HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Ninth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Howe.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PORTUGAL—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SUPPLYING MUNITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of the government of Canada regarding the supplying of munitions to Portugal, one of our NATO allies, particularly having in mind its colonial policy? I ask this question in the light of the statement made by Mr. Lange, the foreign minister for Norway, a country which works closely with Canada in most matters.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I would not think it proper to make a statement on a matter as important as this in answer to a question on the orders of the day. No notice of the question was given, and I would naturally wish to have a statement carefully prepared covering the situation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR-DETROIT—REPORTED U.S. ACTION TO PREVENT WORKERS COMMUTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has received any information in respect to a report that the United States may prevent commuters in the city of Windsor from travelling to Detroit for the purpose of working there.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was reported yesterday in the press that consideration was being given in Washington to closing the Detroit-Windsor border to Canadians who commute daily to work in the United States. It is presumed that this report has reference to surveys which are made by the United States secretary of labour in accordance with the terms of the United States immigration and nationality act. In that act provision is made for the exclusion from admission to the United States of aliens seeking entry for the purpose of performing skilled or unskilled labour at times and places with respect to which the secretary of labour determines and certifies that there are sufficient workers in the United States able, willing and qualified to perform such labour.

I understand that in recent months action has been taken under this section of the United States statute with reference to the admission of Mexican workers to certain areas along the southern border of the United States. Assurances have, however, been received from the United States authorities that no consideration is being given at this time to any action to restrict the admission of Canadian workers along the United States-Canadian border.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW TERMINAL BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. In view of the overwhelming approval yesterday by the ratepayers of the city of Vancouver of the sale of the city owned portion of the Vancouver international airport to the federal government, can the Minister of Transport assure the house that action will be taken immediately for the plans for construction so urgently required in respect to the $15 million jet terminal buildings?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I expected this question from the hon. member, knowing his tremendous interest in the matter of aviation generally in British Columbia. I am very pleased to be able to tell him that instructions are being issued at once to proceed with the planning of that new terminal.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask him whether the government has yet reached the stage of appointing the new directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when these appointments are made they will be announced in the proper fashion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not think in view of the—

Mr. Grafftey: Order. This is a statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister not think that in view of the assurances previously given it would be a courtesy to the house to make these appointments before the committee ceases to sit?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to answer that question?

Mr. Grafftey: That was a statement; why should he?

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO BASIS OF REVENUE ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister say whether we are correct in assuming that in his budget speech of Tuesday evening he estimated revenues for the fiscal year 1961-62 on the basis of a 3 per cent rise in the gross national product?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member will examine carefully the statement I made he will find that I indicated that apart from the budget measures themselves we might expect, according to present indications, a 3 per cent rise this year in the gross national product. My estimate as to the anticipated revenues, expenditures and deficit is, of course, based upon the view that was taken as to the effect this year on revenues of the helpful measures to stimulate the economy which are proposed in the budget itself.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister indicate what percentage he did estimate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's questions would be more appropriately raised during the debate which is to follow. They relate to the subject matter of the debate and do not seem to me to qualify as having that special urgency required in order to be asked at this particular period.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the budget debate is a formal debate, so how is it possible for us to discuss the budget intelligently unless we know the rate of growth which the minister anticipates will result from the proposals he has indicated in his budget? I think, sir, it is imperative that the minister give us this information now, before we proceed with the debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member in this bland admission of his this morning, speaking for himself and I do not know how many others, indicates that he cannot discuss the budget intelligently, I hope I will not be held responsible for that.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister not going to give the house a reply to this question, which we deserve? It has always been customary to state the anticipated percentage of growth. Surely we are entitled to this information before we discuss the budget.

Mr. Speaker: If the words, which I could not hear, suited the actions I am sure they were more appropriate for the debate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I may put a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the character of the present government does the minister really believe that additional protection is needed for gutless chicken?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I should permit the supplementary from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when I have refused supplementaries to the Minister of Finance on the subject of his budget address.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this question was altogether different from the preceding one. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was asking a question regarding a specific proposal in the budget that had to do with "versivated" chicken. In case hon. gentlemen do not know the meaning of the word, it is a synonym for eviscerated. I would suggest to Your Honour that the question put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is different, and the Minister of Finance should have no difficulty now that this long pause has taken place in giving an adequate reply.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member considers the matter one of urgency of course I would not set my judgment up against his.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear your last comment.

Mr. Speaker: I said I did not want to set my judgment up against that of the hon. member for Essex East so as to prevent the minister from replying.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite apparently do not understand something that the farmers of this country understand well. In view of the total inability of the opposition to understand an agricultural problem, or to interpret the views of the farmers on any agricultural problem, may I say that this is a budget proposal which has been received with warm appreciation by the farmers of this country.

When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate associates his question on this subject with the character of the government, may I say that the government is prepared to meet this matter precisely on that plane, recognizing that we do try in our approach to public problems to have regard for the importance of the basic interests of agriculture in this country.

My final observation is that if the hon. member is concerned about protection for, as he called it, gutless chicken or as the resolution calls it, eviscerated chicken, not the corrupt version of the word employed by the hon. member for Essex East, who is above the rules of the house and now apparently above the rules of English composition as well, I might say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that on this subject there are times when I think he needs some protection.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, in view of this entirely unwarranted personal attack—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I feel I should be allowed to say a word in my own defence. I think, sir, that what the minister needs most is some protection for home grown Canadian humour.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the debate continues I am afraid that hon. members should put themselves down as having made one speech already in the budget debate.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he is in a position to say whether his budget as presented the day before yesterday is in any way responsible for the rumours that Premier Frost is to retire from public life?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the minister would like to answer, but actually the retirement of Premier Frost from public life is not a responsibility of the minister.

Mr. Grafftey: It will be a good answer; let us hear it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Speaker, there was a point about the budget in the question, and I think I should be permitted to say that while these rumours may have no connection whatever with the budget, I believe there is a basis in fact for the rumours that are being circulated to the effect that this budget is likely to result in the retirement of the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a report in yesterday's Windsor Star which reads in part as follows:

> W. M. Benidickson (Liberal, Kenora-Rainy River), briefly replying to the Fleming budget speech, referred to the decision to abolish the 7½ per cent excise tax on cars as the "Essex East resolution"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member appears to be reading from a newspaper article what was said by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in the debate which is now to be resumed, if I am correct in what I heard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I was asking a question based on a report of a statement made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I was seeking to ask the minister if he would care to comment, but if he finds it difficult to acknowledge—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ECONOMIC FORECASTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if I can have his attention, whether he will table for the information of the house the secret economic forecasts made earlier this year on which the budget is based?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, any documents to which the house is entitled are always tabled on time by this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, affecting all hon. members of the house, there is a most distinguished precedent for the tabling of these documents in the house to which I would draw Your Honour's attention, a precedent established on January 20, 1958.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The tabling of documents is not obtained on orders of the day either by questions or by raising matters of privilege.

GRAIN

ONTARIO WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT ON PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance, because he comes from Ontario and because he is the Minister of Finance, when we may expect an announcement from the government with regard to the price of Ontario grown wheat?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member knew anything about the practices of this house or about agriculture he would know in the first place that the question should be directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You don't know the answer.

TRADE

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO REDUCED PRICE UNDER SECOND CHINESE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Is it a fact that the change in wheat board prices and the price of sterling yesterday means in effect that the price in Canadian dollars being received by the wheat board under the second agreement for the sale of wheat to red China varies approximately 5 cents per bushel from what we anticipated at the time the agreement was signed?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is obviously not a question for the orders of the day. I suggest that the hon. member put his question on the order paper in the ordinary course.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—MORTGAGES SOLD IN 1960

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. As found on page 6849 of Hansard for yesterday I asked the minister for the number and dollar value of the mortgages sold by C.M.H.C. during 1960. I, as did other members around me, heard him answer that none had been sold in 1960 although it now appears in Hansard as "some". Would the minister clarify that point?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member is quite right. I should like to thank him for making that correction, and say that my answer was none for 1960.

Mr. Garland: Is the answer "none" or "some"?

Mr. Walker: The answer is "none", as I said yesterday.

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF CURRENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In view of the 400 per cent increase in building recently in the township of Scarborough, I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether the national figures are following that general trend.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I dislike taking the time of the opposition to talk about something that is not as fascinating as eviscerated chickens. The reply is that the revised figures for starts in urban centres as at May, 1961 indicate—

Mr. Bourget: Order paper.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, for a year and a half I have been bombarded by the opposition with similar questions.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to raise a point of order he should rise to do so.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the question asked by the hon. member for York-Scarborough is asking for statistics. The ordinary practice has been that questions of that kind are placed on the order paper. I do not think that is a proper question for orders of the day.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member should tell that to his colleagues.

Mr. McGee: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question which I sought to put after many fruitless attempts was one designed to elicit vitally important up to date information relating to a significant field of our economy.

Mr. Garland: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that when in similar circumstances on earlier occasions I have attempted to put questions of that nature, I have been ruled out of order.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, may I say that at no time did

Your Honour ever rule the hon. member for Nipissing out of order on questions dealing with housing starts and the housing program.

We have a special housing program. Parliament was called in November to inaugurate it. The hon. member for York-Scarborough has taken a keen interest in this program. I suggest the hon. member has a right to ask questions and to receive an answer.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On the point of order, I would point out to Your Honour that at six o'clock last evening the committee of supply was considering housing when discussing the estimates of the Minister of Public Works, and if the hon. member for York-Scarborough had been in his place he would have had an opportunity at that time to put this question. We have supply forecast again for Saturday and there cannot be, in the circumstances, any degree of that kind of urgency which Your Honour always insists upon in questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. Walker: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, we devoted 15 minutes to a discussion of eviscerated chickens. Surely the welfare of the Canadian people in relation to housing is of equal importance.

Mr. Pickersgill: The publicity of the government is of importance to hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member mind repeating his question?

Mr. McGee: I should like the Minister of Public Works to give the house the latest available information relating to housing starts, which I understand has only now become available to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I think that question is more appropriate for the estimates, and suggest that it be dealt with there.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

GHANA—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN MILITARY AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I hate to interrupt the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment on reports that the Canadian government is to give military aid to the Ghanaian government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has received a request to provide military training assistance to Ghana, and the matter is under consideration.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to continue my remarks in connection with the budget. It is obvious that the house is in a receptive and bantering mood. Of course I appreciate the little advance billing that was thus given to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River by the hon. member for Essex East.

I am, on the opposition side, the first to reply to the Minister of Finance in connection with the budget which he introduced on Tuesday last. The minister always plays his part on budget night with passion, but I suggest also usually with whiskers. I think he played that part even more obviously on this occasion. I wish, however, to pay a compliment that I read, as I read it, to the Minister of Finance. It was contained in a recent, well distributed article in the London Economist which analysed Canadian finances. In this issue of May 27—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Is this the article written by Mr. Michael Barkway?

Mr. Benidickson: There is no indication on it of authorship of the article. The article says this, and perhaps this disturbs the minister who rose. I am paying a compliment to the Minister of Finance; I think it is the Minister of Veterans Affairs on behalf of his colleagues who is getting excited. The article says:

> Of all the ministers Mr. Fleming has emerged as the most hard working and the most adept in his department (the competition is not too impressive but the compliment is not intended to be backhanded).

Mr. Grafftey: That is London's opinion of the government. Very interesting.

Mr. Hellyer: They are being very generous, too.

Mr. Grafftey: Government by Whitehall.

Mr. Benidickson: I was referring of course to that place which has always been known as the home of the Tory party and from which one normally expects compliments for a Conservative administration. Mr. Speaker, according to our rules it is not, as I know, usual to quote editorials or newspaper comment in connection with events in the house, although I know that we never raised any objection, when we were sitting on the government side of the chamber, when the opposition financial critic of those days invariably endeavoured to give to the house in his first speech some of the editorial comment that appeared in Canadian newspapers after presentation of a budget.

Of course on those occasions there was usually a sufficient lapse of time between budget night and the speech of the first opposition critic so that he was able to quote quite a number of editorials. As I say, we never objected to newspaper comments then. Many comments were quoted from the newspapers from coast to coast. Because of the one day interval of time which has elapsed between the presentation of the budget and today, it is not possible for me to do that nationally. I want to say at once, however, that the leader of the house was good enough, in view of the fact that we are coming to the end of our session and this budget presentation was very late, to ask me if I was prepared to go on this morning, and I agreed.

However, I am not going to follow to any extent the practice that used to be invariable in connection with criticism of the budget at this stage when the members of the present government were sitting on this side of the chamber. I am simply suggesting to all hon. members that it would be interesting to examine the lead article in today's Montreal Financial Times. I am not going to quote from it; I am only going to refer to six words in the headline.

"The budget was not worth delay."

I said, Mr. Speaker, I would not refer to the contents of this article because of the rules, but I do want hon. members on their own initiative to read the last two paragraphs of this comment in connection with the budget.

An hon. Member: How about some of your own ideas?

Mr. Benidickson: I am prepared to give them in due course.

An hon. Member: Let us have them.

Mr. Benidickson: Out of politeness, courtesy and the rules of the house I will not read the last two paragraphs of this article. My comment, instead of reading these last two paragraphs, which will be of interest to hon. members when they receive this publication, as I believe all hon. members do in their mail boxes, is to say in my own words that I felt there was much in the budget the other night that was unnecessary verbiage and could be described pretty generally as rhetorical ballyhoo.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

The Minister of Finance rather regularly has been misleadingly optimistic to this house. He certainly was so in his budget presentation last year, when he estimated a $12 million surplus and to his disappointment, and to the disappointment of the country, we ended up with a very substantial deficit. Now, again we have an addition to this mountain of debt, and the government are always prepared to explain this by saying that it had been properly planned from the beginning. Indeed, again in the budget speech the other night the Minister of Finance, following this style, said:

In the circumstances confronting Canada today, it is "appropriate"—

That is a word the minister invariably uses. He used it in the national television press conference program last night to answer a great many questions, even in the negative. It was suggested by the press that certain things he was doing today were inconsistent with what he said he could not do a year ago. The minister said they were inappropriate then but were obviously appropriate now; but no proof or evidence was given as to what happened in the 12 intervening months. The minister said in his budget speech:

—it is appropriate, indeed desirable, that the federal government should, by incurring a sizeable deficit, help to stimulate the economy. This we propose to do. Accordingly, I shall not be introducing any increase in our general level of taxation.

He took great pride in that. Then he said:

Indeed, I shall be proposing some significant—

That is another word that the Minister of Finance uses very regularly, but which I think was scarcely fitting to the context of his speech of two hours and 20 minutes the other night:

Indeed, I shall be proposing some significant tax reductions to accomplish certain specific economic objectives.

The house heard previously his inclusion of the word "today". Presumably these economic objectives were the best estimates he could provide to this country as of today. I continue to quote one of the minister's initial statements:

This contribution in the field of fiscal policy taken together with the financial and other policy measures which have already been introduced or which I shall be announcing tonight, will bring about higher levels of production—

Hon. members know how his voice can roll when he says such words as:

—higher levels of production and employment, and a more satisfactory rate of growth.

Mr. Speaker, our contention is that this budget again was not planned. The administration attempts to say it was planned, but I say the plans had been concluded months and months ago and were largely based on political priorities, not on economic priorities. I want to go on and establish my point. I say that this deficit is the joint result of an expenditure program put forward and completed by the ministers of the crown last autumn. It has nothing to do with June 20 of the current year. It is the joint result of that program plus the lack of growth in crown revenues resulting directly from a lack of stimulus to the economy and a lack of foresight a year ago, both of which, to say the least, increased a recession which we have been experiencing for a considerable time.

There has been for four years an undue complacency with respect to forecasting and to the country's economic interest as opposed to political interest on the part of this government. I think one of the outstanding pieces of evidence in support of this contention is provided by a statement made by the Minister of Finance when, after his budget had been introduced on March 31, 1960, and a surplus forecast, the minister went to a foreign land to meet the outstanding financial experts of the world. He was attending a conference of the international monetary fund, and when interviewed there as late as October, 1960 his view of Canada's economic prospects was that we were simply in, to use his words, a "rolling readjustment". That phrase was not original to the minister. It had been used earlier by the director of the international monetary fund, Mr. Jacobsson.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, who was good enough to give me a very patient hearing Tuesday night, but I think in fairness, as this has been mentioned before, he should agree that that was not all I said about the economic situation in Canada at that time. What he has referred to was one of, I think, four descriptions I employed at that time to describe the economic situation in this country.

Mr. Benidickson: Still, it is something like the statement the minister made when he visited the United Kingdom. His words then were "Canada is sound as a bell". In other words, there has been this advertising of satisfaction and complacency which, I think, has been a contributing factor to the absence, in times of stress, of the concern, the worry and the co-operation of all sectors of this great land of ours, especially, perhaps, in the government service itself, which one might look for. There was an absence of any sense of urgency directed by the minister.

I could, perhaps, quickly retell the attitude taken by the government toward economic matters in each of the four years they have held office. We have conflicting stories about what the position was when the present administration took office four years ago, in June, 1957. During the election campaign of 1958 the theme of the Prime Minister was that he and his colleagues had inherited a mess, that there had been hidden information, and that this was why they had been unable to cope with a recession.

The unemployment situation was very serious in March, 1958 during the election campaign. The government faced unemployment in January 1958, but had decided it was more important for them to go to the hustings than to cope with the economic situation which was so obviously in need of attention. But the Minister of Finance has not been in that camp. The Minister of Finance is never wrong, and in two budget speeches since then he has referred approvingly to his first presentation of an economic pattern for the people of Canada, which he made not in a budget but in a financial statement or a financial amendment on the night of December 6 or 7, 1957.

I remember it very well. The minister has said repeatedly—I could quote him if I were to take the time—that this was just the right thing having regard to the economic conditions which were ahead and that this was a proper revision, a very wise revision. His action at that time has been praised by both the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Fisheries.

Well, we remember the election campaign. We remember that in that campaign the Prime Minister said that while unemployment had reached peaks beyond those which had been experienced since the pre-war depression, if he was elected no person in Canada would suffer because of unemployment. He said that in Halifax a day or so before the end of the campaign on March 31, 1958. We still do not have a very healthy economy, but most ministers, after their election in the summer of 1958, went abroad and there, of course, they painted a glowing picture of the economic situation in Canada.

We come to 1959. There was a little upturn and still a fair amount of unemployment. There was not much investigation, in a scientific way, as to its causes. In any event the government thought the time had come to break what they thought was to be a continuing boom in this country, and there was in the 1959 budget to confine it the imposition of an additional tax load of some $350 million annually.

I wish to proceed rapidly and come to the last major budget with which we are familiar, namely the budget which normally comes in March and which, on this occasion, did come in that month. In March of 1960 we still had impressive unemployment rolls but the minister said the unemployment would not be a burden or a worry once the snow departed. I know that hindsight is easy, and that it is a proper criticism to those who say "You should have known better" to tell them it is easy to be right by hindsight. But I said in December and the other night, and I am prepared to establish, that at that time, on March 31, 1960, there was again undue complacency and an inadequate appreciation of economic facts.

I gave one illustration Tuesday night. I showed that it was obvious to the Canadian Press, that three weeks before the presentation of the budget it reported there was a radical difference of opinion between the official opposition and the government as to whether adequate steps were being taken to cope with some clouds which were threatening on the horizon. The minister asserts to be always right in these matters, but I do say it was only 12 days later that there were quoted to him from this side forecasts which have proven reliable in the past and which have since proven as reliable as any I have seen. The minister was not prepared to do anything except assail the opposition for presenting these forecasts, including one from a very distinguished economic adviser to the government, Dr. Firestone, in one of the senior departments of the government. The minister pooh-poohed this and said he was not prepared to listen to gloom and doom.

This attitude continued. My challenge is not only that the minister may have ignored some of the facts which were obvious to others, but that he continued to ignore them and continued to neglect to impose policies which might have reduced the impact of a recession. Indeed, as I said the other night it was the Minister of Finance apparently—and this charge comes from a cabinet colleague, not from me—who turned off the tap with respect to housing. Housing is one of the economic factors so directly and quickly related to the provision of employment.

However, to take another source, I am quite confident that most hon. members of this house receive in their morning reading material here in the city of Ottawa the Montreal Gazette. It is well known that a very distinguished writer's articles, those of Mr. John Meyer, appear on the financial page of that newspaper. Three days after the budget was introduced last year Mr. Meyer stated that the budget, as a stand-pat budget, was an inadequate budget, saying this should have been obvious to the government. However, the government went blindly on with it. I recall that the Minister of Finance went to Winnipeg in the middle of May and stated there that things were wonderful and that he had no time nor patience for people of doom and gloom. He shut his ears to all warnings.

Perhaps the next senior minister of the government whose activities might be related to the business and employment situation is the then minister of trade and commerce, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill). He went to Winnipeg as late as the first week in July 1960, and there could not have been much ministerial consultation in regard to the economic field because the phrase he used at that time, which was a striking one. It was that the economy of Canada was going up like a rocket. This blindness, stubbornness and persistence on the part of the government continued.

The Prime Minister, during a very important speech made in October, 1960 said that we had been experiencing the three best years in Canada's history, which I suggest indicates that he was no more concerned than the other two economic ministers about those individuals in very great numbers who were not enjoying three best years in Canada's history.

Shortly after that the government decided to have the session commence earlier than most sessions do. It was called for the middle of November. At that time a program was presented, part of which was included in the speech from the throne, involving legislation of various departments. In addition it was intimated that we perhaps would have an amending budget.

It is the Minister of Finance I am concerned about. How worried has he been about the growth of the Canadian economy during 1960 which we are now reviewing in this budget debate? We met in November. The opposition complied very readily, with much alacrity, to anything that appeared to have an employment content, and several bills were passed before Christmas. I was shocked since to find that although we passed the legislation in December before adjourning for Christmas, in many cases where the cabinet, in view of the emergency, asked us to grant to it quickly executive powers it did not even have the orders in council ready until well after the new year.

I can cite one illustration in this regard, the small businesses loans bill, to which the Minister of Finance referred the other night with some satisfaction. There was here a familiar pattern which can be easily followed because there was a similar law in respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. If this administration had been sharp and anxious to see an upturn in the economy of this country, the $65 million of likely loans, about which they spoke in that debate, should have been put to work immediately.

I suggest the government should have arranged, in a preliminary form at least, the orders in council in respect to this legislation even before it was passed by this house. However, the order in council in that regard was not ready until January 19, 1961, a month later.

This measure was supposed to be an important factor in creating winter employment. However, this is the kind of nonchalant attitude the government has in respect to economic matters, which I feel justifies the criticism this administration has received particularly during the past year at a time when unemployment has been heavier than in any year since the thirties.

I can cite other illustrations. In connection with small business loans I charge the government that there was the usual administrative inefficiency in getting the orders out and the paper work done. In connection with the small businesses loans measure, the minister said that a substantial number of dollars had now been loaned. This has been done after the period during which people were looking for winter work. We were informed that this $65 million would become available very quickly, presumably in the winter. However, the last time he made a return to this house, at the end of April I believe, only about $4 million had been loaned under this program.

I am now looking at the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I give him good marks for some of his activities. He has been endeavouring to be the cheerleader promoting exports in connection with export trade. I think he is to be commended for the publicity and attention that he has aroused. But publicity is not enough. I recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce really blew his top in regard to publicity last November with this unemployment crisis approaching. At that time he announced that there was a billion dollar proposition coming up soon to finance export trade.

Mr. Hees: Could I ask the hon. member to produce that statement from which he is quoting, in which I am supposed to have made that remark; because I do not recall it.

Mr. Benidickson: I have not got it with me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: I have read that statement, and I have asked a question about it in this house. I asked the minister why, after all these months, this legislation was not available.

Mr. Hees: What legislation are you referring to?

Mr. Benidickson: I am referring to the Export Credits Insurance Act amendments. I also asked the minister a question in connection with the counterpart, the private company arranged by the banks, and why that seemed to be at a standstill.

Mr. Hees: I should like to say to the member that he is hopelessly confused because nothing has been at a standstill. The whole thing has been going ahead very satisfactorily, as the businessmen of this country will tell the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I think two days ago the minister himself said during the debate on the resolution, which he only introduced last week, that the China wheat deal which has received a great deal of prominence might have been financed through the utilization of this legislation. Of course it was not because the act, without the amendments, did not have adequate financial backing to take care of a deal of that magnitude.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member continues to quote me incorrectly. I said this thing could have been done but was not done for the reason that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Take your turn in the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister feels he is not being properly quoted he will have the opportunity later to make an explanation. However, if the hon. member who has the floor yields the floor, that would be in order.

Mr. Chevrier: That is his way of making a contribution to this debate.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring hon. members up to date as to the thinking of the Minister of Finance. Despite the fact that some of this unemployment legislation was before us this session it did not move very fast last winter during the serious unemployment situation. I refer the Minister of Finance to the annual budget, which I describe as his pre-budget or advance budget, which he gives to friends annually in Toronto in January at the forum of the Toronto board of trade.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The board of trade?

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian club.

Mr. Hees: Get a few of these things right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not spoken to the board of trade.

Mr. Hees: Get the odd thing right. We do not ask you to get everything right; we know you cannot.

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian club; I stand corrected. Invariably, in the first two weeks of January, the minister makes a statement of this kind. He calls it his review of the economic situation. It usually contains a review and a forecast; his Toronto friends sometimes get it before anything so complete comes to the House of Commons. However, on this occasion the Minister of Finance said that we started this session early. He said though it was not an emergency session and there was nothing of very great emergency in the country at that time. This has been the attitude of the Minister of Finance all along in these serious times.

I could continue to quote the minister and the trade ministers. They were divided in this instance. My friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, joined the Minister of Finance in such attitude. At the end of the year 1960 he went on a national hookup and said that everything was wonderful. The Minister of Labour did the same thing. This does not impress the Canadian people when all should be working together to consider the dips and troughs in our Canadian economy that were so obvious at the time those rosy pre-budget statements were being made.

Of course the Minister of Trade and Commerce changed his mind. He is very versatile. A month had not elapsed before he went out and made another speech, in which he rather contradicted the Minister of Finance. He said, "Things will be worse before they get better". This was not the kind of optimism that was expressed at the finance minister's banquet in Toronto earlier in January 1961.

Mr. Hees: Would the hon. member mind quoting that reference. I would appreciate it if he would, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister deny it?

Mr. Hees: I cannot remember making that statement. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would quote the reference.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister say he did not say it?

Mr. Hees: I am asking the hon. member to quote what I said, because he said I said it. I ask him either to quote it or take it back.

Mr. Benidickson: You said it, all right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order—

Mr. Hees: I do not remember it, and I should like the hon. member to quote it.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister makes so many speeches he cannot remember what he said.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is speaking on behalf of the opposition following the budget speech. The last half hour, Mr. Speaker, while you were not in the chair, sir, we have had persistent, ill-mannered, unbecoming interruptions by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think you should caution the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is conduct not becoming a minister of the crown.

Mr. Benidickson: May I say that I have already excused the minister.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Essex East resents anyone usurping his role as the interrupter in chief of the House of Commons. All I was saying to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is that he has said that I said certain things, and I ask him to give the quotation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has no right to do this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Speaker has indicated before that hon. members should not interrupt the member who has the floor unless he yields. I think at times the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has yielded the floor. If he feels that he should not be interrupted, then he is perfectly entitled to continue—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was no justification at all for the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I indicated—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member insists on keeping the floor he is entitled to it. I would ask hon. members to allow the hon. member who has the floor to continue his speech.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I say that this is background to the presentation of the 1960-61 budget. It is indicative of the complacency about which I complain. We thought if the 1961-62 budget was not brought forward—and it is a very important guide to businessmen across this land, particularly in times of stress—if we had a very unusual delay, the content would be helpful to the economy and impressive. I say the contrary is the case. The impressive part is the fact that we are to have a cash deficit of about $1 billion. This is the fifth deficit presented by the Minister of Finance.

There was a very interesting and short but important proviso in the minister's budget statement last Tuesday night when he referred to the fact that at long last a decision had been made at the governmental level to take the initiative in connection with our foreign exchange situation. There is one short sentence in the budget which I paraphrase as saying "This, of course, is not in current budget expense". However, when you think of the billion dollar cash deficit, and when you think in terms of what some experts, including the minister, have said as to the financial obligations involved in interfering with the market situation in this field, I think one must come to the conclusion that this was an undesirable minimizing of the problem in the speech of great length which the minister made the other night. I think it was altogether too inadequate a reference to something which could involve a great amount of dollars and, of course, in all its aspects could mean big involvement in the money market of this country.

I refer the minister to the latest issue of the Financial Post. This is a national financial paper which came into our hands only this morning. The assistant general manager of the Royal bank, on page 35 in looking at the prospects and the situation with respect to the foreign exchange control situation, estimated that every point of control related to the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar could conceivably require backing by the crown of $200 million. This gentleman is much better informed in this field than I am. He happens to be a vice president whose department is economics.

I heard reference to this question last night on the national television program when the minister appeared on "Press Conference". I observed that he did not give his interrogators very much room, as usual, but I think Mr. Barkway said he thought the liability would be just about half the figure mentioned by the assistant general manager of the Royal bank. He said that perhaps $100 million would be the figure rather than the $200 million which I have quoted. The minister on television did not answer; his rapid tongue just kept going.

An hon. Member: Wagging on.

Mr. Benidickson: Wagging on; and the question was ignored.

During this budget debate we shall have opportunities which were not available in the half hour allotted to "Press Conference" to get answers to some of these questions of tremendous significance. As I say, I received the Financial Post this morning. I put this to the minister. These questions are of such significance that the minister cannot possibly refrain from commenting upon the financial liabilities in connection with them.

In fact he did so in parliament as recently as February of this year. I realize I am not entitled to quote him in the same session. In February he gave us five reasons why this was something that we should not look at. Last year in his budget speech on March 31 he explained about the financial obligations involved. He warned against interfering with normal supply and demand. He did the same in January 1960 in the annual budget speech which he makes to the people of Toronto, at meetings of the chamber of commerce.

I want to refer the minister to his speeches in this respect on these several occasions and ask that he give the house an explanation, and go further than merely saying that our obligations herein—I am paraphrasing his words—do not come into the current accounts. Certainly this does not enter into the deficit figures found at the end of his address on Tuesday night.

We are to have a known cash deficit of a billion dollars. I suggest that we will require at least a billion and a quarter dollars not only to undertake what he has told us about specifically but also to assume the responsibilities that he has announced in connection with Foreign Exchange Control Act operation. How does he propose to finance this? We must know before the debate concludes. Is the minister going to do it by monetizing the lion's share through the banking system rather than with important public purchase?

He will have noted that the day after his presentation of this budget those people who usually have the most acute awareness so far as inflation indicators are concerned, acted rather promptly. There was an unusual rise of five points on the Toronto stock exchange yesterday. Most people that I have met say that this would be a well known hedge taken against inflation. I think the minister should perhaps have regard to some of these reactions. Apparently the investors in the financial markets think there might be inflation and that they should hedge against it in the market. Certainly they were grabbing for stock equities yesterday.

Last year the minister told us proudly that all was well. He said the treasury would be in a surplus position and, as I have suggested, he remained blind to any other indicators for quite a long time. Immediately after the presentation of last year's budget a very interesting publication was issued by Saunders Cameron Limited of Toronto, to its clients and others. This is a bond house whose publications are often quoted. They had this to say four or five days after the minister had presented the budget on March 31, 1960. I quote:

One of our friends feels it has gone too far—

Seemingly the government and the minister had gone too far in extravagant statements such as are usually in the budget.

—commenting, "if the budget's assumptions are correct, the bond market is too high. If the market is correct, then the budget is wrong, and we will have such poor business that we will have a good sized revenue deficit."

That was at the time the minister was telling us that in the economic interests of the country we should budget for a surplus and disregard such factors as unemloyment and so on. So if again in 1961 the market is going against the minister it is a matter of many minds of people, I suggest, who feel, contrary to the minister's view expressed to us budget night that the threat of inflation is "minimal". I think that was his word. He parried the question pretty well last night on television. That these people should hedge at once against inflation because as sophisticated people they seem to think that inflation is involved in the mountain of debt which is to be added to as a result of the announcement Tuesday night, should give the minister pause for thought.

I think we in the house should perhaps look at something else that is a warning. On the very day that the minister introduced his budget his counterpart in the United States, the secretary of the treasury, made a major speech in Washington in which he indicated that in his negotiations with the United States congress he was most concerned whether or not congress would widen the deficit that would result if congress did not accept the President's proposals which on the revenue side included somewhat more stringent measures with respect to tax deduction opportunities.

The point that I thought was of great significance when I read the story yesterday was that it was obvious from Mr. Dillon's speech that although he said some compromise might be possible, he was fighting against the possibility of a deficit beyond $3.2 billion. So far as the equivalent here is concerned, one can take almost any index, population, gross national product, or individual personal earnings. Let us assume that everything is ten times bigger. If Mr. Dillon was concerned about a deficit beyond $3.2 billion in that country on the day the minister was bringing in his $1 billion budget, according to my thinking ours could be related to a $32 billion cash deficit in the United States. Mr. Dillon said that the President would veto any reduction in prospective revenue that would increase the deficit in that country beyond $3.2 billion. We are talking here in terms of $1 billion, but if you want to relate it to our population, our gross national product or anything else, use a multiple of ten and then regard the minister's deficit in that way.

We were surprised that for the first time, I believe, there was evasiveness displayed by the minister with regard to the usual gross national product forecast. He did refer specifically at one point to a possible 3 per cent G.N.P. increase, but hon. members will recall all the escape hatches, and not the historic ones, that were related to it. The minister abandoned the historic ones last year, as I indicated the other night. I do think this is an indication for businessmen who make plans and who, having paid their taxes, think they should get from the head of the treasury, based on all the excellent talent available in the government departments, an economic forecast in such a vital matter as the gross national product.

Such a forecast, of course, is being made three months later than usual, but it still would be of some use to businessmen in their calculations and operations for the balance of the year. We want to know how the minister is going to finance this cash requirement of $1 billion. There is an unknown factor, of course, in connection with the Foreign Exchange Control Act, but let us take the announced $1 billion cash deficit. How is the minister going to finance that? Is it his proposal that the Bank of Canada accommodate this $1 billion? If it is not to be financed through the general public, will it be monetized through the banking system?

We have seen nothing in the budget to justify the very unusual delay in its presentation. I am wondering if it took the minister three months beyond the usual date for the presentation of the budget to convince his cabinet colleagues, some of whom may be spenders and some of whom may have an eye on the forthcoming election, that he must draw the line in connection with this expansionist program. Except for the decision in connection with the exchange fund, any big decision that involved dollars and cents in the budget had been made months ago. As I have said, such calculated amended decisions in respect of the current fiscal year in the budget involve only $65 million. However, for the last three months people have been paying excise taxes on automobiles which the minister says, for the economic health of this country, should be removed. Why were they not removed three months ago for economic advantage?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They should have been removed two years ago.

Mr. Hellyer: You mean the government should have been removed.

Mr. Jones: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you could protect the member who has the floor from the interruptions of his own members?

Mr. Benidickson: My point is that, beyond the unknown obligation undertaken in respect of foreign exchange control, this budget has nothing in it to warrant the delay. So far as the deficit is concerned, that was determined many, many months ago. Those who are familiar with government procedures know that in the autumn the colleagues of the Minister of Finance prepare for him the estimates of their departments. This perhaps occurs initially in September. These estimates are reviewed, I know, by the officials of the treasury board and then they go to the minister. The ministry then make a decision with regard to those matters of expenditure before Christmas.

I am sure this course was followed this year. It takes a considerable amount of time to have the printing of the estimates book done so the members of the house can receive the book of estimates. This book of estimates for the next year is usually presented to us in January. The minister told us on Tuesday night that quite irrespective of the lapsings and the increases in expenditures that might occur, this budget on balances involves an increase of about $450 million during the present 1961-62 fiscal year as compared with the past year.

I say the ministers of the crown had already told the Minister of Finance what they wanted and months ago he had made decisions in respect of those expenditures. In spite of this, when the minister came before us on Tuesday night he said that, in the circumstances confronting Canada "today", it is "appropriate" to do such and such. The minister's colleagues had known for months that they could not make additional expenditures without wrecking the monetary system, but it would seem that for three months he had difficulty in persuading them that these were the hard facts of life. What we really got then, on June 20, although it was wrapped up in these grand words "an economic budget", was a change of only $65 million. The minister, in standard style, used these lavish words and referred to "my program to stimulate growth, enlarge production, increase trade and extend employment". There was only $65 million worth of financial change involved as disclosed.

During the last 12 months we have had two budgets. In view of the fact that the minister was hamstrung by decisions made seven months ago when he, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and others were saying that there was no emergency, there was nothing too much to worry about, they thought, I predict that we may have a third budget within a period of 12 months.

This is easily established by looking at the accounts the minister gave us the other night. He said that to the extent our expansion is accelerated there will be an increase in revenues. Here again I say that this is not a frank statement. The budget is supposed to be a presentation by our treasurer to the citizens of Canada, and in my opinion this language involves ambiguity as I suggest it would to most people who read it. I ask the minister, does that mean there is going to be additional revenue or is he prepared to stand by the prediction that there will be acceleration during the current year that is provided for in an increase in revenues during the current year as outlined on page 6666 of Hansard?

When we get to the harsh end of the figures the minister says that the tax revenue for the current 1961-62 fiscal year is to be $5,150 million compared with $5,016 million last year, a difference of about $134 millon. Is this the minister's best guess as to what our revenues are likely to be? The minister invariably brags, and did on Tuesday, about the growth in the number of people employed. The rise in employment has not been up to ordinary standards and the numbers of unemployed have been greater than the standard. Is the minister predicting that there will be acceleration that will alter these figures before the end of the fiscal year, or is he coming to us frankly and saying that this will be the only increase in revenues compared with last year, based on a budget which, including old age security, non-tax revenues and supplementaries, will I predict eventually come to $7 billion? Is he saying that this is all that results during the current fiscal year in so far as expansion is concerned? There is not very much expansion here. This is very obvious to most people, except for the type of language that is invariably used by the minister.

The minister said that with the stimulus imparted by his budget proposals to the levels of economic activity he would expect a general rise in our tax revenues between now and next March to offset the particular tax reductions he proposed. I think he is still talking—I want to confirm it—about merely $134 million of revenue increase this year compared with last year. Of course, in so far as expenditures are concerned he said he had been big-hearted in stimulating the economy on an expansionist basis. After the fine words have been said and the figures have been placed on the Clerk's table, after the oratory is over, we wake up in the morning and read the figures and find that there was only $65 million involved this fiscal year in so far normal accounts were concerned in a budget which had all this advance publicity as an expansionist budget. This means that on budget night any dynamic or expansionist programs could not be announced because the real truth is that everything that was financially binding upon the minister, and perhaps scaring to the minister, had been settled last autumn when the minister, as chairman of treasury board, approved the spending programs of his colleagues. As I have suggested, these are not at all, as the minister said in his introductory remarks, related to the appropriate needs on budget night of June 20, 1961.

The result is the treasury convinced everybody that it was bare and broke. The treasury was conscripted long ago by the ministers for political expediency rather than economic requirements. Therefore, at a time when we were led to believe we would receive some real economic guidance, something dynamic —which I believe is a favourite word of the Minister of Finance—the finance minister was helpless.

The press did not give that impression. They get advance copies of the minister's budget words. They have a closed conference on budget day and they have to read a long speech. The word goes out, "Canada has a cash deficit of $1 billion" and the impression given is that in the main it involves new decisions for dynamic leadership decided upon by the minister just prior to budget night. This is not the fact. There are other obligations, which the minister has not disclosed. These involve taking at long last some leadership in the exchange control field.

We even had an investigation in parliament recently. We had a most useful one undertaken by the Senate manpower and employment committee. There is a large Liberal majority in the Senate itself, but in the committee there was a majority of supporters of the Conservative government. However, that was of no consequence; the report was unanimous. This committee did a great job over two sessions. It was one of the most useful committees I have known and I compliment those who took this matter so seriously. It was a marvellous thing that so many worthy people and organizations from across the country appeared before that committee to give their counsel in this most serious matter. I refer, of course, to the problem of the great number of unemployed in this country today.

The result is that notwithstanding this most recent parliamentary report, and despite the minister's budget oratory—I say we have had there only the dynamism of the windmill, when one reads the 50 or more pages of his speech which result in very little financially or socially—there was nothing dynamic in the minister's announcements budget night. We might have expected something dynamic in regard to education. I am sure the minister has seen and is familiar with the report of the Senate committee on this question, but I think the house and the country should be made familiar with what the Senate committee thought was of prime importance after its extensive deliberations.

I refer to the section of the Senate committee report dealing with education and the fact that without retraining and education those still in school, and those who have left school, are in their judgment likely to find it very difficult, even in good times, to earn enough money to maintain the standard of living this country wants to see them maintain. I quote from page 8 of the Senate report:

> This leads to a consideration of the whole question of education and training in Canada. Nothing—

I emphasize these words.

> Nothing has impressed the committee more than the very heavy incidence of unemployment among young people, the unskilled, and the inadequately educated. This has been brought out repeatedly, both by the committee's own research staff and by other witnesses. Every study that has been made reveals that in the economy of today the emphasis is increasingly on skill and training, and every forecast that has been prepared indicates clearly that this trend will continue in the years ahead. The opportunities for unskilled and semi-skilled workers are becoming more and more limited as time passes.
> This situation must be viewed with a sense of urgency. Without any question we must devote a much larger proportion of our resources to education and training of all kinds—

If the minister was anxious to follow that recommendation it seems he was unfortunately without resources. It had been decided months ago what was to be done. The Senate manpower committee report says we must devote more resources to education and training.

The Senate committee conclude this portion of the report by saying we must begin now.

The minister may say we had such a program this session in connection with vocational training. The Senate manpower committee were well aware of that, but in their view it was quite inadequate to meet the very important problem with which they were dealing. What is this government doing for the young person? These young people are the ones who in large measure cannot enter the labour market in an initial way and find a job when times are as tough as they have been and continue to be.

All the government is offering our young people in this budget is this. "You will assume, in addition to the debt of perhaps $14 billion net that we older people left you, another $700 million approximately as of today. We do not know when we will pay it. That will be a burden upon you as you grow older".

Despite the promises of this administration prior to coming into power, nothing has been done for the municipalities. I could quote, but I will not do so, the lavish inducements that were given to representatives of municipal governments and their taxpayers in regard to assistance they might be given if the Prime Minister assumed his present post.

In so far as employment is concerned, I am satisfied that much more can be done at the municipal level, and much more quickly, to reduce unemployment in the municipalities, if the municipalities have the proper resources, beyond that which can be done by some fancy federal public works building that usually requires a great deal of long range planning and so on. I think this budget contains $10 million of tax forsaking for the encouragement of more efficient business. I look across to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Rumour has it that he meant what he said across the country, that he wanted exports to increase and he would do his best in cabinet discussions to see that exporters in this country were not non-competitive; he would do his best in connection with tax situations that put industries in an unfair position in respect to their competitors.

We have a section in this budget dealing with depreciation allowances. As I say, the cost to the treasury is $10 million for 1961-62. That is not very much when compared with the ambitions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for our export trade. I believe almost everybody thought the minister would be successful in encouraging those in the export field by providing some spur from this government in the form of tax incentives. However, there is nothing in this budget in that connection. There are many who believe we could not lose anything by giving a tax abatement for the first two or three years of production to new industry which has never provided tax in the past. We do that for the resource industries. If the government has not been getting any taxes at all and an industry is likely to encourage the production of taxes in the near future, would this not be an incentive that would mean something? The Minister of Trade and Commerce looks rather sad. I think perhaps he got the facts of life from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hees: That is not why I am looking sad.

Mr. Benidickson: But while we need this at this time, and though we needed it a year ago, nothing has been done. Perhaps now it cannot be done because, as I say, the treasury is bare and broke.

There are other suggestions of this kind with which the minister is familiar. I was impressed, as I am sure a great number of other members were impressed, as to what this restraint means because of past commitments and decisions. The most worth-while thing we should be thinking about are ways and means of reducing to a minimum the canker of unemployment. I read with grave concern the report of the Senate committee in this respect. They said they hope we shall get at this time bold actions. The Senate said that large amounts of money would be required but that mass unemployment in itself entails the expenditure of large amounts of money.

The Senate committee estimates that unemployment benefits and unemployment relief cost Canada roughly $600 million last year. In addition there is a production loss—and this is a factor which should always be in our thinking—which may be put close to $3 billion. On top of this is the social and psychological damage caused when hundreds of thousands of men are unable to find work. This cannot be afforded. It simply means that we have to be in a position to deal with this in a financial way, and I think the Minister of Finance, when we are engaged upon a discussion of Canada's finances, must be prepared to do that.

As I see it, those are the bare bones of the dollars that are involved and are upsetting ways and means. After two hours and 30 minutes the facts come out, but of course they come out only when we see the text when we read Hansard because they are contained in a table which goes to the Clerk. But the grand words of the minister go out to the press beforehand. We have a deficit of a thousand million dollars—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the cash deficit.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the cash deficit. The minister, of course, having been found wanting in his prognostications in a specific way got a little timid this time and took the attitude well, it will likely be $650 million but I want a little insurance this time so that I shall not be criticized for being a bit out. Of course he was out this last year to the tune of some $350 million; the difference between a $12 million surplus and a $345 million deficit is actually more than $350 million. However, the minister has done the unusual thing here, and he has a spread of $100 million. Besides this, he has not been frank and forthright with us, as I think he should have been, in giving us even a key. He has couched references to the gross national product in the most vague terms and this, I suggest, is unprecedented.

However, we have in this budget one element which, perhaps, is of some consequence and to which attention should more deservedly be paid. I refer to the minister's statement with respect to capital savings, balance of payments and exchange rates. I quote from the hon. gentleman's budget speech.

When the economy was fully employed and expanding rapidly and when inflationary reserves were active, such capital inflows—

The minister had been talking about capital inflows.

—and the matching import surpluses of goods and services were appropriate and beneficial.

Mr. Chevrier: That was in Liberal times.

Mr. Benidickson: I was going to refer to that.

Under today's conditions they are not only unnecessary but in some forms they can be even harmful.

Even in the current session, and certainly in every other session of the present parliament during the past three years, the minister and all those associated with him have said the very opposite. They have spoken with great horror about the previously high imbalance of payments in 1956, and, of course, used it very noisily during the last election campaign. Nevertheless here we find these astonishing words "when the economy was fully employed and expanding rapidly". Does anybody doubt that the economy was at its peak in 1956? But when that was the situation—and the minister has always asserted that there were unnecessary inflationary pressures at that time—the hon. gentleman finally says to us, after four years of political activity on an opposite course, that these were appropriate and beneficial under those conditions.

Then the minister goes on to say, in this section of his speech:

The public reactions to these warnings and measures—

He is speaking of the budget of March, 1960.

—have clearly been in the right direction. The capital inflow has been reduced, the exchange rate on our dollar has been reduced, the surplus import of goods and services has been reduced; but they have not been reduced enough.

But to return to the minister's performance last Tuesday night on television, I must say I was astonished that when he was challenged as to why he had been so slow in taking action in the control of foreign exchange, if that was to be so tremendously beneficial, he should have said that while it was not appropriate then, because of what he had done a year ago it still was now appropriate. The interesting thing is that one has to go outside the budget speech to another speech which the minister made in the country in order to find a key to why he thought his budget of March 1960 was helpful in the matter of reducing the premium on the Canadian dollar.

I find that the minister has held this view for all the 15 months since he presented that budget. The interesting thing is that apparently it was the fact that he was only going to the market for $210 million that made this helpful. Indeed, as late as January of this year, in his 1961 budget presentation to his friends in Toronto, the minister made the statement that his budget in 1960 had been helpful in the Canadian dollar situation because he went to the market only for $210 million, and it had a direct relation to the premium on the Canadian dollar. Now what is the situation going to be when in one portion of the budget the minister says he is going actively into the market to assure that the Canadian dollar goes down and there will be, using his words, "a significant discount"? We, of course, want to know what "significant" means before we can conclude this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will not find out.

Mr. Benidickson: We will put forth our best efforts to find out. There is great inconsistency. The Minister of Finance in Toronto as recently as January was defending the uncontrolled exchange rate on the Canadian dollar. I think he will recall that we in the opposition expressed concern a year ago that the premium on the Canadian dollar had a very damaging effect upon our over-all economic situation, and particularly upon our vital export trade and tourist trade. As I say, the minister was a great defender of the uncontrolled premium as recently as a year ago.

It is very disturbing to some readers of the minister's budget to compare his former statements with the minister's statement on Tuesday night in which he said, in connection with balancing payments, that it would be the government's aim to reduce the trade deficit and the balance of payments substantially, and to ultimately achieve a position of balance. In the next paragraph he said the government's purpose was to put Canadian producers in a position where as a result of these policies they would soon—he was talking about exports—be selling at home and abroad many hundreds of millions of dollars worth of Canadian goods and services which would yield a substantial effect, directly and indirectly, in the form of "more jobs, more production, more business opportunities for our industries." Here again is the usual very extravagant language of the minister regarding what is going to be done about our exports.

Mr. Hees: That is very true.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance apparently has confirmation from his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is the forecast. I hope they are both better prophets now than the minister was in connection with the over-all forecast regarding a surplus a year ago.

I should like to say in this connection that when emphasis is placed in this budget on the value of the government intervening in connection with exchange control, there is inconsistency; and I refer to the minister's statement on this subject in Toronto on January 11, 1960. He said that anyone seeking to buy Canadian dollars with United States dollars or other foreign exchange would create a demand for Canadian dollars, and this demand for Canadian dollars arises from our merchandise exports, from foreign tourist expenditures in Canada, from foreign purchases of Canadian securities and from a whole host of other transfers of funds from foreign countries to Canada. He also said the effect of Canada's very large deficit in its commodity trade and other current account transactions tends to raise the value of United States dollars in relation to Canadian dollars. Indeed, the larger the trade deficit the stronger is the upward pressure on the United States dollar as compared with the Canadian dollar. Those were the statements he made as late as January, 1960.

We are now told that the big thing in this budget is the likelihood that the government will assure that the Canadian dollar will remain at par or, indeed, at a significant discount. In the same speech we are told that we are going to eventually eliminate this imbalance of payments, and that this means, in the words of the Minister of Finance, hundreds of millions of dollars of exports. I think we are entitled to a little further explanation about this ambiguity.

I ask how expensive this is going to be if the minister is going to control the exchange as between the Canadian and the United States dollar. I am not complaining about his objective in this regard because we have urged the same objective but he is not telling us about the financial obligations which will result. I suggest they might be very severe, having regard to what he said last year. I am taking his word of last year, when he said that this would be exceedingly expensive. Then he said in his budget that exports were going to increase by hundreds of millions of dollars and that this would help to increase the value of the United States dollar vis-à-vis our own. I suggest we have heard much too little from the Minister of Finance in this respect.

The minister also said in that same speech of January, 1960 made to the Canadian club in Toronto in respect to the premium—and he was referring to United States and foreign investors—that if outsiders wished to invest in Canada it was because they have confidence in our country and its financial soundness. I suggest that the minister has announced a tremendous cash and huge ordinary deficit as shown by the budget papers we have before us.

As somebody asked last night during the press conference program, is it possible that the minister is really thinking that this control on foreign exchange is in fact not going to be very expensive to him because in the ordinary course and due to some of the matters to which I have just referred, as the Canadian dollar will perhaps fall anyway in relation to the value of the United States dollar.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is almost one o'clock, but before we adjourn I should like to refer to a press clipping which I now have through the courtesy of my friend behind me. It is from the Ottawa Citizen of February 2, 1961 and contains a spanking, a whipping up, or cheering on by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The heading is "Hees Blames Canadians for Slowup". The minister is reported in this article as follows:

> "We are facing a difficult time and things are going to get worse before getting better".

This statement was made after the glowing report made to the citizens of Toronto in the annual statement of the Minister of Finance early in January, 1961, at which time he suggested there was no emergency and indicated just too much complacency.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at one o'clock I was dealing with what I thought was one of the major items of interest in the budget—and there were not too many of them—that might have justified the delay in its presentation. I was dealing with the proposal of the Minister of Finance for a new policy with respect to foreign exchange control, which he argued against last year.

In the course of my discussion I indicated that the minister had appeared at a press conference on television last night. One of the members of the press asked him whether it was a fact that from December, 1960 to May, 1961 the records of the Bank of Canada indicated that only a reduction of half a point in the Canadian dollar premium had been achieved vis-à-vis the United States dollar, and that according to the records it appeared to involve, as I heard it come over the air last night, $100 million for a half point difference in premium. During the noon hour I ascertained that the figure used by Mr. Barkway last night was $120 million.

I referred to the fact that just before the house opened this morning I had received this week's issue of the Financial Post, and that it contained an article by Dr. D. B. Marsh, assistant general manager of the Royal bank. The heading of the article reads:

Keeping the dollar at fixed "parity" could be costly.

I had been told that this article would assert, as it does, that it was likely this operation would require $200 million per point just to keep the Canadian dollar at this predetermined so-called parity. The minister has not indicated to us that parity is his objective. He has used vague terms. In view of what is involved we should hear more from him. He indicated that a significant discount was his objective.

I have spoken at greater length than I usually choose to do. I had hoped that I could have some time to discuss the important matter of interest and debt management. I know that my good colleague from Welland will be heard from later in the debate with his shrewd observations in this field. I would have liked to say something about the industrial development bank. I may say to the minister I regard his announcement in this respect as significant also, and he is to be commended on his decision here. However, I think the suggestion in the budget speech that we are to have legislation during this session to amend this act indicates not too much foresight in the preparation of the work of the session. I do not think this was part of the program announced to us in the speech from the throne. I indicated earlier that prior to Christmas the opposition had given extreme co-operation and had disposed with rapidity and expedition of any items that the ministry had prepared and ready for the session that were directed toward creating jobs, not only during wintertime but jobs per se.

I raised this question last year in a similar debate. I said if the minister took the position that he never said that tight money and actual monetary policy belonged to the Bank of Canada, the decision to amend the industrial development bank legislation in this particular field could be taken by the government. It could have been done during the last session if the minister had the feeling with respect to high interest rates about which he now expresses some concern. It was not done during last session. There was no indication that the planning of the government in November had advanced to the point where they were prepared to do what was announced last Tuesday night. I said last year in the debate that at a time when the banks had been nudged by the minister to reduce the prime lending rate on commercial loans, it seemed unfortunate that the industrial development bank had not followed suit.

Prior to the budget speech the minister suggested to us during this session that he was in some way responsible and should get some credit for the fact that the prime lending rate of the commercial banks was recently reduced one quarter of a point. If it is so that the minister had a finger in that development, I say to him that at the time I raised the question why a similar development did not take place with respect to the industrial development bank. I think this, as well as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation interest rate, which is a matter of government decision, should be very much to the fore so far as the minister is concerned when he says he is doing all he can, I assume through all possible avenues, to reduce the general level of interest rates across the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that the hon. member is aware of the fact that the interest rate charged by the industrial development bank was reduced not long ago by half of 1 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the current rate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Six and a half per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister says "not long ago". The newspaper clipping I have with respect to the matter is dated September 13, 1960. That is some time ago. According to my information that was the last cut in the interest rate. The level was reduced to 6½ per cent not recently but as long ago as September of 1960, certainly long before the minister claimed credit, as he did on two occasions during this session, for nudging the commercial banks to reduce their prime lending rate.

I had hoped that time would have permitted me to say something about the desirability of going beyond the productivity council and setting up the type of body that has been discussed here from time to time and which has been developed in the United States under the Kennedy administration, namely a price-wage board. I also feel that the productivity council is not the entire answer to some of our needs at the present time with respect to imaginative programs to get the economy on its feet. I think we should have an economic research agency that would carry out greater co-ordination among the departments of government which in my opinion are inadequately co-ordinated today.

The minister will be more familiar than I am, of course, with certain new developments in connection with an international monetary organization going beyond what we have today. When the minister speaks again, as he usually does, I should like to hear something about Canada's attitude toward the plans for an Atlantic monetary organization. At least three plans have been presented to most countries in the western world, the last one by Professor Tiffin. I should like to know whether Canada has been approached with regard to this new idea, and to what extent it might be an advance while still not interfering with or superseding the international monetary fund.

I should have liked to deal with several other subjects, but in view of the fact that the exchange fund problem had in my opinion been inadequately explained I thought I would devote as much time to that subject as I have devoted today. We have a cash deficit of $1 billion which we know about, but heaven knows what more is involved. When one reads the fine print in the minister's statement with relation to foreign exchange control and when one reads that the minister himself last year had great apprehensions about this matter and referred to the possibility of gigantic gambles with the taxpayers' money, I think it is very surprising that in his long speech, in which he generated a great amount of wind on so many matters that did not seem to have too much significance, the minister could only spare one little breath with respect to possible financial liability in connection with the foreign exchange control problem and the gamble with the taxpayers' money that might be involved.

Trade is a matter to which I should like to refer, but I will not take the time to do so now. I know that others on this side of the house will deal with it. All I want to say on that subject at this time is that a week ago, prior to the budget, the minister promised an expansionist budget, but when one reads the details and the fine print one finds that in the field of trade the budget is restrictionist and not expansionist.

Finally I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the financial proposals of the government, as set forth in the budget presented to this house by the Minister of Finance and contrary to the advance publicity, are restrictive of trade and thoroughly inadequate to expand the production and jobs needed to ensure the growth of the economy, despite the burdens imposed by a fifth consecutive deficit of a record size;

And the house believes that for this reason, and because of the general mismanagement of the country's financial affairs, the government is not entitled to the confidence of the elected representatives of the people."

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the baby budget brought down last December we at long last had an admission on the part of the government of its failure to meet the national needs. In December the minister told us of his error in forecasting and informed us that he was going to have a whopping deficit. In the baby budget we also noticed a recognition on the part of the government that action was indeed needed. The economy had not received the big push forward that we had looked for and that was so badly needed. However, in the baby budget the government at least did give a little nudge to economic activity in our nation.

Now it is admitted that the failure of the government to take the radical measures that were necessary has cost us half a year of needless stagnation in our national economy. In addition it has imposed needless hardship on the millions of Canadians who are at exceptionally low levels of income, and especially it has caused needless hardship to the over 700,000 Canadians who were unemployed for so much of the past year, and many of whom are still unemployed. Then, too, Canadians had been led to believe that the government was at long last in favour of expansion; that it was even going to take measures to loosen up the money supply and drastically reduce interest rates. We also expected some large scale measures in the budget specifically designed to stimulate and enhance economic activity.

What did we get instead? There is not much in the budget, Mr. Speaker, about which I can complain. There is not much that is particularly bad. There is one thing that is bad about it, and that is what is not in the budget itself. The budget is lacking in any major measures designed to remove our economic ills. As a result of what is not in this budget, I can only come to the conclusion that the government admits it is unwilling or unable to take the measures that are necessary, and that the basic flaw is deeply imbedded in our economic system, our system of economic anarchy which parades under the false front of free enterprise.

This advice that the minister gave to Canadians to work hard and pratice self-discipline is not going to be taken very kindly by the half million Canadians who would be very happy indeed if there were employment available and they were able to work hard. They are going to consider this as a bit of ill timed advice. The minister blames Europe for his great error last year when he predicted a 6 per cent increase in gross national production. It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, but every time there is something haywire in the minister's calculations or in his estimates he always manages to find somebody else to blame. I can recall a number of occasions when he put the blame for what was happening on the United States. Now he has turned to Europe, which is supposed to be responsible; or perhaps it is the governor of the Bank of Canada, who is now pictured as such a vicious ogre, a man who has plotted and schemed against the intentions of this government.

I do not think he can get off the hook as easily as that, by blaming the United States or Europe or the governor of the Bank of Canada. We cannot forget that the minister is the owner, on behalf of the people of Canada, of the Bank of Canada. The Canadian people are not going to take kindly to the government blaming one of the employees of the bank, even though he may be the governor, for the lack of action on the part of the government, even though this attempt is hidden under the smokescreen of a charge that the governor participated in increasing his retirement allowance.

On January 16 last our group moved an amendment to the baby budget. We made a number of recommendations in our amendment, but there were three specific recommendations having to do with monetary policy. I should like to put them on the record. Recommendation No. 1 was to lower interest rates; No. 2 was an expansion of the money supply commensurate with a full employment program; No. 3, assistance to export and domestic industries by taking those steps necessary to reduce the premium on the Canadian dollar.

At that time, and on other occasions, the minister heaped a lot of ridicule on our proposals in the field of monetary policy. He made many speeches both inside and outside of the house in which he told the Canadian people it was impossible to implement those recommendations. Now, at long last and rather belatedly, the minister has officially endorsed each of those three proposals. I should like to commend him for that. I only hope his endorsation of these proposals will result in very early action, because the nation needs the action that is contemplated in these particular proposals. At the end of my remarks today our group hope to offer additional proposals that we feel should be implemented. I hope this time the minister will not be as long in adopting the new proposals that we are going to make in our amendment.

I listened for some time to the usual complaints of the Liberal party. I regard their attitude as most irresponsible. We are here to attack, that is true, but we are here also to offer useful counterproposals to those of the government. I find very little in the whole of the Liberal complaint about the budget that could be classified as useful counterproposals. Even their amendment seems, in effect, only to call upon the government to resign in order, I assume, to make way for the resumption of the Liberal party in office. The Canadian people are not going to forget so easily the many long years of mismanagement by the Liberal party which led us into the economic mess in which we have been ever since. I believe that the utter failure of both the Liberal and Conservative parties to come forward with concrete measures designed to enhance economic activity in Canada indicates the bankruptcy of their basic political philosophy.

The minister predicted a deficit, on operations I take it, of some $650 million. If this were a deficit that was designed to do something to move the rate of economic activity to a higher level; if the deficit were designed to attain national objectives, we would heartily endorse the deficit. We have never been opposed to deficits that are deliberately planned to accomplish certain economic aims. However, this deficit with which we are now faced is only the result of poor housekeeping. It is a deficit on the normal operating account of the government.

