian delegation explained the recent sale of agricultural products to communist China. It was pointed out that the whole matter of agricultural products and of foreign sale of food stuffs was a problem of greater relative magnitude for Canada than for most other countries since Canada consumed about 14 per cent and exported 86 per cent of its wheat production, whereas in the United States the figures were just the reverse. The United States delegation understood the factors within Canada that resulted in these sales and explained the basis for the United States in not engaging in such trade.

Trade with Cuba was also discussed. The United States delegation explained the distinction in United States law between trade with Cuba and with communist China. It cited the dwindling amount of such trade in the permissive categories of food and medicine.

Both delegations recognized that Canada and the United States had a common interest in strengthening themselves and in supporting and promoting free world objectives against the threat that faces them.

United States Investment in Canada

The contribution which United States investment has made to the development of Canadian industry was recognized but members of the Canadian delegation also drew attention to the problems which arose in Canada due to the large measure of United States control over certain segments of Canadian industry. It was pointed out that the Canadian government had recently taken measures to encourage wider participation by Canadians in their own industrial development without penalizing foreign investment. It was also suggested by the Canadian delegation that it would be helpful if Canadians had greater access to the equity financing of United States companies in Canada.

International Trade Unions

The Canadian delegation expressed some concern over the excessive influence exercised on Canadian trade unions by the heads of some United States-controlled international unions. Admittedly this was a matter for consideration within Canada.

European Trade Groupings

A Canadian delegate expressed the hope that Canada and the United States would consult to find a mutually satisfactory approach to the problems created by European trade blocs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, July 6, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

GRAIN

WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PAYMENTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the house that initial payments for the basic grades of western wheat, oats and barley have been approved by the government and established for the crop year 1961-62. These initial payments have been set at the same level as those in effect for the present crop year.

The initial payment for wheat, effective August 1 next, is $1.40 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver. The initial payment for oats is 60 cents per bushel, basis No. 2 Canada western, in store Fort William-Port Arthur. The initial payment for barley is 96 cents per bushel, basis No. 3 Canada western six-row, in store Fort William-Port Arthur.

For all other grades of wheat, oats and barley the initial payments effective for the 1961-62 crop year will be established at a later date on the recommendation of the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, not being well informed on this question I shall take this announcement as notice and refer it to my leader.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN MAXIMUM QUOTA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to show the concern of the Canadian wheat board over the drought situation in the west and the steps being taken to alleviate this problem, I wish to make the following statement. I wish to inform the house that the Canadian wheat board has announced that the maximum quota for the present crop year will be 7 bushels per specified acre. The first authorizations for the quota at points where sufficient space is available to warrant the increase have already been issued to the trade.

For the balance of the crop year, in so far as possible the Canadian wheat board will endeavour to give all producers an opportunity to deliver the maximum quota. Therefore effective Monday, July 3, the key agent at a delivery point where producers have had an opportunity to deliver a 6 bushel quota and where space is available to warrant an increase to 7 bushels per specified acre should, with the consent of the other agents at the point, request the quota department of the Canadian wheat board, Winnipeg, to authorize an increase to that level.

It should be understood, however, that in authorizing a 7 bushel quota at such delivery points the board does not undertake that sufficient space will be made available to enable all producers to deliver the maximum quota. The significance of this, Mr. Speaker, is that the responsibility of requesting the 7 bushel quota now rests with the elevator agents.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of his answer this morning. I should like to break it down into three parts.

First, can the points of delivery take it that the minister's announcement is equivalent to a buying order for each point equal to 7 bushels? Second, what assurance have these elevator agents that box cars will be available for delivery? Third, what is the situation in the event that elevators of the key personnel to which he referred are full and the other elevators are empty or have storage space?

Mr. Chevrier: Order paper.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty in answering the first question, in so far as who is responsible. The main point of my statement was that once the 6-bushel quota has been granted by the wheat board the responsibility lies on the local agents to call for a 7-bushel quota.

We certainly cannot give assurance of box cars, but I think, with the co-operation we are getting from the railways and the terminals these days, we could meet pretty well all the requirements.

The third part of the hon. member's question about the key agent is a touchy one in western Canada. The key agent is usually the leading recipient of grain in that particular town. If his elevators happen to be full naturally he will tend not to request an additional quota. I think it is up to the other agents to persuade him that they have space and that they should be able to get the cars. What we and the wheat board are really trying to do here is first of all to put the responsibility on the local elevator agents to decide whether or not grain should be moved out of that district; second, to put the responsibility on the agents to let the farmers know that the agents themselves decide whether they go to a 7-bushel quota.

Mr. McIntosh: A supplementary question. The minister referred to those stations or points that were on a 6-bushel quota. As he well knows, many points in Saskatchewan are on a 5-bushel quota. Does the same thing apply to a 5-bushel quota?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the intention of the wheat board is that very shortly almost all points will be on the 6-bushel quota and we are assuming that the 6 bushels will be arrived at some time this week. From there on the local agents will have to decide whether they go up to 7 bushels.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

AGREEMENTS RESPECTING TAX COLLECTION, ANNUAL GRANTS, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces and to provide that the minister may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1962 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1967,

(a) a tax equalization payment;

(b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment;

(c) additional annual grants of ten and a half million dollars to each of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, and of three and a half million dollars to the province of Prince Edward Island;

(d) a further additional annual grant of eight million dollars to the province of Newfoundland;

(e) where a province does not levy a succession duty, an amount equal to the standard estate tax applicable to the province for the fiscal year; and

(f) advance payments on account of amounts collected under a tax collection agreement that may be entered into with the province.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister of Finance asking for leave to alter this order to read "later this day"?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker, not later this day.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOUSING—REQUEST BY MINISTER FOR LEAVE TO MAKE ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister indicate why he wishes to revert to motions?

Mr. Walker: To make an announcement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: I am sorry; I was talking to my neighbour.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the first six months period of the housing program of the government is now over. I have been asked by a great many hon. members to make a short announcement, which I have here. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada have guaranteed hundreds of millions of dollars through this parliament and this matter is of great interest to all hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister proceeds, may I ask him whether the announcement is a statement of housing statistics for the past six months?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a propaganda effort.

Mr. Walker: Statistics, of necessity, must be in the announcement, because I cannot make an announcement without giving statistics.

Mr. Speaker: If it is simply a statistical announcement I think it should be made by leave of the house. If it is a matter of policy which the minister is announcing, he has the right to make such a statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is just a piece of propaganda.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, there are no political overtones to this.

An hon. Member: Undertones.

Mr. Walker: Everybody has been interested in housing and, with the greatest respect, I had no chance on the consideration of my estimates because my friend the hon. member for Nipissing was not here—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Having regard to what the minister said, has the minister leave to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Robichaud: You are waking up.

BANK OF CANADA ACT—POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if the Prime Minister could explain to the house why we are not proceeding with the Bank of Canada legislation this day, a bill which the government once considered it was urgent to pass quickly?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am very happy to answer that question. The hon. member for Essex East said the day before yesterday that the fight was going to continue for ten days, so we wanted to get some legislation before the house so that it would be available for the Senate at once.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are afraid to go on. You are afraid to exercise the bill of rights.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex East has not been recognized, nor did he rise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said the Prime Minister was afraid to exercise the bill of rights.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member, and may I say it was not proper for him to make such a remark from his seat.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree fully with Your Honour. Your observation is correct, but I will say this, that when the Prime Minister gives us the example in that particular it is understandable that other members should follow his abuse of the rule.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister on June 23 and the statement of the Minister of Justice on June 24 with reference to obtaining the transcript of evidence concerning the former secretary of state, now Senator Courtemanche; and in view of the fact that the commission finished hearing evidence on June 30, is the Prime Minister now in a position to state what course he intends to follow?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As I stated earlier, a full examination will be made of the transcript of evidence taken by the commission. My understanding is that the commission has now completed the hearing of evidence and has adjourned until September. We asked for the transmission not only of the evidence which was originally given but also of the evidence given subsequently by Senator Courtemanche and, I think, by one or two others.

That evidence, the latter evidence, came into the hands of the Minister of Justice some days ago and he was going to make, as is proper, a full and complete examination thereof. Unfortunately, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Justice had to leave for his home by reason of personal bereavement. As soon as he comes back—I suggest there should be this necessary delay—and an examination has been made, a very definite statement will be made regarding this whole matter.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF CURRENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I have a question to ask the Minister of Public Works, of which I have given him notice. Can the minister give the house some information on housing construction in Canada during the first six months of this year?

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are the rules of the house to be used in this way, first to plant a question and then, in effect, to revert to motions to build up and create an impression—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will state his objection to the question I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. Garland: This has come up so often that I hate to trouble the house with it, but when we ask similar questions we are ruled out of order.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would assist me by indicating the objection he has to the question itself.

Mr. Garland: It has always been my understanding that statistical information cannot be given at this particular time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I may be allowed to say a word regarding the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should first hear the hon. member who posed the question. I take it the point is that this is not a matter of urgency?

Mr. Garland: That is right, Mr. Speaker, This involves statistical information which the minister is seeking by devious methods to place on the record in order to create the impression that all is well when all is not well.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, without getting into any question of good news or bad news, I should say it has been the practice of this house on recent occasions when notice has been properly given—and I can assure the house that it was given this morning—the minister is allowed to make a brief statement.

An hon. Member: You are all wet.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour has been very rigorous in the application to this side of the house—by this side of the house I mean the opposition, and not the senior member for Halifax—of the rule that questions must be of an urgent nature. A summary covering the last six months respecting housing given today rather than tomorrow or on some other occasion by no stretch of the rules, except a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite for party propaganda, could be regarded as an urgent matter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the Leader of the Opposition will find it unnecessary to speak, because I am of the opinion that this is not the type of question which ought to be asked on orders of the day, with all due respect to the interest which exists in this matter. The question concerns statistical information which is published by the dominion bureau of statistics and the minister's department and is equally available to all members and, therefore, should not take the time of the house at this time.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it has been ruled by your Honour on a number of occasions when members of the opposition have asked questions of a similar nature that if the minister is prepared to answer, and has received notice, the choice is left to the minister to answer or not. That has happened on many occasions. If the circumstances are the same today in Your Honour's estimation and the minister is prepared to answer, he should be allowed to do so.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in regard to that point, if the minister in effect received notice of this question why did he try to anticipate questions on orders of the day by giving the information during motions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I may have come to a wrong conclusion, but I have come to a conclusion and have expressed it, and I think the house should accept it unless there is a desire to appeal my ruling.

(Translation):

INQUIRY AS TO NEW CONSTRUCTION POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have given him notice.

Could the minister tell the house whether it is true that his department is considering a new policy to further promote housing construction in Canada?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member has asked that question. Unfortunately, the opposition has refused to let me break the good news about the first six months of 1961. I shall therefore have to pass it along to parliamentary correspondents. Let me say, however, that this problem is under constant review and that any new decision in the field of housing construction will be announced in the house.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFER TO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer).

Is the minister in a position to make the statement he promised yesterday with regard to the Soulanges canal? In a word, I should like to know whether the government is now prepared to turn over that canal to the Quebec government.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that a decision had been taken and that it would be announced today.

It is still early in the day. The decision will certainly be made known today.

(Text):

EAST-WEST TRANSPORT LTD.—INQUIRY AS TO RATE CUTTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question based on a letter received this morning, probably by many members. My question is, does the minister know that the East-West Transport Limited, a crown owned, financed and subsidized truck line, is one of the largest rate cutters in the country?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no particular knowledge of the detailed activities of the company in question, but I can assure the hon. member that I will bring this matter to the attention of the management of the Canadian National Railways.

INCOME TAX

MONTREAL—REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. members for Hull and Laurier inquired in respect to reported activities on the part of taxation officials in the Montreal area. The report referred to concerned a written authorization to amend or cancel charitable receipts, and is part of the administrative procedure which is applicable everywhere in Canada where the issuer of the receipt is relying on information supplied him by the taxpayers. This procedure is being utilized after consultations by officers of the department with religious authorities, and requires no specific authorization from the minister.

LIVESTOCK

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN MARKET PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the heavy sales of livestock in the west during the past several weeks owing to the serious drought and feed shortages, could the minister indicate to the house why market prices have risen in the past week?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I think we are all aware of the fact that the market price has gone up on the Winnipeg market in the last two or three days. I understand the big reason for the stiffening of prices was my announcement last Sunday of our intention to use floor prices if necessary; second, is the fact that a large number of United States buyers have appeared on the market in the last while. I presume this is the reason for the stiffening of prices. I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, it would be advisable for the eastern feeders to step in and get some of these cattle before they all go to the United States.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SECURITY TEST INVOLVING USE OF POTS AND PANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. I apologize for not sending him notice, but I have just received the press dispatch from Vancouver. My question is based on the following paragraph which appeared in the Sun yesterday on information received from Flight Lieutenant Marshal Bluck:

> Pots, Pans Shield R.C.A.F.
> Pots and pans have become part of Canada's defences.
> They were strung around 14 aircraft parked at seven secret sites in British Columbia Monday night in a mock defence exercise.
> They clanged loudly enough for airmen to trip up 11 foreign saboteurs, the air force proudly announced today.
> The operation was a test of security and vigilance according to the information received by the Sun.

Would the minister inform the house whether this operation and the purchase of the pots and pans was done with his sanction and knowledge?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about this matter. I would therefore have to make inquiries and find out, but I would presume that the pots and pans in question show that there are more uses for pots and pans than cooking.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—REPORTED LOWERING OF WATER LEVELS BELOW MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister taken cognizance of a statement appearing in this morning's Gazette, attributed to one of his officials, that the lowering of the level of the St. Lawrence river below Montreal is causing serious concern, and in which it is stated that the level could fall to 34 feet this season, making the channel unusable for many vessels? Can the minister indicate the cause of this lowering of the level, and advise whether a study of this matter is being made by his department?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the factors affecting the level of the St. Lawrence river from Montreal down are very complicated, relating to power and navigation works, general climatic conditions as affected by land use, and so on. A complete statement on the subject would be a very lengthy matter.

I can assure the hon. member that the question of water levels at Montreal and below is receiving extensive study and, in fact, we plan over the next year to construct a major model of the St. Lawrence ship canal covering Montreal harbour and below, with a view to carrying on extensive tests which we believe will help us to deal with this matter.

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that 20 days have elapsed since he gave the house an undertaking to announce in two weeks the regulations governing assistance to the shipbuilding industry, is the minister yet in a position to announce them?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to answer the question I asked him on Tuesday about unemployment conditions in Springhill and the possibility of applying provisions similar to the program for Cape Breton island.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I express regret to the Leader of the Opposition. I should have had an answer available, and I shall have it at the earliest possible time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister yet received a report from the Canadian National Railways about the possibility of keeping open the spur line from the C.N.R. into Springhill?

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS AND WINTER WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister indicate whether his department has yet arrived at a decision regarding the establishment of support prices this year on winter wheat and soybeans and, if so, what these prices might be?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had intended later today to make a formal announcement on this subject. I can now inform the house that the government has decided on this year's support prices for both soybeans and winter wheat. The price for soybeans will be $2.13 a bushel, which is 100 per cent of the base price. The price on winter wheat will be the same as last year, $1.39, which is 83 per cent of the base price.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In doing so I thank the minister for answering the question which the house will recall I asked over five months ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: And again yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister not realize that the price he has announced today is, of course, almost 35 cents lower than the price asked by the soybean growers of southwestern Ontario?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, the minister is aware of the request of the soybean growers. I wish to point out to the hon. member for Essex East that he has never understood how this legislation works. What we do is put in a support price to let the farmers know that it looks pretty good for soybeans this year. We have raised it 13 cents over the price of last year to indicate to the farmers that it is safe to go ahead and produce a few more soybeans.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, now that my question with regard to soybeans has borne fruit—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I recognized the hon. member for St. Denis. The hon. member for St. Denis has indicated his intention to yield the floor to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I recognize my colleague and yield the floor to him.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAID HOLIDAYS FOR PART TIME EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I am in no hurry to ask this question in view of the fact that the minister to which it is directed is in no hurry himself.

Has the Secretary of State reconsidered the possibility of granting annual leave with pay to part time employees, in view of the fact that he recently promised to the hon. members for St. Henry (Mr. Lessard) and St. Denis (Mr. Denis) to consider the matter?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, that is a problem involving not only the Secretary of State department but a number of departments. In other words, it is really a matter of government policy. I can assure the hon. member that for my part, I have already begun to consider the problem and hope to be in a position to make a statement on the matter in the near future.

Mr. Denis: Could the Secretary of State indicate to the house when he thinks the cabinet will once more reconsider the matter?

Mr. Dorion: Unfortunately, I cannot answer that question because the problem is not my sole responsibility.

Mr. Denis: I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, when the house can expect a statement of policy on the matter?

Mr. Dorion: I have nothing to add, because, as I say, the problem is not my sole responsibility.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

APPEAL TO TARIFF BOARD—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

On the order:

Consideration of the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff—the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will not need to be reminded that Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, is one of the bills introduced arising out of the supplementary budget presented to the house on December 20 last. It is a bill that received extended discussion in this house before proceeding to the other place.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the minister for a moment? We do not have the amendment. I think the amendments are normally on the table.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the message of the Senate—

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think we should have the amendment before the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment is before us, Mr. Speaker, and has been since June 15. The message of the Senate containing the amendment which is proposed by the other place was received by this house on June 15 and is recorded in Votes and Proceedings of this house of that date at page 671. This, of course, is the practice of the house. When Senate amendments come to the house they appear in Votes and Proceedings but are not transcribed in extenso on the order paper of this house.

At page 671 of Votes and Processings the following passage from the message from the Senate will be found:

A message was received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate had passed Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, with the following amendment:

Page 1, lines 22 and 23: Strike out lines 22 and 23 and substitute therefor the following:

"(3) Subject only to an appeal to the tariff board, the decision of which board shall be final and in respect of which appeal the provisions of section 44 of the Customs Act shall apply mutatis mutandis, the minister shall decide the following matters:".

Hon. members accordingly will recognize that the Senate has proposed one amendment by which it is intended that a right of appeal in limited form should be extended; that such right of appeal should apply in the cases contemplated in Bill No. C-72; and that the appeal shall not be of the same nature as the appeal provisions now in effect, that is to say an appeal to the tariff board with further appeals in certain cases and on certain grounds to the exchequer court and the Supreme Court of Canada, but an appeal to the tariff board whose decision is to become final.

The issue therefore presented to the house is whether the house should accept or reject the Senate amendment. The government cannot accept it, and it asks the house therefore to reject the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Hon. members will not need to be reminded that the Customs Tariff is certainly a revenue statute. Bill No. C-72, to amend the Customs Tariff, is a fiscal measure. It was one of the budget bills. It is clearly a revenue bill. It is no answer to say that the particular amendment does not expressly relate in its terms to particular tax rates. The bill itself is a revenue measure. The main statute which it purports to amend is by any standard a revenue measure, a fiscal enactment.

I shall not delay the house, Mr. Speaker, by reminding it of the important place which this amending bill held in the government's program for enlargement of job opportunities in Canada, and of the stress that was laid upon that fact in the earlier debates of this session. I am sure that matter is fresh in the minds of hon. members. I therefore turn directly to the question presented to us by the Senate amendment.

I have to say in general that the amendment is an unworkable one and that it would result in frustrating the purposes of the bill to which it purports to be an amendment. It would result in delays that I am sure the house could not possibly condone. I make these brief observations before proceeding to a leading element that challenges the house in the light of the action taken by the Senate. The suggested amendment is open to these criticisms.

1. The delays and uncertainty which would be brought about by having the questions of "normal Canadian consumption", "shelf" goods and whether goods are "custom made to specifications" subject to an appeal to the tariff board may discourage Canadian producers from taking an active interest in such new business.

2. Notwithstanding what has been said regarding how swiftly the tariff board might be expected to deal with such cases—indeed, Mr. Speaker, it was said that they could be disposed of within a period of 60 days—the bald fact is that on June 13, to take a recent date, the tariff board issued a tentative schedule for the hearing of appeals in November and December of this year and in February, April and June of 1962. Such is the extent of the backlog, and such is the measure of the delay that must result in the inscription of any more appeals or the creation of procedure for more appeals under our statutes.

Included among these cases which have already been set down for hearing in this group of appeals now standing for hearing up to June of 1962 are three involving class or kind rulings. These are listed for hearing eight months to 10 months hence. Appeal No. 599, which was accepted by the board in November, 1960, is scheduled for hearing in February, 1962, while appeals Nos. 600 and 606, which were accepted in November, 1960 and January, 1961 respectively, are listed for hearing in April, 1962.

3. The anomaly of having a portion of the class or kind provisions subject to appeal to the tariff board only while other features of the legislation allow the filing of appeals beyond the board to the Exchequer Court of Canada and to the Supreme Court of Canada. This anomaly, I am sure, requires little further comment.

Under the amendment, first, the normal Canadian consumption of shelf goods; second, whether goods are custom made to specifications; and third, whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of custom made goods within a reasonable period of time would be appealable to the tariff board only. The questions which could be taken before the courts include, first, whether shelf goods are of approximately the same class or kind as goods made in Canada; second, the determination of the amount of Canadian production; and third, whether the quantity manufactured in Canada does in fact constitute a minimum of 10 per cent of normal Canadian consumption.

The fourth ground of criticism and the fourth reason why such an amendment would be quite unworkable and accordingly unacceptable is the possibility that the phrase "custom made to specifications" may be construed as applying to a much wider range of goods than is presently contemplated, such as articles which may merely differ in quality, capacity, size, style, etc.

These observations are all that I am sure I need to detain the house in making in order to point out the unworkability of the amendment proposed by the Senate. However, I should like to pass now to something which is fundamental and which in effect presents the house with an issue with important constitutional implications. The house is aware of the rule in regard to the prerogatives of this house respecting money bills. This is the problem presented now in relation to this present bill and the amendment proposed.

Rule 63 of the house, Mr. Speaker, which you applied on a previous occasion, reads as follows:

> 63. All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house, as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, that rule was applied by yourself to an amendment to the Income Tax Act proposed by the Senate in the 1959 session. It gave rise to debate in this house on July 14 and July 18 of that session. May I just remind hon. members of the circumstances of that occasion, because there we have a complete precedent created by this present parliament. We do not even need to go back to statements on the question in earlier parliaments, although there are a number of them.

In the 1958 session this house had passed a bill, No. C-48, to amend the Income Tax Act. When that bill went to the other place the Senate introduced certain amendments. The issue before the house turned on a particular amendment. That amendment was not one that purported to state rates of taxation. It was an amendment to section 71 of the act which raised the question whether so-called foreign investment corporations should or should not be continued with an open-ended clause, or whether steps should be taken to prevent the creation of more of such corporations with the privileged tax position which such corporations enjoyed. It was on that amendment, Mr. Speaker—an amendment, as I say, which did not purport to deal with a particular rate of taxation—that this house took its stand.

When the matter came up on July 14 you, Mr. Speaker, raised the question of order under standing order 63 which I just now read. The matter stood over and came up for debate on July 18. At that time the house took its position by decision that I think can be regarded as unanimous. There was certainly no division in the house, and there was no contrary opinion expressed. The house stood on the ground that this amendment to the Income Tax Act affected a money bill and there was no power in the Senate, under the constitution, to amend a money bill. This was not a supply motion; this was not a bill relating to the appropriation of money; it was a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. So I say, Mr. Speaker, the case is completely on all fours with the case now under debate.

Again I remind the house that it was not a clause in the Income Tax Act which related expressly to the rates of taxation. It was a clause to determine whether section 71 should be permitted to have continuing effect in relation to foreign business corporations. The house took its stand on these matters. Reference was made to the position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in other sessions. The Leader of the Opposition concurred in the position, this historic position on which the government took its stand, and the house asserted that the amendment introduced by the Senate could not be accepted because it infringed upon the prerogative of this house to deal with money bills, which are not open to amendment by the Senate.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I accordingly move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house disagrees with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, for the following reason:

The amendment infringes the sole and undoubted right of the Commons to impose taxation; it alters the application of taxes and interferes with the public revenue.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this motion has just been made available to us—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds I should place the motion before the house, and I shall do so unless any hon. member wishes to raise a technical objection.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might raise the point as to whether notice of this motion is required. I am raising the question solely for information and not to make objection.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is that notice is not required where the house is not accepting the amendment. The point which you raised on July 14, 1959 was that if a particular amendment was proposed to be accepted, notice must be given, but as to an amendment that was being rejected, no notice was required. When the matter stood over until July 18 for hearing you raised the matter again, as reported at page 6402 of Hansard when you said:

Before the Leader of the Opposition speaks, may I say this. I take it that the Minister of Finance considers that the proposed amendment does not now infringe on standing order 63 by reason of the fact that the remaining amendment does not alter any of the conditions, etc., of the grants involved.

To that observation I replied:

Exactly so, Mr. Speaker.

So when the motion simply stands upon and reasserts the provisions made by the House of Commons, no notice is required. Notice would be required if the house were being asked to accept an amendment introduced by the Senate. I think the rule is quite clear in standing order 63, and I may say it has always been the practice of the house that notice has not been required in cases where the house is standing on its original enactment and is not accepting the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point with which the minister has been dealing, and which was raised by my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate, the minister states that the motion is one of rejection of the amendment and not acceptance, and therefore no notice is required. I just bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the motion is not simply one of rejection, but it indicates the reasons for that rejection. We are asked —and I am not at the moment complaining about this—to debate this motion immediately, without notice. The motion includes certain reasons why the amendment should be rejected, and these reasons have just at this moment been brought to our attention.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will not need to be reminded that in cases where an amendment proposed by the Senate is rejected, it is the practice to send a message to the Senate and give the reasons for the rejection. This is the long standing practice of the house. There are many precedents.

That does not touch the question of order that has been raised. That is to be determined on the question of whether or not the original enactment of the house is to stand. The position taken in this motion is that the enactment of the house should stand and the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. Speaker: On the question of the necessity for notice, standing order 41, which applies to bills, etc., reads as follows:

> Forty eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills—

And so on.

Notice has in effect been given to the house by the item being placed on the order paper under government orders, where it has stood for some time. It is, today, item 4, reading as follows:

> June 15—Consideration of the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff—The Minister of Finance.
> Note: Text of amendment printed in Votes and Proceedings of June 15 at page 671.

That is in effect the ordering of the consideration of this matter and it is open to the house, of course, to proceed in at least two directions. The item before the house is consideration of the amendment. This motion proposes to reject the amendment. Had the motion been to accept the amendment I might have been in the same position as I was in 1958, and would have had to bring to the attention of the minister that acceptance of the amendment would be contrary to standing order No. 63 and that, therefore, notice of the suspension of that standing order would have to be given. However, as the contrary course is suggested it would seem to me that notice and suspension of standing order 63 is not needed.

I am a little concerned about the motion in that it asks the house to disagree with the amendment rather than to reject it as being beyond the competence of the Senate, but that is made clear by the latter part of the motion, and I think I should place the matter before the house.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Before the point of order is left, I wonder if we might have some clarification of one part of Your Honour's remarks. I understood you to indicate that if a certain procedure had been adopted today, if a certain action had been taken, you would have had to indicate that rule 63 was applicable. Do I understand from this that Your Honour is making a finding that this proposed amendment by the Senate is in fact in contravention of rule 63? It seems to me that this point has not been adequately dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: I did not intend that to be a necessary implication of my ruling on the question of whether notice was needed. I did indicate that if the motion had been to accept the amendment then I would have had to consider that standing order 63 might be applicable and, therefore, would have to be suspended before the house, in accordance with its own rules, could properly proceed to discuss that proposition.

Mr. Pearson: We had expected, of course, that this morning we would be discussing a bill which in due course would be referred to the Senate, a bill of great and immediate urgency, so we had been told. However, instead we are at this moment discussing an amendment to a commons bill which has been received from the Senate. As you have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been on the order paper for some time.

We should be perfectly clear about the nature of this amendment. The bill itself, to which the amendment has been made by the Senate, is of course a money bill, and it received long and careful consideration in this house. In the course of that consideration we in the opposition did our best to persuade the government not to take away the right of appeal against the decision of a single minister and the officials of the department of that minister in respect to important matters. That question was decided by the House of Commons in favour of the position taken by the government that provision for appeal should be removed. The bill was then sent to the other place.

The Senate has passed the bill with the amendment before us which has nothing to do with the substance of the measure, nothing to do with the financial or tax or monetary provisions of the bill, nothing to do with any revenue considerations which may be involved in the bill. The amendment made by the Senate is to restore the right of appeal from the decision of a minister by giving the person affected by that decision in respect to these important matters the right of appeal to the tariff board. That is the nature, that is the purpose, and that is the content of the amendment; it is designed to restore the right of appeal, a right which should never have been taken from the citizen by the House of Commons in this bill. This right of appeal is restored in the amendment by making it possible for a person against whom a decision has been made by the minister or by his department to appeal to the tariff board.

It has been said before, and it has been repeated by the Minister of Finance this morning, that this would mean inordinate delay and frustrate the working of the act. I would remind hon. members that this right of appeal is not to the tariff board and, through the tariff board, to the courts. That is the position which we took in this house when this matter was up for consideration. We felt that the full right of appeal should be retained, to the tariff board and to the courts. The hon. gentlemen in the other place, perhaps impressed by the argument that an appeal provision of that kind might result in undue delay, have restricted the right of appeal to the tariff board only. That is the only change they have made in this bill.

The minister told us this morning that this change is not acceptable to the government because the amendment which embodies the change is an unworkable one. Once again he told us that the right of appeal granted to a citizen from a decision of a minister means delay, and we cannot countenance delay; delay would make the act unworkable. Well, that is the excuse that is uttered by every governmental authority that wishes to take arbitrary power into its own hands. The minister says, in effect, we cannot have appeals because appeals mean delay and we cannot tolerate delay; we must act at once, by ministerial dictate if necessary.

The minister has said that this would mean exhaustive delay, and the reason it would be exhaustive is the fact that the tariff board is away behind in its work. He gave us some indication of the number of appeals which have been before the board and have not been decided after weeks and months. However, if the tariff board is in such a condition that it cannot deal with appeals of this kind with reasonable efficiency and expedition, then it is the responsibility of the government to see that it is strengthened so it can do just that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: It is no excuse to say that the tariff board has been permitted, because of the multitude of duties which it now has, to get into a position where it cannot hear appeals in time so as to avoid affecting the procedure and operation of the act. There is no excuse for the government in that regard, particularly in view of the fact that it has done nothing for the board in an attempt to make it effective in the hearing of these appeals. The proper way to deal with this matter is to make it possible for the board to hear the appeals quickly and effectively, not by taking away the right of appeal. The Senate by its amendment merely restores that right of appeal in a form which is less far-reaching and embracing than that which we on this side put forward when this bill was before the House of Commons earlier.

The minister has said a good deal about the constitutional implications of senatorial action in this matter. He has cited what are to him analogous precedents—they certainly are not analogous to us, and we will go into that matter later—to show that the Senate has no power to make this amendment. I seem to recall, though I have not all the details in mind, a couple of years ago the Senate making eight amendments to the estates tax bill, seven of which were accepted by the government when they came back to this house, yet at that time no suggestion was raised that it was unconstitutional for the Senate to make those changes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question. Does he not recall that the house was informed at that time that in accordance with long standing practice the Senate had been requested by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government to make those particular amendments when the bill was before the Senate committee?

Mr. Pearson: I recall that very well, but is the minister now trying to tell us that he has power over the Senate so that he can ask the Senate to do something which, if he had not asked it to do, would be unconstitutional?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what he said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the Leader of the Opposition not agree that this has been the practice which has been carried on for many years by my predecessors? That is, when the government was prepared to accept an amendment the Minister of Finance asked the Senate committee to make the amendments, particularly in respect to matters usually not of far-reaching importance.

Mr. Pearson: It may be that has been the practice, but in the past I do not recall that the government of the day took exception to that kind of amendment by the Senate which did not deal directly with monetary provisions, such as that which the minister is saying now is unconstitutional. The minister may also remember—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are quite wrong.

Mr. Pearson: The minister may remember that while he did suggest some of these amendments to the members of the other place, there was at least one which the government had not suggested nor approved at the time, but accepted when it came back to the house. We can go into detail in this regard a little later.

The minister this morning has challenged the right of the Senate to make an amendment to a bill which restores to Canadians the right of appeal from a decision of the minister. If that doctrine were established it would mean that no matter what provision was put in any kind of finance bill, even though it had nothing whatever to do with the financial clauses of the bill but a lot to do with other aspects, including rights of appeal, the Senate could never touch any portion of the bill dealing with such rights of citizens if the clause being amended was included in a money bill. That is the doctrine which the minister is trying to lay down in this House of Commons today.

So far as we are concerned, if the government wishes to alter beyond question the powers of the Senate in respect of this or any other matter, that is the government's responsibility. It will have a hard time proving that the Senate, in this particular case, does not have constitutional power to make this kind of an amendment, which is an amendment that does not directly concern any of these financial provisions but which is concerned exclusively with the right of appeal from a decision from the minister.

Mr. Speaker, if this amendment is not accepted by this house—and the government has made it quite clear that it is not going to be accepted—then presumably the house takes the stand that, having rejected the amendment, the bill is to be sent back to the Senate. I hope the normal and appropriate procedure will be followed in that case, and there will be a conference between the two houses in an effort to find a solution which safeguards the rights of the people by preserving the right of appeal in this case, but which will remove any legitimate objection the government could advance in respect to considerations of speed and efficiency of operation. That would be the normal course to follow if this amendment is rejected.

However, Mr. Speaker, so far as we are concerned we made our position very clear in regard to this matter when the bill was debated in the House of Commons earlier. We took the stand then that there should be an appeal and that the existing right of appeal should not be removed. We regret very much that it was necessary for the upper chamber to take steps to restore that right of appeal which had been removed by at least the majority of the representatives of the people in this house.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I expect that the government is going to get its way in respect to this bill as it has in other matters, and I believe rightfully so. However, we are concerned as to the number of items in respect of which the government is beginning to get its way because of its obvious majority. I believe it was Lord Acton who said:

Power tends to corrupt; absolute power corrupts absolutely.

We have had a number of appropriate indications recently in this regard, and I need only refer to the debate which took place yesterday concerning the governor of the Bank of Canada. The original proposal of the government in this particular bill now before us was opposed by the opposition because in it we observed another indication of absolute power corrupting absolutely, in that the government was attempting to abolish the ordinary right of appeal to the tariff board.

I have always been of the opinion that one of the primary responsibilities of the other place as an institution is to ensure that no majority in this house is ever allowed to be used to the point where the rights of people, minorities and others in Canada, are abrogated arbitrarily.

I believe there is a very good reason outside of the obvious one why we are opposed to a minister of national revenue having final authority. A number of us in the opposition noted that a device which is proposed to give a minister complete and absolute authority might be used to raise tariffs by back door methods on the national scene. I believe the minister as much as admitted that when he spoke half an hour ago and indicated that the whole aim of the bill, which according to his contention is now being frustrated by the other place, was to enlarge job opportunities, employment opportunities in Canada. As the Conservatives of Canada have always used that term it has usually been allied with higher tariffs. It now becomes obvious that the reason the minister was to be given this arbitrary power was so he would have the right, as I said before by the back door method, to increase tariffs without Canadians really becoming aware that tariffs were in fact being increased.

I should like to endorse the proposal or contention of the leader of the official opposition. If the tariff board is so far behind in its work, our government is lacking in its responsibilities in that it does not ensure that the tariff board either is enlarged or other ways and means are discovered by which it can do its work with a little more dispatch than, in the words of the minister, it is now able to do.

The minister gave as an example of why he felt this amendment infringes the sole and undoubted right of the commons to impose taxation. He went back to 1959 and said that example stands on all fours with the situation now before us. If I heard the minister correctly he informed us that in 1959 the other place was in fact attempting to tamper with the levels of revenue by seeing that certain corporations would not be able to take advantage of existing tax privileges. I fail to see how the right of appeal stands on all fours with the right or otherwise of corporations to enjoy tax privileges. I hope before the debate ends the minister will look back into history, and if he does he may be able to come up with much sounder examples and precedents than the one he has given us.

The minister rather clearly underlined my basic contention when he admitted that the estate tax amendments were in a different category because in effect he, the minister, had asked the other place, according to his pronouncements today, to in fact exceed its authority and amend legislation having to do with the levels of revenue of the government.

I believe we shall have to continue to insist that the right of appeal to the tariff board, as proposed by the Senate, ought to be adopted by this house. I am glad that in this instance at least the Senate has performed a function which I had always been taught was one of the prime functions of the other place. Even though the government has a big majority in this house I hope if it really believes that the other place has any role to play at all—and there are many Canadians who are in doubt as to the validity of that proposition—then would it not agree that one of the prime reasons for the existence of the other place is to ensure that the basic rights of Canadians shall not be taken away from them by a majority in this house; and that therefore the other place is perfectly meeting at least one of its responsibilities when it attempts in this amendment offered to us to restore to Canadians the right of appeal which they have had over many long years.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is not very much one can add to what was said so well, so succinctly and so justly by the Leader of the Opposition. This is just another and an earlier example of what we have been witnessing in this house in recent weeks, the attempt of a government using, in the words of the Encyclopaedia Britannica in the article on the bill of attainder, a servile majority to establish a dictatorship in this country and to remove the individual citizen those very rights that the right hon. gentleman talked so much about only a year ago on this bill of rights, about which he boasts so much and which he spends public money to circulate, with his own statements attached to it, for propaganda purposes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should question the course the hon. member is taking as being outside the scope of the discussion. We are dealing with a specific amendment. References to the bill of rights and other extraneous matters ought not to be brought into the discussion unless they apply to this amendment. Bourinot deals with the matter in this way in the fourth edition at page 535:

> When amendments made by one house to a bill from the other house are received back, and are under consideration—

This is our position this morning:

> —it is not regular to discuss the bill itself, or its principle, or the policy of the government thereon; but the debate must be confined to the amendments.

Bascially the amendment is the insertion of the right of appeal. I do not want to circumscribe the discussion, but I wanted to put in that cautionary word before the hon. member got too far afield.

Mr. Pearson: Surely this amendment, as you have just said, has to do with the restoration of the right of appeal which was taken away from the citizen as a result of the legislation passed in this house. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the effort on our part to restore the right of appeal has some relationship to the bill of rights where the right of appeal is supposed to hold.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that Your Honour made no ruling but just issued a cautionary word which I thoroughly accept, because as hon. members will recall I made the argument in the house when the bill was before us before it was passed by this majority—I will not repeat the adjective I used, but I do think it applies in this instance—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I will.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no doubt that my hon. and eloquent friend from Essex East will have something to say about this, and he far exceeds me in his capacity to describe this act of tyranny with adjectives which do not exist in my limited vocabulary, an act of tyranny that is all the more astonishing coming from the government headed by the author of the Canadian Bill of Rights, one part of which I now propose to read:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an act of the parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to

(e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

Now, sir why does parliament exist? Why did parliament come into existence in the first place? It came into existence to give the consent of the people to taxation and to avoid having taxes imposed by the crown or the minions of the crown, as every minister is. This is what these ministers seem to forget. They seem to think that because, under our system of responsible government, they have a majority behind them, parliament no longer matters; that they alone were chosen by the people and not all of us in this house. They think they were chosen by the people to speak for the people and to decide what the taxes should be and how they should be levied. This, sir, is not true, and the tyranny of the Queen's ministers can be just as great as the tyranny of the Queen before she had ministers sitting in parliament.

I say that what is being sought here, as we said when the bill was being debated before and as hon. ladies and gentlemen in another place have said—I might stop and say parenthetically that I congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. He must have found it rather difficult, and I respect him all the more, for having done it knowing the views that he and his party hold on the Senate, to pay the tribute he did to these ladies and gentlemen who seem to be more concerned about our liberties and our rights than the majority in this house. This is the issue, and the only issue. The suggestion, sir, that the method of determining the nature of articles to be assessed and the accuracy of the facts is an aid or a gift is a perversion of the English language such as perhaps only the Minister of Finance could do, as through his recent tactics he has demonstrated he is capable of doing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree with that.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that what is an aid or gift is the rate of duty, and the rate of duty is in no way affected by this matter. What is affected is the determination of the facts on which that duty shall be based and collected. It would be just as simple to say that the income tax that shall be paid will be whatever the minister of national revenue sees fit to exact from each individual Canadian; that is exactly parallel to what we are asked to do here. We are asked to say that the minister shall determine the conditions precedent, to use a phrase that is very dear to the Prime Minister, to the tax. The minister is to say of his own knowledge and in secret, because the facts are so secret—we know something about facts that are so secret, because we have learned something about them in the past few days—that they cannot be disclosed even to the tariff board.

This is what we were told by hon. gentlemen opposite during the course of the debate on this bill in this house. The taxpayer must not be allowed to know what the facts are on which he is being assessed; he has no right to know. The facts are so secret that they must be kept in the breast of the minister of national revenue, acting capriciously and beyond the right of appeal to any kind of tribunal.

This would have been serious enough if there had never been an appeal before, but there has been an appeal. This parliament over the years, and the Minister of Finance pointed this out in his presentation of the bill, has seen to it that the appeal was gradually strengthened. If I recall the circumstances correctly, and if I do not I would be very happy to be corrected by the minister, I think originally the appeal was from the customs officer who made the adjudication to a board which was merely an administrative board. This was not a very satisfactory form of appeal, but it was a form of appeal. Then Right Hon. R. B. Bennett set up the tariff board in its modern form, and there was an appeal to this tariff board which was a tribunal and court of record. From that time forward there has always been an appeal.

Now this house has decided, and is being asked to reaffirm the decision, that the right of appeal which less than a year ago was guaranteed by this parliament in the bill of rights, is to be taken away from the subject; that is the whole issue and the sole issue here. Why do hon. gentlemen want to do it? They do not tell us. They give the excuses, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, that every government seeking arbitrary power has always given; convenience, speed and secrecy. Dark deeds in dark places.

As a matter of fact, as I pointed out—and I was scoffed at by the treasury benches when I did so, but this was before certain revelations had been made in certain inquiries being held in other places—the Minister of National Revenue could make one adjudication for friends of the government and another adjudication for those who were not his friends. No reason would need to be given and there would be no access to any kind of information, no right of appeal to anyone. Not only do I say that could be done, but no one will believe that sooner or later, under some minister, it may not be done. I do not say it will be done; I am not saying any such thing, but I can remember speeches by the right hon. gentleman when he was sitting over here and did not have to account for his words by his acts, when he could simply enunciate broad general principles without worrying at all about whether there was any conformity between his words and his deeds—

An hon. Member: What are you doing now?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman asks me what I am doing now. I am exercising one of the freedoms still left to us, the right of a freely elected member to speak in parliament. I notice an increasing number of the servile majority who think that right should be taken away from us, right in this chamber.

As I say, when the right hon. gentleman was sitting over on this side of the house, no one was more eloquent. He was far more eloquent, I think than anyone on this side of the house today, with perhaps one or two exceptions. I will not attempt to indicate who those exceptions are, except to say that I would not include myself. I, sir, am a plain man given to using plain language, to say yes when I mean yes and no when I mean no without resort to evasion or equivocation or dodging or squirming as hon. members opposite do. I say the right hon. gentleman, when he was over here, was always wont to point out, and about no one more than about me, that to give arbitrary power to ministers was the most dangerous thing that could possibly be done.

The right hon. gentleman made a promise in the election campaign. It was one of the many promises which he made and which are still just words. In the election of 1957 he promised that one of the first acts of the government of which he never expected to be the head would be to change the immigration regulations and the Immigration Act in order to deprive the minister of those arbitrary powers which he then had. Four years have passed and the only time that they attempted to change those regulations at all they were so laughed out of court that the hon. lady was obliged to come back and return to the regulations I had recommended to my colleagues. A promise in this regard has been made to amend the Immigration Act in every speech from the throne, but no change has been made.

The point I am making is this. If the minister of immigration should not have arbitrary powers—and it has been said by the right hon. gentleman that he should not have them—then considering the whole of English and Canadian constitutional history, and considering indeed the whole constitutional history of free countries, surely no minister should be given by any parliament the exclusive right to tax. Again to quote things that were often said by the right hon. gentleman when he was over here on this side of the chamber, the power to tax is the power to destroy; and the power to tax in this particular measure is peculiarly the power to destroy.

What is the minister going to do? The minister is going to decide in one case that something could be made in Canada and thereby probably destroy the business of someone who wishes to import that article. In another case he is going to decide that it could not be made and thereby destroy the opportunity that some manufacturer might have of making it in Canada. The only criterion on which these decisions will be made will be the colour of the gentleman's eyes the size of his brief, or perhaps the size of something else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen can fill in that third point for themselves. But having regard to the evidence we have as to how hon. gentlemen opposite have obtained some of the support they have obtained for themselves in recent elections, and having regard to some of the revelations that have been made in certain inquiries in the province of Quebec, I think the meaning of my words will be plain. I say that for us in this house to uphold the government in this attempt to restore to the crown the right to tax without the consent of the representatives of the people—a right that was taken away from the crown in the 14th century—is one of the most preposterous attempts at tyranny that we have ever witnessed.

Of course I do not think it was a conscious attempt at tyranny, but that makes it worse. Here is the Minister of Finance so oblivious of our history, so oblivious of our rights, so oblivious of all those things which are the foundations of our freedom that he comes in here and says that the convenience of this taxpayer or that taxpayer is more important than are the fundamental and immemorial of our rights, namely the right of the people through their representatives to consent to and control the taxes; and the right, moreover, of parliament—a right which has been very zealously guarded for over 100 years—to lay down precisely and surely the conditions upon which the subject will be taxed so that the tax exacted of one citizen will be on the same basis as the tax exacted of another citizen.

Under this bill there will not be the slightest assurance that such a thing will happen. In fact there will be absolute certainty that it will not happen. However wise the minister of national revenue may be—and I think the present minister is a great deal wiser than are most of his colleagues, but that is perhaps not saying a great deal—he is human and he is fallible. Out of his own wisdom, uncontrolled by any kind of inquiry, without being under the obligation to give any kind of reasons for his decision, it is absolutely certain that he will not make the same decision on two sets of facts. From time to time it is certain to happen that a decision will be given one way in one case and another way in another case, even in good faith.

I do not impute to the hon. gentleman who temporarily has these functions any lack of good faith. I do not do that at all. That brings me to another point which is very important, which also was stressed very frequently by the right hon. gentleman opposite. It is not a matter of the person of the minister; it is not a matter of the character of the minister; it is a matter of the giving of power to any minister, however trustworthy. I do not think even the Prime Minister would insinuate that any less trustworthy minister ever sat in this house than my right hon. friend Mr. St. Laurent, yet the Prime Minister only yesterday made certain imputations—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member means "more trustworthy".

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I mean "more trustworthy".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Everybody agrees.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope everybody will understand that is what I intended to say. I hope that no one will ever seek to denature that accidental slip of my tongue. I say that no more trustworthy minister ever sat in this house than my right hon. friend Mr. St. Laurent. Yet the Prime Minister pointed out quite truthfully yesterday that in 1945 Mr. St. Laurent himself recommended an order in council which was, as a matter of fact, kept secret; and it was kept secret for reasons that were considered by the government of the day to be good and sufficient, because the safety of the state was involved, as the right hon. gentleman knows and he knows what it was about. It is true that on one occasion in this house—and I never attempt to denature these facts—Mr. St. Laurent denied that there was any such order. He subsequently apologized to the house and explained something that I know is hard to credit; but knowing Mr. St. Laurent I am certain it was true. He explained that he had completely forgotten about the existence of the order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And all the members of the cabinet had forgotten. That is the interesting thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the right hon. gentleman suggesting that any attempt was made at that time to deceive the house? Is he making that suggestion? I put the question directly to him. Is he suggesting that any of those gentlemen acted in bad faith in that matter?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: They all forgot.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I think that is quite true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker; I will tell you why they all forgot. The right hon. gentleman, who is not always too careful to state all the facts, has perhaps forgotten that that order in council in question was not passed in the full cabinet for the very good reason that it had to be kept secret.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the ministers not trust one another?

An hon. Member: Dark deeds in dark places.

Mr. Pickersgill: That fact is a matter of record. It has been made public.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It is now made public for the first time.

An hon. Member: Dark deeds in dark rooms.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Can he tell us which of the ministers were trusted and which were not trusted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question is not relevant to the matter under discussion, as I thought the discussion was becoming irrelevant. I trust the hon. member will bear that in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Churchill: Answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was seeking to make a point which seems to have impressed itself very much on hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. Member: I'll say.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point is this; that on an occasion when for the first time in our history, at a time when there was an acute threat of a third world war, we found a spy ring in this country; when it was absolutely imperative to maintain the utmost secrecy in the matter, the government of that day did take arbitrary action of this kind. I admit it, and I do not pretend they did not; but I say we should not make that part of our normal law. That is the whole point.

Mr. Benidickson: Everyday law.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman has maintained on the statute books the act of parliament under which that order in council was possible, the War Measures Act, and refused last year to modify it when we sought to have it modified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that order in council passed under the War Measures Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. Deschatelets: Nothing has changed in the War Measures Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certain other things were done under the War Measures Act in time of war that were not agreeable to most Canadians and certainly not to most Liberal-minded Canadians.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This was after the war.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the day of the Japanese surrender, the very day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was.

Mr. Diefenbaker: September 5, 1945 I think was the date.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): August 15.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Japanese surrendered on September 6, if I remember correctly. The final surrender was just at that very time.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: In any event, if the right hon. gentleman is now saying there was no danger to the state at that time and it was not necessary to take action about that spy ring, he can say so. But he did not; he took good care not to say that at that time and for a long time afterwards. There are those who were very brave long after the event.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you looking at the hon. member for Essex East when you say that?

Mr. Pickersgill: What I am saying here is that it is one thing to do, in time of war and under the threat of war and in the face of a spy ring, things that are distasteful to us all. It is quite another thing to clothe a minister, not even the governor in council but a minister, with the power to tax in an arbitrary and capricious manner. That is what the right hon. gentleman is asking us to do, because it is his responsibility. The Minister of Finance, as we have seen in recent times, does what he is told. He has become an errand boy. It is the Prime Minister who takes the responsibility for this, as he does for every other act of government. I say that to ask this house to concur in what is clearly an act designed to give arbitrary, dictatorial and capricious powers to a single minister, in time of peace, and for no other reason—

Mr. Cardiff: You are repeating yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it bears repetition because it seems only with the greatest difficulty to penetrate some minds. To give that power in time of peace—

Mr. Cardiff: You have stood there for half an hour and repeated yourself over and over again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can only hear one hon. member at a time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say again, sir, and I think it bears repetition—perhaps the hon. member for Huron would not grasp it no matter how often I repeated it, but one would hope it would make some impression on the minds and on the historic recollections of some hon. members opposite—that there was a time in this country when we were concerned, genuinely concerned, about the right of the people to consent to every tax they had to pay; when we were concerned, and genuinely concerned, that instruments of the crown, creatures of the crown—as ministers are—should not have powers that were not under the control of the representatives of the people. I know that historically the party led by the right hon. gentleman opposite fought hard against responsible government; they resisted it—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: They fought for the maintenance of these arbitrary powers of the crown. They fought right up to 1849, and then then they went out and burned the parliament buildings in Montreal because the governor of that day had accepted the views of the majority. Not only that, they also signed an annexationist manifesto in that same year. One of the signatories of that manifesto was Sir John Rose, who was later minister of finance in Sir John A. Macdonald's government, and another was Sir John Abbott, the third prime minister of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am of course limited as to time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and when I have completed what I have to say I will be glad to listen to the hon. gentleman's question, but not now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is just a short question.

Mr. Pickersgill: However short it is, I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow me to continue with what I have to say.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Budget by radio.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Breaking the rules again. Always breaking the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: More respect for parliament.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by the Minister of Finance with that old world courtesy which so endears him to the house, I was pointing out that in the days when we in Canada were fighting for responsible government the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite were fighting to prevent us from having responsible government. But I have thought, sir, that Sir John A. Macdonald repented of all that and reluctantly accepted responsible government.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we adjourned for the luncheon interval I made some reference to occasions in the past, some of them regrettable, when ministers held and sometimes exercised powers which it was necessary, though regrettable, to exercise in time of war. I had pointed out that those conditions were very different from normal conditions, normal taxing statutes in peacetime, as this present bill is. No one will pretend that this is a measure for the safety of the state.

There are sharp differences in the house about whether this bill is even good for the state, but that is not at issue, as Your Honour properly pointed out. We are not concerned now with whether or not this taxing statute in itself shall prevail, because it is going to prevail. We are concerned with whether or not, in the interpretation of this measure, the determination of what articles shall be taxable, and at what rates shall be done in the open with a right of appeal such as has existed for a long time, or whether that right shall, in defiance of the bill of rights, be taken away. That seems to be the sole issue here.

I do not think anyone in the country will be much impressed by hon. gentlemen arguing, as they are apt to argue whenever they have a weak case, that their predecessors may have done arbitrary things, or things which in their view were arbitrary, and that they therefore are at liberty to proceed in any way they please. I do not think such arguments would be effective, and for this reason; that they campaigned all across the country saying they were going to end that period of arbitrary rule and restore the rights of the people. I hope that neither the Prime Minister nor any of his colleagues will do what the Prime Minister seemed to be doing in another debate and suggest that because somebody else seemed to be doing something at some other time which, in his view, he was not justified in doing, the government is justified in doing wrong now.

That is the point. That is invariably the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite on occasions such as this. They seem to feel that the opposition in this house has no rights; no right to express an opinion because, they allege, at some time in the past, when some members of the present opposition were in office, it may have done some things which they felt were arbitrary. It seems to me that this kind of argument is only used by someone who has the weakest of weak cases. Yet I shall not be at all surprised if it is used again to provide another smokescreen, because that is the normal method by which this government evades, or seeks to evade, responsibility. It works for a while, but the public is gradually getting wise to it. This country is gradually realizing that the government is, in the first place, incapable of continuous and steady action of any kind and that it seeks, whenever things get out of hand, to find someone else to blame for its own incapacity.

But there is far more than incapacity involved here. This is a deliberate attempt to restore the ancient right which the crown claimed before parliamentary supremacy was established, the right to tax without the consent of the representatives of the people. Once that power is vested in a single minister, uncontrolled, unanswerable to the courts, as the government is seeking to do in this bill, the old control exercised by parliament will be gone. The government is seeking to go back to the days of ship money—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: When I have finished. I am following the example of the hon. gentleman the other day, remembering the helpful intervention which he made on another occasion.

I was saying that the government is seeking to go back to things like ship money, seeking to go back to the Bate case, seeking to go back to the days when the crown sought to impose arbitrary levies on people in order to get parliament out of the way. I suggest that maybe we are going to see the same sort of thing again, the same overriding of parliament, the same hope that parliament's right to tax will be forgotten.

An hon. Member: Would you permit a question—

Mr. Pickersgill: Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to like to hear the argument. That is perhaps the next right that is going to be taken away from us, the right of members here to speak in this house without interruption so that a consecutive argument may be made. I say that in the government's refusal to accept this amendment we have an attempt to turn back the clock—not the clock, because this goes back to the days before there were clocks—but an attempt to turn back the centuries to the days of the old feudal monarchs before the people had any say, before the people had any right to decide on the aids they would give to the crown. Under the guise of convenience, under the guise of safety, under the excuse that things must be kept secret, they say we must trust one minister, and he must not be questioned in what he does. We must trust him to decide what is taxable and at what rate, because by deciding what is taxable he is deciding at what rate it will be taxed.

Surely anyone who has any belief whatever in the rule of law, any belief whatever in the right of a subject to a fair hearing, any belief there should be no taxation without real representation, and any belief in the rights of parliament to make the tax laws in open parliament and not by the cabinet or a minister in secret, could not conceivably support the kind of legislation the government has advanced.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear from the hon. member for Ottawa West, whether I agree with him or not on occasion, because he at least presents his arguments in a way which is logical. We have just listened to a typical outburst on the part of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate which was theatrical, hysterical, interesting and deliberate in a way that shows the depth and degree of reformation that has come to that man in the last few years in the House of Commons. I thank him for opening the doorway into the privy council chamber a bit by telling us what happened in September, 1945, when the ministers among themselves apparently had some doubt of each other and therefore found it necessary to have a little coterie within that cabinet to pass an order in council that swept aside the rights of individuals in Canada to a degree which had never before taken place in the entire history of confederation.

Indeed, the interesting thing about that order in council was the fact that it swept aside the right of habeas corpus and provided in effect that an individual might be imprisoned and held incommunicado because it provided that no one, however wrongfully held and whatever the circumstances, had the right to challenge his incarceration in the courts. When the matter came up, and I am speaking from my recollection of that year, the then minister of justice, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, told me that there was no secret order in council. He maintained that position until the end of December, 1945. In February of 1946 the then prime minister, Mr. King, rose one day and said he had an order in council, the one that the minister of justice had forgotten about. That was the order in council which had swept aside all the rights of Canadians in a way that was unjust, unfair and, to use my hon. friend's words, tyrannical to a degree that is almost beyond conception today.

I do not intend to go into the past, but I did appreciate that fact coming from the hon. member because he had knowledge of what took place in the cabinet and was able to reveal it today. How it came about has been something we have been wondering about all through the years, and I know the historians of the future will pay their tribute to this historian for the contribution he has made today.

I am not going into the arguments as to the merits of this legislation, because they have been dealt with. Whether hon. members agree or not, the House of Commons dealt with this matter, and dealt with it at much length. All the arguments that have been advanced today were advanced then, possibly not as spectacularly or in as an illogical manner but none the less they were brought before the house. I am not going into that argument at all because it has been dealt with over and over again, but what I intend to deal with is just one matter, and that is the right of the Senate of Canada to interfere with legislation respecting taxation passed by the House of Commons.

I thank the hon. gentleman for having said that this is a taxation measure. Hon. members will remember how he enlarged upon that in saying that the power to tax is the power to destroy. My recollection of that statement is that it came from a former prime minister of Canada in the person of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is older than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having now the approbation of the hon. gentleman, my memory is indeed proven to be correct. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that. I am glad that the hon. member participated in the debate, because he emphasized that this is a taxation measure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not be point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the foundation upon which I build my argument, and nothing can be more beneficial than to use the arguments of those opposite for the purpose of establishing one's own argument. This is a taxation measure, and it being a taxation measure what are the rights involved? The Minister of Finance referred this morning to standing order 63 of the House of Commons, which reads in part:

> All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons—

All through the years from the earliest times the Senate took the stand that it could make amendments, and it followed that course periodically and regularly. That was not the situation in the United Kingdom. We adopted in Canada a constitution similar in nature and kind to the British constitution. In the United Kingdom the position has been made very clear throughout the years, and was established centuries ago. The House of Commons has complete control of revenues and expenditures, and the House of Lords has no right to either initiate or amend money bills. Until about 1910 or 1911 the House of Lords did have the right to reject money bills, but that right was taken away by the parliament act of 1911. In the United Kingdom today money bills normally do receive the assent of the lords, but machinery is now available whereby money bills and other bills can become law without the concurrence of the House of Lords.

The hon. gentleman referred to antiquity and the foundations of parliament, and dealt at some length with parliamentary powers and prerogatives. It was on July 3, 1678, that the position of the commons and the lords was set out in a resolution of the house of commons of that day.

> All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty in parliament are the sole gift of the commons, and all bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the commons, and it is the undoubted right of the commons to direct, limit and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.

Through the years, even as late as 1918, the Senate of Canada took the attitude that it could in fact amend bills which were in the nature of taxation measures. I recall the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King and the manner in which he spoke of the Senate of his day, and I make no apology for referring to the Senate as such rather than the other place because I find that in the course of the arguments Mr. King advanced he invariably referred to that place as the Senate of Canada. I go back to July 19, 1924. As far as I am able to ascertain, this was the first time that Mr. King made any suggestion as to what he had in mind respecting the rights of the non-elected representatives of the people to thwart and interfere with, to amend, abrogate or otherwise alter the power of the House of Commons. This is what he said:

> Having in mind the action of the second chamber with respect to the measure which has just been amended and also the fate of a number of bills adopted by the commons and defeated in the Senate, I think hon. members will agree with me that the time has come when the commons in Canada should seek to gain rights and privileges with respect to legislation originating in this chamber similar to those which have obtained by the House of Commons in the parliament at Westminster. I may say that the government had under consideration, prior to the opening of this session, legislation with this end in view—

I stop to point out to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Boswell of Mr. Mackenzie King, that this was in 1924, and Mr. King had in mind at that time that something would be done. I refer to what he said:

> The government had under consideration, prior to the opening of this session legislation, with this end in view, but we were anxious the public should feel fully convinced of the necessity before pressing it on the attention of parliament. I desire to assure the house that when parliament reassembles steps will be taken by the government to obtain, if possible, means whereby bills may be enacted by and with the advice and consent of the House of Commons under conditions similar in principle to those which have been sanctioned for the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The hon. gentleman referred to the carrying out of promises. That was in 1924. The year 1925 came. The hon. member will recall that in the election of that year the reformation of the Senate was a major matter; it was indeed the pre-eminent issue.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He continued in power until 1926, and then for a short interval he was out of power. He returned to power. The Senate was going to be reformed. A little later on he told Canada quite candidly how the reform came about, namely by substituting live Grits for dead Tories. That was the nature of the reformation. This went on, and then he entered into an arrangement whereby each of his appointees to the Senate was required to sign an undertaking as to what he would do after he got there.

Well, in 1947 Mr. King referred to the nature of those undertakings. I do not want to clutter up the record too much, but each and every one, as appointed to that body, was asked a question by Mr. King. He was asked for an assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as might be introduced by the Liberal administration. He went on to say that this assurance had been given by all who had accepted appointment to the Senate within the time mentioned. Well, that was the last we ever heard about that subject, except in subsequent elections. Now we are in the position where the House of Commons of Canada has spoken. Whatever arguments are advanced today—and they were advanced before, and I am not here for the purpose of answering them—this legislation is taxation legislation. Again I thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate; I wish to repeat the thanks. I am sorry he did not continue in law, because after all he has given his opinion—based not only on his experience as a law student but also as a former clerk of the privy council and as a minister of the crown—that this is taxation legislation. He has made that clear. This house passed it. The purpose in mind was the provision of jobs and the assurance that unnecessary delay would not take place in regard to a matter which has to a considerable extent crippled the productive and industrial capacity of Canada. I refer to the bringing into Canada of goods of a class, or so close to a class or kind, manufactured in Canada so as to permit evasion of the legislation which exists for the preservation of Canadian jobs in Canadian industry.