I believe it is a horrible indictment of the ability of the government to adequately manage national affairs. If the government were to ask for a deficit designed to rid the country of unemployment, to give all people a minimum basic standard of living worthy of our nation's resources, then I would say that the people of Canada would heartily endorse the deficit. But the people of Canada are going to take a very dim view of a government that admits its inability to handle financial affairs.

This is a passive deficit, and I see no indication in the budget of the expansion that we had been led to believe would be forthcoming, especially in the light of the attack on the governor of the Bank of Canada. It is our contention that our economy is not going to improve all by itself; that government action is necessary. It is also our conviction that our ills will not be remedied until the government subscribes to and implements the basic philosophy of a planned economy.

I should like to say that I regret very much the admission of the minister that for his lifetime in office he has avoided consultation with the governor of the Bank of Canada in the preparation of the budgets he has presented to this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Regier: I believe this is a serious oversight on the part of the government and may in large measure be responsible for the mess in which they now find themselves.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I never said what you are attributing to me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, you did.

Mr. Regier: The failure of the government to decide these matters in consultation with the governor of the Bank of Canada and to seek the advice of the man who ostensibly operates the Bank of Canada in the interests of the people of Canada is a serious matter. The minister complained that because of the intransigency of the governor he was unable to consult with him in the preparation of the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Certainly the minister said that.

Mr. Regier: I heard the minister say that the day before yesterday, and I believe the record of Hansard will show that very clearly indeed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Regier: The minister now predicts an increase in the gross national product—we can only assume he is doing so—of roughly 3 per cent. This is completely inadequate to meet the needs of our country. When you consider that the minister is going to depress the value of the Canadian dollar; when you consider the increase in our national population per annum, the minister is actually predicting a per capita decrease in the production of goods and services. This admission that things are not expected to improve indicates that the government seems quite content to live for another year with a level of business stagnation, as we now know it, of almost one million unemployed next winter; and there is an indication that the government intends to attempt to ride out the storm hoping that by some miracle conditions will right themselves.

I may say it is interesting to note, in regard to the increase in our gross national product, that there has not been enough growth ever since 1956 to match increases in our labour force and take care of those displaced in industry and agriculture because of technological changes. In constant dollars our gross national product has risen. In 1957 it rose by .1 per cent; in 1958 by 1.1 per cent; in 1959 by 3.2 per cent; in 1960 by only 2.1 per cent. That stands in sharp contrast with what happened in the years preceding 1957. In 1950 the rate of real growth was 6.9 per cent; in 1951 it was 6.2 per cent; in 1952 it was 8 per cent; in 1955 it was 8.6 per cent; in 1956 it was again 8.6 per cent. The per capita value of goods and services is today 5 per cent less than it was in 1956, and the minister is predicting that this very sad situation is going to continue at least until the end of the next fiscal year, namely March 31, 1962.

We have one of the highest rates of labour growth in the entire world. I believe only Japan has a labour growth rate in excess of ours. In the eight years 1950 to 1958—and these figures are taken from the United Nations world economic survey, 1959—we had an annual labour force growth of 2.2 per cent, whereas in the Netherlands it was only 1.2 per cent and in the United Kingdom it was only .9 per cent. When we have this rapid labour force growth action is essential on the part of the government to ensure that employment opportunities advance at a rate that is at least equal to the rate of growth of our labour force.

We had anticipated there would be some massive plans presented to the Canadian people at this time. Pump priming, as it has been commonly known, at this particular time in the field of production would be of little value. We need to take action to stimulate effective demand in Canada in order to assure ourselves of adequate opportunities of employment. The government is not undertaking measures that are designed in that direction.

I should like to ask the minister, since he now subscribes ostensibly to a policy of lower interest rates, how he plans to effectively reduce interest rates when he himself admits that we will have to find over $1 billion of additional money on the money market or by using the Bank of Canada. I believe the minister is contradicting himself when he blames the governor of the Bank of Canada for excessively high rates of interest when he, by his own activities, is going to be responsible for this terrific amount of new borrowing on the Canadian money market.

The whole role of the Bank of Canada, I am very happy to note, is likely to be reviewed by a royal commission, I believe the government has announced. I notice this also had the hearty endorsation of the governor of the Bank of Canada, as I believe is also indicated by the report of the Senate committee on manpower. I should like to read what Mr. Coyne had to say about this matter. I read from Mr. Coyne's release to the press of June 15:

I also entirely agree with the committee's—

He is referring to the Senate committee:

—view that there is need for "a comprehensive study and re-examination of our machinery for monetary control and of its place in the formulation and the carrying out of economic policies". Such a study, whether by a royal commission or other suitable body, would of course have to include the entire banking system, and indeed all the public and private financial machinery in Canada, within the scope of its review and recommendations.

I believe the day is long overdue when the whole role of the Bank of Canada should be thoroughly reviewed and alterations made so that the Bank of Canada is not limited to one narrow aspect of the monetary field. It cannot effectively deal with our monetary needs if we have many investment houses and insurance companies which have far more power, far more authority or far more effectiveness than even the regular chartered banking system of our nation.

This situation did not obtain when the Bank of Canada was initially established. However, it is a situation that we must face up to today, and I believe we will come to the conclusion that whoever is responsible for the operations of the Bank of Canada will have to be given authority much wider and much more extensive in the field of monetary policy than has been the case hitherto.

The government is recommending exemptions for explorations under the Income Tax Act for certain industries in Canada. I find this a little difficult to appreciate when we have in existence unused known resources, unused capital goods, machinery operating at half capacity and in many cases less than that. I feel that when existing known resources are not being fully utilized it is a poor time for the government to be making these extraordinary concessions to encourage additional exploration. There have been warnings issued in the past about this reckless capital expansion, this reckless expansion in our productive capacity. Such men as the heads of the pulp and paper industries of Canada have openly admitted that they have been guilty of overexpansion in the immediate post-war years and that today they are having to operate under a handicap in consequence because they are very badly overcapitalized. I believe the oil industry is another perfect example. We now have to pay capitalization costs on oil wells which are not likely to be used in my lifetime; they will be used, maybe, by my sons or grandsons.

[Mr. Regier.]

However, the present economic system has to bear the cost of maintaining this reckless expansion which has taken place in years not long gone by at a period when our nation lacked the resources necessary to expand in the essential fields of education, hospitalization, roads, highways and the like.

We agree that the government needs an adequate level of income. We have never argued that our proposals can be implemented without our having to pay for them. We do believe that the government can enhance its income most easily by pursuing a policy of full employment. This would make it easier for all levels of government to meet their responsibilities. We believe this is the easiest way by which government revenues could be enhanced to the point where there would, at least, no longer be any need to ask parliament to approve a deficit budget in order that ordinary housekeeping expenditures might be met. We would recommend some reductions in taxation, but also some new taxes and some increases in the field of taxation with the net result that, assisted by a full employment policy, all levels of government would be able to discharge their responsibilities.

I should like at this time to call on the government to take action to protect the consumers of Canada. I believe the consumer is becoming increasingly aware of his identity as a consumer, and that he is becoming more and more restless because of the unwillingness of the government to take action to protect his interests. I make particular reference to the utter failure of the Combines Investigation Act to fulfil its assigned responsibility. It has been ineffective in preventing ruthless exploitation of the Canadian consumer. With the permission of the house I should like to put into the record a table submitted by the Minister of Justice on February 8, 1960 in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Skeena, because I do believe that the readers of Hansard would be most interested in noting how great a variety of consumer goods has been dealt with by the officers of the combines investigation branch, including some of the most essential articles in our daily life such as bread, matches, roofing, wire and cable. I believe it would be in the public interest for the public to see that what the Prime Minister recommended when he was in opposition is most urgent at this time, namely that we put some teeth into our Combines Investigation Act. Merely to levy nominal fines on offending companies is obviously not having the desired effect. Despite all the hard and conscientious work of the civil servants who have the responsibility for making the act as effective as they can, it is obvious that much stronger measures will be necessary.

I should like to cite just one example. A number of years ago the oil companies in the lower mainland of British Columbia were found guilty of price fixing. Nominal fines were imposed. I believe the companies may even have had the decision reversed later on in a higher court. However, by deliberate design they now have invented a new kind of agreement with the dealers, the retail agents of gasoline and oil, which completely flouts the intent of the Combines Investigation Act. I had discussions with one of the oil companies, and the officials were prepared to admit that they were circumventing the intent of law even though, perhaps, they were remaining within the letter of the law.

I have with me certain details in connection with this matter. I have invoices which indicate that a dealer who signs an agreement on the dotted line and agrees to be their slave or serf is allowed a margin of 7 cents a gallon on the gasoline he sells. However, if he insists on his independence he is allowed a margin of only 3.6 cents a gallon. This was a few weeks ago, and I understand the figure has since been reduced to 2.6 cents a gallon. I do not blame the operators of the retail outlets. They are doing their best under very difficult circumstances. They have to survive on very narrow margins. We had the University of British Columbia make a survey of all the service stations in the municipality of Burnaby, and this commission found that the net earnings of all the operators of all the service stations in Burnaby in one year amounted to less than 80 cents an hour. It is a disgrace when so-called independent businessmen earn a net income of no more than 80 cents an hour.

I understand that one company, and I have a record of it here, is engaged in a dispute. It is not before the courts yet so I can speak of it, but it may come before the courts. This company is attempting to cancel its mortgage agreement with the oil company. It is offering to pay every nickel it owes, but the oil company is not accepting the offered payment. I believe we ought to take legislative action so that if a man owes some money and is prepared to repay what he owes, he may have the right by law to get off the hook and get out from under his obligations.

This particular retail company has been warned that if it cancels the agreement, either legally or otherwise, the oil company may undertake a claim for damages against it and might be prepared to sue for loss of business amounting to as much as 10 cents a gallon for each of the next five years, running in this case to some $60,000. I would dare a Canadian oil company which allows a margin of only 2.6 cents a gallon to publicly sue any operator for a loss of business at the rate of 10 cents a gallon. I think if they did that the people of Canada would once and for all be able to see that it is not the retail operators but the monopoly cartel of our oil companies who are responsible for the racketeering and the needless exploitation that goes on.

Let no one say there is no monoply. Imperial Oil, either alone or through its subsidiary companies, owns oil wells in Alberta, pipe lines that take the oil to Edmonton, the gathering system, the Trans-Mountain Oil Pipe Lines, and their own oil refinery outside Vancouver. They deliver in their own trucks and own their own retail outlets. Then, as I have indicated, the man actually doing the work in rain and sleet earns less than 80 cents an hour. If this is allowed to continue it will not be long before the big companies dictate whom he is to marry, when he may marry and so on. I call on the government either to amend the Combines Investigation Act or to bring in other legislation to ensure that the consumer of Canada is not going to be a forgotten man, and that the hard working businessman who wants to be independent is not exploited as he is at the present time.

I indicated earlier that at the end of my remarks I intended to move an amendment in which would be contained some specific recommendation. These recommendations may appear very expensive to the public treasury; however, I should like to point out that in our opinion these recommendations will enhance effective demand for consumer goods in Canada and will thereby be responsible for getting the wheels of industries going again in order to supply the need for consumer goods. The government, incidentally, will find its revenues enhanced as a result.

I should also like to point out that many of these payments we propose return by way of taxes, and in other ways. All levels of government added together take about one third of what the average Canadian earns. Therefore to increase the average Canadian income is not necessarily a net expense on the part of the different levels of government.

I should like to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough:

That the amendment be further amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "size" and adding thereto the following paragraph:

And this house regrets that adequate consideration has not been given and the government has failed to undertake social and economic planning necessary to stimulate the economy, provide full employment, and give an adequate level of social security by such specific measures as:

1. Raising basic exemptions under the Income Tax Act.

2. Increasing old age security and assistance payments.

3. Increasing family allowances to restore the value of their original purchasing power.

4. Establishing a national security plan, by arrangement with the provinces which will include a portable pension plan available to all residents in Canada.

Perhaps I might interject here to point out that what the minister has proposed in his budget in regard to portable pension plans does not represent the kind of portable pension plan that we have been advocating, because what he proposes will still leave without any pension plans at all, many millions of Canadians who are now without adequate pension plans.

The amendment to the amendment continues:

5. Increasing the investment in the public sector in order to increase and sustain a high rate of economic growth by providing highly essential public goods and services such as health services, including hospitals and other medical and dental facilities necessary for a comprehensive health program, low cost housing, assistance to municipalities for urban development and renewal, highways and conservation.

Mr. Speaker: Does any hon. member desire to comment on the regularity of proposing this amendment before it is put before the house?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I submit that there may be some doubt as to the regularity of the amendment, and suggest that Your Honour might like to take it under consideration before putting it to the house. I should think if the amendment simply read "This house regrets that adequate consideration has not been given to—" and then went on to enumerate the various items, it would probably be in order. The fact that it goes on to say "—and the government has failed to undertake social and economic planning necessary to stimulate the economy—" would appear to give a direction to the government in relation to the items enumerated, and if it does such it would, in my respectful submission, be out of order.

I have only had a very brief opportunity, as Your Honour realizes, to examine this proposed amendment to the amendment, and I suggest Your Honour perhaps should reserve the issue in order to have the opportunity of examining it before it is put to the house.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could be allowed to say a word or two in respect to the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I should like to call Your Honour's attention to the fact that the motion reads:

This house regrets that adequate consideration has not been given and the government has failed—

I do not believe that can be interpreted as a directive to the government, but is an expression of the opinion that this house feels the government has not taken this action.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to speak briefly to the point of order. There would, of course, be no objection to Your Honour reserving your decision without prejudice. However, I do not agree with the view taken by the parliamentary secretary. I am not now commenting on the merits of the resolution one way or another but one must support the suggestion that we should give full consideration—although I have no hesitation in saying that the increases in old age security benefits—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and family allowances are not being opposed by anything I say. Likewise, with regard to the question of portable pensions, we are in full support of the merits of those increases. What we are discussing is the—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not debate the matter. He can easily reserve his comments in respect of any of these points in discussing the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is overly sensitive these days and I will overlook his interruption on that account, and because he is overly preocupied.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And you are overly sly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This motion simply asks the house to note with regret that consideration has not been given to these matters, the mere mention of which arouses the hon. gentleman. The motion goes on to say not that action should be taken but simply that the house regrets that the government has failed to increase old age pensions, family allowances and the like.

On the point of order, there would not seem to be much reason for the objection taken by the parliamentary secretary. If Your Honour feels that you wish to reserve your ruling, I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to take advantage of the opportunity of considering the amendment as the debate proceeds and to deal with it a little later. It is a comprehensive document including a great variety of specific items. I can say initially that I do not think the parliamentary secretary has persuaded me that the passage of this amendment would in any way commit the government, because it is only an expression of regret and a condemnation for failure rather than an instruction which would be binding. However, as I said, I should like to reserve judgment and allow the debate to proceed.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, we in this group are happy with your decision to reserve your ruling, but I should hope that in conjunction with your reservation our right of consultation with Mr. Speaker, in order to possibly make some minor amendments, will be maintained.

Mr. Speaker: I would not like to give that assurance. If I find anything to complain about in the amendment I will give the hon. member an opportunity to be heard further on the point of order.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in their speeches today the two official financial critics opposite have run true to form. Caustic personal comment and tart personal jibes have been substituted for objective argument and constructive consistent reasoned discussion of fiscal and monetary policies. I would say to the house that seldom has it been treated to so much confused and disordered economic reasoning. In the 30 minutes to which I am confined I cannot hope to follow the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River down all the blind alleys, down all the tortuous by-paths of reasoning which he traversed today; but as I go along I will deal with his principal strictures, his special pleadings and, if I may say, his hair-splitting inconsistencies.

With respect to the hon. gentleman, I must say that several times in his speech his reasoning reminded me of a man who had painted himself into a corner. I say to him as well that I have never heard such a vague, hollow, lame, disjointed criticism of any budget, and that its vagueness was equalled only by its emptiness. What to me, sir, was the most extraordinary, the most incredibly fascinating fact of his whole speech was his total failure even once to mention the name "Coyne", at least that word spelled with a "y"; and further his total failure to mention really the role of monetary policy. After the uproar created in this chamber and in a certain committee of this house by an attempt of the Liberal party to get into bed with Mr. Coyne, well, the extraordinary divorce professed today passeth completely any understanding. I say to you, what a revelation of the utter bankruptcy of Liberal policy and tactics, the utter bankruptcy of the tactics which they have pursued in this chamber over the past 10 days.

How was it possible, sir, how was it conceivable, that the dissociation with Mr. Coyne could be so quickly achieved? Well, in fact it has not been or never could any party be deflated so rapidly. I wonder what Mr. Coyne will think of his erstwhile allies?

Let me say just a word on the Liberal amendment. Perhaps I should deal with the earlier parts of it. They are a collection of meaningless words and I would say a sophistical sham. Who in the house would have any question about the author of it. The house will know that the voice was the voice of Kenora-Rainy River's Jacob but the hand certainly was the hand of Bonavista's Esau.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member is just as wrong now as he was before.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What an amendment. Let me read the end of it:

> The government is not entitled to the confidence of the elected representatives of the people.

Well, sir, we on this side of the house will take up that challenge at any time. We are prepared to divide now or at any time. We are prepared to demonstrate now the full and unlimited confidence of those of us who sit on this side of the house in the policies of the right hon. Prime Minister and in the budget which was presented by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday night. I go further, sir, and I say that in due course the people of this country will uphold the policies which are enunciated in that budget.

Hon. gentlemen opposite suddenly in the last short while have changed their tactics. Hon. gentlemen were quiet on the first day of June in this house. Why? Because of what happened on May 31: 3 to 1 was the score in the by-elections. Yes, sir, and the score will be equivalent when the time comes in due course, whether it be in the year 1961, the year 1962 or 1963 to submit the record of this government to the people, a record of which all of us on this side of the house are especially proud.

Mr. Benidickson: You are not ready?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In view of the fact that the C.C.F. amendment, which deals with everything except the kitchen sink, has been reserved I shall offer no comment in respect of it at the present time.

The Minister of Finance described this budget as not an ordinary one, but in more than usual measure an economic budget, and such, sir, it is. Its central design is the re-establishment of an effective partnership among fiscal, monetary and commercial policies. Only on that firm footing, on that partnership, can there be built what the Minister of Finance described as a comprehensive, sound and responsible economic program designed to raise the levels of employment and production in Canada.

The hon. gentleman from Kenora-Rainy River endeavoured this morning and last Tuesday night with, I thought, very little success to cast scorn on the statement that the government's policies are expansionist. Well, sir, if this budget with its proposals in respect of exchange rates, interest rates, debt management, tax changes and economic and fiscal policy generally, is not expansionist, then, sir, I do not know the meaning of the word "expansion".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): At the outset of my remarks I should like to deal first with the general economic philosophy of the budget and with the basic principles and economic reasoning upon which it is based. I should like to point out to the house that at no time during his very lengthy speech did the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River meet the theme of the budget head on. There were times when I thought he was about to do so. Each time that I thought he was about to meet those issues and state where he stood himself with regard to them what did he do? He deflected; he went down another of his blind alleys.

Mr. Benidickson: Not to mention the unprecedented deficit.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, I will come to the deficit and I will say something about what my hon. friend and some of his colleagues have to say about deficit financing.

At the outset, sir, I want to repudiate utterly the suggestion of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that this budget in some way constitutes a reversal in policy; that it represents in a sense some change of heart on the part of the government; that it is in some unexplained and inexplicable way inconsistent with policies heretofore followed.

The other night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River used the expression "flip-flop" and he appeared to savour it. I notice he did not repeat it today. Well, sir, his speech was certainly flipped and it left the house under no illusions as to where the flop was.

What this budget does represent is a fulfilment of policies consistently upheld and promoted by this government. Especially is it in full consonance with and a logical progression from the budget of March 31, 1960 and the supplementary budget of December 20, 1960. The only theme—

Mr. Benidickson: On exchanges rates?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will come to what my hon. friend had to say on that. The only theme that I could detect in the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen opposite appeared to be just this. If these proposals are good now, why were they not advanced in their present form a year ago, or two years ago? I suppose a criticism of that sort, if such it be, could be applied to any budget, could be applied to any legislation which might at any time be introduced in the house. I submit that in this instance the answer is very simple and straightforward. In a system of flexible budgeting, the timing of proposals is vitally important. What may be an appropriate budget proposal at one period in our economic cycle may well be inappropriate, even dangerous, at another. For example, what today may be an appropriate and highly desirable influence upon our exchange rate might well have had deleterious effects a year ago, or even six months ago.

We must adjust quickly to changed and changing circumstances maintaining, however, the same basic policies. What seemed to be the most appropriate influence upon the exchange rate in December was the increase in the withholding tax and the imposition of the tax on branches. At that time I heard economists of some distinction suggest that this action might well result in the Canadian dollar nosediving. But the moderate and the worth-while effect which it had is now well known to the house and to the country. The withdrawal of the special incentives to capital inflow has already proved its efficacy. But had the withholding tax then been coupled with an announcement of an intention to use the exchange fund to help place the Canadian dollar at a discount, the result might well have been a run on the dollar with detrimental effects upon our productive capacity and in the then existing circumstances perhaps an inflationary impact.

In today's economic climate the use of the exchange fund, I submit to the house, is quite different. It is a logical and orderly progression from the principles of the December supplementary budget which themselves have met the validating test of time and experience.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Except for double depreciation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, my hon. friend will see what double depreciation is and if I have time I will deal specifically with that and with the other depreciation measures. When I finish dealing with it he will not be as voluble as he sometimes is in the house. In view of all the effort the hon. member has put forward in the last ten days and the failure of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River even to mention my hon. friend's friend,

Mr. Coyne, the hon. member for Essex East certainly is doubly depreciated today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The debate is just beginning.

Mr. Benidickson: Six days to go.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What the budget seeks to do through the incurring of a substantial deficit, through direct and indirect influence on interest rates, through the achievement of a closer balance of international payments, through the reduction of our exchange rate thereby increasing exports and reducing imports, is to provide very genuine economic incentives of a powerful and, indeed, of a massive character. It is designed to increase our productive capacity, to increase opportunities for employment and to raise the levels of Canadian savings and investment.

As a genuinely Canadian budget, this budget is wholly consistent with and, as I have said, a logical and orderly progression from earlier budgets. I want to emphasize that in pursuing the objectives of Canadian expansion the government, in the field of commercial policy, has never lost sight of our dependence upon our external trade and its policies have been moderate and responsible.

The extension of the activities of the industrial development bank is a most important feature of the budget. One must couple these proposals with the Small Businesses Loans Act enacted earlier this session and with the expansion of the Farm Improvement Loans Act and other measures which have been taken by the government. Hereafter, all business enterprises in Canada will be eligible for industrial development bank loans. My hope and expectation are that this will lead to greater employment, to a broadening of the base of our secondary industry and to the achievement of a more flexible economy generally.

While assuredly not wishing to see the industrial development bank intrude into the field of other lending institutions, my hope would be that under the new legislation, the new president of the bank and its directors and officers would pursue, in the medium and long term fields, more expansive policies than have been pursued in the past. From many hon. members on both sides of the house I have received complaints about the attitude of the bank under its president, Mr. Coyne, and its alleged rigidity and inflexibility. I say simply that the policy of the industrial development bank in my view ought to be service with courtesy. I shall personally be very greatly disappointed if under the new legislation and with a new president this goal is not achieved.

Vital as these matters which I have mentioned dealing with the industrial development bank may be, they do not in my view equal in significance the proposals of the budget with respect to interest rates. I see no particular point in engaging in exchanges, such as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested about such matters as tight money, or any recriminations in relation to the past. But there is no doubt that in 1956 and 1957 a relative scarcity of credit had as its consequence very high interest rates. The restrictive policies of the Bank of Canada under Mr. Coyne's leadership, and to the intense annoyance of the then minister of finance, Mr. Harris, and the equally intense annoyance of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, his parliamentary assistant, forced interest rates higher.

The advent of this government resulted in an easing of credit and until the late summer of 1959 interest rates were at a reasonable level in this country. In that summer an almost unparalleled demand for credit, one in which demand well outran supply, put tremendous pressure on the interest structure. So great was the pressure that at one stage the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had to reject tenders for treasury bills. Let no one believe that was an easy decision. It was a crucial decision fraught with grave risks, but it was the right one and proved to be the turning point.

Already the Minister of Finance has achieved some success in his discussions with the financial community. The reduction of one quarter of 1 per cent in the prime chartered bank rate is evidence of that fact. With the changed atmosphere because of the impending departure of Mr. Coyne, I am satisfied that the further consultations announced in the budget will lead ultimately to a readjustment in our interest structure, thereby giving a tremendous and immediate incentive to business expansion and employment as well as placing a drag upon capital inflow for non-productive purposes. In his last report the governor of the Bank of Canada in effect rejected out of hand any responsibility of the Bank of Canada for interest rates. That view, sir, I repudiate. The Bank of Canada has a vital role to play, in my submission, in easing or restricting credit and the price of credit. In my view unwise policies of a restrictive nature pursued by the present governor have had a deleterious effect on expansion and thereby on employment in Canada.

All of this emphasizes to me the vital necessity, the absolute essentiality of the integration and co-ordination of fiscal, financial, monetary and commercial policies. The achievement of the objectives of this budget could be possible only with that co-ordination. In clear and explicit terms at the end of his budget speech, the Minister of Finance showed how impossible such co-ordination had become with the Bank of Canada under Mr. Coyne's leadership. In recent months Mr. Coyne's theme song has been that monetary policy, for which he was responsible, was powerless but that fiscal and commercial policy, for which the Minister of Finance and the government were responsible, were all-powerful. Extreme succeeded extreme until in lonely majesty in his counting house on the south side of Wellington street the governor divorced himself from the government, from all major financial institutions in Canada which both publicly and privately were denouncing his policies, and, indeed, from his own directors, and, tragically also, from many of his own advisers.

Under a new and responsible governor there may now be a co-ordination of activity in all related fields and the resumption of interrupted progress. When parliament tells this unwise governor, "Begone", I have no doubt that our economy will respond to his removal from authority.

Now, sir, I want to deal with what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had to say in connection with forecasting and the deficit, for it has become a favourite topic of the hon. member to dilate, with his rather considerable gift for sarcasm, upon alleged divergences between forecasts and performances.

I want to say first that if there is a divergence between forecast and actuality in the gross national product, then he seems to take a gloating satisfaction out of the slowdown in our economy. What the hon. gentleman does not realize or certainly does not state is that such a margin of error, if it may be described as such, is less considerable in Canada than has been true in most western countries, and equally true is much less considerable than during the time the hon. gentleman was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. What amuses me, sir, is that the hon. gentleman from Kenora-Rainy River reserved some of his most violent and unwarranted criticism for the amount of the deficit and for the consequent increase in the total net debt. This is the official criticism of a party which, down through the years purported to believe in what they described as cyclical budgeting. O, consistency, thou art a jewel.

Suppose parliament had adopted the tax cuts which were so strenuously advocated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) during the election campaign in 1958 in his something for everyone, but now forgotten, Pearson plan; policies be it noted which have never been resurrected in this chamber. What then would have been the deficit?

Mr. Benidickson: President Kennedy had just this in mind.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman say that President Kennedy had this in mind? That is perhaps the most outrageous statement my voluble friend has ever made in the house. Suppose we had taken over a policy of tax cuts and increased expenditures which were forced down the throats of responsible Liberals by the triumvirate of Gordon, Sharpe and Drury at the so called Liberal rally here in Ottawa in January? What then would have been the deficit? Let hon. gentlemen tally that up. I say to them if you had put in full those measures—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are you asking us?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity to make a speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If you are asking us, then I shall deal with it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman is on his feet so often in this chamber, and I only want to say to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You asked me a question and then you do not want me to answer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): —every time he rises with the pomposity of a mid-Victorian duchess he proves that his volubility is equalled only by his unwisdom.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why did the hon. gentleman ask a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman will have his opportunity to make a 30 minute speech on another occasion.

I say that the situation would have been that the deficit would have been at least $2 billion. My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River who, in my opinion at least exceeds this tiresome trio in genuine knowledge of public finance, although they seek now to replace him as the heir presumptive, endeavours to exploit for political purposes the amount of the deficit. Now, he cannot have it both ways. He cannot blow hot and cold in this particular way. He cannot become indignant and sarcastic about the existing deficit and at the same time join with his colleagues in the advocacy of policies that would triple or quadruple the deficit.

Certainly, we have had a deficit. It is the result of two things. First, it is the result of the greatest increase in services to our people of any equivalent period in Canadian history.

Let the Leader of the Opposition when he speaks in this debate tell this house which of these services he would reject or discard. That is not what he will advocate; he will say he seeks to further expand them with predictable results in deficit financing.

Second, sir, the deficit is the result of flexible budgeting designed to meet existing economic circumstances. In times of economic slowdown the federal government, by incurring a sizeable deficit, can help to stimulate the economy. I had thought that hon. gentlemen opposite gave at least lip service to this theory. However, one would not know it this morning by listening to the hon. gentleman from Kenora-Rainy River.

One of his party's brain trusts has stated it very explicitly. I refer to a speech made by Mr. Tom Kent, former editor of that great organ of outdated Liberalism, the Winnipeg Free Press, as reported in the Globe and Mail of April 22, 1961. What did Mr. Kent say? I quote:

—if our economy isn't growing properly, budget deficits are sound economics.

Contrast that statement from the Liberal braintrust with what the hon. gentleman from Kenora-Rainy River said today. Then Mr. Kent went on to say this:

They are a necessary stimulus. We should not be afraid of extra public debt. In a free economy, you can't have economic growth without extra debt.

Now, sir, for myself I would adopt the first sentence without qualification, although I might put some qualifications upon the second. Mr. Kent went on:

That's the simple fact which is always ignored by the illogical people—

I do not know whether or not he was referring to my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River when he said, "by illogical people".

—who claim to be the champions of our free enterprise system, who talk about the virtues of saving and yet who are so terribly nervous about debt.

In my view, what is important is not the deficit or its size. What is important is whether the policies of the budget will lead to a balanced budget and ultimately to a policy of orderly debt retirement when we re-enter the period of high employment of our labour and resources and a renewed period of progressive and rapid growth. This is what I believe the budget gives expectation and confidence of achieving.

There are two further factors, sir. If you relate the amount of the deficit for the last fiscal year or the amount of the prospective deficit to our revenues or our expenditures, you will see that there have been many times in our history under both Liberal and Conservative governments when the then deficit represented a much higher percentage. On previous occasions in this chamber I have put on the record the statistics of the Fielding and Dunning budgets. I shall not repeat them, but I would refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard of this year at page 1079.

The second factor is that of our ability to pay our net debt. In certain by-election campaigns last month, by-election campaigns which certainly did not proceed to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, obviously an advertisement regarding the increase in our debt must have boomeranged upon hon. gentlemen on the other side. Their excessive cleverness did not take into account the sober common sense of our people who realize that our ability to pay has risen very markedly. Our net per capita debt, sir, and that surely is the only realistic test, as of March 31 was about $150 below that of 1950 and about in balance with that of 1956.

As I have already pointed out, this has occurred during a period of unprecedented expansion of the public services provided to the people of this country. This is the record of this government. Let hon. gentlemen opposite try to deny it. Even my genial and very good friend from Welland who dilates so often on this subject, should now give credit for the high quality of debt management which has existed under this government.

Perhaps less attention than is warranted has been directed to the significant debt management proposals in this budget. The establishment of a purchase fund initially of $100 million will have an immediate and salutary effect upon our financial market, and an ultimate significant approach to orderly debt retirement. The removal of the overhang of medium and long term bonds in the unemployment insurance portfolio will end that threat to the stability of the long term market. The decision to confine new federal issues, for the next several months at least, to the short end of the market will be of direct and immediate benefit to the provinces, to the municipalities and to the corporate borrowers.

Taken together, sir, these decisions must assert a vigorous pressure upon the level of interest rates and upon the exchange rate. This was their basic purpose. It has now become popular for hon. gentlemen opposite to attribute many of the ills of our economy to the conversion loan. I have no doubt that when he arises, my hon. friend for Welland will again devote most of this speech to a distortion of this subject.

Sir, I want to repudiate those allegations completely. When the economic history of the last decade is recorded, I believe it will be established that the gigantic conversion loan of 1958 was one of the most farsighted acts of financial statesmanship ever undertaken.

There are many policies in this budget with which I could deal. I have described only some of the essential features. There is the proposal with respect to special depreciation until March 31, 1963. There are proposals with respect to increased incentives for research; proposals with respect to portable pensions. Yes, these are some of the things that in the long run will have a most significant impact upon our whole economy.

There was the decision to go ahead with the proposals which were introduced last year for tax deferment in respect of profit sharing schemes; the repeal of the tax on automobiles. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I have been amused, really, by my hon. friend from Essex East, the hon. gentleman who has attempted to pose as the putative father of the removal of the excise tax on automobiles.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it had not been for our persistent interrogation we would still have that tax.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The honourable and train catching member for Essex East was a member of the previous government for a period of about 15 years. He was strangely silent during the whole of that period while Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Harris maintained this tax.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We cut it from 25 per cent to 15 per cent.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman did not question the tax when he was a member of the government. It was the hon. gentleman's transfer to your left, Mr. Speaker, which converted him to his advocacy of tax reduction, and I say that his attempt to take credit now is both ridiculous and laughable.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my 30 minutes have expired. I only say to the house, this is a good budget; it is a sound budget; it is a realistic budget. It deserves the support of the house and the country and we on this side of the house are ready at any time to meet the challenge of the opposition amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A most incredible speech. A great public career destroyed.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a very loud but not very enlightening speech from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ricard: You have heard nothing yet.

Mr. Hellyer: The parliamentary secretary has criticized in rambunctious terms the excellent contribution which has been made by speakers on this side of the house. If he would examine the budget more closely and with less partisanship he would learn that it is a budget of rationalization of failure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is non-partisan, is it?

Mr. Hellyer: The parliamentary secretary complained that we were not accurate when we said it involved a reversal in policy. He said it was not a flip-flop budget. We stand corrected, because the government had no policy then; it has no policy now. The hon. member for Carleton is quite right; when no policy exists, a reversal is impossible. As he said, "consistency, thou art a jewel". The trouble started way back in 1957 when the hon. gentlemen opposite—

An hon. Member: It certainly did.

Mr. Hellyer: —even before the election of 1957 were speculating with figures which they were not able to comprehend. They went about this country saying there was a surplus for 1957-58 of $500 million. One of these hon. members, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), in a television broadcast in Toronto increased the sum to $600 million. Well, if they had listened to Mr. Harris' budget that year they would have known that after his budget proposals had been carried into effect the budgetary surplus in the coming year was half that amount; that an increase which was due the civil servants of this country and the armed forces of this country had yet to be paid out of that budgetary surplus, and that the national health insurance program which had just been enacted had yet to be paid for.

An hon. Member: Don't forget the $6 old age pension.

Mr. Hellyer: It was this grandiose ignorance of economic facts which got the government off to an improper start even before the election of 1957. Before the election, too, the government had been talking about the effect of high interest rates, the effect of the government's policy of that day, and saying that the time had come to expand, to relax, to let up; and yet what did the new government do after it came into office in June of that year?

The very first act of the government was to cancel many of the projects which were already on the books for that summer. They cancelled the CF-100 Mark VI which was to have been built to replace the rapidly obsolescent CF-100 Mark V. They cancelled runway extensions, hangars and other projects scheduled for that summer. At that time they immediately put into effect a restrictionist policy. This was in the summer of 1957, notwithstanding the fact that the same hon. gentlemen, when they were on this side of the house, had said the time had come to start opening up. Then months later, in the spring of 1958, they were feigning surprise at a report which said that in the opinion of a department of government the time had come to ease up.

Mr. Speaker, it was not a convincing performance. It is true that late that year, in November, they did reinstate some of the projects which had been cancelled in the summertime; but by then it was too late, the snowball had started. Since then most decisions of this government have been decisions of financial crisis.

My hon. friend mentioned the reconversion loan. This was the biggest financial crisis decision of them all. The Minister of Finance touted it as the biggest and most successful financial operation in the history of Canada. I have said publicly many times, and I say again today, it was the biggest and most successful financial swindle in the history of this country. It will cost the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars directly and indirectly over the balance of their lives.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One hundred million dollars a year.

Mr. Hellyer: The government has criticized the Bank of Canada for failing to facilitate its policies. If anything, I had the impression in 1958 that by facilitating the reconversion loan and by increasing the money supply more than 10 per cent in one single year, when the physical output of this country was not increasing, the Bank of Canada prostituted its responsibility in respect to its obligation to the Canadian people.

Mr. Benidickson: To accommodate the minister.

Mr. Hellyer: This government has been in trouble ever since. There have been more and more crisis decisions based on financial mismanagement. One that is recalled to mind is the cancellation of the Avro Arrow. This was not a military decision. It was obvious from what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in this house last week, when announcing that the government had ordered some United States airplanes to fulfil the function for which the Avro Arrow was designed, that it was a financial crisis decision.

Even then the government could not see past its nose. In its desperation to cut back its expenditures in the short run it contributed to a contractionist policy again. The cancellation of the Avro Arrow in February, 1959 put more Canadians out of work than will be put back to work by this budget. And that is not to mention the smashing of a great industrial design team which had been built up over a decade.

Mr. Pugh: What did C. D. Howe think?

Mr. Hellyer: The present budget is a result of four years unprecedented financial mismanagement. This government has never sought to take the responsibility for its actions. In its early budgets it blamed the Liberals, its predecessors, for the legacy they left. It was the legacy, Mr. Speaker, of a surplus and full employment. Then the government sought to blame the United States and external factors far out of proportion to the influence they exert on the Canadian economy. More recently the government has blamed the economic recovery of Europe. Now, finally, as the last stroke, they have sought to blame the governor of the Bank of Canada for their troubles.

This government has never been willing to accept its responsibility for financial matters, with one possible exception. When interest rates came down for a brief period in the summer of 1958, then it was the government which brought the interest rates down; then it was the government which was responsible. But after that, when the interest rates started going up again due to the reconversion loan and the big government deficit of that year, it was no longer the government's responsibility but the responsibility of the Bank of Canada. The government, they said, had no control over the Bank of Canada, which is responsible only to parliament. What a sham, Mr. Speaker. What a farce. This government has the integrity of an alley cat. After its whinings and howlings it refuses to take responsibility for its financial misdemeanours.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government says we must have a skilled society. I quote from the minister's statement:

> Our technological developments, the enterprise of our business community and the skills and training of our people, great as they are, have not kept pace with the needs of a rapidly changing world.

Everyone knows that. This is not something new. I made a speech in this house in the spring of 1959 urging the government to take immediate and drastic action to rehabilitate unemployed workers and to provide them with the skills which they would otherwise not be able to acquire. I urged the government to do this on a scale comparable to the rehabilitation of world war II veterans. Did the government listen? Not then, Mr. Speaker.

If they had acted then, the program would have been well under way by now. It is true the government did take some small steps in the right direction last November, but the action taken was completely inadequate to meet the situation which we face. It was another example of too little and too late. But if the government took itself seriously it would realize that these skills must start at the top. We must have a skilled government. We must have a skilled minister of finance if the country is going to grow and develop. If these skills, which are now nonexistent, had been available at the top we would not have suffered this so-called rolling readjustment; it would never have taken place.

The minister has said that this is not an ordinary budget. That is a mouthful even for the minister. He called it an economic budget. In truth it will turn out to be an economic bungle. The keynote of the budget, as we were told by the parliamentary secretary this afternoon, is the deficit and what it is going to do for the Canadian economy. But as was so ably pointed out by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) this budget is not planned; this deficit is not planned; this is not part of the great new blueprint for Canadian recovery. This is just an acknowledgment of a fact of life which exists in this country at the present time. This, again, is the minister trying to make a virtue out of a necessity. We have had examples on previous occasions of the minister saying that something was planned. Last year, when the minister introduced his budget, he said:

> The position we have now reached with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget represents the fruits of carefully designed policy carried forward over the past 18 months. This is not something which has just happened. This is the result of considered means and efforts. It began with the great conversion loan in the summer of 1958 which made possible a policy of sound debt management which in turn restored public confidence and government credit and our determination to control the powerful forces of inflation. It was continued in the expenditure controls and the tax changes of 1959 and has been reinforced in this year's program of reduced controllable expenditures balanced by the continued promotion of constructive national development.

To listen to the minister speak one would think that many months before, and as part of a plan, he was going to bring in a really balanced budget. But what is the fact? The fact is that the minister's proposed $12 million surplus has turned into a $345 million deficit. Members opposite used to paraphrase and malign the Right Hon. C. D. Howe and attribute to him the question: "What is a million?" Now we have the Minister of Finance asking, in effect, with a shrug: "What's a million dollars a day?" It is a sad commentary that the planned economy which this government endorses is planning from hindsight rather than from foresight.

What the minister said last year is borne out, of course, by a Conservative document called "Conservative Action". They were pleased to boast at that time and I quote:

> In 1960-61 the Conservative government introduced financial proposals which had as their objective the balancing of the budget without raising taxes and, indeed, at a level of taxation in relation to the growth of the gross national product lower than in any year between 1950 and 1958.

Well, if that was the objective, the government certainly fell short of reaching it.

Mr. Pallett: Taxes are still lower.

Mr. Hellyer: Taxes were not still lower. The hon. member might check that. We thought we had an undertaking in this respect. The people of Canada, at the time they gave the Prime Minister the mandate, thought they had an undertaking. In Saskatoon, on May 27, 1957, at a press conference, the Prime Minister gave a pledge that taxes would be reduced. I quote from a news dispatch:

> John Diefenbaker said today the Progressive Conservative government could carry out its declared policy, reduce unnecessary taxes "and still do it on a balanced budget".

That, Mr. Speaker, is one more unrealized dream, one more broken promise. Now we have this year the fourth annual deficit of the Progressive Conservative government, and instead of apologizing, the Minister of Finance has the temerity to pretend to this house that it was planned, that it is all part of a fiscal scheme to rescue the country from the mess in which it finds itself. It would be nice if that were so but, of course, it is not so. The minister in his budget speech said:

> If appropriately planned and timed, a substantial deficit can encourage higher levels of output, employment, income and savings without incurring risk of inflation.

He went on to say that the risk of inflation was minimal but he skirted very cautiously around the whole subject. He did not tell us how he was going to achieve the goals he has in mind without inflation; he did not tell us the extent to which the Bank of Canada should be used to finance the deficit and to finance the proposed manipulations in the exchange fund. We have a right to know this, Mr. Speaker, because it is important for the future of Canadians that they should know whether or not the minister intends to start the printing presses rolling now as the only recourse in order to get the government out of their present unfortunate situation.

The minister was faced with high expenditures—expenditures which, he would say, were largely uncontrollable. There were three alternatives. He could have increased taxes, but that would be very unpopular politically. He could have borrowed the money in competition with other borrowers, but this would have driven interest rates to unprecedented high levels beside being equally unpopular politically. As the third alternative he could start the printing presses rolling and print more money and put it into circulation. In this way he might avoid the consequences of any action which was politically unpopular.

We wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether this blushing bride, the Minister of Finance, is not like the blushing bride who puts woollen stockings into the washing tub of boiling water and finds on removing them that they have shrunk to a considerably smaller size. We wonder to what extent the Canadian dollar will be shrunk as a result of the monetary expansion which the Minister of Finance may have to prescribe in the existing circumstances.

The Minister of Finance had quite a bit to say about inflation in earlier days and some of the quotations from his speeches in the years 1956 and 1957 make very interesting reading. At that time he was not in favour of embarking upon such an escapade. However, today when he is responsible, it is quite a different matter.

The minister in his budget speech went on to say that we should not expect deficits to occur in the indefinite future. He stated that when the economy and income have reached satisfactory high levels and the rate of economic growth is strong a sound budget and tax structure should generate sufficient revenues not only to cover actual expenditures but also to provide funds for the orderly retirement of debts. This is an interesting prospect and an interesting hypothesis; it must be so because the minister says it is so. If he is correct in his assumption then there have been only four years of Tory government in the history of this country when there has been a satisfactory level of employment and income. In every other of the approximately 40 years of Conservative government in this country there have been unsatisfactory levels of employment and income, at least according to the minister's tests.

We now find the minister seeking to find a scapegoat in order to get himself out of his financial difficulties. He has told us that he is going to require the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada. There are only two possibilities to explain why the governor of the Bank of Canada should be retired six months before his term of office has expired. The first is, of course, that the government must start the printing presses, and must indulge to some extent in the inflation of the Canadian dollar, a course which no governor could possibly permit in all conscientiousness.

The other reason is, of course, that the government is trying to find a scapegoat on which to unload the political unpopularities in which it finds itself at the present time, anticipating a deficit of $650 million, in round figures, as well as requiring perhaps several hundred millions of dollars to finance the manipulation of the exchange fund. That is a course which the minister said, only a few months ago, might not be successful.

There is a great deal of capital also required in respect to the industrial development bank, and I should like to ask where the government is going to find that capital, as well as the $100 million for the sinking fund to buy long term government securities. Where are these great amounts of capital going to come from? Are they going to come from the market or are they going to come from the printing presses, and to what extent? We have the right to know whether our savings are going to be jeopardized by an irresponsible government.

This Minister of Finance has deceived the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: By changing the structure of his budget he created the impression in regard to his revenue forecast that he only expected a growth of 3 per cent. In answer to a question today he admitted that was not the figure he used. He has refused until now to give this house the figure. He must do so because it is the right of the peoples' representatives to know on what basis the minister has made his forecast.

Mr. Benidickson: It was an unprecedented performance.

Mr. Hellyer: By subterfuge and by changing the structure the minister has misled this house deliberately, or otherwise, and he will have to say which.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister should also tell us at the same time what percentage of growth he expects to take place, and on what his—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —forecast is based.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought I heard the hon. member say that the Minister of Finance had deceived the House of Commons deliberately. I am sure the hon. member did not intend to say that and will wish to correct it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I said "deliberately", or accidentally, and the minister himself would have to tell us which. If he says it was accidental I will take his word for it, but he should tell this house which it is. He should also tell us what is the expected rate of growth on which he has based his economic forecast. Let him stand in his place and tell us the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That may be another way of putting the suggestion, but I think in one way or the other the hon. member should not use the word "deliberately" because it is not accepted parliamentary practice to do so.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister wish to say that—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the Minister of Finance asking that I—

An hon. Member: The minister did not say a word.

Mr. Lambert: Put up or shut up.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I suggest we have to leave it to the minister to tell us whether this was an inadvertency or otherwise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not putting a question but making a speech, and he was not putting a question on the first occasion he used the words, which I indicated are unparliamentary. I think he will agree with the suggestion that he withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to accuse the minister of anything of which he is not guilty.

An hon. Member: Then withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: If the minister will rise in his place and say that this was done accidentally or inadvertently—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Don't be so cheap.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will realize that the problem is not one of fact but of form. He cannot discuss the fact, and it is the form that the Chair is now objecting to and that is why I am asking the hon. member to withdraw the word "deliberately".

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw and say that the minister misled the house accidentally; whether for a purpose or not, only he can say.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is having difficulty withdrawing. He should understand that the rules and practice of the House of Commons are very clear in this respect, and should withdraw his remarks without reservation.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the accusation of deliberate deception. However, I think the deception remains and that this house is entitled to an explanation from the minister.

An hon. Member: Don't spoil your withdrawal, be a gentleman.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, in referring to the future the minister said he would not wish hon. members to expect that expansion can be accomplished by some simple or quick formula. It would be folly, for example, to attempt drastically and artificially to force interest rates down by irresponsible increases in the money supply. How else can this be achieved other than by currency issue or in the alternative a reduction in government borrowing? We have the right to know from the minister the mechanics by which this is going to be achieved. He has not told us. He is vague.

The minister has carefully skirted this question. While we may regret that we have not been given clear statements by the minister in this regard I am going to assume for the purpose of a few comments that there is in the mind of the Bank of Canada and in the mind of the minister a fear—

In respect of this matter, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

I do not believe for one minute that the Bank of Canada would act in a vacuum. We all have respect for the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. J. E. Coyne; he is a very serious man who takes a conscientious and grave view of his responsibilities.

I am sure no one would disagree with that; I hope they do not because these are the words of the Minister of Finance, as recorded in Hansard of August 11, 1956, at page 7460. Many of the statements the minister made then are in quite definite contradiction to his actions in office. At one point he said, as reported at page 2557 of Hansard of March 21, 1957:

The governor of the Bank of Canada has appealed for the curtailment of expenditure but his recommendation has gone unheeded by the government. I am not saying, of course, that some large government expenditures are not necessary; we have been dealing with some of them here today in what we have approved in recognizing the need of the pensioners to some additional increase because inflation has destroyed, in part, the value of their pensions. But there is a great deal of government expenditure that could be, under careful examination reduced.

And so I say in conclusion on this subject: Let the government first cast out the beam from its own eye and then it will see clearly to pull out the mote from the eye of the individual Canadian.

And I may add this—that the Minister of Finance, as far as we are concerned, is not going to hide behind the policy of the Bank of Canada. He is going to bear his own responsibility.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who said that?

Mr. Hellyer: That was said by an hon. gentleman who sits on the treasury benches today. At the present time he occupies the portfolio of finance. He said it in this House of Commons on March 21, 1957, as reported at page 2557 of Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Another contradiction.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

If I may intervene here for a moment, perhaps we could complete the discussion of the proposed subamendment. I have some general conclusions. Unless anybody is disposed to argue seriously that the subamendment is out of order I think the benefit of the doubt should lie in the direction of accepting it. In the last decade or two the tendency has been to admit subamendments and amendments in the budget debate rather more easily than in other instances. The normal rule is to be found in citation 203, subsection 1, of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, where he says:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

The reason I feel that this subamendment might be accepted is that the amendment itself is very broad, bringing into question the whole of the budget. Therefore I have looked at the subamendment to see whether any of the numerous subjects mentioned in it are necessarily outside of fiscal and economic policies such as might be appropriate for action in the course of the consideration of budget measures. On that test, perhaps giving the benefit of the doubt to the mover, the subamendment can be accepted.

Mr. Regier: On a question of privilege, if I may, I had asked—

Mr. Speaker: If anyone wishes to propose any contrary view I would hear him at this time.

Mr. Regier: During the course of my remarks I asked leave of the house to table a rather lengthy table which appeared in Hansard of February 8, 1960. I did not give you, Mr. Speaker, time to ask for permission.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to ask at this time that the table be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman indicate the length of the document and in view of the fact that it already appears in Hansard, why he wishes to have it reappear?

Mr. Regier: It does not appear in Hansard of this year; it appears in Hansard of February 8, 1960. It contains a list of corporations and individuals who have been convicted by the courts for violating the Combines Investigation Act since 1950.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the practice of the house to have a document reprinted in Hansard of a later session. It is available to hon. members in Hansard of 1960, I understand. I therefore see no occasion to reproduce it in Hansard of this session. It is available to all hon. members because of the reference the hon. member was kind enough to give.

Mr. Speaker: Without unanimous consent it would not be in order to incorporate anything in Hansard which had not been spoken.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for his wise budget.

Under the present circumstances, this budget is such as to promote employment, production and exports. It is certainly advisable to increase the purchasing power of Canadians, of taxpayers, by reducing interest rates and the rate of exchange of our dollar.

One item which pleased me particularly was the one providing for further tariff changes to give greater protection to our textile industry. Since the Progressive Conservative government assumed power, it has taken action with regard to the protection of that important industry on 14 different occasions. I see that the government means to pursue its commendable efforts in this field, and I want to thank its members on behalf of the many thousands of workers, men and women, in the textile industry of Sherbrooke and elsewhere in the country.

The budget speech gives members an opportunity of commenting on the various financial, economic and fiscal aspects of our national administration. That is why I wish today to make a few remarks on the sharing of revenues between the federal government and the provinces, and on the important issue of education.

In the matter of tax sharing between the federal government and the provinces, there were in the past two great causes of trouble between Ottawa and the provinces. First of all, the various governments encroached on fields which the British North America Act of 1867 did not place under their jurisdiction. Second, Ottawa, under Liberal rule, centralized various powers and taxation fields so as to levy almost everything while entrusting the provinces with the spending of large amounts of that money. In the latter case, which we will discuss later, it meant sapping the fundamental principles of responsible government.

On the basis of our constitution and of judicial decisions, the provinces are entitled to exclusive jurisdiction over direct taxes collected within the province for provincial purposes. The federal government can levy taxes either directly or indirectly.

Several years ago, due to certain circumstances, the federal government invaded the direct taxation fields of the provinces, such as income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. The provinces in turn invaded some indirect tax fields which were ruled to be direct tax fields by the courts in view of certain tricky aspects.

I refer in the latter case to indirect taxes on retail sales, to taxes on the transfer of securities, on meals, theater tickets and gasoline or petroleum. Such indirect taxes levied by the provinces were ruled direct taxes by the privy council, because they were levied directly from the ultimate consumer, without being included in the initial price.

Now we have just seen that the federal government and the provinces skilfully invaded taxation fields which had not been explicitly granted to them under the British North America Act of 1867. While such actions on both sides may have helped improve temporary situations, they have created confusion and raised permanent difficulties in the way of fiscal relations betwen the federal government and the provinces. It is always difficult to withdraw from a field of activity after getting deeply involved in it, because once a precedent is established under our constitutional law, it leaves an almost indelible trace.

When, for the first time, the federal government levied a direct tax on personal incomes, the then minister of finance indicated that this was just a temporary measure. On that occasion, Sir Thomas White recognized that direct taxation was particularly appropriate for the provinces, and I quote:

(Text):

The income tax is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the province and is a suitable tax for the purpose of the province and the municipalities.

[Mr. Allard.]

(Translation):

During the second world war, another minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, again invited the provinces to lease out their taxation powers to the federal government for the duration of the war only.

But what happened after is a matter of record: what was supposed to be temporary became permanent under the Liberals.

Precedent superseded principles and the spirit of the constitution.

Another important cause of conflicts in the fiscal relations between the federal government and the provinces is the systematic dislocation of responsible government which was fostered by the Liberals to the prejudice of the provinces. That is what they did when they were in power: they centralized in Ottawa more than 77 per cent of taxes, part of which they returned to the provinces. What they wanted was to levy taxes while letting another government spend the tax revenues, in short, to control the greater part of the revenues and the economy of the provinces and let the provinces take the responsibility for their respective expenditures and development.

That flippant attitude of the Liberals toward the constitution was found to undermine the principles of responsible government. Under the Canadian constitution and according to the very nature of Canadian federalism, the provinces, like the federal government, are independent governments and each of those governments is sovereign and responsible in its own sphere. Well, everyone knows that a responsible government must have essential taxation powers and should not be placed under trusteeship which would paralyse its activities.

The system established by the Liberals consisted in grabbing the province's revenues and distributing to the provinces subsidies and varying payments. Such policy was unconstitutional, erroneous and a source of dissatisfaction both at provincial and national levels.

Under a federative system, it is unthinkable that a government should levy taxes and that another should spend those moneys.

The Liberals of today and of 1945 would be much better off if they would forsake their last leaders and stick to the views of a great Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier who stated in 1887:

It is altogether a false principle that a government should levy taxes and that another should spend them.

In 1930, some 15 years before he gave in to the centralizing ideas of Mr. Howe et al, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King stated in the House of Commons:

(Text):

When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact, I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body raise the taxes and another body spend the people's money thus raised.

(Translation):

In 1952, a Liberal senator, the late Jacob Nicol, whom I had the privilege to know and admire, stated in the Senate that the Liberals were stealing from the provinces by refusing to return to them their taxation rights.

In 1955, another great Canadian, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, the premier of his province during the most crucial years, was not afraid to demand the return of what the Liberals unjustly refused to surrender.

In fact, on October 3, 1955, at a federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa, he stated:

What advantage would be gained in having the tax-dollar collected for provincial purposes make a wide detour via Ottawa before being returned to us? Would it be any bigger when it reached us after such a journey. Obviously not. It is certain that responsible government can never exist if fiscal powers which are indispensable to the exercise of the constitutional rights and the performance of the constitutional obligations are not wedded to legislative and administrative prerogatives.

Mr. Speaker, two axioms illustrate well that governments hold administrative authority through taxation; the right to tax is the right to govern. In other words, he who holds the purse strings always has the last say.

It is in the light of the foregoing principles that in this house, on April 13, 1959, I asked the present government to gradually return to the provinces their responsibilities and their taxation powers.

In this field, as in many others, the present federal government is seriously seeking to rectify the anomalies and the confusion spread by the Liberals in our national economy and in our federal-provincial relations during their 22 years in office.

We should not be expected to set everything straight overnight. But the trend set by the formula announced by the Prime Minister at the last federal-provincial conference is a marked return to the spirit of the confederation pact of 1867; to acknowledge the sovereignty of the provinces and to give them back gradually their taxation powers. Since they came into power in 1957, the Conservatives handed over to the provinces, by way of deduction, 10 per cent of the personal income taxes.

Mr. Gerard Filion, managing director of Le Devoir, was fully justified in saying in an editorial dated February 25, 1961:

From the purely constitutional point of view, the Diefenbaker proposals mark a definite progress. The provinces, at least those which insist on their freedom, should find them satisfactory.

A little further down in the same article, Mr. Filion said:

If the provinces wish to get back some of the ground they lost, they must not be content to ask more money from Ottawa but must state their willingness to shoulder heavier responsibilities.

This is what Father Ares, a Jesuit who is an authority on constitutional matters, has to say about the provinces' role in the field of taxation. I am referring to Father Ares' article which appeared in the December 1960 issue of Relations, and more particularly to page 320. I quote:

The provinces must not forget this: if they refuse to make full use of their rights in the taxation field, they forgo the possibility of their becoming modern and independent governments, capable of handling their own destinies and of deciding on their own what policy they should follow; if they refuse to assume the responsibilities freedom entails, they are doomed to mediocrity, they accept their downfall and join the ranks of governments whose subsistence is ensured by a paternalistic and self-seeking metropolitan government. There is but one road open to the provinces if they wish to remain true to their dignity and keep their freedom; they must, right from the start, fully assume their responsibilities in the field of taxation.

I find it difficult, Mr. Speaker, to understand the negative criticism of the Quebec premier, the Hon. Jean Lesage, with respect to the recent proposals made by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and which take into account the sovereignty and the increasing autonomy of the provinces. Or rather, I can see in what embarrassing position the new premier of Quebec finds himself. At the time he was a member of the federal Liberal government was he not one of those who did the most to hinder provincial autonomy?

May I read here from the speech made by the Hon. Mr. Lesage in this house on April 14, 1954. As seen on page 4078 of Hansard, he said the following:

We cannot, however, accept the unjustified claim that the provinces have priority over the Canadian government in so far as direct taxation is concerned.

And a little further on, he added:

In neither case Mr. Speaker, is there anything but the recognition of a parallel and concurrent right.

So, Mr. Speaker, that was the interpretation that the Hon. Jean Lesage put on the letter and spirit of the confederation pact with a leaning toward centralization and contrary to the interests of the provinces.

But we know that under section 91 of the Canadian constitution, the government of Canada, in the interest of peace, public order and good administration is entitled to legislate in any matter not included in the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures.

Now, in paragraph 2, section 92, of the same constitution, it is provided that the provinces shall have an exclusive right in the matter of direct taxation for provincial purposes. Direct taxation includes personal income tax, succession duties and corporation income tax.

Therefore, the provisions are clear and specific. When provincial purposes are involved, such as education, property and civil rights, the provinces have an exclusive right to direct taxation.

It is not a case, then, as between the federal government and the provinces, of a parallel and joint right to direct taxation for provincial purposes.

Mr. Jean Lesage made in this regard erroneous statements; it is fortunate that our country is now headed by a Progressive Conservative federal government, which is more anxious than he is to preserve those rights and prerogatives our valiant forefathers wrought into the Canadian constitution.

Under the new fiscal formula of the right hon. Prime Minister, the provinces regain possession of their tax fields, enjoy a greater degree of taxation freedom and more of their proper responsibilities.

Before I resume my seat, I would like to suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) a means or method of settlement concerning the important field of education.

Section 93 of the British North America Act says quite clearly that education is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces, except when minority rights are violated in a province.

Also, the courts have decided that the word "education" used in section 93 must have the broadest meaning. A decision of the Supreme Court of Canada reported under "Adoption Act, 1938," page 398 of the report of the supreme court, bears witness to that.

We must therefore progressively eliminate any federal interference in the field of education as experienced in the last century.

I sincerely believe that an integral observance of the constitution is essential for proper political efficiency of the Canadian confederation.

To this effect, I make four suggestions:

1. That the present government publish its intention to consider as an exclusive provincial responsibility all claims for an increase in the payments made at present by the Canadian government, either to provincial governments, or to educational institutions, as subsidies or any other form of assistance to education, at any level;

2. That the government adhere to the principle of handing over in due course to the provinces the control and distribution of the various forms of assistance with regard to education, which are now operated by the federal government;

3. That the solution of this problem be sought by including the present federal payments for education in the equalization payments guaranteed to the provinces under the fiscal agreements, so that both be integrated and considered at the same time when a renewal of the fiscal agreements is discussed;

4. That this solution be immediately accepted with regard to university grants, it being agreed if necessary that the federal government is willing, until otherwise decided by the fiscal conference, to increase equalization payments each year by the sum representing the intended increase of grants to universities, i.e., by $1.50 per capita of the increased Canadian population.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government would then abstain from paying any additional grants.

A study of the present grant system should be made in order to determine the machinery by which they might be eliminated through their integration with equalization payments.

The amounts voted each year for the Canadian conference of universities would be immediately added to equalization payments and directly handed over to the provinces. It would then be the responsibility of the provinces to make arrangements with the universities to determine the method of distribution, whether through the present Canadian conference of universities, or any other means. It would be the responsibility of the universities themselves to discuss the formula with the provincial governments.