I am glad to see hon. gentlemen opposite on the side they are on this matter. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, "we did this and that, but those were days when things were serious." If I were to believe what hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to lead the Canadian people to believe, I would think we were living in one of the most serious economic days that Canada has ever seen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have been asking for action. Having listened just yesterday to the hon. member for Essex East, I wondered whether he could maintain silence. It is very difficult.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the most serious time in Canadian economic history.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I seem to remember another time that was fairly serious for the hon. member for Essex East, but I am not going into that now. I am pointing out this is a taxation measure. There were a few Liberals in the Senate who saw the situation as it was.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to raise a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West is rising on a point of order?

Mr. McIlraith: It is on the question of relevancy. Item No. 4 on today's order paper reads:

Consideration of the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-72.

Mr. Starr: Liberal closure as usual.

An hon. Member: Obstruction again.

Mr. McIlraith: If we can get some order I can state the point of order. The amendment made by the Senate deletes a certain sentence in the bill and substitutes the following:

Subject only to an appeal to the tariff board—

That is the essential part of the amendment. Now, as to relevance; surely the argument must relate to the amendment. Surely it cannot go over the rather interesting field that the Prime Minister has been discussing, however interesting that may be for discussion on another occasion when other subjects are before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I simply suggest that possibly the hon. gentleman was not here when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate dealt with the subject.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I think it would be helpful to get your guidance as to whether, on this particular amendment from the Senate, we can discuss the main bill and whether we can discuss the reform of the Senate and the powers of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if I read the motion before the house it will help to answer the question which has been raised in the point of order, namely the relevance of what has been said about the Senate. I did indicate this morning that in so far as the bill is concerned, the matter which is before the house for discussion is only the amendment to the bill made by the Senate. The motion which is before the house is broader than that; it calls for a message to be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house disagrees with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, for the following reasons: The amendment infringes the sole and undoubted rights of the commons to impose taxation; it alters the application of taxes, and interferes with public revenues. I think it puts directly in issue the right of the Senate to make the amendment which it has made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think I had arrived, when I was given a rest by reason of an interruption that had no basis, at the point of saying that the House of Commons dealt with all the arguments. Hon. gentlemen expressed themselves strongly. They talked for nine days. This reminds me also of the fact that the hon. gentleman who just finished speaking said we were getting to the point where they could not express themselves. Yet we had nine days of talk. There was a careful examination, very helpful and beneficial.

I can also say to the hon. gentleman that the newly found reformation on his part is welcome after the way in which freedom was crucified in this house by the closure imposed when those four hon. gentlemen over there were members of the government. I have made an error, Mr. Speaker; I included the hon. member for Laurier, who was absent at that time in better climes.

Mr. Chevrier: It would not be the first error you have made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I pointed out the fact that this bill was discussed and went over to the other place. A few members of the other place saw otherwise, but they decided that they were going to amend a taxation bill. Let me make this clear. We are not going to accept their amendment of this taxation bill.

Mr. Pearson: Down with the right of appeal.

Mr. Benidickson: To hell with the bill of rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have all got the same refrain, Mr. Speaker; the bill of rights. The thing they ridiculed they now found all their arguments upon.

Mr. Pearson: No, you have torn it up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to enter into conflict with them, I simply want to state the facts. Their leader in the Senate chose to immediately give an indication of what would be done. I say this, and I repeat it; that the question as to whether or not the Senate of Canada is going beyond that responsibility which it has discharged and can discharge with effectiveness under the constitution is a question that the Canadian people will have to decide sooner or later.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Deschatelets: We will meet you halfway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I notice that in response to that remark there was but one lone voice over there, and he used the top of his desk. Otherwise there was silence at that moment.

The other place has over and over again in the past four years made amendments that have been beneficial and helpful in the discharge of its joint legislative responsibility. The bills have come back here amended and we have accepted them. On one occasion, at least, the amendments were very close to the line, if not over the line. We made it clear there was no precedent being created thereby.

In this case this government takes its stand. We shall not, as the Minister of Finance has said, accept the authority or right of the Senate to make this amendment. I hope the house will agree with that stand. The bill will be sent back to that body. If they choose to stand on what they have done this legislation, beneficial to the Canadian people, legislation that has universally been requested, can only pass out of existence, for we on our side will not accept the amendment. In the days ahead we shall ascertain the constitutional rights of this country in the only way in which they can be ascertained.

I said a moment ago that that would be sooner or later. I remember so well another occasion when the challenges were given as to what was going to happen—"and soon"—so I say this. This is a major matter. It was discussed in detail for nine days. Whatever the demerits, every argument that could be advanced was advanced by the opposition, strongly and fearlessly. This house, if we are to maintain the Canadian constitution, cannot in taxation matters be subject to the untoward interruption and interference of the other house. I make that clear.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister a question. Is the position he takes that the government refuses to accept the restoration of the right of appeal from a decision of the minister, and is willing to stand or fall on that issue?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, even the Leader of the Opposition should understand clearly what I have said. There was none of that equivocation, and fence straddling, for which he has become famous.

Mr. Pearson: Will the Prime Minister now answer my question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is answered.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Prime Minister, I shall endeavour to address myself to the question before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I admit at once, of course, that I do not have the skill of the Prime Minister in the art of irrelevance and trying to throw up a smokescreen so as to mislead anyone who will read his remarks. If I had that skill, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I should not desire so to use it.

Mr. Walker: You are safe.

Mr. McIlraith: The interjection of the Minister of Public Works was one that I did not hear. Perhaps it is just as well that I did not hear it.

Mr. Walker: Do you want to hear it?

Mr. McIlraith: I should not like to have to answer my old classmate and colleague in the way in which he should be answered and dealt with.

The business before the house is consideration of the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff. As is indicated on the order paper, the amendment of the Senate is contained in June 15 Votes and Proceedings at page 671. I should like to read it in order to make my point. It goes on to say:

> A message was received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate had passed Bill C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, with the following amendment:—
> Page 1, lines 22 and 23: Strike out lines 22 and 23 and substitute therefor the following:
> "(3) Subject only to an appeal to the tariff board, the decision of which board shall be final and in respect of which appeal the provisions of section 44 of the Customs Act shall apply mutatis mutandis, the minister shall decide the following matters:".

It will be noted that the only significant change in that amendment is with reference to the right of appeal from the minister. The minister's power to decide is left unhampered.

The Minister of Finance this morning in dealing with this matter, when he set it out, indicated to the house that he proposed to reject the amendment of the Senate. It is quite the privilege of the house, if it wishes to do so, at any time to reject a proposed amendment of the Senate. But he went on to say this, and I think this motion should be read again to the house because it completely ignores any relationship to the amendment before us. As I said earlier, the Prime Minister seemed to me to completely ignore the whole matter before the house in an effort to find an issue where he could drag up, for some purpose of his own, the question of Senate reform. That is a subject that I might be very interested in discussing on a proper occasion. The motion now before the house, without notice, by the Minister of Finance is the following:

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house disagrees with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. C-72, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, for the following reason:
> The amendment infringes the sole and undoubted right of the Commons to impose taxation; it alters the application of taxes and interferes with the public revenue.

It is elementary, of course, that the Senate have no right at all, or that the House of Commons has the sole and undoubted right, to impose taxation. That is elementary. I do not know why that reference is put in this motion before us now. It is irrelevant. I perhaps should have pressed the point harder earlier when Your Honour was putting the question, but it seems to me that it has no relationship to the business before the house at all and that that part of the amendment is irrelevant to the subject matter before the house. If such commentary is permitted in a motion rejecting an amendment of this sort, the one before us dealing with the right of appeal, then of course we could add any other commentary. We might add some facetious commentary such as, for instance, that we did not like the names of the hon. senators or any other comments we wished to add. Neither the minister nor the Prime Minister made any attempt whatever to relate that part of the motion to the amendment proposed by the Senate. They glossed it over and talked about Senate reform and other matters that are not before us on this occasion.

The Minister of Finance did the house a real disservice in his argument when he made reference to the income tax amendments proposed by the Senate in 1959. As I recall it the situation was this. Since I did not know the line which the Minister of Finance was going to take in dealing with this Senate amendment I have not looked the matter up, but I think my recollection of it is correct. The house had proposed a change in section 71 of the Income Tax Act closing the class of companies that could be called foreign corporations, formerly called 4-K companies. I believe that was the terminology. The significance of that was that no companies incorporated in the future would do other than pay income tax or corporation tax in the ordinary way. That type of corporation with which we were concerned on that occasion, namely the foreign corporations, paid only a nominal type of tax. I think it was $100, but I am subject to correction as to the amount.

Mr. Benidickson: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, the house dealt with that taxation matter. The Senate proposed an amendment striking out that part of the provision in the amending bill.

Mr. Benidickson: The whole clause.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member for Ottawa West will allow me to interrupt him. There is a good deal of conversation going on, and I think a good deal of it comes from the corridor. If hon. members cannot moderate their voices I suggest that they go into the lobby, as it is very difficult to hear what is being said.

Mr. McIlraith: The Senate amendment on that occasion struck out the clause in the bill, and the effect of it was virtually to exempt from corporation taxation all companies of the type which I have described or which might be incorporated in the future.

Mr. Benidickson: And it changed the revenue.

Mr. McIlraith: In other words it related to the imposition of taxation on the companies with which we were concerned on that occasion, and there was no question at all but that they were seeking directly to undo the imposition of taxation imposed by this House of Commons. There can be no question in the mind of anyone so far as I know that they had no right to do that. Certainly I am not aware that anyone in this House of Commons suggested that they had the right to pass such a clause.

The matter before us today has no such connotation at all. It is a very narrow point. What the Senate chose to do is this. Although from reading the debates I believe that some of them did not like the legislation, they chose to accept any parts of the legislation that had any implications of taxation at all. They completely ignored that point, and they dealt only with the right of the taxpayer to be heard by way of appeal from the arbitrary decision of the minister. The essential part of the amendment is in adding the words:

Subject only to an appeal to the tariff board,—

They dealt with that one matter, and that alone. I ask the house—

Mr. Benidickson: In open court.

Mr. McIlraith: —where that infringes or has any relationship to taxation. Where does it deal with taxation? This resolution with which the house is now dealing goes on to give reasons for rejecting the amendment:

The amendment infringes the sole and undoubted right of the commons to impose taxation—

Is the Minister of Finance suggesting for one moment that an appeal to the tariff board from an arbitrary finding of a minister is imposing taxation? If he is, then he is suggesting—and this is implicit in his argument—that the minister concerned in making that decision acted not in accordance with the law and the definitions spelled out in a statute, but that he broke the law and did something under his arbitrary powers that was not in accordance with the statute.

Mr. Pearson: That is the issue.

Mr. McIlraith: Then the minister asks us to reject the Senate amendment for the following additional reason:

—it alters the application of taxes—

The application of taxes is clearly set out in the bill and in the act; every detail of the application of taxes is set out there. The Senate has not dealt with any aspect of the bill relating to the application of taxes. The only conclusion that can be drawn from the minister's motion is that the minister is suggesting that an appeal to the tariff board deciding what the law was in its application might show that the minister had broken the law and the tariff board had brought him back; that the appeal authority under the provisions of the act was altering the application of taxes. Surely the minister is not going to ask this house to believe that the whole purport of this legislation, the whole purport of giving this final right of decision to the minister was so that the minister could act arbitrarily outside the legislation. Yet that is what his motion means.

Then the minister argued that taking an appeal from the minister's decision to the tariff board would interfere with the public revenue. If the tariff board decision upheld the minister it would be difficult to see how the right of appeal would interfere with the revenue. But if the tariff board overruled the minister because the minister had made a wrong finding in fact, or had misapplied the law, would that be interfering with the public revenue, or would that be interfering with a wrongful action taken by a minister contrary to the law enacted by this House of Commons? That is the point at issue here. In other words, the minister's reasons as given in the motion which is before us are completely specious and irrelevant to the rejection of the amendment to this bill received from the Senate.

Mr. Pearson: Another smokescreen.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a complete non sequitur and is not to be related to the Senate amendment at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just to hide the Coyne issue.

Mr. McIlraith: My seatmate gives a good reason as to why it was done. I would perhaps be called to order, Mr. Speaker, if I were to elaborate on why it was done. It is obviously done to divert the attention of the House of Commons from the real issue.

Mr. Pearson: Hear, hear; for no other reason.

Mr. McIlraith: The real reason for the motion before us is whether the Senate amendment giving a right of appeal to the tariff board from the minister's arbitrary decision will be accepted or rejected by this house. That is the real issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): To divert attention from the Coyne affair.

Mr. McIlraith: This attempt to drag in all these extraneous matters is one that I am afraid has been used all too often these days by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. Perhaps I had better not enter into the debate of yesterday, when we saw the Minister of Finance struggling hard for what many of us thought were diversionary tactics.

Mr. Pearson: He thinks he has got a reprieve.

Mr. McIlraith: In answer to this point—

Mr. Benidickson: The fishing is not any better.

Mr. McIlraith: In regard to the matter before the house today the Prime Minister chose—and I regret that he has left the house now, because I would have liked him to be here when I deal with this—to deal with an order in council passed just at the conclusion of the last great war, at a time when this country had many hundreds of thousands of troops in other parts of the world. We were looking forward to bringing them back here. They had fought a very long, hard war. I need not remind hon. members of this house about that; a great many hon. members are familiar with that in a personal way.

That order in council was dragged into this debate today by the Prime Minister as a red herring. That order in council which was passed related to a matter of the security of this nation having to do with a world spy ring having been discovered, and an urgent attempt being made to deal with that situation. The issue was whether or not the war was over; whether we were immediately likely to be engaged in another war. That matter concerned our whole security.

Just before I came into the chamber at 11 o'clock this morning I had delivered to my office the text of the speech which the Prime Minister made only the day before yesterday—

Mr. Benidickson: To the Kiwanis clubs.

Mr. McIlraith: —in which he devoted a great part of his time, practically the whole of it, to the serious threat of communism at this time, and made all kinds of strong remarks concerning the leadership of Mr. Khrushchev. I could not believe my ears, knowing the substance of that speech, when I heard—

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the rule that my learned friend has just invoked as to what is in order and what is not, is he not at the moment hoist on his own petard? This is completely irrelevant.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why don't you go back and build a bridge?

Mr. Walker: Why doesn't my hon. friend from Essex East sometimes speak with even a kernel of truth?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would you kindly contain the Minister of Public Works and send him back to digging ditches.

Mr. Chevrier: He makes himself ridiculous.

Mr. Pearson: He has never dug a ditch in his life.

Mr. Speaker: I shall keep in mind the point of order as the hon. member proceeds.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Public Works was not in the chamber when the Prime Minister was dealing with this order in council. I merely want to contain my remarks within the limits of the point raised by the Prime Minister, who raised this matter in some illogical way that I could not understand as a reason for rejecting this amendment from the Senate. I could not see the relevance of the two. I did not understand what that 1945 order in council about which the Prime Minister spoke had to do with the right of appeal to the tariff board and the arbitrary decision of the minister. The Prime Minister was permitted to make reference to it and I thought I should be permitted the same latitude in replying to the argument he raised in regard to that order in council.

The Prime Minister was regrettably very careful not to give the house the subject matter with which that order in council was concerned or the situation in which the house found itself at that time. As hon. members who were here in those years will recall, the War Measures Act had regrettably to be used during the five years from 1940 to 1945. I think it was not other than distasteful to hon. members that the circumstances at the time made that practice necessary, but the point I was seeking to make was the complete irrelevance of the Prime Minister's attempt to relate that order in council to the question which is before us. The matter of the reform of the Senate is also, of course, completely irrelevant to the point before us now. The message from the Senate contains a simple amendment having to do with the right of a citizen or, perhaps I should more correctly say, a taxpayer, to appeal to an administrative board which has grown up over the years and the authority of which has been so extended that it is now a court of record. It has to do with the taxpayer's right to an assurance that the taxation law as applied to him will be applied in accordance with the statutes of this land. That is all this amendment contains—nothing more, and nothing less.

The Prime Minister would have us believe there is some greater justice in having the taxation law of the land applied by the minister alone without right of appeal and without his being obliged to give any reasons for the decisions he takes in cases of this type where matters of fact have to be determined. The Minister of Finance, in the course of remarks which were singularly brief for him, went on to give as the reason for the position taken by the government the greater speed and efficiency which would result. In the argument which he addressed to this point the hon. gentleman used language which was identical with the language used in this country in the late 1930's by those persons who were apologizing for the fascist regime in Italy. I could not help but recall how many times some people in this country—fortunately, a minority, not a majority—used as an apology for that regime of that day the fact that they got the trains running on time. That was the theme of the small part of the argument put forward by the Minister of Finance which was relevant this morning, the only real reason he gave for not wanting taxpayers to have the right of appeal to the tariff board.

The Prime Minister, in his concluding remarks, seemed to adopt and approve this argument used by the Minister of Finance, as indeed, I would expect him to have done, but I point out to the Prime Minister that mere efficiency or ease of administration is not the test when you are applying onerous taxation to the citizens of this country. Surely something better than that should be the test.

For my part, I must say it is a matter of regret that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) is not with us today. I wish to express my personal regret at his illness and his absence. I wish he were here, and I hope his colleagues will convey my regrets to him. I, for one, have never been convinced in the course of this legislation that the Minister of National Revenue knew that this provision was in the bill in the first instance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh. He stood up in this house and supported it.

Mr. Lambert: Surely the hon. member does not believe that.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, I can speak for myself. The hon. member for Edmonton West can interject as much as he wishes and speak as much as he wishes. I shall always protect his right to speak. I have that feeling in any event. I believe that had the cabinet had the benefit of the advice of the Minister of National Revenue on this measure since it has come back from the Senate the message we would now be sending back to the Senate would be one of concurrence in the proposed amendment. That is my assessment of the man and, as I say, I regret he has unfortunately been ill, and unable to give the benefit of his views to the cabinet on this point since it was dealt with by the Senate.

I know the Minister of Finance has a somewhat different outlook on these things. Once he has put a provision in a bill, good bad or indifferent, he will stand by it no matter how wrong it is shown to be in the course of debates in this house or by an amendment from the other place. I regret that the minister takes this attitude. I regret, also, that the Prime Minister in seeking to deal with the issue before us at this time chose to deal with many side issues which are interesting and, indeed, important, but which are irrelevant to this particular motion. The rest of the right hon. gentleman's arguments had mainly to do with personalities. I have sought in my observations to steer clear of personalities and to relate my remarks directly to the point of issue. I, for my part, must support the right of the taxpayers of this country to appeal from the arbitrary decision of the minister to the tariff board. This was a right which they had enjoyed. It was taken away by this House of Commons, and I wish to see it restored to them.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): I am sure everyone in this house appreciates the kind reference which the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) has made to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). We all regret that he is not here today. I think that if he were here he would give an answer to the observation which the hon. member for Ottawa West made about his attitude in regard to this bill. I think the hon. member has misrepresented the opinion which the Minister of National Revenue would have expressed on this matter.

The hon. member for Ottawa West seems unable to appreciate the nature of the legislation which is before us. He has regarded this as a very simple matter. All we have here, he says, is a simple amendment which is going to protect the interests of the taxpayers. Well, who are the representatives of the taxpayers of this country? Are we not their representatives? Have we not been elected as members of this house to be their representatives? Any decision which is made here is made in the interest of the taxpayers.

Mr. Chevrier: You would not think so.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member has said that this is simply an amendment granting a right of appeal to the tariff board. But the hon. member has chosen to overlook a rule of this house which was established when Canada became a nation in 1867. I am referring to standing order 63 which was read by Your Honour:

All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house, as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

Is this present bill, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, a bill which grants aid and supply to Her Majesty? Anyone who listened to the historical references in the speech of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) would certainly have thought that this was a bill to grant aid and supply to Her Majesty, because he spoke of the arbitrary power which was given to the minister to collect taxes and to alter taxes.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister permit a question arising out of his reference to standing order 63? Does he suggest that the Senate amendment respecting the right of appeal to the tariff board is related to such grants as are the subject of standing order 63, or is an aid or supply within the meaning of standing order 63?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think anyone with a fair mind reading standing order 63 which I will read again for the hon. member—

Mr. McIlraith: I have it before me.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member says he has it there; perhaps he would look at it. It reads:

All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons—

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to go into detail to explain for the benefit of the hon. member the meaning of the words "sole gift of the House of Commons".

Mr. McIlraith: That is elementary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Standing order 63 then continues as follows:

—and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house—

This bill began with the house. The standing order then continues:

—as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions—

What is the condition here? The condition here is that it shall be decided by the minister, whose decision shall be final.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Hon. members opposite do not agree with me.

Mr. Pearson: That is the way all tyrants begin.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You should know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What meaning does the Leader of the Opposition ascribe to the words "limitations and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate"? If they are not alterable by the Senate then the Senate has no power to alter them. Has the Senate altered them in this instance? Yes; for we have before us today an amendment which is in essence an alteration of the bill granting aids and supplies to Her Majesty. No one can question the fact that a bill dealing with customs tariffs is a bill granting aids and supplies to Her Majesty.

The hon. member for Ottawa West is probably as familiar as anyone in this house with the fact that the Customs Tariff involves hundreds of items and deals practically entirely with the collection of taxes through customs and exise and by other means. Therefore, the amendment to this bill is precisely that which is not allowable because this is a bill which is not alterable by the Senate.

The question which we are concerned with is not merely a question of whether a right is being refused to taxpayers to prevent them from appealing a decision of the minister to the tariff board but is a question as to whether we are going to acquiesce in an amendment by the other place which it has no right to make. That is the real question before us today.

If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Ottawa West think that this is a bill dealing with taxation, and I believe they are right, they must also agree that it is unalterable by the Senate. The hon. member for Ottawa West believes that it is a taxation bill because, to use his own words as I wrote them down—

Mr. McIlraith: I think perhaps I can help the minister. The point I made was that the bill in toto is not before us but only the amendment dealing with the right of appeal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I beg your pardon?

Mr. McIlraith: I suggested that it was only the amendment to the bill that was before us and argued that the whole bill was not now before us.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member also stated that this was something affecting the taxpayers. I suggest if it affects the taxpayers it does so in respect to a matter of taxation; that is, taxes they must pay. I think the hon. member will agree with that, because if there is any complaint on the part of taxpayers it has to do with the taxes which they must pay being unfair and they, therefore, want to appeal to the tariff board to make it right. That being correct, there is no doubt, using the hon. member's own argument, that this bill deals with taxation. I think it is unnecessary for me to argue any further along that line.

To reinforce my suggestion that this is not unusual, I point out that there are hundreds of provisions in public statutes granting to ministers discretionary powers more or less of this type.

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was the minister for citizenship and immigration for three or four years and I am sure that no one knows better than he the discretionary powers he possessed while acting in that capacity. The hon. member for Ottawa West, who was the parliamentary assistant to the minister of defence production, knows full well the powers that the minister of defence production possesses. Who in this country has ever possessed greater powers than the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe?

Mr. Deschatelets: Are you arguing against that?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, no, the hon. member does not follow my argument.

Mr. Deschatelets: Oh, yes, I do.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to point out—

Mr. Chevrier: It is not even an argument.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) says this is not even an argument, the fact that many ministers have discretionary powers.

Mr. Chevrier: I was referring to your speech as a whole as not being even an argument.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suppose when the hon. member for Laurier was the minister of transport he had many powers which he could exercise and did exercise without there being granted any right of appeal from his decisions.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know of any.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Certainly the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) under the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff Act has many other powers apart from this one given by this bill from which there is no appeal.

Mr. Lambert: There are 64.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am informed by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue that there are 64 different powers which have been in existence from which there is no appeal.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister permit a question? Is the logic of his argument that whenever possible we should reduce and take away these rights of appeal just because there are 64 instances which exist where there is no right of appeal?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, that is not my argument.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, what is your argument.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am trying to point out some of the inconsistencies in the arguments presented by hon. members of the official opposition. I am attempting to show that we are not doing something quite original and out of keeping with the history of this country as has been suggested by those hon. members. No one knows better than those hon. gentlemen who were members of the previous ministry, that these powers have existed, because some of them and their colleagues exercised these powers when they held office.

Mr. Pearson: Is that your excuse?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, sir. The Leader of the Opposition knows very well that no one would attempt to alter all the powers and discretions that are given to various ministers, some of which are very necessary for the administration of the country. That is the reason this amendment was put into the Customs Tariff. That is, it is considered necessary at this time.

Mr. Pearson: But the right of appeal existed for years.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The House of Commons saw fit to pass this bill and the members of the other place felt they had the power to alter it.

Mr. Pearson: No, the power to put back the right of appeal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The House of Commons is now being asked whether the other place has the right to alter it and whether this house is going to maintain the rights and privileges, as well as duties, established as part of the constitution of this House of Commons and, therefore, of this country, in 1867 as contained in standing order 63.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise because I feel that the Solicitor General (Mr. Browne), and I am sure not intentionally, misrepresented what I said. I have the words I actually used and feel that I should be permitted under the rules to set the record straight.

The Solicitor General gave the impression that I suggested that the amendment we are now considering was in itself a taxing statute. What I said was that this whole bill was a normal taxing statute. I continued, and these are the precise words I used, to say that there are sharp differences in the house about whether this bill is even good for the state, but that is not at issue, as Your Honour properly pointed out. We are not concerned now with whether or not this taxing statute in itself shall prevail because it is going to prevail. We are concerned with whether or not, in the interpretation of this measure, the determination of what articles shall be taxable, and at what rates, shall be done in the open with a right of appeal such as has existed for a long time, or whether that right shall, in defiance of the bill of rights, be taken away. That seems to be the sole issue here.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to indulge in any technical or legal hairsplitting on this issue. We in this group simply oppose this issue on the basis of what is in the best interest of the people. I am a simple country man searching for the truth in the dense political fog which has been created by repeated government errors in recent days. I rise to express our opposition to this very unique and, I would say, unusual resolution, and to express our concern over the unreasonable things that have occurred in recent days.

The second paragraph of this resolution simply diverts attention from the principle of an appeal on, from our point of view, a very trivial basis indeed.

I listened with interest, as I always do, to the orchidaceous rhetoric of the Prime Minister and the speech delivered in such a dramatic manner which made us all feel as though there was a crisis in it. Anyway, it was obvious from the Prime Minister's remarks that he has clearly indicated he refuses to accept the amendment proposed by the Senate that restores the right of appeal to the Canadian people from the decision of a minister or of officials. We think that right of appeal is fundamental. It has been mentioned on a number of occasions by the spokesmen of the official opposition and by the members of this group. In our opinion on this occasion the Senate has performed a service for the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen of the other place have protected the rights of the Canadian people in, shall I say, taking this second look and finding out the weaknesses in the legislation that was sent over to their house. That legislation received a great deal of attention in this house. Fears were expressed during the rather lengthy and at times heated debate that this was a wrong principle to establish in legislation and the Senate has vindicated that opinion as expressed by a good number of members of the opposition during that debate.

I judge from the Prime Minister's remarks that he challenges the house to oppose his will. This is the way I take it. From the very emphasis he used and the dramatic way in which he brought the matter to the attention of the house there was no question but that he challenges the house to oppose him. I did not sense in his speech the question of a great principle. The Prime Minister challenged the house to oppose his will. You could see all the power vested in the Prime Minister and all the determination of one self-willed man to impose his will on this House of Commons. Members of this group accept this challenge and welcome an immediate appeal to the highest court of the land, which is the people.

An hon. Member: Let's go home and settle this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The election is not going to be held today.

Mr. Herridge: I am distinctly under that impression, Mr. Speaker, and possibly not next month. The Prime Minister blows this thing up as a great issue. You could see in his attitude and in his remarks that he thought to himself, now, I have got something that will befog the minds of the Canadian people. This is an issue; this is a smokescreen; this is something I can take pleasure in presenting. I can see him rampaging around the country talking about the members of the opposition disregarding the rights of parliament.

Mr. Ricard: True.

Mr. Herridge: We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that no one was more vociferous in days past with respect to reform of the Senate and no one has said less since he was elected to office with respect to the suggested reform of the Senate than the Prime Minister. This is not a major issue. What are the issues in this country if the government should go to the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member is not going to answer his own question because it would be out of order.

Mr. Herridge: I am using a counter-argument as against this being the issue. In doing so I think I must propose what are the issues.

Mr. Drysdale: Let us keep on one side of the case.

Mr. Herridge: The issues are not this one. The issues are unemployment, markets, health insurance, security and justice for old persons. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wishes to go to the country at this time the Canadian people will not be misled by the presentation of what is obviously an expedient, a manufactured and synthetic issue. Therefore we on this side of the house, say, let the people decide now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this debate has exemplified on the part of the opposition some quite extraordinary features but they are quite obvious, and I shall not detain the house long in speaking of them.

Hon. members must have been conscious of a curdling of their blood here today, Mr. Speaker, as they listened to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate tell them that the day of freedom had passed and we are now under the rule of tyranny. The hon. member for Kootenay West was just talking about blowing something up into a great issue. If there was any blowing up done in this house it was done by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in what he had to say about the effects of this measure. He was talking about the danger of the bill in question if passed, without the benefit of the amendment introduced by the Senate. This house has dealt with this matter, Mr. Speaker. It was before the house on nine different days of the present session. On April 18 the house gave this bill second reading without amendment by a vote of 141 to 34, and on April 19 the measure was passed on third reading on division, a division not called by the Liberals but by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He called out "on division" and that is the only record there is of a division of opinion in the house on the third reading of the bill.

But the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate curdled our blood by talking about "dark deeds in dark places". Well, I think his following comments indicated that probably he knew more about the subject of dark deeds in dark places than any other member of this house. What are those dark deeds which he fears, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the enactment of this measure without the Senate amendment? Without traversing ground that is already so familiar, may I say that this measure simply follows well established precedents in this house. Hon. members opposite were not lying awake at nights as they dreamed about the loss of freedom when they were in power. Is freedom passing in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is passing here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is tyranny overcoming freedom there, Mr. Speaker? I have already drawn to the attention of the house that under similar legislation of the United Kingdom power is given to the treasury in just such cases without any right of appeal. Here are the notes issued by the board of trade and commissioners of customs and excise under the Import Duties Act. This is the official note:

> Under the Import Duties Act, 1958, protective duties are normally chargeable on imported machinery in order to protect United Kingdom machinery manufacturers.

And then they say this about duty free admission:

> Section 6 of the 1958 act and paragraph 1(b) of the fourth schedule thereto provide that the treasury may, on the recommendation of the board of trade, direct that payment shall not be required of any duty chargeable under section 1 of the 1958 act on particular importations of machinery,—

Some exceptions are set out and then the following words appear:

> —if similar articles are not for the time being procurable in the United Kingdom.

The decision in that matter is not subject to appeal. It is a decision made by the treasury.

Further on in this document, Mr. Speaker, we find the following:

> The similarity of machines for the purposes of compliance with the statutory condition referred to in paragraph 1(b) is judged primarily in relation to the product or effect and the efficiency with which it is produced. The appearance, size, shape, method of producing the given product or effect and the cost of machines are not regarded as relevant. To justify a recommendation for remission of the protective duty, it must be shown that the foreign machine has a definite and marked superiority in performance over any comparable machine procurable in the United Kingdom.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are decisions made by the treasury of the United Kingdom, just as decisions under this measure are to be made by the minister of national revenue. This is described as ushering in the rule of tyranny. Well, Mr. Speaker, if any hon. member's judgment has gone so completely astray, has turned to such irrational lengths then he must, if he is to be consistent, say that tyranny has come in the United Kingdom.

Hon. members opposite do so much dislike to be reminded that there are in this country statutes, most of which were enacted in the days when hon. members opposite were in the government, conferring upon ministers and particularly upon the minister of national revenue just such necessary powers as this present bill proposes to confer upon the minister, and without appeal. These are powers without appeal.