Under such an agreement, no province could claim to be financially wronged by the cancellation of direct grants to the universities. They would receive the same amount, except that they would be free to use it as they pleased. The problem of equalizing the funds available for educational purposes would then be a responsibility of the federal-provincial conference and could be appropriately settled by the parties concerned.

(Text):

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, today I should like to say a few words, first with regard to the prelude to this budget; second, the philosophy behind it, and finally the results of the application of this philosophy. Probably for the first time in the history of this house we are now dealing with two budgets, the one which was released by the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. James Coyne, at the beginning of this week, and the second, the official budget, which was read to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

We noted with some interest the fact that the minister tended to read his budget speech very quickly, and indeed when he spoke most quickly, the loudest and with the greatest flourish we noticed the words had a very familiar ring. It became very evident that the major salvos had already been fired by Mr. Coyne and in many cases the minister had been left with empty shells.

We remember, of course, the 7½ per cent excise tax being taken off automobiles, the expansion of the industrial development bank's assets, and the resounding statement that monetary policy was only one aspect of the whole picture. We remember the fact that we want a balanced budget by 1962, and the cutting down of imports from abroad. It would seem that these two gentlemen are not the light years apart which has been assumed in this house over the last few days. In fact, rumour has it that these two gentlemen sometimes had lunch together and that indeed they were on rather good terms. I sometimes wonder whether this whole thing came about as a result of a very badly digested meal. We also understand that the Department of Finance depends a great deal upon the research facilities of the Bank of Canada, as does the Department of Trade and Commerce. Indeed, these two gentlemen were not that far apart after all.

In reply to the opposition on the debate on Mr. Coyne's future the Minister of Finance began by saying there is no halfway place. I am sure this eminent gentleman realizes that this world is full of halfway places. Indeed, there are few extreme positions; life is nothing but finding compromises. However, I think it is very easy to find a place in this particular argument. In spite of the fact that we may disagree with what Mr. Coyne had to say, I do not think any hon. member of this house can agree with the method by which Mr. Coyne has been treated in the last few days. The question I would ask is, why does the minister have to make this nation the laughing stock of the world? I am sure this will go down as a tremendous joke in the financial centres of all continents of this world.

One might wonder, indeed, about a budget brought down by this minister when evidently the governor of the Bank of Canada knew nothing about it until he read it in yesterday morning's newspaper. I wonder how much confidence the nation can have in such a budget. Also, I cannot help feeling very unhappy about the fact that Canada is almost being relegated to the position of a banana republic in the Caribbean by the way in which Mr. Coyne has been used.

It would seem it is not a matter of getting rid of a co-operative Mr. Coyne; he has said he is going to be co-operative. It is not even a matter of getting rid of an un-co-operative Mr. Coyne, but rather of acquiring a silent Mr. Coyne. Mr. Coyne apparently was not willing to be silent and the whole scheme backfired very badly. The Minister of Finance has not given us a shred of evidence that there has been any lack of co-operation or that he has been at odds with Mr. Coyne until the last few days, either in relation to interest rates, balanced budgets or anything else. In fact when he came to argue with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) it turned out that he had to use the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and of Mr. Lamontagne to prove that he had been in opposition to what Mr. Coyne had been saying.

I think we might very well ask what right the Minister of Finance had to ask Mr. Coyne for his resignation. What right had he to bulldoze the governors of the bank to get the resignation of Mr. Coyne? Certainly we are entitled to ask what right he had to call into question the Bank of Canada Act, which states that the governors have the right to set up a pension fund for the officers of the bank? After all, the governor is the chief executive officer of the bank. As much as we dislike the size of this pension—and we disagree with its extent—none the less Mr. Coyne did nothing that he was not legally able to do as the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I express the concern of a great many people in this country, I think, and the lack of confidence in this budget as a result of what has transpired. I refer to the shocking events which have transpired outside this house and the effect on the public service of Canada. This service has a long and proud tradition, a British tradition, of treating its public servants honourably. I sincerely hope this will not lower the morale of various departments of this government.

Let us turn to the budget itself. The minister has called it an economic budget. I do not really know what other kind of budget one could have. I think I would call it a Conservative budget. It is couched in terms which indicate a complete lack of faith that government can really be effective. The minister's remarks regarding "bureaucratic delays", and so on, show his idealistic view of so-called laissez-faire, free enterprise school which believes that no government is good government.

The purpose of the budget as expressed by the Minister of Finance is worthy; to solve unemployment, to create a balanced growth in every sector, to improve technical efficiency of industry, to raise the level of savings and investment by Canadians. All of these objectives are very worthy, though we fail to see how this budget is going to accomplish any of these things. We do not believe that government needs to adopt stifling controls; we do believe that a government should provide leadership and planning, something which is completely lacking in this particular government.

What does the minister appeal for throughout the entire budget? He said, as reported at page 6642 of Hansard:

> In our free enterprise system we shall need self-discipline and the full co-operation of business, labour and all levels of government—

Later in his speech the minister called for "co-operation of labour and management" in regard to prices and wages. In other words, what he expects is foresight and initiative to come from the bottom, when it is completely lacking at the top.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pitman: We do not believe the country is on the brink of disaster, as has been claimed. However, we do believe that when a nation has the highest unemployment rate of any developed nation in the world, when it has one of the lowest gross national products of any developed country in the world, when its capital expenditure on plant and factories has gone down to an unbelievably low level, when a small businessman in an area, whether he runs a restaurant, a furniture store or a car lot, finds his profits going down somewhere between 3 to 27 per cent, something seriously needs to be done.

We feel that the tragedy is not so much what is but what could be, in a nation with all the unused plant capacity and unused human resources which the minister spoke about last Tuesday evening. We want to see an expanding economy, and once again we do not see anything in this budget which will give us this.

The minister has said, "We do not intend to let events take an unguided course in the hope that these problems will solve themselves". But that is exactly what happened this last winter. This government would not even admit there was unemployment until some time in December and January. Then they waited for these problems to solve themselves. This government has no faith in planning. This government cannot plan, because it has no faith in the initiative which would take place if it did.

This budget is concerned entirely with incentive, in the hope that if we spread enough money around at the top, some small part of it will finally find its way and filter down to the bottom. It is completely beyond the comprehension of this government to give money at the bottom and hope that some of it might go to the top.

One of the things this budget is certainly built upon is the hope that the premium on the Canadian dollar will disappear. We want to know by what method. The minister is not suggesting that the foreign exchange board of the second world war is going to be reconstituted and will fix a rate, something that can be depended upon. He suggests, rather, that we are going to set up a foreign exchange fund to buy United States dollars. With an annual average inflow of well over $1 billion, how can one tenth of this create a long term devaluation of the Canadian dollar?

An hon. Member: Go back to school and find out.

Mr. Pitman: How can the minister be sure that this will not create a considerable fluctuation which will have a very serious effect upon the money market? What of other currencies? I understand that yesterday the relationship of the German mark to the Canadian dollar was exactly the same. In other words someone could have converted Canadian currency to German marks and exchanged German marks into United States currency to escape the premium on the direct conversion. I think this is certainly a problem with which the minister should be concerned.

The minister suggests also that he will lower interest rates. How? I share the concern of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) as to how these rates are going to go down. The minister says he is not going to force the interest rates down.

As he stated—and this appears at page 6645 of Hansard—we attach high importance to a climate of confidence and understanding in our financing matters. Well, all of us have a great deal of confidence in the businessmen of this nation but to expect leadership from them is, I suspect, a matter of misguided hope. Will not the government's needs, with a deficit of $1 billion not raise interest rates, or will the printing presses begin to turn as the hon. member for Trinity suggested? I am all in favour of creating understanding, but I think this is an area where the government has to take some action and show some initiative.

Certainly, one of the areas where the government is advocating a shrugging off of responsibility is the area of dominion provincial relations. In this respect, the government seems determined to go back to the 1930's. In 1940 this nation had the benefit of having one of the greatest examinations of our federal system which was ever initiated. I will be the first to admit that it was under the Liberal regime. The recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report are, I think, as valid today as they were back in 1940.

Mr. Pickersgill: All being torpedoed now.

Mr. Pitman: That commission thought the solution to our problems would require greater centralization. They thought this was a world wide movement and not simply a matter for Canada to deal with. They believed it was in the interest of all Canadians for the government of Canada to take over certain functions and to take over certain fields of taxation. They believed these policies should be centralized. Equalization, they thought, should be based on a national adjustment grant which would be based on need decided according to expert study. Now, not only is this government determined to excuse its failings by commenting on the confidence of the businessman but it wants to shrug off its responsibilities placing them with the provinces.

The No. 1 weapon by which this government can do anything about unemployment is the monetary and fiscal weapon and now the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is thinking of placing in the hands of the provinces the opportunity to negate whatever the central government is trying to do. A perfect example of this comes right with this budget. Here, this government is going to reduce this tax on automobiles—7½ per cent. But what is the premier of the government of Ontario doing? He is putting up the tax by 3 per cent. If the premier of Ontario had pondered for a year to find a way by which he could negate the influence of this government he could not have come up with a better suggestion than a 3 per cent sales tax, the most regressive tax possible. This is an example of what is going to happen. One can see this jungle taking shape in every place in Canada as province after province puts on one tax after another to negate the effect of taxes taken off by the federal government. I think this will be a matter of intense concern to people right across this nation.

Furthermore, once again this equalization is back on a political pandering basis. Forty per cent is given here, $8 million there. The government refuses the opportunity to provide leadership and refuses to realize that provincial freedom may involve federal slavery for the Canadian people as a whole.

Perhaps I might give a perfect example of the lack of leadership and direction which has been noticeable in the last six months by drawing attention to one particular problem with which this government tried to deal in the last budget placed before this house. I should like to read from Hansard at page 1007 where the speech is reported in which the Minister of Finance brought forward one of the ways by which the unemployment problem was to be solved. I quote:

> The most important of our immediate objectives, as I have already said, is to deal effectively with the problem of unemployment.

I take it, of course, that the minister meant unemployment during this year and not unemployment some years hence. Further on in the same paragraph the hon. gentleman said:

> I am anxious to do everything in our means to encourage initiative and enterprise. As a powerful incentive to these ends I am pleased to announce measures to fulfil three major purposes: first, to assist new industries in areas where there is a substantial degree of continuing unemployment over the years—

That was the first proposal. Did this government designate the areas which were to be qualified as surplus manpower areas? No. We heard nothing more about it. When more information did come down, not without considerable prying on the part of the opposition, it came down on March 2. Yet the minister had the audacity to suggest in this budget, and here I read from Hansard at page 6658:

> As usual with such matters, interested persons took some time to consider the possibilities in relation to their own affairs and their own plans. Following a time lag which was not unexpected—

The minister went on to say that interest was increasing. The time lag Mr. Speaker was the result of delay by this government. It took until March 2 before any indication was given as to what the criterion might be for those areas which had a surplus manpower. Equivocation of this kind is difficult to stomach. It certainly was not the result of business hesitation. It was because the municipalities did not know whether they were eligible and could not even find out from the government whether they were eligible.

Finally, on March 2, we found out what the criterion was. Was it some glorious, complicated criterion which might have taken months and months of this government's activities to find out? No. It could have been looked up the day after the minister had rushed out his budget speech. It could have been looked up in a chart to be found among the documents of the Senate committee on manpower and resources. That criterion could have been announced then. Instead, this government took three months while the unemployment rate was the highest in the history of this nation for the last quarter of a century. This was an inexcusable lack of responsibility. This criterion, again, was combined with another stipulation that the industrial force must be going down. That is when the Department of Labour or the Department of Finance, through its officials, should have been in these constituencies finding out whether or not the employment force had gone down. I am not, of course, suggesting that what was being offered to these areas of surplus manpower would be any use whatsoever—double depreciation for one year is practically useless. In fact, I would ask this question: how many industries are, six months later, receiving the benefit of this allowance? I would be very interested to know, because this is one of the most fantastic negations of government responsibility that I have ever seen.

Mr. Pickersgill: None.

Mr. Pitman: It took four months from the bringing down of the last budget before one area had been designated, namely, Cornwall. It took from March 21 to May 4 for the government to figure out that Windsor should be designated as such an area. Then—this is the greatest joke of all—a few days ago they had to change the rules so that they could bring in the one area which they were trying to get in, namely, Elliot Lake. The government had refused to tell the areas which had an opportunity to come under this scheme whether they were eligible or not. But I have worked out—and I can assure hon. members it did not take me long—a list of the major industrial areas of 10,000 people and more who have the required 75 per cent of unemployment and, as of June 2, Shawinigan Falls, which had 90.5 per cent, had not applied; Grand Val d'Or had not applied; Cornwall had applied and been accepted; Lac St. Jean with 32.6 per cent had not applied; Trois Rivières with 90.5 per cent had not applied, Brantford, with 90.5 per cent had not applied —had not even been told that they were in a category where they could apply. So what do we have? As of June 2 there was 39 places which had applied and most of them, well over 50 per cent of them, are way below what has been set out in this particular criterion. They have no chance of gaining any help whatsoever from the scheme which has been designated by this government.

I know of one case where the municipal council of a city tramped all the way down here to Ottawa and spent the day down here, the taxpayers' money having been spent on sending them down here, to spend a couple of hours with a minister of the crown to find out where they belonged in this category. They could have been told that they belonged in that category by means of a phone call in two minutes. It took me 15 minutes to find out what the percentage was by simply looking through the copies of the Labour Gazette which are to be found in the library of this particular house. That is an instance of the lack of responsibility, the lack of leadership, the lack of initiative with which this government has conducted its affairs over the past six months. We are presented with a huge deficit and told by the Minister of Finance that this will not cause any real inflation. He then adds that modest price advances in regard to some of the goods we obtain from abroad as well as in regard to some of our export commodities will occur. What consideration does he give to the consumer or those individuals who are on pensions and whose incomes are stabilized, those individuals who are so dependent on welfare benefits? I suggest there is not a bit of concern given to those people. It's a budget of bits and pieces.

I should like to read from page 5 of the report from the Senate special committee on manpower and employment as follows:

> The maintenance of an adequate rate of economic growth requires a continuing high level of capital investment, both private and public. Private capital investment must be supplemented and stimulated by an adequate rate of government investment in social capital.

This is an area which the present budget has missed completely. The report then continues as follows:

> Our stock of social capital is both inadequate and in many respects obsolescent, especially in our rapidly expanding urban areas.

Has this government dealt with anything in that area? I suggest it has not. That certainly indicates poverty of imagination and a complete lack of a recognition of the major problem of this nation.

This huge deficit is being used as an answer to the problem in a manner similar to spreading out a mass of green and white bottles on the floor and then turning a firehose on the bottles with the expectation that some water will go into the green bottles but none into the white bottles.

There is no indication in this budget as to the determining of whether this huge deficit and the money resulting from it will be directed into those areas where it will provide employment. I suggest it sets forth a firehose approach which I am convinced will have very little effect upon the problems of this nature.

The minister is determined that he is going to increase the investment in Canada by Canadians. Here again there is no plan for creating some kind of Canadian development fund to provide incentive and encouragement to Canadians to invest their money in areas where it is socially desirable, none whatsoever. Once again the incentive is provided at the top with the hope that some of it will drop to the bottom. Again, is this not a time for lower taxes in certain areas so as to provide greater employment?

We note with satisfaction that the minister is now determined to do something about the individuals with high expense accounts; expense account living, he called it. His answer to this problem is simply that the Department of National Revenue will scrutinize this type of thing. I suggest this is not enough.

In conclusion I should like to state that this is the last time that the C.C.F. party as such will have the opportunity of discussing a budget on the floor of this house. For that reason, and in view of the budget which has been brought down, I feel that a few facts placed on the record might be of value.

Family allowance payments this year will be $523 million. Old age assistance payments, blind persons and disabled persons' allowances and unemployment assistance will be in the amount of $96,856,000. Hospital insurance and general health grants will amount to $317 million. Old age security payments —expenditures from the old age security fund —will amount to $606,570,000.

An hon. Member: All increased by this government.

Mr. Pitman: The government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund will amount to $57 million. Total welfare payments amount to $1,600 million. All of this must come out of a total budget of $6,100 million. That means the total welfare payments represent 26.2 per cent of the total budget, which amounts to $90 per year for every man, woman and child in this country.

Let us remember that family allowances were advocated by J. S. Woodsworth in 1926 and were adopted in 1944 and 1945. Old age pensions were extracted by J. S. Woodsworth and A. A. Heaps from the Liberal government in 1926. Hospital insurance was advocated by J. S. Woodsworth in 1926 and adopted in 1959. Old age pension were extracted from the Liberal government in 1926, and we have a letter signed by the late Mr. Mackenzie King indicating the extent of that extraction. Unemployment insurance was advocated by Mr. J. S. Woodsworth in 1926 and adopted in 1940 by the Liberal government.

In concluding my remarks I should like to say that I have no concern whatever about history dealing very kindly with this party.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pitman: Most certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nasserden: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the provincial sales tax, such as was brought into effect in the province of Saskatchewan by the Liberal government, and later increased by the C.C.F. government by 50 per cent, was regressive?

Mr. Pitman: I should say that under certain circumstances it could be regressive, yes.

An hon. Member: That is an example of the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan.

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to participate in a budget debate, and I must compliment the minister and the government for this budget which, in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of many other Canadians, is a good budget.

I was very interested on Tuesday evening last to hear the remarks of Dr. Hannam, the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, who said that in his opinion this budget would do much of benefit to agriculture in Canada.

I wish to deal with three matters which I feel are of urgent importance. The first is of regional concern, but, in my opinion, of national importance. Since 1950 in Canada and particularly in western Canada we have built up a beef industry with the largest market being the United States. Over the past years farmers' incomes have been increased in part as a result of the shipment of dressed and live beef to the United States. In western Canada this year the farmers are facing a drought situation.

I should just like to refer to the latest issue of the Manitoba Co-Operator dated June 15. In that issue under the heading "Drought and Livestock" there appears the statement that Manitoba's pasture and hay picture this season to date has not been as grim since the 1930's. This same situation applies to all three western provinces where there will be no early hay cut this year. Normally the first cut of hay should have already been taken, but this year farmers will be fortunate to take one crop in July or early August.

Since this government came into office in 1957 it has recognized Canada's agricultural industry as it has never been recognized by any previous government. This government has placed legislation on the statute books of great benefit to Canada's agricultural industry across the nation, and has increased the level of income and standard of living of those individuals participating in this industry; although not to the degree desired, this is a step in the right direction.

Among the pieces of legislation which this government has enacted is the measure providing the acreage payments made in 1958 and again in 1960 on the basis of emergency. I should like to state that in my opinion the present situation in western Canada constitutes another similar emergency. One of our major sources of United States dollars exists through the export of beef to the United States. I suggest that if the beef farmers are not assisted in the provision of funds to purchase fodder for their beef herds these herds will have to be drastically reduced with a resultant loss in economy, both regional and national, for some considerable time. I suggest the situation has never been as bad since the 1930's as far as drought is concerned as it is now, when we are just nicely recovering from the losses suffered from the outbreak of hoof and mouth disease in 1950. We have our herds back; we have a good market and I would hope that the government would seriously consider paying the $1 an acre again this year.

The second matter that I should like to deal with is one that I consider to be in the national interest. It is in the interest of all of Canada from the point of view of employment, and from the point of view of a balance of payments with the United States, and it is in the interest of Canadian development and national advancement. I want to speak for a few moments on the Canadian case for the Montreal pipe line.

In the area east of the Ottawa valley we have the largest concentration of users of the products of our oil industry being supplied at the present time almost wholly by foreign imports. In effect this situation is creating employment outside of Canada when we need so much an increase in employment in Canada.

Recently a booklet was put out by Home Oil Company Limited of Canada, and I should like to refer, if I may, to one or two sections of it. The booklet is called "The Canadian Case for the Montreal Pipe Line". They begin by saying:

> The Montreal pipe line project, must succeed or fail on whether it serves the national interest of Canada.

In my opinion it has failed to do so. I continue:

> The proposal to construct a $430 million large diameter pipe line to Montreal falls four-square within the national interest as so defined.

Our productive capacity of crude oil, sir, is 1,100,000 barrels of oil a day. At the time this booklet was printed we were producing 525,000 barrels a day and importing more than 410,000 barrels of crude oil products a day from outside the country. I continue:

> The building of a Montreal pipe line, and the consequent utilization of western Canadian crude oil, can reduce Canada's merchandise trade deficit by more than $200 million in 1963, increasing to more than $400 million per year by 1972.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a worth-while objective for Canadians. The booklet goes on:

> The building of a large diameter crude oil pipe line from Alberta to Montreal will provide direct employment for 6,000 Canadians and indirect employment for more than an additional 25,000 during the two-year construction period.
> The pipe line will require approximately 700,000 tons of steel, all of which can be produced from Canadian iron ore and fabricated in Canada into 2,100 miles of Canadian pipe.

There again we would create additional employment. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians would gladly pay perhaps a little more for their oil products which they require and use, in the interest of providing employment for other Canadians, rather than providing employment for people in outside countries.

In addition, the building of this pipe line would give a great impetus to national development, to the expansion which the minister and the government so desire. Our known potential of crude oil is more than 30 years' supply for Canadians and our expected potential is probably something like 300 years' supply. Therefore, I believe we would be better off as Canadians to use our own product and develop our own oil rather than give this employment, as I said before, to people outside of Canada.

The third subject that I should like to deal with I like to think is global. As all hon. members know, I had the honour and the privilege in April and May of this year to attend as Canada's delegate the meeting of parliamentarians from the nations and dependencies of the commonwealth, which was held at the houses of parliament in London, England, and at Stormont, the parliament of Northern Ireland. It was a great privilege for me to attend this conference, sir. Before I go any further I should like to urge the government to consider very seriously increasing by a very large amount its contribution to the Canada branch of the commonwealth parliamentary association so that more members of the Canadian House of Commons and of the other place might be able to visit the countries of the commonwealth.

It was very interesting indeed to find, when we were assembled in the houses of parliament in London, that of the 32 delegates three were white. I think this provides a very interesting commentary on the position of the white people in the world today. In fact their position is perhaps not quite as ascendant as it was. There were 12 delegates from the various nations in Africa; four from commonwealth countries in the Orient; three from India; seven were of Arabian nationality and three from the West Indies. I was delighted indeed to find that all of these people from all of these countries held Canada and Canada's Prime Minister in the highest respect. In fact, the remark made by many of them was that they consider the Prime Minister of Canada to be the foremost figure on the political scene in the world today.

During the passage of another piece of legislation in the house this week, Mr. Speaker, I made mention of the needs of some of these member nations of the commonwealth in respect of the things which we in Canada can provide. I was amazed to read in a report of one of the committees of the house that one of my colleagues had suggested the government should reduce its aid to African nations. In my opinion, sir, we should vastly increase aid to Africa particularly. There is a need for advancement in agriculture. They are farming under very primitive conditions. They have no other source of national income, really. In most African countries their young men and women have to leave home to make a living. Canada could make a tremendous contribution, sir, to the advancement of those nations and by making this contribution it could certainly help to weld this commonwealth into what it could be.

I should like to see my colleagues in all parts of the house support such a move to extend this assistance to those African nations; in fact, to all of the commonwealth nations. I would hope that it would be done soon. It is my opinion that the commonwealth, rather than any other organization in the world today, provides us with our greatest hope for world peace and security. With the commonwealth we can weld together and keep together a team whose members are multiracial and speak many languages but with a common devotion to the crown and the common bond that most of the people in these countries can speak the English language. I would hope that we in Canada would adopt an attitude as a nation and as a people not of what can we get but what can we give in today's world.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the budget brought down two nights ago aroused a great deal of interest. There was perhaps more interest this year than at any time in the recent past. There was much anticipation and much speculation because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had indicated that he was going to produce an expansionist budget.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He did.

Mr. Granger: The word "expansionist" had a magical effect. Canada, still in a period of recession, still plagued with unemployment, was really in difficulties. There was no official admission that the nation was in trouble but there was a sort of unofficial acknowledgement that all was not well and among the public there was concern that this condition of recession might not cure itself.

The announcement of an expansionist budget was welcomed generally and excitement ran high. Certainly there is reason to call the budget the great expectations budget. Tuesday night came and the great expectations budget was brought down. The preamble was heroic and heroically delivered. The minister's words were optimistic. He said, as found on page 6641 of Hansard:

> The normal growth of real demand can be expected to overtake capacity in the not too distant future.

A great part of the budget speech was an attempt to explain the new policies which were about to be produced, policies which it was indicated would make Canada a land flowing with milk and honey and bursting with prosperity. The minister admitted as he proceeded with his speech that all was not well. This was a new departure, one of several in what was in fact an unusual budget. He had this to say in his speech:

> There is more unemployment and unused capacity in our industries than we can possibly accept. Recent rates of economic growth have been lower than we need to absorb our rapidly growing labour force and the output of our expanding industrial capacity.

This was a very neat way of formally acknowledging that there has been an unemployment problem. A little later he used another neat phrase when he said, as found on page 6642 of Hansard:

> We do not intend to let events take an unguided course—

One must note, however, that he did not announce a planned economy. One statement he made was soon proven to be correct, namely:

> The budget which I bring down this evening is not an ordinary budget.

It certainly was not an ordinary budget. It was not set in the usual ideological background either. This was to be an expansionist budget, not one of the ordinary run of the mill, pay as you go budgets. The passing of the years and the persistence of economic troubles had induced a change of thinking if not a change of heart.

Deficits are not new to this government There were deficits in 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961 and a huge deficit is expected and planned for in 1962. I might also go so far as to say that deficits are a way of life with the present administration. However, to embrace deficit financing as a way to prosperity and to hail it as a noble means to a glorious end is a new philosophy for this administration.

I hasten to add that deficit financing is not necessarily bad or perhaps I should say that deficit financing can be justified. I am not criticizing the decision to resort to deficit financing. I am merely wondering at the complete change in economic philosophy which accompanied its announcement. In a time of economic stress and strain there is positive justification for resorting to deficit financing provided that the deficit financing is to create something new. However, it appears to me that all the present deficit does is to cause us to go deeper into debt in order to pay off old debts. The present deficit financing seems to have been forced on the government rather than having been sought out to create a better and healthier economic state.

Then there is the matter of delay in introducing the budget, for there was an inordinate delay in introducing the budget this year. The budget is, I suppose, about three months late. The delay has caused great anxiety, concern and uncertainty in the Canadian business community. The only possible justification for such a delay would have been the presentation of a far-reaching budget introducing major changes, but there are really no major changes in the budget. To my way of thinking, it is not a document which would justify such a delay and the resultant consequences of the delay that have occurred upon Canadian business. The conclusion which the Canadian public must reach with regard to the delay is that it represents both the arrogance and the poor administration of the government.

The only substantial measure introduced by the government is the use of the exchange fund to attempt to influence the external value of the Canadian dollar. This fund has existed for at least 20 years. It now stands, I believe, at nearly $2 billion. The government could have employed this fund at any time to influence the exchange rate. It did not require a budget to enable the government to use this fund. The fact that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to emphasize the use of the exchange fund and calls this a major measure shows the lack of dynamic ideas in the budget. The use of the exchange fund is rather like finding an old toy in the closet, bringing it out and polishing it up and becoming excited over it. Too little and too late may well apply to this budget of great expectations. It is questionable if the budget contains the power, the real power to bring about the upward change and the rise in industrial development which it forecast. There is wind without the windmill. There are great promises which require real geared energy in order to fulfil them. The substance is not there. Of course, time will prove the value of all the prophecies which have been made.

However, I cannot help but think back to some of the great national projects which were initiated under the previous Liberal administration.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose I was recalling some of the great national projects which had been initiated under previous Liberal administrations. I would mention among others the Trans-Canada Air Lines, the trans-Canada highway, the trans-Canada pipe line and the St. Lawrence seaway. I cannot help but deplore the fact that there does not seem to be provision made in this budget for the development of further great national projects in the near future. I might add that such national projects serve a twofold purpose; they give a boost to the national economy and they develop the cohesion and maturity of Canada as a nation.

It is a matter of regret that there are no great new national projects forecast at the present time because such national projects would more than justify a deficit. The only expansion on the horizon in an expansion of debt without the compensation of expanded productivity.

I should like to make some reference to parts of the budget speech of the Minister of Finance which were devoted to international trade and commercial policies. The minister seemed to reject most of the views of people who have been thinking about Canada's trading problems. I think he referred to them as "counsels of fear and even despair".

The point which I wish to emphasize is that all the discussion regarding the need for fundamental rethinking in Canada's trading position, and the many arguments that have been presented, notably those by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) regarding the need for Canada to recognize and assess the impact of European trade developments, have apparently been rejected as well as the proposal put forward regarding new horizons for Canada's trade. The minister said:

> I do not believe that the economic problems which confront Canada today require a drastic redirection of our trading relationships; or that these problems cannot be overcome by a vigorous pursuit of our present trading policies judiciously adjusted to meet changing world conditions.

The minister made some reference to the prospect of Britain entering the European common market and it seemed to me that he did not think Britain should join that group. On the other hand, it seemed to me that the tenor of his remarks held implications that Britain would be doing Canada a disservice if she joined that common market. If I am right in my assumption that the Canadian government is opposed to Britain entering the European market, I should like to ask what alternative policy or proposal the Canadian government has to offer the British government.

If Britain considers that it is essential to her economy to join the European common market, we should act constructively so that Britain and Canada can strengthen their economies and expand their trade. I suggest the time has come for Canada to show a greater long term understanding of the position of the British government and to attempt to make arrangements whereby she can share the increased prosperity which this move could bring to Britain, to the common market and to the commonwealth.

I believe there is no more important area in which new thinking is required in Canada than in respect to our trading relationship with Britain and the European trade bloc. The Minister of Finance seemed to be neglecting the opportunity which exists to expand our future trading prospects in these areas of the world, and I should like to suggest that he spend some time studying the arguments put forward in this house time and time again by the Leader of the Opposition and others regarding the Atlantic economic community.

The budget of great expectations is already petering out in uneasiness and disappointment. I think it would be unfair to blame all this on the Minister of Finance who, after all, is in the rather unenviable position of operating a cash register in which there is no cash. It was the Prime Minister who, in 1958, sowed the wind and it is now the people of Canada who are reaping the whirlwind. The long delay in the so-called expansionist budget has become, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, an expansion of wind, word and debt.

Mr. B. G. Allmark (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations, to those already expressed, to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for his very able presentation of the budget. May I say that in this presentation the minister has again shown that quality of good judgment he has always exhibited since first occupying this portfolio.

The budget debate provides an excellent opportunity for members who are backbenchers to pass along to parliament the advice and opinions of those whom they represent in their ridings. I would like to commend the ministers on their readiness to turn a sympathetic ear to the problems of the private members and since this receptive attitude exists on their part I should like to take this opportunity to pass along to hon. members on the front benches the comments, praise and criticism of those who live in both the urban and the rural sections of my historic riding.

One of the most frequent complaints concerns the unemployment insurance fund. I know that all Canadians are anxious to help those who are in need but I do think there are areas where we could do more than we are doing at the present time. May I say that many of my constituents are not at all satisfied with the hand-out of insurance funds to those who are not in need. I am sure that the public is not opposed to married women drawing unemployment insurance if it is necessary for them to supplement the income going into their homes, but there are, I find, many who are definitely opposed to married women drawing unemployment insurance when their husbands are taking home $4,000 or $5,000 a year. We know there are thousands in Canada who are doing this and we do not have to look very far for examples of such misuse of the insurance fund.

Possibly because I come from a port on the great lakes I have always supported the Canadian sailor. I have stated on a good number of occasions that as pilots and ship handlers Canadian sailors have no equal. They work hard in the job which has its disadvantages and discomforts. They deserve good pay. But I see no justification for sailors who are making between $5,000 and $10,000 a year receiving unemployment insurance during the winter months. I have friends who are in the top salary bracket and who enjoy the luxury of having their unemployment insurance cheques mailed to them in the winter months. These men are good Canadians; I am sure they do not believe that this is the purpose of the fund. But one cannot expect them to refuse what is lawfully and cheerfully provided.

I have the opportunity which all hon. members do to help many elderly people in my riding. There are many Canadians who do not have an opportunity fully to realize the tremendous blessing which the old age pension is to elderly people. There is, however, an area to which further consideration should be given. There are cases where the survivor of a couple who have made ends meet on both old age pensions finds great difficulty in managing on a single pension. Sometimes extreme hardship has to be faced. It has been my privilege in many cases to assist such people to obtain supplementary assistance from the province and from the municipality. However, in such cases an investigation is made as to means and this adds to the upset state which bereavement has already brought to these people. I would strongly recommend that some method be found to increase the income of such persons without making it necessary for them to appeal to charitable organizations.

The residents of my constituency are extremely grateful for the assistance given by this government to the shipbuilding industry. We are aware that in the shipbuilding trade in recent years and particularly since the opening of the seaway competition from foreign countries has been very keen. Had this provision for assistance not been made we were faced with the loss of those skills which are peculiar to this trade and which would be almost impossible to replace. Thus we were faced with the loss of an important Canadian industry. May I remind the government that there will no doubt be considerable work to be done in the conversion of the best of the old canal ships to a larger and more economic size for use in the new canal and I would ask that consideration be given to the application of this subsidy to the conversion of existing Canadian ships.

No one who has followed the shipbuilding industry has failed to notice the number of times foreign engines are used in ships belonging to the Canadian government. Too frequently we find that these ships are designed so that Canadian marine engines cannot be adapted for use in them, or that they can be adapted only at considerable additional cost. I believe that when it is decided that the Canadian government needs new ships there should be a consultation at the design stage with a committee of government to ensure that the ship was not so designed as to exclude the use of Canadian machinery and equipment. We have in Canada two marine engine manufacturers. One of them is a Kingston plant. The marine engines produced by these Canadian companies are at least equal to those produced by any country and it is shocking to find that on occasions we appear to give preference to engines and equipment produced by other countries. If we believe the "Buy Canadian" slogan, let us make sure that our government ship designers do not prevent us from practising this policy.

Until recent years in my historic riding we were very proud of our transportation system both by water and and by rail. Kingston is on the main line of the Toronto-Montreal route of the railway. Our passenger and freight service by rail was equal to the best in Canada. Our passenger and freight service by water was also equal to the best in Canada because we were one of the important ports on the St. Lawrence-great lakes system. Ninety per cent of all the ships which passed from river to lake or down from lake to river passed the port of Kingston. But the shipping channel, either through stupidity or design was diverted, under the previous government, to the United States side, missing the port of Kingston. In addition, under former governments, when the necessity for air service became apparent, only a few feeble attempts were made to provide my constituency with this modern system of travel. It is said that the wheels of government turn slowly. But may I say that it is only a little more than three years since the people of Canada elected a government of Sir John A's party and in this short period of time a contract has been awarded which in its first step will provide a connection with the seaway channel to the east. This will permit 90 per cent of the present seaway vessels to use the Canadian side and to pass the port of Kingston. Also in this short period of time the government has studied and realized the need for air service and has granted a licence under which Kingston will have a daily air service to Toronto and Montreal, commencing at the end of this month. I should like very sincerely to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) for their interest, their sound judgment and their progressiveness in bringing those services to my riding. At this time I should like to say how much I appreciate the assistance of our local council and the businessmen of my riding who took the time to come to Ottawa and efficiently present briefs supporting those necessary services.

At the junction of the St. Lawrence and lake Ontario, where the city of Kingston is situated, there are a number of very beautiful islands. Two of those are large and have a large population of year round residents in addition to those hundreds of people who have their summer homes there. The great problem for those who make their homes on the islands is transportation to the mainland, particularly at the time of freeze-up and at the spring break-up. To cross over the ice in the spring and fall is very hazardous and through the years there has been a tragic loss of life.

There is only one proper solution to this problem, Mr. Speaker, and that is the building of a bridge to span the distance from the mainland to Howe island, thence to Wolfe island and from there to the United States mainland. Unfortunately, the bankers who finance such projects as international bridges assess only the financial returns and attach no importance to the great benefit to those who must make this hazardous crossing in the spring and fall, nor does the loss of life enter into their calculations.

This project has been studied by committees on both the United States and Canadian sides of the river, and, while all agree on the great benefits a bridge would bring to the area, there is also agreement that such a project is impossible without government assistance. May I suggest to the Minister of Public Works that his very capable economic study group under the leadership of Dr. Weeks might well look at this proposal with a view to assessing the benefits which would accrue not only to those who live on the islands but also to the entire area through increased tourist traffic. It does seem to me that here is an excellent opportunity for the government to be of service to Canadians which would result in a tremendous benefit in the development of the area and, what of course is more important, it would save human life.

In the rural area surrounding the city of Kingston the chief occupation of those who are engaged in farming is the dairy industry. We realize that this government has been particularly interested in the welfare of the farmers, and particularly aware that the dairy industry is one which has not received a fair return for its production. While the farmers in my area appreciate the legislation which has been passed by the Conservative government to stabilize farm prices, I should like to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) the fact that the dairy industry is likely to continue to have a problem and it is our responsibility to continue to study and improve the conditions in this industry which is so vital to our country.

We in the riding of Kingston are grateful to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) for the granting of an additional $100,000 toward the cost of Kingston's sewage disposal program. We also commend the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) for the extension of mail carrier service to the residential areas which lie outside our city.

We are grateful to the Minister of Public Works for his co-operation with Canada Steamship Lines and James Richardson Company in dredging Little Cataraqui bay so as to provide a deep water port for the city of Kingston.

As I mentioned earlier, we are extremely grateful for our air service and the connecting channel to the seaway. May I, however, remind the Minister of Public Works, who I know has some very close ties with my riding, that he may expect me back in his office shortly urging further port improvements so that the port of Kingston may share in the development of this promising area.

Before coming to the House of Commons I was an employee of a Canadian industry with an excellent pension scheme. However, Canadian workers are aware that even the best of our Canadian pensions have one great weakness; they are not portable. Industrial employees in my riding have discussed this matter of the portability of pensions with me on numerous occasions and I should like to say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that his statement during the presentation of the budget that steps will be taken to deal with this matter will be indeed welcome news to Canadian workers.

In closing I should like to mention a subject which is important to my own riding and the surrounding ridings. While I have admiration for the qualities of the man whose empire I propose to bring to the attention of this parliament, I think it proper that I should level criticism because of the great concern expressed to me by residents of my constituency. I refer to the control of the news media over a wide area of eastern Ontario which is held by one man. Not only does he control the news media in my riding but also in adjoining ridings. Let me be specific. There is one daily newspaper in Kingston and one in Peterborough. This man owns both. There is one T.V. station in each of those ridings. He controls both. There are four radio stations in the two ridings, and of those he controls two. Licences for both the T.V. and the radio stations were granted to this Liberal Senator by the previous Liberal government. This man, whose newspapers pose as being politically independent, had this to say in a speech to the commonwealth press union, reported in the Ottawa Journal of June 15 of last year. I quote:

> The new government has appointed a board of broadcast governors which has proved to be very autocratic. This board tells stations what to do and what not to do. How much time to devote to each item. How much profit must be devoted to the development of local talent. Some of us are worried that this might eventually affect the freedom of newspapers.

Here is a man who has gained control of the news media over a large area who is obviously concerned only that this government should not disturb his empire. I believe it is utterly impossible to have freedom of the press, or to have an informed public, when almost 100 per cent of the control of the news media over a large area is held by one man. It is in my opinion impossible for any person to have such a monopoly of the news, such a power to influence people's minds, without using it for his own personal advantage. Frankly, I see little difference between the government controlled press such as exists in some countries and a news monopoly held by one person such as we have in this instance. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is the responsibility of the board of broadcast governors and the C.B.C. to take such steps as are necessary to break up these monopolies wherever they may exist across Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, Tuesday night's budget was introduced under very unusual circumstances. Never had a rendering of accounts to the country been delayed so long. The most surprising thing is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) did not attempt to give an explanation or a reason to justify such a delay.

Therefore, the government is responsible for the confusion and uncertainty in which business and industry in general have found themselves since the end of last March, the time when a diligent government usually gives an account of its administration.

The four previous budgets submitted by the present government showed substantial deficits. At times the economy was at a standstill, according to the government, at other times we had come out of a momentary recession, but never in those four years had the Canadian citizen the clear impression that their government was aware of the actual problems and shortcomings of our economy and took appropriate action to correct them.

Last year, for instance, on the basis of a 6 per cent rise in gross national income, the Minister of Finance forecast a surplus of approximately $13 million; yet, last December, we heard that that surplus was to become a deficit of about $350 million because gross national income had not met the minister's hopes.

The Minister of Finance who has already been nicknamed "Donald deficit" by some people, has become our national "Wrong way Corrigan" with his record-breaking deficit of $1 billion forecast for the current year.

That means, that after five and a half years of Conservative administration, this country is $2.5 billion deeper in the red. I am not against deficits as such, because they are sometimes necessary.

I think Canadians, in general, were expecting an expansionist and therefore adverse budget. However, like most of my fellow-citizens, I am deceived because, if it is true that we will have a deficit at the end of the next fiscal year, we are far from being sure that the program introduced by the Minister of Finance will bring us the expansion he promised.

The Conservative party still bears the mark of Toryism, and in this situation into which we were thrown by this administration I submit that the Liberal expansionist program would have been a hundred times better.

An hon. Member: What program?

Mr. Deschatelets: I must reply to my hon. friend who just interrupted me, that we have submitted a program under which a national tax reduction would have brought immediate dividends to every class of citizens.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and my hon. friends should be reminded here that the working class like others, the humble class, the class of small wage-earners should have been directly considered and protected under this so-called expansionist program, which in fact is mostly based on artificial measures.

This budget is not a budget for the majority of our people who shall still have to be content with a few crumbs that may fall from the table of the wealthy.

The disastrous results achieved so far by the Minister of Finance force us to accept his predictions under beneficium inventorii and I feel that an editorial of the Ottawa Citizen of June 21 expressed quite accurately my views in that regard.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming's past performances as a prognosticator being what they are, it is difficult to feel anything but the most profound uneasiness as he offers his new prescription for an ailing economy. The Minister of Finance sounds his usual ringing note of confidence, but the fact remains that he is embarking on a gigantic gamble. It carries the danger if not the outright guarantee of inflation. In this budget, Mr. Fleming frankly goes out to achieve a deficit of some $650 million. This assumes an increase in revenues between now and next March 31 as a result of the stimuli being applied to Canadian business. In any event, the accumulated deficits of the present government promise to top the $2 billion mark before it has been five years in office, which is quite a feat.

Part of the minister's objective is to bring down interest rates. How he expects to do this in the face of such monumental deficit financing, with its consequent effect on the money market, is difficult to see.

(Translation):

And the article concludes as follows:

(Text):

Yet while these features of the budget appear satisfactory as far as they go, the document as a whole is a disturbing one. It is overshadowed by yet another deficit, and while a case may be made out for deficits for pump-priming purposes, Mr. Fleming has become addicted to them as to a drug. It remains to be seen how the business and financial community reacts to the latest in the series. Any outcome of the experiment in manipulation of the exchange fund is unpredictable. Pushing buttons without knowing just what will happen is a risky game.

Canadians will hope that the minister's gamble will turn out all right. It will be unfortunate for the country as well as for the government if it does not.

Everyone is aware of the well-known unbiased and objective attitude of the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. Speaker, following even a superficial examination of the budget, you cannot but reach the conclusion that the Conservative government has been faithful to its past and its Tory spirit.

While radical measures are imperative, we only get words and wind; while a measure of tax reduction is offered, there is nothing for the small wage-earner, nothing for the working classes, nothing for the unemployed, except perhaps renewed concern about the pres- its tory spirit.

The small wage-earner will be the first to bear the brunt of the budget. It is he, in fact, who will have to shoulder the burden of that budget.

As I said earlier, the economy is not like a car. A car can be shifted into gear, its speed can be increased by pressing on the gas, and it can be stopped by applying the brakes.

You cannot do that with a country's economy.

You will also recall the government's lack of judgment in trying to divert to the United Kingdom 15 per cent of our trade with the United States. You will also recall the difficulties that followed that irresponsible statement.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to that new policy announced by the Minister of Finance Tuesday, concerning the exchange rate control. That is one of the main points in the budget.

With that policy, the government hopes to control the exchange rate, even to reduce it, through the exchange fund.

But a report published in La Presse of June 21, sets forth a very interesting opinion in that connection:

The minister proposes to reduce the exchange rate.

And the minister goes on:

More than any other policy that could be adopted, a lower exchange rate will be of signal assistance to all of our producers, both in primary and in secondary industries, to those who export as well as to those who sell at home.

There had also been a rather interesting article concerning the budget brought down on March 31, 1960. The Minister of Finance had then made a statement on the same subject in utter opposition to this one.

I quote:

I have seen some references to a demand that the government should deliberately "devalue" the dollar. This kind of talk might have been appropriate when Canada was on the gold standard, or even when it maintained a fixed exchange rate. We have not been on the gold standard for half a century and we have not had a fixed exchange for a decade. An attempt by the government, added Mr. Fleming, artificially to lower the external price of the Canadian dollar would involve sums of money with which to buy up foreign exchange.

The minister added:

It would be a very difficult matter to work out technical controls.

In other words, we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

I have just shown that this new policy is a complete reversal of the minister's former position concerning the exchange rate.

And yet that was what the minister said on March 30 last.

I cannot understand why the minister is saying exactly the opposite of what he was stating last year. I wonder when he is speaking the truth. Was it last year, when he said that the artificial reduction of the exchange rate was bad policy. Or is it this year, when he says that it is sound policy. I must tell the minister that there are a thousand ways of controlling the exchange rate, but there is a way that could prove very bad because of unforeseen consequences, and that way is precisely this artificial method adopted by the government Tuesday night.

Canada is an exporting nation. We must therefore take that into account and adjust our economy in such a way as to achieve commercial expansion and competitive prices on world markets. One must not forget however that we are equally dependent on a great many imported products for our very subsistence. I will mention the most essential ones, those which may be found on every Canadian table: tea, coffee, sugar, etc.

As a result of this change in the rate, our Canadian families should necessarily expect to pay more for imported products. I should like to ask the minister what provisions there are in his budget against such an occurrence? What will happen to the lower and middle classes if there is a sharp rise in the cost of living?

I know of experts who have expressed the opinion that the cost of living index could go up by as much as five points. Regarding this matter I should like to read a most interesting article which appeared in this morning's Gazette, that is the June 22 issue, under the signature of Mr. John Meyer. It is entitled:

(Text):

The full cost of budget has still to be figured. Mr. Fleming will have to borrow an average of $100 million a month for the balance of the fiscal year to meet his estimated cash deficit. No provision was made for the $100 million needed for the debt management fund. There will probably be other non-budgetary expenditures which haven't yet been accounted for. The heaviest cost is likely to arise from keeping the dollar at a discount. A total borrowing half again larger than that indicated remains a distinct possibility. Meeting this requirement and, at the same time, reducing interest rates will be a remarkable accomplishment to bring about without inflating the money supply.

(Translation):

Now, I ask the minister: how much will the government have to borrow monthly in order to meet the requirements of its deficits? What will happen to the interest rates which the government is anxious to maintain at a reasonable level? What are the means provided in this budget to maintain those interest rates at a reasonable level? What will happen to the loans of our provincial governments, of our municipalities, past loans as well as future loans?

Shall we be in a position to meet their needs if they are unable to obtain funds on foreign markets, as far as financing is concerned? I am thinking in particular of the Montreal subway project, about which it was reported that financial arrangements were almost completed with the French government, because at that time, Canadian businessmen had been extremely surprised and taken aback when they heard that the Canadian government was unable to supply funds to our own municipalities, which were forced to borrow on foreign markets.

Well, today, with the adoption of those measures, I submit that such financing will place the provinces and municipalities in a very difficult situation, and I ask the minister what provision was made to enable those provinces and municipalities to get the money they need for their projects.

Mr. Speaker, I will not conclude my remarks without saying a word or two about a question which is very close to my heart, because I represent, as you know, a constituency with a majority of workers. I should like at this point to talk about the unemployed, a question which the government tried to keep under the carpet, a question which the government tried to prevent us from discussing because it has neglected for the past two or three years to convene the committee on industrial relations, and I say that it is a shame that this very committee should be the only one to remain inactive when the main problem in Canada, the most important domestic problem is precisely that of unemployment. We have never been told why the committee on industrial relations was not sitting. Since the Prime Minister takes so much pride in the fact that a great number of committees are sitting, I ask him to explain to the house why the committee which perhaps could have made the most important contribution is precisely the one the government did not want to sit?

Mr. Speaker, under this government, the unemployed have been ignored, forgotten, abandoned. Every month, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) reports on the unemployment situation in Canada, he uses the D.B.S. figures. He does not use the actual figures that he gets from the unemployment insurance commission. He does not give us either a figure that nobody can question: the number of persons now receiving unemployment insurance benefits. The identity of an unemployed and the number of the unemployed people could give rise to all sorts of arguments, but one fact remains undeniable: on April 30 last, 714,894 Canadian citizens were receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that those people are unemployed in a statutory sense, and their number does not include other citizens who have waived their unemployment insurance benefits and whose names do not appear on these lists.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with another matter, and submit that it is a field which comes under the leader of this house. As a matter of fact, it is not the first year that the situation has arisen, I mean that discussion of the labour department estimates is delayed until the last days of the session, probably for the purpose of preventing hon. members from asking the Minister of Labour too many questions. We have the same situation this year. Consequently, I say that the government did, by every means and every possible action, prevent an honest discussion of the unemployment problem in Canada, and I believe that such lack of responsibility with regard to the unemployment situation is the greatest criticism that can be levelled against this government.

Mr. Speaker, I recently asked the minister why the Department of Labour did not call a meeting of Canadian municipalities to give them some information on the winter works program. It is not in the fall that we will be able to interest municipalities in such an undertaking. If the minister told me that the government had greater success this year than last year, I should answer him that he is right, but I would add that, if the winter works program had been made known earlier to the municipalities, we might have employed many more men on those projects last winter.

The Minister of Labour has no excuse for delaying information to the municipalities about the program which he intends to submit to the house for next winter, and I hope that the scope of those projects will be broader. I also hope that the government will pay more than 50 per cent of labour costs under that program so that the lot of the jobless can be improved to some degree.

Mr. Speaker, those are the comments I wanted to make in connection with this budget, and in my opinion its impact has been weakened by the fact that it was submitted by the Minister of Finance at a time when the government has obviously lost the confidence of the Canadian people.

The total popular vote in the last four by-elections, gave the Liberal party a majority. The latest Gallup polls also show a majority in favour of the Liberal party.

It therefore seems high time that the Canadian people are due for a change of administration. It is obvious that such a change is eagerly sought at this time and I do hope that the government will soon give us this opportunity which the Canadian people are so anxious to have.

Mr. Noel Drouin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to have this opportunity to give to the house my impressions on the recent budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). He and the government are to be highly commended for their tremendous, magnificent, intelligent, enlightened and detailed work in relation to Canada's economic orientation in the present year.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that in a few minutes time, it is impossible to deal fairly with the various aspects and technicalities of the present budget; however, I note that it will benefit every segment of the population and that every economic sector, whatever its level, will enjoy a most satisfactory development brought about by measures which are not artificial but natural and solidly based. Thus the Canadian nation will be assured that its investments have not been left to chance and will not be subjected to the risks of a short and artificial show.

In relation to expenses, the figures that make up the various items of the departmental estimates assure us of a brilliant future on the basis of the past year and of spectacular events we have witnessed and which are known throughout the world.

The present government of this great country, through its genius and skill, has managed to breathe new life into the Canadian people and gain the friendship and respect of the world. It would be grossly unfair to take issue with the expenses in the field of external affairs, because this government has been able, through a mixture of intelligence, diplomacy and occasional severity, to gain for Canada the respect and confidence of every nation.

Mr. Speaker, is this not a fact that deserves to be stressed in this house, when nearly half of the world is sitting on a volcano, when most countries are meeting with competition on the markets, when hunger is a permanent feature of certain countries, when whole populations are without shelter, when others roam the deserts and the deepest jungles in search of a shirt or a pair of shoes, when nations are torn by racial strife, when all those countries are faced with such troubles and have to spend much of their national income on armaments and armies, is it not a fact that we in Canada are fortunate to live under the banner of a provident and enlightened government, considering the size and geographic position of the country. This is a country inhabited by two equally great and proud races who live in harmony; we have managed to gain the respect and affection of our powerful neighbours to the north and to the south. While those neighbours talk to each other over our heads, while our friends to the south say certain things about our friends the Cubans and the Peking government, at the same time Canada's external and trade relations are at the highest possible level, and never have Canada's name and goods been so well known.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, in failing to mention in this house a "comparative" situation in which we have been living and are still living at the present time. I submit that the least mistake on the part of the Prime Minister or his Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) would immediately plunge Canada into very difficult circumstances in view of its geographic and highly strategic location. There was nothing that could compare at the time of the Suez incident, because Suez is just a very small spot on the map.

All this goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians can be mighty proud of the government in power. Statistics have proved time and again that no other people in the whole world have more bread, meat and material for clothes and leather for shoes than the Canadian people.

In this country, we hold the world's record in the matter of housing, with every citizen having more cubic feet of living accommodation at his disposal than people anywhere else in the world. We also use more gasoline for touring than do our neighbours to the south.

There, Mr. Speaker, we have a comparative which the opposition has never had the frankness or the courage to admit in this house.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has on several occasions attempted to disparage our country. In referring to Hansard for April 18, I find he claims to be the one who enjoys world confidence, and that it is the Liberal opposition whose statements are believed in other countries. It was Voltaire who said:

> Lie, lie; something will always come out of it.

For once Voltaire was mistaken. Of all the opposition's sarcasms, little remains if we consider the enviable position which this country occupies, as a result of this government's energy and vitality.

When opposition members speak in this house they remind me of the devil attempting to preach a sermon. Mr. Speaker, never before has a government shown so much insight and fairness in the distribution of public funds. Citizens at all levels have a share in them.

Never before have so many public works been undertaken; never before have municipalities received so much help and consideration for the promotion of their development; never before, either, have our veterans received better treatment and, there again, never before has a government done so much for the development of a merchant marine and the promotion of shipbuilding in this country. Never before has a government done so much to promote family housing, farm credit, and loans for the recovery of industry in general. And then there is the action taken to encourage the sale of motor cars and the technical training of the unemployed.

A hundred million dollars have been set aside for a survey of the problem of water pollution, a vital problem which so far had been sadly neglected.

We can claim credit for organizing 75 per cent of vocational and technical training. The Conservative government has shown very special regard for export trade, providing funds for it in amounts never equalled in the past. We have built railroads that have opened new access roads to the development of our national wealth.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that those few remarks will refresh the memory of the opposition. I would like to remind the house that there is an area in the province of Quebec that the government at the time had forgotten. I refer to the constituency of Dorchester which I have the honour of representing in the House of Commons. My constituents are always amazed at the amount of attention they have been getting from a federal government since 1958. Because of its geographical situation the constituency of Dorchester cannot take advantage of certain legislation due to the fact that, like nine out of 10 constituencies in the province of Quebec, it has no adjacent navigable waterways; yet it has benefited from the millions of dollars that have gone to municipalities in the form of public works, subsidies and public buildings. There, Mr. Speaker, is a summary of the activities of a vigorous government, a government that has a sense of responsibility.

I am sure that the people of Canada are quite happy with the new provisions included in this budget, one fully in accord with the political program that the Prime Minister submitted to the people in 1958, and which was endorsed by this nation.

Mr. Speaker, the budget that has been presented to the people of Canada, with a fair balance of fiscal, financial and trade policies, is designed to give fresh impetus to Canada's economy, to develop unused capacity for production, to increase trade and, in this way, to multiply jobs. The result will be increased development of our resources, so that every citizen may get his share of our national economy. That is what this budget holds for the people of Canada. Such is its purpose, a purpose which meets the fondest wishes of the people of Canada.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, it is not part of my duties to act as opposition critic of the government on financial and monetary matters. However, I have general remarks to make following the budget speech delivered last Tuesday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

The most striking feature is no doubt the announcement of a deficit of approximately $650 million for the fiscal year 1961-62.

While the new measures resulting from this budget will bring about a tax reduction about $100 million, we are wondering, as do the taxpayers, to what extent the economic activity will be increased if we rely on the experience of past years when we had enormous deficits.

The fact is that our deficit in 1958 was $38.5 million; in 1959, $609.5 million; in 1960, $413 million; in 1961, $345 million; while that for the current year will reach $650 million.

If the figures for the 1962 deficit prove correct, and if we add to them a decrease of about $900 million in the unemployment insurance fund and about $160 million in the national defence fund, we get a total deficit of $3,121 million for the four years of Tory administration.

Can we rely on the figures supplied by the Minister of Finance as to the expected deficit for 1962?

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me only one question?

Mr. Boulanger: I shall give permission to my hon. friend only when I have concluded my remarks, because I do not think I will be able to say everything I have in mind in the short time at my disposal.

I maintain that we cannot rely on the figures provided by the Minister of Finance since he has never been very good at crystal-gazing. Last year, when he introduced his budget, he forecast a $12 million surplus; it all turned out into a $345 million deficit, or a difference of $333 million, that is, a third of a billion dollars.

We are therefore inclined to feel that if the minister makes the same mistake, it is not a $650 million deficit that we will have but a $1 billion deficit, which means a charge of $750 per family.

We had hoped that, after increasing the already enormous debt load which bears down on each Canadian family, the government would have shown itself fatherly and given us the gift it promised us during the 1957 and 1958 electoral campaigns. In fact, here is the promise the Prime Minister made in Toronto and which was reported in the April 29, 1957 edition of Quebec city's Le Soleil:

> The high taxes party has been in power too long, added Mr. Diefenbaker. The present tax structure practically amounts to confiscation and, if it is allowed to go on like this, it will spell the end of free enterprise. The leader of the Conservative party does not wish to encourage attempts at tax evasion, but had harsh words for government employees who act as spies and tyrants and who, by their action, infringe upon the rights of Canadians.

Not only has the tax burden not been lightened but it has been made heavier.

Mr. Pigeon: What do you think of the excise tax on automobiles?

Mr. Boulanger: What provisions are there in the present budget to help average families?

As the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) just stated, the tax on automobiles has been repealed; it was to be repealed four years ago. Besides, it is not so much the average taxpayer who will benefit from that provision, because the workers cannot afford the luxury of changing their cars every spring. When they can buy a car, they keep it for seven or eight years.

The government has made possible the manufacture of a slightly heavier cigarette.

But what has been done to enable farmers to benefit from their share of the national income of which we heard so much about during the 1957 and 1958 electoral campaigns?

Mr. Pigeon: Remember butter at 64 cents a pound.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I intend to keep on with my speech. If the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has questions to ask, I would ask him to wait until I have concluded my remarks.

The government has changed the excise tax on poultry imported from the United States and reduced the rates on secondary products. That is all.

But there is nothing in the budget to make the average working man enthusiastic.

We now have in power a Tory government which takes after the Bennett government of 1930-35.

During the four years and a half of the latter regime, we had the worst depression in our history. It was truly at the time the rule of poverty and of hunger, of which the soup-ticket was so symbolic.

Today the Tory government is resorting to camouflage and fleeting visions. In years to come it will be nicknamed "The Unemployment Party" or "The no one will suffer Party."

Mr. Pigeon: Recent by-elections are proof of the contrary.

Mr. Boulanger: I would like to say a few words about textiles. Here is one industry which felt the ill effects of a revolting policy of inaction.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Here again promises galore were made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and also by many candidates in the 1957 and 1958 elections. They were going to put the industry back on its feet.

What a forceful electoral campaign was undertaken in the areas which depend on that industry.

I remember listening to talks on television by Conservative candidates who today are members for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) and for Richmond (Mr. Dubois).

Their enthusiastic line of talk, backed by the dictatorial Union Nationale, gave them victory at the polls. But since then have we heard anything from them about that industry?

I especially remember a vision of the member for Sherbrooke, in a speech, in 1958, full of recommendations to his government.

Since then, the member for Sherbrooke has kept rather silent in this house on that matter of textiles.

Mr. Pigeon: There has not been a year he did not talk about it.

Mr. Boulanger: He makes himself heard through press releases.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to submit a few specimens of those releases. I will give only the titles.

In 1958 as reported in La Tribune, the member for Sherbrooke said this:

Ottawa introduces two changes to solve the textile problem.

Of courses, they were nice changes.

September 10, 1958, he said:

Aid from municipalities sought to save the textile industry—

At a time when the member for Sherbrooke was asking municipalities to cut down taxes and grant special rates on electric power, on November 14, 1958, he wrote an article entitled:

Mr. Allard is preparing a study on textiles.

On November 24, 1958, another spectacular heading:

Seek answer to textile problem.

Nothing yet had been saved.

On December 16, 1959, the press reported:

M.P. asks parliament to inquire into the textile industry. One of the main points, imports.

A few weeks later, that is on January 13, 1960, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated:

Higher Japanese exports welcomed.

On March 20, 1960, another item is entitled:

Mr. Allard endorses any measure that could save the textile industry—

Here is what was stated in June 1960 in a report which appeared in La Presse under the title:

Textile situation calls for moderate optimism.

Naturally, the situation was deteriorating instead of improving. The hon. member for Sherbrooke did recognize it.

Last year, in July 1960, again according to an article reproduced in La Presse, the hon. member for Sherbrooke said:

Ottawa shall have to take action to protect the textile industry.

The situation was not as good as in 1958.

This spring, in March 1961, at the Conservative convention, there was adopted a resolution introduced by Mr. Allard, federal member for Sherbrooke, and seconded by Mr. Andre Langlais, urging the federal government, among other things:

To impose quotas on foreign textiles in the most vulnerable sectors of the Canadian economy.

That is about all the work done by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. After having recognized that the textile industry had been saved, we now hear him say, in 1960 and in 1961, that we must not be overly optimistic about textiles.

Another member, representing St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, referred on some occasions to textile products.

A few weeks ago, he told us, among other things, that 11 new industries had been set up in St. Hyacinthe since the coming to power of the Conservative government.

To whom must we credit that? To him personally or to the municipal council?