I hold in my hand a list of these statutory measures, measures passed by this parliament conferring upon, in this case the minister of national revenue, powers by the dozens that are not subject to appeal, and practically all these statutes were enacted when a Liberal government was in power. Here they are, Mr. Speaker: The first is the Customs Act, and here we have amendments running back over these recent years. They read: the minister may prescribe; the minister may prescribe; the minister may determine value. Here, we are back in 1921 and we find that the minister may revoke a custom house broker's licence; 1951, the minister may appoint a commissioner, and so on it goes. In 1927 we find this: the minister may make regulations.

Then, there is the Customs Tariff, the statute which is now being amended; in 1948, the minister may determine the tariff or surtax; 1948, the minister may authorize collections of special duties; 1931, the minister may dispose of prohibited goods; 1950, the minister may apply specific duties to fruits and vegetables; 1931, the minister may make marking regulations.

Here is the Excise Act, and in 1934, the minister may refuse to issue a licence; 1934, the minister may prescribe; 1934, the minister may refuse a licence; 1948, the minister may require additional data, and so on it goes, the minister may prescribe; the minister may revoke penalties. Throughout all these statutes, there is no right of appeal. Practically every one of these powers was conferred by parliament on the minister of national revenue when a Liberal government was in office. Are they going to say that there was a crisis in every year when these statutes were passed by parliament conferring these powers upon the minister without appeal? I suppose it is futile to look for anything in the way of rational argument or consistency on the part of hon. members opposite.

Let hon. members recall what happened in 1947. These great apostles of freedom, these defenders of parliament, who are they, Mr. Speaker? They are the people who in November, 1947, did not even wait for parliament to be called but announced the budget over the radio and proceeded to impose tariff embargoes and other imposts by radio without parliament even being in session. The Leader of the Opposition was not then a member of the government. However, the hon. member for Laurier was a member of that government, as was the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was then serving in his other political capacity as secretary of the cabinet, and was doing things in secret, as we were told this morning.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the minister does not wish to be inaccurate. I was not the secretary of the cabinet at that time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I apologize for having advanced the hon. member prematurely. He had not even got that far at that time.

In 1947, they proceeded to apply licences. They cut off a lot of imports, just by order in council, and in many cases nobody was permitted to import except under licence. Of course, the power to issue a licence was conferred upon the minister. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the kind of conferment of power that they view now with such stricken horror was conferred at that time upon the minister of finance. Was there any right of appeal provided from the decision of the minister of finance? There was not. Here, in case after case we have a measure applicable not simply to a handful of commodities but literally hundreds and hundreds of commodities, and there was no right to import except where the minister, in his sole discretion, directed that a permit might be granted. We are asked now to take seriously these roars and thunders from hon. members opposite in their hollow pretence that now the foundations of freedom are being shaken by this measure because it does not provide that in three simple respects in which it is so appropriate, proper and necessary that a decision be made by the minister, there is being provided no right of appeal to the tariff board. Did you ever hear a more hollow presentation than was made today by hon. members opposite on this subject?

Then, in 1948, parliament passed the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. It received assent on March 24, 1948. Here we find a Liberal government asking parliament to confer on a minister powers like these. Section 3: The minister may issue, vary or revoke permits for the import of such goods. Was there a right of appeal? No, there was not. Section 4 says that no permit shall be issued for the import of goods listed in schedule I, unless in the opinion of the minister, etc. Was there any right of appeal from the decision of the minister? No, there was not. Freedom must have been tottering that day, Mr. Speaker.

Then, section 6 states that, subject to this act and the regulations the minister may (a) prescribe the procedure, (b) prescribe the forms, and do all kinds of things such as (d) authorize persons in his behalf to do things. Was any right of appeal provided there? No, there was no right of appeal.

Let us look at section 12 and compare that with these protestations of hon. members opposite of their undying fidelity to the principles of the bill of rights. Section 12 provides that:

> "Where a person is charged with an offence under this act, if it is established that the said person did any act for which a permit is required under this act, it shall not be necessary to establish that the person charged did not possess a permit and the burden of proof that he possessed the necessary permit shall be upon the person charged."

Well, freedom must have been shaken to its foundations that day.

Perhaps I have said enough on this subject. I pass from my comments on this aspect of the matter, Mr. Speaker, only for the purpose of reading one out of many comments that might be chosen at this point. I quote:

> The budget proposals changing definitions of "made in Canada" will permit the manufacture here of many products now imported and will give our manufacturers a better relative position against foreign competition.

This sounds like a very sensible and fair observation as to the effect of this measure. It is interesting to know who says this. This statement appears, if you please, in a pamphlet issued by the North American Fund of Canada Limited and it is entitled, "Annual Report to Shareholders, December 31, 1960". You will observe that this annual report was issued very shortly after the introduction of the supplementary budget. Then, we find a message to the shareholders signed by the chairman and president, and it is this message to the shareholders from which I have read this particular extract. But, Mr. Speaker, if you are interested further and happen to turn the page you would see, under the list of officers and directors, that among those is "A. Bruce Matthews, vice-president and director". Mr. Matthews is a very distinguished citizen and a former president of the national Liberal federation. But, Mr. Speaker, I hope you would not stop your reading there because if you were interested to go a little further and happened to read the names appearing under the list of other directors you would find there, to your shocked amazement I am sure, the name "Hon. Lionel Chevrier, Member of Parliament".

Mr. Chevrier: Thanks for the advertisement.

An hon. Member: Look and see how he blushes now.

Mr. Chevrier: Not in the least.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I turn to the other point. I was not a little surprised to hear hon. members opposite in both the old and new wings of the opposition say what they said today in relation to the fact that the amendment before us was proposed by the Senate. If one had reached the point of looking for nothing resembling consistency on the part of hon. members opposite, then, of course, there would be no occasion for surprise. But as to those who think hon. members of this house made in 1959 bold statements of their principles and positions on such matters, surely we are entitled to be somewhat surprised when they take a complete somersault in July, 1961.

Mr. Speaker, this is a money bill. It is a money bill under every definition of the rule respecting the prerogatives of the House of Commons in such matters. This is a money bill within the meaning of rule 63 of the standing orders of this house. This is a money bill within all of the declarations in relation to the prerogatives of this house in such matters.

We shall not be lightly misled, I am sure, in this house by the suggestion that was made, I believe by the hon. member for Ottawa West, that there was something different about the bill in 1959, on which this house took a stand in relation to this principle. I say again that in relation to this principle there is no difference whatsoever between the issue that was presented to this house in July, 1959, and the issue that is presented to it today by this Senate amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: On July 18, 1959, having regard to what is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings of this House of Commons and the minister's remarks on that day recorded in Hansard, will the minister not say that there was involved there an important difference in the ways and means in regard to the income of the crown and the taxation right of the crown on a taxpayer?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say certainly not, Mr. Speaker. There is no difference whatsoever in relation to the principle at stake on this amendment today. What we had before us then was a bill to amend the Income Tax Act; and, as I pointed out this morning, the amendment did not relate to any clause respecting a rate of taxation; not at all.

Mr. Benidickson: No; to an imposition or not on a taxpayer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was an amendment about closing a particular class that was created by one section of the bill which did not for this purpose name rates. This was a question of closing a class of corporation and of saying that no more corporations should be permitted to qualify for that particular treatment. Was that any more of a money bill than the one we have before us today? Of course it was not, Mr. Speaker. The thing that determines what is a money bill or determines the application of the principle here involved to the amendment, is whether the main bill is in its nature a taxing statute. Does it relate to money? Is it a fiscal measure? Does it bring into effect any question pertaining to the balance of ways and means? You have these determinations, Mr. Speaker, that it is not simply appropriation acts or simply estimates that are deemed to be money bills of this house for that purpose. It is the taxing statutes, measures like the Income Tax Act as in 1959 or the Estate Tax Act as in 1958. These are money measures for this purpose; and bills to amend such statutes, are money bills and there can be no escape from that fundamental position. It is a well established position in the jurisprudence of this house.

Mr. Peters: Try to sell that somewhere else.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will come to hon. members opposite in a moment. What did we find in July, 1959? Mr. Speaker, when we dealt with this subject on July 18, 1959, it fell to my lot to present to the house an amendment similar in certain respects to the one now under debate or at least a message to the Senate similar to the one now under debate. There were more clauses. The third one contains these words:

> The said amendment of the Senate infringes the sole and undoubted right of the Commons to impose taxation; it alters the application of taxes and interferes with the public revenue.

Mr. Benidickson: But this one does not involve a change in revenues.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was adopted by this house on July 18, 1959. What was said on that occasion? Both on that occasion in my own remarks and in the remarks of other hon. members on that occasion reference was made to some of the great statements of the past. In his speech on July 14, the Prime Minister had occasion to refer to remarks made in this house by some of the leading authorities of earlier years. He drew attention to what had been said on September 7, 1917. Here is what the Speaker of that day said:

> On a previous occasion when this motion was under consideration, two points of order were taken by the hon. the leader of the opposition, (1) that the Senate has no power to amend a money bill, and, (2) if the Senate makes such an amendment, in view of rule 78, the house is bound to insist on its privileges and reject the amendment.

The leader of the opposition who is referred to by the Speaker in this passage is none other than Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Speaker proceeds:

> As to the first point, it is beyond question that, in view of section 53 of the British North America Act, bills appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost must originate in the House of Commons; and there is no doubt that the Senate has neither power to increase the tax or impost nor to change the incidence of the burden of any such tax or impost in any such bill originating in this house;—

And so on.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will accept questions when I have finished if the hon. member does not mind.

Mr. Benidickson: Very well.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then further, the Speaker had something to say and Sir Wilfrid Laurier commented on the ruling of the Speaker, and asked that the remarks of the Speaker be not simply a matter of record but should be made a part of the decision of the house. That was the doctrine that was honoured by the Liberal party. In bygone years my predecessor, Mr. Ilsley, was very punctilious in his insistence on the prerogatives of the House of Commons in this matter. In 1941 when the house agreed to accept an amendment he was very careful to insist that the following should be made a part of the decision of the house. He moved:

> That the said amendment be now read the second time and concurred in; but that this house, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other house, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges but the waiver of such rights and privileges is not to be drawn into a precedent; and, further, that this house agrees to the incorporation in this bill—

Et cetera. Mr. Ilsley was very careful to insist upon that assertion of the rights of the house.

We come along to July 18, 1959. As to the nature of the measure, I simply observe that it was a measure comparable in all respects, for this purpose, with what we have before us today.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister read Votes and Proceedings of that day at page 750?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on September 7, 1917. This is the great voice of liberalism, Sir Wilfrid Laurier; not the hollow voices of the liberalism of 1961. He said, as quoted on page 6402 of Hansard:

It is a well-known principle that the upper chamber can reject any bill, even though it deals with financial matters, that has been passed by this house. The Senate can reject the supply bill; it can reject a bill adopted by the committee of ways and means of this house, but it cannot amend such bills.

This principle has been affirmed over and over again. Mr. Speaker, can you find a clearer statement anywhere? That was the great voice of liberalism in 1917, but that voice has been forgotten; it is not heard today by hon. members opposite over the clamour and roar of lesser voices. On that occasion the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) chose to make some remarks following those which it had been my honour to make. They appear on the same page. He almost went so far as to congratulate the government for the strong stand it had taken in rejecting the amendment proposed by the Senate. He said:

We are therefore naturally gratified that the government has taken this position and we will support it.

That was the Leader of the Opposition on July 18, 1959, Mr. Speaker. I do remember, when that address to the Senate was adopted unanimously that day, the congratulations that were extended to the government by hon. members of the C.C.F. party. I can well remember the spirited applause that some of them extended to the government because we would not yield or compromise on this principle that the Senate cannot amend a money bill.

I was shocked today to hear the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) making compromise with the principles of the past. I was more shocked by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), for whom many of us in this house have great respect, this afternoon making compromise with a sound and well established principle.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

These hon. members have been greatly misled since the days when they took their stand on principle in 1959.

Mr. Deschatelets: Let us go to the people with it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this points to the sorry departure of hon. members opposite from the positions they were prepared to take when they were on sound ground and stood on principles. Do not take my word for this principle—

Mr. Martin (Timmins): You are right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —on which the C.C.F. stood, Mr. Speaker. Here are the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), then the leader of the C.C.F. party. I quote from page 5980 of Hansard of July 14. Here he was chastising the Liberal party in this house for the weakness of its position on this question. He said:

I do not think we can emphasize too strongly that with regard to money bills it should be the sole right of the House of Commons not only to originate them but in fact to have them passed in their original form.

Mr. Benidickson: But there is no money involved in this amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton: That was the hon. member for Assiniboia in 1959, standing on principle. Today we have the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Kootenay West leading themselves, and we do not know yet how many others, into error because they are prepared under these circumstances to depart from a sound principle. Mr. Speaker, the government stands on the principle that the Senate cannot amend money bills.

Mr. Denis: Give us an election on that.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In two speeches the Minister of Finance has indicated that he—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let him put the question.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance has referred to the debate on July 18, 1959 which he gives as a precedent on this question. He says the conflict between the House of Commons and the Senate at that time was similar to that presented to us today. I wish to direct—

Mr. Starr: Question.

Mr. Habel: A "starred" question?

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to ask the Minister of Finance this question. The minister said today that the exemption of foreign corporations did not involve a change in revenues and therefore we had there a proposal from the Senate which did not in any way involve a change in revenues. I wonder whether the minister has read what he said at that time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Precisely, Mr. Speaker. This is what I said on July 18. It is to be found in Hansard at page 6401. Here I was speaking about the amendment that was then being debated:

> It was made clear that this clause 19 was not introduced into the bill with the object in view of enlarging the revenues. It was introduced with a view to abridging what was regarded as a discrimination or favoured position enjoyed by foreign business corporations under the Income Tax Act here. In the light of the views expressed in the house, the government is pleased to reaffirm, re-emphasize and reassert the principle that money bills passed by this house may not be amended in the other place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him one short question. Was the final determination by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) introduced into this bill for the purpose of enlarging the revenues?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment was introduced—that is, the whole bill we are speaking of now—

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —for the purpose of changing a definition in the act which has a bearing upon the interpretation of some 75 items in the Customs Tariff. This has been made clear. Hon. members opposite, in the nine days this measure was before the house this session, kept telling us that this gave the minister power to determine rates, rates of customs tariff, and now they are shilly-shallying and pretending that this has no resemblance to a money bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister answer my question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: More evasion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1961 not exceeding $178,900,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1962; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $76,800,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $76,800,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system; and to provide further in respect of the refunding of matured, maturing and callable obligations of the said company, for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $230,000,000 in lieu of the present amount of $200,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the resolution now presented is that which annually precedes the introduction of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act. In accordance with the practice followed since 1952, the 1961 act will again include the financing of all capital expenditures whether authorized in the current year's act or in earlier financing and guarantee acts.

The bill is intended to accomplish six main purposes. The first is to authorize the Canadian National Railways to incur capital expenditures not exceeding $178,900,000 during the 1961 calendar year.

The second is to authorize the company to make, prior to July 1, 1962, such capital expenditures as may be necessary to discharge obligations incurred under the 1961 act, but which become due for payment after January 1, 1962, as long as these expenditures do not exceed $76 million.

The third purpose served by the bill is to authorize the railway company to enter into contracts prior to July 1, 1962, for new equipment and for general additions and conversions where payment will come due after the calendar year 1961, provided that such amounts do not exceed $44 million.

In addition to these three purposes, all of which are similar to those of previous years' acts it is necessary this year to introduce three new provisions pending a review of the Canadian National Railways capital structure. As I announced in the house last year during the debate on the financing and guarantee act, 1960, the government had intended to proceed with the re-examination and, if necessary, revision of the capital structure of the railway company prior to December 31, 1961. However, since the complete report of the royal commission on transportation has not yet been received it was considered advisable to make provision in the 1961 act for a one-year extension of the present capital structure. As the president of the C.N.R. indicated in the recent hearings before the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, the capital structure is at present under study. This review will be continued in the light of the complete report of the royal commission once it has been received.

Consequently, the bill provides for the continued purchase by the Minister of Finance of Canadian National Railway 4 per cent preferred stock through to the end of the calendar year 1962. Hon. members will recall that the 1960 financing and guarantee act extended to December 31, 1961 the expiry date of the authority granted by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act for the purchase of such stock up to the limit of 3 per cent of the company's gross revenue. The 1961 act will extend this expiry date by a further year.

The bill also will extend by one year, to December 31, 1962, the moratorium on interest on the government loan of $100 million to the railway company authorized by the capital revision act, 1952.

Finally, the bill will contain a new section to increase to $230 million the limitation in the Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1955, placed on the authority to refund maturing or matured securities of the railway company. The limit is at present $200 million and it is necessary to increase this limit to allow the refunding of securities of the company maturing during the currency of the 1961 financing and guarantee act and pending the review of the capital structure.

The financing, either by means of the issue of new securities by the government of Canada or by way of direct loan, which parliament is being asked to approve, is an amount not to exceed $76,800,000. I would ask permission at this time to place on Hansard for the convenience of hon. members a table giving details of this amount.

The Chairman: Does the committee grant leave to have this table printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The table referred to above follows:]

The amount of $76,800,000 appearing in clauses 4(3) and 6(2) is computed as follows:

Road property		$122,735,000
Branch line construction		14,599,000
Hotels		1,732,000
Equipment		14,212,000
Investment in affiliated companies:
Trans-Canada Air Lines financial requirements	$19,700,000
Others	5,922,000
		25,622,000	$178,900,000
Less:
Uncompleted work			16,000,000
			162,900,000
Add:
Interim financing authority January 1 to June 30, 1962, on obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1962			76,000,000
			238,900,000
Less:
Depreciation accruals and amortization of discount on funded debt, etc., in relation to calendar year 1961		108,100,000
Depreciation accruals and amortization of discount on funded debt, etc., in relation to period January 1 to June 30, 1962		54,000,000
			162,100,000
			$ 76,800,000

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As in previous years, the bill provides authority to make temporary loans to the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet deficiencies in operating revenues up to June 30, 1962. As hon. members are aware, these loans to the two companies on income deficit account are of a temporary nature to meet deficiencies in revenue which regularly occur in the early part of each calendar year and are repaid later in the year either from revenues or, if these are insufficient, are written off by parliamentary appropriation. For 1961, the railway company has forecast a deficit of $64 million, while the air line is budgeting for a surplus of $500,000.

At present, temporary loans to the railway company in respect of capital expenditures authorized under the 1960 act are outstanding in the total amount of $36,389,212.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister can tell the committee before he sits down who is the president of the Canadian National Railways at this moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am surprised the Leader of the Opposition is not aware that Donald Gordon is the president.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of points I should like to make in connection with this legislation. In the first place, as the minister has indicated, this is the resolution which precedes the annual bill concerning the financing of Canadian National Railways. As is the custom, this bill is generally brought in after the report of the committee on railways, air lines and other government owned corporations is received. However, such is not the case this year.

I must immediately indicate to the committee the delay on the part of the government in connection with this matter, as in so many other matters. It has been the custom, as the committee knows, to deal with the affairs of Canadian National Railways long before the end of the session. My recollection is that in years previous to 1961, the committee on railways, air lines and shipping has reported much earlier than on this occasion. I believe they have reported in March and April, but I have no recollection, during the long years I have been in this house, of an occasion when the committee has held its sittings so late and at this time has not brought forward a report.

When the Minister of Finance introduced a similar bill on June 7, 1960, he had this to say as reported at page 4601 of Hansard:

It is the custom to introduce this present measure after such a committee has conducted that review of the operations and financing of the Canadian National Railways system and has made its report to the house.

The question I put to the minister, then, is why is the measure being brought in before that committee has made its report?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member understands that I am not a member of that committee, but I am told the reason the report has not been made is that the chairman is ill. It is hoped the report might be submitted tomorrow morning.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to let the minister get away with that statement. While it is true the chairman is ill, there is a deputy chairman of the committee and there always has been a deputy chairman of the committee. The real reason is that the government could not make up its mind as to when it was going to call this committee. The real reason is that the government allowed charges to be made against the president and other officers of Canadian National Railways, and held a debate here for days during which attacks were made on the president, thereby delaying the setting up of this committee. This is the real reason we have not received a report as yet.

The custom which the minister says has been established is not being followed. However, he need not tell the house or tell me that this failure is the result of the illness of the chairman. We all regret his illness. I must say the chairman of the committee has done a magnificent job in trying to maintain order and decorum in the committee. All of us who sit on this side of the house, as well as those sitting on the other side, regret his illness. However, I come back to the point that there is a deputy chairman. There is no reason why this committee could not have been set up much earlier, and therefore had a report before us prior to the introduction of this resolution.

The other point I wish to make is this. Before we vote on this resolution, before we vote these huge sums of money to the Canadian National Railways, we should know who the directors of the railway are going to be. We had a bill introduced into this house some weeks ago increasing the number of directors from seven to 12. Notwithstanding our demands, both prior and since the introduction and passage by this house of that legislation, we have not been able to find out who the president and directors of the Canadian National Railways are. Before we are asked to vote these large sums of money, I think it is an insult to this house not to tell us who these directors are going to be. It is of the essence of good business, good administration, for the shareholders of any corporation to be told who the directors are going to be. After all, we have a right to know what kind of people they are. We have a right to know whether or not the public will have confidence in them. We have a right to know what business experience, and the like, they have. We are not even being given that information, although the bill concerning the directors has been approved by both houses of parliament for many days, if not weeks. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that we are entitled to obtain this information before we vote these large sums of money.

There is another point which I think should be brought to the attention of the committee. This has to do with one of the subsidiaries of Canadian National Railways, namely Trans-Canada Air Lines. We were told in the committee that it was not possible to discuss certain matters affecting Trans-Canada Air Lines because they were under study by the cabinet. We were told in the committee that these matters had not been determined by the cabinet, were of a highly confidential nature, and so it was possible to discuss them. We respected the statement which was made by the minister because that has been the practice.

Mr. Balcer: I should like to ask the hon. member precisely what matters he is mentioning. I did not ask the committee not to discuss any matters because they were before the cabinet.

Mr. Chevrier: I am referring to the international routes of Canadian Pacific Air Lines and those of Trans-Canada Air Lines, as well as the domestic routes. When we got to the point in committee that we were about to ask questions concerning these matters, we were told that they were sub judice; we were told that they had not been determined by the cabinet and therefore it would not be advisable to discuss them. I, for one, respected that decision. So, I say now—

Mr. Balcer: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Chevrier: There is no question of privilege, but there may be a point of order.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member says that the committee was told by the minister that the committee was not to discuss certain matters because they were before the cabinet and therefore were sub judice. I say that, as minister, I did not say that at all. When this subject was raised, I said that these matters were before the cabinet. I did not tell the committee not to discuss these matters, and I did not say they were sub judice. Any member of the committee was free to discuss any matter as long as he wanted.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has just confirmed what I have said; the minister is not disagreeing with anything that I have said. I am the one who said that the matters were sub judice, but the minister rose and said they were under consideration by the cabinet. He certainly made that statement, and immediately he made that statement it was quite clear that the officers were not going to give any information concerning those routes.

The point I am making now is this. Because of that statement we respected the views that were expressed then and we did not pursue the matter. Certainly, I did not pursue the matter. I say now we have arrived at another stage. Where we require large sums of money, we should be told what the position is in so far as these international routes are concerned. Is that decision going to be withheld from the committee and from the country until such time as the house has adjourned its proceedings or prorogued, for that matter, in view of what the Prime Minister said a little earlier? Then, when this house is no longer sitting will we get, as we have in the past, a statement from the Minister of Transport that here are the matters that were under review and here are the decisions that have been taken?

But the press, however, has given some indication of what is being demanded: first, that on its polar routes from Australasia via Edmonton to Amsterdam, C.P.A. be given the right to come down at London; and next, that it also be given the right to fly Toronto-Montreal by way of London with propeller aircraft. The press has given indication that those are the applications that have been made to the cabinet under the Aeronautics Act. It has been well known for many months that this matter has been under cabinet consideration. When is the cabinet going to hand down its decision? What is the nature of the application?

Before these large sums of money are voted by this House of Commons surely we should be given some indication of (1) what the applications are; (2) what effect they will have on the financial position of T.C.A.; and (3) what the decision is going to be. The same thing applies to the transcontinental air routes now being serviced by both these large corporations which are competing with each other and unquestionably causing each other financial harm. I think the committee again in that field is entitled to know what the position is.

The minister made a statement, unfortunately not in the house, having to do with regional carriers, as he had a perfect right to do; and at least in the field of regional carriers we know what the position is east of Oshawa and Sarnia. For instance, the statement was made that applications had been filed with the air transport board relative to Quebecair, Nordair and Maritime Central air lines and the air transport board handed down its decision with reference to these matters. The minister made a statement and, at least in so far as the regional carriers are concerned, we know where we stand and the air carriers know as well. Not so, however, in the other two fields. Not so, however, in the field of international carriers and in the field of domestic carriers as well.

We also know that since the committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and operated by the government has been sitting, a team of experts from the Department of Transport have gone to Washington. What have they gone there to do? They have gone there to negotiate with their United States counterparts a renewal of the bilateral air agreement between Canada and the United States. We asked questions of the minister in so far as that matter was concerned and we received very unsatisfactory replies. However, we obtained from the press a statement by a United States delegate that it was difficult to decide on the nature of the demands and the discussions when it was impossible to find out what was in the minds of the Canadians. Of course, I am now paraphrasing a question which I put to the minister on an earlier occasion.

What did the Canadian delegates go to Washington to discuss? I think this House of Commons is entitled to know since we are voting large sums of money for this purpose. Was it to seek additional transborder routes? Was it to obtain additional routes from Montreal to Los Angeles, or from Montreal-Toronto to Miami, for instance? They are routes which we should have had since this government has been in office but which we have not obtained. Is it to offset the loss of routes which this government has granted to foreign countries by the signature of bilateral air agreements with, for instance, Italy, west Germany, France and one other country the name of which escapes me for the moment? I think the committee should be given information on matters of this kind. We have not been able to get it in the house by way of questioning. We have not been able to get it in the committee. Surely we should be given it on this last occasion which we shall probably have to discuss matters concerning T.C.A. and the C.N.R.

It is a well known fact that Lufthansa, Air France, and Alitalia have fifth freedom rights in Montreal, with onward rights for these foreign air carriers to Los Angeles and to San Francisco and also that B.O.A.C. has fifth freedom rights to land in Toronto, something which our carriers do not possess in these countries. It is quite clear that the United States has given these foreign countries certain rights which Canada does not possess.

Mr. Balcer: Who made the last agreement with the United States? What government did that?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister asks who made the last agreement with the United States. I do not know when the last agreement was made. However, if the minister is referring to agreements which were made when we were in office, let me tell the minister that when we gave a quid we got a quo in return and we never gave fifth freedom rights without getting from these foreign countries similar fifth freedom rights in return therefor. Not so since this government has been in office. I have not the statements before me now but I put them on Hansard last year; and I am only summarizing the position as I can but do on a measure of this character. However, there is no doubt that to west Germany, Italy and one if not two other countries went fifth freedom rights in this country in exchange for third freedom and fourth freedom rights in those foreign countries. Now an attempt is being made by the Canadian team in going to Washington to recapture the position lost in those negotiations.

Mr. Balcer: By the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Mr. Chevrier: I think either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Transport or someone on behalf of the government should give some indication of what it was the Canadian team was seeking in Washington, what success it has had, and what was the nature of the discussions. After all, there is nothing secret about this matter. These transborder routes have been public knowledge to both Canadians and Americans for many years now. It is only fair and right that we on this side of the house and the public should know what the position is with reference to the transborder routes.

There are other matters affecting the Canadian National Railways with which I should like to deal but the amount required in this resolution and the details thereof have just a short time ago been handed to me by the minister. On short notice like this it is difficult to deal with the matter in the manner in which I should like to deal with it at the present time.

I think those of us who sit on this side of the house will approve of the three new provisions which were announced by the Minister of Finance concerning certain extensions having to do with the capital revision of the Canadian National Railways pending a review of the capital structure of the C.N.R. by the royal commission on transportation.

I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the report of the royal commission. That has been done previously. Until the second and third reports, if that be the case, are brought down it perhaps would not be appropriate at this time to deal with that matter. However, the president of the Canadian National Railways did tell us that there was under consideration with the government at the present time a review of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. There is no doubt that the railways all across this country—not to mention railways in the United States and elsewhere—because of competition emanating from air lines, trucks and motor vehicles, are in difficult financial circumstances. The Canadian National Railways is no exception.

The president of the Canadian National Railways gave an excellent summary of the reasons why the net revenue of the railway was so much lower this year than it has been in the past. If one gives heed to the reports that have appeared in the press from time to time, in so far as Canadian National Railways is concerned, the situation certainly is not improving. I hope the royal commission on transportation will make recommendations which the government will find it possible to adopt which will assist Canadian National Railways in the difficult financial position in which it finds itself.

There are many other things I should like to inject into the debate, but I should like to conclude on the note with which I began. It is that before we are asked to vote these huge sums of money the house should be taken into the confidence of the government and parliament should be told who are going to be the directors of Canadian National Railways and, by inference, some of the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines also. Until we are given that information the house, in all decency, should not be asked to adopt this resolution.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, in view of the Prime Minister's indication this afternoon that we are on the lip of an election, if one could put it that way, I suppose every time one gets up one is conscious that this may be the last opportunity to express opinions, and especially on an institution such as the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Drysdale: Don't get political.

Mr. Fisher: The Canadian National Railways bill, as has been pointed out by both previous speakers, is a routine measure in a sense. We find nothing contentious in the measure itself and are prepared to support it.

However, it does seem to me most unfair that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport have not taken the trouble to discover whether the report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping will be available to the house tomorrow. Without that report before the house we are not in a position to discuss many of the points that really need to be discussed and examined which affect this resolution and the whole financial picture of the C.N.R.

The minister himself indicated that before our committee Mr. Gordon mentioned that completely new proposals with regard to the capital revision of the C.N.R. were under way or were being studied at the present time. To say they are completely new is an understatement. As far as I am concerned they are a bombshell, and I am sure they are a bombshell to the minister. They are a bombshell the size of $700 million or $900 million apparently. We cannot really discuss that now, Mr. Chairman, because in order to do so we should be able to go into the committee proceedings and, according to procedures of the house this is not allowed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will agree with me that the proposed changes in the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways are not involved in the present bill. That is something for further study. The bill will simply continue the existing arrangement for another year to enable that study to be carried on. There is nothing in the bill that relates to that study or prejudices the right of any hon. member to comment on it in due course.

Mr. Fisher: I agree with that particular aspect of it, but I say to the minister this. We have a senior management that has been in charge of the railway for 12 years. In 1950 a royal commission made certain recommendations with regard to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. In 1952 there was a recapitalization, as the minister knows, but that measure is coming to an end and will be continued in this bill.

To speak properly to this matter we should be able to examine wholly, in relation to this bill, the proposals and information that the president of the Canadian National Railways gave us. The minister mentioned the recent royal commission. Here is a royal commission set up in 1959. It reports in the spring of 1961. Its hearings conclude in the winter of 1961. The president of the Canadian National Railways tells us in the committee that he has these great new provisions coming about, but he did not say a word of this to the royal commission on transportation. Not one thing was brought forward in that respect.

This is a most surprising state of affairs to me, that as a consequence of our last big royal commission on transportation we get a huge revision, well over half a billion dollars, in the debt structure of the C.N.R. Now we have another royal commission, and there seems to be no indication that anything is going to be done or recommended in relation to the C.N.R. debt structure. But the president has a new proposal, and it is a dandy—$700 million or $900 million. I hope that after the resolution is passed we do not deal with the bill until we have the committee report in the house and are free to go into details of the evidence that was presented to the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I may inform the hon. member that I am again told we may expect a report tomorrow morning. In that event we would have it before there is any question of going on with second reading.

Mr. Chevrier: We should have had it a long time ago.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member for Laurier made the point that the committee has been much delayed this year. I very much regret that it was delayed, because I think the whole attitude toward the C.N.R. management, especially on the part of the government members, might have been much different had we had the committee hearings a month and a half or two months ago, rather than coming with the peculiar juxtaposition to other events that affect other figures in the public service. I hope I am not being too obscure.

Mr. Pearson: No, you are not.

Mr. Chevrier: Another head to roll.

Mr. Fisher: I would suggest that the fact the committee hearings were late, other than the inconvenience of not having the information from the hearings, is really not critical in relation to the bill before us. Another point raised by the hon. member for Laurier was in relation to the fact that we do not know who the directors are going to be. It seems to me that question is one worth putting forward, but I do not know whether it is worth getting excited about. We are pretty sure who the directors will be, in a general sense. I mean, there is no doubt about that. I do not think we are under any illusions that the government is searching around to find a good socialist to sit on this government corporation.

Mr. Drysdale: There aren't any.

Mr. Fisher: Do you mean there are no good socialists?

Mr. Drysdale: Not in crown corporations.

Mr. Fisher: Regarding that contradiction of terms from the hon. member for Drysdale—

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you for changing my riding.

Mr. Fisher: —I suggest that we put it to the voters of Burnaby-Richmond, because I imagine there are some people out there who will be voting in the next election and who might consider that you can link up the adjective "good" with the word "socialist". They may have something to say about the hon. member's return here.

Surely the point in regard to the directors is that the house did act to provide more directors. The official opposition took one position on it; we took another. We were glad to see the number of directors increased. But the delay is just another example of what we have come to assume is the chief characteristic of the present administration and, that, in its simplest terms, and in a word with a Latin root which would appeal to the Minister of Finance, is, simply, procrastination. When we look at this mob around us of 200 plus, we conclude it is easy enough to find Conservative M.P.'s; but it is too bad that in this mob of Conservatives in the country who stand behind them they cannot come up more quickly with people who want to be directors of this crown corporation.

The aspect of the Canadian National Railways about which I should most like to speak—but again, until we have permission to go into the evidence, it would be incomplete—is the question of whether we can have any great confidence in the present management of the Canadian National Railways. I am not going to anticipate what opinion the committee of the house which has looked at the railway might have, but it certainly is apparent from the resolution and from what the hon. member for Laurier called the vast sums involved that we are continuing to give a very free hand to the management of the Canadian National Railways in its programs of capital expenditure.

I hope that at some time in this debate the Minister of Transport will get up and give us a review of all the capital that has been pumped into the C.N.R. in the past decade and tell us the government's view as to how effective these expenditures have been in terms of operating revenue, operating profits or losses, as they may be, and also in terms of what these capital expenditures have done in providing job opportunities. It seems to me that if we are going to have an election very soon we must look even here at one of the fundamental issues which is going to appear at that election. That is not the issue of Senate reform, but the issue of unemployment. Here is a wonderful example of what has taken place in Canadian industry. Governments, both Liberal and Conservative, supported by all parties in the house, have pumped multimillions of dollars into the Canadian National Railways for change. Out of that change they have had a reduction in jobs and job opportunities which is astounding, and if it continues at the present rate, the railways, within about four more years, will have approximately half the number of employees that they had a decade ago, that is, in about 14 years practically half of the railway labour force will have gone. We should be conscious when we are putting through expenditures on this scale that these are some of the results that are accruing to the Canadian economy.

Someone suggests that you cannot move the clock back, that we cannot be an anachronism in the railway business. One can readily agree, but when one examines the consequence of this job reduction and job dislocation which has happened with the Canadian National Railways and other railways it certainly seems that we are not geared in relation to our willingness to spend on the C.N.R., to take care of the dislocation and the lack of jobs which result from the expenditures.

We shall support the bill and we look forward to the resolution having a quick passage through the committee, especially in view of the indication that tomorrow we shall have both the bill and the report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping before us.

The hon. member for Laurier went into some detail about the issue of Trans-Canada Air Lines and its position, especially with relation to rights which are being negotiated with the United States. What we are most concerned about is the apparent hesitancy on the part of the government and the Minister of Transport to come up with a clear-cut answer, yes or no, to the Canadian Pacific Airlines request for added opportunities for service on the domestic lines. Again, even the friends of this government suffer from procrastination. In this regard, Trans-Canada Air Lines has given an indication that what competition was allowed on domestic routes has led them to have the first deficit in a period of nine years. We can only assume that this deficit results from the change in government policy which was made several years ago following the Wheatcroft report and the decision to allow Canadian Pacific Airlines to get into the trans-continental service. The issue is an extremely simple one and it can be put in the form of a question: Will a government decision to give Canadian Pacific Airlines more opportunity for domestic service create a greater deficit and greater problems for the government owned railway? It is as simple as that. It seems to be such a simple problem that it takes a great deal of time for the government to make up its mind. There is a very crude expression that one cannot use in the house in relation to this kind of proscrastination, but something needs to be done immediately, and since the next election is being fought on the basis not only of Senate reform, we hear, but on the basis of free enterprise versus socialism we can only assume that the government, when it finally does get through procrastinating is going to give Canadian Pacific Airlines exactly, or most of, what it is asking for.

I hope the government is consistent in its philosophy—and it seems to think it has a philosophy in this regard—because it would give us the opportunity of pointing out how paradoxical and ridiculous it is to create an instrument of national policy which is an efficient organization and then to turn around and cut its throat.

Mr. Benidickson: I have in the past had the privilege of introducing a resolution of this type when I was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance of another government. I had at that time consistently said to the Canadian National Railways and to those officials in the Department of Transport who serve as liason officers between government and the railways that I felt there was a great desire in the interest of members of parliament that there be consistency in the wording not only in bills reflecting these tremendous amounts of money involved in these grants, but in the resolutions.

We are now at the resolution stage. I am disappointed that the C.N.R. has not assisted the administration by presenting to us something that is consistent along the lines I advocated. I was not a member this year of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping. I was last year. I made this point, but I find a radical departure when it comes to the phraseology of the resolution presented to us in 1961 as compared with 1960. We have before us in 1961 a resolution which in the first two or three lines makes reference to $178 million. I say that $178 million is an amount of money with which most hon. members of this committee are unfamiliar. For years and years on the government side and on the opposition side I have urged the adoption of consistency of terminology in this resolution so that we may go back to Hansard of previous years and compare oranges with oranges and not oranges with lemons.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member agree that the resolution is in precisely the same form as the standard resolution we have had year by year, the only difference this year being the addition of the last clause which is necessary by reason of the new additional purposes which I outlined in my remarks a few moments ago?

Mr. Benidickson: I will not agree with the minister at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Apart from that one clause the resolution is identical with the resolution last year.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not know whether the minister has the resolution for 1960 in front of him, but I have them both in front of me and contradict the minister in that statement categorically. I have urged that we adopt consistency in the matter of the wording of resolutions of this kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me say to the hon. member that I have been assured by the official who drew this resolution that it is identical with the resolution of last year with the exception of the additional clause, but in view of what the hon. member says I will check it again.

Mr. Chevrier: Do not make a speech.

Mr. Benidickson: I have both documents in my hand and can make it very clear to hon members of this committee that there is a difference, and I shall read them if it is desired that I do so.

There is no suggestion in the first few lines of the resolution of 1960 as to the ultimate amount of money that this committee is committing the taxpayers to by the passage of this resolution. However, in the 1961 resolution in the first three lines we have a reference to capital expenditures in the year 1961 not exceeding $178,900,000. That is of course the crux of what this committee is being asked to do at the present time. I suggest that the members of this committee find the expenditure of this amount of money far beyond their experience as individuals and must, therefore, refer to the presentation made by the president of the Canadian National Railways to the committee on railways, air lines and shipping of this year.

The sittings of that committee were rather drawn out. The interesting thing to note is that not only were the officers of the Canadian National Railways not brought before the committee at the normal time, but very late in this session, but report No. 5 of the proceedings and evidence, which should have been available to hon. members, was not printed and available to my knowledge until last Saturday. I was concerned with that report because I intended to do some research in respect to it. In spite of the fact that it was not available until last Saturday the government leader of this house proposed that we deal with this legislation prior to the time we had this evidence in our hands.

Be that as it may, we are faced with the difficulty and without much help, of translating the phraseology of this resolution given to us on July 3 in terms of what the president said as reported in the minutes of proceedings No. 5 of that committee at page 370.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Why didn't you sit with that committee?

Mr. Drysdale: What year is that report?

Mr. Benidickson: It is a 1961 report. I think the key to the examination of the capital expenditures can be found at page 370.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: I think I know what the hon. gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. Drysdale: The hon. member intends to refer to a report which I believe is not yet properly before this house.

The Chairman: Yes. The hon. member for Port Arthur refrained from reading from the evidence of that committee because that particular report has not yet been received.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, how horrible and reprehensible the situation is. We are now in a position to discuss this resolution which involves the capital expenditure of $178 million but are unable to refer to the evidence presented to that committee at this time because it has not been properly placed before us. How reprehensible for the government to advance legislation at this stage and then for hon. members on the government side to suggest that it is improper, and it is improper under the rules of the committee of the whole, to refer to evidence which I read with great care over the week end, and upon which I had made annotations, particularly when this is evidence of a committee which was supposed to save the time of the committee of the whole. I say that this is just further proof of the mismanagement of the government in guiding this house in its legislative program.

Mr. Drysdale: The evidence will be available tomorrow if you like.

Mr. Benidickson: If it is to be available tomorrow I suggest that the resolution relating to this monumental capital obligation on the part of the taxpayers of this country should not have been advanced by this government until all the procedures had been followed in order that the evidence be available.

Last year the same committee suggested in its report that it took a serious view of the continuing deficit of the Canadian National Railways. I am not allowed now to refer to the fact that my colleagues investigated the budget of the Canadian National Railways and had before them the senior officers, nor the evidence which is available as a result of the ten meetings held by that committee. Incidentally, I should like to compliment my colleagues for the attention and efforts they devoted to the investigation of these important matters. In spite of the fact that the evidence is available, although not properly before the committee, I am not allowed to refer to it and must, therefore, turn to the report of that committee presented last year to point out that the committee does take a serious view of the continuing deficit of the Canadian National Railways.

I was not a member of that committee but my recollection is that—

Mr. Drysdale: You were a member last year.

Mr. Benidickson: I was a member of that committee last year and am referring now to a report which is properly before this house, because you have denied me the right to refer to this year's report on the ground that it has not been presented as yet to this committee. I read that evidence very carefully over the week end but am now unable to refer to it.

Mr. Drysdale: I am sorry.

Mr. Benidickson: I suggested last year that the deficits of the Canadian National Railways were not taken into the minister's calculations in making his budget estimate on March 31, 1960, that his budget would provide a surplus of $12 million, because very shortly after that an announcement was made by the Minister of Finance regarding the deficit to be incurred by the Canadian National Railways in 1960.

We know that the Minister of Finance in the presentation of his budget this year has done an unprecedented thing. He has not been prepared to date to inform hon. members what the gross national productivity in 1961 is likely to be based on real values. However, we have some evidence that the Minister of Finance has not been very helpful to the House of Commons or to the country when an opportunity is given to look at the evidence concerning perhaps the biggest corporation in this country, namely the Canadian National Railways. We find that in 1961 they do not expect their revenues to increase even at the rate mentioned by the minister in his budget speech, namely 3 per cent, notwithstanding that certain costs of operation, in the opinion of the president, might be considerably greater than they were in 1960. These are questions of moment and importance which we are denied the opportunity to discuss on the grounds of a technicality, namely, that the report of the committee of 1961 has not been presented to us.

Let me use my own words. I am not going to quarrel with the president of the C.N.R. I quarrelled with him last year when he gave evidence on this same type of legislation. I said the deficit would be three or four times what it was represented to us by the government it would be and I proved to be right. This time I am only going to say that the president of the Canadian National Railways does not indicate that in 1961 his revenue will increase at a rate even comparable to the evasive and back-handed estimate given to us by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on June 20 when he referred to a possible 3 per cent increase in growth.

I say these are the matters we have to consider when we are voting capital expenditures which involve interest on obligations of the C.N.R. This has continued year after year. These are the matters that are pertinent to the resolution before us which is a resolution preliminary to a bill. I repeat, I am not happy with technicalities and with amendments in language. The 1961 proposals for capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways may amount to $178 million, and no truly comparable figure is given to us as members of parliament with respect to the 1960 budget of $279 million.

Apparently under the rules I am debarred from dealing with the evidence upon which members of parliament are supposed to rely when we come to discuss the matter further. I am debarred from dealing with evidence taken in a careful way, I would imagine, detailed in seven or eight reports of committee proceedings, and I would assume that they involved two meetings a day. I have respect for my colleagues. I am sure they gave great attention to this capital budget. But since I was not a member of that committee I am not able to refer to it when discussing a resolution introduced by this government at this time with the knowledge that perhaps the report would be available tomorrow. This resolution has been advanced on a technical, partisan basis because the government are not prepared to deal with another very important issue which we discussed yesterday and which they said was of the utmost emergency—

Mr. Churchill: We will get it tonight if we keep going.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the report of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping be available to us before we conclude this stage of the debate in the House of Commons? I refer to the resolution stage where we have rather unlimited and frequent opportunities to question the minister. Will that report be available? Will an opportunity be given to see whether the committee did as it did last year when it took a serious view of the continuing deficits of the Canadian National Railways?

I cannot refer to the evidence but I am informed that the president of the Canadian National Railways said that the deficit this year would perhaps be as large as or a little less than it was last year notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Finance says we might have a 3 per cent increase in the growth of our national production.

These are serious questions, Mr. Chairman. I say we cannot proceed with this line of disorganization. When we have something of consequence, such as we have here, involving $178 million, I say we must have leadership from this government in directing the course of the day to day business of the House of Commons so that we are not prevented from utilizing the good work done for a period of, I would assume, perhaps 40 hours by members of parliament in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any great length on this resolution. Indeed, it is not the type of resolution on which I would normally have had anything to say at all. However, I did have the opportunity of serving for a short while on the committee, which I believe we are allowed to mention as long as we do not mention anything that happened in the committee. It is permissible to recognize that the committee had an existence. I must say that I was in attendance in that committee on a day when the press states it was very dramatic. I had quite an interest in what happened there.

What I wished to speak about at the outset was, having been appointed to this committee and not having been removed from it, I have been receiving notices for the last few days about meetings of this committee in camera to prepare a report at a time when events in this house seemed to me to be of more compelling importance. We are now assured by the Minister of Finance, who although not a member of the committee seems to be better informed than some of us who are, that the committee is going to make a report tomorrow. I do not believe the hon. member for Laurier or I will have much idea what is going to be in that report, through no fault of our own. This is just another example of the way in which the affairs of this parliament have been mismanaged by the present administration ever since we came back in January.

As a result of our co-operation with the government in November, some legislation was passed because the government was caught off guard. Government members, however, did their best to filibuster their own legislation at that time. From January onward, we have had week after week, month after month of the time of this house and the committee of the whole taken up with endless repetition from hon. gentlemen on the other side. There was repeated delay of the important business and now we reach a situation where on the 151st day of the session, just two days short of the longest session in our whole history—this was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's session in 1903 when things were being done in this country and not being postponed—in which I venture to say that, apart from Mr. Coyne, Senator Courtemanche and the delayed budget, there will not be a person in this country who will remember anything that has happened in the whole of this session—

The Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. member's introductory remarks will come to an end soon and he will discuss this resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope they will not, sir, because what I am pointing out is we are being asked, on the 151st day of the session, to consider a resolution, the proper consideration of which necessitates having before us, for at least two or three days, the report and the proceedings of the sessional committee on railways, air lines, and shipping, owned and operated by the government.

Why do we have that committee, sir? We have that committee precisely so that we can give intelligent consideration to the future needs of the railway. We do not have it, though some members seem to think we do, for the purpose of engaging in a lot of useless recriminations about the past. We have it because we know there is a great problem in connection with the railway and a developing problem in connection with T.C.A., and there is a good deal of concern about all these government operations that are covered by this committee. In spite of this the government, on the 151st day of the session, has managed things so badly that we find ourselves being asked to vote blindly on this resolution.

Perhaps of itself and by itself, isolated from everything else, this might not be a very serious matter but it is symptomatic of everything that has happened during the session and suggests that it has really become almost intolerable to have in charge of operations of one of the greatest countries in the world a lady and a collection of gentlemen—I must say for the hon. lady that I would give her higher marks than most of the hon. gentlemen—who seem to be incapable of decision, incapable of action and incapable of managing the affairs of the country.

Mr. Lambert: Including the opposition that cannot keep its mouth shut.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have now one of those interventions from the hon. member for Edmonton West sitting right behind the Minister of Finance who on one celebrated occasion before the hon. member for Edmonton West had been elected to this house so asserted his alleged right to speak that he was expelled from the house for asserting it. In those days the Conservative party thought an opposition should talk; they thought it should have the right to talk. Now the only part of this house that is doing its duty is the opposition and hon. gentlemen seek to prevent it from doing that.

Mr. Lambert: Not the opposition; a few people in it. Let us hear occasionally from some of your other members.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps after the distinguished intervention that was made the other day by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, it is not surprising that he has reverted to his usual practice of speaking from his seat.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I really rose for another purpose. My purpose was to do today what I said at six o'clock yesterday I would do and that is to read into the record a letter I wrote to the present Prime Minister of this country in 1953 with respect to one aspect of the operation of the Canadian National Railways about which the Prime Minister quite extraneously in another debate made certain gratuitous observations to which I took exception. Since it is relevant in this context and was not relevant in that in which it was used, and since it seems to me that I should be entitled to have this document put on the record today, I propose now to read a letter which I wrote to the Prime Minister and which I mentioned yesterday. It is a letter I wrote to the Prime Minister on July 15, 1953, when I was for the first time a candidate for election to this parliament.

An hon. Member: Eight years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Eight years ago; that is right. I do not think any member of the house would have expected me to raise this question at all. I was exceedingly surprised that the right hon. gentleman raised it, but since he chose to do so I think the record should be set straight. This letter is dated Regina, Saskatchewan, July 15, 1953. It is addressed to J. G. Diefenbaker, Esq., Q.C., Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Diefenbaker:

I have just seen reports in the Ottawa "Citizen" and the London "Free Press" of July 7 of a speech you made the previous day in St. Thomas in which you are said to have made certain statements about interference by the government with the Canadian National Railway hotel management at Winnipeg.

The London "Free Press" report also states you said there was proof—

And I underline that word "proof".

—that I had "complained" to the cabinet and to C.N.R. management about the "treatment" I got at the hotel.

You obviously have no personal knowledge of any such action and the president of the Canadian National Railways denied there had been any complaint.

I made no complaint to the cabinet or anyone else and it was only some weeks later that I made a reference to the matter at all in a private conversation with Mr. Donald Gordon in a reply to a question from him.

Mr. Churchill: The reference was a complaint, was it not?

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member explain how he came into possession of this letter addressed to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wrote it. I must say that I am staggered by that question. I am the author of this letter and being the author of it, having had some occasion to look into the copyright laws, I believe I own the letter. However, I have no doubt that the hon. member for Medicine Hat has not only satisfied his curiosity but has also achieved what he set out to do which was to divide the letter into two parts in Hansard. That is one of the risks one has to take in this game and I take it. But I think perhaps I should read again from the letter and I hope that this time, having confessed that I wrote the letter myself, I might be allowed to read it uninterrupted. I am not going to read the first two paragraphs again but will commence with the third:

You obviously have no personal knowledge of any such action and the president of the Canadian National Railways denied there had been any complaint.

I made no complaint to the cabinet or anyone else and it was only some weeks later that I made a reference to the matter at all in a private conversation with Mr. Donald Gordon in a reply to a question from him.

Are you now suggesting I should not have told him the truth for fear someone would subsequently misrepresent what had happened for a supposed political advantage?

You are a lawyer and I assume when you tell the public you have "proof" of something you do not mean you have just been listening to gossip or hearsay.

I myself made a memorandum of my personal conversation with Mr. Donald Gordon which the prime minister—

That was Mr. St. Laurent.

—sent to Mr. J. M. Macdonnell, M.P. on March 30th last. Since that time I have seen no further reference by Mr. Macdonnell to the matter.

I have the prime minister's permission to send you the enclosed copy of this correspondence with Mr. Macdonnell and I would hope that, if you feel it necessary to refer again to my conduct, you will give the facts fully and fairly as I cannot imagine that you believe the Conservative party needs to distort and misrepresent facts to impress the public.

I am, of course, a newcomer in public life, but I would find it hard to believe that a public man with your many years of experience and your reputation would continue to repeat statements that are not true, once he was aware of the truth.

Yours sincerely,
J. W. Pickersgill

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-121, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1961 to the 30th day of June, 1962, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might get leave of the house to revert to motions. I should like to make an announcement.

Business of the House

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—STATEMENT AS TO FEDERAL DISPOSAL

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the following announcement. Over the past few months, we have had discussions with the government of the province of Quebec with regard to the Soulanges canal, which has not been in use since the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway. As a result of correspondence exchange with the minister of fish and game of the province of Quebec, we have agreed that the federal government would offer to sell for industrial purposes some land located along the Soulanges canal. It was also agreed that if, after a month, the offers received were considered inadequate by the federal government, the Soulanges canal would be offered to the province of Quebec. To that effect, Mr. Speaker, I have written today the following letter to the minister of fish and game, Mr. Gerard Levesque:

July 6, 1961.

Hon. Gerard Levesque,
Minister of Fish and Game,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec City, Que.

Honourable Sir:

Further to my letters of last April 4 and May 12, concerning the Soulanges canal properties, I wish to inform you that my department has received a few offers from industrial and commercial firms in connection with the land and buildings at Cascade Point. Having given serious consideration to those offers, we have decided to turn them down and, as agreed with you, I am now prepared to recommend to treasury board that all the Soulanges canal properties be transferred to the province of Quebec for the nominal sum of $1, those properties to be used as a fish reserve for the people of the district.

As mentioned in my letter of April 4, my department would like to reserve itself the right to use, during the winter, the wharf situated at the entrance of the canal at Coteau Landing for the storage of the buoys used on lake Saint-François, in the summer. My department will take the necessary steps to turn over to you the Soulanges canal properties as soon as we have received confirmation of your acceptance of this offer.

I should like this transaction to be subject to only one condition, namely the following:

We should like the province to undertake to keep in its service the few federal employees who are now looking after the maintenance of the canal.

Please accept, Sir, my best regards.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should just like to congratulate the minister on the decision he has reached. In my opinion, it was the only one possible under the circumstances.

I will not indulge in political considerations since this question is now settled. I will merely add that it is unfortunate that it could not have been settled sooner.

The minister has written to the Quebec minister of fish and game to inform him that he was willing to hand over to the province the whole canal from the upper part, in Coteau, to Cascade Point.

I am sure that all members who followed the negotiations between the two governments are not only happy with the results but feel that it was the only proper thing to do under the circumstances.

I should like to thank the minister once more and to commend him for the decision he has made as to that matter.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CLASSES OF LOANS, INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, July 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-117, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 6—Capitalization.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the committee considered this bill on July 3 and we saw that the explanatory notes with respect to clause 6 read as follows:

The purpose of this amendment is to increase the authorized capital of the bank from $25 million to $50 million. Section 12 at present reads as follows:

That section is available to all members of the committee. A few minutes before the adjournment on July 3 I asked the Minister of Finance how this capital was going to be raised. As reported on page 7469 of Hansard, I asked:

Where does the money come from? In what manner is it provided?

The Minister of Finance had only a very short time in which to reply, but I say he replied in a most inadequate and shabby fashion. I suggest that all hon. members of this committee want to know a little more about the provision of these funds beyond what the Minister of Finance said on that occasion. In reply to my question the minister said, as reported at page 7469 of Hansard:

The legislation imposes the duty upon the Bank of Canada to provide this additional capital.

The minister was referring to this extra $25 million. That is all the Minister of Finance thought he should tell the committee. He went on to say:

> The money will be provided, in—

I emphasize this next word:

> —obedience to the legislation enacted by this parliament,—

Does that explain to hon. members of the committee how the additional $25 million is going to be provided under the amending bill which is before us? I must confess, in all modesty, that it does not explain it to me. I went on to ask:

> Does that mean the printing presses?

I admit the minister did not have very much time in which to answer my criticism, but he has adequate time tonight. He has 2½ hours tonight in which to explain to this committee, in layman's language, how the Bank of Canada will discharge—to use the minister's words—"the duty" upon it to provide these funds, and how "in obedience" to legislation enacted the money will be provided. As I said earlier in the debate, the lending power provided in the bill is five times the $25 million increase in capital funds; the ratio of the lending power provided is increased to five times the capital under this statute.

On July 3 the minister did not have time to explain this matter to those of us who are ignorant about some of these machinations in the financial field, but I take it that in the 2½ hours ahead he can adequately explain just how this is going to be done. He can explain whether it will involve utilization of the printing presses and whether it will involve inflation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is no secret involved here. All this bill does is amend certain words in the present statute. When the present statute was enacted in the session of 1944-45 section 12 provided that the authorized capital of the bank should be $25 million, divided into 250,000 shares at par value of $100 each. Subsection 2 of section 12 provided:

> The Bank of Canada shall subscribe—

There was a command given by parliament to the Bank of Canada:

> The Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the said 250,000 shares at par and shall pay the amount of such subscription at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine.

Mr. Benidickson: You are reading the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All that this bill does is change the amount. Clause 1 simply changes "25" to "50"; it changes "250" to "500". Clause 2 simply changes "250,000" to "500,000". It does not change the terms at all in which parliament directs the Bank of Canada to subscribe the authorized capital. The statement of assets and liabilities of the Bank of Canada for some time has showed and shows now $25 million of the capital stock of the industrial development bank as one of the assets of the bank. The Bank of Canada has various investments which are carried on the assets side of its statement. It would be a matter for decision on the part of the Bank of Canada whether the additional $25 million should be provided by the realization of other assets and the investment of the proceeds in this manner or by the exercise of other powers open to the Bank of Canada under the act.

Mr. Benidickson: I think all members of the committee, including those who usually support the government, would really wish to look at the last words of the Minister of Finance in which the hon. gentleman vaguely said that the Bank of Canada might resort to some other opportunities open to them to finance this particular enactment. Specifically, surely, we are entitled in committee of the whole to ask the minister, taking his own words, what the Bank of Canada is going to do in recourse. Is it going to go to the Canadian Bank Note Company on Wellington Street and print notes? Is the government of Canada going to enlarge its cash borrowings for the current fiscal year about which it has given us no advice in the budget? Hon. members opposite have stipulated that they have an ultimate ceiling on the amount of money they feel they should go out to the public and borrow in the course of the fiscal year 1961-62. That was indicated to us in the budget speech on June 20. Now I ask the minister, and I know he left this gigantic gamble about the exchange rate out of his speech, why there was nothing in his speech with respect to requirements for cash borrowings on the part of the government, guaranteed by the government, in relation to acceptance of the requirements of the industrial development bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can answer that very simply.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not finished.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh dear.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister can answer all these points simply, to a simple man and to all simple men in this committee. What I am saying is this. Under what operation does the minister foresee that the Bank of Canada will provide another $25 million in capital for the industrial development bank and then afterwards, on a multiple of five plus $25 million, provide lending power for the industrial development bank as contemplated in the amending bill before us? Will the minister explain that to all of us who, I say, are not too knowledgeable in some of these aspects of finance? We have suggested that there might be utilization of the printing press. The Minister of Finance says that is not so. He says the stroke of the pen will not be utilized; that real money will create this additional capital for the bank and, indeed, will create five times the capital to be provided as lending power. Will the minister please explain to the satisfaction of all of us simple people here in this committee how that is going to be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the manner prescribed by the clause, Mr. Chairman, if the clause is duly carried. It is not the government which is to provide the additional capital authorized by the clause; it is the Bank of Canada. Therefore, there is no question of government money-raising being involved here at all. As to the way in which the Bank of Canada is subscribing the $25 million additional capital, that would be a matter for decision by the bank. I have no doubt the bank will comply with the terms of a statute when enacted by parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: And pay for a little printing down Wellington street at the office of the Canadian Bank Note Company.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member—

Mr. Benidickson: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. Subclause 2 says:

> The Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the said five hundred thousand shares at par and shall pay the amount of such subscription at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine.

I wish to know how they are going to pay. My question is how is this going to be done? I say to the minister: Tell your colleagues here in the committee of the whole how this is going to be done by a course in any way different from that which has been followed with regard to, shall we say, the farm credit corporation, or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Tell us how this is different from the manner in which credit is provided in those circumstances, and why, in the hon. gentleman's budget there was no reference to a cash borrowing liability potential in 1961 and 1962 with respect to this requirement comparable to the cash liability and borrowing set out in the minister's budget tables on June 20 with relation to the farm credit corporation, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and so on.

The minister knows I have criticized him severely for that blank, that little item of a dot, in his cash requirements statement in the budget which refers to the exchange fund gamble that he talked about a year ago. I shall not deal with that. That is irrelevant, perhaps, to tonight's debate. But I am asking him what is the difference between the method of providing credit under the Farm Credit Act or under the National Housing Act, and providing credit under this act? Under the two other measures referred to, the minister reports to parliament in respect of cash requirements and borrowings needed during the fiscal year 1961-62.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Obviously this has nothing to do with government borrowing requirements for 1961-62. It is entirely different from the provision of capital for the farm credit corporation or for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In the case of those two crown corporations the capital is provided by the government. In the case of the industrial development bank, the capital has been provided in accordance with the act by the Bank of Canada. That is the difference. In the one case it is provided by the government, and in the other case it is provided by the Bank of Canada; so they are different. The capital in this case has been provided by the Bank of Canada and the increase will be provided by the Bank of Canada if this measure carries, and obviously it does not enter into the budget requirements of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a different line of question with regard to this capital. Perhaps I should ask two or three questions at once so that the minister could reply to them all.

The minister has asked parliament to instruct the Bank of Canada to subscribe another $25 million capital. I think the minister told us just before bringing in this bill that he had discussed this bill with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In a general way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, in a general way, as I am reminded by the hon. member for Essex East. I should like to ask the minister whether in those general discussions he received advice from the Bank of Canada as to whether the additional $25 million capital was an appropriate amount, and how this amount was arrived at. Did this figure just spring into the minister's own mind without any discussion with the Bank of Canada and, if it did not, did he have any discussions with the Bank of Canada as to whether it had funds available for this purpose, or what arrangements they would have to make, or what securities they would have to dispose of in order to make this capital available?

Perhaps I could add one final question so the minister can give a confusing answer as he undoubtedly will. Will this have any effect upon the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada and upon the total money supply of the country?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, communications passing between the government and the Bank of Canada in relation to such matters are confidential, and it would be quite improper on my part to discuss communications that pass in respect to this subject. I was asked that same question on a previous occasion and was obliged to take the same position.