His reasoning seems confused. Would he be afraid if he spoke his mind to have a bad reputation as was the case in 1959? We will recall that at that time the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) had said things that had not given satisfaction to a certain textile workers union in the city of St. Hyacinthe. In an open letter to La Presse, dated July 8, 1959, the union had this to say to the hon. member:

Trade unionists respectfully suggest that you consult them if only as a courtesy before you talk on their behalf. Besides, the position you took is openly at odds with a resolution adopted at the 1958 convention of the Canadian and catholic confederation of labour.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Could the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska also read the letter I addressed to that union and in which I explained my position? Would he tell me also whether there was any mention at that time of the increase in unemployment benefits the government had voted for the unemployed, and whether the hon. member was opposed to it.

An hon. Member: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Dupuis: It is an abuse of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has the floor.

Mr. Boulanger: From that letter of the union leaders in the St. Hyacinthe area, we had to come to the conclusion that at that time the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe was not their spokesman in this house. When he announces that 11 new industries will be established in the city of St. Hyacinthe, I am not sure that he is the spokesman for those industries. He may have more—

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Habel: There is no question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before allowing the hon. member to state his question of privilege, I must point out to him that if he objects because he disagrees with the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, that does not constitute a question of privilege. When the hon. member has concluded his speech, if the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot thinks that his remarks have been misinterpreted and feels he must correct the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, I shall give him the floor.

Mr. Ricard: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no question whatever of a misinterpretation, only—

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Ricard: —if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will give me the chance, I shall state my question of privilege which is as follows: he credits me with words that I have not said; he tells the house—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is not a question of privilege at all.

Mr. Ricard: —he quotes remarks I did not make—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: —and which are not true.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: The question has been ruled upon.

Mr. Speaker: This is just what I thought. There is no question of privilege in this. Order. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska—

Mr. Boulanger: Besides, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot never did mention the names of those industries. Since he is such a good industrial propagandist, I ask him to tell the house why the number of applications for jobs filed with the unemployment insurance office in his city has gradually increased.

Mr. Ricard: Do you want me to give you the reason?

Mr. Boulanger: And I will quote figures I have taken from the official Labour Gazette. On January 30, 1957, there were 2,566 workers looking for jobs. In 1958, on the same date, there were 3,187. In 1959, there were 3,337. In 1960, there were 3,500. On March 30, 1960, there were 3,995—

Mr. Pigeon: Have you any figures going back to when the Liberals were in power?

An hon. Member: Would you please keep quiet.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I would have liked very much to comment on the attitude taken by the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Dubois), in whose constituency there are several textile industries, but as far as I know, he never said a word about the textile problem in this house nor through the newspapers. His only merit is to be at his desk when a vote is taken. I am quite willing, in a few words—

Mr. Pigeon: You are cheap.

Mr. Ricard: Pretty cheap in fact.

Mr. Boulanger: —to consider the present situation in the field of textiles. I shall do so fairly quickly.

First of all, if we compare the number of people employed in the textile industry between the years 1956 and 1960, we find a decrease of 9,000. In 1956, the production was 393 million yards; it went down to 340 million in 1960, a decrease of 53 million.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Could the hon. member give us his source?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why?

Mr. Ricard: Why? Because he has piled up a great many inaccuracies.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Boulanger: The figures are from the cotton institute of Canada, 1960.

An hon. Member: Are you satisfied now?

Mr. Boulanger: Imports rose from 315 million yards in 1956 to 356 million in 1960. So that today the Canadian production is down from 52 to 48 per cent.

I could have quoted many paragraphs from the brief prepared recently by Mr. G. H. Dobbie, president of the Canadian textile association. I will merely quote a few of his remarks. He said:

> Canada is the biggest importer of textiles. If the present rate of production in Canada is maintained, we will have 7,000 more people employed in the textile industry in 1970.

He goes on:

> If the market continues its downward trend at the same rate as in the past, there will be 14,000 jobs less in 1970.

According to Mr. Dobbie, the Canadian textile industry could employ 110,000 persons in 1970, if steps are taken to control imports.

I have here an article published in Le Progrès du Saguenay, on October 14, 1960. I quote:

> Sales of Japanese textiles and clothing in Canada reached such a volume last year that they represented an expenditure of $2.38 per man, woman and child in the country.
> That makes up an astonishing amount, considering that sales of those Japanese products in the United States only represent $1.50 per head, and 30 cents per head in Europe.

If textile imports from Japan do a lot of harm to our Canadian industry, U. S. imports do no less.

I see that I have to summarize my remarks. An article published in the June 1960 issue of the magazine Affaires says this:

> Total Canadian consumption in 1959 was 555 million yards, but the increase only benefited imports. Last year, the United States sold 240 million yards in this country, whereas Canadian textile mills only sold 229 million yards.

Mr. Speaker, this increase in our textile imports from over the southern border is the result of subsidized exports by the United States government. Moreover, it was announced that those subsidies would be increased to a large extent as from August 1, 1961.

The six cents a pound subsidy for raw cotton will be raised to 8½ cents; the 6.84 cents subsidy for cotton yard goods to 9.69; the 7.08 cents grant for finished fabrics will be increased to 10.03 cents and the present subsidy for manufactured cotton goods will be raised to 11.47 cents.

According to the comments of the Canadian cotton institute, this country will never be able to compete with United States imports, which are subsidized to such a large extent.

The position of our textile industry today, is the Conservative government's doing. What can this government do to remedy that situation?

In fact it strikes me as strange that the remedies advocated during the 1957 and 1958 elections cannot be applied today.

Has the government lost heart? Yet, it has available a good way, all set and prepared, which lies in the full enforcement of the anti-dumping legislation, which authorizes the Minister of National Revenue to determine the value for excise tax purposes of goods entering this country.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to deal with our secondary industries, like the footwear and electronics industries which are in a precarious position. In fact, we have witnessed last year as we shall witness again this year many bankruptcies in the secondary industry and in conclusion I would like to read a paragraph from a speech made by a great economist, Mr. Coyne himself, the governor of the Bank of Canada who stated—

Mr. Pigeon: Your friend.

Mr. Boulanger: Here is what he said:

> If we produced in Canada all the goods we need and that can be economically produced here, 250,000 additional jobs would be provided for Canadians and we would be using to full capacity the facilities of some of our plants now idle.

Mr. Speaker, I share that opinion. There is nothing in the budget proposals of the Minister of Finance indicating that the governments intends to take steps to stimulate our secondary industries and more particularly the textile industry, the footwear industry and the electric appliances industry.

Several industries have already disappeared; others will move to other countries, as happened recently in the case of the textile industry.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house would have to give unanimous consent because the time of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has expired.

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska be in favour of a customs tariff increase to protect the textile industry?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I already put forward my suggestions for improving the situation in the textile industry, and that is the application of the anti-dumping act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Promised by the Prime Minister.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The question is on the subamendment—

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): No, Mr. Speaker. I thought someone on the other side would have been able to find something to say in favour of the budget but in fact I am not in the least surprised that they are not able to do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There has been no attack upon it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently they do not want to hear a reflection of what the public is saying about it either because I am being howled down at the present time.

Mr. Thrasher: Quit crying and get on with your speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member for Essex—

Mr. Thrasher: South.

Mr. Pickersgill: —would be quiet and let me I would be very glad to do so. I do not suppose that in the whole of the peacetime history of Canada, and I exclude those days of war when we had a competent minister of finance, there has ever been a budget about which there were such great expectations, as the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger) said earlier today, as there were about this budget, particularly after we had the Grosart advertisement a week ago about this phony expansion that was so different from the alleged restrictionism of the governor of the Bank of Canada. The difference, of course, between the two was that the governor of the Bank of Canada, whether it was the right or the wrong one, had a program for full employment and this government has a program for the maintenance and perpetuation of unemployment which they refuse to regard as existing in the country and which they say is a figment of the imagination of the opposition.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman adopt the governor's program?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not adopt the governor's program, I am putting forward my own views. I am supporting the program of the Liberal party and, unlike hon. gentlemen opposite, we have a program.

Mr. Lambert: Tell us about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am going to tell you about your budget. I am going to tell you what the country thinks about yours, but you do not want to hear it. This is, I hope, still a free parliament and I will be allowed to speak about it.

After this great Grosart advertisement of last week, which the Minister of Finance could not conceivably have made up because it was succinct and catchy whereas we know the Minister of Finance and his cold porridge, I knew that this budget was going to be the greatest anticlimax we had ever had in our budgetary history. Whenever you put out this misleading, inflated advertising and then produce the kind of empty package that we got on Tuesday night, you find that the public is let down. This is what happened once again with the present government.

There is another very striking feature about this budget. As I was following the minister in the reading of the budget speech the other night, when he reached page 10 which was about one sixth of the way through that dull, tedious document, I noted the minister had adopted about one third of Mr. Coyne's proposals and I wrote on the margin of my paper, Coyne and water, more water than Coyne. I was surprised to find that I was not the only one who had that reaction. A distinguished member of the press gallery, a particular favourite of the minister's, used exactly the same phrase in his broadcast that same evening, so I am told. I defy any fair-minded person, and when I say that I exclude the Minister of Finance, to go through the budget proposals of the Minister of Finance and find a single item, with one exception, that is not a pale reflection of Mr. Coyne's memorandum. Everything the minister has proposed, not as clearly nor in nearly as good English and certainly not as succinctly or as comprehensively—of course he did not propose a lot of the things in Mr. Coyne's memorandum—is in Mr. Coyne's memorandum.

The one exception is something the minister described only a year ago as a great gamble with the taxpayers' money. The minister said this was dangerous financial speculation. This is the one thing that the minister has produced that Mr. Coyne did not, in some fashion, recommend, and the only thing in this so-called expansion budget. Expansion is undoubtedly the right word, but there is a synonym for that word "expansion", and the synonym that is generally used in these matters is the word "inflation". We had an inflation of the publicity, and then the air just petered out of the balloon that night as the 58 pages of the budget were slowly, tiresomely and boringly read to this house. The minister steadily lost his audience and several of his colleagues actually slept through it, which perhaps was the best treatment it could have been given. Never before has there been such an anticlimax in our budgetary history. Never before, sir, in any respectable country has a minister of finance erected the fouling of one's own nest into a principle.

It is true that after a war and in other very critical times a few countries have had to depreciate their currencies because they were in dire straits and this was the last possible remedy available. But here we have this pious, sanctimonious, hypocritical Minister of Finance coming into this house—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and erecting the fouling of one's own nest into a principle.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Grafftey: You ought to be ashamed of yourself; you know better than that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am quite sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would wish to correct one of the epithets he used to describe the Minister of Finance. It is not parliamentary, as he knows.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I am not quite sure which of the epithets I applied to the Minister of Finance Your Honour would like me to withdraw. In order to save time, I will withdraw any of them if you ask me to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In order to save time, I might suggest that the hon. member withdraw them all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to, sir, with a mental reservation. I will comply with the rules of the house, but as I said the other day when the minister made an attack upon my motives, I could not care less what he thought of me and I was not going to ask him to withdraw.

The minister pretended during his budget presentation that this fouling of our own nest, this use of the exchange fund to get the dollar below par, was something new. Then he let the cat out of the bag during his press conference. Last night in his press conference the Minister of Finance was asked this question by Mr. Michael Barkway, and it is found at page 5 of the transcript I have in my hand:

Between December and the end of May—

That is this year.

—according to the official figures you spent $120 million to move the dollar by 50 cents and it was still at a discount of 1½ points. Now you want to bring it down by a significant amount you say—let's say five cents—

The minister said that he had said a significant discount. The minister did not deny that allegation by Mr. Barkway.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not confirm it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We know the minister well enough to know that if Mr. Barkway had not been telling the truth, the minister would have leapt up in that synthetic indignation for which he is so famous in this house. The plain fact is that the Minister of Finance has apparently been using the exchange fund since last December to foul our nest without telling parliament. He has been spending this money; he has been spending $120 million, for which he gave us no accounting whatsoever, for this purpose ever since last December, according to Mr. Barkway's evidence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidence?

Mr. Pickersgill: Now he is going to go on—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do you call that evidence?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Barkway said that was from the official figures. Does the minister deny that the fund went down by $120 million? If the minister wants to deny it, let him deny it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is silly to talk about that as spending, and you know it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says it is silly to talk about spending. The other day I got a friend of mine to go through Hansard and make a count of the number of times the minister said "nonsense", "silly" and "rubbish", and when he reached 5,000 he said, "I cannot take it any more". That is a statistic about as reliable as most of the statistics we get from the government, I might say. The minister has told us, in addition to this great claim that he is going to foul our nest, as I call this scheme to depreciate our dollar. The minister's words were very amusing when he talked about Mr. Coyne suggesting something that was contrary to our international financial and trading obligations. The minister knows perfectly well that Mr. Jacobsson has already warned him that tampering in this way with the exchange rate is contrary to the rules of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a false statement because it appeared in the press everywhere—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and if it had been false the minister would have been the first to deny it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am the first to deny it and I say that is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has his own ideas about what are false statements and I will come to a few more of them before long.

An hon. Member: The hon. member does not care what he says anyway.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Neither does anybody else.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, whoever interrupted me was quite right. I really do not care what the Minister of Finance says, and neither does the country, because the country has ceased to have any kind of confidence in the Minister of Finance or his statements.

An hon. Member: What about the by-elections?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the minister who in 1957, in his first press release as Minister of Finance, said he was going to tackle the tight money situation and end it. Then a year later, when it was embarrassing, he washed his hands like Pontius Pilate and said he had no control over monetary policy. When interest rates started to fall again he said, "I did it with my little hands", and then when the interest rate went up again there was the Pontius Pilate act, "It was the Bank of Canada".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When are you going to start telling the truth, tonight?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister talks about someone else telling the truth. When one considers what the minister told this house regarding when he learned about Mr. Coyne's pension fund, which he knew about from 1959, and then he talks about someone else telling the truth—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that was raised the other day and you will recall—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the floor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ricard: Sit down. A question of privilege has been raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not like it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister has risen on a question of privilege. I have to decide whether there is a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a point of order here, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Order?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the other day we had the same situation. I made a statement in the house on Wednesday of last week that the first time I heard about the voting of this pension to Mr. Coyne was in the spring of this year. A question was raised; there was an attempt made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) to throw doubt on that statement and that question was required to be withdrawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not withdrawn.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The record will show that what I have said is correct. It was required to be withdrawn because it was a reflection on an hon. member of the house. Now the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is violating the same rule. He is saying something in relation to a statement made by a member of this house. I say I first learned of the voting of this pension, a vote that was made by the board of directors of the bank on February 15, 1960, in the spring of 1961. The hon. member says I knew about it from 1959. It was voted by the board of directors on February 15, 1960. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member observe the rule that when a statement is made by an hon. member concerning a matter within his knowledge, that statement must be accepted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will comply with the rules and accept the minister's statement with a mental reservation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because I do not believe the minister is that incompetent and I do not believe the minister is that inattentive to his duties, if indeed he had any duty in this matter, which is very doubtful indeed. He seems to have arrogated to himself, not for the first time, a duty that was never given to him by parliament in this matter and has interfered in a matter that parliament never intended a minister of the crown to interfere in. But it is what you would expect from the kind of minister who brought in the "class or kind" legislation excluding citizens from the courts. It is all of a piece with this dictatorial attitude and this "to hell with parliament" attitude that the minister has taken.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh. Shame.

Mr. Kucherepa: Mackenzie King would not like that statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: —no one is so squeamish—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hear hon. members calling order. I appreciate that the hon. member may be using words which are not too proper, but they are not unparliamentary. However, I would say that they do not add to the dignity of debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor, sir, do I think the minister's attitude to parliament adds very much to the dignity of parliament. He has consistently treated this parliament with the utmost contempt.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, just you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nothing, sir, bothers me less than the minister's attitude to me; but I notice that my attitude to the minister does seem to get under his skin almost all the time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't flatter yourself, old boy.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Something is under your skin.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should not talk about things under the skin.

Mr. Pickersgill: The plain fact of the matter is that we know the minister is not at all a free agent any more. No other member of this government is a free agent. What we have—and we had a beautiful display of it last night—is a one-man government in this country with a lot of little boys running errands, and none of them has been running more unpleasant errands than the Minister of Finance has had to run in the last few weeks. But we know the source of all this—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is just plain hysteria.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is just plain hysteria.

Mr. Nesbitt: The man in a white coat is coming soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) speaks more truly than he knows, because I was just about to read from the Prime Minister's broadcast of last night and I do not think a more apt description could have been found by me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was talking about you and the way you are carrying on; you must understand that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member for Carleton can speak for himself without help from his little boss. For the benefit of those—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The big man talks.

Mr. Pickersgill: —who did not hear it or see it last night, it began:

My fellow Canadians.

Well, I couldn't do justice in imitating it, you know:

Four years ago today following your mandate—

Of course, he did not get a majority:

—I was called upon to be Prime Minister of Canada and naturally—

Naturally, all right:

An hon. Member: Naturally you won't forget it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister said:

—I look back on the intervening years with feelings of satisfaction and humility this evening.

That was 99.44 per cent satisfaction and the rest of the fraction humility, sir. Then, sir, the Prime Minister told us how he carries on the government of this country.

Mr. Grafftey: Now give us Uncle Louie.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the Prime Minister's conception of a duty of a prime minister.

Mr. Pallett: Picky-picky.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister said:

Above all else I am thankful for the opportunity given me to serve my fellow citizens to the best of letters—thousands of letters I have received, every-And throughout the period of time, while there have been ups and downs I have been sustained by the encouragement of so many of you in your letters—thousands of letters I have received, every one of which I have read.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, sir, I served for 16 years in the Prime Minister's office and I know how many letters come to the Prime Minister's office and I know that any prime minister who spends his time reading all the letters that come to his office is not earning his salary and is not administering the affairs of the country. That is precisely what has been happening in these last four years.

An hon. Member: Don't you wish you got them?

Mr. Pickersgill: You don't like it, do you? No prime minister who is responsible—

An hon. Member: Crystal ball.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I recall to hon. members that it is not permitted to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was saying that no prime minister who has the responsibility for the welfare of 18 million people has any right to spend hours every day reading letters from the few hundreds out of those 18 millions who write those letters. If he has any sense of duty and any sense of responsibility and any appreciation of the many burdens and the urgent problems of that office he would not be wasting his time reading thousands of letters which an efficient secretariat could deal with as they have been dealt with in the past in a perfectly competent way. Of course, I do not believe for one moment that the Prime Minister meant that statement to be taken literally. He merely meant that each individual should think that he read his particular letter. No prime minister could possibly read all those letters.

Mr. Pallett: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate read the letters he receives?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I do not read all the letters I receive, and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh. Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: —neither does the hon. member for Peel, nor any other member of this house. I suggest that a very high proportion of the letters which come to our desk go where they ought to go—right into the wastepaper basket.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh. Shame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are supplied with secretaries for the purpose of winnowing all this stuff which is sheer propaganda from the real letters. I use mine, and they should be used by every other conscientious person who has a sense of responsibility as a member of parliament to all the people of Canada or to all his constituents.

Now we come to the next statement in the Prime Minister's document to which I wish to refer. The Prime Minister said:

Some of the current headlines concerning views on fiscal and monetary policy have pointed to an aspect of blocks—

I do not feel I have to apologize for the English or for the syntax.

—an aspect of blocks in the path of progress that can defy even the most patient and persistent efforts.

You can imagine the most patient and persistent effort on the part of the Prime Minister—between letters.

The case of the governor of the Bank of Canada is now out in the open where it can be thoroughly discussed and assessed in the light of all the facts.

That was said last night. Yesterday morning the Prime Minister voted against two motions to provide us with the facts out in the open and he used his majority to keep those facts away from parliament.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I just caution the hon. member that it is not in accordance with the rules to question or discuss votes taken in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was neither questioning nor discussing the vote. I was pointing to the fact that a vote had been taken.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were reflecting on it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was certainly reflecting on the Prime Minister. I was reflecting on the kind of leadership the Prime Minister gave. In the morning he denied the facts to parliament and in the evening he went on television and said we had the facts. Do you believe him in the morning or do you believe him at night?

The Minister of Finance refused to answer straightforward questions put by my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. McMillan), straightforward questions about which the minister himself had made his own statement in parliament before those questions were put on the record. He refused to answer because he knew the answers to those questions were very embarrassing to the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not a bit.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answers to those questions would have revealed conclusively that the statements made by the minister were not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is why the minister would not do it. But the minister did answer one question. He threw a little light on the subject in answering one question. He disclosed one of the facts, and let me show the house how he gave that fact. The minister was asked this question. He was asked by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron):

Did the Minister of Finance at any time receive from Mr. John Bassett, publisher of the Toronto Telegram, a suggestion that the government should seek the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada?

And here is the way in which this simple, straightforward question, which called for the answer yes or no, was answered.

An hon. Member: You say so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I will read the minister's answer. I am always fair to the minister. Here is the answer:

Not in any formal sense.

The minister knows perfectly well that in the presence of a good many witnesses Mr. Bassett assailed him because he did not have the courage to fire the governor of the Bank of Canada. And knowing what we do about the courage of the minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not a falsehood and the minister knows it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said it was a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The witnesses can judge that. That happened and the minister knows it happened.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister also knows that Mr. John Bassett, a favourite of this government, the owner of a powerful newspaper, apparently has more influence with the present government than parliament has in matters of this kind.

Of course, this is all part of a pattern. With this government there is one principle of government—a head every three months. Heads must roll. The head of the government has to have heads, one after the other. Off with their heads. Off with his head. I have not time to go into the list of them. We recall, of course, the time when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was humiliated over the R.C.M.P. and we lost the head of the commissioner. Now we see what is happening here, and I suggest, sir, that the next head that will roll will be the head of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I trust, Mr. Speaker, I was given allowance in respect of all the interruptions that were made.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would have been very difficult to calculate, as the hon. member realizes. I do not think the circumstances permit that being taken into consideration. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house would give the member for Bonavista-Twillingate unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in this house after hearing a full budget speech. That occasion was, Mr. Speaker, one of the most disappointing which I have experienced in what is already too long a life time. We had expected, those of us in the country—

An hon. Member: Oh, you are not that old, Judy.

Miss LaMarsh: —after waiting and waiting for months, and after having been informed since last fall that the country had not seen anything yet, and after waiting since that stillborn of the twentieth of December last—the baby budget—that by the time the minister presented his full budget, that baby of his this spring, the government would finally after four years have arrived at the point where it had in fact a policy. Alas, the people of the country are left as a woman is left in the lurch waiting at the church.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: We are as confused and angry now as all hon. members will realize an unfortunate person would be in that position. This results from the same sort of false persuasion, the same sort of faith and trust, but in this case in a nation of more than 18 million people, this results from four years of pumping them full of advertising, pumping them full of expectation and hope.

Last year this parliament was told in March, when the minister brought down his budget, that what he was reporting on that evening was the result of 18 months serious study and planning. At that time he said, as reported in Hansard of March 31, 1960, at page 2681:

> The position we have now reached, with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget, represents the fruits of carefully designed policies carried forward over the past 18 months. This is not something that has just happened. It is the result of considered aims and efforts.

I should like to underline the words "considered aims and efforts" which brought three quarters of a million Canadians to unemployment in the years since then.

This government has demonstrated that it received a mandate on the hopes of the people that this government would have the vision to carry Canadians forward to the greatest prosperity in their history. Instead, what have we? We have a return of the dirty thirties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: We have drought in the west which is deepening; we have insects in the west, far more than we have here.

An hon. Member: Yes, we have a few here.

Miss LaMarsh: In the west—

An hon. Member: I resent that remark.

Miss LaMarsh: In the west there are grasshoppers and drought, yet in this parliament this Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) have been trying, without the use of the phrase, but with the use of the same old Tory policy, to blast their way into the markets of the world.

An hon. Member: Have one for me.

Miss LaMarsh: Many of the members of this house were children, as I was, during the last depression and they know what Tory policy brought to Canada then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Miss LaMarsh: It is current in the country now that Tory times are hard times. This government has more power than any government has ever had in Canada's history. This government cannot escape any of the responsibility for what has occurred in the last four years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utter nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: There are in this house 200-odd supporters of the government. I admit that their main contribution is represented by the kind of aside I have been listening to for eight months in this house, and that is a shame to the institution of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: Those individuals who come to represent their ridings, come into this house to make a contribution through debate, and not—

An hon. Member: We at least read our mail.

Miss LaMarsh: —to make the sort of asides and irresponsible interjections that many members are now making.

Mr. Skoreyko: You came here to fight the election.

Miss LaMarsh: This is a parliament; this is supposed to be a forum for debate, not a political arena.

In the time since this government took power it has had but one purpose, and that is to seek and retain power again and again.

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, no, we have no Mackenzie Kings in this parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: You certainly have not.

Miss LaMarsh: This government has inveigled the people during "buy" elections, and with respect, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of assisting the Hansard reporter I should like to spell that first word: "b-u-y" elections. In every instance, at least in 1960 and 1961, the policy which this government put to the people in the by-election was one of attempting to purchase the votes. In three recent instances this did work, but in one other instance it did not. In those by-elections just concluded the Minister of Finance did not participate. Nor in one sense did the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Mr. Skoreyko: They did not have to.

Miss LaMarsh: —although his image appeared on television immediately before, and assistance was given by someone close to him. Other ministers of the crown went out in the by-elections and offered to buy the voters.

An hon. Member: Order.

Miss LaMarsh: There was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill), and there was that master of sweetness and light, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker).

Mr. Drysdale: What were the predictions before the by-elections?

Miss LaMarsh: They went from one riding to another. Ministers went into the province of New Brunswick and in the first instance they offered them a cabinet seat, and told the people there that if they did not elect the Conservative candidate they would not have anyone in the cabinet. They came into my riding and offered defence contracts; they went into the riding of Peterborough and they offered contracts there; and they went into the riding of Leeds and offered public works projects. Nowhere in Canada, Mr. Speaker, have they offered decent responsible government.

This government has been toying with the people as a cat toys with a mouse. When this government goes to the people in a general election it will find what the people think of it and its policy.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down. Give the lady a chance.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, we have in this country a feeling of unrest, and since I have been a member of this house I have heard the responsibility for that charged to a number of people, and in particular by those who sit opposite the treasury benches. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and others on the treasury benches, have gone on television and radio and out in the hustings and have told the people of the country that we in the official opposition were the ones that cast doom and gloom and caused the uncertainty and unrest. That was until recently; but now it is claimed that the Bank of Canada and its governor caused all this unrest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: They always have an excuse.

Miss LaMarsh: Recently it has been suggested that it was the president of the Canadian National Railways who has caused all this uncertainty. I am told that previously it was the chairman of the film board. There have been other persons accused; someone else was always responsible.

Then, if you read the minister's speeches on budgets—which I had occasion to do last night—since he took over his office you will see that he blames the rest of the world. We in Canada are having the greatest government we have ever had. The rest of the world does not seem to appreciate that. In my lifetime, Mr. Speaker, I have been proud of Canada, proud of its reputation around the world for stability and for good government. I am no longer proud.

Mr. Grafftey: Shame!

Miss LaMarsh: In the past four years this government has succeeded where no one in the world would have believed it possible. Yes, it has succeeded in alienating our two greatest friends, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

Mr. Grafftey: Of course, that is not party politics.

Miss LaMarsh: This country gave a mandate to this government second to none that had ever been given to any government, and the government then went to the United Kingdom and shook its finger under the nose of the prime minister of that country and said, "Oh, no, you will not join any economic union in Europe and we in Canada will not". Indeed, we will not join any economic union; we will sink alone.

An hon. Member: What rot.

Miss LaMarsh: We wonder why the Canadian people are restless and afraid. Why do they have no confidence? Why will they not invest their money in Canada?

An hon. Member: Three out of four by-elections.

Miss LaMarsh: Why is it that the other countries of the world are afraid of Canada? Why is it that when this Minister of Finance makes a speech the Canadian dollar plunges? Why is there chaos in the financial world? Why is it that the private and public corporations of this country are in a state of confusion and anxiety? Why is it that the municipalities of this country are unable to prepare their budgets? Why is it that hon. members of this house are unable to go back to their constituents and say that this is a solid, responsible program? It is because, first, this government delays the budget and then beats the drums so that the people believe there will be real assistance to the economy and then they drop the people.

The municipalities, hydro, the provinces, had to borrow money in the last couple of years outside this country and the Minister of Finance knew it very well. They had to because all of the money in the market in Canada had been sucked up by this government. Now they are left with nothing but a devalued dollar with which to pay this off, and again it is the taxpayers who pay. This Minister of Finance said last year—and it can be seen in black and white—that the dollar would not be devalued. It is a most incredible somersault to find that he can come back to this parliament in a little over a year after saying what he did in the flattest most unequivocal language, which he used in March, 1960. It was obvious then that it could never be contemplated that the Canadian dollar would be devalued by government manipulation. But this minister has come back and unblushingly done it. He has done it to a point where no one knows where it will end. He has not indicated whether it will be 2 cents or 20 cents or just what it is he wants. The people of this country do not know what this government will do because it has followed, if anything, a policy of lurching from crisis to crisis. It has not in the four years since it has been in office had any plan, any policy. Oh, yes, I remember the Prime Minister said in a speech to Conservatives last fall, which was widely reported, that up until that time the ministers of the crown had been learning their jobs. It might have been better for the country if after three years in which they could not learn their jobs the Prime Minister had tried out some of those other gentlemen to my left.

Mr. Skoreyko: Does the hon. lady not realize that the people of Canada, after 22 years of Liberal reign, have learned to distrust federal governments and they are just now able to recognize a good government after 22 years?

Miss LaMarsh: I do not think this is a matter of privilege; however, it depends on Your Honour's ruling. I may say that what the hon. member says may have an element of truth in it. You see, up until 1957 the people of Canada thought it was an easy thing to govern federally because before that time they had a good government. It looked easy. But they have found that easy or not, it is too difficult for those across the way.

There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, which has caused this feeling of lack of confidence in this country, and I charge to the government as a deliberate planned proposal, the only one they have had. I refer to a plan originally conceived to keep the opposition in a state of alarm, but with the highly unhappy consequent circumstance of keeping the country in a state of alarm. They have cried "wolf"; they have cried "election". This has happened in respect of every proposal they have brought in, every time there has been a suggestion that it was not a perfect proposal. Every time anything has been put before them the Prime Minister has stood up and wagged his chin, and the Prime Minister's seat mate has stood up and wagged his finger, and they have threatened to take us back to the country. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, "Take us to the country". How gentlemen opposite will then find out what the feeling of the country is—

An hon. Member: You found out at the beginning of June.

Miss LaMarsh: —with respect to the trifling proposals which were placed before us on Tuesday night.

Mr. Jones: Is the hon. member speaking for her party when she makes that remark?

Miss LaMarsh: I am a member of my party. I know they are people of courage, that they have been responsible for a great government and will be again shortly.

Here we are, Mr. Speaker, in a situation where the people do not know where to turn. We are now in June. Last August we had the worst unemployment figures in Canada's history. I prophesy, not as a matter of doom and gloom, that they will be greater still in the coming August and this is a frightening prospect for a country which reaches a condition approaching really full employment—and by that I mean a condition in which no one who wishes to work is out of work—only during the full summer months. We are not able to do anything about our climate. This government has abandoned its right; it has abandoned all the tools which it has to use.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that we had the baby budget, this deformed child, last December, and that following it there was the provision introduced by the Minister of Labour, I believe, to assist areas which were called areas of surplus manpower. That provision was very nearly laughed off the statute books by the people of this country. It was said at that time to be a tremendous assistance for new industry; so tremendous that now in the new budget we have had another proposal of much more major importance to apply all across the country.

Well, perhaps I should not too harshly judge those on the other side. There was a member of the treasury benches—now unhappily no longer a member of this house but of the other place—a former secretary of state, who said in 1959, perhaps in justification for this government's past and future actions, as reported at page 2961 of Hansard:

> We did all that could be done. Of course, our methods can be questioned . . .

If I understand the rules, Mr. Speaker, it is not proper in this house to question the bona fides, the good intent of hon. members opposite. I cannot question motives but I would expect that every person who has been honoured with a seat in this venerable house, no matter for how short a time, would be a man or woman who had the greatest benefit for Canada at heart. But there are more things necessary than good intentions, Mr. Speaker, and I am told there is a road to a certain place, not the other place, which is paved with them. It is not sufficient to take office and to have good intentions. If this government has given up, if it cannot or if it will not introduce proposals in this house to be of assistance to the country and if it will not do so soon, then I ask that the government and its supporters go back to the country to receive the judgment which they so richly deserve.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to remind the house that a year ago today the province of Quebec escaped from bondage and freed itself from the Duplessis dictatorship. I am glad to point out to the house that the people in Quebec tonight and since last June 23 are finally enjoying freedom under a democratic administration.

Mr. Speaker, we have just heard speeches delivered by opposition members. I have the privilege of being the third speaker in a row from this side of the house and I am pleased to note that the government side seems to be lacking in fighters. Of course, if I had to come to the defence of the Conservative party and of the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance, I should also be most reluctant to rise in this house. But fortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on behalf of a riding whose constituents had foreseen, as early as 1958, that it would be a pity to vote for the Conservatives and tonight we note once again, during the discussion on the budget submitted by the Diefenbaker government, through its Minister of Finance, a fourth deplorable deficit in four years of administration.

If the deficit could be explained by important accomplishments on the part of the government, like all other members of this house, I could admit the existence of a deficit. But four deficits without solving any of the present problems, nor any of the problems resulting from a bad Conservative administration since 1957, that is too much.

Mr. Speaker, in order to find years comparable to those we are now going through, we must go back to the years of Borden, Bennett and Diefenbaker—the three BBD years of Canada, Bennett, Borden, Diefenbaker—years of darkness, of carelessness and of decline for this country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the greatest confusion was reigning in the house a while ago; indeed, order has not yet been restored. Not only are the Conservatives unable to stand up in defence of their budget but they constantly interrupt members of the opposition who do their duty in this house. By the way, I would say that they could at least have the decency of listening attentively to a representative of the fair sex. When we, on this side of the house, have the opportunity of hearing a woman from the other side, we listen carefully and respectfully as should always be done towards a woman.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) fortunately succeeded in expressing the views of her constituency and she did her duty when she said that the people of Canada are most deceived with the present administration.

I was speaking of years of confusion. Naturally, that is not the Conservatives' fault. When things go badly, the previous governments are always to blame. When things go wrong, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) holds the C.B.C.

people, the C.N.R. people or the Bell Telephone people responsible for all the government's wrongdoings. The government is looking for victims right and left; it is Mr. Coyne who is to blame, or Miss Judith Jasmin of the C.B.C., or Mr. Rene Levesque, or Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, or Mr. Donald Gordon. All those heads have to be cut off to prove to the Canadian people that someone is to blame. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who is a very sympathetic fellow: Stop looking for heads; if you wish the country to prosper, cut one head off, that of your present leader. Vote Liberal at the next election and all problems will be solved.

Mr. Pigeon: That would be a disaster.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking of confusion. In the whole history of our country, have you ever seen a government change its mind so often. The Minister of Finance is always either retracting or contradicting himself. I said a while ago that I did not expect to speak tonight because I thought some of the hon. members opposite would show some fighting spirit. Looking over to the other side, I tried to find traces of this change of mind, this change of opinion, this whirlpool of uncertainty to which we are used and which is characteristic of the Conservatives.

The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) was tried about everywhere: solicitor general, secretary of state, minister of transport.

The minister of transport was shifted to trade and commerce while the minister of trade and commerce (Mr. Churchill) was being transferred to veterans affairs.

The minister of veterans affairs was sent to the Senate.

The same was done with the secretary of state, and for good reasons, he was such a sick man.

As for the minister of agriculture, he was given national defence.

The minister of national defence was sent somewhere else and he is now lieutenant governor in a province.

Then the minister of northern affairs and national resources was moved to agriculture while the minister of agriculture received the national defence portfolio.

There you have the only changes made. There is no mistake about it, the more it changes the more it is the same.

It shows what a wash-out this government has been for the country.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, to shuffle ministers and transfer them from one department to another is no solution to the problem facing this country. The way to settle this problem is not to transfer ministers but to invite members of the opposition to sit to the right of the Speaker and to allow clever men like the hon. members for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and others to play the part that is theirs, and to give to the country the Liberal prosperity which was so appreciated.

Mr. Speaker, for the last three years, even four years, we have been watching the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and hearing him explain his policy.

In 1958, for example, the Minister of Finance was saying that he had just come into the legacy left by the Liberals, that he was new to his post.

He would then explain to the house and the public that it would take time to reorganize his department according to Tory pattern and to put the country back on the road to prosperity.

In 1959, the Minister of Finance comes forward with a deficit. His explanation: it is obvious that we are having a slight recession: but next year, things will be better, finance will be reorganized, the situation balanced and we will present concrete results.

1960, 1961: deficits. But now, the blame is on Mr. Coyne, the fault lies with Judith Jasmin, Rene Levesque, Alphonse Ouimet, Donald Gordon. Even the Bell Telephone is to be blamed, it is a bad company.

If our economy lacks stability, those people are certainly not to blame, but the fault lies with the present Prime Minister who asked the people's trust in the general election campaign of 1958.

He never said that, if elected, he would not be able, because of the persons I just mentioned, to solve the problems in four years. He said: Trust me. I will take the job.

He said: As long as I am Prime Minister, no one will suffer, deficit or no deficit.

Mr. Speaker, tonight we must remind him of his promises. We must tell our friends opposite that people are suffering from unemployment at this very moment.

We have to remind the Prime Minister that he did not fulfil any of his promises.

We are forced to remind the Minister of Finance that he should have organized what is now called his economic expansion program, four years ago, in order that we could at last feel its beneficial results, if there are any to expect from his budget proposals.

But no, Mr. Speaker. In 1958, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) rose in this house to ask the government to kindly consider the problem of the automobile industry in Canada.

In 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961, the hon. member for Essex East recalled that in his native city of Windsor, as well as in the major cities where cars are being made, there was some slackening in business and unemployment, because the government admitted foreign cars into Canada, and did not protect the Canadian car market.

This government has been aware of that situation for four years—four years during which we have seen the automobile industry going into a slump; four years during which we have seen our car plants laying off thousands of employees, who swelled the numbers of unemployed in Canada.

At that time, the Minister of Finance could find no solution to the problem.

But, feeling that elections are now in the offing, he suddenly finds, after four years of administration, that it might perhaps be wise to listen to and put into practice the suggestions made by the hon. member for Essex East.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the 7.5 per cent tax should be abolished, but unfortunately, it is a bit late to do so.

Now that the automobile industry has laid off a considerable number of workers; that the European car market has been organized on a solid basis throughout the country, it may be a little too late; it would surely have been easier and wiser to put those proposals in effect as soon as they were announced.

What about the pitiful situation of the textile industry in this country?

Not only Liberal members, but even Conservative have, for the last four years, urged the government to adopt economic measures to protect that industry.

What has the Conservative government done? They turned a deaf ear.

There was no known solution, no possible means. We were facing competition against which we could do nothing.

Then, all of a sudden, after four years, the Minister of Finance says he has found means to assist the textile industry, at the very moment it is dying.

I could also, Mr. Speaker, talk about the dollar problems.

While the Minister of Finance said two or three years ago that it was absolutely impossible to devaluate the Canadian dollar, because it would have created a terrible economic chaos, the same Minister of Finance after rejecting that suggestion during four years of administration comes out this year with a broad smile and tells us that it is wise to devaluate the Canadian dollar.

No wonder we are disappointed and that the people of Canada are also disappointed, profoundly disappointed with the budget.

We do not believe the Minister of Finance has the confidence of the people, after making, as he has, year in year out for four years, promises that he has not kept at any time or in any way.

Mr. Speaker, we are now faced with an intolerable situation. Our economic situation is far from being enviable. On the contrary, it deteriorates from day to day.

Therefore, I urge the Minister of Finance to cease claiming he has found the solution to this problem, when he fails to take the necessary steps to do so.

He has brought forward nothing that could help the Canadian economy.

All across the country, people were expecting a general federal election as early as next September.

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who entertain this view.

This government is a Tory government, an historically and fundamentally Conservative government.

The Hon. Mr. Borden clung to power as long as he could before being defeated. The Hon. Mr. Bennett extended his years of office as long as he could before being defeated.

This government will do just the same and will extend its administration until March or April 1963, when the people of Canada, after five years of suffering and enduring, will finally free the country from this lame administration that we now have had for four years.

What have you done, my Conservative friends, of those famous public works projects that you announced in all corners of the country? One billion dollars of public works. That was the promise the Prime Minister made everywhere in Canada.

What have you done, hon. gentlemen of the government? Absolutely nothing.

The government say that they want to solve the unemployment problem, but they do nothing to this end.

We, in the opposition, have submitted several suggestions to the government for several years now. Had the government been serious, they would have listened to us and now, instead of being in an unemployment period, in a period of uncertainty, and instead of experiencing an unhealthy economy, we would have restored the financial situation of this country and we would be living in happier years.

Mr. Speaker, we are still waiting for the Conservatives to keep the promises which were made, not only in my constituency, but in Chambly-Rouville and other ridings in that area, to the effect that if they were carried back to power the Richelieu seaway would perhaps be considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, four years have gone by and the Richelieu is still flowing past our shores. This government has done absolutely nothing in his respect.

Mr. Speaker, as I said and shall repeat every time I rise in this house, the unemployment problem in Canada will never be settled only by long term projects of national scope. The one means for remedying the present unemployment situation, and revitalizing and strengthening our economy, is to solve the problems of each district in the most beneficial way.

To my mind, the Richelieu seaway should have been considered as from 1958; the planning should have been submitted by engineers in 1959 and, in 1960, we should have been able to tell our people: We cannot proceed with the Richelieu seaway, for such and such a reason. On the other hand, if the project had been considered practical, we should have gone ahead and explained to the population why it could be carried out. But no, there again, we have seen the same utter sloth on the part of the government.

The Minister of Transport is still here tonight. I am trying to catch his eye to tell him how much the people of Quebec have been disappointed not only because of the Richelieu seaway, but in almost every field connected with his department. There has been no progress in the field of transport in the province of Quebec, since the present minister took over that department. He did less than nothing. There is a vacuum. The result is naught.

Well, Mr. Speaker, instead of coming to us with statements and promises for our part of the country, the minister should give us what we want, that is serious consideration of the Richelieu seaway. It is his responsibility to do so. And when he comes to the Queen Elizabeth hotel, in Montreal, to tell us that the project will not pay, I shall ask him once again, to prove it in this house and to our people.

Obviously, the minister smiles. It is very funny indeed. He does nothing and smiles. Well, let him smile while there is time, because, after the next general election, our friends will shed crocodile tears when they sit on this side of the house.

An hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) anything to say?

Mr. Johnson: The lad is nervous.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) is again interjecting. It is the only thing he can do properly. I should very much like to hear him discuss seriously and objectively the Richelieu waterway. In any event, I think he will have to discuss it with his constituents some day, and I am sure that when he does, four years too late, he will be given an extended leave of absence from the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I again ask the government to make a study of the Richelieu waterway project. Further, I repeat to the Minister of Finance that deepening the Richelieu is the only way to revitalize our area.

I also urge the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), who lives in our immediate area, to do his share and try to persuade the government to consider this great Richelieu scheme, a scheme which has been seriously considered by the governments of the states of New York and Vermont as well as the United States government. The scheme was also the subject of a serious study on the part of the chambers of commerce, the boards of trade and many well thinking people in our area.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, there are those who think that to revitalize the economy of a country, all you have to do is to make statements and promises. There are others who say: When things are bad, you must do as the Roman emperors: give the people bread and games. That is why some ministers of the crown take a lofty attitude with regard to this problem despite the fact that it is close at hand.

Mr. Speaker, I too wish to say to the house that the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance has been a disappointment to the entire Canadian population, because they need action which will yield immediate results.

Today, after four years of depression under a Conservative government, what will be the effect on the Canadian economy of the removal of the 7½ per cent excise tax on cars? None whatsoever. A citizen who can afford to buy a car priced at $3,200 will certainly not change his living standard if the price of the car is reduced to $3,000. Four years ago, however, when it was time to act, European cars were allowed to invade the Canadian market, thus contributing to the lay-off of thousands of workers by the Canadian automotive industry. We are now faced with a situation that was entirely created by the Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker, having studied the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, I am trying as you are to find something this government has done for the unemployed. I find not a single thing. What does the present government suggest for the unemployed? Not a single thing.

What solution is this government planning to put forward in the matter of federal-provincial relations? None whatever. What is the Conservative government planning to do to get us out of our difficulties? It calls upon its smiling Minister of Finance to propose a fifth deficit, which will amount to something like $1 billion, and tell the people of Canada: "Let's go into the red, and get around the problem that way".

Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have had enough of the deficits of the Minister of Finance. The people should be used to them because if we take a look at the past, we find that the last four deficits instead of helping the Canadian people have resulted in a shaky and dangerous economic situation. The next deficit will lead to a new period of inflation whose effects will start to be felt a few months hence. Conditions will then be worse than those facing us at this time and the government will say once again: "We were wrong; we thought that the recession was over and that the great Donald had found the solution".

But, again I say, this is a deficit that not only will reach the billion dollar mark, but within a year—and I shall be here to see it—the estimated billion dollar deficit will be $1½ if not $2 billion.

Mr. Speaker, with those members in this house who are of good faith, I repeat that the Conservative government has been a failure, and I remain convinced that this government will not call elections in the immediate future. Why? Because public opinion has been tested recently. One test was held last year and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Clermont) is here as a result. There was a further test last year. The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) is here as a witness. And this year, since the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm asked me, I shall say that the Liberal party, in the last four by-elections, has won four great victories of which we are proud because, first, in the constituency of Leeds, we have taken a stronghold away from the Conservative party.

Second, in Kings riding in Prince Edward Island, the Conservative majority was only 165, while in 1958 they had a majority of 1,134 votes.

In the constituency of Esquimalt-Saanich, the Conservative candidate had a majority of 769 votes, while his predecessor had a majority of 14,000 votes.

In the Restigouche-Madawaska riding, all the big guns of the Union Nationale party had been brought into action, but the victory was only a flop for the Conservatives, since the temporary member for Restigouche-Madawaska only received a majority of 960 votes, while his predecessor had secured a majority of 4,000 votes. The conclusion to be drawn is that the Liberals secured 44 per cent of the popular vote, and the Conservatives, 43 per cent.

Here is another conclusion: in 1958, in the Restigouche-Madawaska riding, the Conservative party had received 60 per cent of the vote, and that percentage is now brought down to 43 per cent, while the Liberals, who had then secured only 32 per cent of the vote, have now overtaken the Conservatives.

Hon. members of the Conservative party, we shall outride you, and soon there will be only three or four of you sitting on this side of the house to the extreme left of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, may I simply call it 10.30?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house leader could indicate what the business will be for the rest of this week, and of course we would appreciate it if the government has been able to make up its mind about next week.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the government would be happy to have the fullest co-operation from the other side of the house with regard to completing the business of the session, but no agreement has been reached with regard to that.

Tomorrow, if the house—which has shown considerable interest in the subject—would like to debate a bill, notice of which has been given in Votes and Proceedings, called an act respecting the Bank of Canada, it would be quite possible for the house to take first reading and then follow with second reading.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can disabuse the hon. gentleman at once. We should not have the slightest intention of relaxing the rules in any respect regarding that particular matter. The very suggestion that a question as important as this should be rushed through the house in this fashion is another evidence of the contempt of the government for the house.

Mr. Churchill: Well, it is a very short bill and the subject is one which is not unknown to the house. Tomorrow, then, we shall continue with the debate on the budget.

Mr. Pickersgill: And on Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: At this stage of the session I think it would be wiser to announce the business from day to day.

It being thirty three minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—FIFTH REPORT

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills in English and in French. I think hon. members would be interested to know that for the first time for any parliamentary committee a female clerk attended my committee yesterday. The bill considered had to do with the Canadian Girl Guides Association. The chairman at that time was the hon. and fair member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh). One might say that the suffragette movement had blossomed into fullest and fairest flower at that instant in our history.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—SIXTH, SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS

Sixth, seventh and eighth reports of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REPORT ON GENEVA CONFERENCE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I returned last night from attending the conference on the situation in Laos which, as hon. members know, has been going on in Geneva for about five weeks. I went back to Geneva to attend this conference having in mind four objectives. The first was to do whatever was possible to get the conference down to actual drafting. So far they have been having what we would describe as a debate on the speech from the throne, without any actual work being done on the drafting of documents. For example, I think it is essential that as quickly as possible they start drafting terms of reference for the international supervisory commission, and also declarations, one of neutrality which it is planned would be signed by the 13 nations, apart from Laos, attending the conference, and a second declaration to be signed by Laos when agreement is reached as to the government of that very unhappy country.

The second objective was to outline in broad terms Canadian views on the terms of reference for the truce supervisory commission. This commission, of course, is our main interest in the situation in Laos. It is because Canada is a member of that commission that she is attending this particular conference.

Then I had in mind also getting proper support for the truce supervisory commission in the way of more specific instructions and equipment.

Finally, I wanted to confer with the representatives of the other countries which are attending the conference. This I suggest is very important, because quite a bit can be accomplished by discussing the situation from time to time with all the other delegates no matter whether they are of our general point of view or not.

It might be helpful to those members of the house who are interested if the three statements which I made during my visit there could be printed as an appendix to Hansard. That would cut down the time required for me to make an adequate report to the house today.

With regard to the first objective, I am very hopeful that some time next week the conference will start to discuss in restricted session the terms of reference for the commission. The idea is that there should be perhaps two or three representatives of each country rather than the larger number who have been sitting in thus far, and that there will be discussions rather than a series of set speeches.

The plea for more support for the international commission met with quite wide approval from the other delegations. I made this plea on June 15. The following day the United States and France both submitted in writing to the co-chairmen of the conference, the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, offers of equipment. I should also like to have these offers printed, if I may.

The Soviet union as one of the co-chairmen must, of course, consent to any such support being given and Mr. Gromyko, the foreign minister, has been holding back on giving approval. He put forward the suggestion that the three member nations represented on the commission, India, Poland and Canada, should send messages to their commissioners in Laos asking if it would not be possible to get this equipment, particularly light airplanes and helicopters, from the Laotians themselves.

That seemed to me to be a very foolish idea. However, we agreed to send a message to Mr. Léon Mayrand, our Canadian commissioner in Laos, asking for his views about the possibility of hiring from the Laotians the equipment necessary for the commission to do its job. We had a reply on Monday, June 19, and I think the house would be interested in reading that reply. It sets out very clearly just what obstacles the commission is facing in Laos because of the failure of the co-chairmen to supply adequate equipment. Incidentally when I criticize the co-chairmen I am really criticizing the Soviet union, because all the way through the British have been prepared to have this equipment supplied but they alone cannot make the decision. It has to be a joint decision by the two co-chairmen. The Canadian reply from Laos was the only one which had been received when I left Geneva yesterday morning.

The day before yesterday I made a further statement dealing with the absolute necessity of supplying this equipment, and my statement was supported in a very helpful way by the representative of France and by Governor Averell Harriman, the representative of the United States, and by Right Hon. Malcolm Macdonald, the chairman of the British delegation, whose support was particularly important because he is one of the two co-chairmen of the conference.

In the meantime the three Laotian princes have been meeting in Zurich, Switzerland; Prince Boun Oum, premier of the government which has been recognized by the United States and Great Britain, Prince Souphanouvong, who is the head of the Pathet Lao and who is representing the communists, and Prince Souvanna Phouma, who is described as a neutralist. They apparently have been making some progress. There is an encouraging report this morning but it is in very general terms, and it would be unwise for the house to expect that any definite final agreement would be made among the three princes tomorrow, the next day or maybe for some time.

I am afraid that the Soviet union is not very anxious to have an effective commission in Laos. This is my judgment after listening to their remarks and noting their actions with regard to requests for equipment. One quite effective way of handicapping the commission is to fail to supply or to delay supplying the commission with what it needs in the way of equipment. That is not a very helpful process.

The task Canada has undertaken as a member of the truce supervisory commission is a very onerous one. The representatives of the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs in Laos are doing an excellent job under extremely difficult conditions. I think the work of the commission is exceedingly important. It might just be the means of preventing a third world war arising out of what is happening in that country in southeast Asia. In any event, the presence of the commission and the fact that the conference has been sitting in Geneva have, I am sure, greatly reduced the actual fighting in Laos. They have not stopped it altogether, but in my opinion there would have been much more fighting if the commission had not been set up and if the conference had not been held.

Canada will do what she can to help out. I am sure all hon. members of the house will support the Canadian delegation in their attempt to follow that course. We are very well represented. The chairman of our delegation is Chester A. Ronning, the Canadian high commissioner to India. He was born in China and speaks Chinese; in fact he attended school with one or two of the Chinese delegates, and is able to give great assistance in the deliberations at this conference. We also have Paul Bridle, our ambassador to Turkey, who served for a year as Canadian commissioner in Laos. A third member is Ralph Collins formally head of our far eastern division in Ottawa. Mr. Collins too was born in the Far East. We are also receiving excellent assistance from Brigadier George Leech of the Department of National Defence who has served on the Canadian commission for Viet Nam. These Canadians are working in Geneva in a situation which can in no sense be described as a holiday and, I believe, are rendering a great service to our country. I am glad to pay this tribute to them today.

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Essex East may I ask leave of the house to have printed as an appendix to Hansard the documents referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps the minister would now produce the documents. Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of documents above referred to, see appendix.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I express what every member of this house wishes me to express at this moment when I observe that once again we are glad to welcome the Secretary of State for External Affairs back from an important international conference. The fact that we have done so at least three times since January, during this session, indicates the interdependent character of the world in which we live and the importance of our country in the context of this contracted world.

We note with interest that the minister says he hopes there will be a drafting of the terms of reference of the international truce commission next week, and also that there will be some form of the kind of neutrality in the government of Laos which it is hoped to be able to achieve. The minister has cautioned us about being overenthusiastic about the statement of the three princes as reported in today's press. Nevertheless their statement indicates that some progress has been achieved toward some form of coalition. It is to be hoped that the kind of neutrality which will emerge will be an honest neutrality, not one that will represent a government that will play closer to the communist world than to the western world. We hope that it will be, in fact, as President Kennedy said, a neutral government. However, we have reasons for being concerned about the likelihood of this result in the future.

The minister should know that we fully support him in his desire to see that the international truce commission of which Canada is a member is given every protection and every assistance to maintain its security and render efficient its operations. However, we note with concern the statement of the minister that he is of the opinion that the Soviet union is not anxious to see an effective commission operate in Laos. This statement from the minister confirms our own apprehensions; but coming from him, with his knowledge of the situation, it gives us reason to be greatly concerned.

We can only hope that we shall be able to meet the reluctance of the Soviet union in this particular and that, to the extent that it is possible, we shall be able to provide conditions of relative peace in an area which, as he said, is so vital at this time if we are to avoid a conflict on a much wider front. If the Soviet union does not co-operate with the commission as one of the chairmen of that commission I hope that Canada as a member of the commission will not hesitate to say so and will not hesitate to take steps consistent with this reluctance of the Soviet union to give full effect to the terms of the commission.

May I finally say to the minister that while he was away dealing with the problems of peace and war, we were serenely engaged in this house with matters that were very peaceful.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I wish to associate our members with the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East with respect to all of us being pleased to see the minister return safely home again. On behalf of our members I wish to thank him for his immediate report to this house on his latest mission. In doing so he shows for this house and this parliament a respect which has not always been shown in the past under similar circumstances. We give him full marks for that courtesy and for his very fair and, in our opinion, objective report.

I was also very glad to see that the hon. gentleman had the various statements and documents attached to today's Hansard as an appendix. This makes it very much easier for us to read them carefully and digest fully the results of his mission and the report he has given the house. I am glad to hear that the pleas on the part of the commission for more support met with a good response. I noticed that on reading some of the papers. That is a good sign. It shows there is a moral force behind this mission from persons of good intentions and good will.

I was also interested in the hon. gentleman's report with respect to the signs of progress, should I say, toward co-operation among the three princes involved. We must remember when we are dealing with circumstances like these, particularly with questions related to the Far East, that these people do not move as quickly as we do. We have to exercise a lot of patience. They do not think quite as we do. While at times it may be frustrating, I think the minister takes the right point of view when he indicates that there is hope of progress and co-operation in time. That depends to a great extent on the attitude of the members of the commission.

I was interested in the hon. gentleman's comment to the effect that the presence and actions of the commission had reduced the hazards of fighting in that area. Well, that is a major accomplishment in the first instance. All we have to do is imagine what could have been the circumstances without that commission and without the effective contribution made by the Canadian members on that commission.

Members of this group wish to join with others who have spoken in paying tribute to the excellent service being performed by Canada's representatives on the commission and in the related work for Canada and for the world as a whole. We pay tribute to them for the way they are performing what, as everyone must recognize, is a trying task.

Proposed Legislation

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this bill is to provide that a vacancy in the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada shall arise upon its coming into force. It is a brief bill consisting of one clause, reading as follows:

The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should be prepared to proceed with this bill now if the house would give consent to doing so.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is not unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CLASSES OF LOANS, INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act to enlarge the classes of loans that may be made under the act so as to include therein all business enterprises without limitation as to the kind of business carried on; to increase the authorized capital of the bank from twenty-five million dollars to fifty million dollars; to increase the authorized borrowing authority of the bank to an amount not exceeding five times the aggregate amount of its paid-up capital and reserve fund; to enable the bank to make funds available in respect of transportation equipment by the purchase of equipment trust certificates; to enable the bank to acquire title to moveable property and to make such property available to a borrower under a conditional sales agreement or other arrangement under which the borrower has a right of redemption; to raise the limit on the aggregate amount of loans and other liabilities that exceed two hundred thousand dollars, from a maximum of seventy-five million dollars to a maximum of two hundred million dollars; and to make certain other changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Herridge.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask the right hon. gentleman if he was aware that Senator Courtemanche, according to his own evidence in Montreal yesterday, was acting as solicitor for a hospital receiving hospital grants at a time when he was a member of the government of Canada which was providing part of those grants.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As I said the other day, the government wants to secure the most definite and authentic information on this matter. Therefore a letter was sent on Saturday, June 17, by the Department of Justice to the chairman of the commission investigating this matter, asking that the government of Canada be provided as soon as possible with a copy of the transcript of evidence given the previous day, concerning Senator Courtemanche, together with a transcript of any further evidence which might be given in this matter.

That was last Saturday. To date no reply has been received. As soon as copies of the evidence are received the evidence will be carefully examined to the end that the proper course shall be taken. I am not going to deal with the matter on the basis of newspaper reports. The government wants the authentic evidence, and in order to ensure that the evidence shall be forthcoming the letter was directed to the chairman of the commission and a copy was sent to the deputy attorney general of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: Could I ask the Prime Minister whether he was aware that the secretary of state at the time was acting as solicitor for the hospital?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not aware of that at any time. As a matter of fact, as I said yesterday, following a course somewhat different from that which the last government followed we made absolutely sure that ministers—

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An interruption from the hon. gentleman is always so far removed from the facts. He is always searching for something, and some day I hope he will find it. We ensured, as far as it was possible to do, that all ministers should be disconnected in every way from directorship and the like.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Has the Prime Minister not asked his colleagues to refrain from active legal practice and the accepting of fees, along the same lines as the prohibition of directorships?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I seem to recollect that in the days when the hon. gentleman was a minister this matter was before the house—

Mr. Hellyer: Would the Prime Minister just answer the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Calm yourself.

Mr. Hellyer: Never mind the speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: During those days—

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely the Prime Minister is not entitled to make a speech in answer to a question.

Mr. Speaker: I think all hon. members appreciate that a debate does not take place at this time. We are limited to factual information and questions.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the Prime Minister not answer the question, which is a simple one, and tell the house whether he has asked his colleagues not to engage in active legal practice or accept fees?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman objected to the answer I was about to give. I am not going to pursue it, because he seemed to have something else in mind; therefore I think the matter had better rest.

INQUIRY AS TO TRANSPORTATION ARRANGEMENT FOR MEMBERS' FAMILIES

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Could he inform the house whether the wives and dependents of members will be able to secure passes on C.N.R. passenger trains after June 30, 1961?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following several requests submitted by my colleagues in the House of Commons, I got in touch with the presidents of the two main railways and they assured me that their companies would keep on issuing passes to wives and dependents of members of the house until one month after the end of the session.

THE BUDGET

REPORT THAT PRICE OF BREAD TO BE INCREASED

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Due to the fact that one of the first results and benefits to Canada on Tuesday's budget as announced in this morning's press by Mr. Joseph Conrad, president of General Bakeries Limited, is that the price of bread is to increase for all Canadians, can the minister advise the house whether he is now issuing instructions to let them eat cake?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the concluding words of the hon. lady's question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall not give the hon. lady the floor to repeat the question, which was not seeking information in the ordinary sense of the word but rather presenting a point of view.

CONSULTATION WITH MONETARY FUND ON EXCHANGE RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the house whether prior to the presentation of the budget any consultations were held with the officers of the international monetary fund with respect to the action proposed by Canada to affect the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canada's member on the executive board of the international monetary fund, Mr. Rasminsky, the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, was in Washington on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. I think he had some informal discussions to acquaint Mr. Jacobsson, the managing director of the international monetary fund, and perhaps some other members of the executive board who were there, with the nature of the proposals contained in the budget.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, my question was whether there were any consultations prior to the presentation of the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Rasminsky was there on Tuesday and Wednesday. I am not sure of the exact times that he talked to Mr. Jacobsson and others. It may well have been that some of these discussions were held sometime late on Tuesday.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question of the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the house whether he has used resources of the exchange fund to influence the value of the Canadian dollar since the presentation of his budget and, if so, to what extent the fund has been so used?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it has never been the practice in all the years the exchange fund has been in existence to disclose individual transactions at individual times such as the hon. member is now asking about. Whatever has been done in this respect has been done in accordance with the statement I made to the house on Tuesday evening.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OPERATION OF FLORENCE COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question with reference to his reply on June 19 concerning the request for an extension of the operation of the Florence colliery. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to make a further statement so the miners who are threatened with loss of employment on July 2 may know as soon as possible what action, if any, the government intends to take?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question I should like to say that we have a meeting scheduled for today after twelve o'clock noon with the representatives of district union No. 26 and the Florence local.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—PETITION FROM RENEWS RESPECTING HAND LINE OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Could the minister please advise the house whether he has received a petition from the fishermen of Renews, Newfoundland requesting that their ancient rights in respect to hand line operations be restored and that an area be reserved for hand line operations from July 1 to October 31 only each year?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have received such a petition as well as correspondence from various people in the area, including the local clergy. I might say that my colleague the Solicitor General has been of great assistance to me because of his local knowledge of that area which he represents. I have also received correspondence from Hon. Myles Murray, the representative of that area in the Newfoundland legislature. Meetings have been held between officials of my department and the fishermen concerned in an attempt to work out regulations which will be acceptable to the fishermen while at the same time not unduly inhibiting the trend toward more modern and efficient methods of catching fish.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ESTIMATES TO BE CONSIDERED ON SATURDAY, JUNE 24

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the house leader and ask him, for the convenience of members of the house as well as for the orderly conduct of the business of this house, whether he can indicate what estimates will be taken up tomorrow?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be more appropriate to make this announcement at the conclusion of today's business.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree that is the normal procedure, Mr. Speaker, but because tomorrow is Saturday and because of the indication the Prime Minister gave during the course of a former debate that Saturday would be as a rule devoted to estimates, I wonder whether the house leader could indicate now what those estimates are likely to be.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it would be easier to do so at the conclusion of the day's business, because negotiations are carried on during the course of the day. I have had suggestions from hon. members on the other side that the estimates which I proposed to be taken up on Saturday should not be taken up. In return I proposed that if the hon. members on the other side could give me some guarantee that something could be passed on Saturday, we might make a change. I suggest there is plenty of time to consider these matters during the next few hours.

AIR TRANSPORT

APPLICATION OF U.S. COMPANY TO OPERATE SERVICE INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. It has been reported that the Areo-Flight Service Incorporated of Minneapolis has applied to the Canadian air transport board for a licence to operate an air service into Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northwestern Ontario. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether a licence has been granted to this company?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that a licence has been requested. I am not quite sure of the point of origin of this route, though I think it is somewhere in Minnesota and from there to a point in Manitoba and then to western Ontario. I shall be in a position to let the hon. member know either tomorrow or Monday if a licence has been issued.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Have any objections to that application been made by Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is inquiring about matters presently before a board which has been charged with that responsibility, and it would be improper for the minister to intervene in those proceedings.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is in a position to tell us if conclusions have been reached by the foreign ministers regarding the form of the next forum for disarmament discussions; and is the minister in a position to add anything to the proposal made by Mr. Khrushchev that nuclear talks be integrated into the disarmament discussions?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite a tall order for me to add anything to suggestions made by Premier Khrushchev, as it is hard enough to find out what he is getting at without trying to help him out.

There is no meeting of four foreign ministers on the question of disarmament. What is going on is a conference between the United States, represented by Mr. McCloy, who is the head of their disarmament branch, and Mr. Zorin, representing the Soviet Union, who is a deputy foreign minister and permanent representative at the United Nations. They are discussing informally in Washington the type of forum in which disarmament negotiations could be resumed. They started to meet on June 19 and those talks are still going on. Therefore it is impossible for me to say what the decision will be. The plan was that disarmament negotiations proper should commence about August 1.

With regard to the test ban conference in Geneva it, too, is still in existence. The leading United States representative has been recalled to Washington for talks. It is true that Premier Khrushchev has suggested that those talks should be merged with the talks on general disarmament which are supposed to take place about August 1. I believe the United States has rejected that suggestion, and I do not know what will happen with regard to that particular three-nation conference in Geneva. The third country represented, of course, is the United Kingdom.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary. Since the practice in recent years has been to issue an interim payment, is the minister now in a position to inform the house whether the stabilization board intends to make an interim deficiency payment on eggs?

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I will draw this matter to the minister's attention.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, June 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, since I have only two minutes left of the time allotted to me—

Mr. Chevrier: Five minutes.

Mr. Dupuis: Five. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I still have five minutes at my disposal, I am pleased.

Since I have five minutes left of the time which was allotted to me yesterday, I should like to make a wish concerning our friends opposite. I hope that today they will rise in greater number than yesterday to defend the miserable budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Indeed, sir, last night's performance was not too impressive since only the Conservative members for Kingston (Mr. Allmark) and for Dorchester (Mr. Drouin) participated in the budget debate whereas on this side, the members for Grand Falls (Mr. Granger), Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) and I took the floor to discuss the budget we are now considering.

Or course, Mr. Speaker, I realize that this year just as last year, the budget has not provided much to satisfy the hopes of our friends on the government side. I can understand that they are disappointed, disenchanted, distressed, disillusioned, desperate and discouraged, but I ask them to change their attitude today, because when things go wrong, it is not good politics for a party to show it to the public.

I suggest that more of our Conservative friends should rise today and cover up their great disappointment. I would particularly ask the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay)—who, I am told, is quite dissatisfied with the budget—to forget these things, come into the house and be as talkative on the occasion of the budget debate as he is when he interrupts the speeches of members of the opposition.

(Text):

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke in the budget debate on January 16 last I made some remarks which I should like to quote. I refer to the last sentence of my remarks as reported at page 1095 of Hansard. I said in connection with the baby budget:

—I believe also that the different members of the cabinet should be helping the Minister of Finance in a department in which we have a continuing and chronic emergency.

The events which have taken place since that time would lead one to believe that there is something wrong with the Department of Finance. The minister has been convinced by somebody somewhere to change his thinking on interest rates. For some three years and half I have been telling this house that our interest rates are too high and that they were at the very root of our economic ills. In the windy and wordy budget speech the other night the Minister of Finance certainly gave lip service to this premise. I shall quote some of his words. At page 6645 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

To begin with, interest rates in Canada are out of line with those in the United States and some of the European capital-exporting countries.

This is something that we have been saying for at least three years and a half. I recall quoting the New York Times in the house three years ago to the effect that interest rates in Canada were out of line with those in the western free world. At one time I quoted the interest rates on Cuban bonds in New York, and at that time I said the Diefenbaker bonds were selling lower than those of the Batista government and certainly lower than those of the Castro revolutionary government in the first three months it was in office.

At page 46 of the budgetary papers there is a table showing the long term government bonds yields. It also shows the differential between interest rates in Canada and in the United States. At the time of the election in June, 1957 the differential was about one half of 1 per cent. Later, in the fall of 1957, this differential went down to, I would say, three eighths of 1 per cent. This table has not been so prepared as to give the exact figure, but I would say it is about three eighths of 1 per cent. After the conversion loan and after further financing the differential got up to around 1½ per cent. Since last year it has eased somewhat. It has again eased somewhat lately, and according to this table I would say it stands at about 1⅓ per cent today. I say that the actions of this government in handling our fiscal policy and in the management of our debt have brought this about. Further down on page 6645 the minister said:

High interest rates are a double drag, at times like these, on our economic activity and expansion.

Still further on the minister said:

Statistics indicating trends of interest rates in recent years in Canada and abroad are to be found in the white paper. These support the view that Canadian interest rates have grown out of harmony with those abroad . . .

That was not the story of the minister previously. As I said before, I have been bringing up this matter in the house for the last three and one half years but the minister has only seen the situation lately. He has only seen it after a good part of our debt has been built into a debt structure of long term non-callable bonds at high interest rates. In the meantime the provinces and the municipalities have assumed long term debts by way of bonds and debentures, and the taxpayers in the provinces and the municipalities will be paying these debts with high interest for years. Some of them will not mature for 30 years, and I am thinking particularly now of debentures on sewers.

High interest rates have also brought about stagnation in our economy. I could quote innumerable statements I have made in the past to the effect that high interest rates would increase taxes at all governmental levels, and we know they have done so. We on this side of the house said that high interest rates would increase the cost of living, and they have. We have said that high interest rates would increase the cost of production and therefore make us less competitive in the markets of the world, and this they have done. We have also said that high interest rates would attract foreign capital to this country in order to earn a higher yield on such capital and that this would contribute to a greater imbalance in our international payments. This too has been brought about. The budget attempts to correct the effects of high interest rates which the government itself has brought about.

As I have said, I think interest rates are basic to our economic well-being. When you remove from the budget the measures taken by the government to correct its former mistakes with respect to interest rates you have not got much left. I admit there are two or three things in the budget of which we approve. The first is the removal of the excise tax on automobiles. The hon. member for Essex East has often urged this, as have other members on this side of the house. I also want to thank the minister for giving some consideration to volunteer firemen. I think I was the only member of the house who brought up this matter at the time of consideration of the resolutions following the baby budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Many members spoke to me about that.

Mr. McMillan: At that time I asked the minister to exempt for income tax purposes at least $200 of the honorarium they receive. The minister has gone further and has set the amount at $300. I wish to thank the minister for that.

Mr. Hellyer: That is to allow for the inflation he expects.

Mr. McMillan: Third, there is the provision, which I think will help the tobacco growers, by which more tobacco may be included in cigarettes. I hope the tobacco growers of western Ontario will get some relief and will be able to sell more tobacco. But when you take away from the budget the measures it contains to correct the mistakes of the government with respect to interest rates and the three other provisions I have just mentioned, there is absolutely nothing left in it. The budget contains little to cure our economic ills, including the imbalance in international payments of which interest rates have been the principal cause.

I am glad to see the minister give lip service to lower interest rates, but giving lip service to lower interest rates is not going to bring them about. The ordinary taxpayer will continue to pay high government taxes and in many cases high interest payments on bonds for the rest of his life. The taxpayers will continue to pay high interest rates for their share of every new school, every new sidewalk, road or sewer. Every new home owner will be called upon to pay high interest rates for a good many years to come.

Unfortunately the lip service given by the minister is no solution to those of us who have been caught up in the payment of high interest rates. I am glad that at this late date the minister has had a change of heart. It is something like a death bed confession, his last chance before wrecking our economy. Until his repentance he was the high priest of high interest rates in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. McMillan: Why does he merit this appellation? In debt management, purely under the control of the minister and in no way the responsibility of the Bank of Canada, we have had the spectacle of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance appearing on radio and television and making statements in the press recommending that bondholders should take more interest on their bonds. They were told that it was in the national interest and was the patriotic thing to do.

I am referring, of course, to the conversion loan. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, on radio and television and through statements that appeared in the press, pleaded with and begged Canadians to convert their 3 per cent victory bonds into 4½ per cent conversion loan bonds. They not only begged them to do so but they also paid them to do so. They paid every thousand dollar bondholder who converted to take $45 interest each year instead of $30 each year. At that time it did not make any difference to them whether interest rates in Canada got out of line with those in the rest of the world. At that time it did not matter whether interest rates were a double drag on our economy. It did not matter then if there was an increase in the imbalance of payments. It did not matter whether they caused stagnation in our economy. What mattered then was that the minister should be in charge of the greatest financial transaction that ever took place in Canada.

The minister continually required more money. To cover his deficits he had to continue to raise more money, and this caused an upward pressure on interest rates. It was not until early last year, when the country learned that the minister was going to budget for a surplus, that interest rates eased. In addition, the minister devised gimmicks for the benefit of the wealthy friends of the government. The government devised ways and means to give its wealthy friends some extra interest taxwise.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Untrue.

Mr. McMillan: Deficit or no deficit, these people had to be looked after. When the government came to power in 1957 the average rate of interest on our debt stood at 2.98 per cent, slightly under 3 per cent. The minister and the Prime Minister in the bond conversion loan tried to get as many people as possible to increase that by 50 per cent, to change as many bonds as possible from 3 per cent victory bonds to 4½ per cent conversion loan bonds. For subsequent borrowings the minister paid much higher rates, as I said before, and the total interest payment on our debt has now increased by approximately 50 per cent. I suppose they have reached their goal and achieved their objective. Now comes the deathbed repentance.

By the end of this fiscal year the extra debt charges imposed on the taxpayers of Canada in the four years, including this year, will be $800 million. It is made up mostly of interest. The first time I or anyone in this country had any indication that the minister had a change of heart in connection with interest rates was on June 14 last, when something was brought up in connection with the resignation of Mr. Coyne. I would say that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance blazed a trail for high interest rates on our national debt. They have now attempted to cover up this fact by erecting a smokescreen. Heads must roll and so Mr. Coyne, governor of the Bank of Canada, is losing his head. It is quite within the realm of possibility that before long he will be blamed for the conversion loan.

Firing the governor and erecting a smokescreen will never conceal the damage the minister himself has caused. So much of our debt is built into high interest non-callable bonds. If money could be borrowed tomorrow at 3 per cent this government could do nothing about these bonds because they would not be callable. Therefore we could not reduce our interest on these bonds.

The former government, and I think a great many former governments, sold bonds that were callable so that in a low interest period these bonds might be called in, redeemed and reissued at a lower rate. I have always maintained that this government was a prisoner of its own mistake in that conversion loan. I predicted in this house that the government would never escape and it never will.

I predicted that it would grope around, and it has. I predicted that it would blame someone else, and it has. The government in terms of taxes has stamped itself on our country for a generation.

It is interesting to think of the capital projects that could have been undertaken with the $800 million of extra interest. For instance, that amount of money would have built two St. Lawrence seaway canals or five Welland canals, on the basis of the cost of constructing the latter canal at the time it was built. If capital works had been built the people would have had employment and something tangible they could look at, instead of being faced with increasingly high income tax rates. It would not be so bad if the $800 million could be paid and we could then be done with it, but that is not the case. That sum has gone to create new debt. This year, as in previous years, the government will not raise sufficient money to pay the interest on the $800 million, so we will continue as we have in the past, paying interest on the interest.

In discussing the budget the Minister of Finance often counters our criticism with the argument that we are bringing up the same old stuff. I would be the first to agree with the minister, because if we adhere closely to the budget we are indeed discussing the same old stuff. The minister does not vary the diet. He gives us bigger and bigger deficits and more and more debt. He increasingly demonstrates his ability to be further off the mark in his predictions in respect to budgetary figures. Fifteen months ago the minister reported that we would have a $12 million surplus for the last fiscal year. I predicted then that the deficit would be much more. In December the minister predicted that there would be a deficit of $286 million. At that time I said it could not help but be more. He came along in the last budget and said the deficit would be $345 million, I believe, and his prediction was off the mark by $1 million a day.

For the next fiscal year the minister predicts a deficit of $650 million. I cannot agree with that figure. In view of past experience I do not think anyone could say that the minister's prediction is likely to be at all close to the mark. I recall that the minister used to find fault with former Liberal ministers of finance because they were out in their budget predictions by approximately $50 million on the favourable side. I predict that the present minister will be out more than this amount on the unfavourable side of the budget. I should like to be wrong once in my predictions for the sake of the taxpayers of Canada, but this last budget has not changed our idea about the dismal Diefenbaker day. We are certainly going to continue to be confronted by a $2 million a day deficit.

When the former Liberal government left office in June of 1957 there was a surplus of $400,000 a day. Today the deficit in connection with extra interest alone is more than half a million dollars a day. In addition to this, when the former government left office there was approximately $900 million in the unemployment insurance fund and approximately $200 million in the defence equipment account.

What has happened? In order to conform to the needs of the various assessments of our economy made by the Minister of Finance the defence equipment account was soon raided and is now nonexistent. The unemployment insurance fund is almost bankrupt, containing at this time only approximately $65 million to meet a depletion of about $300 million a year. The daily deficit on overspending on current account has piled up to the point where it now reaches an enormous sum. After the budget it will stand at over $2.2 billion.

Considering the overspending on current account together with the depletion in government accounts, it will be seen that this represents an amount of more than $3.3 billion, a colossal sum. This is more than twice the cost of world war I between the call-up of troops in 1914 and demobilization in 1919. Since it came to office this government has indulged in overspending in an amount more than twice the cost of world war I during the period I mentioned. Canada had over 500,000 troops overseas in those years, yet in less time than the length of that war this government has found it possible to overspend more than double the cost of the war with little or nothing to show for it. We have heard much about the minister being expansive in his budget. He was expansive only in debt, not in tax cuts. We would not complain about tax cuts of sizeable proportions if they were designed to put people to work, but this amounts to only $65 million in this current fiscal year. The minister expects the budget proposals to cause a rise in our tax collections to offset the $65 million in tax cuts, yet he is predicting a deficit of $650 million this year as against a surplus of $12 million predicted in his last budget. I was interested in another halfhearted prediction of the minister to be found at page 6665 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> On the basis of the present situation and anticipated trends it is not unreasonable to expect that the current flows of revenue and expenditures will be approaching a balance by the end of 1962. Indeed, as our economy reaches high levels of employment, it is essential that the budget should achieve a balance, and that provision should be made for an orderly retirement of debt.

All I can say is that on two occasions the minister has attempted to predict the result of the budget for just three months ahead and he has been out by upwards of three quarters of a million dollars a day in those predictions. Last year, as I said, when he predicted ahead for 12 months he was out by about $1 million a day. How much is he going to be out when he starts to predict ahead for 18 months?

In speaking on the budget then I referred to the fact that some orderly reduction should take place in the value of our Canadian dollar, as I thought it would help exporters in the country. But at that time, as we all recall, the minister said it would cost too much to buy United States money in order to do this, that it would mean a considerable expenditure of money. The thinking on this matter by the minister has also somersaulted, just as it has done in connection with interest rates.

On Wednesday evening I was quite interested to note that the Conservative party here celebrated the fourth anniversary of their assumption of office and responsibility for the direction of the affairs of our country. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister and the members of the government on attaining four years of power. I could not, however, but feel uneasy that on the very day of this anniversary our dollar was plunging in the various markets of the world, and there was chaos in those markets. I do not mind admitting that I experienced some emotion on learning that branches of the various Canadian banks in such centres as Los Angeles, New York, London and Paris did not have enough confidence in the Canadian dollar to trade in it. I heard that statement over the radio and I have since read it in the press. What dealings took place in those centres were mostly between United States banks and British banks. I know this situation will clear away, but certainly there has been left some lack of confidence.

I was laughed at in this house when I predicted that unless this government changed its ways there would be some flight of capital from Canada. On August 10, 1960, as found at page 7914 of Hansard, I said this in the house:

> Two years ago I predicted these high interest rates. I am afraid that if the minister carries on as he has been there will be flight from the Canadian dollar.

Then I went on to say that I did not know how much more the Canadian taxpayer could take but that certainly, if the next two years were anything like the last two, we would see our currency depreciated. I should like to ask the members of this house what was going on in the last few days if it was not a flight from the Canadian dollar—a temporary flight, at least—in the various markets of the world. In fact I myself know some people who were hurrying to get their money out of Canada at that time, and trying to get the best deal they could in United States dollars.

I do not know whether this abrupt change or abrupt fall in the Canadian dollar has ever occurred previously. However, I appeal to the minister and to the government to have a more orderly change in the future. If it is desirable to have our money selling at some figure below par, I suggest that this should be done in an orderly way and not in the way in which it was done the other day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was bitterly disappointed in the budget speech presented the other day by the Minister of Finance. After hearing, as we did, his vociferous emotionalism and oratory about the coming expansionist budget, I feel certain that all of us in this house as well as the people of Canada were really looking forward to a militant, progressive, constructive budget outlining policies, legislation and action which would aid to a considerable extent in curing the ills which have beset our Canadian economy in the past and still beset it. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I was bitterly disappointed because I did not see that much looked for expansionist policy.

But perhaps of even greater importance is the fact that I find the presentation made by the minister frustrating and confusing. It could not be anything but frustrating and confusing because almost in toto it was a tour de force lasting for over two and a half hours and consisting of cliches and platitudes and repetitions of cliches and platitudes. It was not what I think the members of this house and the people of Canada had a right to expect, namely a clear explanation of the basic and fundamental economics underlying the proposals which he made. I myself found it difficult to understand the basic economics. I believe the Minister of Finance owes it to this house to present a picture of the fundamental economics in such a way that there will be an understanding of why he has brought in the proposals contained in his budget speech.

May I say here also that I have been most disappointed in the fact that we have not heard from some of the backbenchers on the government side of the house. I have taken it for granted that the Minister of Finance is a true believer in democratic methods and procedures and therefore that, in such an important matter as a budget, he would have taken all his backbenchers into his confidence and would have explained to them the economics of his proposals. If that procedure had been followed I would have thought the backbenchers would have an understanding of the economics and therefore, as one would gather from their applause for the Minister of Finance, would have been happy and proud to rise in their places and explain to the other backbenchers in this house and to their constituents the real and fundamental meaning of the economics of the budget.

I can only come to the conclusion that they also find the basic economics frustrating and confusing, and that the reason we have not heard from them is that they do not understand the matter and that it has not been explained to them. The situation is either that, Mr. Speaker, or the whip has really been cracked and they are under orders not to speak in the budget debate. As a matter of fact it is current in the corridors this morning that the whip has been cracked and that we shall not be hearing from the backbenchers. If that is so it is a peculiar expression of democratic procedure and a peculiar expression of Conservative back bench representation in this House of Commons. I hope we shall hear from some of them, because we should like some explanation.

It was interesting to note that when the Minister of Finance started he did not give us an analysis of the economic situation of Canada past and present, explaining from the position of government policy and administration what had gone wrong with our economy. No; it was something outside government, something outside Canada which had brought all these things to pass. Almost in his opening remarks the minister said, and I quote from page 6640 of Hansard:

> Last December in presenting to the house a supplementary budget, I explained that the rate of economic expansion in Europe had shown some hesitation and that the economic outlook in the United States and Canada, which had been most encouraging at the beginning of 1960, had rather unexpectedly reversed itself, resulting in a disappointing slow down during the last three quarters of 1960.

So the failure of the government to succeed in its operations in Canada was because of what had taken place in the United Kingdom, in Europe and in the United States. I think that is a weak way in which to begin an expansionist budget and to explain away the mistakes and fallacies of the present government. However, it was not very long before we found that the Minister of Finance had taken a second look. He put on his rosy glasses and told us that everything was going to be different in the future; because we also find on page 6640 these words attributed to the Minister of Finance:

> Expansion is expected to continue in western Europe and in our other important overseas markets. These welcome developments will make possible further increases in our exports, production, employment and incomes. Thus, an improvement in our situation could be expected to occur even if no further efforts were taken to stimulate our economy.

Thus not only have the government's failures in the past been blamed on what was taking place in foreign countries, but now Canada is going to reach a new heaven because of what is taking place in other countries. I think that is a ridiculous way in which to introduce a budget and upon which to base government policy. Of course we all hope this new vision is not just something seen through rosy hued glasses. We hope the situation which the minister outlined is going to come about. But if it is, Mr. Speaker, that has got to be related to government policy and proposals as outlined in the speech of the Minister of Finance. I think the minister owes it to the house and to the people of Canada to explain just how his policies related to these other countries are going to bring about the desired result.

His economics are indeed most strange. The minister almost completely ignores all the fears which have been growing as to what is likely to be the effect on Canadian exports when we relate them to the expansion and the fulfilment of the plans, policies and purposes of the inner six and the outer seven. That, I think, cannot be explained away by the minister in the course of a casual mention. Neither can we accept without explanation the contention that his policy is going to mean a greater expansion in the export field. I refer in particular to the United Kingdom, although all our export markets come into the situation. We have to recognize this, and I do not know why we completely close our eyes to it. If you are going to export you have to import. If you are going to export, the countries to which you export have got to have Canadian dollars, and to have Canadian dollars they have to be able to get their exports into our country.

When you have a policy of devaluation of the dollar it is true that on the surface that is undoubtedly going to assist our exports, but how is that going to be counterbalanced by the fact that we have to get Canadian dollars in order to pay for our purchases from the countries to which we export. We have to import from them in order that they may get the Canadian dollars for our exports. By the devaluation of the dollar we are without doubt, whether the minister wants to admit it or not, doing the same thing we would do by erecting higher tariff barriers. It means that we have to pay more dollars because our currency is being devalued.

I think it is stupid to talk, as the government is disposed to talk, about our rightful market in the United Kingdom, and to express our fears about the United Kingdom going in with the inner six; because we have to realize that Great Britain must think about her 48 million people, and that is her first concern; and that if we want to sell, as we do want to sell, more wheat or agricultural produce or lumber or pulp or paper or salmon or other fish to the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom has to be able in turn to export to Canada. Therefore we cannot consider in isolation the fact that the government policy of devaluing the dollar is going to help us with our exports. What is going to be the effect of the counterbalance if it is going to hurt us in regard to imports when we cannot get the Canadian dollars for the sale of our goods? Just what are the views of the minister on the counterbalance on the imbalance? What indeed? The minister did not tell us one word about that, and I say that is where he is being distinctly unfair. He only wants to show us one side of the picture, and if we are going to have a successful government and a successful policy we have to have both sides of the picture and we have to have a complete balance.

I do not think we have heard enough in the explanation given of the devaluation of the dollar as to what it is going to mean in Canada itself. As was pointed out in the question of the hon. member for Niagara Falls this morning, there is a certain impact which already has been felt.

An hon. Member: It was the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. Winch: No, I am referring to the question about eating cake. If the reports in the press are correct the price of wheat has gone up. Because the price of wheat has gone up the price of flour has gone up, and because the price of flour has gone up the bakers say the price of bread is going up. So we are already feeling an impact. Now how is it going to affect other fields, other imports which are basic necessities in Canada? Let us take just a few small items in use in every home every day, whether it be tea or coffee or cocoa or spices, all those things which we shall now have to pay for with a devalued dollar. I think we are entitled to a better picture of the economic survey and analysis made by the minister so we may know just what this will mean as far as the cost of living in Canada is concerned.

The minister is seeking to get the provinces and the municipalities to do more of their borrowing in Canada. That is a desirable objective. He hopes by his present policy to enable that money to be borrowed at lower interest rates. That is an objective with which we all agree, and we hope it saves the millions of dollars that the minister is looking for and anticipates. I should like to see this policy of economics carried all the way through, but the minister does not do that.

Of course we agree with the devaluation of the dollar and the stated objectives which we hope will follow, but what will be the cost on the other side of the picture, to the provinces and municipalities, which have to pay back hundreds of millions of dollars which they have borrowed in the United States and elsewhere, on the basis of that devaluated dollar? I suggest it will cost millions of dollars which the provinces and municipalities have not anticipated having to pay. How and to what extent is this going to be balanced? I suggest this involves some of the basic economics which have not been explained by the minister. I suggest that it is not fair to give only one side of the picture, and that to do so is to mislead the house and the people.

Mr. Speaker, as my time is moving on much faster than I anticipated I should like at this time to refer to one of the most important phases of the proposal of the Minister of Finance, which has not been referred to very much as yet. I refer to that portion of the minister's statement where he deals with dominion-provincial fiscal relations. I find his suggestion in this regard most disturbing. He has proposed that the tax rental system be discontinued on March 31, 1962. Mr. Speaker, I think I know something about this subject, because I was a member of the British Columbia legislature in 1941 when the first tax rental agreement was introduced. I was also there when this agreement was reaffirmed with changes five years later.

In 1941 the federal government asked the provinces of Canada to enter into a tax rental agreement. Why did the federal government do that? I suggest it was because of the necessity of the time for national planning and financing to meet the responsibilities of the national government in time of war. This necessity was recognized by the provinces at that time and they entered into agreements. During the years since the war these tax rental agreements have not been discontinued because they involve good principles and methods, and because of the basic thought that because this was good policy during wartime it might be good policy during peacetime, as there is still a need for planning and the solving of problems which must be overcome.

I felt that this was a good arrangement when it was first made and I still feel it is a good arrangement. I believe the new proposals set forth by the Minister of Finance in his budget represent a backward step on a downward path in respect to federal-provincial fiscal relations, and that it cannot lead anywhere but to bickering and difficulties.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is just what it does away with.

Mr. Winch: I feel this policy represents a serious departure from the path of progress which was laid out in 1941 toward national minimum standards. I suggest this new policy will renew the complications, duplications and inefficiencies in the taxation field. To use terms that were used at the time of the federal-provincial conference, the adoption of this new policy will mean a return to the tax jungles of the 1930's.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize the fact that I feel strongly about this matter of not only inviting but almost demanding that the provinces impose their own income taxes, because this policy is fraught with danger. I think we should recognize that without clear-cut leadership from Ottawa there is every possibility of a return, as I said earlier, to the tax jungles of the 1930's. Perhaps the most important result to the federal government will be the loss of its vestige of control over the use of income taxation as a means of combating unemployment and for stimulating economic growth. I can only envisage this proposal as an indication that from this time on the provinces and every individual in this country will be on their own.

I suggest all we have to do, Mr. Speaker, is to look back over the statements of the provincial premiers at the time of the October conferences, and the editorials which appeared in newspapers across this country at the time. I should like very briefly to refer to several of those editorials. In the Ottawa Citizen of October 26, 1960 there appeared an article under the heading, "Diefenbaker's Tax Proposals Stun Premiers". In the Leader Post of October 26, 1960 there appeared an article under the heading "Sask. Will Oppose Proposal on Taxes". That article reads in part as follows:

> Premier T. C. Douglas has branded Prime Minister Diefenbaker's proposal to end the tax rental formula as a surrender to the wealthiest provinces and a "complete betrayal" of the others.

The Toronto Star of October 27, 1960, included an article under the heading "P.M.

Offers Return to Tax Jungle". Let me quote two paragraphs from this article as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker proposes to abandon the present tax rental agreements with the provinces and let them levy their own income, corporation and succession taxes.
> This would be a double step backward. It would tend toward the Canadian tax jungle of the 1930's and it might easily promote national disunity by setting province against province, region against region.

I should also like to make reference to a statement made by the premier of Quebec as reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 27, 1960, which appears in an article under the heading "Lesage Opposes Proposal". Also in that same newspaper appeared an article written by Arthur Blakely under the heading "Premiers Reject Diefenbaker's 'Suggestion' ".

The last article to which I wish to refer in order to give the broad editorial picture of that time appeared in the Toronto Star of October 27, 1960, written by John Bird, a very eminent member of our press gallery, under the heading "Dief 'Turns Clock Back 20 Years' ". That article in part reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker's proposals to end tax-rental agreements, putting the clock back 20 years, have virtually united the provinces in opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate how strongly I feel in regard to this matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations and agreements, mostly because of one statement contained in the minister's budget speech as found on page 6655 of Hansard of June 20, 1961, which reads as follows:

> In short, it was proposed that the provinces would reassume their constitutional rights and responsibilities to impose and vary their tax levies as they saw fit.

I think that is the key to the minister's statement; he wants to return the constitutional rights and responsibilities to the provinces. I suggest that is entirely different, and an about face, to statements as I recall them made by the Prime Minister when he spoke in Massey hall during the 1957 election campaign. He said then that the provinces and municipalities could not discharge their constitutional responsibilities. Great as were the men and great as was their thinking at the time of confederation, they could not possibly conceive of the development of Canada and the development of new responsibilities of federal, provincial and municipal governments. The fathers of confederation had no idea of the development of Canadian democracy, whereby people looked to government as a right for health services, old age pensions, mothers' allowances, family allowances and unemployment insurance.

I suggest that this proposal of the government in this realm of federal-provincial fiscal relations, with a return of constitutional responsibilities to the provinces, is unfortunately an intervention in that section of the British North America Act which deals with property and civil rights, which means basically employment and all those other social benefits which I have mentioned. I suggest a serious mistake is being made here, because the result will be that those social benefits, which were not contemplated at the time by the fathers of confederation, will disappear because the residual power will now rest in the hands of the provinces.

Despite the interpretation of governments or courts I say that is wrong. The residual power should belong to and be a responsibility of, the federal government, and there is a section which can place it there. I say it is absolutely impossible for the municipal and provincial governments to accept these new responsibilities because of the limit on their taxation powers. I say it is absolutely impossible to have a national minimum across Canada on account of the difference in the wealth, in the resources and in the productivity of the provinces. Surely we have to have that in effect in legislation and in policy if we are all going to be Canadian citizens. I say, sir, that the government is throwing all this overboard by returning to the procedures in existence prior to 1941. In particular, of course, this can be applied to that vast problem of unemployment.

I remember reading not long ago a statement of the premier of one of the provinces in which he outlined this feeling—and I agree with him—that widespread unemployment is obviously a problem in which all members of government share a common concern, but the predominant responsibility of the national government to launch corrective measures cannot be denied. It is the national government alone that possesses the strategic control over fiscal policy, and foreign trade, and the constitutional powers and financial resources which must be thrown into the battle against unemployment at all times.

Sir, this matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations is one of the most important things that could come before the members of this House of Commons. It is a matter which strikes home deeply to every citizen of Canada. Certainly it strikes home deeply in so far as the provincial and municipal governments are concerned. I say, sir, this government is letting down the people and the provincial and municipal governments in setting the clock back in not only the proposals but in the demand that I understand has been made by this government, by the Prime Minister, upon the provinces that they shall have their—I think the term is "acceptance"—in by the end of September of this year. The word

"acceptance" may not be quite right, but I do know that on one of the releases the month of September was given as the time for the reply by the various provinces. We do know from the press that questions have been sent to the government regarding the working out of some of the details and problems.

I do not think this new plan is in the best interests of Canada. I do not think it will work. If the government insists on going ahead with it I believe that after a trial period of a year or two we shall have to return to something different and something more along the line of the five-year agreements that have been in effect now since 1941, which the government have said are going to end on March 2 of next year.

I know the government has said it will work out a plan whereby it will collect these taxes. That is so typical and is hemmed in by restrictions, particularly the one which is referred to on page 6656 of Hansard where it is said that the federal government will take care of the collection provided the provincial tax base is identical with the federal tax base at all times. If the federal government is going to collect only if the provincial tax base is identical with that of the federal government I do not quite see how the minister is returning their constitutional powers to them. If the tax base is not identical at all times, then we are going to have a duplication in the collection of income and corporation tax.

Sir, I notice I am just within a minute of my time being up. I say this entire matter of the budget is important. I have had time to outline only two aspects. First, we have not had an explanation of the basic economics and we have not had that trial balance with what appears to be good and what can have a serious inimical effect on the other side of the picture. I think we are entitled to that. I think we must know that if we are to have a full understanding of this budget.

As I conclude the last half of my remarks may I say I believe this matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations and agreements is of such a serious nature that before the government proceeds as it has now outlined it should take a second comprehensive and exhaustive look at what it is doing; otherwise it may be endangering the true meaning of federalism and Canadianism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): I will give the floor to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) after the luncheon recess. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Winch.]

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I sit in this seat because there died on December 7, 1960, Hayden Stanton, a man greatly respected in Leeds and I believe by everyone with whom he ever came in contact. Hayden Stanton had the honour of representing my historic riding as a result of being elected in 1953 and re-elected in 1957 and 1958. What may not be so well known to members of the house is that before that time Hayden Stanton had a distinguished career in municipal government. He was loved by our people. I know he was loved in parliament, and I know that my presence in this house comes as something of a disappointment to an overwhelming group of representatives from different ridings in Canada. All I can say, sir, is that according to my lights I shall be as faithful to my convictions as I know my good and respected friend, Hayden Stanton, was for so long to his.

I must thank every member of the house for the chivalry with which I was received in this chamber just a few days ago. I walked up the aisle with something of a gasp in my throat. It reminded me of another vivid moment in my life when I was assisted by friends to look through a porthole of the Lady Nelson as we approached the city of Halifax and looking through wet snowflakes I had something of the same feeling that I had in joining this company of ladies and gentlemen.

It was a dramatic day on June 14, 1961, for many other reasons. We heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) make an important statement respecting a senior servant of the government, Mr. Coyne. This came rather as a surprise because I think all of us who live anywhere near Ottawa had come to believe that there was a rather intimate relationship between these two gentlemen, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the bank. On December 9, 1960, the Montreal Gazette carried this story from Ottawa:

> Regarding the "sweeping indictment" of James Coyne by seventeen university economists, Mr. Fleming said he is at a loss to know their grounds... However, Canada is a free country and university economists have as much right as anyone to express their views on current matters.

I do not, of course, intend to dilate on the merits of this particular matter which has actually been so disturbing to so many people for so long. We could not understand public utterances and silence from the treasury side but we understand it now. An article which appeared in the Financial Post of June 17,

1961, under the heading, "The Nation's Business", speaks of the big fight and refers to the serious blows to the public service. The article has this to say in part:

> ... the wisdom and efficiency of our governments depend on the calibre of our top public servants and on their candor and self-confidence ... Hence the beheading of a very senior servant of the government like Coyne is a profound cause for concern. The effect on the very important group of senior public servants not yet decapitated will be very serious.

If this were a single isolated event we would wipe it away, but within recent recollection we have sustained other serious losses to the public service such as the loss of: Hector McKinnon, chairman of the tariff board, Clarence Shepard, 47 years of age, chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners, George McIvor, chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board, Davidson Dunton, 49 years of age, chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C., Ernest Bushnell of the C.B.C., Mr. Nicholson, 57, commissioner of the R.C.M.P., Mitchell Sharp, deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce, William Buchanan of the tariff board, Alan H. Jarvis, 46 years of age, in his prime, director of the national art gallery, Charles Gavsie, St. Lawrence seaway, Jean Lessard, St. Lawrence seaway—

Mr. Ricard: Don't come into Quebec and talk that way.

Mr. Matheson: —General Worthington, civil defence, and now in these last few days we have been hearing repercussions with respect to Donald Gordon. Again, without referring particularly to the merits of that or any other issue, all I can say is that in this country we can scarcely afford the wastage of any human resource, particularly human resources with this kind of intellectual quality.

We on this side believe and, indeed, I think it is believed throughout the whole house, that there is not one human being in Canada that we can waste. This is as important in the case of some senior civil servants and, indeed, perhaps more so, as in the case of the dreadful wastage that there has been among the youth in this country.

Mr. Grafftey: We do not see any youth in the opposition.

Mr. Matheson: Figures indicate that in 1960 the average number of unemployed males between the ages of 20 and 35 was 153,000, or 24 brigade groups of young men with hope, with determination and with purpose in their lives who were doing nothing in 1960, and this, Mr. Speaker, is 18 per cent above the figure for 1959.

To touch again on the matter of the bank and the Minister of Finance, it is difficult to address oneself to the merits as we have been permitted to hear only one side. However, I should like to refer to an article in the Economic Journal, being the quarterly journal of the Royal Economic Society. The editors were J. M. Keynes and T. H. McGregor. The article was printed in March, 1934. This goes back a long way, but let me read a few words set out in this learned article by a man esteemed by all banking authorities and a well known student of this subject, Dr. Clifford A. Curtis. The paragraph to which I should like to refer appears at page 54:

> There can be no question that it is the duty of the central bank to stand out against the pressure of governmental policies which the bank believes to be injurious to the public good. But, if a government decides that a certain monetary policy—using the term in its broad sense—is desirable, and if it is prepared to follow it at all costs and to be responsible to the public for it, then it must be, under a democratic scheme of government, the duty of the central bank to carry out this policy. In an extreme case, the bank may appeal to the sovereignty of the people by making the matter at stake a public issue between it and the government. Such a possibility, however remote, is bound to exercise some restraint upon even headstrong administrations.

The fact, Mr. Speaker, that such an issue has developed is a crisis in Canada. The reasons for it are, perhaps, not as important as the fact that this particular thing has happened. I come to this house with great respect for all members of this house, and particularly those gentlemen who adorn the treasury benches. We know the Minister of Finance as a man of scholarship in the law, hardworking, dedicated, of an exemplary character, and so on. I believe that when the minister presented his budget in June of 1957, he meant exactly what he said. I refer to an article in the Toronto Star of June 26, 1957. This article bears the headline "Fleming's First Budget 'Tremendous Challenge' ", and reads in part as follows:

> But Mr. Fleming says firmly that there will be a balanced budget.

I think that the distinguished minister intended precisely that. I compare that with the type of newspaper clipping we read today. The Toronto Telegram says:

> In a startling reversal of his past position, Mr. Fleming has devalued the dollar.

The Montreal Star says:

> Mr. Fleming predicts only a below average rise in gross national product. Our deficit in the current fiscal year will be a whopper.

The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph says:

> Budget provisions pave road for more inflation.

We heard in detail something of the explanation of this in the speech given yesterday by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I should like, in the few minutes that are available to me, Mr. Speaker, to try to address myself to some of the things referred to in this budget. I would say this, that the minister can be characterized as an expansionist nationalist, whereas Mr. Coyne can probably be described as a restrictionist nationalist. Probably the only safe course at the present time is for Canada to pursue a policy that is more internationalist. I put to you, sir, that the minister puts faith in exchange manipulation. The word "manipulation" is entirely appropriate to what is happening, dealing with the symptom rather than the economic problem, thinking that by manipulation of the symptom he somehow or other is going to be able to change the course of economic fortunes in this country.

I think we can credit the fact, in the light of the minister's explanation during his appearance on television, that he wishes to frighten capital so that a change will occur immediately. This is an extraordinary development. His course on the import side is obviously restrictionist; it could have no other connotation. Indeed the hon. gentleman's policy as outlined in the budget, so far as exchange is concerned, is just as restrictive as Mr. Coyne's policy is with respect to tariffs. What are some of the foreseeable results of such a policy? It certainly is going to increase the cost of consumer goods. This morning we heard about increased bread prices, and other increases will rapidly follow. Increases in the cost of machinery will be another result. It does mean that, in fact, there will be a drag on new investment in Canada. The minister has explained to this house that this exchange manipulation may provide something in the nature of a stimulus to exports. However, this is exceedingly uncertain because many of our important exports in this country are exports which do not respond very rapidly to price changes. It does seem, according to the best economic advice available, that a good many of our markets in the United States are to large buyers who need our products and are going to take these products in spite of a slight price variation. There will be a response in price very quickly by Canadian exporters who, regardless of the kindly advice and warnings of the minister, will take advantage of conditions. The result of this will certainly be to move export and all prices up, to give larger profits where there have been adequate profits before. What possible advantage will flow from this? The ultimate results will be higher costs for the Canadian people.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is another very sinister aspect to this particular budget. This budget represents protection through depreciation. Some expansion is expected unless other countries catch on and retaliate. All we have to do is look back at the financial history of France and the United States, and particularly the morass into which Europe got itself in certain periods in the past, to realize how frightfully dangerous this course may be.

What about the international monetary fund? To what extent has Canada actually kept faith, to what extent is she now living up to her own exemplary record in the financial field? Moreover, such protection as is being afforded to certain people through this depreciation factor really means, if we analyse it at all, that Canadians hereafter must pay more for goods produced.

We are presently presented this choice, Mr. Speaker, in terms of achieving full employment. We can make the economy more efficient, and I submit that this budget does not do that, and does not address itself in any way to that problem. Alternatively, we can subsidize marginal industry by accepting a lower standard and that is the course of this particular administration. In so far as the exchange factor in this budget is concerned, certainly exchange depreciation rapidly destroys the competitive factor, the one thing on which Canadians should surely have concentrated their ingenuity in the last months and years. The exchange manipulation does not increase efficiency by one iota.

Let us look at it from another standpoint entirely. Up to now we have had a free exchange rate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has referred recently to his advocacy of private enterprise. Before this budget we have had a free exchange rate. What does that mean? It means an exchange rate determined by the play of day to day forces in the market—in the longer run by the position of our balance of payments. What about the alternatives, the fixed exchange rate which Canada enjoyed during the period from 1939 to 1950? This could work with certain advantages. A fixed exchange rate does give the trading community certainty about the rate. However, this government has given Canada neither. It has given Canada, if I may use the expression in a parliamentary sense, a bastard rate flexible but subject to political manipulation.

Now the minister gives us a manipulated rate influenced by market, by official action, that is the bank, and by the indecisiveness of the government itself. We have compounded on the natural laws of supply and demand the economic influence of the bank and the political influence of the government.

I put it to this house in earnestness that this is a dangerous and damaging thing to the future of this country.

How does the minister propose to "manipulate" the rate in the manner and to the extent he believes to be desirable? By the process of going into the market and buying United States dollars for which we need cash. Where are we going to get cash when we have an administration that, by its budget now, has piled up interest charges alone of something of the order of $200 million a year? Where are we going to go for the moneys that are going to be necessary to go into the market and buy these United States dollars? I submit that we have two alternatives. We are either going to borrow more or we are going to print more and neither is a very happy choice. We have to do one or the other.

I submit that this is an irresponsible act in another respect. We have had a policy declared with no action. What is the likely result of this announced policy? I submit that one of the first things we can look for is sharply increased United States investment in Canada—which I always thought was one of the things which the ministry side were very much against—but not United States investment in the sense of the past, not the establishment of some new industry and the earnest desire to build up, not speculative or risk taking at all, but rather such things as Americans buying Canadian homes, buying Canadian established businesses, buying what is already making a profit, buying stocks and so on and shares in Canada.

Can we not fairly say that the only result of this course—that is the Coyne-Fleming controversy—is victory for neither? No matter what the facts are, no matter what is presented to this house, there can be victory for no one. There can be only loss to all of Canada. When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is being interviewed on television and elsewhere is being asked the question, "What would you do", I think there is only one proper answer. "No one else ever would have got into such a box." Have we ever heard of a situation in Canada where the head of the bank and the head of a ministry have worked so very badly together? Is this not part of a pattern—the decapitation policy of this government? Have we not seen this pattern develop with the loss of many extremely able people in Canada who were compelled to quit or who were fired?

This administration first came into power with tremendous fanfare. When we analyse the policy of the Prime Minister of Canada we find that he came into power in Canada with an approach that historically has had a tremendous popular appeal. It was nationalism. Nationalism was the key note of this great victory of the government in 1958; "the call for a greater Canadianism" appeared in full page ads across the country. In the Toronto Daily Star the Prime Minister is reported as promising:

> Probe of United States domination in Canadian firms.

In the Ottawa Journal he is reported to have pledged himself to:

> Canada's fight to control her own affairs.

The Globe and Mail weekly carried the headline:

> Won't take dictation: P.M.

This was the approach of this particular government, a very popular approach. I wonder whether this approach is not shown now more demonstrably than ever before by this unilateral monetary step which must be sharply resented and which will bring retaliation from other countries with which we have had happy and profitable relations in the past.

As my time runs out I think it would be wrong not to address myself more positively to the growth of Canada. I can only do so in a word but I would put to the house this submission. The thing that we should be aiming at now and exploring zealously and courageously is the extent to which Canada can truly become more competitive, not less competitive, in the international field.

There are one or two things about this budget that I like. I am greatly pleased about proposed portable pensions. I think it was the parliamentary secretary who said that this may be more important than perhaps anything else, and I agree with him. Surely this is something that can be a basis by which we can use and constantly upgrade human talents in this country and establish a program whereby no man or woman, however young or however old, is useless. Surely this can be a basis, conjoined with other things such as bold technical training and retraining whereby we can actually move rapidly towards a skilled society, one in which we are unafraid to meet competition from any source. We know what has happened in other countries. We know of the great developments in Germany under Ludwig Erhart. At page 33 of his book called "Prosperity Through Competition" we find this paragraph:

> The foreign trade policy which we are pursuing, in spite of much criticism over the past nine months, is based on the conviction that our economic task—the employment and maintenance of over 12 million more people than before the war—cannot be carried through, but must founder in a cul de sac unless we create more air in this manner... Above all we must not try to achieve an apparent success through increasingly watering down our money——which has at last become stable and thus move towards inflation. In that way we would steal imperceptibly the money of those who have saved. That would be the most damnable method which could be conceived.

Something we in Canada are doing right now.

Surely this is the type of policy we need in Canada, and I think the Globe and Mail of March 15, 1961 summarizes this neatly when it says:

What is needed is a better economic climate in Canada—a climate that will encourage development, ingenuity, buying and selling; a climate that will stimulate competition by making competition worth while.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I live along the upper St. Lawrence, in Brockville, the island city.

When I was young, I used to live in the picturesque port city of Quebec and sometimes I went sailing on the St. Lawrence at the point where the salt water begins.

Canada must be like its great river fearing neither depths nor vast expanses, working in close co-operation with all countries of the world, not only in the cultural field but also in the economic field.

We shall no more succeed in retaining the waters of the St. Lawrence than we shall be able to stop the development of our country, by trying to cut it off from the rest of the world through certain protectionist measures.

(Text):

I see that my time has almost expired Mr. Speaker, I thank the members of the house for their kind attention. It seems to me that if we are serious about this business of really using enterprise as the stimulus to move forward, we must be concerned about the extent to which we really mean what we say. In closing I quote from Canadian Insurance of May, 1961, where their opening editorial comment states this:

History records that no nation or empire has survived when 50 per cent of the people's income went to support the government and Canada is only 10 per cent short of that fateful margin.

All of us must take this as a warning and start to think in terms of real growth, of real development, of truly building a much larger gross national product. Only in this way, I earnestly submit, can we hope to achieve nobler goals in terms of social security and achieve genuine material progress for our people.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the main theme of this budget is the minister's belief that the measures which he presented and proposed will create new opportunity for all Canadian producers. He has undoubtedly come up with at least three suggestions which have long been advanced by members of the opposition. During the past three years I have tried on various occasions to direct the attention of the government to the benefits which would result to the automobile industry from the elimination of the 7½ per cent excise tax, and I am happy to see that this tax has at last been removed. I wish to put on record, from the pages of Hansard, some of the observations I have made on the subject dating back to 1958. As reported at page 1862 of Hansard for that year, I said, and I quote:

I submit that the presence of this 7½ per cent tax on passenger cars is a threat to the steady employment of thousands of Canadians. I am convinced that its removal would provide more jobs and more steady employment than any measure the government has so far introduced in an effort to reduce unemployment. This is a serious handicap to have hanging over an industry so vital to the economic well being of Canada. The excise tax creates instability in this major industry upon which so many people from coast to coast are entirely dependent for their livelihood.

I wonder if hon. members realize that one in every seven persons in the entire labour force of Canada is employed in the automobile industry, exclusive of service stations dispensing products necessary for the operation of motor vehicles. In other words this tax creates a situation of instability for this large group of Canadians.

Automobiles are taxed in so many ways on both a federal and provincial basis that it would require a lengthy computation by a battery of so-called mechanical brains to find out just how much of the cost of a car is accounted for by taxes.

Again, speaking in the same year on the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act, I said as reported at page 2864:

Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that this bill does not meet with the approval of what I believe is the overwhelming majority of the Canadian people who fully expected the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles—

Then I proceeded to move the following amendment:

That this bill be not read a second time until further consideration has been given to the repeal or reduction of the excise tax on motor cars.

Of course, the massive majority supporting the government defeated the amendment as was to have been expected.

Then, on April 14 of the following year, I made the following statement to be found at page 2694 of Hansard:

Does the minister realize that today the motorist is by far the most heavily taxed individual in Canada? If he does he has not shown any regard for the benefits that would result from the removal of this tax which, in addition to giving a little well-earned relief to the prospective new car owner, would stimulate sales and create more jobs not only in the automobile plants but in the iron ore pits, the coal mines, the nickel mines and the aluminum plants which are now in the doldrums, the textile industries and dozens of suppliers of materials too numerous to mention.

In 1960, during the tax act debate I again brought up the matter in these words:

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance what has already been repeated in this house over and over again, namely the 7½ per cent tax on automobiles, the presence of which is discriminatory, in addition to being a threat to the already shaky employment situation in the industry.

On March 10, 1961, on the orders of the day I asked the minister the following question:

It arises out of the 3 per cent sales tax imposed by the Frost government of Ontario which would increase the retail delivery cost of passenger cars already burdened by a federal 11 per cent sales tax and a 7½ per cent excise tax. Can the minister inform the house whether consideration is being given to the elimination or reduction of the excise tax on automobiles?

After several interjections by hon. members, the minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the government will continue as in the past to try to undo all the harm that was done to that industry and many others by the former administration.

I do not think the reply given by the minister succeeded in impressing anyone. It certainly did not impress me.

Again, speaking on the excise tax, I had this to say as reported at page 2912:

Relief from the excise tax on passenger cars is needed to help the Canadian motor car manufacturing industry combat the increasing sales of European cars, and would permit the continued growth of the Canadian passenger car manufacturing plants. But, Mr. Speaker, over and above all I have said with regard to the facts and the figures, the excise tax is discriminatory because the automobile is the only major consumer article still subject to special taxation, and I submit to the minister that a re-examination of this provision should be made without undue delay looking to the elimination of this unwarranted tax.

Notwithstanding opinions to the contrary, I have been a consistent advocate of lowering the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to that of the United States dollar because I have felt this would have the effect of removing the disadvantages with which Canadian manufacturers and producers have to contend in the export of goods to other countries.

Speaking in the debate on the speech from the throne in 1960 as reported at page 232 of Hansard I said:

Our region derives a great deal of its development and prosperity from the products of its forests. We are a great centre of pulp and paper manufacturing, 95 per cent of which is being exported to the United States, and the same can be said about the rich iron ore of Steep Rock iron mines, which within five years will ship eight to nine million tons of ore annually valued at $100 million to our neighbour to the south.

This, of course, sounds good but the fact that our Canadian dollar sells at a premium of approximately 5 to 6 per cent over the United States dollar makes Canadian pulp and paper, especially, more expensive and we are faced with keen competition from other countries in this market which has always been looked upon as our own preserve. The crux of the question is that we cannot afford the luxury of maintaining the price of the dollar above that of the United States. To have the most valuable dollar in the world may be a source of great Canadian pride, but unfortunately if it is going to remain high it will have the effect of reducing income from sales which are made, and encourage Canadian purchases of products of other countries.

To bring the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar is, I believe, one of the very first objectives of this government. Nearly three quarters of a billion dollars worth of iron ore is being sold annually to the United States and approximately a quarter of a million is sold to other countries.

If we were to consider trade alone, our dollar would be worth 95 cents and not $1.05 in terms of United States dollar value, because of our trade deficit. What keeps our dollar high, as every one knows, is the inflow of fresh investments and the borrowing of our provincial and municipal governments along with private corporations. According to official figures, United States capital in Canada represents about 52 per cent of total investment in manufacturing, mining, oil and gas. It can be and has been said that we are purchasing our prosperity by giving title to our resources to outsiders.

In the budget speech of that year at page 2673 of Hansard the minister made this observation:

There is a related question upon which I should like to dwell for a moment. This is the question of our exchange rate. The external price of our Canadian dollar has been high for eight years now and is currently running about 5 per cent above the United States dollar...

Apart from the economic objections to such policies it would be a very difficult matter to work out effective technical means of control. Even then the controls would not be effective unless the objective were one which commanded the broad public support which is necessary for general compliance. In other words we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

When I rose to speak on that occasion I said this, as found at page 2915 of Hansard:

With that statement the minister is attempting to give this question an air of finality which should not be raised now or ever, at least until the government will decide when it will be appropriate for further review. The minister contended that the inflow of foreign capital was responsible for the premium on the Canadian dollar, but said nothing about the borrowing in the United States by provincial governments and municipalities and private corporations, a procedure which many would agree to have been chiefly the result of poor financial management. It is a statement which does not take into consideration the artificial value of the dollar which in reality, having regard to its true value in relation to our trade deficit, should be worth only 95 cents instead of the $1.05 in United States dollars. I think the truth of the matter can be found in the suggestion that the Canadian dollar is presently being manipulated by a few international financiers.

The artificial value of our dollar is damaging our tourist industry to the tune of millions of dollars. It has severely handicapped northwestern Ontario major industries, pulp and paper and forest products, and the iron ore from Steep Rock iron mines. I submit to the minister that he would render Canada an excellent service if he would reconsider the question in the light of what parity of our dollar with that of the United States would mean to our export trade and to the development of Canada.

Speaking on the baby budget on January 24, 1961, as reported at page 1382 of Hansard of that date again I referred to the subject of the premium on the Canadian dollar:

The minister had nothing to say about the premium on the Canadian dollar. It is true that it is now at near par with the United States dollar. However, a stabilization of the rate of exchange for the Canadian dollar should be considered now. It should have been done a long time ago.

The apparent advantage of the premium has actually been a problem which interfered with the stimulation of export trade. I directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the house during the trade commissioners' conference in Ottawa. I asked whether the high priced Canadian dollar had been discussed. I was more than mildly surprised to receive a negative reply from the minister whose responsibility it is to promote exports.

I venture to say that the minister of the newly created Department of Forestry—to whom I wish to express my congratulations upon his appointment, and also my best wishes—will not find it difficult to agree that the premium on the Canadian dollar has been a definite detriment to the forest industries, which are substantial in the economy of our nation. Were it not for a healthy pulp and paper business northwestern Ontario would be economically insolvent. I need not remind the minister that practically one third of our annual total exports is represented by pulp and paper, lumber and other forest products.

It is no secret, therefore, that in respect to lowering the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar I am in agreement with the program.

The plan of portable pensions merits the support of every hon. member in this house. Speaking on the vesting of pension rights, a subject which was introduced by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) on May 24, 1960, I had this to say as reported at page 4208 of Hansard of that date:

Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the discussion of this very important subject. I was interested in hearing the Minister of Finance state that portable pensions are not a matter of federal jurisdiction. I maintain, however, that the federal government has some responsibility in the matter of pensions and the provision of a general pension plan acceptable in every part of Canada. If that is the case, then it has got to be a federal proposition and not merely a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

One of the major problems facing workers in industry today is the difficulty of men over 40 getting another job if for some reason their previous job comes to an end. As everyone knows, the acceleration of technological change has hit the hardest at older workers who have been displaced by machines. Many of these displaced workers were participants in pension schemes of all kinds, as intimated by the Minister of Finance, but their prospects for security are threatened through loss of employment. As a result, people 45 years of age and over find it extremely difficult to get a job in industries that have their own pension plans which in many instances preclude the hiring of men and women over 40. The only fair solution to this problem, and it is a serious problem, is a measure or method, call it what you will, which would permit an employee to change his job without affecting his pension plan.

[Mr. Badanai.]

On March 16, 1961, as reported in Hansard at page 3033, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) if he knew of a statement made by an official of his department to the effect that legislation on portable pensions would be introduced in the near future. The minister replied that he had been informed that the statement had no reference to federal legislation, but dealt only with the possibility of provincial legislation.

These and similar observations have been placed on the record by me regarding these three subjects, which should indicate that these desirable measures were not hatched in the fertile brain of the Minister of Finance who, after much prodding, came to the conclusion that suggestions made by members of the opposition have merit, after all. I will give him credit for a belated acknowledgment of their worth.

I also appreciate the minister's concern for the tobacco grower who he is going to help by allowing a fatter cigarette without an increase in tax. However, while he was thinking of cigarette smokers, I am surprised he did not give consideration to the users of soft drinks, chocolate products and toilet goods, because these commodities are of general universal consumption as are fruit and meats.

A budget designed to expand the Canadian economy should certainly contain a proposal for a municipal development bank from which municipalities could borrow for essential projects on long term and at rates of interest close to those which the federal government pays. This is, among other things, one of the striking omissions of this budget. The absence of such a fund has forced municipalities to borrow heavily in the United States money market to finance their local improvements, and these municipalities will have to repay their debts in United States funds which, with the devaluation of the dollar, will mean a substantial loss to them. Both these measures, the lowering of the value of the Canadian dollar and the establishment of a loan fund to help municipalities, should have been undertaken at least three or four years ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why not five or six years ago?

Mr. Badanai: The failure of the government to implement much earlier these recommendations which were made in this house over and over again, at least since I have been in the house—I am not concerned with what happened years ago; I am concerned only with the past three years since I was elected to this parliament—has been a contributing factor to unemployment and has served to retard the recovery of the economy

The idea of establishing some kind of a national institution to facilitate municipal borrowing has been put before the government on numerous occasions. The municipalities are asking for access to capital funds at costs within their capacity to pay. In their importance as basic community needs many local improvements are of equal priority with those of the senior government. It would be only fair to enable municipal governments to have the same advantages as senior governments in respect of the capital market, and the only effective way to accomplish this desirable equity is to establish a municipal development fund or bank, call it what you will, to assist the municipalities, with the co-operation of the provinces, in borrowing for their needs.

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities favours a federal agency which could be named the municipal development bank, the main function of which would be to purchase the bonds of a municipality subject to the approval of the province. The terms of such loans to the municipal governments would be as favourable as possible, consistent with the cost of the federal government's own borrowing. This would not eliminate the private investor who would still participate in municipal, financing, either by sharing in the initial underwriting or by purchasing bonds from the bank. A federal government guarantee of such securities would be as sound in principle as the federal government's guarantee of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I wish to submit another good reason for such a municipal loan bank within the jurisdiction of the federal government. The federal government has a triple role to play in co-ordinating capital expenditures, public and private, which come within the framework of the national economy as a whole. Such co-ordination would ensure a condition of steady growth and stability. At present I doubt whether the government can clearly see, let alone co-ordinate, the capital expenditures of the three levels of government. Over and above any other consideration, such a bank would certainly facilitate borrowing within Canada for Canadian needs. It would, therefore, be a positive means of implementing the federal government's policy of encouraging more reliance upon domestic savings.

The establishment of such a fund or bank would also remove the frustration and obstacles to development; it would give a sharp incentive to the forward planning of growth and redevelopment. It would also help to keep in each urban area a planned capital development program which, if implemented, would provide work and satisfaction in seeing the fulfilment of community needs.

At the lakehead we have a lakehead planning board, with a full-time capable planning engineer, whose plans are awaiting capital to transform the lakehead cities into a co-ordinated unit which would have the sure effect of attracting new industries and more people. I ask the minister to consider the suggestion of establishing such a bank at the earliest opportune time.