What effect this will have on the money supply is a matter for decision on the part of the Bank of Canada, which is the only authority in this country that can create currency under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this question of monetary supply involves a statute. I recognize, although the minister has not during a period of four years, that the Bank of Canada has some responsibility in connection with monetary supply. However, I am asking in regard to clause 6 how the additional $25 million capital for the industrial development bank is to be created. Further to that I should like to know how the government intends to create the $125 million which is to be made available to the constituents of hon. members who sit here in this chamber. I should like to know what the minister's opinion is in this regard, because I have held the minister responsible, at least for four years, in respect to monetary policy. I should like to ask the minister what his opinion is in regard to the printing of this money to meet those obligations with which most of us are concerned, but with which the minister for four years has not been concerned. I suggest he has not yet been concerned at all with the high costs which result to the taxpayers of this country. That is the question we must discuss here in relation to clause 6.

Will the minister to explain to us how the $25 million is going to be subscribed by the Bank of Canada? I will sit down and let the minister answer that question and just forget about the additional $125 million. Are bonds of the Dominion of Canada to be offered to the public to create this $25 million? Is the $25 million going to come out of the existing savings of the Canadian public, or is the Bank of Canada going to sell the bonds which it now holds? The minister has already told us that he is not going to depress the long term bond situation in which the provinces, municipalities and corporations are interested. He said he was going to stay out of that market. In light of that assurance, can he tell us where this $25 million is going to come from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already given that explanation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have been listening with considerable interest to the valuable interrogations of the minister by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drysdale: Try again, Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not altogether been surprised by the inconclusive character of the response the minister has made to some of the questions put to him by that hon. member, but the more one dwells on the nature of these interrogations, and the more one bears in mind the implications of the various sections—almost every section of this act—it becomes increasingly clear that the Bank of Canada will play the central role in the operations of the industrial development bank.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has asked where in the first instance the $25 million is to come from. The minister initially replied so evasively that I found it difficult to keep my seat even while the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was talking. What the minister said was that all this bill does is simply amend the statute. That was no reply at all. It is quite clear that clause 6 continues the principle involved in the original section except—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Solicitor General says "Hear, hear". I hope that he will not regard the amendments as a mere bagatelle. The same principle is continued except that the authorized capital of the bank is to be increased from $25 million to $50 million and the Bank of Canada is to subscribe, instead of 250,000 shares, 500,000 shares. Those figures must be regarded by the Solicitor General as providing a very substantial change in the effect of the section. It is to those increases that the questions of my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River have been addressed.

The minister said in regard to how this money was to be provided, that it will be up to the bank itself to determine whether it is going to use its investment portfolio or other methods provided under the Bank of Canada Act. To repeat what the minister said, it is a matter for the determination of the Bank of Canada itself. The Minister of Finance cannot tell us—

Mr. Pickersgill: He does not know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to what means the Bank of Canada is going to resort, to its investment portfolio or the other methods open to it under the statute. This is important information which has been asked for, and which is essential for us to have in order to fully—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I complete my sentence? I suggest this is very important information and essential in order that we fully understand the potential of this act. The Solicitor General is obviously agitated because he has a good question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wanted to ask whether the hon. member was a member of the cabinet when the industrial development bank was formed in the first place. Where did they get the money then?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend had been in this house he would have remembered. He may find that this can be verified in Hansard. When the industrial development bank was first discussed in this house there was not the same reluctance to give information as one has found in the case of the present Minister of Finance. That is clear. The Minister of Finance seems to regard the Bank of Canada—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman is not answering my question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit me to answer it in the careful way in which I like to prepare my answers?

Mr. Drysdale: You have a good quarterback, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should remind my hon. friend—I just forgot my history for a moment—I was not a member of the government at the time, but I was a member of this house. My hon. friend knows well that I am somewhat assiduous in the performance of my duties. I was here when the discussion took place and I recall very well the way in which the minister of finance of that day, Mr. Ilsley, gave replies to these questions.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The member for Kootenay West says "hear, hear." He has been here for a long time and he will recall that the minister of finance of that day did not regard the Bank of Canada with the same air of detachment and mystery that apparently pervades the thinking and the manner of treatment of the bank by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Aiken: He does not remember, either.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister of finance of that day would have had no difficulty in saying, as a result of his consultations with the bank, that the bank proposed to use a particular method for raising the moneys that were required under the statute. I do not think that that would be very difficult for the Minister of Finance today. In any event, he says he does not know. He says it is a matter for the bank to determine.

Subclause 2 of clause 6 reads:

> The Bank of Canada shall subscribe for the said 500,000 shares at par and shall pay the amount of such subscription at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine.

This is a very large increase in the credit that is to be made available now under the amending legislation to assist industrial enterprises.

Mr. Macdonnell: What percentages of the assets of the Bank of Canada is it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not catch the hon. member's question.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the hon. member tell us what percentage of the assets of the Bank of Canada is represented by this $25 million?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says $25 million, but this is not the only amount that the bank is going to be called upon to put up. The rise in the credit available will be $300 million. The total amount of credit which will be provided under this legislation will be $400 million.

The question my hon. friend asks is a very important one but I do not know why he puts the question to me. It is the kind of question that should be put to the Minister of Finance. I am afraid that if any one of us on this side of the house asked the Minister of Finance for the answer to that question we would not receive it. When I am through I hope the hon. member for Greenwood will rise and ask that question. I am sure the Minister of Finance will give that information to the hon. member for Greenwood and we can vicariously take advantage of the reply. I am sure if I asked the Minister of Finance—he feels so cool toward me these days—I would not be able to get any kind of reply.

The point of my present intervention is this. Since the minister finds it difficult to give us replies to some of these questions I wish to renew tonight the request we made the other night, namely that we send this bill to a committee of this house so that we can examine the president of the industrial development bank.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. This is a repetition of the tactics we had in this house on Monday night when the fair discussion of the bill was greatly delayed. We are in committee on the bill because of a decision of the house, Mr. Chairman, and it does not lie within the power of this committee to change the decision of the house in that regard and any discussion of that subject in this committee is entirely out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure you do not need any assistance from me to deal with the most unfortunate intervention of the Minister of Finance. We discussed this the other night on clause 3 of the bill. We had some discussion on clause 6. There was no suggestion at any time that that kind of request was out of order. The only purpose the Minister of Finance can have in raising it now is that he finds this repeated suggestion embarrassing and irritating. That is the only reason; I can find no other reason and it is not a ground for raising a point of order. I can very well understand how irritated the minister is.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: He cannot explain it to us.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Essex East will remember that the point was raised the other night by the hon. member for Hull. I indicated that this committee had no purpose other than to study the bill clause by clause. Therefore it seems to me that to discuss the sending of this bill to a special or a standing committee would not be relevant at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I must say I do not agree; I profoundly disagree and I hope that you, sir, will not make that kind of ruling.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. May I complete my remarks before the hon. member for Essex East expresses his disagreement.

To express of regret that this was not done may be one thing, but to suggest repeatedly that this be done would be out of order. There is a distinction there that the hon. member can make.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you make a final ruling, sir, will you hear argument on this point?

I think the minister quite wrongly said that a decision was made on this point by the house. No decision was ever made by the house. The point was never put before the house; there was no way of putting it. It is true that we resolved to go into committee on the bill but no motion was made that the bill should go to a special committee, so that the house took no decision on this matter. Therefore, there is no decision of the house that is being contravened by our suggesting, as my hon. friend from Essex East was just doing, that since we cannot get the information from the minister we ought to be in another place where we could get it from someone who knows what it is. Since the minister is not on speaking terms with the governor of the Bank of Canada, we ought to get someone from the Bank of Canada who will know how they are going to do this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, you have suggested that there was no objection, of course, to a suggestion. I thought I had put the request in the form of a suggestion. If I have not, I will suggest to the minister now that because of the fact he says the replies to certain of these questions reside in the bank, and because obtaining answers to these questions is vital to this matter, in the interests of the quick dispatch of this measure and a full comprehension of all of its implications we should have the opportunity of examining the governor of the Bank of Canada who is the president of the industrial development bank so that we could ask him—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I must ask you now to make a ruling on the point I raised a while ago. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had quite overlooked the facts of the case when he said there had been no decision of the house. If you refer to Hansard of July 3, at page 7447, at the top of the second column, you will see that after the bill in question was read the second time Hansard proceeded in this way:

> Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved that the house go into committee on the bill.
>
> Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?
>
> Mr. Pickersgill: On division.
> Mr. Deputy Speaker: Carried on division.

That is the decision of the house to refer this bill to this committee. Under the rules of this house, Mr. Chairman, it is referred to this committee for the purpose of a review of the clauses of the bill and not for the purpose of discussing reference of it to some other committee. It was a decision of the house that it be referred to this committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance, as usual, has misrepresented what I said. What I said was that this house took no decision about referring this bill to the banking and commerce committee. If the house had made a decision, if there had been a motion made to refer this bill to the committee on banking and commerce and the house had turned it down, then the minister would be quite right. This would be a decision of the house and we could not reopen that question. However, the question was never put to the house at all. It is still open to us, therefore, to say we are not getting the information we ought to be getting here in committee of the whole and therefore the committee should rise, report progress and the government should let us go to another place where we can get the information. That is all we are suggesting.

The minister has told us he does not know anything about this. He has no way of finding out, and if he did the information would be secret; parliament would not be entitled to it. Surely parliament is not going to be asked to order the Bank of Canada to put up $25 million without knowing where this money is coming from. This is what the minister is asking us to do. He does not know where or from what source the money is coming. He says it is none of our business where it is coming from; we have no right to know; we have no right to go to a place where we could find out.

Mr. Benidickson: On this point of order, the Minister of Finance again has given us only part of the record in twisted form. He referred to page 7447 of Hansard and told us this particular situation had been resolved. He referred to the matter being settled on division. I wish to refer my colleagues to the words that the Minister of Finance did not read, and they are attributed to me. I quote:

> Mr. Benidickson: There are unanswered questions. That is why it was agreed to on division.

We are now at another stage of the debate in which we expect to obtain some answers to these questions.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suggest we are in great danger of making a laughing stock of ourselves in this house. The Minister of Finance has been asked a question as to how a comparatively small amount of money is to be raised by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, $25 million is small?

Mr. Macdonnell: I used the word "comparatively". The Bank of Canada has $3 billion of assets. The minister has answered the question in terms which anyone with even a modest familiarity with financial affairs would understand. We are now being told, I do not think very seriously and I hope not very seriously, that he has not explained or he does not know merely because he has not undertaken to say which of the various means at the disposal of the bank, with $3 billion of assets, will be used by the bank. The bank has also the power to create more money if necessary. The minister has not undertaken to say by what detailed measures the bank will provide this sum. I suggest that anyone with even the slightest familiarity with financial matters would say that the Minister of Finance has answered the question satisfactorily, and that we are making a laughing stock of ourselves at the present time.

The Chairman: Order. I find that as chairman I ruled on this point the last time the bill was before the committee. I refer hon. members to page 7456 of Hansard. Essentially, the ruling explains that this committee only has the power to examine this bill clause by clause, and it was for the house to decide whether or not the bill should have been referred to the banking and commerce committee or any other special or standing committee of the house. This was not done, so the situation has not changed at all. Having ruled this discussion out of order at another time, it is clear that I have to rule the same way tonight.

I may mention also that as reported at page 7457 the hon. member for Hull moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask the house to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee for further study. This motion was ruled out of order. The hon. member for Essex East then moved that the committee rise and report progress. The motion was decided in the negative. However, the motion made by the hon. member for Essex East did not deal with this particular point. I am not citing this motion to indicate that the committee made a decision on that point. I only point out that the Chair made a decision then and it was not appealed. We should, therefore, proceed in accordance with this decision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not dispute what you have said; of course, what you have said is true, Mr. Chairman. You did make a specific ruling on a specific point. However, you said a few moments ago that there was a difference between making a request in the form of a motion that this matter be sent to the banking and commerce committee and making a suggestion, in the course of argument to the minister, that because the minister was not in a position to answer certain questions some other instrumentality might be found for giving the house an opportunity of securing this information. I am not making any motion. I am not moving that this matter go before the banking and commerce committee.

Are we not in this position? The minister says that these are answers that can only be given by the Bank of Canada. I simply say, in parenthesis, to the hon. member for Greenwood that he may have an understanding of this subject that perhaps I should have, but it is quite obvious that we do not have the same background and the same experience. Consequently, we are not in a position to give to ourselves the ready answers which he feels he has. I wish he had told us how the bank was going to raise this money, whether through its investment portfolio or through other means and methods open to it under the act. Since the Minister of Finance does not give us this information, surely no one sitting on the treasury benches is going to argue that an hon. member has not the right, in the course of a clause by clause discussion of this bill, to say that being the case and this being a vital element in the bill, the minister should assist us in obtaining the kind of information we wish in the only place that information can be obtained, from the president of the industrial development bank and the governor of the bank.

The minister told us that he had some general discussions with the governor of the bank with regard to this whole scheme. I have suggested that it was perhaps a result of the suggestions made by the governor of the bank that these amendments were being put forward to improve the industrial development bank. The minister can tell us whether, as a result of having this general discussion with the governor of the bank or with the bank's officials, he is now able, on reflection, to give us some of the answers for which we are asking. Surely, no one is going to contend that this House of Commons should be called upon to pass this measure without being able to determine how the bank is going to raise this money and what the effect of raising this money, through its investment portfolio or other methods, will have on the general position of the Bank of Canada.

The hon. member for Greenwood says we are making a laughing stock of ourselves. I do not know exactly what interpretation he wished to have placed on those words. I say we will be making a laughing stock of ourselves if this high court of parliament is not able to obtain directly from the Minister of Finance or vicariously through some other means, answers to these questions. These questions are not being put forward merely for the sake of provocation. They are proper questions. Let me tell my hon. friend just how serious this matter is.

When the Industrial Development Bank Act was first introduced the bill was sent to the banking and commerce committee. The governor of the bank of that day, namely Mr. Towers, appeared and he was asked questions along these lines. If it was right to have another means of ascertaining what the information was in these particulars then, is it any less so now when we are raising the capital that will be available for capital purposes fourfold from $100 million to $400 million?

Mr. Macdonnell: It was a new departure then. The situation is entirely different.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it was a new departure then and of course he is right. My hon. friend says it was altogether different. I will admit it was a new departure, but I would ask him to look at what this bill is doing. This bill is now going to give credit not to restricted groups in our industrial and economic life. Under clause 1 of this bill any industrial enterprise, meaning an enterprise in which is carried on any industry—not a particular industry but any industry—trade or business undertaking of any kind, will potentially be able to qualify for credit assistance. That was not the situation under the bill which was before the banking and commerce committee and to which the governor of the Bank of Canada at that time addressed himself. As the minister himself said in a statement in chief, this represents a very important departure in the structure of the industrial development bank. When we are theoretically going to properly extend credit potentially to every industrial enterprise and when we are raising the capital to this amount, surely we should be able to ascertain from the bank or from the government exactly how this money is going to be raised. Are we to treat the Bank of Canada as something separate altogether from the operations of the government? That has not been the argument of the Minister of Finance in the last four or five days. He has said, as has the Secretary of State, that the Bank of Canada must be subservient to the will of parliament. How can the will of parliament in this instance be exercised if we are to take the position taken by my honourable and estimable friend the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member allow me to make a comment?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend wishes to do so.

Mr. Macdonnell: If we were discussing the advisability of broadening the operations of the bank and if he had questions as to that matter, I would think that they are important and well worth discussing. But to discuss a technical matter of $25 million for an institution—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it is a technical matter. I do not understand his use of the phrase "technical matter" in this context. He says, "What is $25 million?"

An hon. Member: No; he did not say that.

Another hon. Member: That is a Liberal expression.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the present time, when we have a deficit for the last budget year of over $350 million and when the Minister of Finance is anticipating a deficit in the coming year of over $600 million—

Mr. Benidickson: Likely $700 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and when the Canadian Tax Foundation says that the deficit is going to be $700 million, I assure the hon. member for Greenwood that, whatever he may have said, the impression he has created undoubtedly is that $25 million is not to be calculated in the consideration of the people of this country as a vital matter.

Mr. Benidickson: It is a technical matter, he says.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is $25 million? I say that $25 million is everything. We are entitled to know from the Minister of Finance how that is going to be raised out of bank assets. It is not only $25 million. That is not the only amount that the bank is going to be called upon to subscribe. My hon. friend says "This is a technical matter". Let us assume for the sake of argument that it is a technical matter. He said that if we were going to ask about other aspects such as, for instance, the enlargement of the concept of the kind of organism that can qualify for credit assistance, that might be a different matter. That, too, is an important matter. Would it not be useful to find out through some other source exactly what kind of industrial enterprise is going to be covered when we say "any industry, trade or other business undertaking of any kind". When you relate this to clause 8—

Mr. Benidickson: Clause 7.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When one relates this to clause 8 in particular which addresses itself to chronically unemployed areas; not by direct wording but by implication, one can see how important the examination of this matter is with regard to that matter. But surely the important point in principle now is this. We have the Minister of Finance first of all saying that certain information is confidential. He does not explain how it is confidential. He merely makes the assertion. Often his argumentation consists in mere positive assertion. Then he says, in any event, that the determination of the source of some of this credit will be by the Bank of Canada and that it will decide. Are we to take the position that we can pass this bill without having specific answers to these questions? If the Minister of Finance does not feel himself to be in a position to give these answers or if he does not know these answers, then surely the proper thing for him to do is to provide us with a forum in which to obtain these answers. If we cannot have a committee, surely some forum can be provided. I am sure it would be unusual, but I would suggest that we call the governor of the Bank of Canada to the bar of this house and ask him questions about this matter. Let us do that right in this house.

An hon. Member: Ask him to write another letter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a result of the reluctance of this government to confront the governor of the Bank of Canada in a proper place apparently the only way in which we can get any information is through the governor of the Bank of Canada voluntarily embarking upon an epistolographic procedure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speakman: At the expense of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Drysdale: Explain.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): For the benefit of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin, I may say that "epistolographic" means writing a letter. That is the point. I say this to hon. members. Here we are meeting today at a time when the Social Credit party is holding a national convention.

An hon. Member: Go and join them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no Social Credit member in this party. However, I would just ask hon. members to think of the kind of argument they are going to make, some of them likely within hearing of our very discussion at this moment. They are going to say that here the parliament of Canada was engaged in a discussion of the industrial development bank, that questions were put to the responsible minister of the crown with regard to the source of credit that is going to be made available under this bank to all industrial enterprises that apply for such assistance, and the Minister of Finance said that he could not give that information as this was a decision for the bank. Because that is a decision for the bank, the minister now takes the position that this house is not going to be afforded an opportunity of finding out from direct confrontation with the governor of the bank what the answers to these questions are. That is the situation. I say this to the hon. member for Greenwood. If there is anything that is laughable or if there is anything that is regrettable, it is the situation into which the intransigence of the Minister of Finance has put us with regard to this very matter. That is the situation.

The hon. member for Greenwood is a very honoured and respected member of this house. I say this to him with the greatest of kindness. He has allowed his judgment in this matter and in other matters during the last few days to be beclouded by the image of the Minister of Finance which he respects and bows to almost at every turn. I do not wish in any way to disturb the beautiful friendship that prevails between the hon. member for Greenwood and the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Greenwood is an experienced man and he ought not to allow this infatuation to in any way interfere with his good judgment. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance will still regard me as a friend. I wish to say to him that notwithstanding the very harsh things I have had to say about his policies, I have the highest regard for the Minister of Finance personally.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I believe that my affection for the Minister of Finance is no less intense than that of the hon. member for Greenwood, but I am not going to let my infatuation for an old friend interfere with my right to exercise independent judgment. I hope the hon. member for Greenwood will, after this reasoned argument, join with the rest of us in recognizing that we have a right to obtain this information.

I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance does not tell us. He knows, I am sure, what will be the source of this money. He knows whether it will be out of the investment portfolio, or what percentage will be out of the investment portfolio.

Mr. Benidickson: It will come from the printing presses.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister knows whether it is going to be provided through other methods suggested, and rather seriously suggested, by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. In any event, there is no other way; we cannot force the minister to give us this information if he does not wish to recognize the reasonable proposals that are put forward. I put them forward, and because I think this matter is so vital I hope my colleagues and I will not be alone—

Mr. Drysdale: You will be after the next election.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in our appeal to the minister to recognize this situation. Perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is so helpful in these matters, could assist us; perhaps he could persuade the Minister of Finance—who at the moment is engaged in pensive thoughts, which I hope have some relation to this particular matter—to give us this information.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I will not try to follow the hon. member for Essex East in his psychological wanderings. I know that no power in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth will prevent him from making all kinds of devious political suggestions. I rise purely for one purpose. The hon. member in the course of his wanderings tried to leave the impression that I had referred to the amount of $25 million as a small amount. We think $25 million is a big sum in Greenwood. I wish to make that very clear. My reference to it was purely in its relationship to the large assets of the Bank of Canada. I seek to make that clear, Mr. Chairman, because the hon. member, in his devious way, can leave impressions as he goes along which, innocent as they seem at the moment, are found afterwards to be not nearly as innocent as they appear.

Mr. Drysdale: Beware.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, my affection for the Minister of Finance is no less intense and no less discriminating than that of the hon. member for Essex East. Therefore I am emboldened to repeat the appeal that has been made to the minister to give the committee the information on this matter to which we are entitled. After all, as has been pointed out, on March 14, 1944, there was no argument when the bill to establish the industrial development bank was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

The hon. member for Greenwood said that was a very different matter; that was the establishment of the bank. The hon. member knows, of course, that by this bill the functions of the bank are being extended to a point where they are being altered. This is a very important bill. Surely the importance of the bill does justify the kind of examination before the committee for which we have asked. The capitalization of the bank is being increased by $25 million. The hon. member says this is a technical matter. The doubling of the capitalization of a bank of this kind is more than a technical matter, in conjunction with the enlargement and the extension of its functions.

We ask the minister for information. He cannot give it to us. Therefore we ask that this matter be submitted to the committee where we can obtain the information. He will not do that. If he cannot give us the information, perhaps as we are in committee he could invite—it could be done very quickly; it could be brought into operation in a few minutes—the man who has the information, the governor of the Bank of Canada, to come to the committee and sit in front of him. He could supply the minister with the information to which we are entitled. In that way we would be able to obtain the information to which we are entitled and the minister himself would have a very stimulating experience.

Mr. Benidickson: Who is in front of him right now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition speaks as though he had been here all evening. Actually, he came in late. Some of his colleagues had asked questions and had been given the information and all the answers—

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —before he came in. If the Leader of the Opposition has not been informed of that fact, I inform him now. The information was given. But instead of seeking information we have had these repetitious comments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of them, obviously, is not to obtain information or dispatch the proper business of the house. Anything but. As the Leader of the Opposition was not here when I answered these questions earlier, let me now say for his information that the additional money required to be provided by the Bank of Canada to increase the capital of the industrial development bank will obviously be provided out of the assets of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: That is a brilliant answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The particular assets will be a matter for decision from time to time by the Bank of Canada. It apparently has been completely overlooked by hon. members opposite that it is most unlikely the whole $25 million will be required at one time. That is the reason why the clause provides that the money shall be provided as required from time to time by the board. That is the board of directors of the industrial development bank.

This money will be drawn down from time to time as the credit demands upon the industrial development bank require. The original $25 million capital, if I recall correctly, was not created at one particular time. It was created over a period of time until it reached $25 million and it has continued at that figure for some years now. But be that as it may, I do not think anyone suggests that this additional $25 million is going to be raised all at once. Therefore the clause makes provision for the payment by the Bank of Canada to the industrial development bank of the amount of such subscription—that is the additional $25 million—at such times and in such amounts as the board may determine.

What will happen is that the board of directors of the industrial development bank, as they require the money, will call on the Bank of Canada to provide this additional money by way of capital subscription. At that particular time, in the face of such a request, it will be a matter for decision on the part of the Bank of Canada as to where, out of its various assets, it shall take the money required; whether it shall take it out of its currency holdings or whether it shall raise the money by disposing of some of the assets held in its investment portfolio and using the proceeds for the purpose.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is not merely the question of this $25 million increase in capital but it is also the multiplication of it.

Mr. Benidickson: Five times.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That relates to the next clause, Mr. Chairman. That does not relate to clause 6.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know. The minister need not get excited because I was seeking to save the time of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Why don't you go home then?

Mr. Pickersgill: I was seeking to save the time of the committee by dealing with the one point, which is only one point, on this clause so it would not have to be repeated on the next clause. But if the minister would rather have it raised again on the next clause I will withdraw a few words—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps we had better wait until the next clause.

Mr. Drysdale: Carried?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. At any rate, even if the $25 million comes down only in dribs and drabs, surely the minister has told us over and over again in the last three years that the Bank of Canada is responsible to parliament, not to the government. If this were a government department and not the Bank of Canada the minister would have his officials here. When we asked questions about its operation he would turn to his officials and obtain the information, because parliament would be entitled to have it. Since it is the Bank of Canada and not a government department the minister says, "There is no way at all in which you can obtain the information". The plain fact is that we are entitled to know what effect this provision is going to have on the total money supply of the country.

It is more compelling that we should know this at a time when certain events are going on—I do not know whether any other hon. member has mentioned it—here in Ottawa. What I mean, is Mr. Caouette or Dr. Thompson prescribing the method by which this additional money supply is to be provided? This is serious business, the question of this very considerable increase in credit. How is it provided? What will be its probable effect on price levels? What will be its effect on the economy generally? Surely, if parliament means anything, if parliament is to exercise that ultimate responsibility which the minister says he does not possess but which he says parliament has over the Bank of Canada and, therefore, over the industrial development bank, then parliament must have some means of obtaining the information which will enable us to make an intelligent decision. The minister says we have just got to fly blind. Surely that is not the way to treat parliament.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Aggregate liabilities.

Mr. Benidickson: On clause 7, we go beyond what we were talking about when we discussed clause 6. The minister completely evaded all the questions which had been asked for many minutes and hours in this committee with respect to where the money is going to come from. He has evaded that. He also knows that under the act there is that multiple of funds which can be provided by the Bank of Canada to the commercial banks for an expansionist program, that is, a multiple of 12 to one. But here we are dealing with a multiple of five to one. We have spent some time discussing $25 million. The minister has not indicated in any manner from where that $25 million is going to come. We have said it might come from the sale of some bond holdings by the bank.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we are back on clause 6. This is repetition of what was said on clause 6 which has been adopted.

Mr. Benidickson: We have said—and I am about to conclude, Mr. Chairman—that it might come from the printing press. But now we are dealing with clause 7 and I would draw the attention of all members of the committee to the layman's explanatory notes. This is important, because we received no explanation where the $25 million was going to come from in our discussion under clause 6. It is now, I say, five times more important that we look at clause 7, because the explanatory note to clause 7 says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to increase the authorized borrowing authority of the Bank to an amount not exceeding five times the aggregate amount of its paid up capital and reserve fund.

This committee, under some pressure, has forced the adoption of clause 6 which increased by $25 million the amount that the Bank of Canada could subscribe for stock in the industrial development bank, and now we are on clause 7 where we get this statement that the lending power is five times that amount. The minister has not yet explained in layman's language how the $25 million is to be provided. Will he perhaps attempt on clause 7 to explain whether or not the additional maximum of $125 million is to be raised from the public in bonds that are to be guaranteed by the government of Canada, or whether this sum is to be arranged through the operation of the printing presses of the Bank of Canada?

We remember that the Minister of Finance not long ago deplored, with regard to the unemployment insurance fund, sales of long term holdings of government bonds. Of course, there is a reference here to a reserve fund and the minister might also explain what reserve fund there is, if any, in the industrial development bank. Perhaps the minister would let us know how this $125 million is to be provided.

In other words, if a constituent of mine wanted, say, $250,000 for an industrial purpose under the terms of this act, would the industrial development bank issue a cheque to him? Where does the cheque go? Would the minister explain that to the committee? Where does the industrial development bank get the funds in the first place? And where does every other person wanting $250,000 get the equivalent of $250,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In so far as the provision of financial resources to the industrial development bank for lending purposes is concerned, that is clearly provided for under the clause we have dealt with, and under section 13 of the act and under the clause now being considered. I explained this all very fully when introducing the resolution on June 30. I think the hon. gentleman was here, but evidently he has not absorbed what I then said, so I shall ask him to refer to a paragraph at page 7311 of Hansard in the first column.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister read it? I think everyone here would be content if the hon. gentleman were to read it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said:

> Parliament will be asked to increase the borrowing authority of the bank. The borrowing authority is now limited to three times the aggregate amount of paid up capital and the reserve fund. Briefly, with paid up capital at a level equal to $25 million and a reserve fund standing at approximately $15 million, this means that the borrowing authority now amounts to about $120 million. It is proposed to increase the limit on borrowing to five times the paid up capital and the reserve fund. As a result, and on the basis of a doubling in capital from $25 million to $50 million, the borrowing authority of the bank will reach $325 million. The total resources of the bank, including capital and reserves, will amount to close to $400 million compared with $160 million today. Of course, as the reserve fund builds up from the present level of about $15 million we can expect a further increase in the bank's resources.

It is all fully stated there.

Mr. Benidickson: Five times the 15 as well as five times the 25.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. Five times 50. As to the machinery for dealing with loans, the application is made to the bank and dealt with by one of the bank's 13 offices in various places in Canada and, after investigation, presumably in the case put forward by the hon. member the loan would be approved. After it had been approved and the title had been searched and the necessary documents completed, the money would be paid over.

Mr. Benidickson: When someone asks me to lend them money I require a deposit, some asset or other form of collateral and then I write a cheque or, in some way, convey to the borrower what is asked for by the borrower. The industrial development bank will be lending $125 million and I should like to know what security will have to be provided by the borrower and what amount is to be decided upon as just enunciated, as well as in what form the borrower receives his money.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The borrower will receive funds from the industrial development bank. It has funds raised either in the form of its own capital or under clauses 13 and 14 by borrowing, and having that money on hand. In this case it pays the money out by cheque as anyone else would do under similar circumstances.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Benidickson: I think you should go to the Social Credit convention.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): When shall the said bill be read the third time, now?

Mr. Benidickson: Next sitting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Order. I must put the question, and I ask the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to wait until I do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it will not be necessary to retrace the entire portion of the argument which has been made by a number of hon. members sitting in the opposition. However, I should like once again to remind the house of the provisions of this bill in relation to certain officers in the government service. That is, the deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the governor of the Bank of Canada. The latter serves as the president of the industrial development bank at the present time and no change is made in clause 3 in this context.

In a matter of importance, such as is presented by this bill, where an attempt is being made to assist all industrial enterprises in the country by affording them increased credit facilities, and on that account the credit to be made available is to be not $100 million but $400 million, we should receive from the administration or its emanations the fullest information as to the policies to be pursued, particularly at a time when the nation is confronted with serious economic problems consisting, among others, of a high level of unemployment.

A proposed attempt to mitigate unemployment by special treatment of special areas in the country is opened under this bill in clause 8 and it would be very useful, I am sure, if we could have a full exposition of all that is intended in this regard. We have not been able thus far to obtain from the Minister of Finance full answers to many of our interrogations. We have not been able to receive from the minister responses particularly to those questions addressed to the way in which the Bank of Canada is going to raise the necessary funds which the statute imposes up on it, as indeed was the case in the basic act.