The Bladen royal commission report contains a recommendation which would have been of doubtful value in my opinion, had the government implemented it in the budget. I am referring to the 10 per cent duty on British cars which the commission has recommended. Today the United Kingdom is more and more under pressure to divert her trade to the European community. Such a tariff proposal would be just another obstacle to our maintaining our trade relations with Britain. If Britain chooses to join the European economic community we should then lose no time in allying ourselves with the same bloc. After all, Britain buys in round figures $1 billion worth of commodities in Canada, while our purchases in that country do not give Britain a favourable trade balance. These are factors—

Mr. Pugh: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Badanai: Let me finish. At the conclusion of my remarks I will answer any question the hon. member wishes to ask.

These are factors which command the attention of the government to a degree which has seldom been necessary in the past. In this budget the Minister of Finance has endeavoured to create the impression that he is providing Canada with a planned deficit in order to stimulate the economy. In reality the deficit that the minister will incur this year will be the result of an increase in expenditures based on departmental estimates that were drawn up as early as September of last year, and which had very little to do with the recession or its cure because unfortunately at that time the government did not recognize that the economy was suffering from a recession which caused wholesale unemployment.

In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, this budget can only be assessed in terms of whether or not it contains solutions to three of Canada's principal economic problems, first, unemployment; second, balance of payments; and, third, economic growth.

With regard to the solution of the unemployment problem, there is little in the budget to tackle effectively this basic trouble. There is little or no support for the vocational retraining program established recently on a federal-provincial basis.

The Minister of Finance cannot put everything in his budget, but at the present time it is almost inexcusable to overlook support for a program upon which the government has placed so much emphasis. One might even wonder how sincere the government is in its sponsorship of this vocational retraining program when in the budget it grants tax relief to volunteer firemen but nothing is granted by way of tax concessions to those who undertake the vocational retraining program which is being done largely on a voluntary basis, or for that matter to those who are trying to educate themselves or their children at their own expense.

With regard to tax concessions granted in the budget for research, there will be little increase in the amount of research done by Canadian firms. A more positive incentive must be provided. If research is to be effectively stimulated something like a double tax credit will have to be given for expenditures for research.

The minister proposes to raise the tariff on textiles coming into Canada. These will come largely from Britain, Japan, India and Italy with which usually we have a favourable balance of trade.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Pugh: The hon. gentleman said he would permit a question at the conclusion of his remarks. May I ask it now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the consent of the house it may be put.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Pugh: My question relates to the imbalance of trade with the United Kingdom. The hon. member said that exports from Britain to Canada were far greater than our exports to that country.

Mr. Badanai: No, it was the other way around. Our exports to Britain are greater than our imports from Britain.

Mr. Pugh: Yes, that is correct as to the total figure. Has the hon. member the figure for per capita trade with the United Kingdom and is he aware that it is greatly in excess of the per capita trade with Canada?

Mr. Badanai: The hon. member has asked a question that I should try to—

Mr. Robichaud: Take it as notice and answer in due course.

Mr. Badanai: Great Britain has approximately 50 million people and Canada has about 18 million. If you wish to establish that figure, all you have to do is to use your pen or pencil and you will have it right away.

Mr. Pugh: Would the hon. member answer the question? Is he aware that exports per capita from Canada are far in excess of imports from the United Kingdom on a per capita basis?

Mr. Badanai: I presume that some members on the government side will undoubtedly take part in this debate and I sincerely trust that the hon. member who has asked me this question will make a speech before the end of the debate. I think it would be in the interests of all concerned for as many members as possible to rise from their seats and speak on the budget.

Mr. Ricard: They would sound much better than your speech.

Mr. Badanai: Inasmuch as I have been asked these questions, I should like to quote from an editorial in the Fort William Times-Journal of Wednesday, June 21, which seems to sum up the general reaction to the budget in these words:

> No doubt a host of Canadians feel disappointed with the budget brought down in the House of Commons last evening. Finance minister Fleming may have provided the right nourishment for an ailing economy. But the menu is nothing like the fare which many had led themselves to expect.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to look around the house to see whether the friends of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would rise at last to extol his budget and explain how beneficial were the provisions announced therein, according to him.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we shall begin by having some order here, and if hon. members do not want to listen, let them go out. They did not speak last night. There was not a single Conservative member who rose to compliment or defend the Minister of Finance. They left him high and dry, and he is quite small.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Sherbrooke spoke.

Mr. Bourget: I hope I did not insult the minister when I said that he is quite small, because I did not say it with any bad intent.

Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday night, we heard the Minister of Finance make his budget speech. It was the fifth budget of the Conservative administration and the second one for this fiscal year. He wanted—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was the first for this fiscal year.

Mr. Bourget: I am sorry, the minister is right, it was the second in the fiscal year 1960-1961. Anyway, the minister took three hours to make that speech which, according to him should pull the Canadian economy out of its present stagnation. Well, after all the fuss of the last few weeks and the unusual delay in explaining the government's financial policies, the Canadian people, as I said last Tuesday night on television, was expecting a sensational budget. However, all the sensation contained in that budget was a deficit which will certainly this year exceed $700 million. The minister himself predicts that the deficit will be between $600 and $700 million but if we take the inaccuracy of his former predictions into account, we might easily expect a deficit varying between $700 million and $1 billion, an amount which is a far cry from the promises made by the Prime Minister at a press conference in Saskatoon on May 27, 1957, when he stated that the Progressive Conservative government would fulfil all its promises and reduce unnecessary taxes while balancing his budget.

And now, does the minister contradict this? Did the Prime Minister not say these words in Saskatoon?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was a good speech.

Mr. Bourget: It now becomes evident, Mr. Speaker, more particularly after this fifth budget speech, that the Conservative government, in this field as in all others, has proved itself incompetent. Far from having succeeded, even on a single occasion, in balancing revenues and expenditures. It has the sad distinction of having reached a peacetime high in this respect for the last five years. The total of its five consecutive deficits reaches the phenomenal figure of more than $2 billion. That deficit—

(Text):

Mr. McGee: Did you hear your leader on the radio last night? He approves of a deficit.

Mr. Bourget: The aggregate deficit incurred since 1957 exceeds $2 billion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A deficit of $2 billion this year?

Mr. Bourget: Since 1957 the total deficit under a Conservative administration has reached a figure of over $2 billion. That is the budgetary deficit.

(Translation):

This record breaking deficit of $650 million which is forecast for the current fiscal year will bring the Canadian taxpayers no general income tax reduction nor will it cut down substantially the extremely high level of unemployment.

In fact, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance did not foresee more than a 3 per cent rise in the national income, that is only a little better than in 1960, which was a recession year. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I read an article which was published in the Wednesday, June 21 issue of the Le Soleil. I should like to quote a paragraph from that article:

> Mr. Fleming's speech mentions imports and exports. It also deals with several other important matters. It is based mainly on the expectation of an increase in the national product and income, but does not include anything likely to bring about an increase greater that could normally be expected. Indeed, it is a document lacking in dynamism. Short of a miracle happening from the outside, Canada must be content to mark time while seeing its national debt increase without being able to do anything about it.

That article gives us an idea of what independent people think of the present budget and of the results that can be expected from it.

At the outset of his remarks last Tuesday night, the Minister of Finance mentioned that every budget he has introduced since the Conservative party came into power was intended to answer current financial and fiscal problems. He added that this budget is designed to meet the present needs and difficulties of our country. "Flexibility, he said, has been the keynote of our financial policy in these four years."

Well, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that besides having visions, the Conservative party now has delusions.

Indeed, one does not have to be an expert to understand that the measures enacted by the Conservative party since 1957, far from answering present problems, have only contributed to cause an economic stagnation.

After having been in power for four years, it seems obvious that the Conservative government is unable to correct the situation.

In June 1957 and March 1958, the people of Canada no doubt thought that they had elected people who could better look after the country's economy. Now, let us take a quick glance at what happened since the Diefenbaker team took over the administration.

Before I proceed, however, I think I should remind the house that when things are going badly in some sector of the economy, the Conservatives never miss a chance to imply that all that is due to the legacy we left them. What legacy did we leave them in June 1957?

A $260 million surplus. A national debt reduced by $2.5 billion. An unemployment insurance fund of more than $900 million. Trade agreements with the United States from which the Canadian uranium industry was deriving revenues of $300 million.

In October 1957, according to statistical reports, only 3.4 per cent of the labour force was unemployed.

As a matter of fact, when the Liberals handed over the administration, the nation's business was in good order and Canada's prestige abroad was very high. Today, after four years of Conservative administration, what is the situation?

I said a moment ago that, under the last year of the Liberal administration, there was a surplus of $260 million, and that, from 1946 to 1957, we had succeeded in reducing the debt by $2.5 billion.

Well, let us see what use was made of such a legacy. During the 1957 fall session, the Diefenbaker government, foreseeing undoubtedly the general election of March 1958, reduced taxes by a total of $204 million and increased social security payments—excepting naturally family allowances—by an amount of $115 or $120 million. But subsequently, that is in the April 1959 budget, the people of Canada were soon to find out that the Prime Minister had forgotten his promises for that year, taxes were increased by $352 million. Moreover, contributions from the workers to the unemployment insurance fund were raised 30 to 50 per cent, which meant a further tax increase of $75 million. If we add this amount to the $352 million mentioned earlier, we find that taxes which were reduced in 1957 by $204 million, were increased in 1959 by $427 million.

In short, that means that the tax reductions granted in December 1957 did not last very long and that we had to pay a high price for the increases in social security payments.

We would have had a right to expect that those new taxes would ensure subsequent balanced budgets; but far from it, all the budgets submitted by the Tory government since 1957, far from being balanced budgets, showed deficits totalling over $2 billion.

Deficits are a tradition with the Tories as is well known. Since confederation, that is since 1867, in all the years that they were in power, and that means 43 years, there were only four years when the Conservatives succeeded in bringing down a surplus budget.

Should I also remind the hon. members of the colossal mistake made by this Conservative administration when in September 1958 it launched its famous conversion loan of $5.6 billion, the effects of which are still with us and the result of which has been to upset our whole economy.

We all remember that only a few months after this loan operation, the bonds lost from 12 to 18 points in value, with heavy losses for those who had to sell unmatured bonds. We remember also that money became tighter, which sent interest rates to an unprecedented level and deprived our industrialists, especially the smaller ones, as well as our businessmen of the funds required for modernization and development.

Our municipalities and school boards were also strongly affected by that situation, because when they were in need of money to carry out works that were absolutely necessary, they had to pay an interest rate which was often higher than 7.5 per cent. Needless to add that such an increase in interest rates meant for all our citizens an increase in municipal and school taxes for years to come. And, incidentally, do you know that since the Conservatives have been in power in Ottawa, the increase in the debt interest only has now reached more than $556 million?

It seems to me those arguments should suffice to show that the fiscal policy of the Conservatives has been a fiasco.

Have the results achieved by the Diefenbaker government been better in the field of federal-provincial relations? We still recall the promises made by the Prime Minister in that connection, among others, the one he made at St. Patrice de Beaurivage, in the constituency of my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. O'Hurley), on May 30, 1957, which is as follows:

> Everyone admits that the relations between Ottawa and the provinces are bad and that they are unsatisfactory to both provincial governments and municipalities. The federal government is rich, but the provinces and the municipalities are poor and cannot go on assuming their obligations.
> To summarize the attitude of our party, I repeat what I said when I opened the election campaign; we guarantee the provinces and municipalities a greater share of the tax dollar. We shall thus provide the provincial governments with the possibility of fulfilling their important constitutional responsibilities and of promoting the development of our natural resources.

Now, what has happened since then? Are the provinces and municipalities in a better financial position? Is it easier for them today to discharge their important constitutional responsibilities?

I say no, because at the fiscal conference last February, the government greatly disappointed most of the provinces. The federal government consented to very minor concessions in the field of the personal income tax. All it makes a pretence of giving the provinces in direct taxation it takes back immediately by changing the basis of equalization payments. Thus is sabotaged the formula for a fair redistribution of the national revenue the St. Laurent government had developed and called equalization.

After the last fiscal conference of February, the province of Quebec realized that there is nothing it can gain with the new proposals, that it will proportionally get nothing more than it did under the last agreement.

After the marvellous promises of the Conservatives in the elections of 1957 and 1958, our provinces were not expecting such a stab in the back. Therefore, the Conservative government must be held responsible for the unfavourable position in which it places the provinces as regards their future expansion.

I have here a statement made by the late premier of the province of Quebec, Hon. Paul Sauve, who had this to say in the fall of 1959, in a speech to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association:

> We have reached the limit and unless there is a more equitable distribution of fields of taxation between Ottawa and the provinces, there is nothing left to be done. If the federal authorities do not realize that in 1962, I cannot see—

That was a speech by the then premier of Quebec, who was not a Liberal:

> If the federal authorities do not realize that in 1962, I cannot see how confederation can continue to operate.

Neither must we forget, that, because of its numerous deficits and its many loans, the government runs the risk of dangerously exhausting sources of credit where the provinces and municipalities can find the capital they need.

It is therefore a mistake to contend that these new agreements will help the provinces to expand and develop.

Let us now look at the results of those steps taken by the Conservative government with regard to employment.

I said earlier today that in October 1957, 3.4 per cent of the entire labour force was unemployed. Yet it can be remembered how the Conservatives, when they were sitting on this side of the house, criticized the Liberal government of the day. Well, if we take the trouble to look into the figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics, we find that the yearly average number of unemployed under Liberal administration was as follows:

In 1953, 3 per cent; in 1954, 4.6 per cent; in 1955, 4.4 per cent; in 1956, 3.4 per cent.

Let us now take a look at the statistics under the Conservative administration. I shall skip 1957, because the government was Liberal for one half of that year and Conservative during the other half:

In 1958, 7.1 per cent; in 1959, 6 per cent; in 1960, 7 per cent.

It can, therefore, clearly be seen that under the Conservatives unemployment has considerably increased. Yet, people still remember the famous statement of the Prime Minister who said, "no one will suffer as long as I am Prime Minister".

Well, again in this field, and especially in this one, the Conservatives have failed to find the required solutions to this situation, because at no time since they have come to power have we seen so many unemployed in this country.

In February this year, Mr. Speaker, there were 727,000 unemployed Canadians, or about 11.2 per cent of the total labour force. The government now seems to find some satisfaction in saying there are only 457,000 unemployed. They do not need much to be comforted, for it must be realized that this figure of 457,000 represents 7 per cent of this country's labour force, as well as 38,000 more than at this time last year.

The most deplorable thing is that the Prime Minister and his ministers have been denying during all these last few years that such a situation was abnormal. They merely said that that situation would disappear with the snow or with the coming of spring.

The only measure, I must make haste, Mr. Speaker, the only measure which was adopted to remedy the situation was the establishment of a winter works program which called for a federal contribution of only 12 per cent, the rest being assumed by the provinces and the municipalities. Perhaps the government will decide to put into practice the "bread and games" plan suggested by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) or perhaps will they say, as they did before, that it is now up to employers and labourers to solve the problem because apparently the government has taken all the steps they feel they can take.

In short, that is a very sad inventory of the Conservative administration during the last four years.

The Minister of Finance has stated that the budget he has just presented is an expansionist budget. It is indeed an expansionist budget if, by that, he means that it increases the deficits we have had since the present government took power in 1957.

This is what he said to justify his deficit:

(Text):

In times like the present, a substantial budget deficit can promote economic expansion, with more jobs and better living standards for many thousands of Canadians.

(Translation):

In recent years, as I said a moment ago, we have had huge deficits. Hon. members will agree that in spite of that we have had a record number of unemployed and alarming spells of depression.

Since December 1957, Mr. Speaker, we have become used to hearing the Minister of Finance make optimistic predictions in the high sounding statements of his budget speeches. But at the end of the fiscal year, we always found that the government's financial proposals contained in the budget had in fact restricted our economic activities and had been utterly inadequate as far as increasing the production and volume of employment was concerned, as required for our expansion.

The speech delivered Tuesday night is only slightly different from the others. This is why it is a disappointment to the great majority of the Canadian people, and it can be concluded from the silence of our hon. friends on the government side that they are also disappointed with the deficit.

Mr. Pigeon: May I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I have always been willing to answer questions, but considering that since last night hon. members opposite did not have the courage to rise in order to defend their own budget, they have no right to ask questions.

Mr. Pigeon: You are a coward. You are a coward just like your leader.

[Mr. Bourget.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Bourget: Let the dead rise.

Some hon. Members: Silence, please.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): It is very interesting to hear this exchange, Mr. Speaker, and also to note that the Conservatives must now make their contributions by way of questions to the opposition. This seems to me to be a surprising way of presenting contributions to any budget debate.

Mr. Pigeon: We shall show by our vote.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Peters: We have all watched what has happened during the past few months and it is very seldom that the backbenchers call a vote which the cabinet does not stand up and demand first. So we do not even get their opinion by the vote. They are probably getting to be better sheep than the Liberals were who preceded them in following the leaders.

Mr. Habel: We were not.

Mr. Peters: Maybe you were not, but that was the suggestion made at various times.

I think the Canadian people must have been very unhappy after this budget was presented. For days and days they had listened to an argument between Mr. Coyne as head of the Bank of Canada and the hon. member for Eglinton as Minister of Finance. They had heard them carry on a duel by letter and by remote control. They had come to the conclusion, I am sure, after the day long debate which took place in this house, that there was a difference of opinion. However, after listening to the minister's two and a half hour performance the other night I think the Canadian public came to the conclusion that there was very little difference in the positions taken by those two men. This is as it should be, since they are both Conservative economic advisers trained in very much the same school.

Ever since 1957 the Canadian public has been faced with an increasing amount of deficit budgeting. Previously, many Conservatives—and I am sure the minister himself was one of them—had felt that a budget in order to be a satisfactory budget should at least be balanced, and that the only reason for a deficit was the need to overcome some definite national emergency. I believe the Canadian people held the view that the only reason for incurring a deficit, either in government finances or in their own personal finances, was when a need arose to acquire something urgently for which it was neither convenient nor possible to pay immediately; in any case, there was some reason that argued against saving the money in advance. I believe that during the war, especially, the Canadian people were willing to see large deficit budgets introduced because they knew exactly why such budgets were necessary. After listening to the minister speak for two and a half hours the other night I believe many Canadians are going to wonder just what this particular deficit is for.

It seems to me that if a worker got into the habit of going down to the finance company at the end of the week and borrowing $10 to pay his grocery bill and the other current expenses of his household it would not be long before the finance company would begin to take a serious view of his carrying on on that basis. Certainly there are credit unions—and I think it is true that credit unions probably take more interest in the welfare of their borrowers than do some other agencies—which would call the borrower in after making a few loans of this type and suggest to him that it would be to his advantage to borrow money only when he intended to use it to solve a particular problem. I think the Canadian people would go along with a deficit budget if the government could show that they are planning to spend more money than is immediately available to them only for the purpose of dealing with the economic recession and embarking on an employment program for Canadian citizens. But I believe we must look at this budget very closely if we are to find any evidence that either of these problems is being tackled with sufficient imagination and energy.

I think the country will also be concerned about the statements which the minister made about the relation of our economy to conditions in the United Kingdom, the United States and some other countries in Europe. He said these nations are experiencing an upturn in their economy and that this in turn will be reflected to the benefit of the Canadian people. This is probably true but it is certainly no justification for incurring a deficit in this country. That deficit is not helping us to solve our particular problem.

The C.C.F. party moved an amendment which stated in part:

—and this house regrets that adequate consideration has not been given and the government has failed to undertake social and economic planning necessary to stimulate the economy, provide full employment, and give an adequate level of social security by such specific measures as:

1. Raising basic exemptions under the Income Tax Act.
2. Increasing old age security and assistance payments.

The reason we have suggested this basic increase in the exemption granted to small wage earners is that the money will flow immediately into the purchase of manufactured goods and agricultural commodities. We believe similar beneficial results will follow an increase in old age security and assistance payments. Such increases would restore the original purchasing power of the payments. In addition, an increase in family allowances would in large part, through spending by the medium and lower income groups, return to the federal government to the tune of 33 per cent in taxation. It seems to me that these are places where some assistance could immediately be given back to the people.

It is my belief that this government has not told the Canadian people the whole story of the financial conditions which are facing us. I believe that if the whole story were really told it would probably become known that the unemployment insurance fund had been a much greater factor than anything else in stabilizing the economy in very serious circumstances. Had we not had the $900 million reserve nor the payments that have been made to the unemployment insurance fund, there should have been a great deal less consumer goods purchased in this country because a vast number of unemployed would be without money. I agree that this program has put money into the economy of this country and reduced to a great extent the impact of the recession that we have been through.

While it is true that these increases will put money into circulation almost immediately, it is also necessary for the government to provide employment immediately. I suggest one way of doing this, and I congratulate the Minister of Public Works in this regard, is to provide money for housing at times when private industry is not interested in doing so. The amount of money which was supplied through the Department of Public Works in this regard has done a great deal to alleviate the situation. I believe a similar policy should be followed in regard to providing money for municipal capital expenditure, as well as money for capital expenditures on the part of this government.

I was surprised to note, in the highlights of this budget, the number of things which are supposed to be of value in comparison with what has been suggested in a number of statements made by Mr. Coyne, the governor of the Bank of Canada. I agree that some of his statements have been made in regard to subjects outside the realm of his jurisdiction, and a few of them have been made in a way with which the Minister of Finance did not agree. However, it has been generally conceded that a great deal of money being saved in Canada is being put into banks and other savings institutions, which should be reinvested in the national development of Canadian resources. There is very little difference of opinion as to how this should be done. The methods which are now being used are similar to those methods suggested by the governor on previous occasions.

I should like to ask a question, although I do not expect to receive an answer immediately. The fact that none of the Conservative backbenchers has spoken in regard to this budget I suggest is an indication that they have been directed to stand pat and not try to sell this budget, because it is impossible to sell unless the salesman possesses the extensive knowledge possessed by the Minister of Finance and his capable parliamentary secretary. Unless one does possess that ability and knowledge it is probably unwise, particularly for backbenchers, to try to show the value contained in this budget to their own constituencies because they are liable to muck the whole thing up.

In the choice of a new governor for the Bank of Canada I hope consideration will be given to the development that has taken place in respect to other banks in Canada, particularly with relation to consumer credit. The present governor of the Bank of Canada has had a great deal to say in this regard. He has suggested, as many Conservative backbenchers and others who support that party have said, that we should not spend more money than we have, and that it is not a good idea to live beyond our means. I believe that philosophy is followed by most Conservative finance experts and supporters.

Mr. Coyne has insisted that the 6 per cent interest rate be maintained. This has been a source of aggravation to the administrations of other federal lending legislation. The leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has suggested on many occasions in this house that the limit on interest should be set at 6 per cent maximum in relation to loans made under federal legislation. He has introduced bills in this regard which have been talked out before even reaching a vote.

The head of one of the chartered banks in Canada has been suggested as a possible replacement for the present governor of the Bank of Canada. I should like to point out that the bank of which he is in charge has developed a small loans branch in competition with the finance companies. It is my understanding that the rate of interest charged, while not as high as the interest rate charged by finance companies, which I understand is as high as 28 per cent, on occasion reaches 11 per cent, including the normal legitimate charges allowed. I should like to ask if the gentleman in charge of this type of activity is the type of individual this government is considering as a replacement for the present governor of the Bank of Canada? If that is the case then I suggest it is a good indication of the fact that there is a real difference in opinion between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? Would he recommend the president of a credit union for this position? The rate charged by those organizations is even higher, at 12 per cent.

Mr. Peters: That subject could lead to a long detailed discussion in which I do not intend to engage at this time. I should only like to state that I have been a member of different credit unions and have always understood that loans from those institutions have always been made at the rate of interest of 1 per cent per month on the unpaid balance, which amounts to just slightly over 6 per cent. Hon. members may argue that is just slightly under 12 per cent, but I am not prepared to take up that subject at this stage. If I am wrong and the interest rate amounts to 12 per cent then I suggest the Bank of Nova Scotia small loans branch is charging twice that rate, perhaps as high as 22 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Such nonsense. Why do you not get the facts instead of talking nonsense off the top of your head like that?

Mr. Peters: I have just said that I am not prepared to argue that subject. I have just suggested that the Bank of Nova Scotia, which the Minister of Finance seems happy and anxious to defend, makes loans charging an interest rate as high as 11 per cent. If the calculation made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) is correct, then I suggest the interest rate charged by that bank is perhaps twice what I understand it to be.

Mr. McCleave: Nonsense.

Mr. Peters: Why do you not stand up and make your own speeches in this house if you wish to deal with this subject?

Mr. McCleave: Why do you not sit down when you do not know anything about the subject?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, hon. members are asking questions, to which I have tried to give the answers. If they are not happy with my answers they are perfectly entitled to rise later and say so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why do you not make a speech based on facts and refrain from making these statements of fantasy and imagination slurring these institutions when you do not have the facts to back them up?

An hon. Member: He always does that.

Mr. Peters: I suggest the hon. minister should not have used the word "imagination" because I listened for two and a half hours on Tuesday night to the hon. gentleman's budget speech which was nothing but imagination. As one of his own members has suggested, the facts were covered by so much confusion that it was impossible to understand what it was about. Perhaps that explains why there are so few of his colleagues speaking on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been made of the fact that the excise tax has been removed from automobiles. I am sure that the removal of the 7½ per cent tax will be of great interest to those engaged in the automobile industry. However, I suggest this will really not be of much help to the citizens of Windsor, because it is difficult for me to understand how a person can be said to be assisted because of the fact that he can now borrow $3,000 to buy a car in order to save $100 to $150. I suggest it is much more important that the unemployed in Windsor, Oshawa, the Oakville area and elsewhere be provided with jobs.

This tax alleviation fails to take into consideration the fact that we do not produce cars in Canada. All we do is assemble parts and, as the house knows, parts are going to be more expensive now than they have been before, because we have to import them. It has been decided that a great deal of our problem can be solved if we reduce the value of the Canadian dollar. I agree that the dollar should be reduced in value. I do not know why the Canadian dollar should ever have been valued higher than the United States dollar. Certainly our wage levels, our standards of living and other things are exceeded by those of the United States, except for the quantity of our natural resources. Why then should our dollar be higher in value than the United States dollar? I cannot understand this unless it has something to do with one of the highlights of the budget which says that the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar is to be pushed below United States parity by the purchase of United States dollars; lower exchange rates on the dollar are designed to help purchasers increase modestly the price of imported goods. We were told by the minister that this is done continually by manipulation of the amount of United States money we hold.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I never used the word "manipulation"; never.

Mr. Peters: If the minister did not use this word in two and a half hours probably it is one of the few words in the dictionary that he did not use.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is going to supply it now and attribute it to me.

Mr. Peters: Well, I presume somebody regulates the supply and that would be manipulation. You would buy some when you wanted to lower the rate and sell some when you wanted to raise it which, in my opinion, would be manipulation. If the minister did not use this word, the effect I presume is the same.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member just does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Peters: This kind of action has a great influence in my part of the country, Mr. Speaker, because we have resources which are sold in the United States but we also depend heavily on the United States for imports. If it is done by the restriction of imports and the raising of prices on imported goods I am not sure that we are going to gain too much by this method of increasing our products. The gold mining industry is a good example of this. They have been suggesting for some time that the Canadian government do something constructive toward pegging the price of gold at a much higher figure than that at which it is pegged currently in the United States. Suggestions have been made, and certainly this would be one method by which the government could control—if the minister does not like the word "manipulate" —the purchase and the disposal of United States money. It would be a method that we could use to govern our exchange by our own holdings and maintain our reserves of gold in this country at a much higher rate than the current United States price of $35 per ounce.

I think the government has done some good in this budget. It has done one thing that I particularly like. It has permitted our volunteer firemen to get relief on those payments that are made by municipalities for out-of-pocket expenses. This has been a bone of contention with the volunteer fire departments because already income taxes and other taxes have been paid on this money. They are out of pocket in so far as this money is concerned. The minister—not this minister but the Minister of National Revenue—is to be commended on having agreed to the many representations made to him in this regard. I thank the minister who introduced this in his budget as a method of giving this tax relief of $300 to the volunteer firemen who are doing such a good job in so many of our small communities across Canada.

I am concerned, and I think many people will be concerned, about the broad suggestions made in relation to expense accounts. While I agree with the minister that this is a free enterprise country, and that this may be a method of boosting sales—and it has been abused—I will be very surprised if it is not a fact that the people who will get it in the neck first are the salesmen across the country who are doing a good job. Although this is considered to be pretty wide open, I remember that the unions got called up on the carpet for allowances in this particular field. I hope the minister has other things in mind besides the small legitimate amounts which are necessary for people travelling across this country in the performance of their duties. I hope this is not to be considered income for that class of people.

The average man on the street is also interested in the statement the minister made about cigarets. I do not think the reaction will be quite what the minister expected. The proposal will mean one of two things. It will either frighten some people—who are already afraid—into thinking that they are going to get cancer that much faster because cigarets are all going to be king size, or it will provide longer butts for those who are unemployed and have to pick them up off the streets. In either case it is of doubtful value.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member speaking from experience?

Mr. Peters: I am always glad to know there is so much interest around the house. So many hon. members are interested in this particular subject and yet they are unable to rise to their feet. They must have a special charm when they go back to their own electorate and tell them that the budget came down but they did not see fit to discuss it. There was nothing of any importance in the budget that affected their ridings. They did not want to hurt Mr. Fleming's feelings; they wanted to let him get on with firing Mr. Coyne and they were in a hurry to get the whole matter cleared up. This is not true of my riding. I do not necessarily have any exceptional charm but I have problems in that riding, as the people have. The minister talked about one of them and he talked about it in a way which indicates he has at least given consideration to the matter. I refer to the discussion of portable pensions.

It is not many years ago that portable pensions were unheard of. I can remember when the subject was first discussed in the mining areas. Miners were working for many years in the mines. Sometimes they retired at an early age. Sometimes they lived to retire at a normal pensionable age, and faced the fact that there was no money, no funds, no pension plan for them. Their position was exceedingly aggravated by the fact that in most instances they knew they could not have earned their living in their employable lifetime in any one particular mine because the mines did not exist that long. To be employed in the mine the miner had to be young and healthy and by the time he reached 60, 62 or 63, mines would have closed down and he would have had 10 or 12 years employment in one mine, maybe 15 in a second mine and a further period in a third. The miner had no opportunity to have a pension plan. The miners were also concerned with those very few places where a pension plan was in effect but the mines used that entirely as a weapon not for the employee but against him. They kept the employees in low-paying jobs; they told them if they did not like it to quit and obviously they would lose whatever pension they had accumulated. Usually they did not have a strong organization to speak for them and when they approached retirement age they were retired and did not receive any benefit from the fund.

Therefore our experience in northern Ontario has been a very poor one in relation to pensions. I can safely say that with the exception of the Sudbury area where the employees have had a longer mining experience in one mine, there have been very limited and very unsatisfactory pension arrangements throughout the whole mining industry.

This is true also, Mr. Speaker, in relation to lumbering, logging and the complete forest industry in which I also have had the opportunity of gaining some experience.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Order. I regret to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the presentation of a national budget is a very important matter. In fact, it is one of the most important items of business that come before parliament at any session. A budget is meant to serve two main purposes. In the first place, it affords the government an opportunity to give to parliament and to the Canadian people an account of their national housekeeping and of their stewardship. In the second place, it affords the government an opportunity to make a statement with regard to changes in fiscal and monetary policies, with respect to current economic problems and also with respect to anticipated changes in future economic conditions. Incidentally, the budget can also be used as a political instrument to promote and advance party interests. I feel that it is in some ways a sad commentary on our political maturity both as parliamentarians and as a people that this aspect of the budget, which is rather incidental, should in some cases assume sufficient importance to overshadow its two primary purposes which I have just mentioned.

It is true, I think, from what we hear over the radio and read in the press that the greatest interest in the national budget stems from curiosity with respect to whether or not it will indicate an early election. I believe that the times in which we are now living are too serious to permit this kind of indulgence because the economic strength of our nation is an important factor in our national survival and I think we should look upon the Department of Finance in the same light as we regard the Department of National Defence.

The role of the opposition as I understand it is to examine the government's stewardship during the past fiscal year and that must be done, of course, in the light of last year's budget objectives. The opposition must also examine the proposed changes and these must be examined in the light of current problems and objectives. In presenting the national balance sheet and an account of the government's stewardship, the minister should remember that he is reporting not only to parliament but also to all the people of Canada and the people should be treated as fully grown and mature adults who are mature enough to face facts even though they may be unpleasant and who are willing and able to take whatever steps may be required by way of correction no matter how drastic those measures might be.

To accomplish that, these facts of the national budget, the national housekeeping, should be stated briefly, clearly and simply in language which can be understood by the average man in the street. That does not require a document like the minister presented on Tuesday, a document so lengthy and so verbose that it took him nearly 2¾ hours to read it. I might add that he read it very rapidly. If he had not done so, I am sure he would have taken well over three hours, which would have been another record of some kind or another.

The document which the minister read had another disadvantage in that relatively simple facts of relatively minor significance were wrapped up in masses and masses of verbiage while matters of major importance, such as our international trading relations and the government's attitude to the trading blocs now emerging in Europe, were dismissed with only one or two sentences.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense. There is a whole chapter on that subject. Were you not here?

Mr. Carter: I heard everything—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a whole chapter on it.

Mr. Carter: —but there was no information. The only information that the minister conveyed about these matters was wrapped up in one or two sentences. I made notes the other night and I will refer to them if the minister wishes me to do so. With respect to external trade relations I wrote down that the minister said there would be no regional integration, no isolation, no association with trading communities and as to diversification we would continue to support GATT. That was the sum and substance of what the minister said with respect to trading relations on Tuesday night and I made a summary of it as he spoke.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit me to direct his attention to pages 6650 to 6653, the chapter under the heading "International Trade and Commercial Policy". If he says this constitutes a few sentences, all I have to say is that he has done some extraordinary summarizing.

Mr. Carter: Of course it is summarizing. I am simply complaining that the minister gave so little vital information that the house and the people need that it could be conveyed in merely two or three sentences. The rest is just superfluous words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Verbiage, water.

Mr. Benidickson: Water plus Coyne.

Mr. Carter: I have not been here too many years but I can remember when a budget speech that lasted beyond an hour and a half or an hour and a quarter was considered long. We have listened now to four budget speeches from the present minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You missed one.

Mr. Carter: —and each one seems to be getting longer and longer with less and less information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Keep on telling me what you are telling me and they are apt to be longer because you say you are not getting enough information now.

Mr. Carter: Well, the minister has already doubled the normal length of time and is giving us just about half the information that we used to get.

Mr. Batten: And double the deficit.

Mr. Carter: Well, maybe the minister has had to expand his words to keep pace with his deficits. That may be the explanation for it. I want to urge the minister to consider this proposal, that in the future he prepare his budget in two parts. Part one should be prepared in simple, clear and concise language for the man on the street. It should contain the simple facts relating to housekeeping as they affect the lives of all Canadians. Part two should contain all the massive details in which only the financial experts and members of parliament who have a special interest in finance would be interested. I would be glad, if the minister would give me the job and pay me well during the summer, to condense his budget speech for him and put it in that format. I am sure it would be a model for him to follow in future years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. member a question? If I prepared the budget speech in these two parts about which he speaks, which part would he read?

Mr. Carter: I would read the part for the man on the street; that is the information every Canadian wants to know and nobody knows at the present time, not even the experts.

As an illustration of stewardship, the government's report is not very reassuring. A year ago, in March 1960, the minister forecast a surplus of $12 million. On Tuesday evening he told us that a year later, on March 31, 1961, this $12 million surplus had turned out to be a deficit of around $345 million. Now, either the minister was very wrong—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being 4.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 58, as provisionally amended, to put forthwith the question on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the subamendment lost.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

SWEEPSTAKES

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES BOARD

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-36 to provide for the establishment of a hospital sweepstakes board.

He said: It gives me a great deal of pleasure to move the second reading of this Bill No. C-36 to provide for the establishment of a hospital sweepstakes board which would be empowered to operate a national hospital sweepstake. As hon. members know, there are some limits to the type of bill which a private member can introduce in this house, but it is my feeling that of all the bills which could be introduced by myself as a private member this one would be supported with the greatest degree of unanimity by my constituents and by Canadians in general.

I think it is recognized that the people of Canada do want a national hospital sweepstake, and I should like to deal with some of the evidence in support of this contention. First of all, I would turn to the Gallup poll which has in recent years become a well known indicator of public opinion and the results of which have in most instances proved very accurate. The last time the Gallup poll questioned the people of Canada on this subject was in 1955 and the organization released the following statement on September 14 of that year:

> There can be no doubt that a large majority of Canadians would like to see legalized lotteries and sweepstakes in this country. Even among the minority who disapprove, the largest number would change their opinion if the government were to run a lottery to raise money for health and welfare. Moreover, this feeling has persisted for a good many years.

The statement goes on to indicate that the question was asked: "Suppose the government operated a big national lottery to raise money for health and welfare; would you approve or disapprove?" Eighty two per cent of the people who were questioned answered "yes" to that question. I think that is a substantial indication that the people of Canada want a national hospital sweepstake.

It is interesting to look at some of the news stories which have appeared in recent years. I have here a number of photostatic copies of news clippings which were kindly forwarded to me by the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province after I had requested them to let me have copies of relevant items they had carried in their columns. Throughout, a great many bodies and organizations have advocated sweepstakes in this country including provincial legislatures. One dispatch from the Canadian Press in 1938 indicates that a resolution requesting the dominion government to legalize the operation of a sweepstake in the province to benefit hospitals was passed by the Ontario legislature by a vote of 48 to 34. Here we have a provincial legislature on the record, a good many years ago, expressing support for this proposal and there is a clear indication that since that time public opinion has swung further in favour of a national hospital sweepstake.

I have another clipping concerning Ontario. It is undated, but it is a United Press dispatch indicating that the Ontario municipal association has forwarded a resolution to the provincial government calling for lotteries to support hospitals. Here is the case of another substantial body supporting action of this sort. Then in 1954, according to a C.P. dispatch dated Ottawa, March 18 of that year, a further request was made for such a lottery. In this instance the request came from the unions. The cutting reads:

> The trades and labour congress of Canada has repeated demands for a government sponsored lottery. The 580,000 member labour organization suggested an amendment to the Criminal Code allowing the federal government to set up a national lottery.

Here again is a substantial body on record as being in favour of a national sweepstake.

Another which appealed to me particularly is dated June 17, 1958 and is headed: "City Tories ask Legal Sweepstake". It reads:

> Vancouver-Kingsway Progressive Conservative association favours a national legal sweepstake.

The article goes on to indicate that the association had asked the member for Vancouver-Kingsway to present its resolution to the federal government.

I have another cutting dated January 28, 1950 with the heading: "Vets Want Legal Lottery". The dateline is New Westminster.

> An amendment to the Criminal Code to allow lotteries and raffles to be conducted in Canada providing all proceeds except necessary expenses be made available for charitable or/and benevolent purposes was requested in a resolution passed unanimously at the 27th provincial conference of the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada held here Friday.

I think that is sufficient to indicate that there is large and varied support for a national hospital sweepstake in Canada. The position of Quebec is, of course, well known in this regard. Some years ago the province passed its own lotteries law, but because it was in conflict with the Criminal Code they did not proceed with it. However, there can be little doubt that the people of Quebec would strongly support a national hospital sweepstake.

I noticed another submission which was made to the government of Canada last year by the legislative committee of the international railway brotherhood who were expressing some concern about hospitals in Canada. They indicated their support by saying:

> If it is necessary to engage in a scheme of hospital sweepstakes in order to provide the funds we shall be ready to endorse such a scheme.

This bill, if passed, would not, of course, be introducing anything new because sweepstake tickets are sold every day in Canada in large numbers. This proposal would make this legal and ensure that Canadian tickets rather than tickets from other countries are sold. There is a substantial sale of other tickets. I think we have only to consider the last Irish sweepstake which was so well publicized in Canadian newspapers within the last short while to see what is happening.

I have here an extract from the Toronto Telegram of May 25, 1961, under the dateline Dublin. It is an Associated Press dispatch and it indicates that the total ticket sales for the Irish sweepstakes was around $15,400,000 with prizes amounting to $9,100,000. It is further stated in this article that there are 27 first prizes of $140,000 each, 27 second prizes of $56,000 each, and 27 third prizes of $28,000 each.

To indicate how Canadians made out in the distribution of these prizes, I have here some extracts from the press which indicate the prizes that came to Canadians from that pool. From the Montreal Star of May 31 I took an extract which reads as follows:

> Five Canadians won the $140,000 pot of gold with Irish sweepstakes tickets on "Psidium", winner of the Epsom derby. Another nine held $56,000 tickets on second place horse, and seven had $28,000 tickets on the third place horse.

When considering the total number of prizes from the Irish sweepstake of that date it can easily be seen that Canadians received approximately 25 per cent. I think it can only be fairly assumed from that percentage that Canadians contributed a very substantial amount to that Irish sweepstake.

Another press release of May 31, from the Toronto Telegram, reads as follows:

> Canadians scooped nearly $2,500,000 from the Irish sweepstakes on today's derby at Epsom, England.

There again, not only the number of prizes but the amount of money indicates that Canadians won over 25 per cent of the prizes in that sweepstake, showing quite clearly that the people of Canada desire national sweepstakes and are already spending money on these tickets.

I suggest it is absolutely wrong that all this money is going outside of Canada, because our hospitals could benefit greatly from a Canadian national hospital sweepstake without costing the taxpayers of Canada one cent more than they are spending in this way at the present time.

Of course the Irish sweepstake is not the only one to which Canadians contribute. I make this statement as a result of a special article written in Sydney, Australia and carried in the Vancouver Sun of July 28, 1958. This article is headed "Canadian Cash Finds Way to 'Down Under' Gambling Set-up" and reads in part as follows:

> Cash each week flows from Canada to Australia's booming gambling industry.
> It comes mostly in the form of subscriptions to government conducted lotteries. There is also a dribble of dollars for Australia's uncounted numbers of art unions, raffles, sweeps and other gambling devices.

Here again is an instance of money going outside Canada when it could be very well used to benefit Canadian hospitals.

It has been clearly shown that the present law cannot be enforced. It is a well known fact that you cannot enforce a law that the public will not support. I suggest there is a great deal of evidence both from Canada and the United States to support this statement. This fact was recognized by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries which reported in 1956. I should like to read some of the statements contained in that report. Paragraph 6 of chapter 3 at page 64, reads as follows:

> There appeared to be widespread support for lotteries organized for charitable and benevolent purposes.

Paragraph 8 reads as follows:

> "Lack of public support for lottery laws"
> The committee notes that there is widespread difficulty in enforcement and it is disposed to accept the statement of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that there is lack of support for the present prohibitory laws and that they cannot be enforced in the face of adverse public opinion.

Paragraph 9 reads as follows:

> The committee has little doubt that the results of this evasion of the lottery law are serious in that the law and law enforcement in general are thus brought into contempt.

Paragraph 10 reads as follows:

> An unsatisfactory product of the present situation is the existence of fraudulent lotteries which law enforcement agencies are unable or unwilling to control. This being so, it is difficult to protect the public from fraudulent lottery schemes where all or the major portions of the proceeds are taken by promoters. There was evidence of widespread sales of counterfeit Irish sweepstake tickets.

Paragraph 11 reads as follows:

In particular the committee is under the impression that most law enforcement agencies consider that clarification of the existing lotteries provisions will not of itself solve the difficulty and that some new departure in policy is required to bring order into the administration of the lotteries law.

Many law enforcement officers of the United States have made statements similar to those, and I intend to refer to only one made by a very experienced administrator of the law, Judge John M. Murtagh, who is a graduate of Harvard and was chief magistrate of the city of New York from 1950 to 1960, at which time he was appointed chief justice of the court of special sessions. I intend to read three statements from an article he wrote entitled "Gambling and Police Corruption". Those statements read as follows:

My professional career has been almost entirely in the criminal law, as prosecutor, as chief magistrate, and as chief justice of the court of special sessions. My experience with the enforcement of gambling and related laws has made me increasingly critical of the criminal process.

Further on in the same article he states:

I also endorse a government operated lottery, such as that proposed by congressman Paul A. Fino. The proposed lottery is very similar to the Irish sweepstakes, the Mexican national lottery, and the much newer French national lottery. These have been operated by government agencies without any breath of scandal. The major portion of the money taken in is paid out in prizes; the remainder is used on public health projects.

In the final paragraph of this article, Mr. Murtagh makes the following statement:

The underworld is thriving on our hypocrisy and stupidity. So long as we persist in our efforts to end gambling by prohibitory legislation, we promote police corruption. Police honesty can never be a relative matter. Police corruption erodes the average citizen's respect for the law and makes him cynical about all law enforcement. We cannot continue to tolerate a partnership that invites corruption. And, yes, we owe it to the judiciary to end the existing judicial farce.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go any further into that aspect of the subject, Mr. Speaker. The special committee which was set up to consider this matter presented the very definite opinion that the present laws could not be enforced. That opinion is substantiated by many law enforcement officers of other countries.

I should now like to indicate that not only the people of Canada are in favour of hospital sweepstakes, but that this seems to be very popular throughout the world. I intend to mention briefly some of the countries in which sweepstakes operate at the present time. I also hope to correct the erroneous opinion that has been frequently placed on record where it has remained unchallenged; the opinion that most of the money collected in sweepstakes is consumed by administrative expenses and little benefit accrues. I shall show that administration expenses in most instances are not high and that the money goes in prizes, for the most part, or to hospitals or other federal purposes.

The Irish sweepstake is of course the largest one and, over the years it has been in operation, 97 sweepstakes have been held. Paid out prizes total £117,890,377. In addition to the prizes that were paid out £48,197,543 went to Irish hospitals. This information compiled as of February-March 1960 was sent to me by the Irish hospitals' sweepstakes officials. This information also indicates that 410 hospitals and institutions affording free medical and surgical treatment have participated in sweepstakes which are controlled by the associated hospital committee. In addition to that, over the years money has been given to the Red Cross. They also pointed out to me that because the laws governing these sweepstakes do not permit the distribution of sweepstakes funds outside Ireland, Hospitals' Trust initiated, in 1937, the medical research council of Ireland, which operates on an annual grant from the Hospitals' Trust fund. This council's grants are open to citizens of all nations to carry on research in any part of the world. They do not, however, place a figure on the amount of money that has been distributed in that way.

I should like to mention some of the other countries that operate sweepstakes. I wrote to most of the embassies here in Ottawa representing countries operating sweepstakes and I received many very courteous replies. I am certainly indebted to many of the ambassadors and their staffs who went to a great deal of trouble in providing me with information in this regard.

I hold in my hand information on the Spanish state lottery which was founded on September 30, 1763, and has been operating ever since. I am not going into the details of how it works but I wish to give some of the percentages to indicate how the money taken in has been distributed. These are the results for 1958. Total prizes paid out amounted to 69 per cent of sales; gross profit, 31 per cent; agency commission, 2.46 per cent; net profit, 28.5 per cent.

I should now like to give some information on some of the other South American countries. I took this information from the annals of the American academy of political and social sciences, volume 269, 1950:

Bolivia—the state lottery is considered to be a source of official revenue by regulation May 13, 1930. All forms of public gambling were prohibited.

Brazil—lottery as a source of revenue is regulated by the federal law of February 10, 1944 and clandestine lotteries are severely punished. Any public gambling, even at summer resorts, is prohibited.

Argentina—the lottery law in Argentina dates from 1895.

Sweepstakes

Chile—the law of August 30, 1890 holds only authorized lotteries to be legal. All other forms are under the penalties of the penal code.

Uruguay—lottery is under official control in Uruguay and is considered a source of revenue.

The conclusions in this article contained in the annals of the American academy of political and social sciences are as follows:

Only a state lottery may be considered an acceptable minor form of gambling but this again depends upon prevailing cultural patterns. General public opinion in Latin America does not consider such a state lottery as gambling.

I have been given figures on the Turkish national lottery. Unfortunately I have not had the opportunity to change them into percentages; therefore I will give the figures for the Turkish lottery for one year, and indicate how the money is brought in and distributed in the lottery. The distribution was as follows: The total revenue was 63,931,435 Turkish liras. The prizes paid out amounted to 32,417,795; commission given to sales agents amounted to 3,310,372; general expenses, 900,572. The net profit was 27,302,695. This will indicate quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, that the administrative expenses are comparatively low for the operation of sweepstakes.

The following information I have taken from the official year book of New South Wales, 1957:

State lotteries

State lotteries are conducted in New South Wales in terms of the state lotteries act, 1930. The act is administered by a director, and the lotteries are conducted on the cash-prize system.

The article goes on to indicate how the prizes are distributed and it appears to be operating quite satisfactorily.

My next information is from the year book of the commonwealth of Australia, 1958. It mentions the New South Wales state lotteries and indicates that the net proceeds of the lottery are paid to the consolidated revenue fund from which grants are made to hospitals. The Tattersalls lotteries in Tasmania have been going on for some time, and there again the money is paid into the hospitals and charities fund and the mental hospitals funds in such proportions as the treasurer determines from time to time.

In Queensland, the golden casket art union commenced in 1916 with the specific object of augmenting the funds of the Queensland war council. Since 1920 the net profits have been paid to the department of health and home affairs for the maintenance of hospitals, motherhood and child welfare trust funds, and so on.

In western Australia, lotteries are conducted by the lotteries commission under the lotteries control act of 1932. Profits are paid by the commission to hospitals and other charities.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Here again I might give the house some percentages so that an indication may be had of how effective and efficient lotteries in general are. These figures are for the golden casket art union of Queensland. I shall give just the figures for the year 1956-57. Amount of prize money paid out was 63.82 per cent; administration costs, 6.71 per cent; state stamp duty, 5 per cent; department of health and home affairs, 24.47 per cent. There again, Mr. Speaker, is a clear indication that the administration expense is not high in regard to the amount of money taken in.

I should now like to deal with the letter that I have received from the Mexican embassy indicating the value that sweepstakes have had in that country. It reads:

The national lottery for public welfare, of Mexico, is a federal government agency under the general authority of the department of health and public welfare.

Farther down it goes on to say:

The net proceedings are turned over to the department of health and public welfare for the construction and maintenance of hospitals, orphanages, clinics, etc.

The national lottery has been in existence for 90 years, and has performed a most meritorious work with complete public support.

I should now like to refer to an article which appeared in the Financial Post of October 10, 1959 entitled:

They Pay for Culture

By Robson Black

Hon. President, Canadian-Scandinavian foundation

Sweden finances most of her culture by a chain of public lotteries. This may be "gambling" but in no sense does the system employ professional gamblers. Indeed, few countries in the world suppress with such a zeal all commercial games of chance, barbotte dens, cardsharps and roulette wheels.

Lotteries, however, are legal fund-raisers, all of them tightly supervised by government accountants.

The embassy of the Republic of China has given me the following breakdown of the distribution of their lotteries: 10 per cent to dealers as commission; 40 per cent as premium; 40 per cent as profit; 10 per cent for tax and administrative expenses.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and give the details of a good many sweepstakes and lotteries operated throughout the world, but I think I have given sufficient indication to support the view that not only the vast majority of Canadians are in favour of a national hospital sweepstake but no harm is seen throughout the world in the operation of a government-operated sweepstake.

It was rather interesting to note in the Ottawa Citizen of January 16, 1959 that this matter came before the board of the United church. I found it somewhat amusing. This statement is contained in the middle of the article. I do not want to delay the passage of this bill and therefore I will not read the whole article. It reads in part:

> Rev. J. H. Slade of Port Elgin, 22 miles west of Owen Sound, said service club-sponsored bingo and crown and anchor games were supported by some members of his church's session.
> "What can I do?" he asked.
> "I tried to say 'You'll go to the devil,' but they say they're having a good time."
> Dr. Mutchmor advised him to seek action by the local United church conferences.

Finally, I say it is quite clear that there is a substantial amount of money going out of Canada. As has been mentioned, it is hard to get a proper estimate, but in the annals of the American academy of political and social sciences a couple of years ago—I do not have the exact reference here—it was estimated at that time that between $100 million and $200 million was going out of Canada each year to buy foreign sweepstake tickets. I firmly believe that we cannot stop the people of Canada from buying sweepstake tickets if they want to buy them. They have indicated quite clearly that they do want to buy them and it is the responsiblity of this parliament, if the democratic process is to operate properly, to carry out the wishes of the people of this country and institute at once a national hospital sweepstakes.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, a rumour is alleged to have been broadcast this afternoon that a mysterious ailment affected the Conservative members and prevented them from thinking and speaking.

We are happy to note that their ailment is now partly over and that they have at least regained the use of their speech.

My hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) introduced a bill on sweepstakes and kept the floor for 35 minutes.

As far as I am concerned, I see no difficulty about the principle involved. I shall be brief and resume my seat in a moment.

However, to gain time and allow all parties to voice their views, so we can have a vote, I thought that I should say a few words about the stand our C.C.F. friends take on such a measure.

That will probably prevent one of those hon. members from taking part in the discussion, and so we will be able to vote immediately.

I have here a ticket bearing number 45863, under the name of—

(Text):

> Drawing September 4, 1961 at annual labour day dance at Riverside pavilion.
> 1st prize—A crisp new $1,000 bill.
> 2nd prize—Acrisp new $500 bill.

The number of the ticket is 45386. Now that our C.C.F. friends are in favour of the principle of lotteries and drawings, I think we have nothing else to do but to call a vote.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the house that I will not be very much longer than the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. I am very happy that occasionally we have private members' hours and I emphasize the word "private" because in this hour we do not necessarily speak on behalf of our party. Irrespective of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), may I say I have never noticed any political party in Canada taking an official position with respect to this problem. They are all willing to cater to all interests in Canada in order to get votes.

I welcome this hour in which we are really able to speak on the basis of our own personal convictions. In my opinion, and I am now speaking only on behalf of myself as a member of the house, I believe that this campaign is part of an over-all long range campaign under which the people of Canada are offered something for nothing. They are being led to believe that some national benefit might accrue out of this business of gambling.

I know that the aim and intentions of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) who introduced the bill are perfectly honourable. As he said, he has introduced the bill in order to make it easier to raise money on behalf of Canadian hospitals. However, it is my conviction that this is part of an over-all campaign that has been going on for many years in Canada in an effort to persuade the people of Canada that they can really get something for nothing.

The hon. member complains about the vast amounts of money that are going out of Canada by reason of Canadians subscribing to hospital sweepstakes and other gambling schemes outside of our country. If this is a fact, and I believe the hon. member has some justification for making this claim, it is a reflection on our own society and also on our law enforcement agencies. In that regard I have particular reference to the Post Office Department. However, despite all the campaigns by most of the newspapers in our country—

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a reflection against the Post Office Department. I think he should explain what he means.

Mr. Regier: I believe you would not recognize that as a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a member of the house, I believe I have the right to say what I like about the Post Office Department. As long as I do not reflect on the hon. member's intentions, I believe I am within my rights.

As I indicated before, I am perfectly prepared to assume that the hon. member has introduced this bill in all honesty and with all good intentions, but I should like to ask this question. If we are unable to control the gambling instincts of the people of Canada now, how in the world does he expect the law to exercise any control over them if the law itself contains the basic principle involved here? Despite all the statistics he has presented, I would be prepared to predict that the racketeers who now operate illegally in this field would be many times multiplied if we opened the door to such operations.

On another occasion I expressed my opposition to any extension of the gambling that exists in connection with horse racing. These proposed hospital sweepstakes are linked with horse racing and there are a great many reasons why I am opposed to the extension of the incidence of gambling attached to horse racing. If we accept the bill now before the house it is my view that we would be enhancing the sport of horse racing, if you wish to call it a sport, although personally I have often referred to it as a racket. This bill is a very important one and it concerns our basic principles. If the Canadian people are not accepting the concepts expressed in legislation enacted in the past, maybe we legislators have been too eager for votes and have not met our responsibilities on the public platform.

I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) will get a lot more votes because of what he has said than I can ever hope to get in my riding as a result of what I have now said. However, I should like to appeal to the members of this house to recognize their responsibility as leaders in our nation. They ought not to be mere politicians who are merely looking for votes.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, having had the honour of introducing a bill based on a rather similar principle, I am pleased to say to the house that I fully support the bill put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne).

Everyone knows that La Presse took a poll on this subject and that the great majority of people in the province of Quebec favour such an amendment to the Criminal Code. This also applies to labour unions, including the syndicats catholiques et nationaux de Joliette which are in favour of a federal lottery.

[Mr. Regier.]

Use could be made of the experience of other countries in the preparation of this legislation. I sincerely hope that the bill of the hon. member will pass, and I would even suggest a first prize: Mr. Coyne. Then we would see if he is really popular, but I am afraid the first sweepstake would be a fiasco if we offered Mr. Coyne as a prize.

In principle, I therefore fully support the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I commend him for his courage in introducing such a bill.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I was afraid, for a while, the sponsor of the bill was going to talk out his own bill. I have no intention whatever of talking out the bill. However, I want it to be very clear that I am speaking personally and not on behalf of the C.C.F. or New party. I support the bill now before the house.

I believe I am the only member in the house at present, perhaps with one exception, who was a member of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital punishment and lotteries. This committee conducted hearings for three years. I well remember the representations made before that committee and I know the final decision of the committee was in opposition to lotteries. I do not agree with that decision. I cannot agree, either, with my seatmate, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I just cannot believe he is so naive as is indicated in the way he spoke.

Let us look at the matter intelligently and from a psychological point of view. The majority of the people of Canada, whether it is right or wrong, moral or immoral, legal or illegal, are imbued with a sense of gambling. You are not going to change that by passing a law. This has been proven time after time in Canada. As a matter of fact, sir, I still remember that the people from whom we got the opposition were the top brass of certain organizations, and some of their own people ran some of the biggest gambling establishments in Canada. I say this because gambling is not limited to horse racing. Raffles are a form of gambling. I challenge, yes even my seatmate, to show me a political organization, fraternal organization or religious organization that does not conduct raffles. Raffles, as I said, are a form of gambling. I challenge anyone to show me a religious or fraternal organization that does not run a bingo. As a matter of fact, the biggest bingo operation in Canada—we had proof of it in our committee—was run in Ontario and Quebec by fraternal and religious organizations.

Raffles, bingo, horse racing, sweepstakes are all forms of gambling. There is a certain instinct for this in our people, and I am afraid we are not going to be able to control it by passing a law. Whether we like it or not, millions upon millions of dollars are going out of Canada to the Irish sweepstakes, the United Kingdom football pools, the Australian sweepstakes and the Mexican sweepstakes. My hon. friend now mentions the Kentucky derby. You may control many things by law, but I am afraid you are not going to remove the inherent idea people have that they may get something, not for nothing, but for the purchase of a raffle ticket, a sweepstake ticket, a pool ticket or something else.

If we are going to be completely honest, surely we must ask: why not have some of this money stay in Canada to be used for social purposes in this country? I say, therefore, that in principle, because I think I know people and I think I have the evidence, I am in support of this bill and I believe it should be adopted.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I just want to take a few minutes of the time left to give my opinion of this bill. I was amazed to hear the initial spokesman of the C.C.F. party say that horse racing was a racket. I wish he would communicate this amazing thought to Her Majesty the Queen who has her own horses, I believe, running in the English derby upon which lotteries are conducted. With respect to the remarks of the second speaker from the C.C.F. party, I say I do not believe we should call lotteries a form of gambling. From my point of view a lottery for a charitable purpose is not a form of gambling, but is an incentive or stimulus to the people to give some of their money for charitable and social purposes.

I favour the principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I believe the people in this country want it. This has been proven, not this year, but in 1951 when the Conservative party held a convention in Ottawa. I had the honour to introduce a resolution at that convention in the name of the young Conservative association, and this resolution received a majority of votes. I recall that the Ottawa newspapers made a great deal of this resolution and this indication that the people of this country wanted lotteries. Personally, I would prefer a small change in the approach of this bill. I should like to see this bill consider the question of section 92 of the British North America Act which reserves health questions, hospital administration and management, to the provinces.

Of course, it is not my wish to discuss this matter at too great length. Like most of the people of this country, I should be happy to see a bill of this sort passed. Even though I should not like the amendment proposed by this bill, I would support any bill that would attract the attention of the people of this country to the need for the people to spend their money not on foreign lotteries but on Canadian lotteries and Canadian welfare.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it is almost mandatory that a member who seconds a bill should speak to that bill.

There are in this country certain spiritual values, and I can quite understand those who, from the ecclesiastical viewpoint, will oppose this bill.

There are certain things about this bill that I do not like. I am not a gambler, but I buy sweepstake tickets. My money goes to Ireland. With respect to this question, as my hon. friend on my right has so well and eloquently said, I believe we must be realistic. Canadians have a tendency toward gambling. I am not too greatly impressed with the advocacy of hospital aid. I do not think that is the prime purpose. Certainly the Irish hospitals should be very well equipped.

I think the fundamental principle of the sweepstake is the opportunity that the person has to make a personal gain. I do not believe that in this house or anywhere else we can reform human nature.

Since we are exporting this large amount of money to foreign countries—to Ireland, Mexico and Australia—I think we should take a new look at our own position. I think we should become reconciled to the fact that our Canadian people wish to move in this direction and should legalize their position. As the seconder of this bill, may I say this, and the mover of it and I have talked about it a great deal. While there are some disquieting aspects with respect to the situation surrounding it, I believe the bill should be supported, that we should keep our money at home, and if there is any benefit for any institution such as a hospital or a children's educational institution, it should be applied here and not elsewhere.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am loathe to dampen the ardour of some of the hon. members who have spoken in favour of this bill, but there are some matters that I think should be pointed out. During the discussion of the bill that was introduced by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm I remember that there was a great deal of enthusiasm at that time for those who wanted to speak for or against that bill. Whether or not it means that more have been won over to the cause, I do not know, but there evidently is in favour of this bill a preponderance which was not evident with regard to the other one.

Sweepstakes

I think it should be pointed out that the issue in this case, in my humble opinion, is not so much whether an individual is in favour of gambling or of lotteries but rather whether the state should become involved in such activities. I have before me the report of the royal commission that sat in the British house on this matter and I think that they dealt—

Mr. Winch: You will find the reference under the recommendations section. If the hon. member looks in the recommendations section he will find it there.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have it. It is page 120 of the royal commission on betting, lotteries and gaming, 1949-1951, in the British parliament. They dealt at length with this question I am now trying to explore, namely the involvement of the state in gambling. The first point that comes to mind is that they go to great lengths to point out that the revenue which might be obtained from such a national lottery is usually greatly exaggerated by the supporters of such a proposal. They examined in detail the Irish sweep, as they called it, and they admitted that nearly two thirds of the revenue may come from the United Kingdom in this regard but they simply mentioned, proving their point, that the net revenue from such a nationally approved lottery is greatly exaggerated. The conclusion to which they come, as found at page 120, is as follows:

392. Our conclusion is, therefore, that there is no important advantage to be gained by the establishment of a national lottery and that there is no reason, in this particular case, to depart from the general principle that it is undesirable for the state to make itself responsible for the provision of gambling facilities.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member moves the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Bell (Saint-John-Albert): I note that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: In the vein of the debate, may I say that it was a photo finish.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, you do not agree that it is six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: I see that it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what business we shall be taking tomorrow and what the business will be for as much of next week as the house leader can announce.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we shall take the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare followed by the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. The forecast for Monday and Tuesday, subject to change if circumstances so require, will be as follows. On Monday the first item will be an act respecting the Bank of Canada, followed by the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport dealing with the Pine Point railway. The third item would be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Industrial Development Bank Act. On Tuesday I expect that we shall resume the budget debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

FEDERAL GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAX, HALIFAX

Question No. 262—Mr. Morris:

1. Does the federal government pay grants to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on federal government properties?

2. If so, does the grant formula use the rate of tax which would be applicable to federal property if that property were taxable? If so, in what year was this formula first applied, and what formula was used previously?

3. What was the total grant paid by the federal government to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on federal government properties in (a) 1956 (b) 1957 (c) 1958 (d) 1959 (e) 1960?

4. What was the total accepted value of federal property on which the 1960 grant to the city of Halifax was based, what portion was subject to the residential tax rate applied by the city of Halifax to taxpayers, and what portion was subject to the commercial tax rate applied by the city of Halifax to taxpayers?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. Yes.

2. Yes. This formula was first applied with respect to the taxation year 1957.

For the taxation years 1955 and 1956 the grant was paid only in respect of that part of the value of federal property in excess of 2 per cent of the combined value of taxable and federal property in the municipality. The grant was determined by multiplying the value of federal property in excess of 2 per cent of the combined value of taxable and federal property in the municipality by a fraction in which the numerator was the total amount of the real estate tax levied in the appropriate tax year and the denominator was the assessed value of all taxable property in the municipality.

For the taxation years 1950 to 1954 inclusive, the formula for grant was similar to the formula for 1955 and 1956 except that only the excess of federal property over 4 per cent (in place of 2 per cent) of combined taxable and federal property was eligible for grant; also an additional factor which was applied reduced the resulting grant by 25 per cent.

3. Grants to the city of Halifax: (a) 1956, $806,187; (b) 1957, $1,408,422; (c) 1958, $1,462,103; (d) 1959, $1,492,875; (e) 1960, $1,530,637.

4. Accepted values of federal property for 1960 grant:

Subject to residential tax rate, $13,788,250; subject to commercial tax rate, $27,718,450; total $41,506,700.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAX, HALIFAX

Question No. 264—Mr. Morris:

1. Does the national harbours board pay grants to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation of national harbours board property?

2. If so, what is the formula used in the payment of such grants, and is the formula related to the so-called commercial tax rate or to the residential tax rate applied by the city of Halifax to taxpayers?

3. What was the total grant paid by the national harbours board to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on national harbours board properties in (a) 1956 (b) 1957 (c) 1958 (d) 1959 (e) 1960?

4. What was the total accepted value of national harbours board properties on which the 1960 grant to the city of Halifax was based?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. The national harbours board makes a grant in lieu of taxes for municipal services such as fire and police, which might be required by the national harbours board in its administration of harbour properties.

2. Basic formula:

$$\text{Grant} = \frac{a}{b} \times c$$

Where:

a=the accepted value of national harbours board property (August 1, 1959): (i) buildings, (ii) land above original high water mark occupied by buildings.

b=total city assessment (1959) of taxable real estate plus (a) c=city expenditure on fire and police services (estimates for 1959).

The grant calculated by means of this formula was rounded upwards to provide for other miscellaneous services apart from fire protection and police.

On the basis of experience at all national harbours board harbours over the preceding ten years this basic grant was further increased by just under 23 per cent to make provision for possible cost increases and harbour developments in the period 1960-1964.

The formula is not related to either the commercial tax rate (business tax) or the residential tax rate (household tax).

3. Grants paid: 1956, $75,000; 1957, $75,000; 1958, $75,000; 1959, $75,000; 1960, $129,000.

4. Accepted value of N.H.B. property on which 1960 grant based—$14,207,920.

FEDERAL GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAX, DARTMOUTH, N.S.

Question No. 266—Mr. Morris:

1. Does the federal government pay grants to the city of Dartmouth in lieu of taxation on federal government properties?

2. If so, does the grant formula use the rate of tax which would be applicable to federal property if that property were taxable? If so, in what year was this formula first applied, and what formula was used previously?

3. What was the total grant paid by the federal government to the city (then town) of Dartmouth in lieu of taxation on federal government properties in (a) 1956, (b) 1957, (c) 1958, (d) 1959, (e) 1960?

4. What was the total accepted value of federal property on which the 1960 grant to the city (then town) of Dartmouth was based?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. Yes.

2. Yes. This formula was first applied with respect to the taxation year 1957.

For the taxation years 1955 and 1956 the grant was paid only in respect of that part of the value of federal property in excess of 2 per cent of the combined value of taxable and federal property in the municipality. The grant was determined by multiplying the value of federal property in excess of 2 per cent of the combined value of taxable and federal property in the municipality by a fraction in which the numerator was the total amount of the real estate tax levied in the appropriate tax year and the denominator was the assessed value of all taxable property in the municipality.

For the taxation years 1950 to 1954 inclusive, the formula for grant was similar to the formula for 1955 and 1956 except that only the excess of federal property over 4 per cent (in place of 2 per cent) of combined taxable and federal property was eligible for grant; also an additional factor was applied which reduced the resulting grant by 25 per cent.

3. Grants to the town of Dartmouth: (a) 1956, $92,638; (b) 1957, $106,997; (c) 1958, $105,744; (d) 1959, $96,163; (e) 1960, $118,622.

4. Accepted value of federal property for 1960 grant: $5,345,350.

3. What was the total grant paid by the federal government to the municipality of the county of Halifax in lieu of taxation on federal government properties in (a) 1956, (b) 1957, (c) 1958, (d) 1959, (e) 1960?

APPENDIX

STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AT GENEVA CONFERENCE ON LAOS, JUNE 15, 1961

Mr. Chairman and distinguished delegates:

This afternoon I should like to make a very brief speech concerning the effectiveness of the international commission for supervision and control.

As you are all aware, Canada's main interest in this whole Laos question arises through the fact that we were named as a member of this commission.

When I spoke here four weeks ago on May 18, I emphasized the vital importance of providing the commission with the essential technical means to supervise the cease fire and to report on the effectiveness of that cease fire. There was general agreement with these views and the co-chairmen sent a message, on May 19, asking the commission to inform them of requirements for the exercise of its functions in relation to the cease fire. I should have expected that by now, some four weeks later, the necessary equipment would have been provided.

The commission has submitted six reports from which it is evident that, while there has been no general renewal of hostilities, there have been a number of infractions of the cease fire, the most serious of which was the recent outbreak of hostilities at Ban Padong.

So far the commission has been unable to report on these violations from first hand observation. In their message to the commission on June 12, the co-chairmen referred to the commission's intention to discuss with the parties in Laos—now I am quoting from the message of the co-chairmen—"proposals for making the cease fire more effective" and the co-chairmen called on those parties in Laos, the three parties in Laos to co-operate with the commission in its task of supervising and controlling a cease fire.

But I must draw attention to the fact that even if that co-operation is forthcoming in Laos, as I hope it will be, the commission lacks its own means to move to areas of reported conflict and to inform the co-chairmen and the conference.

As the representative of France said on May 31—and I am quoting from that statement—"So far the commission which has its headquarters at Vientiane, has not been able to go anywhere else but Xieng Khouang, and to do that it had to borrow a French aircraft which happened to be there".

In other words, this commission is not being given a fair chance to do its job. And to do that, it had to borrow a French aircraft which happened to be there. Why should this commission have to go around borrowing a French aircraft, or other equipment, in order to do its work? I suggest that this is putting an imposible onus on the commission.

More than six weeks ago the commission, in a report to the co-chairmen dated May 1, stated—and I am quoting now from a report to the commission from the co-chairmen—"The commission should be able to set up an effective machinery provided"—provided—"that the co-chairmen were willing to supply the commission with an adequate number of airplanes and helicopters, together with facilities for their maintenance".

That was six weeks ago. Three weeks ago, on May 22, in reply to the inquiry from the co-chairmen dated May 19, the commission said that its minimum requirement of helicopters was six and of aircraft, six. I submit that it would be a reasonable step—and I know we all want to be reasonable—without waiting for further word from the commission, for this conference to make available immediately at least three light aircraft and three helicopters and the personnel for their operation and maintenance.

It is perfectly clear, Mr. Chairman, that, if it were the will of this conference to provide the technical resources the commission requires, these could be immediately obtained from a variety of sources. In other words, this is not a case where it is impossible to get equipment. The equipment can be obtained, if the will is there, and the responsibility, I suggest with all deference, is on the two co-chairmen.

I therefore ask that the co-chairmen arrange without further delay to make these and other essential requirements available.

In this way the conference can insure that the commission is properly equipped to perform its immediate tasks, and, in so doing, can facilitate the work of this conference on other issues. And I hope to offer comment on these issues early next week.

But surely it is a test of the willingness of this conference to get some results. A very good test is whether or not this commission—which after all has to do the work out in Laos of supervising the cease fire—the test is whether this commission can be given the equipment to do that work, and given it right away, without any further delay. And I do suggest that action be taken in order to bring about this result.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I listened with great interest to the statement by the distinguished representative of Burma and if I may be permitted to say so, I thought he made a very helpful contribution to the deliberations of this conference.

My own purpose today is to state Canadian views on the aims and principles of a settlement in Laos. But before discussing the details of such a settlement, I would remind the representatives here of the high expectations and hopes which the people of my country—indeed people everywhere—have of the conference. Today, of all the international conferences concerned with the peaceful settlement of important international disputes, this conference, by general consent, is the one that holds the greatest promise of constructive results. After all, we start with the advantage that all the parties to the conference are agreed on the main aim—a sovereign, independent and neutral Laos. This aim was explicitly endorsed by the President of the United States and the Premier of the Soviet union in Vienna. If we are to fail, the implications for peace would be far reaching. Therefore we here are concerned not only with Laos, but with the hopes of mankind for an orderly settlement of disputes and the future peace of the world.

We cannot, I suggest, disappoint world opinion. I suggest that the time has come for the conference to end general plenary discussions and begin consideration of the details of a settlement. Certain specific proposals have already been laid before the conference by the French and Soviet delegations. There are also the agreements on Laos of the Geneva conference of 1954, which are bound to be the foundation upon which any Laotian settlement now or in the future can be built.

As a first step I suggest that an article by article tabulation should be prepared of the French and Soviet proposals, setting comparable articles in parallel columns, alongside the relevant articles of the Geneva agreements of 1954, in order to focus the attention of the conference on specific topics and to serve as an initial basis of discussion. Such a tabulation could be prepared by the co-chairmen's staff or by some working group, but I think it is an essential first step in an orderly approach to our work.

The conference in restricted session, not plenary session but in restricted session where free discussion rather than set speeches would be the rule, should then take up article by article the various parts of a Laotian settlement on the basis of this comparative tabulation. This discussion would proceed in sequence from topic to topic in order to reach as much of a common view as possible.

For instance, if we start with the functions and terms of reference of the international commission, we shall have to deal at some stage or other with the subject of the commission investigations. For discussion of this subject we would probably have before us article 7 of the Soviet draft terms for the international commission for supervision and control, article 6 of the French draft protocol on control, and article 30 of the cease fire agreement of 1954. In each of these there is already a high proportion of common language, and the differences which exist might well be narrowed by discussion in restricted session. Other delegations could propose their own version for improving the text or reconciling divergent views.

Then at that stage a drafting group might meet to work out a single agreed text. By adopting a procedure along these lines the conference could hasten a settlement in Laos. And I have in mind that a similar procedure would be followed with each of the topics.

I now turn to an outline of Canadian views on what should be included in a settlement. There will, of course, be declarations on the neutrality of Laos to be made by the government of Laos and by other governments represented here and we appreciate that such declarations are of great importance.

Canadian views on what a Laotian settlement should contain are based on our service, over many years, on the international commissions in Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam. Therefore I confine my remarks today mainly to those parts of the settlement which especially concern the international commission. With this experience in mind, my delegation wants to see the terms of reference of the international commission so worded as to enable it to do a useful job.

I am convinced, that in framing terms of reference as part of the present settlement, we should take as our starting point the cease fire agreement of 1954 modifying it only as has proven necessary in the light of experience and of course taking account of changed conditions. The terms of reference are like a well thumbed book of rules which have gained a certain authority and meaning by virtue of constant use. On the other hand, experience has shown that they were in some respects inadequate for the duties and responsibilities placed upon the commission in the past and they may not be wholly appropriate for the changed circumstances facing the commission in 1961. In the interests, however, of preserving those articles which have stood the test of time, I think it would be wise if the conference were to frame the relevant provisions of the new settlement as a protocol to the 1954 agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Laos.

Then a few words about relations with the government of Laos. We start, as I have already said, from a common position that the settlement should ensure a truly neutral, independent and sovereign Laos. Moreover, it is generally agreed that responsibility for the government of that country must rest with the Laotians themselves.

Let me make it perfectly clear that we have no desire to see the international commission interfere with the normal exercise of sovereignty by the government of Laos. Canada has no wish to see established in that country a commission which would have the slightest resemblance to what some have characterized as a super state. We look to a state of mutual confidence and co-operation between the commission and the government of Laos. We think this is vital and we are in full sympathy with the natural desire of the Laotian leaders to run their own affairs. Indeed, it is precisely to protect Laotian sovereignty that the commission is undertaking its duties of supervising a settlement in Laos.

However, if the international commission is to be an effective instrument of this conference in carrying out the terms of settlement, the responsibilities of the commission must be so defined as to enable it to perform its tasks. In this connection it must be recognized that the commission cannot function if it is made answerable at almost every step to some other authority and can act only at the request or with the agreement of such authority, for example the co-chairmen. Perhaps they could bear that in mind.

To avoid unnecessary friction and misunderstanding between the Laotian government and the commission, it is also important that the terms of reference should spell out with some precision the rights of the commission to obtain necessary information, both documentary and on the ground. To give an example, experience on international commissions suggest that it would be essential for the commission to be able to inspect aircraft and to have access to manifests, in order to control the importation of war material.

Then a few words about the initial responsibilities of the international commission. While fully recognizing and welcoming the responsibility which the government of Laos will assume for its own affairs, the conference will obviously have to include in the settlement, provisions covering the steps to be taken in the military field in the early stages on such questions as the identification and withdrawal of foreign military personnel. Due account also will have to be taken of any formal cease fire agreement which is worked out in Laos. Arms which may have been brought in from outside will have to be collected and disposed of in some suitable way. The forces now opposing each other in Laos will have to be sorted out as a preliminary to the formation of Laotian security forces. All these matters, particularly the formation of Laotian forces will, of course, primarily be the responsibility of the government of Laos. The international commission, however, will have to accept some responsibilities, on behalf of this conference, for supervising these processes. This kind of activity by the commission will be essential for the establishment of a neutral and stable Laos.

Then there are the continuing responsibilities of the commission. The problems I have just been discussing are of a transitional nature. The main problems, however, with which the commission will be concerned will be of a more continuing nature. For example, it will have to assume responsibility in connection with preventing the re-entry of foreign military personnel; ensuring that armaments are not imported in excess of a level appropriate for the requirements of the reorganized Laotian security forces and taking other steps which may be necessary with respect to the security of the Laotian state.

I think we can assume that the commission will have some responsibility with respect to threats to the security of the Laotian state. Such threats obviously can originate either within or without the territory of Laos iself, or represent a combination of the two. In view of the general acceptance by all members of this conference that our primary concern is with the creation and maintenance of the conditions necessary for an independent and neutral Laos, and not with the internal affairs of Laos as such, the commission's responsibilities in this field will have to be very clearly defined.

And then freedom of movement. One of the facilities which the commission will certainly need if it is to assist the government of Laos in ensuring that the provisions of the settlement are properly implemented is freedom of movement and freedom of access, where necessary to the effective discharge of its assigned tasks. And here I must register a complaint that just a few days ago the commission was refused by the Pathet Lao permission to visit Ban Padong which is the one place in Laos at the present time which in my opinion would justify a visit by the commission. But certainly within the last four or five or six days, the Pathet Lao has refused to allow the commission to go to Ban Padong. The commission will also need to have the co-operation of the Laotian authorities in providing protection for its personnel.

There can, I think, be no doubt that because the commission will have responsibility for safeguarding Laotian neutrality and independence through supervision of the entry of foreign military equipment and personnel, it must establish an adequate number of teams for this purpose. The number and location of commission teams should be sufficient to include all likely points of entry. If this conference should decide to make specific provision for the team structure, as was done in the 1954 agreement, it is important that provision be made at the same time for the commission to adjust this structure in the light of experience. Alternatively, the conference may wish to leave the question of number and location of teams for determination by the commission itself in consultation with the government of Laos.

Intimately related to the responsibilities mentioned above is co-operation by the government of Laos in furnishing periodic returns on the strength of the Laotian security forces. This is necessary to enable the commission to confirm that agreed force levels are not being exceeded and that military or paramilitary units are not being formed or maintained which might constitute a threat to the security of the Laotian state.

Then I come to the question of voting in the commission. Most countries represented here have expressed the view that the 1954 agreement should form the basis of a Laotian settlement. I have been very surprised to note, however, that some of the documents tabled contain provisions which depart radically in principle from those in the present agreement. The important question of voting in the commission is one outstanding example. Under the present agreement, decisions are taken by majority vote on all matters except three: first, violations or threats of violations which might lead to a resumption of hostilities; second, amendments to the agreement; and third, reduction of the activities of the commission. To suggest that all matters except purely procedural questions should now be decided unanimously is to depart completely from the Geneva agreement and would I submit make the commission utterly ineffective.

We who have served on the commission have had a good deal of experience with the voting procedure adopted in the present agreement, and I believe from what he has said in this conference that my Indian colleague, Mr. Menon, would support me when I say that this procedure has on the whole worked very well. It involves a striving for unanimous decisions whenever possible, but leaves the way open for majority action when this is necessary. I for my part, would resist any derogation from the existing provisions of the 1954 agreement in the direction of enforced unanimity.

Voting procedure in the commission is in many ways closely related to the manner in which investigations by the commission are handled in practice. And now I come to the question of investigations. I must confess that I am unable to see any justification for the double veto which has been suggested in one of the proposals before this conference. I am referring to the veto involved in the proposal for unanimity in the commission and the further veto contained in the proposal that investigations by the commission related to the introduction of foreign military personnel should be undertaken only on instructions from the two co-chairmen. I suggest that the two co-chairmen are getting a bit too high and mighty if they expect to have this power. This second restriction would deprive the commission of any initiative in its task of assisting the government of Laos to prevent the entry of foreign military personnel or to ensure the carrying out of the provisions of a settlement. We think that investigations should be undertaken by the commission either on its own initiative or at the request of the government of Laos.

It would seem highly desirable that the terms of reference should provide for regular reports at suitable intervals from the commission to the members of the conference. That, I am afraid, has not been the practice followed in the past with regard to these commissions and I presume Canada is as much to blame for that as any other country. Such reports would, of course, not in any way prejudice the obligation of the commission to keep the members of the conference informed of any serious situations which may arise, through the medium of special reports indicating whatever remedial measures might be considered appropriate. In addition, it is my view, that if the commission fails to reach unanimity on a report, it should submit majority and minority reports and, when necessary—when no two members of the commission can agree—it should have the authority to submit separate reports.

I should also like here to mention a special aspect of the problem of guaranteeing that adequate and suitable equipment be made available to the commission to enable it to carry out its task. I am sure my views on this general subject are by now well known, but I emphasize again that the terms of reference should specify that all equipment which it may require will be placed at the disposal of the commission, and that such equipment will be fully under the commission's control. This is a subject on which we suggest that the two co-chairmen of this conference must take action. It has been dilly-dallying on it long enough and now when a proposal is put forward that the members of the commission should try to beg, borrow and steal equipment from the Laotians themselves in Laos, this I suggest is going to a ridiculous extreme and it puts the members of the commission in an impossible position. To this end, the conference will also have to make provision for the funds necessary for the commission's operations. At the present time, India has agreed to advance I think the sum of two hundred thousand dollars but so far as I know there has been no thought given in this conference whatever to the financing and India is just holding the bag and I do repeat that this question of financing is a vital one which has to be faced by every delegation attending this conference.

There is a final point which the conference will have to take into consideration. This is the eventual termination of the commission's activities. Whatever arrangements are agreed upon by this conference, it is, I think, important that the commission itself be given the discretion to recommend when it considers it is no longer required. In addition, of course, the commission should have the capacity to adjust the scale of its operations as circumstances warrant.

I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by stressing again the urgent need for this conference to organize itself in such a way as to make steady and orderly progress toward agreement on specific texts. The urgent need now is to create a momentum toward agreement. This conference has been sitting for nearly five weeks. While we were not sitting for the first three or four days—the distinguished delegates will remember we were all hanging around waiting to start—but we have actually been sitting five weeks tomorrow and there is not much to record in the way of results and as I said the conference has not even settled the simple matter of basic equipment for the commission, to which I shall have to refer again at another time.

Canada, as I have emphasized, approaches the problems of the conference from the point of view of trying to help a country to achieve neutrality, stability and genuine independence—to help an unfortunate country which has been torn by internal strife and subjected to external pressures. All that we ask of this conference is support for the commission in Laos and more rapid progress —much more rapid progress—towards an agreement which will put an end to the tragic situation in that unhappy country.

STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AT THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON LAOS, JUNE 21, 1961

On June 15 I raised the matter of equipment for the international commission in Laos and proposed that three aircraft and three helicopters be made available immediately. The following day, on June 16, the co-chairmen received offers of equipment from the governments of France and United States. These offers were contained in letters to the co-chairmen from the two delegations which have now been circulated as conference documents. You will note that these offers include three helicopters for the use of the commission as well as light aircraft, and the French offer includes the personnel to operate this and other equipment.

On the same day the two co-chairmen, however, met and came up with the idea, if I may use a colloquialism, which was communicated to me, that each member nation of the commission should separately inquire of its commissioner in Laos, whether the equipment might be made available by the parties in Laos, in other words, by Laotians. At the time, I found this notion strange, to say the least, in the light of the two unanimous requests—I repeat, unanimous requests—for equipment that had already been made by the commission and of the offers that had been received. However, in the hope that it would hasten action by the co-chairmen, I agreed to send a message to the Canadian commissioner in Laos asking him whether adequate transport and other requirements could be provided by the Laotian parties. I have now received Mr. Mayrand's reply, Mr. Chairman, which is available for distribution if it is so desired.

Because of the situation in Laos, the commission has had to accept severe limitations in practice on its right and duty to carry out investigations of breaches of the cease fire. As you know, there has been a failure of the parties to give their agreement to such investigations, particularly on the part of the Pathet Lao, despite messages from the co-chairmen urging the parties in Laos to co-operate; and despite also the unanimous decision, again by the three members of the commission that certain specified sensitive areas should be visited.

The results in Laos speak for themselves. In seven weeks of operation the commission has been unable to make a single on-site investigation of any alleged violation of the cease fire, even, as I stated on June 19, of the serious incident at Ban Padong.

Obviously, however, the co-operation of the parties is not the only condition which must be met to enable the commission to exercise full and effective control over the cease fire. The commission, in its report dated May 1, stated to the co-chairmen that it could set up effective machinery of supervision only if the co-chairmen were willing to supply adequate equipment including helicopters and light aircraft. On May 22 the commission provided the co-chairmen with a detailed list of technical requirements which again included an adequate number of helicopters and light aircraft. I remind the distinguished delegate from Poland that both these decisions were unanimous, and were concurred in by his commissioner in the field.

Now the Canadian commissioner in his reply to me sets out a list of the immediate requirements essential for the discharge of the commission, including three helicopters—later to be increased to six—and three light aircraft, together with the necessary maintenance and crews for both. In addition, he states a requirement of 20 jeeps and certain wireless sets.

His answer to the question of whether this kind of equipment can be obtained from the parties is that it would require double the amount of equipment and lead to endless difficulties in defining the territorial limits within which the aircraft and helicopters of each side could operate. This is a situation which would not end overnight even if there were a formal cease fire or political agreement reached among the various parties in Laos.

A further point raised by the Canadian commissioner in Laos is that reliance on Laotian parties for transport and other equipment would be wholly inconsistent with the commission's responsibility to this conference. The conference should deal promptly with this issue of whether the commission is to have the necessary equipment at its disposal and under its own independent control; and thereby free itself from the serious limitations of having to rely on others for its transportation needs.

It must be clearly evident to all, Mr. Chairman, and really should not require a debate to establish that the ability of the commission to discharge its responsibilities in a fair and impartial manner cannot be made subject to the ability or willingness of one or other of the Laotian parties to provide transport and other necessary facilities. Just imagine the situation in which the commission would be placed if, before it could investigate any complaint against one of the parties, it not only would have to obtain the consent of that party to make the visit but also would have to rely on that party to furnish the transportation to the scene and then return the commissioners to the place from which they started. I find it very hard to believe it is the intention of the conference to reduce the commission which is its own agent to a position of impotence and indeed of exposure to ridicule.

This situation cannot and need not continue. Equipment in amounts adequate to the commission's immediate needs has been offered by the French and United States governments. All members have those offers in writing before them. The responsibility now lies fairly and squarely upon the two co-chairmen—the United Kingdom and the Soviet union—to see that this matter is settled. These offers cannot be ignored. The requirements of the commission cannot be ignored. They cannot be argued away. I suggest that without further ado the two co-chairmen should meet with representatives of the three members of the international commission to work out the practical details, consulting as necessary the governments that have made the offers of equipment and any other governments that might offer equipment. In this way, we can get the commission down to work on a practical basis, and we would go far to ensure the result and the success of this conference. I point out that the member nations of this conference cannot evade their responsibility to see that essential equipment is supplied to the commission.

OFFER OF EQUIPMENT BY GOVERNMENT OF UNITED STATES

Delegation of the United States of America

June 16, 1961

Dear Mr. Co-Chairman:

I recall that on May 22 the international commission for supervision and control in Laos forwarded a list of its materiel requirements. This list was in response to the request by the co-chairman that the I.C.C. furnish them with information concerning its equipment needs. I also note that the commission in its letter to the parties in Laos of June 8, has expressed its intentions of visiting and making investigations at various points in Laos. Therefore, it would seem that the commission has immediate need for at least some of the equipment it has requested.

The Minister of External Affairs of Canada, Mr. Green, specifically referred to the need for helicopters among other items in his statement to the conference of June 15. It is with this need in mind that I have been authorized by my government to offer to the co-chairmen and the commission three helicopters (Model H 34) for use by the I.C.C. in Laos. These can be provided within a few days after the acceptance of this offer.

I understand that the government of France has also offered equipment and support, and I hope that other governments represented at this conference will be able to do likewise. The United States government does not preclude the possibility of supplying other equipment or support should it be requested to do so.

The United States government expects that it will receive credit for any equipment it provides under this offer against its share of costs under such arrangements for financial support of the international commission for supervision and control as may be decided upon by the conference.

Sincerely yours,

W. Averell Harriman
U.S. Deputy Representative

Co-Chairman of the International Conference on the Settlement of the Laotian Question,

TELEGRAM DATED JUNE 19, 1961 RECEIVED BY CANADIAN DELEGATION IN GENEVA FROM CANADIAN COMMISSIONER TO THE I.C.S.C. IN LAOS

In its message of May 22, the I.C.S.C. in Laos expressed to the co-chairmen its unanimous recommendations as to the personnel and equipment which in its judgment would be required to carry out its functions. Since May 22 the Canadian delegation in Laos has not changed its views as to the requirements necessary for the proper functioning of the commission.

The Canadian delegation in Laos realizes, however, that it may take some time to engage the personnel and procure and dispatch the equipment which the commission has requested. In view of this fact it believes that it will be helpful to the co-chairmen to have an indication of the priorities which should be observed in fulfilling the commission's requirements so that what is immediately necessary may be dispatched without delay. The Canadian delegation in Laos therefore recommends most strongly that the following personnel and equipment be supplied to the commission at once as being essential for the discharge of its immediate responsibilities:

(a) Three helicopters required immediately, and to be increased to six as soon as possible to ensure that four are always operational.

(b) Three light aircraft with at least six-passenger capacity and capable of using short air strips and flying at ten thousand feet.

(c) Maintenance organization for the helicopters and light aircraft to be established in Laos.

With the foregoing immediate needs in mind, the Canadian delegation in Laos has considered, in accordance with the co-chairmen's request, whether adequate transport and other requirements could be provided by the Laotian parties and has come to the following conclusions:

(a) The provision of helicopters by the Laotian parties is not practical because neither side will agree to permit aircraft piloted by the opposition party to overfly territory occupied or disputed by them nor will the parties admit into the area forward or a defended locality helicopters piloted by the other side. Provision of helicopters by the parties would also mean twice the number held in readiness for commission use, since all investigations and visits by that means would involve double movement or double teams approaching trouble spots first from one side and then the other, whereas neutral helicopters should be able to move from one side to the other without delay or difficulty. The confused situation on the ground often makes clear demarcation of areas under the control of either side virtually impossible and thus the selection of a helicopter from either side for transportation will meet with objection for the reasons already stated. Consequently the commission would be prevented from supervising the cease fire in those disputed areas where available evidence indicates that violations are occurring unless it is equipped with its own helicopters and pilots and the objections of the parties to its movement in such areas are thereby overcome.

(b) Provision of light aircraft by the parties is impracticable for reasons similar to those applying to helicopters.

(c) Provision of vehicles has already proved beyond the capabilities of the parties. The commission representatives of Xieng Khouang are at present provided by Xieng Khouang parties with a total of three jeeps which are in such bad mechanical condition that the commission is having to consider purchase of replacement vehicles. Further, the commission is already supplying, at the request of the Xieng Khouang parties, petrol oil and lubricants for the vehicles allotted for its use there. The Vientiane party is also experiencing difficulty in meeting the minimum needs of the commission for transport in the Vientiane area, and for petrol, oil, and lubricants for vehicles allotted to the commission.

(d) With regard to wireless sets, the responsibility for providing communications between teams and the commission headquarters has been undertaken by India. Communications are as important as transport to the ability of the commission to do its duty. It is essential that the equipment provided be standard and acceptable to the Indian communications officer, upon whom responsibility for the communications service rests.

(e) The most important consideration of all is that reliance upon the Laotian parties for transport and other requirements would be wholly inconsistent with the commission's responsibility for supervising the cease fire. Transport and communications are inseparable from commission operations. The commission must be independent of the parties in these respects if it is to retain its status as a neutral agency and be acceptable to all parties. The ability of the commission to discharge its responsibilities must not be subject to the ability or the willingness of one or other of the Laotian parties to provide transport or other necessary facilities. Such a dependent position would place the commission under the control of the Laotian parties and nullify its capability for conducting impartial investigations. The interests of all the Laotian parties can be served only if the commission has the ability to move and administer itself independently.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST DAY—DISCOVERY DAY, NEWFOUNDLAND

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this day of "St. John the Baptist", may I associate myself with my French speaking fellow Canadians to pay tribute to their patron saint and to again recall in this parliament the contribution of French Canadians to our national life in all its aspects.

I should like to draw a lesson from the life of St. John the Baptist, who was beheaded for his indefectible courage in the defence of freedom and in denouncing the ways of the tyrant of the day. Today, when as a result of the historic evolution of peoples, western nations are faced with the task of defending man's fundamental freedoms, all Canadians need to feel united and draw from their traditions the courage and inspiration required to overcome the problems that may arise and hamper their common efforts for the establishment of a strong and prosperous nation, and full development of all its resources and possibilities.

(Text):

It is fitting as well, Mr. Speaker, to recall that today is Discovery day in Newfoundland. We offer common tribute to the people of Newfoundland who, by joining confederation, have given to all Canadians the right and privilege of claiming a share in their history.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, like the Prime Minister, I should like also to call the attention of the house to an important event in the life of French Canadians: the celebration of St. John the Baptist day, in honour of their patron saint. Throughout French Canada, this feast day is celebrated with joy and enthusiasm. Not only in the province of Quebec are there joyous demonstrations—especially in Montreal, that big city, where is staged every year a parade of floats—to stress the importance of this patron saint's day, but also elsewhere in Canada.

I am just back from western Canada and in Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan, St. John the Baptist day was being celebrated this year. In Cornwall, Ontario, the French week will conclude with the celebration of St. John the Baptist day.

Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that our patron saint's day should thus be celebrated because its purpose is to show that French Canadians are strongly attached to their language and religion. As long as our two cultures, the French and the English, can flourish without hindrance, we will have unity and peace, because they are the prerequisites of the progress and development of the whole country.

I should also like to call attention to the anniversary of the discovery of Newfoundland of which the Prime Minister spoke a few minutes ago. On this occasion, we should like to associate ourselves with our fellow citizens of that province and offer them our best wishes.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of this group I wish to say that we join with the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Laurier in their comments and their recognition of this day so important to Canadians of French origin. I can well appreciate what it means to them, because I know that on their part it is the counterpart of what St. George's day means to many other Canadians. I wish them a happy and successful day in all parts of Canada where this occasion is celebrated.

(Translation):

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on behalf of my French speaking fellow citizens for the good wishes he just tendered to us French Canadians. I also very much appreciate the wishes expressed by the hon. members for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge).

The holiday we are celebrating today in Quebec gives us an opportunity of stopping a few moments, not only to recall our history, but also to note that we now look forward to the future with greater confidence, as the Canadian people today are more and more converging towards a well-conceived and well-applied national unity.

I therefore tender all my English speaking fellow members the most sincere thanks of my countrymen for the regard they expressed today on the occasion of our national holiday.

(Text):

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, as a Scottish Protestant may I associate myself with the remarks that have been made. I am sure all of us are moved by them. We also note with satisfaction the words from Maria Chapdelaine, selected by the incomparable Leonard Brockington in today's magazine section of the Globe and Mail.

(Translation):

May I suggest that, in this country, no one particular ethnical or religious group can claim sole possession of even its own treasures. These are the heritage of all those who are prepared to acknowledge their value.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In the light of the statement he made yesterday in answer to a question concerning Senator Courtemanche, in which he said he had ensured that all ministers should be dissociated in every way from directorships in companies or associations dealing with the government, was the Prime Minister aware that in the Parliamentary Guide for 1960 under "Henri Courtemanche" it is clearly stated that Mr. Courtemanche was a director of l'Hôpital Jean-Talon?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not the record before me at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I think Mr. Courtemanche ceased to be a member of the house on January 8, 1960.

(Translation):

[Later:]

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Has the minister or the officials of his department received a letter from Mr. Guay, secretary of the royal commission on the Jean Talon hospital, or from a representative of that commission, including a transcript of the evidence relating to the Hon. Henri Courtemanche?

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday about noon we received in the office of the deputy minister of justice a copy of a transcript of the proceedings of Friday, a week ago yesterday. We have not yet received copies of the transcripts of the subsequent proceedings relating to Senator Courtemanche but, as the Prime Minister advised the house yesterday, in the letter asking for this first transcript we also requested to be provided with copies of transcripts of any subsequent proceedings in which Senator Courtemanche was involved.

[Later:]

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the Prime Minister to my previous question, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment on the fact that the Parliamentary Guide for 1959 lists Mr. Courtemanche as a director and treasurer of l'Hôpital Jean Talon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is entering the field of cross examination rather than seeking information. The Parliamentary Guide is available to all members. In effect the hon. member is asking whether the Prime Minister read the Parliamentary Guide, I suppose, at a certain time. It does not seem to me that is a question which should be asked.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister made a statement to the effect that ministers of the crown would not be associated with directorships in companies. This morning I asked whether the Prime Minister was aware that in the Parliamentary Guide of 1960 Mr. Courtemanche was listed as a director and treasurer of l'Hôpital Jean Talon, to which the Prime Minister replied that in 1960, as far as his memory was concerned, Mr. Courtemanche was no longer a member of parliament but had been sent to the other place. My question is—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I comprehend all those facts which the hon. member has repeated, but it seems to me that rather than asking for information the hon. member is seeking to cross-examine or debate the earlier statement which the Prime Minister made. There is a more appropriate time to do that than on the orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PORTUGAL—STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SUPPLYING MUNITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I wish to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East concerning the supply of munitions to Portugal.

As the house is aware, Canada has a mutual aid program which was designed for the purpose of helping our European NATO allies build up their capacity to resist aggression. It is carried out under NATO sponsorship, and allocations are made on the basis of recommendations from the central NATO military and civilian authorities.

Under this program Canada has given assistance to Portugal. Such assistance has been provided on the understanding that it should be used only to strengthen the capacity of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to defer or resist aggression, and only for the defence of the NATO area as defined in article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty. This understanding has been formally communicated to all countries, including Portugal, which have received Canadian mutual aid.

There have been no deliveries of munitions to Portugal since November 1960.

FINANCE

GOLD—REPORTED ACTIVITY OF SPECULATORS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement made by Mr. Jacobsson, managing director of the international monetary fund, that gold speculators in the United States, Canada and other countries are inventing and spreading rumours about currency changes that are damaging the economies of the countries in question, would the minister inform the house whether he has any knowledge of activities of gold speculators in Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): None in particular, Mr. Speaker. Purchases and sales of gold are undoubtedly going on in many markets the world over, and those who are engaged in such transactions no doubt are interested in whatever plans various countries may have in relation to currency changes.

THE BUDGET

CONSULTATION WITH MONETARY FUND ON EXCHANGE RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? I asked the minister a question along these lines yesterday in order to ascertain whether Mr. Rasminsky informed Mr. Jacobsson of the minister's intention prior to the presentation of the budget.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I thought I made myself clear yesterday, Mr. Speaker, when in reply to a similar question I told my hon. friend that Mr. Rasminsky was in Washington on Tuesday and Wednesday. He had talked to Mr. Jacobsson and I believe to other members of the executive board of the international monetary fund. I did not have the precise times of these discussions, but I understood these discussions did take place on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Mr. Benidickson: There is some significance that I think the minister is overlooking, as to whether or not this information was given before or after his presentation of the budget. I hope that perhaps by Monday the minister could ascertain whether the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada did or did not inform the international monetary fund's director of the minister's intention before the presentation of the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, let there be no question about that matter. There are contacts frequently with Mr. Jacobsson in regard to various questions of interest to the international monetary fund. Mr. Rasminsky, as Canada's member on the international monetary fund board, had permission to discuss with Mr. Jacobsson any of these matters that might be thought to be of interest to the international monetary fund authorities.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister please be so good as to be precise on Monday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to get that information, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure the hon. member that it will not have significance as far as the point he is pursuing is concerned. Mr. Rasminsky and I had discussed this question and he had authority to have such discussions as might be desirable with the authorities of the fund.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a related question. In view of the fact that it is proposed on Monday to debate the act respecting the Bank of Canada, will the minister consider getting the information and replying to my starred question on Monday in order that this information will be available for the debate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I asked the officials of the Department of Finance yesterday to obtain that information. I cannot guarantee that it will be available, but we will do our best.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he can inform the house when the order of the house relating to notice of motion No. 142, which was passed on Wednesday, June 7, will be complied with. The order requests the production of the list of awards to veterans made by the Newfoundland commission government. It is a very short list; I think there are only about 18 names or 19 names on it.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will check on that matter and give an answer later.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): While the Secretary of State is doing that checking, I wonder whether he would mind checking in order to find out how soon it is proposed to make a return to two motions adopted in this house some time ago with respect to the tabling of orders in council for which there was no legal authority. Presumably there are such orders or the motion would not have been adopted by the house. I think it would be most interesting to have this particular matter accelerated.

Mr. Dorion: I will check on the matter, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

MRS. MALONEY—REPORTED DANGER OF DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I wonder whether I might raise an urgent matter with the Prime Minister. I regret that I was unable to give him notice, but I have only now received a wire. I understand that a Mrs. Maloney is being held in Oakalla prison without benefit of bail and that she is in danger of being deported from Canada at any moment. Is the Prime Minister in a position to assure us that Mrs. Maloney will not be deported until she has had adequate legal aid?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about Mrs. Maloney. I will have the question looked into.

FIRES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister whether, particularly in view of the fact that today is Discovery day in Newfoundland and that on this day in an area very close to the place where Canada was discovered in 1497 there are really quite serious and possibly disastrous fires burning, the government of Canada would consider joining with the government of Quebec in offering any assistance it might be possible to give in the fighting of those fires.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of National Defence might reply to that question. That department is always ready to give assistance, and I am sure the minister has something to say in this connection.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I received information just before coming into the house that Newfoundland has asked for help from the Royal Canadian Navy and the R.C.A.F. They have asked for both personnel and vehicles to fight forest fires in the vicinity of the northern portion of the St. John's area. Eastern command Halifax has instructed the Newfoundland area commander, Brigadier Morres, to make arrangements to honour the request to every degree feasible by the resources of the R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. that are there and able to be used.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to thank the minister for his reply and say that I am sure his attitude will be greatly appreciated.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLOWANCE TO POSTAL EMPLOYEES WORKING ON JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Perhaps it could be taken as notice, but I prefer to give him notice now because of the urgency of time. I have been receiving a great many telegrams, letters and telephone calls about a condition in the Post Office Department respecting postal employees who are required to work on Saturday, July 1. Because of some apparent uncertainty as to the exact provisions, would the minister advise the house what allowance by way of overtime pay or extra leave will be granted to postal employees who are required to work on Saturday, July 1?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to do so. I might point out to the hon. member that some days ago a directive covering this matter went out to all our offices across Canada explaining the situation to those who are directly concerned. Of course I will be delighted to try to explain this to the hon. member with the hope that he will eventually be able to understand.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should add that it is that directive that has caused the uncertainty and confusion.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may address a question to the senior parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, and ask him whether on one of his recent rare visits to the house and to the capital the minister has had the time to bring the question of compensation in respect to potato rot in Prince Edward Island about which he made promises over two months ago, to the attention of his colleagues.

An hon. Member: We do not get anything for tommyrot.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): The minister answered that question very favourably the other day when you asked it. I suggest that the hon. member just wants to get his name in Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: That answer is not very complimentary to the potato growers.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—REQUEST FOR LOWERING OF INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since housing starts seasonally adjusted have declined since February of this year, has the government any plans to reverse this trend, such as the lowering of National Housing Act interest rates?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I seem to recall that the hon. gentleman objected to information being given in regard to housing starts the other day.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, if I may say so with respect, the matter you are referring to was a matter of statistics, and the matter I am now referring to is one of policy which has resulted in a decline in housing starts, despite the figures which have been given to the contrary, because the seasonal adjustment shows that these starts are down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will appreciate that matters of policy are not declared on orders of the day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or any other time.

Supply—Health and Welfare

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

255. Departmental administration, $1,821,267.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Chairman, in line with my usual practice I propose to make a brief general statement in opening the committee's consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

As hon. members will note from the blue book, we are budgeting for a total expenditure in the fiscal year 1961-62 of approximately $1,600 million. This represents an increase of close to $150 million or roughly 10 per cent over the previous 12-month period. A customary feature of the department's annual spending program is the predominance of statutory expenditures. This is again apparent in our proposed outlays for 1961-62, in which statutory items amount to about $1,500 million or 94 per cent of the grand total.

Here the main components are: $606,600,000 for payments required under the Old Age Security Act; $523 million for payments required under the Family Allowances Act; $270 million for the federal share of costs under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act; $45,100,000 for federal contributions under the Unemployment Assistance Act; $30,900,000 for payments to the provinces under the Old Age Assistance Act; $16,600,000 for payments to the provinces under the Disabled Persons Act; and $4,200,000 for payments to the provinces under the Blind Persons Act.

Such statutory items account, as I have said, for 94 per cent of our projected total outlays for the fiscal year 1961-62. The remaining 6 per cent or $96 million represents items to be voted by parliament. These include: $47 million for payments to the provinces under the national health grants; $25 million for Indian and northern health services; $8 million for emergency health, welfare and training services; $3,700,000 for quarantine, immigration medical and sick mariners services; $2,300,000 for administration of the Food and Drugs Act; and $2,400,000 for laboratory and advisory services.

Looking at the increase in departmental outlays for 1961-62, statutory items account for $141,100,000 of the $150 million total increase. By far the most important factor is an additional $103 million required for the hospital insurance and diagnostic services program. This is to take care of anticipated increases in expenditures including the first full year of federal contributions under the agreement signed with the province of Quebec which became operative on January 1, 1961. The remaining $38,100,000 increase will cover the normal year to year growth of the various statutory welfare benefits which are paid either fully by the dominion government or on a sharing basis with the provinces.

Of the over-all $8,900,000 increase in voted items, $5 million relates to the national health grants and chiefly to the acceleration of hospital construction projects. The $2,600,000 increase in emergency health, welfare and training services is required largely for completion of phase 1 of the transportable hospital program. The net increase of $590,000 for Indian and northern health services is associated with the further expansion of services provided by that directorate.

This, then, is the broad outline of the department's spending program for the fiscal year 1961-62 which, as I have pointed out, totals close to $1,600 million. As hon. members are aware, there are a number of important policy steps which have recently been implemented in connection with my department. These include a new narcotic control act, an amendment to the Food and Drugs Act with reference to the so-called goof ball problem, and the announcement of the membership and terms of reference of the royal commission on health care.

In this regard, it has been most gratifying to the government to note the generally favourable reaction which these steps have evoked throughout the country. This is particularly evident in relation to the comprehensiveness of the study outlined in the terms of reference of the royal commission. On this point, we have felt that it would be unwise to attempt to examine any particular aspect in isolation, since health services are interdependent and must be closely integrated.

For example, the committee will note that the terms of reference not only envisage a close study of health services but also focus attention on the importance of training of professional and technical personnel and related medical research. This is to ensure that health services in Canada keep pace with developments in medical science which in turn will provide the highest possible quality of health care for all Canadians.

As far as the commission itself is concerned, I know the committee will welcome the fact that such a distinguished group of Canadians have been willing to set aside their ordinary activities in order to serve the country in a matter of such great importance. Under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Hall I am sure the study will proceed with all possible dispatch.

I should like to say a few words about the hospital insurance and diagnostic services program, which is now in operation throughout Canada. As hon. members will recall, the twelfth and final agreement was signed with the province of Quebec in December, 1960 and became effective January 1, 1961. While not all the provinces have as yet fully implemented the federal legislation with respect to insured out-patient services, we have reached the stage where some 18 million Canadians are eligible for coverage for basic in-patient hospital and diagnostic services.

From the point of view of my department, our estimated contribution to provincial programs for 1961-62 is $270 million. This, as I said, represents an increase of $103 million over the original estimate for 1960-61. The bulk of the increase is due, of course, to the fact that the province of Quebec, with a population of some 5,200,000, will be participating for the first time over a full 12-month period. Federal advances in this regard have been set at something over $72 million. In addition, an allowance has to be made for the final adjustment with the provinces for the calendar years 1959 and 1960, as well as for expected rises in costs associated with such factors as increasing bed utilization owing to increased numbers of hospital beds and growing population.

If I might be permitted to go back to the fiscal year 1960-61 for a moment, the house will recall that our original estimate of federal contributions was $167 million. As things turned out, this was on the low side. It did not include, for example, the participation of Quebec during the first three months of 1961 which, of course, could not have been foreseen when the calculations were made. This has involved federal outlays of some $13,900,000. When allowance is also made for increases in the cost of hospital operations generally, the total federal contribution for 1960-61 amounted to $189 million.

I turn now to the national health grants. Hon. members will note a change in their presentation in the blue book. For 1961-62 they have been split up into two separate votes, general health grants and hospital construction grants. Formerly they were all under one vote but under separate headings. The new arrangement, I would point out, is merely for greater administrative convenience. As the committee is aware, there are certain differences between hospital construction grants and the other grants, particularly the fact that funds outstanding under the former are subject to annual revote while those under the latter lapse at the end of each fiscal year. In view of such considerations, it has been felt more appropriate to have them appear under separate votes.

I wish to say a word now about polio vaccine. The dominion government has, of course, played an important part in the nation-wide Salk immunization program. Some $6 million in federal funds has been contributed toward the cost of producing the vaccine, and the same kind of support is now being given the development in Canada of the new Sabin-type live polio virus vaccine. This oral vaccine is being manufactured in Canada at the Connaught medical research laboratories in Toronto, and plans are under way at the institute of microbiology and hygiene in Montreal for similar production. Federal financial support in this regard has already amounted to over $250,000. While it is still too early to assess the results of various demonstrations conducted in different parts of Canada, indications so far have been favourable. Because, however, of certain technical difficulties, licensing of the vaccine is still a matter which is under review.

Another development in connection with my department's health activities merits brief mention. This was the opening on January 16, 1961 of a new 80-bed general hospital at Inuvik, Northwest Territories. Costing close to $2 million, the hospital provides an important additional link in our far flung services for Indians, Eskimos, and other residents of the north. It will cover primarily the Mackenzie river delta, and brings to 22 the total number of hospitals operated by our Indian and northern health services.

On the welfare side of my department's operations, it will be noted that this continues to account for the great bulk of our annual expenditures. In fact cash benefit programs such as family allowances, old age security and various joint federal-provincial pension arrangements add up to $1,200 million out of our total budget of $1,600 million.

For 1961-62 our expenditures for old age security are expected to reach some $600 million. This substantial amount is due not only to the steady increase in the number of recipients but also to the higher rate of benefits paid now as compared with the amount provide at the time the program was inaugurated. Indeed, of the amount now involved, approximately $165 million is due to the increase in benefits from $40 to $55 a month.

A further point worth mentioning is the current state of the old age security fund. In the fiscal year just completed, revenues from the three earmarked taxes were sufficient to meet benefit payments. For the first time in the history of the program it was not necessary to resort to loans to make up a deficit. This is a most encouraging development, and means that old age security has at last achieved the original objective of financing on a pay as you go basis.

As hon. members will recall, an important change was introduced in the program last year. I refer to the new provision permitting qualified old age security recipients to draw pensions while residing outside Canada even on a permanent basis. This move was very well received throughout the country and has, I believe, been of substantial value to many pensioners who for one reason or another have chosen to leave Canada.

It is interesting to note the number of persons who have taken advantage of the amendment. As of April 30, 1961, 6,758 pensioners were receiving old age security benefits out of the country. This represents three quarters of 1 per cent of the total number benefiting under the program. Of these out of country recipients, 1,357 were residing in the United Kingdom, 4,536 in the United States and 865 in other countries of the world. As I have pointed out the legislation now permits payments to qualified pensioners who are absent indefinitely. According to our latest figures, 2,777 pensioners have been away from Canada beyond the period of six months. This is one third of 1 per cent of the total number of recipients.

At this point it might be of interest to see where Canada stands in relation to other federal states of the western world in the matter of cash benefits for senior citizens. In 1959-60 our expenditures, including old age security and old age assistance, represented 2.45 per cent of the net national income. In the same year, payments in Australia accounted for 2.33 per cent of national income and in the United States for 2.66 per cent. The latter includes both the O.A.S.I. and old age assistance programs. This small differential between the United States and Canada is particularly significant when you consider that per capita personal income in the United States is almost a third higher than in Canada.

Before leaving the matter of benefits for senior citizens I should perhaps add that the government is continuing its examination of various approaches to old age income security. This includes of course matters such as portable pensions, the Clark report, and developments in other countries. In view of the growing interest on the part of labour, management and a number of provinces in the provision of more adequate private pension arrangements, this area has been receiving particular consideration. As hon. members are aware, the Minister of Finance in his latest budget statement indicated that the government has decided to ask the co-operation of the provinces to deal with the solvency and portability of private pension plans. We consider that there is room for more widespread expansion of these plans on a secure basis, and are prepared to work with the provinces toward this end.

A survey which is now being carried out by the dominion bureau of statistics should prove to be of particular value in connection with this latest proposal. This survey will provide up to date data on the number of persons covered under private pension plans, the nature and extent of vesting and cash surrender provisions, as well as information on the transferability of pension rights. These and other facts relating to private provisions for old age income security should prove most helpful in any federal-provincial discussions on this subject.

I might also say a word or two about the unemployment assistance program. As I mentioned earlier, our estimated expenditures in this regard amount to some $45 million for the current fiscal year. Since claims by the provinces for federal reimbursement may be as much as six months late in reaching my department, it is not possible to provide up to date figures as to the number receiving benefits under the program. In October, 1960, however, it appears that the total coverage had reached something over 400,000 persons including dependents.

The increase in expenditures under unemployment assistance over the past few years has been due to a number of factors. Among these are the program's extension to all provinces and the territories, the removal of the threshold provision and the increase in rates of benefits paid by the provinces and municipalities. In addition, there is the fact that a number of provinces, including Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, are now using the program to provide supplementary relief payments to recipients of old age security, old age assistance, blindness and disability allowances. This means in effect that the dominion government has been sharing in additional aid above the general level of $55 a month, which in cases of special need has not constituted a rigid ceiling on benefit payments.

I do not plan to make any remarks at this time with regard to the fitness, recreation and amateur sports program forecast in the speech from the throne and which, as the Prime Minister mentioned in answer to a question in the house recently, will be dealt with through legislation. An opportunity will be provided for detailed consideration of this subject when the matter is brought before the house.

Finally I should like to turn to our efforts in emergency planning and radiation protection. Earlier this year cabinet approval was given for the establishment of a special advisory committee to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on emergency health services. Like its predecessor, the defence medical and dental services advisory board, this committee is composed of the appropriate federal officials as well as representatives of various national health organizations. Its first meeting took place here in Ottawa last month, and I am glad to say that a good start was made toward providing greater stimulus and continuity to the progress of emergency health planning in Canada.

As in the case of emergency health activities, the greatest problem in emergency welfare planning has been to encourage the setting up of suitable organizations within provincial departments. I am therefore happy to inform the house that arrangements have now been worked out with nine provinces, including the appointment of five provincial emergency welfare service planning officers to be paid under the financial assistance program. Taken together with the increasing coordination of policy and stepped-up training activities, this development, I believe, augurs well for the continued growth of Canada's capability to meet whatever emergency welfare needs may arise in the years ahead.

On the matter of radiation protection, I have indicated on previous occasions that preparations were under way for what is called a total body monitor unit. The physical facilities for the unit have now been completed and the necessary equipment and special steel shielding installed. When in full operation the total body monitor will constitute a major addition to our over-all radiation measurements program.

Other aspects of our radiation protection activities have continued to expand to meet the increasing demand for services. A network of 23 stations has been set up across Canada for the regular collection of samples of air, rainfall and soil. The well established milk sampling program is going ahead, and we are also beginning to receive human bone samples in accordance with a revised sampling pattern. The results of all of these studies are published in quarterly and annual reports.

In this connection, the latest figures on strontium-90 in milk bear out our expectation of declining levels. For the fourth quarter of 1960 the national average was 9.5 micromicrocuries per gram calcium compared with 15, 12.9 and 9.3 during the previous three quarters of 1960. These levels are all the more significant when it is recalled that the quarterly figures for 1959 were 10.8, 18, 14.6 and 14.2 respectively.

During the past 12 months additional laboratory facilities have been provided for the analysis of radioactive samples from foreign countries. This, as hon. members will recall, was planned as Canada's contribution to the world-wide fall-out study program of the United Nations scientific committee on the effects of atomic radiation. In this connection negotiations have been under way with four countries, Ghana, Pakistan, Burma and Malaya. Agreement in principle has now been reached with the first three, while discussions with the fourth are still in process.

Just before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pay a tribute to the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare who have assisted me during the past year, many of whom have been in the department for many years, and to their dedication to duty during that period. I should also like to mention that yesterday morning I had the pleasure of turning the sod for a new headquarters building at Tunney's pasture. This will bring units now scattered in some 19 different locations throughout Ottawa under one roof for the first time, and while it is going to take some two years to complete the building I am sure that the new headquarters will lend itself to much more efficiency in the management of the department.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, no one regrets more than I the unavoidable absence this morning of the former minister of national health and welfare, the member for Essex East, by reason of a previous commitment. In these late days of the session we have very little advance notice, of course, which departmental estimates will be discussed on Saturdays. So it falls to me today, as it did two years ago, I believe, under similar circumstances involving short notice, to make some observations on behalf of the official opposition in connection with the department's program and comment upon the statements made by the minister in introducing his estimates for 1961-62.

I was a bit disappointed by his presentation. This is a terrifically important department of government from the point of view of human benefit and advancement. The minister did not say so, but in recent years it has been the second largest spending department of the government. The minister also did not say so, but I suspect that in the coming year it may perhaps overtake the Department of National Defence as the biggest spending department. Although the minister indicated that over 94 per cent of the department's expenditures result from prior statutory decisions and are not policy matters that come before us for consideration at this time, the fact is that new advances require legislation and the minister has not given us any indication that such new legislation is being planned by the department.

In my opinion he confined himself too much to a financial and statistical analysis of the department. In a department of this kind I would have thought we might have had from the minister an indication that the department is not standing still, that it has studies actively under way beyond those to which he referred, which were not very many in number, that would involve new programs which would indicate that the department was continuing to provide inspiring and imaginative leadership in welfare and health arenas. I regret that in the report the minister made in introducing his estimates there was nothing with respect to the views of the department on a comprehensive medical health plan.

Respecting pensions, we have heard from the minister every two months during the past two years in which he has had the Clark report in his possession that he has been studying this report. He said nothing more about it in his presentation today.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes I said we were studying it.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, studying it; and, as I have said, the minister has made similar statements every two months over the past two years.

All of us receive copies of the representations that are made to the cabinet each year by the Canadian welfare council, and we note the many imaginative and advanced programs set out therein. The minister made no reference to the attitude of the government toward the representations made by this most competent, most dedicated, voluntary organization. A resolution was introduced during this session by the hon. member for Mount Royal respecting the problem of mental health. At that time the minister said he had a great deal of sympathy for the purport of the resolution. This is another important field in which no report was given to the nation by the minister during the introduction of his estimates.

Earlier this session I raised a question with regard to Canada's participation in an important conference held in Washington relating to medical care for the aged. We have heard no reference to that. If the government is not prepared to embark upon a comprehensive medical plan, are there no studies under way in respect of medical assistance at least for the aged? There was some reference in the minister's statement to portable pensions. The Ontario government has had a committee at work in this field, and this committee believes a central agency should undertake consideration of portable and transferable pensions. This subject was mentioned in the budget speech, and reference was made to the fact that it is merely under study and that the participation of the provinces is required.

The minister mentioned the old age security fund. He said that, for the first time, the fund was in balance. We all know that in 1959 new taxes were imposed on the income tax side, on the excise tax side and on the corporation tax side which were designed to bring in from the point of view of tax imposts $2 for every dollar to which the government had committed itself in extra payments under old age security in the previous year.

The minister gave some illustrations of the percentage of national expenditure applied in some countries in the health and welfare field. He compared Canada's position in this respect to that of the United States, Australia and some other countries. There is a feeling in Canada and the United States, particularly among businessmen, that one of the handicaps from which they suffer in competing in world markets is the fact that we have an unnecessarily heavy burden of welfare payments.

I have been looking at some reports recently provided by the Canadian tax foundation. I was startled to realize that this impression that is held and spread by many Canadian businessmen to the effect that they cannot compete in export markets because of the tax burden imposed by welfare payments is not borne out by the facts. I find that, on the tax side, our taxes are not higher than those imposed by the countries of western Europe and Britain from which our businessmen are getting the keenest competition. On the welfare side, the tax foundation reports that the welfare payments of those countries take a greater percentage of the national income than is the situation in either Canada or the United States. We must not excuse our failure to compete in the markets of the world with countries such as Germany and the other keen, aggressive countries in western Europe by saying that we pay higher taxes in Canada, or that government legislation in Canada and the United States imposes upon the business community the cost of welfare payments beyond those of our competitors in western Europe. These are not the facts.

The minister referred to unemployment assistance. I hope later, during the discussion of his estimates, we will hear much more about this subject. It is true that $45 million will be required under this program, according to the estimates which are before us. The minister said that in October, 1960 some 400,000 Canadians participated in the unemployment assistance provided by this legislation. He said that this resulted from a number of factors. He quoted some liberalization of the rules under which the federal department participates with the provinces and, in turn, with the municipalities in this field. Of course one would not expect the minister to mention what I believe to be the fundamental factor, that such a huge number participated. I pointed out the reason for this condition the other day in the budget debate, when I referred to the complacency and lack of planning on the part of this government which has resulted in a lack of proper growth in our economy, a stagnation which has meant that the gross national product has not increased in the same way it has in other countries throughout the world to take care of those who are entering our labour force.

I remind the members of the committee that as recently as last year the estimates committee spent 20 sittings studying the program and expenditures of this Department of National Health and Welfare. I was a member of that committee. I felt the review was very rewarding indeed. The Hansard record of the estimates committee covers over 500 pages, and as a result of that review last year perhaps we will be able to shorten the debate today in this committee of supply of the House of Commons.