The present governor of the Bank of Canada is, as I say, under this amending statute, the president of the industrial development bank. We have been told by the Minister of Finance that the governor of the bank in the usual way provided suggestions and part of the inspiration, at any rate, for this measure. We have not been informed as to the extent of collaboration in the project by the governor of the Bank of Canada although the minister did not deny the suggestion that, in the light of the document written to the minister on February 15 last, the governor of the Bank of Canada had much to do with the framing of this particular series of amendments. We should take the position that the present governor of the bank under our law is still the governor of the Bank of Canada, and it is not open to any member of this house or to any member of the government to suggest what course parliament—by parliament I mean its two houses—will take with regard to the opportunity of further participation in public service by that hon. gentleman. He is the governor of the Bank of Canada and as a result continues to be the president of the industrial development bank.

When the industrial development bank project was first proposed in 1944 the bill went to the banking and commerce committee and the then governor of the bank, Mr. Towers, appeared before that committee and explained its purposes. It is true that marked the first venture in this field in Canada, as we were reminded a few moments ago by the hon. member for Greenwood. However, the enlargement and the increased scope now being provided for the industrial development bank under these amendments to include all industrial enterprises represents such a fundamental departure, and I believe a wise one, that we should have from those in the government service who are qualified to give us the information that further information thus far not given us during our discussions.

I think it would have been very useful if the Minister of Finance had accepted the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that some of the questions to which he did not feel disposed to reply, and questions which he thought were not within his sphere of authority, might have been replied to vicariously tonight by him if the governor of the Bank of Canada had been asked, as has on other occasions been done, to take his place in front of the minister to provide answers, as is usually done by deputy ministers or other selected officials when ministers are presenting estimates or putting forward special legislative enactments.

I believe it is in the interests of a further elucidation of this bill that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee at which time we should ask the governor of the Bank of Canada to come before that committee—not only the governor of the bank but one of the new officials in government service who is now to become a new director of the bank namely, the deputy minister of trade and commerce. I think it would be useful if we had these gentlemen and perhaps others give some indication of the scope intended in the programs they have in mind.

For those reasons Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred to the banking and commerce committee with instruction that the president of the industrial development bank and the directors be invited to appear before the committee for examination on the existing and proposed functions of the said bank.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I submit this amendment is out of order. On third reading the kind of amendment that is in order is one calling for reference back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of making certain changes in the bill. This kind of motion is of a different nature. It proposes to refer the bill to a standing committee of the house. The proper time for such a motion, of course, is immediately following second reading of the bill or, if it is a case of referring not the bill but the subject matter of the bill, it can be introduced on amendment to the motion for second reading. In my submission it is too late now in our proceedings to bring forward such a motion. It is not a proper amendment to the motion for third reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had time to find in Beauchesne the exact form but the form is taken precisely from Beauchesne's typical forms with relation to the kind of motion that can be moved on third reading, and that is why it was moved in this particular form. It was felt that with the great weight of Dr. Beauchesne's knowledge of the rules he would not have put a form in the rule book for a motion of this kind on third reading unless it was competent to do so, because it is hardly likely that that distinguished clerk of the house who presided at the table for so long would have sought deliberately to mislead the house.

The minister has not taken the trouble to cite any authorities for his suggestion that the motion is out of order. In his usual fashion he merely stated that such and such is the rule. We know from previous experience with the minister that those pontifical statements that he is so fond of making are nearly always—I will not say they are quite always—wrong, but they are so rarely right as to be the kind of exception that proves no rule.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the very distinguished former clerk of the House of Commons, drew his experience and his inspiration from his predecessor, Mr. Bourinot. In Bourinot's fourth edition at page 530, citation XV, you will find this with regard to third reading:

> When the order of the day for the third reading has been read, it is competent to move—

He cites two things that can be done.

> —that it be discharged and the bill withdrawn, or that it be recommitted.

Then he goes on to discuss what had been the practice formerly with regard to suggesting amendments at that stage, but he points out:

> —but of late years the house has followed the modern practice of the English commons, which is stated in a standing order: "No amendments, not being merely verbal, shall be made to any bill on the third reading." Whenever it is proposed to make important amendments, it is usual to move to discharge the order for the third reading, and to go back into committee for the purpose.

That is, the same committee from which the bill has emerged. I think this clearly indicates, Mr. Speaker, that on third reading of a bill it is within the competence of anyone in the house to move that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole house but not to change a decision of the house which was made earlier, which was that the bill should be studied in committee of the whole house.

The amendment introduced by the hon. member for Essex East has brought entirely new material forward to the House of Commons tonight. His amendment is clearly out of order. There is only one of two things that may be done to this bill. One is to move that it be discharged and the bill be withdrawn. The other is that it be recommitted to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend give us the page of the citation.

Mr. Churchill: Pages 530 and 531.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is also a reference on page 288 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forgie: The expert again.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now who is bringing in closure?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Order. I might say that I have before me the reference on page 288 to which the Solicitor General is going to address himself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would point out that it says:

> On the second reading of a bill, an amendment may be moved expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution, or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees or commissions, the production of papers or other evidence, or the opinion of judges. This cannot be done on third reading because it is not directly connected with any provision of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say just another word, Mr. Speaker, before you make a ruling? I listened with care to what was said by the government leader. The government leader said there were only two kinds of motions that could be made on third reading. One was to discharge the bill and the other was to recommit it. Of course Your Honour must be aware, and I am sure the government leader is aware, that on third reading it is perfectly competent to move the six-months' hoist, and it is perfectly competent to move what is called a reasoned amendment—that has been done very frequently—setting out reasons why the bill should not now be read a third time. What is being done here, of course, is precisely to move a reasoned amendment as to why the bill should not now be read a third time. Our position is that the bill should not now be read a third time because we need more information on which to base our judgment whether the bill should be read a third time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): I thank hon. members for their assistance. The authority referred to by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and by the Solicitor General gives me the precedents I require to make this ruling. The only portion of citation 418 which was not referred to by the Solicitor General was the part reading as follows:

> All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

I might use that additional authority to support my ruling. I would judge that the contents of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East did introduce new material and accordingly I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would Your Honour not agree that it was not new material which was introduced but simply procedure to deal with existing material? This is really the situation which I put with great respect to Your Honour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): That may be so, but I still feel on the basis of the other authorities cited that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka seeks to speak to a ruling which has already been made and I accordingly put the question. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Those opposed will please say nay. In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no nays.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Several months have passed, Mr. Chairman, since the house gave second reading to this Bill No. C-71, an act respecting the civil service of Canada, and then referred it to a special committee for the purpose of study and report. This committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, has applied itself with great determination and patience to a very important task. I am sure that I simply voice the sentiments of all hon. members of this committee when I pay tribute and express the gratitude of hon. members to this special committee for the study that they have given to this bill.

The report of the committee is set forth at pages 723 to 727 of Votes and Proceedings for June 26, where all of the amendments recommended by the committee are to be found. The committee held many meetings. They entertained representations from all of the civil service associations and, indeed, at least several of them were heard on more than one occasion. It may be said, therefore, that the fullest hearing has been accorded to those who are particularly interested in the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I do not need to remind the committee that a great deal of study had been expended in the drafting of this measure before it was introduced at the present session and before its predecessor was introduced in the 1960 session of parliament. The committee has added to that study one of the most intensive studies that I think has been given to any bill for many a year. All those hon. members of this house who served on that committee I think have justly earned and deserve the thanks of hon. members.

I, of course, did not attend the meetings of the committee, Mr. Chairman, except the first meeting and the last. However, I know that hon. members would wish a special word of thanks to be extended to the chairman, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. The committee was evidently able to proceed with its duties in an atmosphere of calm and reasonableness, and much of the credit for the conduct of the proceedings of the committee is due the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond.

Now, a question may arise as to the status of the amendments proposed by the committee. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that as the sponsor of the bill in this house I am happy to accept the amendments proposed by the committee to the bill. As we proceed in committee of the whole on the clauses of the bill, the amendments will be moved to the clauses and so far as I am concerned, as sponsor of the bill, I make it very clear I am happy to accept all of the amendments proposed by the committee. I believe they do improve the bill over the form in which it was originally introduced and given second reading.

I know that all hon. members in the present deliberations of the committee of the whole will have regard for the fact that this bill has received, on the part of the special committee, a most thorough examination.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, we are presented, in the dying days of the session, with a bill that certainly does not have the urgency which is apparently being ascribed to it. Salaries were raised not so long ago, and it cannot be expected that the civil servants will have to come back to the government in the near future, something which would justify the immediate passing of this Bill C-71 before we come back in September.

However, the government has decided that this bill should be submitted to the house before adjournment. Being outnumbered, we shall have to accept.

I agree with the minister that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) deserves to be commended for leading the committee with great intelligence and skill and for managing, despite some rather sharp differences of opinion at times, to maintain an atmosphere of harmony such as does not exist in every committee.

I must say to the minister that when the government has names to suggest for membership in committees, an effort should be made to consider personalities, but whenever we have a chairman such as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, we may still meet with problems but there will never be cause for bitter discussions. I therefore wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy to all hon. members, and particularly to members of the opposition.

The committee met a number of times. We considered the bill very carefully. I must also thank those who appeared as witnesses, such as the members of the civil service commission, the representative of the treasury board and the representatives of the associations, whose specialized knowledge was very helpful. Frankly, without their assistance and support, the situation would have been extremely difficult. I want to acknowledge their ability and generosity in that regard. In some cases, we may have pressed our questions a little too far, but they always answered our questions with equal co-operation and made our task very easy.

We had a statute that had been on the books since 1918. It obviously needed revamping, because it is impossible to tell 50 years ahead of time what is going to happen.

When the first legislation was enacted, Canada was a colony and the civil service was not as large as it is now. In the meantime we had two wars, during which it was necessary to increase personnel.

Since Canada achieved independence and became a free country, our relations with other countries have been extended; this has called for the establishment of a Department of External Affairs which considerably increased the burden of the civil service as far as selection of personnel is concerned. In my opinion the act, even though outdated, has served its purpose well and, until this year, we did not have too much trouble in the matter of salaries and working conditions. This may be due to the fact that, under the previous administration, or the preceding ones, there were people in office who could act with benevolence, who understood the workers, the needs of employees. That is why there may have been discussion with civil servants and their associations, but we never felt the need to seek a set protection provided by law, because we knew how to get along with them and granted them, if not all they were asking for, at least what they were entitled to expect from a government.

There were no secret documents at that time. There was no injustice due to delays in granting salary increases, as happened recently when employees were granted raises, between April and October, that were not retroactive. Those raises applied only from the day the department had decided to grant them, and so, for six months, some civil servants lost an increase they were entitled to expect. Why was this done? I do not know, and no explanation was ever given in that regard. I even wonder whether the minister can explain his delay in the matter.

Only this government could spoil everything and make civil servants suspicious of the government.

The new legislation certainly contains improvements. There are some items which considerably improve upon the old act; they have been seriously considered, but they do not amount to all the improvements the civil servants have a right to expect.

I have here a press release sent by the civil service association's chairman, Mr. Best. This is what he says:

(Text):

C.S.A.C. national President J. C. Best has issued the following statement dealing with the amendments to clauses 7, 10, and 69 of Bill C-71, the revised Civil Service Act. The statement has been approved by the executive committee of the association and represents the official position of the C.S.A.C. The statement said:

"The civil service association of Canada has now studied the provisions of clauses 7, 10, and 69 of Bill C-71 (the Civil Service Act) as amended by the special committee of the House of Commons on June 23. Since passage by the committee more or less assures acceptance by the House of Commons, this association now wishes to record its comments on the clauses which, unfortunately could not be made before the committee.

Generally speaking there can be no doubt that the amended clauses represent improvement over the original forms of clauses 7 and 10. However, the association and its members are disappointed that certain basic principles of our position could not gain acceptance in the committee or from the government. We are as concerned with too rigid legislation as is the government. However, we do not feel that the position we took before the committee requesting negotiation, consultation and arbitration implied any rigidity whatsoever. We viewed these principles as minimum safeguards to the rights of civil servants.

In introducing these amendments the Minister of Finance emphasized the need for good will and good faith on the part of all concerned. With this viewpoint we can readily agree. However, we would point out that such a climate is more readily achieved if the legislation under which we work enumerates certain basic principles which, in our view, are essential to a satisfactory employer-employee relationship within the government service.

Our major area of concern is the lack of definition of what constitutes consultation and whether it is synonymous with negotiation as we view it. We are also concerned that there is no means whatsoever in the legislation to solve fundamental points of disagreement which must, from time to time, arise regardless of how much good faith is evidenced by the parties concerned. We thus feel that the refusal of some constitutionally acceptable form of arbitration will inhibit the staff associations in their representations and will provide additional strains on the "consultative process".

Our other major concern is the government's belief that after so many years we can in effect only now begin to evolve a satisfactory system of dealing between it and its employees on matters concerning salaries, wages and working conditions. In the absence of any indication as to how long the government feels such an evolutionary process should take we are deeply concerned that we may be faced with many more years of struggle to achieve what we feel are legitimate and necessary goals. We do feel that some firm indication is needed on the government's part as to how long it feels this process will take, and when the question of changing the legislation to come closer to our wishes can again expect to be raised before a parliamentary committee. We feel that three to five years is as long as we should be expected to rely on evolution, in view of the long period that has passed without significant change. While we can see validity in a program of gradualism where no precedents exist for guidance, we do not feel that this applies to the present situation.

The civil service association of Canada will do everything possible to assist in working out proper machinery under the act.

(Translation):

As you see, Mr. Chairman, the association was very willing to co-operate with the government. But civil service organizations have some misgivings. Can you blame them for it? Their representatives asked that certain basic protections be included in the legislation. They were not given satisfaction, and they have some misgivings in this respect, because, during the three or four years that this government has been in power, difficulties have always cropped up when these people tried to obtain a salary increase or reasonable working conditions.

In the first case, the civil service commission had recommended not to grant any raises in salaries. The Minister of Finance immediately informed the public of the decision that the requested increases were not being granted.

However, when, on a second occasion, the civil service commission recommended an increase to the department, which submitted the matter to the treasury board, and when an increase had been recognized acceptable and was to be granted, the position was quite different. Nobody in Canada knew what was going to happen. The minister kept his great secret to himself. The report was held to be a document which could not be revealed either to the house, or to the public, or to federal employees.

It was necessary to wait until the government was ready to say, in April, what categories of civil employees would benefit from a salary increase, as from the first of that month; in May, another group of federal civil servants would be granted a raise, but from May 1 and not April 1. In June, another group of civil servants would be granted an increase, but only as from June the first.

That is how the government went about it, from month to month, granting successive salary increases, but never allowing the civil servants to benefit from retroactivity to April 1, which was the date of the first increase which had been granted, so that federal employees lost some of their confidence in this government; and they can scarcely be blamed for it.

As federal civil servants stated themselves, they accepted the situation, but unwillingly. They are not satisfied with the way they were treated by the government, and they cannot be blamed for that either.

In spite of some improvements, civil servants were sadly disappointed. They had hoped to be treated as first class employees; they had hoped that, as in industry, they would be able to meet the government's representatives and discuss their working conditions and salaries man to man, and not as slaves facing a master.

But at that stage the minister decided that there should be no more than consultation, not negotiation. Those civil servants remain second class citizens, because the Minister of Finance decided that he could not grant them the right of negotiating on a basis of equality with their employer.

That is a situation which is not accepted anywhere in the world, in industry, and it is essential that the government recognize that its employees are entitled to meet their employer and to discuss their working conditions and their salaries man to man. The Canadian government had to be the first to withhold recognition of that right.

The Saskatchewan government is known to have recognized that principle. Did the civil servants in Saskatchewan experience any difficulties? Not in the least. The government and its employees finally agreed on all points, and even if the parties concerned did not obtain all they wanted, they secured a good deal, which enabled them to accept something which did not reduce them to a subordinate standing as human beings.

Why did the federal department reject a request to negotiate? Some officials have stated that the suggestion of the minister had finally been accepted, though it was far from satisfactory, because they had no choice.

The minister indicated that the words "consultation" and "negotiation" meant about the same thing. On this subject, I have here a release issued by the federated association of mail-carriers of Canada, which states:

(Text):

The minister, in his preamble, pointed out that after consulting various dictionaries he was unable to see where the word "consultation" did not meet the same requirements as the word "negotiation". He also stated that he did not favour writing into legislation detailed provisions for negotiation and arbitration.

Whilst the amendment submitted by the minister is, to some extent, an improvement on the original draft of the proposed clause, it does not, in our opinion, give staff associations the protection to which they are entitled.

We fail to see—and we have also consulted dictionaries—where the words "consultation" and "negotiation" are synonymous; on the contrary, we find that there is a vast difference between the two.

When this association submitted its brief it did not suggest that detailed provisions for negotiation and arbitration should be written into the act; we did feel very strongly, however, that the word "negotiation" should be written into the act where it now mentions "consultation",—

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have looked up dictionaries, and this is what I have found:

Negotiator: A person who is appointed to discuss with someone. The negotiators of an alliance.

Negotiation: The act of negotiating important public or private business. That business itself. To break off, to resume negotiations. The act of transferring, of surrendering commercial papers.

Negotiate: To carry on business. To carry on business in the east. Of commercial papers or drafts, to transfer, to pass on to somebody else. To discuss through diplomatic channels or with an individual. To be negotiated, to be the subject of negotiations.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, this is what the dictionary has to say about the word "consultation" and its derivatives:

Consultant: A person who gives advice, as a lawyer, a doctor. One who seeks a consultation.

Consultation: The act of consulting. The study of a case by one or more lawyers, of a patient by one or more doctors. Advice given by lawyers, doctors. A conference held to consider a case.

[Mr. Caron.]

Consult: To seek the opinion of someone. To consider in order to gather information, an explanation. To consult a book. To confer, to deliberate. They are consulting each other. To give consultations. To consult oneself, to deliberate within oneself.

It can be seen that, in one case, the word "consult" means to parley, to hold parleys, while "negotiation" means to parley for a specific purpose, and it is precisely what the postal employees and employees in the other divisions of the civil service have asked for—the right to negotiate rather than the right to consult.

Besides, as far as the principle of consultation is concerned, whether the minister inserts it in the act or not he has granted nothing more to them, for there has been consultations in the past. In fact, whenever government employees have had the privilege to parley with the authorities, those of course were consultations; but that was all. They met with the authorities of the department and explained their problems. The authorities acknowledged the explanation of the problems, dismissed the employees and held discussions among themselves and the civil servants were not informed of what had happened.

On the other hand, when negotiations are held the representatives remain together to the end and they are there and know what the employer's final decision—in this case the government's decision—will be.

That is what they want to know. Therefore, there should be more co-operation between the two parties, so that the civil servants know, before being kicked out, what has been the final decision reached by the government.

They want to know where things stand and what other representations they might make in case they did not get satisfaction.

There are also a number of strange things in the bill before us.

For instance, the civil servants have asked that the word "grievance" be defined. The committee, with the support of its majority, has refused this suggestion. I later made the same suggestion myself, and was told this was not necessary, as the wording was clear enough. As a result, I have come to wonder whether lawyers do not have a special purpose in mind when they say everything is clear. In fact, I wonder if this is not a way of getting more cases and providing for longer and therefore more profitable discussions. I wonder if that could be their purpose.

The civil servants have asked for a clear definition of the word "grievance". They were told no, there was no need for that, as everyone knew what it meant.

Yet there are many definitions in the bill, but when it came to the word "grievance", the government objected.

Those people only asked that the word "grievance" be described as such. A grievance is a reason alleged for a complaint. It would have been easy for the minister to accept that the simple word grievance be defined.

It might have made the bill clearer. Perhaps it would have been repetitive. I do not think so, not being afflicted with the quirks of the legal mind. It would probably be a clarification involving repetition, as lawyers felt it was clear. It seems to me, however, that in the circumstances, the simple word "grievance" might have been made clear, as this would have clarified the bill. Besides there is always room for improving a rather confused situation.

Confidential reports and delays of applications which cause unfair losses with this new word "consultation" instead of "negotiation" will again arise. The government will again be faced with the same problems, though it can ill afford such problems.

Indeed the government does not have to wait for its pay to survive; it is not the government that suffers from working conditions; it is the employees.

The employees are the ones who suffer. They are the ones who want to remove the causes of friction and the difficulties they have been faced with, and have them replaced by smooth discussions, so that when a final settlement has been reached, they will be able to say to the government: Here is what we suggest. We have had discussions with the staff and have reached an agreement. We now ask parliament to refuse or accept the decision reached by the government as a result of discussions with its staff.

The minister has referred to arbitration. He referred to it as something highly dangerous. He said he opposed it because he wanted to protect the rights of parliament.

It is rather astonishing to hear such words from the minister—to protect the rights of parliament. Indeed, since 1958, we in the opposition have many times had occasion to complain that the rights of parliament were disregarded by this government, who often took advantage of its overpowering majority to disregard our legitimate requests, to refuse to produce documents we needed, to turn down our suggestions that matters be referred to committees, to refuse to bring forward its legislation in time so that we could study it, to refuse to announce the business for the session.

And now the minister rises and says he wants to protect the rights of parliament.

When it comes to minor employees who cannot defend themselves, oh, they want to protect the rights of parliament. Members of parliament can easily protect themselves when their rights are interfered with.

Civil servants cannot take such steps. If they raise their voices, their employer can make trouble for them.

That is why I say the act could have been improved. Civil servants should have been given collective bargaining like provincial employees have in Saskatchewan. There has not been more trouble in that province; in fact, there has been less than here. Why?

Because that provincial government has gained the confidence of its employees, while, here, the present employees of the various services or various associations no longer trust the government. The reason is that they have been unfairly treated in the past three or four years, that is, since the present government came to power.

Parliament's rights would not be threatened if we accepted or encouraged bargaining.

The only case where the rights of parliament could be threatened would be if the minister arbitrarily decided to grant salary increases without consulting parliament or without previously asking the latter to approve the necessary funds.

When parliament is consulted with respect to decisions which have already been taken and which involve the government and some other body, be it a civil servants' organization, a provincial government or a foreign government, it cannot be said that there has been encroachment upon the fundamental rights of parliament, because in all those cases, the government has come to an agreement.

One example of that is the agreement between the Canadian government and the United States government on the South Saskatchewan river dam. Was there any encroachment upon parliament's rights because that agreement was signed before it was submitted to parliament? Did we take offence? No, because we knew that sooner or later parliament would have full opportunity to discuss it and that it would have a final say in the matter.

In this case, naturally, giving bargaining rights to employees would in no way threaten or challenge parliament's prerogatives because if there were a dispute, they would just submit their case to an independent body which would hear the evidence and submit its recommendations to parliament. Those recommendations would either be endorsed or turned down.

There has been some talk about the employees' right to go on strike. Only one association mentioned it but did not insist.

In fact, civil servants already have that right since anything which is not specifically prohibited is permissible.

Now, nothing in the previous act prohibits civil servants from going on strike. The same situation prevails in England.

Yet, civil servants have not taken advantage of that right.

Nothing in this bill forbids employees from going on strike; therefore, they still have that right since there is no prohibition in that connection. Consequently, civil servants have the right to strike.

At any rate, that is idle talk because civil servants neither have the intention nor the desire to call a strike.

Most staff organizations, the civil service association of Canada, the civil service federation of Canada and the professional institute of the public service of Canada have stated most emphatically that they have no intention of calling strikes or of taking advantage of their right to do so regardless of whether or not it is in our statutes.

I might add that it is not in their interests to go on strike since they have other means at their disposal, especially if they are given bargaining rights.

Those recommendations have been turned down. Why? I could not say. Certain lawyers say that the answer is obvious even though they feel a need to discuss the point. They fear repetitions; yet, that would be conducive to a clarification of this matter.

It was said that this is obvious; still, lengthy discussions took place, questions were asked and long talks were held. However, when asked to tell exactly what would be the prevailing rates, they refused to answer saying it was clear.

There were ten members in attendance, and five of them were not of that opinion. As a matter of fact, the commission's interpretation was often at variance with that of the members of the committee.

It is quite clear that there was a lack of precision there. A text should be given the meaning it should have.

A bill does not have to be a piece of literature but still it must be clearly worded, even if repetitions are involved.

That is why it would have been better for some points to be clarified.

As far as prevailing rates are concerned, I think it was wrong not to accept the suggestions made by the spokesmen of the association.

Another feature of this act which may be criticized is the fact that it grants too full powers to deputy heads. Already those powers were not inconsiderable, yet they are further extended. The deputy heads may do as they wish in order to crush any employee they dislike, because they are sole masters according to the commission and the government. Such a situation should not exist under a civil service act.

I suggest that the powers given the deputy heads and their responsibilities should be limited; that the commission should have the last word—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his speaking time is up.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that the hon. member be allowed to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Thank you, and I also thank the committee for allowing me to continue. I hope I will not be too long.

Deputy heads have powers that are too extensive while the commission gets too little. I think that powers should be given the commission. In fact, the commission deals with individuals that it does not know. Not knowing them, it can examine the matter objectively without saying: "This is the case of So and So; I do not like the looks of him." We often meet people we dislike at first sight. Well, deputy heads are no exception. The civil service commission sends a man over but as he does not like the looks of the applicant, he sidetracks him and, at the first opportunity, the commission manages to fire him on the pretence that he does not give satisfaction. I think that deputy heads are granted too much power. I am sure that, even in the ranks of the government members, there are people who agree with me on this subject. I met some in the committee who felt the same as I do. The powers of the deputy heads should be limited, and those of the commission should be increased, because in the last analysis, it is the commission that cannot feel any bitterness against any one.

I also think that too much power is given the governor in council. That is a natural tendency with the Tories which we cannot countenance. The governor in council reserves too many powers to himself.

When considering this bill, clause by clause, we will have an opportunity to submit amendments to this effect. That the governor in council has some rights, I admit, but those rights should be limited. They should be well defined, so as to avoid all risks of overriding the powers of some other group. That is why we should be careful when granting such extended powers to the governor in council.

Something else is lacking in this legislation, which is not made clear, because it is claimed this has been handed to the commission to draw regulations therefrom: it is the rights of appeal which are not properly defined. Even if this is included in the regulations, and even if the regulations are considered in consultation with employees' associations, I suggest it would be much clearer if it were provided in the act that certain points may constitute cause for appeal in order to protect the lower civil servant who, often, is the victim of more important people who take advantage of their position—they are those whom we usually call beggars on horseback—to oppress those around them. We often see petty officials who, having climbed the social and official ladder, lose all notions of decency and crush everyone under them. I suggest we should provide for such cases in including very definite rights of appeal in the act.

There is another case which has not been corrected, and which should have been. It is that of veterans. The protection we had provided for them, under the former act, is included in the new one. But neither the former act nor this one provide any recognition for those who served in the army but remained in Canada, against their own wishes, because their special knowledge was required for some work in Canada rather than in Europe or elsewhere. To those veterans is denied the right of preference over others. You may say: "Of course, but the others, it is them who decided to risk their lives abroad." But, they too were prepared to go overseas to risk their lives. But they were kept in Canada because they were needed here. All the same those soldiers had some merit, but it is not recognized. A new act is enacted which completely ignores those who stayed in Canada. I claim that the government should amend the act to give those veterans some advantage, not as much as for the others, but when they pass an examination they should be allowed an advantage of 10 or 15 per cent so that they may have a better chance of being eligible for the civil service.

Those are a few of the amendments which could be moved.

However, notwithstanding the briefs of the conseil de la vie française and the St. John the Baptist Society, I say that there has been no improvement introduced as far as bilingualism is concerned. Confederation is almost 100 years old and we are still treated as the poor relations of the majority. Is it normal that after some 100 years of common existence, we should still be considered as poor relatives? I would have thought that after 100 years, we should know each other well enough and understand each other well enough that prejudices would no more exist.

At present, does the bilingual individual, either French or English, have any advantage? If he is bilingual, he should be considered superior to others. We generally recognize that the minority becomes superior, and that is a necessity imposed by nature. In every country where there is a minority and a majority, we know that the minority, due to its condition, has to become intellectually superior to become the equal of the majority. That we recognize.

I am not asking that everyone learn French or that everyone learn English, but when one knows both languages, he should enjoy special consideration. I suggest that those who are bilingual should get special consideration and this would encourage the study of both languages. In fact, if in a civil service competition a candidate can say he knows the spoken language of the other part of the country if not its written one I say he should be granted at least 5 per cent more than the others who cannot do as well, so that he may have a better opportunity of earning and promotion. This would favour all those who care to study another language. Even when it is not definitely necessary, they could do it as a means of improving their cultural standards.

Besides, the hon. member from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) suggested in committee—and

I entirely agree with him—that the civil service organize both a French course and an English course for those who do not have adequate knowledge of the other language to help them to be prepared for better positions. I think that suggestion should be most seriously considered. For the time being, I will not move an amendment in that regard, because I know it would mean immediate expenditures and under the rules, I cannot move neither in the house nor in committee, an amendment that would result in an additional expenditure. But I do hope the government will continue to give consideration to that matter in order to encourage people to further their intellectual development. I am sure that by granting a 5 per cent more to those who would be able to show in a competition that they know the two languages spoken in this country, we would reach this objective. In this way, the act would be amended in such a way that everybody, and especially the civil servants, would be satisfied, because they would be the ones to suffer if the act were not satisfactory and were left as long as the old act without being amended. At that rate, many of those employees would be dead a long time before ever seeing their lot improved.

Well, I ask the government if it will consider it carefully.

As far as bilingualism is concerned, here is a recent development. Notice had been given of a promotion competition for the office of director of district No. 2 which includes part of the country of Pontiac, the counties of Gatineau, and of Hull, part of the counties of Labelle, Argenteuil, Russell, Stormont, Ottawa East and Ottawa West, as well as many neighbouring counties. There are a great many French speaking Canadians in that district, and I asked the minister why a bilingual employee was not required for that office. He replied that this was not necessary, since the district includes an important part of Ontario, and therefore a bilingual employee was not required. Nevertheless, while we are dealing with a postal district, even where post offices might not be as important as those in Montreal, Toronto or Ottawa, such opportunity could well have been taken to require that a bilingual director be appointed. Many people are qualified for that office. But no: it was decided that this was not necessary. And the minister told us the other day that the decision was the responsibility of the civil service. That statement is wrong: such decision does not come from the civil service, but from the officials of the Post Office Department who decide which qualifications will be required, and the civil service sets out its competition according to those requirements. Therefore, the department has the right to ask for a bilingual director, be it a French speaking or an English speaking person, provided it is a bilingual employee.

When the mail-carrying service was inaugurated at Gatineau, they had to call upon a bilingual official from Montreal, because the head of the service in Ottawa could not speak French. They realized thus that bilingualism is a necessity; and yet, they did not think it advisable to remedy the situation.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I took up more time than was kindly granted me by the house. We shall have occasion to take the matter up again and propose amendments to several clauses.

(Text):

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Was the hon. member speaking of the civil service or of his relatives?

Mr. Caron: That is a fine question but I suggest you should direct it to the Minister of Finance, because I would not stoop that low. Some of my relatives may be in the civil service—

Mr. Hicks: Some of mine are too.

Mr. Caron: Yes, some of your relatives may be in the civil service too but I am not responsible for that. I can tell you this: if some members of my family are in the civil service they are there of their own accord, because I did not give them recommendations. I can state that I do not intend to give any member of my family a recommendation for employment in the civil service.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I am happy to report that no such suggestion was discussed there. The proceedings of the committee were not conducted on the level of the last question.

I should like to congratulate the chairman of the committee because I think he did a good job as chairman. He understood the problems that were being discussed. He was lenient with the points of view with which he did not agree, and if there was an honest difference of opinion in the committee he was willing at all times to allow the matter to stand over to see whether some compromise could not be worked out. I think this is the kind of job that a chairman should do and I was certainly pleased to be a member of that committee. I highly recommend the hon. gentleman to the government as an excellent and capable chairman.