However, I want to refer again to what I think is the most important next step that must be considered by those in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I refer, of course, to a comprehensive medical plan. We have had a short experience now with the hospital insurance plan. However, hospitalization insurance alone falls short. I think all national political parties have been giving this matter considerable attention. Better programs are available in other countries. However, I wish to put on the record the up to date plan the Liberal party proposes in this field. In doing so may I say that I am quoting from the resolution presented and approved unanimously at its rally in January, 1961:

> Second only to the threat of unemployment is the threat of illness. Hospital insurance, which has now become available to all Canadians, does much to lessen the insecurity of ill health. But it is not enough. Many people still face medical costs outside the hospital scheme, that are financially crippling to them. While various good schemes of prepaid medical care are in operation, they are not available to everyone, on terms everyone can afford. In consequence there are still many Canadians who go without medical care that they need; and others, whom serious illness forces to go to a doctor are thereby pushed into overwhelming debt or a catastrophic impairment of their savings.

It is the Liberal policy to end such social evils. Universal hospital insurance was a big step forward. Further measures are needed to reduce the insecurity arising from illness. A new Liberal government will undertake at once, to provide extended hospital facilities including mental health and rehabilitation, comprehensive care by doctors, drugs and medicines and diagnostic services.

Now the question arises, how is this plan going to be paid for? This, of course, was questioned when we were still dealing with the supplementary budget of the Minister of Finance in January after the rally of the Liberal party. Nothing could be clearer as to the Liberal party's position in this respect than what was stated by the Leader of the Opposition on January 20, 1961 when those on the government side questioned the financial responsibility that was involved in a program of this kind. As found at page 1273 of Hansard the Leader of the Opposition gave four fiscal measures which he felt were being neglected and were of imperative concern after more immediate actions such as dealing with unemployment. He referred to reduction of the rates of personal income tax. He referred to extra unemployment benefits and some other matters. But with respect to the all-embracing plan for health he said this; that perhaps the most important of those things that must come forward as needed new programs for Canadians is the matter of a medical health plan. The leader of this party said that this, of course, is one of those things that should be implemented during an expanding economy and not a contracting economy. Under the present government we have had five deficits in succession. Under the previous administration we were able to provide surpluses and reduce our debt. Under circumstances such as these, on a deficit financing basis, of course, perhaps it is not possible to finance the substantial costs of a medical health plan. However, given policies that would return us to surpluses in our financial administration I say, as did the Leader of the Opposition, that this would be one of the first of the new measures that should be added to Canada's health and welfare program.

An hon. Member: The Liberals were in power for 22 years.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend refers to that. I say to him that there was not one of the programs advanced to the Canadian electorate by the Liberal party in 22 years and involving no participation by other governments, such as governments at the provincial level, that was not carried out according to the commitments that were made by the Liberal party.

In addition I point out that inflation is a very important factor as to the value of the welfare programs that are provided. I think of the very pertinent comment that was made in the session of 1957-1958 when this government assumed office. We were then debating the speech from the throne. The former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, had taken his position on the other side of the chamber as leader of the opposition. I think he described a sensible position with respect to welfare advance in these words, as found at page 44 of Hansard of October 16, 1957:

As for the measures forecast to increase old age security and other social benefits, naturally every true Liberal will welcome them in principle. Our sole concern will be to see how they fit into the whole financial picture and how far the government will take effective measures to control the rise in the cost of living which, if unchecked, could easily take away all the advantages of the proposed increases.

Naturally, as I perhaps take a special interest, because of party assignments, in the financial policies of the country, I express some apprehension about inflation. Some of the matters that we shall debate during the budget discusison and even in connection with the Bank of Canada bill concern welfare payments. I wish to say that Mr. St. Laurent's words of 1957 should be regarded by members of this house with the utmost attention. The people who will lose most or suffer most by reckless financial policies, by monetizing in an unnecessary or improper way or by any wild operation of the Bank of Canada, are those whose cheques we are concerned about today when we are examining the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to start off by doing something that I think I always try to do, namely by giving credit where credit is due and, of course, to criticize where we feel criticism is warranted. I should like to pay tribute to the sincerity of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I have always found him to take his duties very seriously and to discharge them very sincerely. I should also like to pay tribute to the devotion to duty of the members of his department. Because of the fact that the departments are so closely intertwined and interwoven I also pay a special tribute to the provincial department of health and welfare in Ontario and to the deputy minister, Mr. James S. Band, with whom I have had occasion to have considerable dealings in connection with individual problems in the field of health and welfare.

For four years the party to which I belong has been critical of the policies of the present minister, as we were critical of the policies of the previous government during their term of office. With all due respect to my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River, for whom

I have a very high regard, I do not think we can take the Liberal promises any more seriously today than we could when I was two years old and they promised us health insurance. However, in my few remarks today, in the interests of getting this extended session drawn that much closer to a close I intend to try to make a technical, at least in my humble opinion, rather than a political criticism of this situation.

If the C.C.F. party has for many years criticized this particular field it is because we feel that as a nation possibly this has been our greatest failure. In this very favoured country in which we live this is one field in which we lag far, far behind so many countries throughout the world. It is interesting to note that recently we have been joined in our criticism of the present methods and policies in connection with health and welfare by an ever growing number of people and newspapers throughout the country.

I should like to draw particular attention to the Globe and Mail of May 10, 1961. The whole of page 7 of this newspaper is devoted to this very problem. I think some of the things stated on this page might very well be placed on Hansard while we are debating this issue today. There is, for example, an article written Professor Kenneth Duncan, who is in the department of economic and political science, University of Western Ontario. I think some of his words are very apropos to the item before the committee. He says:

> Welfare and social services provided to needy Canadians should be rationally organized and entirely financed from the public purse. In every province—and the province is the effective jurisdictional unit—these services are now provided by ill co-ordinated, overlapping, understaffed and underfinanced congeries of private and public agencies.
> This ramshackle structure is a heritage from a time when all seemed to agree that it was no part of the government's duty to do much to comfort the afflicted. Most charity and social service work was then regarded as a matter for religious bodies, personal philanthropy or private organizations of the tender minded. It was in such a day that some of our best known and most useful agencies were founded.

A little later in his article he says:

> Today, we find every level of government providing a variety of services or welfare payments such as family allowance, mother's allowance, old age assistance, public relief, medical care of the indigent, treatment for alcoholics, blind pensions etc. Yet public authorities were always willing to permit private agencies to go on providing services since it kept down taxes—

I should like to digress for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to underline that point. I have mentioned this on many occasions in the house. This is one of the fields in which we like to indulge in our favourite pastime of self-delusion. We feel that as long as we can keep taxes down the government are doing a good job in this field, when in fact they are failing and are remiss in their duties. By virtue of keeping taxes down they do not provide these services and in fact, as is mentioned in this article, through a conglomeration of various agencies the cost to the public is actually higher than it would be if these agencies were properly organized. Professor Duncan goes on to say:

> —and there remains as a consequence a complex of private agencies providing such things as child care and protection, family counselling, nursing and health services, care of homeless and transient men, protection of unwed mothers and numerous other services which by contemporary standards are necessary to the community.
> Such an arrangement as this leads almost inevitably to inefficiency in operation, poor inter-agency co-ordination, high costs in terms of services given and to some abuse by professional indigents. It has persisted this long because each private agency inevitably becomes a vested interest.

I think that is one of our greatest problems in trying to get something done in this field. Over the years we have seen so many fields in the many different branches that make up the Department of Health and Welfare. We have seen these little, vested interests grow up in our society, and once they have grown up they dig in their heels and resist all efforts to improve the over-all situation because it interferes with their own particular organization.

In saying this I am not being critical of the individual organizations as such. Many good people devote many hours of hard work in order to make a success of their particular organizations. However, I think if we look at the over-all picture we see that the headline on this page is very well warranted. The headline reads:

> Is full government control the answer to the failure of our welfare agencies?

That is being very critical of the present situation of the various health and welfare agencies in our society, but I think the criticism is very much warranted because if governments were doing the job they are capable of doing and should be doing in the first place, we would not need this great conglomeration of agencies be they religious, service club, private or what have you. The only reason these have sprung up across the country and have grown is that there was a great need in this field. I fully appreciate that at one time the thinking was that governments had no responsibility in this field, but I do not think we will find too many people in the country today who will go along with that type of thinking.

On the same page of this issue of the Globe and Mail there is another article written by a man who is very well known in this field, Professor John S. Morgan, who is in the school of social work of the University of Toronto. The first paragraph of his article is, I think, well worth mentioning at this time. It reads:

> The time has come to bring welfare up to date. Too many of us think of welfare as something that the rich provide for the poor or the wise give to the foolish. In actual fact, in a modern industrial society, all of us are recipients of welfare services and all of us contribute in some way to the provision of welfare services. The problem of welfare in the future is to organize the complex operations of this mutual dependency in the most effective, the most economical and the most efficient way.

I think the minister could do much worse than give a great deal of thought to the words of Professor Morgan. He is well known as one of the experts in this particular field on the North American continent. On the same page there is another article written by a gentleman who is becoming well known and who certainly is well versed in his own field. I am not going to deal with some of the most bitter criticisms in his article, because I think I could go as far as to say there may even be a political twist to this. I know the gentleman very well; he originally came from my own town of Timmins. This is an article written by Mr. Gower Markle, who is the Canadian director of education and welfare for the united steel workers of America. I should like to read one paragraph which I think is apropos of my remarks today. This paragraph reads as follows:

> Much of the current debate on welfare is on the level of "who will give and how much" and "who will receive and how much". This serves only to obscure the fact that Canadians have yet to make a fundamental decision whether we are socially responsible or not. And if the answer is negative all the rest becomes irrelevant.
> If the answer is positive—then, we have to determine how best to provide the goods and services required to take care of the present needy.

I should like now to highlight one matter which I believe to be a great problem and drawback in our efforts to develop some kind of sensible, comprehensive health and welfare program across this country. This problem involves a tendency on the part of many individuals and newspapers to look only at the actual cost in dollars involved in the development of a program upon which the government, through the Department of National Health and Welfare could embark, and completely ignore the resulting savings from the adoption of measures of this kind. They also completely ignore the better health standards that accrue from the adoption of such measures.

Another drawback to our efforts in this regard is the tendency on the part of governments, both federal and provincial, to boast about the number of dollars spent in certain fields, as though by the mere mention of the amount spent the job is accomplished. I suggest it is time to look at our health and welfare measures in the light of what has been accomplished and what has yet to be done rather than by just totalling up on an adding machine the X number of dollars which have already been spent.

We in this group for many years have propounded the need in this country of a portable pension plan. I have mentioned before one of the biggest obstacles to the accomplishment of this type of plan and do not intend to deal with it at length today. However, I should like to say that the obstacle arises because of the fact that over the years we have built up little groups of vested interests with pension plans, such as in industry and in municipalities, here and there and all over. In fact we have heard a great deal within the last few days about one pension plan, and we shall probably hear quite a bit more about it within the next few days.

Have we ever stopped to think that even this particular controversial pension plan of the past, present, but not too far in the future, governor of the Bank of Canada would involve no issue at the present time if it were part of a portable pension plan available to all citizens of this country? I believe this controversial pension plan will provide approximately 50 per cent of the governor's salary on retirement. I think that is a very laudable objective in respect to a comprehensive portable pension plan available to all citizens. I believe that if citizens of this country, from the governor of the Bank of Canada down, were to contribute their just and equitable share toward that type of a pension plan there would be no beef regarding anyone receiving 50 per cent of his salary on retirement, because each and every person in this country would then have paid an equitable share toward this pension to be received at retirement age.

Whenever we hear about pension plans, just as when we hear about health or hospital insurance plans, while we believe they are wonderful ideas we wonder where the money is to come from to pay for them. I should like to remind hon. members that a portable pension plan, such as I have referred to, should in the long run be self-liquidating and self-supporting. I agree that to establish a plan of this kind will involve the spending of a good deal of money for some time; but what we will be doing is paying off our past shortcomings, and once we have done so the plan will carry itself and there will be no cost as such then to the Canadian taxpayer.

I do not for one moment think this will be an easy task. I have given considerable study to the problem and realize the tremendous complexities involved. My greatest criticism of this government at the present time arises because I see no effort being made to reach this goal. This goal cannot be reached in six months or perhaps even in five years, but I maintain that if we never start, the job will never be done.

I fail to see any real measure of progress being made in this field by the present government, although it has been in office for four years. I believe this government should launch boldly on a plan, giving a complete and honest picture of the costs and prospects to the Canadian public. If this were done I am sure the public across the country would get behind the program and support it. If the taxpayers realized that by paying their proper share they could accomplish this job; if they knew they would not be hounded every Saturday morning by organizations carrying out tag days, which will not accomplish the job but only keep things going, they would support the government's program. I suggest that if the businessmen of this country knew that through the paying of proper taxes the job could be accomplished without their being hounded, not only on street corners during tag days but through their businesses and service clubs, which have never been able to accomplish the job in this country, the government would then get the full support of all those taxpayers, and this great program could be accomplished.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, like previous speakers I should like to acknowledge the responsible manner in which the minister and his senior officials have discharged their responsibilities to parliament and to the country, and I should like to assure him that the small bouquets I throw do not contain any hidden bricks.

The previous speaker in his concluding remarks mentioned the undesirable feature of people wandering the streets on Saturdays holding tag days. While his remarks are prominently in my mind I should like to state that I do not think anyone in this country would stop publicly minded citizens from endeavouring to make their communities better places in which to live, or from helping their fellow citizens. I do not think this type of argument should be entertained in respect to this particular subject.

At the beginning of the present session I placed a resolution on the order paper which I hoped would have been discussed before this time. I regret that in referring to it now I am taking up some of the time for the discussion of the minister's estimates, but I feel that I should do so. That resolution requested the government to give early consideration to the advisability of instituting a contributory pension system available to age 65 as a more equitable means of supporting the independence of Canadian senior citizens.

My purpose in bringing this resolution before the house and the country stems from my personal realization of the desire of most Canadians for such legislation and, I assure the committee, from my own humanitarian ideals, divorced completely from any political implications.

I believe that the three political parties now constituting the house agree unanimously that some such program should be instituted. I hold in my hand a press clipping of a statement by the hon. member for Essex East, who expressed a desire for such a plan. I have a statement by the Prime Minister which may not deal directly with it, but the inference one gathers from the statement is that the Prime Minister favours such a plan. I also have the statement made by the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget. This statement is taken out of context, of course, and has a slightly different meaning, but his words are as follows:

> It is desirable that those who have been employed throughout their working years should be able to retire without fear of want.

I have a further statement by the minister of public welfare for the province of Ontario, part of which reads as follows:

> In almost every country a contributory insurance-maintenance plan anticipates the future needs of these persons. We could view this as a responsibility which should be treated by the individual, himself. We might consider that he should prepare, well in advance, for his own future needs and the needs of his family—for the eventualities which will probably arise.

These are the important words:

> Experience has shown, however, that such individual preparation does not take place.

When we hear the minister relate that 7,934,374 individuals collect $1,226,400,000 from the federal treasury I believe the wishes of the people should be given consideration in regard to the proposal I am making.

When I decided to discuss this matter in the house I immediately realized that the entire subject is too vast and complicated to discuss specifically. However, I hope the basis of my thoughts will be sufficiently clear to convince the minister, the government and all hon. members of the desirability of such a plan. Social security, as we refer to it, is by no means new to the world at large. I was interested in an excerpt from the book I hold in my hand, written by Mr. Arthur Larson, who is now director of the world rule of law centre at Duke University, North Carolina. This is the excerpt I should like to read:

> It is always something of a shock to those who call social security "socialistic" to discover that it was, in origin, an anti-socialistic measure. It is an even worse shock to find that the father of social security was no dewy eyed liberal or left winger, but the iron chancellor himself—Otto von Bismarck.

During the years following the war of 1870-1871, Bismarck began to be concerned about the growing strength shown in elections by the Marxian socialists—whom we would now call communists. He met the situation, and took the wind out of the Marxians' sails, by laying before the Reichstag a comprehensive social insurance system. It was enacted in various measures between 1883 and 1887, and contained provisions for payments in case of sickness, accident, disability, widowhood, and old age.

The idea spread gradually throughout Europe, and received an important addition when the British, in 1911, added the idea of unemployment insurance. Once more, it is significant that it was not socialists or even trade unions who put through unemployment insurance in England. In fact, the Fabian socialists, including Sidney and Beatrice Webb, and the free trade unions, all opposed it. Unemployment insurance and related measures were put through in England by such people as Winston Churchill, Lloyd George, Beveridge, Lord Asquith, Hubert Smith, Neville Chamberlain, and Joseph Chamberlain. It is typical of the history of social security that it did not come in on a great wave of popular demand from the mass of people, as Marxians would now like to have us believe. It came largely because of the efforts of farsighted individuals, who were found as often as not among the ranks of those who would be called conservatives.

At the present time I believe that most authorities on this subject consider the United States plan to be the best in operation. Therefore I have chosen to make a few observations concerning our separate systems on a comparative basis. We are aware that the Canadian system in effect is financed on the 3-3-3 formula, with these percentages being collected from sales tax, corporation tax and personal income tax. This formula supplied $603.1 million in the year 1960-61, which represented $10.7 million in excess of receipts over expenditures. In the current year it is estimated that $607 million will be required to finance the necessary payments.

With the flat rate payments of $55 a month I have learned and the minister indicated, that Canadian payments amounted to 2.45 per cent of the national income, whereas in the United States payments amounted to 2.66 per cent of the national income of that country. The difference is accounted for by the fact that in Canada the minimum and maximum are the same, while in the United States the payment ranges from a minimum of $33 to a maximum of $127. There are two very relative points to be borne in mind, namely that the United States per capita income is from 25 per cent to 30 per cent higher than in Canada, and that the United States plan supports a disability and survivors insurance program as well, in addition to the program that we have in effect.

With regard to welfare payments as we understand them, I think the time has come when we must give further consideration to unemployment insurance benefits. This matter has been studied by the authorities in several of the provinces. I am sure hon. members will be aware of this. They have said, and this is also my opinion, that unemployment insurance benefits could be more adequately handled if they were paid out directly by the provinces. As I have said, this has been requested by some of the provinces. In the United States unemployment insurance is handled entirely by the state authorities, and is no concern of the federal government.

In the United States in 1960 the average income for retired workers was $69.50 for a single person and $123.40 for a married person. The differential as compared with the Canadian figures can be discounted, if one chooses to do so, on the basis of the difference in income. One of the great advantages of the United States program, in my thinking, is the benefit paid to widows and their children under the age of 18, or the survivors benefit, and also the disability insurance, which I would advocate, if the government were to institute such a plan. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I think I should say that the United States system is financed by a 3 per cent employee and a 3 per cent employer contribution, with 4½ per cent being paid by the self-employed, based on a maximum taxable income of $4,800 for this purpose.

Because of the many experiences I have had where people under the age of 70 have become disabled and are not eligible for old age assistance, I would recommend that the government include the disability class in a prepared program. This I realize, from the experience of 1951, and in consideration of survivors benefits, may create a constitutional problem but I should hope that it would be of minimal proportions. I believe that such a program could be put into effect on a 2 per cent employee and 2 per cent employer basis, and adjusted as experience required. I have been assured that such a program would carry itself financially on a 1 per cent and 1 per cent basis if the 3-3-3 formula were retained; but I would not advocate such a course, because the people want a plan on the basis of contribution so the returns are a personal right as opposed to some of the current thinking. Moreover, I believe the minimum could be raised and the maximum set to allow a flexible scale for those who contribute the maximum, possibly a range from $70 to $100.

Those who have studied this matter will realize that in such a system the problems of portable pensions and of vesting rights would be removed, because there would be a lessening in the tendency to change jobs, which usually results in the employee losing some of these privileges under existing private schemes. Therefore I was interested, of course, in the statement of the Minister of Finance in presenting his budget. Private companies which have expressed certain fears in regard to the implementation of this type of legislation need only to look to the United States, where the experience has been that such insurance sales have increased tremendously since the inception of their program.

I should like to state, Mr. Chairman, that a contributory social security system, as I have referred to it, would foster many of our fundamental beliefs such as self-respect, dignity and personal pride. You may ask why, and my answer is because there would be entitlement by right with no stigma attached, no means test. I believe it is a Christian concern for the state to assist the people of the state, particularly some of the weaker members; for, as Abraham Lincoln stated:

> A legitimate function of government is to do for the people what needs to be done, but what they by their individual efforts cannot do quite so well.

Such a plan does not result in the loss or the control of the rights of anyone, nor does it require the sacrifice of any personal freedom. It would be fair to require the participation of all groups in our society. I would not advocate the principle of contracting out such as was done on the inception of the plan in Great Britain.

A flat rate contribution on maximum amounts of income would assure that up to that maximum—and ours might have to be slightly higher than in the United States—the earner in the higher bracket would support the program to a greater degree than the earner whose income is in the lower scale, but to compensate there would also be a graduated scale of benefits which in reality would give the minimum income group more than they could buy for the contribution they actually make, and the maximum less than they would receive on a similar basis.

My observations indicate that beyond doubt this is the general desire of the Canadian people, and I respectfully request consideration of such a program by the minister and the government.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question? I was very interested in his speech, and I ask the question because of his quotation from a book. Does the hon. member know that the records of the United Kingdom House of Commons and House of Lords prove that while the Liberal and Labour members in Great Britain urged an over-all security program it was delayed for years because of the opposition of the Conservative party?

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, before dealing with the one subject with which I wish to deal at length I should like to make some reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Timmins. He suggested that, having regard to certain remarks that were made by the first speaker from my party, he could not give credence to any Liberal promises, since such promises had not been fulfilled in the past.

With reference particularly to the provisions respecting hospitalization, which were brought in by the former administration, I suggest that this was one of the most forward looking measures ever introduced. It was introduced by a Liberal majority, and it was designed to be brought into effect only when a majority of Canadians and a majority of the provinces had indicated that they were prepared to accept and pay for such a plan.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Timmins was that the plan should have been imposed from the top whether or not the people of the country were prepared for it. I simply observe that when it was introduced it was brought in by a Liberal administration with the proviso that this country is a democracy, that the majority rules, and that only at such time as there was a majority would the plan be instituted throughout the country.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Miss LaMarsh: I am not going to deal with all of the matters which come within the minister's purview. As has been said before, this is one of the largest spending of all federal departments. However, I wish to deal with one isolated part of the operations of the department, something which has reference not only to this department but to other departments. Therefore it will be necessary to refer to some of the things which have been done by the Department of Public Works and by the Department of Labour in particular.

I wish to deal specifically with the problems of aging in the community and the contribution which has been made so far by the federal authorities, by voluntary welfare organizations throughout the country and by the provinces. Particularly since the last war this country, in common with most of the other western nations, has been required to pay particular attention to the problems of youth. Because of the population explosion which took place about the end of the war, because of the fact that we have had a great many young people going through the school system, we have been concerned with using our resources first to give these children public school education on a free basis and then high school education, and in many quarters there is pressure to give them university training.

Only this year we have seen strengthened legislation introduced to deal with the matter of technical training for those who have left the formal education field and require some other training. But too little has been done and too little thought has been given by the public generally to the problems of the aged on the other end of the scale. The aged are not only those who require to be in nursing homes. The aged can be almost any age. Certainly the lowest age which is usually considered to be included is 60, but when one considers related problems, the problems of portability of pensions, the problems of retraining for employment, it is shocking to find that the aged in a modern society are those 40 and over.

These people are increasing in numbers. According to the latest figures I have, which are taken from a report in the Ottawa Citizen of April 18 last of a meeting of the local council of women, the number of those 60 or over in 1921 constituted 7.5 per cent of our population or 660,000 people. By 1951 this had risen to 11.4 per cent or 1,592,000 Canadians, and it is projected that by 1980 the aged group of the Canadian population over 60 will constitute 12.8 per cent or more than 3,400,000 Canadians.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Miss LaMarsh: Just before the noon adjournment, I had put certain figures on the record as quoted in a copy of the Ottawa Citizen. Those figures came originally from a study prepared by the research statistics division of the Department of National Health and Welfare, a report of which was issued in June of 1957. Even at that time—and in the past few years the problem has become increasingly important—it was realized that the percentage of the population in Canada above 60 was creating considerably more pressure and would continue to do so. We are reaching a situation in Canada wherein, by reason of the number of years required for young people to take training, whether it be the academic type or the trades training type, it is taking so long for people to become producers in society that, when taken together with those who are forcibly, as a result of pension agreements, employer-employee agreements or the policies of governments, put out to pasture at 60 or 65, there is an increasing burden on the producers of the nation.

If we continue to treat those who are aged, in particular those who are above 60, as individuals who are no longer necessary to the mainstream of society, if we persist in putting them aside, if we persist in saying to them, you cannot stay in this place of employment because other people are coming along and because of your age you are no longer capable of contributing in this employment, then we are going to add to our problems. In addition to this we have the fact that, in the last 60 years, there has been a considerable change in the size of houses now being constructed for the young married people. The young married people are no longer able to keep their aged parents or relatives with them, so this forces the older people out of the home and breaks the family association. The elderly people are thereby cut off from the mainstream society.

Welfare agencies, either govermental or voluntary, are trying to set up recreational programs or "busy" work for the aged. It is my belief from my study of this problem, that the older citizen of Canada does not want to be treated as a special class with particular disabilities. As everyone knows, we all age at a different rate. We all cease to have our full capabilities at a different time. We say that 65 is the time when a Canadian is no longer of any use to his country, is no longer efficient. We make them feel unwanted, that they are no longer useful. It is significant that all studies indicate that there is a higher suicide rate in the group above 60 than in any age group in our nation. These figures are identical with those for the United States. No human being wants to feel he or she is not wanted by the family or the community, to feel there is no purpose in continuing to live. No person wants to be a parasite in society. Everyone wants to be an effective human being and able to contribute all they have throughout their productive period.

Yesterday the hon. member for Leeds referred to the fact that we cannot afford to have trained people in our society who are not contributing to the public welfare. I would suggest that we cannot afford to arbitrarily put people out of work at 65 and dislocate them from everything they have known. We cannot afford the waste of these people. They have the greatest training and the greatest experience. Our philosophers have said that up to age 40 you simply gain experience and beyond 40 you apply it. The problem is one for the nation as well as for the individuals concerned.

In studying this problem, Mr. Chairman, I have written as widely as I could to welfare agencies in both Canada and the United States, and I should like to refer briefly to some of the agencies that are working on some of the problems in relation to the aged. As an indication of the increased interest which is being shown in this particular problem, I may say that in the province of Ontario, with which I am most familiar, there was set up in metropolitan Toronto a social planning council which has been meeting for the past few years dealing with the special problems of the ageing in our community. In addition, the Ontario society of the ageing has been set up and it has called conferences and established study groups. This organization has been responsible for some excellent reports dealing with the problem in Ontario. In 1957, the Ontario society for the ageing called a conference which met for a month in Toronto. A report was published entitled, "Proceedings of First Ontario Conference on Ageing". This conference was attended by individuals from government and from voluntary societies. As I have said, the study lasted for one month at the University of Toronto.

May I, Mr. Chairman, refer to some of the things which were discussed so hon. members will realize the scope of the problem. This is not just a welfare or health problem, but it goes much further than that. These are the subheadings in this report: Mental health in later years; the challenge of the ageing population; financing health services; working together; total community programs; patterns of living of older people in Ontario, and here research was undertaken; the cost of living and retirement income; nutrition for the ageing; pension plans; compulsory retirement plans; the problem of the cost of living; government programs and other sources of income; housing and living arrangements; money available for housing; types of accommodation, including boarding home care and private care; charitable institutions and their contributions; self-contained accommodation; community services; care and rehabilitation at home; friendly visiting; clubs and recreation; educational interests; church and synagogue; senior citizens' service bureau; employment, unemployment and retirement; the effect of the changing patterns of employment; work opportunities; satisfying the psychological needs in retirement; employment of older persons; pre-retirement counselling and planning; the care, treatment and rehabilitation of the ageing in hospitals and homes; long term illness in institutions; the acutely ill aged in institutions; private hospitals and nursing homes; the care of the senile aged.

Reference was made to what is being done in the United States and Great Britain. This is a magnificent report and I would commend it to the attention of all hon. members of this committee who are interested in the ageing elements in our population. As a result of this conference subcommittees were set up and after three years' study another one day workshop was set up on March 26, 1960; it was a workshop on ageing. Reports were made as to what had been done in the intervening free period and certain of the research which had been commenced was also reported on. Perhaps one of the most interesting things was of a couple of studies which had been undertaken which indicated that what was necessary in order for an individual who had retired and was living alone to live—just to exist—was between $86 and $90 a month and that for a couple retired, living alone, it would require $130 to $149 a month. This is a modest but adequate living standard and it is only for the province of Ontario. So far as I know that type of study has not been undertaken anywhere else.

In addition to the Ontario society for the ageing there has been magnificent work done by a national board and that is the committee on ageing of the Canadian welfare council of which the Hon. Muriel Fergusson of the other place has the responsibility and honour of being chairman. This agency, which is a well known one, has for the last couple of years been particularly interested in the matter of housing and there have been set up in various provinces particular agencies to deal with housing for the aged.

Most hon. members read the local press here in Ottawa and will have seen that there has been considerable pressure and a considerable number of press reports with respect to a new home for the aged in Ottawa. This is a matter which is becoming increasingly important in all communities across Canada. At one time it was considered sufficient to set up what was called an old people's home, to put there indigent people, to close the door and to forget about them. This is the same sort of thing that once happened in Eskimo societies where you sent the aged out on the ice expecting them never to come back. For too long in Canada we have sent the aged to old people's homes, closed the door, hoped that they would die and that the problem would go away.

In the most recent years we have been considering what can be done not just for these people but with them, or what can they do for themselves. Certainly the more modern approach appears to be that we do not build an old people's home some place out in the wilds of a community away from all the interrelation of the community, but that we try to build smaller units in down town areas where they can get out, see their friends, go to the theatre and things of this kind.

Housing is only one problem and there has been considerable assistance in the past few years from the Department of Public Works. Under N.H.A. a particular brochure has been prepared called "Housing for Old People". Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have put out this brochure. There are also a great many most interesting booklets which are of assistance to every community which has to face this problem. They include "Housing and Living Arrangements for the Aged", "Everyone Grows Old", "The Needs of the Aged", and things of this kind. They are of assistance and they indicate that some research, study and attention have been given to the problem. But this is fragmentary.

In the Department of Labour a considerable amount of work has been done as well. I have had the benefit from the Department of Labour of a considerable number of booklets indicating the extent of the work they have been doing over the past few years. They have made a study of the older worker as such. They put out in May 1960, in mimeographed form "The Problem of the Older Worker" which is a reference manual containing certain factual information and references to other works. In addition, they have prepared something of particular interest to women, namely a booklet entitled, "A New Career after 30". This is a most interesting study of women above age 30 who launched into new careers and took new training. It indicates that they are a most effective addition to the productive part of the population.

Also in the Department of Labour there has been a considerable program over the last five or six years of a study of pensions—

An hon. Member: The last four years.

Miss LaMarsh: Over the last five or six years. Many of these are dated early in 1957. On pension plan and employment of older workers an excellent report has been prepared by the Department of Labour. There was, set up, I believe, in 1953, an interdepartmental committee and there are representatives of labour, of national health and welfare, of veterans affairs, of finance and some other departments who meet to discuss the interrelated problems of ageing. This has been going on now for some eight or nine years and it is producing more and more research information. There is indeed a pamphlet which is put out called "Two Minutes of Employment Facts", pension plans for the employment of older workers. The intent of this was that it should be sent around to employers in order to encourage them to employ people above what would normally be called the pensioning off age.

There were two radio broadcasts made on the older worker problem, the scripts of which are available to the public. There is another booklet called "Speaking Out About the Older Worker Problem" also prepared by the labour department. In addition, there is an excellent study made by Professor S. A. Clark of the University of Toronto on the employability of the older worker. This is a review of his research covering a long period which was produced in October of 1959. It goes into the whole problem in Canada. There are many studies of employing, housing and caring for, in a medical way, older people in the world but not too many Canadian studies.

In addition, the department of health and welfare, since the publication of "The Ageing Worker" by the Department of Labour, has instituted research and has produced a number of pamphlets and pieces of material which have been of assistance to those interested in the problem. There is one booklet produced by this department under date of July, 1959, "Health Services for Public Assistance Recipients in Canada" with particular reference to older people and "Rehabilitation Services in Canada", part 2, which sets out the provincial and local programs available. This is under date of February, 1959.

In addition, there have been a number of private or semi-private groups most interested in the ageing. I would particularly refer hon. members to the problem which is clearly set out in the Saturday Review of January 28, 1961, which deals in particular with the desperate world of the senior citizen in the United States. Apart from the figures which are given there the problem is identical to that in Canada. I would commend this to all hon. members.

In addition, through its leaflet "Occupational Health Review" volume 12, No. 2, 1960, this department has put out a long and informative article on the lengthening life span which again gives evidence of the increasing numbers as well as the increasing percentages of the aged in our community. This is something which we can no longer allow to be attacked on a piecemeal basis. In the United States, as a result of the type of pressure that there has been from private agencies over the past two years, there was held on January 9 to 12, of 1961, at Washington the first White House conference on ageing. It may be of interest to hon. members to know that there were about 2,800 voting delegates attending that conference and there were 20 Canadians there as invited observers. Papers were produced as a result of the conference which dealt with all aspects of ageing. In the field of federal-state, such as our federal-provincial programs of public assistance, surveys and studies were considered that had been undertaken by research organizations and universities without knowing that anyone else was undertaking the same type of work. This conference dealt with the increasing concern in the fields of health, rehabilitation, housing, income maintenance, and education and retraining of the aged.

The population trends on the North American continent are inescapable. Because of the triumph of medicine over those diseases which have caused our people to die at early ages we have an increasingly larger group of the ageing in our communities. It is necessary that they be treated as human beings; it is necessary that they continue to be a part of our population. Most individuals who are of retirement age do not like to be called senior citizens, aged or ageing. I think all of us would like to say that we are forever young. However, when one realizes that because of the present lack of portability of pensions even 40 year olds, or in some cases those in their thirties, fall into the classification of the aged. They cannot move from one place to another because of the lack of portability of pensions, and because of the pressures of modern living their bodies age more quickly than they did in the past and people are falling within the classifications of the ageing well below the age of 60 or 65 years.

Mr. Chairman, most of the work which has been done by various departments of this government was instituted prior to 1957, as anyone who would study these publications will readily ascertain, because one can see from the length of time devoted to the studies and the date the reports were produced that is was a Liberal administration which brought in all the social welfare legislation which is on the statute books of this country. These were the studies which were undertaken and I would venture to guess that had that administration continued in office, at this point we would have a co-ordinating agency to devote concentrated attention to this particular problem.

Hon. members will have noticed within the past few months discussions in the Financial Post, in the local press and the national press respecting the Canadian welfare council meeting which was held recently, where the director of the council, Mr. Kenneth Parker, pointed out in his presidential report that "better welfare is not achieved only at the cost of a higher total of public spending".

Notwithstanding the fact that these people are leaders in bringing together health workers and social workers in a community, they said that the total cost of Canada's public health and welfare programs, in the vicinity of $3 billion including taxes and private donations from volunteer agencies, was not enough; that it was necessary for a searching study to be made in Canada of the whole approach of social welfare measures, and particularly of those involving the aging. There was an editorial to this effect, which hon. members may have seen, in the Ottawa Citizen of June 1, 1961.

In March of this year the Financial Post undertook a thorough study of whether or not in Canada we are receiving enough for our welfare dollar. It was indicated that 11.4 per cent of our national income is devoted to welfare payments and that this is steadily increasing each year, but that there is a considerable amount of duplication in private and government agencies. Reference was also made in the Financial Post of February 18, 1961 to a tremendous new study which has been undertaken in the province of Ontario under the provincial department of labour. This is a study of Canadians over the age of 45 years in which from 1958, 2,000 men in the province are being studied until they reach age 65. This is perhaps the first such study undertaken anywhere in a western democracy. This study will provide invaluable information, but the information will only be relevant to the province of Ontario. It is not sufficient, I would suggest, to leave this to the provincial departments, because it is a national problem.

There is no question that, like education, the administration of assistance to the ageing can best be done on a local level and on a level in which they themselves can actively participate. I would suggest that, following the report of the 20 observers who attended the White House conference on the ageing, following the report of the Canadian welfare council, a massing together of the information which has been brought together in the various departments of government and the interdepartmental committee, from private welfare agencies, and from provincial departments, now is the time for this department to take a bold step and to call a national conference on the ageing in which there will be participation not only by federal-provincial departments, not only by those whose whole responsibility is to assist in the problems of the ageing, but also by all volunteer agencies. The Canadian Red Cross has been active for years in matters respecting the ageing, and the Canadian welfare council, as I said before, has a particularly active group set up to deal principally with the problems of the ageing.

Mr. Chairman, may I in closing refer to an article which appeared in the February 1961 issue of the magazine Health, published for the Canadian family by the Health League of Canada. The article is by Dr. Edward L. Bortz and is entitled:

Breaking those "ageing" barriers.

On page 19 of the magazine he writes:

Then another problem, perhaps the greatest problem facing society today, appears, namely, what to do with all the old folk. Surely we do not want a majority of our population to be tottery, senile, vegetating parasites. Would it not seem that experience and maturity that come as we grow older should have some social usefulness that we have not yet identified? Too often we invite premature decay by withdrawing from the active stream of social usefulness and sit on the sidelines. The zest and joy of living are likely to be lost if one withdraws from productive living. One becomes a consumer instead of a producer, and the world already has too many consumers. The yardstick of social value, so far as the individual is concerned, is just that easy to apply.

It is necessary, then, Mr. Chairman, for the good not only of those involved, those who are ageing, but for the good of our country nationally that we now bring together the information which has been obtained at all levels and undertake research and study in order that those in our community who have the greatest experience, the greatest judgment, shall be able to continue to contribute to the mainstream of our community life.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, before presenting my remarks may I extend my congratulations to the minister, who I understand is celebrating his birthday today. It is not very often that a minister has the privilege of celebrating his birthday and also presenting his estimates on the same day. I am sure we all wish him well in his future health and welfare. May I say to the minister:

Count not your age by years you live
But by the happiness you give,
The friends you make, the good you do,
The confidence that's placed in you,
The little things that day by day,
Bring cheer to others on life's way,
And count this day one more mile,
Upon the road to God and things worth while.

I appreciate the opportunity of speaking briefly on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. This department, under the energetic supervision of the minister and his staff, is no doubt one of the most important in the administration of our country's affairs, and the fine advances made in social justice are proof of the competent work being done by all those concerned.

I understand that assistance to every category of social justice—old age security, old age assistance, blind and disability allowance, unemployment assistance, not too well known to some Canadians, hospital insurance and health grants—has been substantially increased. Perhaps one of the most beneficial improvements was the lowering from 20 to 10 years of the residence requirement in regard to old age pensions. As we know, recipients are now permitted to take their pension with them when leaving Canada on a permanent basis. Senior citizens living outside of Canada, and those contemplating doing so, are very appreciative of this legislation. Many of these recipients living in Canada, happy and satisfied with conditions here, are obliged to leave our country for health reasons or because of family ties and uncontrollable circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, about a year ago I spoke in this house in favour of the new federal plans concerning emergency measures and civil defence. At this time I should like to add that the progress and development that have taken place since that time have justified the optimism I expressed then as to the workability of the new plan. It has been brought to my attention that the Department of National Health and Welfare has assumed two important responsibilities; first, the arrangements for the maintenance of public health and welfare in case of disaster. This is in accordance with government planning for wartime emergency. Two departmental divisions, the emergency health division and the emergency welfare services division, are continuously planning and preparing for this task. The emergency health services staffed by experts in the health field have in operation an $18 million medical stockpiling program. This supplies to the purchasing, packaging and distribution and storage depots across Canada, tremendous amounts of first aid supplies, medicines, drugs and surgical equipment. These depots along with hospital facilities play a big part in wartime as well as in peacetime emergencies.

Another important move has been that hospital medical resources are being reinforced by the issue of nearly 3,000 kits each containing supplies that would be in heavy demand in the establishment of a readily transportable 200-bed improvised hospital in a school, town hall or other public or industrial building. A very important part of this set-up includes special conferences for the medical profession including dentists, pharmacists and nurses, which are held regularly at the Canada civil defence college at Arnprior.

of responsibility for survival. These responsibilities include emergency feeding, emergency clothing, emergency lodging, registration, answering inquiries and rendering personal services. Much of the welfare services work, I am informed, is related to the day by day activities and specialized fields. As an example, I believe many social welfare workers may be counted on in time of disaster to assist and staff the many hundreds of welfare reception centres which would exist across the country to take care of the homeless population.

In Waterloo county and surrounding district, at such places as Kitchener, Waterloo, Preston, Galt, Stratford, Guelph and others, reception centres can be set up to look after the population of such centres as Toronto and Hamilton, and other larger cities. Social workers could include former veterans of the army, navy and air force, thousands of whom reside in this district.

Much can be said of the development of equipment for mass care which would include an emergency mobile feeding unit capable of feeding 100 people per hour on a 24 hour basis.

The minister, his department and the government which in peacetime, as hon. members know, are continuously engaged in the betterment of the health and welfare of the people of Canada are to be commended for the preparations made to continue their specialized services during wartime emergency if they are ever called upon to do so.

Provincial governments and our federal government have made many fine contributions in grants to hospitals across Canada. In Waterloo North we are indeed fortunate to have two splendid hospitals. The Kitchener-Waterloo hospital which has 320 beds, plus 110 for chronic cases, is at present filled to 85 per cent capacity, which would mean about 385 cases. This hospital has a waiting list of 180 surgical patients and 35 medical patients.

The St. Mary's hospital in its present building has a capacity of 112 beds but, by crowding people into the hallways and former closets, they have at present 155 patients and have on occasion accommodated as many as 165 persons. Some time ago a drive was held to raise funds for new buildings. Because of the kindness of many public spirited citizens and the splendid grants by the Ontario and federal governments, this drive was exceptionally successful. Much credit is due Colonel Heasley, chairman, and his committee. New buildings for this hospital are now being erected and will be completed sometime before December 31 of this year. These additions will mean an increase of 465 beds, cribs and bassinets for this outstanding hospital.

Other places receiving government assistance are Huronia hall for the blind—so badly needed—Sunnyside home for the aged, where 170 citizens are accommodated, elderly persons' homes sponsored by the Canadian Legion, and the home for senior citizens as well as other smaller homes throughout the country. All these are providing excellent services for our elderly persons, and for the blind, sick, depressed and disabled.

In closing, may I say that this government has always been anxious to provide medical care, financial assistance and other comforts to individuals who because of age, disability, unemployment, or for other reasons otherwise would not be able to enjoy a reasonable share of the good things of life.

Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we give further consideration to those of our citizens reaching the retiring age of 65 years. These folk in many cases have not had the opportunity of providing for the future through superannuation or pension plans. Many of them are on the unemployment list or were unable to have their retirement postponed and, therefore, are in financial difficulty at an age when they should be able to have some security other than just owning their own homes and a few belongings. It is a recognized fact that these citizens have played a prominent part in developing the economy of our country.

Our Minister of National Health and Welfare understands the problems confronting his department and the following remarks he made show the great interest and confidence he has in the future of our great country. I quote his words and suggest that they are appropriate on his birthday:

> Canada's health and welfare balance sheet is encouraging. Certainly it is a good deal brighter today than it was several years ago. We still have important liabilities but the over-all balance is clearly set toward a fuller measure of social justice for every Canadian. Our aim must be to keep it tipping more and more in that direction.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of our discussion of the Department of National Health and Welfare estimates to deal with a subject very close to my heart, the matter of improving the lot of the epileptics with regard to medical care, research and the relation of this disease to everyday life.

Of all diseases affecting human beings, none has been less understood than epilepsy. In fact, people still have all sorts of antiquated notions about it, even though medical science offers good hopes of recovery, because it is a known fact that nowadays 50 per cent of cases can be successfully treated.

The purpose of my remarks today is to help put an end to those antiquated ideas about epilepsy and to that lack of understanding which amounts to a lack of charity. I do not know whether we have very accurate statistics on the number of such cases, but I am informed from a reliable source that there are 10,500 epileptics in the Montreal area, 40,000 in the province of Quebec and around 145,000 in Canada.

People who suffer from that disease must fight on two fronts: first, the disease itself and, then, society whose lack of understanding gives rise to all kinds of complexes among epileptics, society which does not give these people the moral and economic support they need to put up an efficient fight under normal conditions.

It is said that the term "epilepsy" derives from a Greek word meaning "seizure"; apparently, that disease goes back to the remotest history of mankind. It seems that those seizures or fits, which vary in seriousness and frequency from one individual to another, are brought about by some irritation of the brain the causes of which are mostly unknown to this day. Epilepsy is not an hereditary disease as such, since it is said that only one epileptic out of every 50 has an epileptic child. In some cases, an operation is necessary but in most cases drugs are the recommended treatment. As I said, the purpose of these remarks is to get both the government and the public to show more understanding for the plight of epileptics and take positive steps to help them.

May I suggest three types of measures already within our reach. First, in the research field, I think we should promote and speed up medical research in order to develop the most appropriate drugs for this disease. We should keep abreast of developments in medical research, not only in the western countries but also in the countries behind the iron curtain, because in the field of research there is no such thing as frontiers. The officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare should be given every facility to take an active part in any medical conference, anywhere through the world, in order to be always on the watch for any new treatment.

I would be very much in favour of the federal and provincial governments joining in a construction program for various research centres in Canada's major cities, where thousands of epileptics could be admitted, so that we could give them the appropriate care and promote their rehabilitation to a normal life, without their having to depend on anyone.

As a second step, I would suggest that epileptic children of school age attend regular schools.

At this point I must say something which is probably not known to any hon. member. If a six, seven or eight year old child, is registered in a school in the province of Quebec and the school authorities notice that he or she suffers from epilepsy, this child is sent home. Epileptics are not getting any education, whereas they need the benefit of education more than others. Such conditions are unwarranted, indeed. Experience has shown that most epileptics who have had a chance of getting some education, and more particularly those whose parents were able to afford private tuition—and this is the only way they can be educated—have always got on in the struggle for life, and never became a burden for the state.

If the only result of my remarks were to rouse the public conscience with regard to that extraordinary fact that epileptic children have no possibility of education, that they are not admitted in our schools, I think I shall not have wasted my time in drawing public attention to a problem for which an eventual solution may be found.

I have a third suggestion to submit. It deals with the adult epileptic, who had no chance of getting an education. How can such an individual, who, in spite of his illness, is able to take on a responsible job in many fields have a chance of being employed? Unfortunately, we are living in a callous society, which is often lacking in charity. I must say that we are not very progressive in this field, as I am informed that in Great Britain for instance, there are laws providing that in large companies, 2 or 3 per cent of the labour force must be made up of handicapped people such as epileptics. I wonder why we could not do the same thing here. If we want industry to do its share, if we want our industries to give epileptics an opportunity to work, it is only fair that the state should set the example.

I was saying a moment ago that generally speaking our society is callous. However, Canadians are also very generous people, and when face squarely with a problem of this kind, I am sure they will respond and give jobs to those handicapped, who seek nothing more.

Moreover, if the government were to set aside 1 or 2 per cent of the jobs available in the federal civil service for those people, this would provide employment for 300 to 400 of them. We must not forget that nothing prevents an epileptic from marrying and raising a family.

I also stated a moment ago that this disease is not hereditary. I hope the minister will give special consideration to this suggestion and will be able to prevail upon the government to lead the way in this field.

In closing, may I say a few words about two organizations which have been showing great devotion in the care of those sick people. I refer particularly to the Dieppe home, at St. Hilaire, an establishment devoted to the treatment and rehabilitation of male epileptics. Unfortunately, when those people are released from the Dieppe home, there are no jobs available to them, despite the fact that they are able to work.

Moreover, there is no institution to take care of women thus afflicted. They have to depend upon public charity or their relatives. So far, the government has not taken any real step to assist that rather large number of our fellow citizens.

I was saying a moment ago that we have in Canada 145,000 epileptics who expect us to come to their assistance. They are not asking for favours, but only the support they are entitled to. All they want is to be able to play a productive part in our society.

I hope that the minister will give serious consideration to my suggestions.

(Text):

Mr. McLennan: Mr. Chairman, may I first congratulate the minister and the government for the many good pieces of legislation they have brought forward in the interests of the health and welfare of the Canadian people. In my constituency alone there are over 10,000 old age pensioners, many of whom have come from other parts of the nation, especially the prairie provinces, to live in the banana belt of Canada. In many instances these are people who pioneered western Canada and who have made Canada the great nation it is today.

An hon. Member: From Bruce county?

Mr. McLennan: Yes, there are some from Bruce county. All have contributed a good deal in their own way to the development of this country but some, through misadventure or misfortune, find themselves in a pretty hopeless position in the sunset years of their lives. May I ask the minister to give serious and sympathetic consideration to providing some relief by increasing the social assistance to those of our senior citizens who can qualify for additional help under the means test. I know that the minister and his officials are giving careful and serious study and consideration to the Clark report on contributory pensions. I believe that the introduction of legislation setting up a system of contributory old age pensions and a social security program would be among the most beneficial and popular health and welfare legislation ever introduced in this country. I should also like to thank the minister, his executive assistant and his officials for the friendly and courteous reception they have given me as a private member and for the help they have given me with respect to many problems concerning my constituents.

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Chairman, I believe the Department of National Health and Welfare is one department that touches practically every home and every individual in the country in some way, shape or form during their lifetime, and today I want to extend the thanks of the citizens of Brantford for the very generous help we have had in building two new hospitals. We are fortunate that we have two practically brand new hospitals, one operated by the sisters of St. Joseph who do a very excellent job and operate the hospital most efficiently, and the other our own Brantford General hospital, a 500 bed hospital. Incidentally, I happen to have the honour of being a member of the board of governors of this big institution.

One point that I want to bring before the government today has to do with the building of nurses' homes and nurses' training schools. We are in the process now of trying to draw up plans and raise the money to build a new nurses' home and a new nurses' training school. This is a big problem because in a large hospital such as ours we need from 60 to 75 girls going into training for nursing every year. This means that we have to have a building to look after at least 225 girls because we must have enough beds for the trainees and also for those engaged in supervisory duties.

This is a big responsibility for the municipality. Because of the way hospital grants are now made and because of the fact that people coming under the Ontario hospital plan can enter any hospital, when the municipality is called upon to construct these large buildings in order to maintain these hospitals it puts a terrific burden on the taxpayer who is already suffering a good deal from high taxes in municipalities throughout the country.

Some time ago when the government extended to 75 per cent the subsidy to vocational training schools in order to help to train the male population of our country, I asked myself why a subsidy of the same proportions was not also extended to training schools for nurses. After all, if we do not train nurses we will not have the necessary staff for our hospitals. New hospitals with plenty of beds are of little value unless we have efficient nurses and can get girls to enter training as nurses in order to staff these hospitals.

This is a problem that every hospital faces right throughout Ontario and I suppose right throughout the country. We have brought nurses from overseas but they did not stay too long. While they helped to tide us over a period when we were very short of trained nurses, we have to rely on the nurses we can train in our own hospitals to maintain them and to look after the patients there. The building we now have for a nurses' home is not adequate by any means. The fire department would like to condemn it and not have it used at all but we must continue to use it until such time as we can construct a new building.

Other hospitals have a slight advantage over us when they can show prospective trainees a new nurses' home and an excellent training school. We have very excellent teachers in our hospital and that counteracts to some extent the difficulty we are having. Not too long ago the government saw fit to help parents with children going to university and if parents of university children can be helped in some way I certainly think that parents with daughters training for nurses should also be given some assistance. As you know, the trainees receive practically no remuneration for the first two years of their training, and I think their parents certainly should be given some consideration so far as income tax is concerned in order to help keep the girls we have and induce girls to train as nurses.

We have heard a good deal today from various hon. members about our old people, our senior citizens. I hope that before too long we will be able to increase the assistance to our older people. I am happy that I was a supporter of the government in 1957 when it raised the old age assistance pension to a level that enabled these people to at least live in some degree of comfort rather than only exist as had been the case before. When we hear about social legislation being brought in, it is important to remember that it is of little or no use unless it is made good enough so that people have to live on and are not existing from hand to mouth and having to go to welfare agencies in order to get enough to sustain themselves. The people who are now reaching the age when they will receive old age pensions are people who went through the last depression. As one who is old enough to have had that experience, I can say that I know what it was to go through the thirties. These people lost everything through no fault of their own. Then the war came and the depression ended—that was the only thing that did end it. When the economy slowed down again, these people were the first to be laid off because they were in the age categories which the factories wanted to eliminate in terms of employment. These are the people who need this extra assistance in order to get the necessities of life. In a country such as ours, these older people should not have to go to welfare agencies with their hat in their hands to ask for enough in order to live.

Another point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister concerns pensions for the blind. We in Brantford have the problems of the blind brought to our attention more forcibly than other people because we have the Ontario school for the blind in our city. Pupils come from all over Canada. When one visits this school, one is amazed to see how these youngsters are trained to participate in all types of sports as well as the different vocations for which they are suited in order to enable them to earn a livelihood. However, there are always some who cannot be trained, and some senior adults who need extra help. I would commend to the minister the brief presented by the Canadian institute for the blind and urge him to give help to the older blind people. It is a most heart-rending sight to see a person who has lost his sight late in life because he finds great difficulty becoming accustomed to a new way of life.

We have a man in Brantford who looks after the needs of the blind. He is blind himself. I refer to Mr. Ian Grills. He does an amazing job in finding occupations for these older people and helping them work out a new way of life. He certainly should be commended for the excellent work he has done.

We are fortunate also to have in Brantford a building which is only five or six years old, and to which we are adding two new wings. This building is called the John Noble home. Hon. members should visit this home to see how we take care of the people who need some medical attention but do not require hospitalization. This home is run in conjunction with the old people's home, as it used to be called. We now have room for aged couples who can live the last few years of their lives together in good surroundings. I had the honour of being the chairman of the organization in control of this building two years after it was constructed. One of the most heart-rending sights I ever saw was an old couple who came to that home and whom we had to separate because we did not have room to put them together. The old lady was a pathetic figure as she sat in the rotunda of the building. They had been married for some 50 years, yet this would be the first night on which they had been separated from one another in all that time. One of the reasons this project was undertaken to increase the size of the John Noble home was to enable elderly couples to live together during their declining years.

There is just one more matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I see that we make grants to some very worth-while organizations. I should like to call the minister's attention to an organization that is trying to eliminate leprosy, not only in Canada but throughout the world. There is a lady in Brantford by the name of Miss LeRoy who has dedicated her life to this end. I do not want to take the time of the committee this afternoon to indicate the small sum of money necessary to cure a case of leprosy. Fortunately, we do not have too many cases in Canada, but there are a great many cases throughout the world which could be cured at a small cost. I would ask the minister, in future, to include a grant for this organization in order to help these people who have dedicated their lives to the elimination of leprosy throughout the world.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief remarks concerning these estimates. This is a very important department for two reasons: First, because of its responsibilities to a very large number of Canadians directly and, second, because it involves the expenditure of over $96 million.

Before proceeding, Mr. Chairman, I must say that there are certain advantages in occupying a seat in this corner of the chamber, in addition to being close to the Speaker. For many years I sat at the other end of the chamber and I did not have the opportunity of looking at the most attractive section of the senior officials in front of the minister. I welcome the opportunity of viewing them from this angle and it will give me some incentive in dealing with these estimates. I want to thank the minister and his senior officials for their prompt attention to any question of mine in respect of administrative matters and regulations. I wish to thank the officials in Vancouver, too, because being a member from British Columbia I have a closer relationship with them.

As I have said, this is a very important department with regard to the welfare of the Canadian people. In view of this country's great natural resources and the profits made even in the last year by great corporations, to suggest that we as a nation cannot afford to accept our responsibilities for the health and welfare services provided to our people is to suggest that we are not doing our duty in this house. One hon. member who spoke this morning—I just forget the constituency he represents—made a very interesting speech.

I thought his speech indicated his interest in this general problem of health and welfare. He quoted from a book which would indicate that the Conservatives were the first to legislate in the field of old age pensions in Great Britain.

Mr. Chambers: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence says, "Hear, hear". I am afraid his enthusiasm has outrun his knowledge. Let me say this. I happened to mention that they did pass some considerable body of legislation after it was advocated for many years by the Liberals and the Labour party in Great Britain. The credit for the first old age security or pension legislation must go, without a doubt, to the Liberal party in Great Britain. I have a volume of United Kingdom Hansard on my desk because I just wondered if my memory was slipping by reason of increasing age. Here I find a speech by a member of the Conservative party in which he says frankly they must give credit to the Liberal government, which was the government of Campbell Bannerman's day, and later, for the introduction of the old age pension legislation. I thought I would mention that because I think it is wise for us to keep our facts straight. I give the Conservatives of Great Britain great credit for allowing themselves to be influenced by the members of the Liberal and Labour parties of the day. I give Winston Churchill, the former prime minister of Great Britain, great credit because of his natural common sense. But let us not forget this fact. When former prime minister Winston Churchill first advocated old age pensions he was a member of the Liberal party in Great Britain. But later on,—he was a very common sense prime minister—he saw the need for this provision and his government moved forward in that direction.

Generally speaking we in this country are far behind Great Britain and European countries with respect to over-all social welfare legislation. I suppose it comes from our more recent pioneer circumstances in the first instance and second because we are not a unitary state. I admit that it is much more difficult to develop an over-all security program in a country such as Canada in which there is a federal government and ten provincial governments that have to be considered and their wishes with respect to policy, administration and finance, shall I say, obtained and agreement reached.

In this country there is a need, as there has been for years, for an over-all security program. If there is any question about the need for it and about the thinking in this direction, I just wish to refer to a very interesting conversation with the former chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Butler. I was ribbing him a bit. It was shortly after the Conservative government came into power in 1951. I said to him, "Mr. Butler, in view of the history of your party since 1895 with respect to over-all security programs, what are you going to do now that you are in power?" Do you know what he said to me? He said, "An over-all security program is a necessity in the modern age. It is demanded by the British people. It is serving a great purpose. It meets a great need so far as the British people are concerned. As far as our government is concerned I will tell you this. Our policy as a Conservative government is to continue to improve the revolution." That is because there is a great change in thinking as a result of changing circumstances. There is the advocacy of these things for almost a generation when they were unpopular but finally the will of the people prevails and governments in a democracy are obliged to reflect that will.

While an over-all security program is necessary, the foundations must be laid by the state, shall I say, so there is a minimum security with respect to health, employment, old age and so on. I do not overlook the necessity under the best arrangements for a continued operation of private agencies. In my opinion there will always be a place for compassion and personal responsibility and efforts in this respect. Regardless of the type of society we have, we must have an opportunity for those sentiments to find expression through organized groups and through the efforts of individuals as further supplements to anything that the state can do.

What about the need in this country? I was just looking at this copy of Canadian Welfare magazine which is published monthly. I think it is the latest edition. In this magazine there is a very interesting article written by Mr. E. F. Watson and entitled "How Much is Enough in Social Assistance". I wish to quote one paragraph in order to indicate the circumstances that exist in Canada. I am not quoting this material on a partisan basis but rather to indicate the opinion of a very experienced person in this field. The first paragraph of this article reads as follows:

> Hunger and grinding poverty continue to exist for too many people in Canadian communities today. In 1961 there are still men, women and children who are not getting enough to eat, who are living in appalling housing and who lack sufficient clothing to keep them warm. Unprecedented national productivity, rising wage levels and vastly increased social welfare expenditures have left this segment of the population in an economic and social backwash.

I think that is quite true and that it is one of the anomalies of our present civilization.

Before going on to say a few words about an over-all security program I wish to refer to the annual report of the executive director of the Canadian welfare council with regard to the part that is still played by private agencies. I mention this matter because I am a great believer in individuals accepting some responsibility within the field of their circumstances and so on. I read in this report an interesting paragraph:

> Another thing we observe as we look around is the vigorous growth everywhere evident in the voluntary welfare field. Throughout the whole country many forms of health service, child and family welfare, recreation programs, programs for delinquent youth and the aftercare of adult offenders, housing for the aged and a large variety of other facilities and services continue to be provided largely under private auspices, although in a number of instances with financial subsidies from public funds.
> A notable feature of the private welfare movement in Canada during recent years, and one of the secrets of its present strength, is the development of federated financing through community funds. Today there are 107 such funds across the country as contrasted with 54 just a decade ago. During the same period the Canadian per capita contribution to community funds has increased by 50 per cent to well over $3, the number of agencies receiving support has more than doubled to around 1,800 and the total money raised, now approaching thirty million dollars annually, has nearly tripled. This growth during the 50's is by any standard impressive, and greatly exceeds that of the entire earlier period back to 1917 when the first Canadian federation was established in Montreal.

I will tell you what I think that indicates. I think it indicates that when governments take a lead and give effect to policies, as the federal government has done in certain fields in the administration of this department, it is a spur to action on the part of private organizations and agencies and even to individuals. I say again that whatever the state does—and the state must accept its full responsibility—there is a great deal of scope for compassion exercised through private agencies and through the activities of individuals.

In 1958 the Canadian welfare council adopted a policy statement for social security for Canada. I wish to refer to it briefly because it is still up to date. This statement was the result of a considerable study by very well informed and experienced persons in this field, and I understand that these recommendations were presented to the federal government at that time. What do they say here? I am going to quote just some of them. While there are some things that we could not agree with entirely, possibly where they do not go far enough in some instances, I think the general outlook is excellent and progressive.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I heard a sort of bellow over to my left. I did not know whether it was complimentary or otherwise. Oh, I understand. I had thought the hon. gentleman was going to rise in order to make some comment on what I was saying. It is the pipe line section of the chamber. I read as follows:

Recommendation 1:

The present universal flat rate pension commencing at age 70 should be retained.

That is in view of the proposal being put forward for an over-all security program. I think that is quite correct, and we believe that is correct until it is replaced by some over-all security plan which provides for something better.

Recommendation 2:

Consideration should be given to arrangements which would enable certain classes of people in the 65-69 age group to qualify for the old age security pension.

I have received a number of letters on that question and a number of instances have been brought to my attention which indicate that the government should give immediate