The remarks that I have to make cannot be made in the light of whether I have relatives in the civil service because to the best of my knowledge I have none. Very few civil servants in my riding are in the category of office staff. With the exception of a very limited number my riding does not consist of civil servants. Therefore, I was interested in this matter not on the basis of patronage, not on the basis of what we could get out of it but rather on the basis of what we could put into the committee to accomplish what we all really want, namely the best civil service and the best possible agreement for those civil servants because this is the way to establish a very active and effective civil service body.

In my opinion the members of the civil service commission who attended on a number of occasions were very co-operative in their replies. They were willing to discuss in very broad and effective terms the matters that fell within their jurisdiction.

I agree with the previous speaker with regard to the presentation of our regional arguments having to do with improvement in the civil service. That problem still remains with us. I refer to the matter of whom the civil servants negotiate with, what type of relationship exists between the civil service commission and the civil servants themselves, the civil service associations and representations. I believe this is the crux of the disagreement between the government and the opposition. This is also the reason why the Civil Service Act was opened up at this time. As has been said, there is at the present time no disagreement over salaries or wages but there will continue to be a disagreement if the same type and method of negotiation is continued that took place at the time the civil servants received their last pay increase. I believe the civil servants themselves have the right to know with whom they negotiate, how they negotiate with whatever body is selected for negotiation and what results come from those negotiations. It is still confusing in my mind and I think in the minds of most Canadian civil servants as to whom they negotiate with.

This matter is not nearly as simple as if you were negotiating with management in a plant where you might find that the management really did not have any say because there was a board of directors over that management. But in that case you do know that the representations you make to management in those negotiations are referred to the board of directors. In the case of civil servants' negotiations I am not too sure with whom they are negotiating and I am sure that they are not. We heard such terms kicked around as the governor in council, the treasury board, the civil service commission and the parliament of Canada itself. I think that in solving some of the problems that have been apparent over the past three years we will have to make a change. This is not one of the changes that has been suggested but we shall have to make a fundamental change so the civil servant and his association will know how to proceed in negotiating under the normal procedure commonly referred to in other acts administered by the federal government. I refer specifically to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

In other countries civil service commissions have been given authority to make representations in relation to pay and to other conditions of work. They make those representations after having consulted with the associations that represent the employees. When they make those representations to the government, or to the cabinet, a decision has to be arrived at at that level. The governor in council will decide on behalf of the government and of parliament what pay increases will be granted to the civil servants. But in most cases that I have examined where the commission was the equivalent to the civil service commission in Canada, those representations were made public and everyone knew what were the suggestions of the civil service commission and on what grounds the submission had been made. Thus the civil service commission retreats from the negotiations because they become political on the one hand and a matter for decision by the members of civil servants themselves through their associations. Negotiations should take place on that level. I think this has not been done by this government. It probably has not been done by any government in Canada in the past. It seems to me this is the crux of the question of a need for change in the Civil Service Act.

Will you call it 10.30, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: The order of business depends to a large extent on whether it will be possible to reach an adjournment on Saturday. But tomorrow government orders will follow in this way, subject to notification to the opposition in good time if it is necessary to make any change: The first item on the order paper, the third reading of Bill C-114; the second item, Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada; and, third, the bill pertaining to the C.N.R. financing. The fourth item will be Bill No. C-120, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Business of the House

I do not know how far the house will get tomorrow. The other items that we have for consideration in the happy event of an early adjournment are the resolution stage of the dominion-provincial fiscal relations legislation which is on the order paper and an appropriation bill dealing with the supply that has already passed the house. We have 11 departments that have passed through the committee. The appropriation bill would deal with just those matters. They would be followed, then, by interim supply, if the house approved, dealing with the departmental estimates that we have not yet concluded. Those appear to be the matters for consideration of the house, if things turn out tomorrow as many members hope they will. If there is a prolonged debate somewhere tomorrow on one of these items, I would hesitate then to forecast what would be the business for Saturday.

It being 35 minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

BOMARC BASE, MONT LAURIER—TENDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 7, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

Government House, Ottawa
5th July, 1961

Members of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament. I thank you sincerely for this address.

Georges Philias Vanier.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

Second report of sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government—Mr. Smith (Simcoe North).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INCOME TAX ACT—NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I inform the house that I will be placing on Votes and Proceedings today certain amendments to the bill to amend the Income Tax Act. To ensure that hon. members opposite will have earlier notice of the text of the amendments I will be sending copies over to them.

FINANCE

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN INVESTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask whether he has taken notice of an article appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 7 entitled:

Europeans sell Canadian investments

The article continues:

Swiss and other Europeans have been withdrawing millions of dollars worth of investment funds from Canada during the past week, fearing inflation and lower bond prices are in store for the country later this year.

This statement has been made by Mr. Walter Keyser of Gairdner and Company, Toronto. I would ask the minister whether the statement is accurate, and if he has any comment to make upon it.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen this article, I would, however, make this comment upon the observations of the hon. member for Laurier. There is no reason whatever for anyone to be fearful of inflation. The policies which the government follows and will continue to follow will be aimed to expand production and employment opportunities in Canada without disturbing the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar.

As far as bond prices are concerned, I might point out that since the budget was introduced on June 20 the bond market has been stronger than it was previously, and that the effect of the strength of the bond market has, of course, meant a corresponding reduction in interest yields.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is it a fact that the exchange stabilization fund has purchased between $30 million and $40 million in Canadian dollars this week to keep the Canadian dollar from falling sharply?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has never been the practice in this house to disclose individual transactions or transactions from day to day of the exchange control fund. There are statements issued periodically which indicate the balance in the fund, but it has never been the practice at any time since the institution of this fund to indicate particular transactions from day to day or particular balances over short periods.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Is the government in a position to announce what its plans are as to the financial needs of the government in the field of borrowing, and thereby restore some stability to the market?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is evidently not acquainted with the market, because there has been more stability in that regard since June 20 than there was previously. With regard to the plans of the government with reference to the financing and meeting of its cash needs, I announced those plans, as is the custom, in the budget speech for the period covered by the present budget. As to particular issues from time to time, it has never been the practice to announce those individually until a particular issue is about to become available.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the reported heavy selling of Canadian securities by foreign investors, does he still deny my prediction in this house on August 10 last—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member heard an earlier question along the same line, and as he continues it seems to me he is more intent on making a point than on getting information. I recognize the hon. member for Trinity-Conception.

Mr. McMillan: I want to ask the minister if he still agrees that there has been a flight from the Canadian dollar.

Some hon. Members: Order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN TRUCKING INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport following a telegram I received this morning from the secretary of the Trucking Association Inc., which reads as follows:

Mr. Alfred Belzile, M.P.
Ottawa, Ont.

Are informed C.N.R. is asking Quebec provincial transport board to acquire trucking companies stop We protest against railway interference in field of private enterprise stop On behalf of our members urgently request your intervention in favour of private enterprise against state monopoly.

(signed) Romeo Blouin

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is reading a telegram which gives certain information. If he has a question, would he please ask it.

(Translation):

Mr. Belzile: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister inform the house as to whether it is official that the C.N.R. intends to compete with private enterprise in the field of highway transport?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is a decision for the authorities of the C.N.R. However, I should like to assure my hon. friend that I will pass on to the C.N.R. officials the representations he has made in that connection.

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, could the minister take that opportunity to impress upon the C.N.R. that it should not enter a field which belongs to private enterprise, especially the trucking industry?

Mr. Balcer: The final decision as to whether or not the C.N.R. will be allowed to purchase or operate a trucking business in the province of Quebec, rests with the Quebec transport board.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. If the C.N.R. takes over that trucking company, would it be possible to request the management not to indulge in a price war with private enterprise?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, my information is that the C.N.R. does not engage in a price war with private enterprise but rather in a fair competition with other carriers.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to comment in respect to a telegram he received from the Springhill citizens' industrial committee?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question was asked as well by the Leader of the Opposition. I received a telegram from Mr. A. J. Mason, chairman of the citizens' industrial committee of Springhill, Nova Scotia, much along the lines of the suggestions that have been made in whole or in part by the hon. member for Cumberland earlier.

At the time I received this telegram referring to the special measures that were being taken by the federal government in the Cape Breton area to assist in providing jobs for the coal miners affected by the mine closures, a request was made that a similar program be introduced at Springhill because of the mine closures in that area and the fact that some of the miners were unemployed. The house will recall that the closing of the Springhill mines occurred several years ago, and at that time special measures of various kinds were taken, including assistance to coal miners in finding employment elsewhere.

On June 23 I made the following reply to Mr. Mason:

Your telegram of recent date has been receiving attention. As you know a new penitentiary has been established and a new mine opened at Springhill recently. In addition the Springhill area has this month been designated by order in council as a surplus manpower area in which double depreciation will be allowed for income tax purposes to new industries. Any further measures that may be taken from time to time by the government of Canada will be announced.

I received a further telegram from Mr. Mason on July 3 repeating the request of the earlier telegram and asking that the federal government provide assistance in the construction of a new hospital and a vocational training school, and for the establishment of a national park in the area. Furthermore, it was also requested that the Canadian National Railways take over from Dosco the spur line between Springhill and Springhill Junction.

Apart from the special measures of assistance mentioned in my telegram to Mr. Mason, the Department of National Health and Welfare has approved a hospital grant in the amount of $178,360 to the All Saints' hospital corporation. The question as to whether a vocational training school should be built in the Springhill area is a matter for the provincial government in the first instance, although, as the house knows, special legislation passed during this session is applicable to suitable vocational training schools anywhere in Canada.

As to the railway spur line, it is being studied by the Department of Transport, the Canadian National Railways and the government of Nova Scotia. I should add further that my colleague the Minister of Public Works recently announced plans for the construction of a new federal building at Springhill.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question directed to the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether he could make any comment in respect to negotiations between his department and the other parties concerned with regard to the spur line between Springhill Junction and Springhill.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to announce to my hon. friend that after his many and repeated representations my department has come to the following conclusion, and I am writing to Premier Stanfield today in this regard. The Department of Transport is prepared to take title to this railway line, and we will arrange for any continuing maintenance necessary as long as the province is prepared to underwrite this maintenance financing.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour or to the acting minister, and ask whether any information can be given to the house about the progress of negotiations between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian air lines flight attendants association.

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): I do not think anything can be added to what the minister said the other day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF NATO PARLIAMENTARIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware of the presence in the gallery of members of the standing committee of the NATO parliamentarians' conference who, for the first time in North America, are holding an official meeting in Ottawa?

(Translation):

The Prime Minister undoubtedly sees those distinguished visitors in the diplomatic gallery.

(Text):

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for pointing out this very obvious fact. By the reception given by hon. members the welcome has been fully indicated.

I may say that I was a member of the earlier NATO parliamentary association. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was among those on the delegation present at the first meeting, and I have since followed the deliberations of this body which has done much to bring about agreement on many matters on which there might have been disagreement, and has made stronger the unity of NATO without which freedom cannot be maintained. I am very happy, I am sure with the approval of the official opposition and the third party, to welcome this distinguished group of men. I am very glad they have chosen Canada for their meeting. They will see here that we believe in the maintenance and the strengthening of those ties, particularly at a time when the challenge to freedom appears to be more definite than ever before.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as an old NATO hand—I beg your pardon, as a former NATO hand—and still a strong supporter of NATO, may I be permitted on behalf of my party to associate ourselves with the remarks of welcome of the Prime Minister to this distinguished group of NATO parliamentarians. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, their presence here brings to our mind the fact that NATO still remains the strongest bulwark against aggression.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of this group I should like to add our welcome to the distinguished visitors. We know that the NATO parliamentary association was originally organized in order to sponsor economic unity in the western world, and we wish them every success in their endeavours.

TRADE

SALT FISH—DISPOSAL OF CARRYOVER AND PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked for a report on the results of the efforts of my department to assist in the disposal of surpluses of salt fish. He also asked whether there had been any discussions with my colleague the Minister of Fisheries regarding action by the fisheries prices support board.

I am glad to be able to report that my department has completed, through the trade commissioners, a canvas of all salt fish markets and has given every assistance to the industry to increase its sales in foreign markets. All of this has resulted in the sale of nearly all the stocks of salt fish carried over from the 1960 production.

I am advised that stocks of salt fish at the end of June were only slightly higher than at the same time last year, when supplies were inadequate to meet current demand. There are also indications that export prospects are continuing to improve. I can also advise the hon. member that my department works in closest collaboration with that of my colleague the Minister of Fisheries.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to thank the minister for his statement. Could he say whether we are now getting back into the Cuban market?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that there are prospects of an increased demand in the Cuban market for the supply of salt cod, and there is also an increased demand in the Dominican Republic for Canadian salted pollock.

[Mr. Pearson.]

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

RESTON-WOLSELEY—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. With respect to the application of the Reston-Wolseley retention committee, which is now pending before the governor in council, to have the order of the board of transport commissioners of Canada to remove the Reston-Wolseley branch of the C.P.R. fully reviewed, and in view of the serious implications to the social and economic life of the people affected, can the minister say what action, if any, has been taken by the governor in council in this matter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter is before the cabinet at the present time, and I can assure the hon. member that the most careful consideration is being given to the strong representation he has made on behalf of the population served by this branch line.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

OLD MILL, ILE-AUX-COUDRES—REQUEST FOR PRESERVATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. My question is based on a conversation with a young lady who is interested in national historic monuments. In view of a report in La Presse of July 4 concerning the repairs required by the old mill built in 1618 on Ile-aux-Coudres in Charlevoix county, would the minister consider getting in touch with the government of Quebec on this matter with a view to having the mill declared a historic monument?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this particular press item has not come to my attention; neither have I had the good fortune to be approached by the same young lady to whom the hon. member referred. However, I shall be happy to refer this matter to the historic sites and monuments board for their consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if there are any developments which he feels he would like to report to the house regarding the situation in Laos, particularly in view of the fact that Canada is a member of the international supervisory commission.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing further to report at the present time. Discussions are still under way with regard to the provision of equipment.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR CURING OF NEWFOUNDLAND CODFISH IN GASPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Because of the fact that salt codfish sold under the trade mark "Gaspe cured" is in short supply, will the minister give consideration to moving some of the fresh caught product from Newfoundland to the Gaspe peninsula to be treated?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am not technically qualified to pass judgment on the practicability of such a suggestion, but I will certainly refer it to my department for advice.

TRANSPORT

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REPORTED STRANDING OF NEWFOUNDLAND BOUND FERRY PASSENGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Miniser of Transport. Is the minister aware of the fact that more than 100 Newfoundland bound travellers were left stranded at North Sydney recently when they were unable to obtain passage on the car ferry William Carson, and that this marked the fourth consecutive night that travellers were left stranded at North Sydney? If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the unfortunate incident related by my hon. friend but I will certainly bring the matter to the attention of the management of the C.N.R., who are operating the ship.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Can he bring to the attention of his department and perhaps of treasury board, where it has been resting since 1959, the proposal for an east coast ferry which would help to relieve the kind of situation referred to by my hon. friend from Trinity-Conception.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, in the very near future I am going to surprise the hon. member.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO THE REGULATIONS RESPECTING SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Will the minister try to surprise us tomorrow by bringing forward the regulations for aid to shipbuilding?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What do you know about what is before treasury board?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter of the regulations respecting shipbuilding has been raised a number of times recently. Unfortunately the regulations are not prepared. However, I have a statement that will be of interest to the house, I think. If it is agreeable to the house, I could read the statement at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the aid to shipbuilding?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a statement rather than an answer to a question I think the minister might have leave to revert to motions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Balcer: As hon. members will recall, I announced in the house on May 12 a new policy respecting government assistance to Canadian ship operators and shipyards. I also stated that the methods of determining approved costs for this purpose and other particulars relating to administration of this plan will be prescribed by regulations approved by the governor in council. We are making good progress in the drafting of these regulations, and I hope they will be ready in the near future.

However, in order to avoid delay in proceeding with projects in shipyards on the part of potential large purchasers, we have introduced an interim procedure by which prospective purchaser and shipyard jointly can write in to seek assurance in principle that the project they have in mind would be covered by the subsidy policy. Accordingly a provisional application for ship construction assistance has been prepared for the use of those who may wish to proceed with the formulation of an application at this time. This application form has already been given to the following associations: Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association;

Canadian Shipowners Association; Dominion Marine Association; B.C. Towboat Owners' Association.

In writing to them in this connection I advised that respective applicants should be guided by the following general considerations:

1. The approved cost of vessel construction would be the price at which a contract is placed as a result of competitive tenders. Where a contract is not placed with the lowest bidder, or where there is only one tender received, or where a contract is placed without the calling of tenders, the government might, after investigation, fix a lower figure as being the approved cost. In all cases a firm figure would be established upon approval of an application which would not be subject to escalation and would be payable to the shipyard in the customary form of progress payments.

2. The proposed construction is to incorporate the maximum Canadian content that is practicable and consistent with availability and economy. If less than such maximum Canadian content is proposed, then the approved cost of construction may be reduced by such amount as the government may deem appropriate.

3. The owner for whom the vessel is to be built must be Canadian, whether a person, partnership, corporation or provincial or municipal government, or agency of such a government. Such owner would be required to undertake to maintain the vessel on Canadian registry for at least ten years. Any disposal of the vessel during that period would be subject to appropriate governmental approval.

4. The prospective owner and builder would be required to make joint application for the subsidy in accordance with the form "Provisional Application for Ship Construction Assistance", or such other form as may be prescribed.

5. The applicants would be required to establish their respective financial responsibility to the satisfaction of the government. This would normally include a requirement to carry insurance to protect the government against bankruptcy of either applicant and to cover builders risk and such other contingencies as may be specified.

6. Where a vessel is disposed of by a taxpayer and the proceeds or any part of the proceeds are used to finance or to assist in financing construction which is eligible for subsidy, such use would not qualify the taxpayer for the benefits set out in section 4 of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, i.e. the portion of the proceeds so used would be subject to recapture of any excess depreciation that has been claimed.

7. Other provisions affecting shipping and shipbuilding are being reviewed, including legislative provisions, and changes may be announced or recommended to parliament in due course, but the government does not propose any material change in those sections of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act which allow an accelerated rate of depreciation on the owner's net investment or which authorize the claiming of reserves for special surveys.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that already ship owners and shipbuilders have signed contracts on the basis of the foregoing prescription.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question which I asked him during the course of his estimates, namely whether or not over and above the subsidy provisions covered by the regulations which he has just mentioned, the ship owner, ship operator or shipbuilder will also be entitled to the benefits of the vessel construction assistance act.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my statement, there is no intention of making any major changes in the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Mr. Chevrier: From that statement does it follow that over and above the 40 per cent subsidy he will also be entitled to the depreciation under the various sections of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I wish to thank the minister for this further information with respect to this very interesting and important legislation. I should like to ask the minister this question. When the final regulations are drafted and become effective, in view of the continuing interest in this subject will he inform the house of those final regulations and of any further developments to date? In conclusion I wish to say that we are very pleased to note that other levels of government are able to participate under this act and these regulations.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I shall be very pleased to do so.

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for the third reading of Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I have said so far during the course of the debate was designed to show that the views expressed by the opposition regarding their affection for the bill of rights was but lip service to principles which they had disavowed so frequently and so wantonly during their period of office. What I am going to do today is cover in general some of the matters that have not been dealt with in extenso as yet.

At the same time I am able to say that the publication of a letter yesterday by Mr. Coyne, to which he attached various letters which have passed between him and the Minister of Finance, will in very considerable measure reduce the length of my remarks, for they themselves constitute an answer to many of the matters that have been raised by the opposition. Indeed they are a revelation of what the Minister of Finance had stated to be the fact, that there was a vast division of opinion between the views of the government and the views of the governor.

I think I should also say that the Bank of Canada Act contains schedule A—to which I will do nothing more than make the casual reference necessary to place it on Hansard—which is the oath of fidelity and secrecy. It reads as follows:

> I,—do solemnly swear that I will faithfully, truly and to the best of my judgment, skill and ability, execute and perform the duties required of me as a director (officer or employee as the case may be) of the Bank of Canada and which properly relate to any office or position in the said bank held by me.
> I further solemnly swear that I will not communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information relating to the affairs of the bank, nor will I allow any such person to inspect or have access to any books or documents belonging to or in the possession of the bank and relating to the business of the bank.

Sir, I am not going to enter into recriminations. I am not going to answer in kind. I have found myself to be subject of bitter personal attacks far and beyond the realm of criticism ordinarily accepted and necessary for our parliamentary system. I have never answered personal attacks. I do not intend to start on this occasion. I do say, however, that whatever feelings of some Canadians may have been at the beginning of this debate, the last two epistles sent out from the ivory tower, irresponsible and intemperate, sent out on the letterheads and in envelopes belonging to the Bank of Canada and delivered by a personal messenger of the bank, make one wonder.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, these letters reveal an attitude which, if accepted by the government, would result in two sovereignties in Canada, the government of Canada and the governor of the Bank of Canada; but not in that order. They would set up a rival government. They have established beyond any question that the views of the governor and the policies of this government as revealed prior to and in the budget are incompatible. They have revealed, too, that the attitude of the governor and responsible government and its maintenance are not compatible. He has shown that there are irreconcilable differences on basic policies. Throughout the correspondence he has gone beyond the field of monetary policy and has declared himself in direct conflict with government policies on fiscal, financial and commercial matters.

To listen to the official opposition today one would think that was a recent attitude on his part. I would ask hon. members opposite to read Hansard of August 10, 1956, page 7351. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the then acting leader of the opposition, asked this question of Mr. Harris:

> In view of the announcement last night by the Bank of Canada that its interest rate has been raised to the unprecedented high level of 3¼ per cent, will the minister advise the house what is the purpose behind this new move on the part of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Harris replied:

> The Minister of Finance was expecting to have his estimates called tomorrow, and I shall be glad to discuss this point at that time.

Mr. Harris went on to say, after a further question:

> The duty of the Bank of Canada is to regulate the interest rate, which is commonly known as the bank rate. That duty and responsibility is imposed upon the bank and not upon the government, and it has not been customary in the past for any minister of finance to comment on the actions of the bank in discharging its duty.

When I hear the arguments of the opposition today I remind them of the declarations of Mr. Harris. I then asked a supplementary question:

> —in connection with actions such as this on the part of the Bank of Canada which, in regard to house building and the like, may have a very detrimental effect, and also in connection with the fact that it raises the costs of production at a time when we are endeavouring to compete in other parts of the world. Is the government or any member of the government consulted by the Bank of Canada before a decision as momentous as this one is made?

The answer was:

> I answered this question some two months ago by saying that the governor of the Bank of Canada is one of the several advisors to the Minister of Finance. In this particular matter, however, he has statutory authority to make his own decisions, that statutory authority having been conferred upon him by parliament. I think it would be correct to say, as I said on the former occasion, that I was advised of this course before it was taken.

Governor of Bank of Canada

Then I asked the question:

Did the minister in any way suggest, having regard to the inflationary tendencies in this country today, that this action should be taken or might be taken by the bank?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I also answered that question two months ago by saying that this action is the action of the governor of the bank and his responsibility alone.

Then it went on, and it is well to read it. I do not want to read it all into Hansard, but finally I asked the prime minister this question, which is to be found on page 7352:

Will the Prime Minister, having had the reasons from the governor of the Bank of Canada, now give the house the benefit of what those reasons were?

The prime minister had stated that the reasons had been given. He answered:

No, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will not undertake to have parliament or the members of the opposition act as a court of appeal from the decision made by the governor of the Bank of Canada—

The opposition have been founding their arguments on a principle which was disavowed by Mr. St. Laurent. Then Mr. St. Laurent added these words—somebody said, "Oh, oh"—

—unless and until parliament amends the act which now governs the Bank of Canada.

And at this point, a little later, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who was so noisy and vociferous a few days ago—and then suddenly the flame snuffed out—said this:

This is degenerating into a debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The ground rules of the Bank of Canada, as it were, were set out in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in 1933 at page 63:

A central bank is at the same time an instrument and a force. As an instrument it is the means by which the state, which must necessarily retain ultimate sovereignty in matters respecting the currency, can give effect to the national policy.

That is the principle on which it was set up, and in volume 1 of the proceedings of the commission, at page 92, there is the evidence of Professor W. A. Carrothers, of Vancouver, as follows:

No one suggests that this board (that is, the bank) should become the governmental authority of Canada, but it should become the instrument through which a truly national policy can be carried out in such a federation as we have in Canada today . . . Naturally, it would have to work in co-operation with the many policies of the country. You cannot have one institution working one way and another institution working another.

Whatever the views of the opposition may have been when the debate started, they are now in a position in which they admit that Mr. Coyne cannot stay; that for him to stay would be inconsistent with the responsibilities that rest upon him, and with the welfare of Canada. I think it is of interest that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should each have graduated from the field of public service, or the civil service, into public life. They have some understanding of the responsibilities of those who discharge the offices within the public service.

"I think it is always of interest to know what are the principles which should actuate a public servant." First of all there "is the constant and unfailing realization that he is a servant and not the master of the public." The second is that there should be a proper appreciation of the limits of the public servant's responsibility. "Under our system of responsible parliamentary government, public servants are not expected to take the responsibility for the policies they carry out. That is the responsibility of the politician." Our senior "civil servants" owe loyal and zealous service to their political chief so long as he enjoys the confidence of parliament. I think that is a principle which is acceptable. If they cannot give such service, even when they disagree with the policy they are not entitled to feel they are doing their whole duty."

Then, as far as civil servants are concerned, these words might be used, I think, to define their responsibility: "one way to put it is that civil servants, like children, should be seen and not heard."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members may wonder what I was quoting from. Well, I was quoting the immortal words of the member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoken on October 24, 1953 at Carleton College, in which the following personal remarks were interspersed:

I know that there are those who would disagree violently with this view—some people already have—

And he quotes who disagreed.

—but I am vain enough to believe that I was a good public servant.

And do hon. members know who moved the vote of thanks for this address on the position of public servants, earlier and later? It was Mr. J. E. Coyne, the present governor of the Bank of Canada. It was a delightful dissertation on the subject from one who knew then and, I hope, in spite of some of the arguments he advanced during this debate, knows now.

We are in the position that the government is challenged, and the sovereignty of parliament is challenged. Mr. Dicey in his book "The Law of the Constitution" explains the nature of parliamentary sovereignty in this way:

> The principle of parliamentary sovereignty means neither more nor less than this, namely, that parliament, thus defined has under the English constitution, the right to make or unmake any law whatever; and that no person or body is recognized by the law of England as having a right to override or set aside the legislation of parliament.

Is there anyone in the opposition today who says that this legislation was not necessary or that it should not be passed? The hon. member for Essex East certainly agrees that such is the fact. Indeed, during the course of his remarks as reported at page 7071 he explained his position and relied on his earlier words of March 22, 1961:

> I have always taken the position, as has the Leader of the Opposition, that there is no room in this country for two sovereignties and where there is a difference between a leading official in the public service and the government of the day there can be no public disagreement unless that disagreement is concurred in by the administration. We in this party have always stood for that principle.

I ask them to do so now. When this matter was discussed on February 21, 1961 the Minister of Finance said on that occasion:

> There is nothing a government is in a position to do—

That is where there is a breach of authority or responsibility by the governor under any legislation—

> There is nothing the government is in a position to do except to ask parliament to change the legislation or await the expiry of the term.

We placed the budget before the house. Is there anyone who will say after reading any one of those epistles to the universe, to members of parliament, to members of the cabinet, to officials here, there and in the other place and across this country—is there anyone who, on the basis of what is set out in these several letters, can say that there is not, and has not been continually disagreement which would make impossible the carrying on of government if we were to wait until the expiry of the term? I cannot quote the words that were used by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the budget, but I shall refer to his words of June 20 as found at pages 6666 and 6667, and shall summarize what he said on that occasion without quoting him.

He said that the financial and commercial proposals that he was laying before the house, and the international obligations, were such that in the face of Mr. Coyne's speeches, which were permeated with ultra-protectioism and isolationism, they would bring about a restrictionist "world of our own" rather than expansion. Furthermore he pointed out that interest rates are very important, and that Mr. Coyne's stand was that whether the interest rates were as high as Haman's gallows, they did not exercise any particular influence on the productive capacity of Canada.

Mr. Coyne in his annual report argued that interest rates had very little influence on economic development. He also stated that the exchange rate should be flexible to move with the times. Another stand he took was that budget deficits were not in keeping with the need to meet the unemployment situation that existed. I am going to refer in some detail to the appendix to one of his epistles.

Are not the words of Charles Dunning as effective today as when they were spoken? I refer to his statement that a long continuance of a policy that conflicts with a government view becomes impossible. Mr. Abbott said that the ultimate responsibility must fall upon the government. Mr. Mackenzie King said, and I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will accept what he said—this is only in the book, not by way of transmission—the following as it appears at page 4227 of Hansard for June 22, 1934:

> I do not believe powers should be given any institution that would enable it to put itself in a position of opposition to a government that has been entrusted with great responsibilities of enforcing particular policies.

Then he went on to say at page 4228, on the same day:

> What I should like to ask is: Are the institutions created by governments themselves to be made by their very constitutions so powerful that in the matter of national policies they can regard themselves as wholly beyond the direction of a government, where those policies are the result of the will of the people as expressed by their representatives in parliament?

No one but the opposition today has ever taken any other view than that which I have just enunciated as representing Mr. King's views.

The minister of finance of that day, Mr. Dunning, explained the situation in greater detail when he said, on June 8, 1936, as recorded at page 3480 of Hansard for that date:

> Of course there is only one answer to that argument—

That was the argument to set up two governments in this country, one by appointment, placing it in supremacy over the government that brought about the appointment with approval of parliament. Mr. Dunning's statement continues:

> Of course there is only one answer to that argument—the parliament of Canada, the House of Commons of Canada, must be supreme.

Mr. Mackenzie King on June 17, 1936, said the following as reported at page 3807 of Hansard of that date:

—the last word is not with the governor of the bank but with the governor in council, which is the cabinet, which represents the House of Commons, and which in turn represents the people of this country.

I have great admiration for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He is a historian with wide, wide knowledge of the past. I do not want to go back as far as the burning of the parliament buildings in 1849, was it? I thought that was the year the hon. gentleman referred to. I go back, however, to 1936 to quote from a man who more than anyone else trained and shaped—I was going to say perfected—the hon. gentleman, but I think that would be going further than the circumstances demand. Later that day of June 17, 1936, as reported at page 3811 of Hansard, Mr. Mackenzie King summed up his opinion as follows:

I pointed out that what was necessary was that no institution, and least of all a great banking institution, should ever be created in this country with any such power, or be so constituted that it could be a force to oppose the will of the government of the day.

Out of the mouths of those who were their mentors I place these quotations before the opposition.

I must make reference to the press conference of some weeks ago and the words of the Leader of the Opposition, because they cannot pass unnoticed. However, I will come back to that in a moment. He was asked this question:

Do you think he should resign now, Mr. Pearson?

"He" being Mr. Coyne, and the Leader of the Opposition replied:

I say his usefulness is over as governor.

If his usefulness is over, what are we fighting about? I should like now to refer to one or two other observations of the Leader of the Opposition before I return to that appearance on television when Michael Barkway finally said "—I am confused—". That was a case of Mike confusing Mike.

The Leader of the Opposition said, as reported at page 2206 of Hansard for February 20, 1961, the following:
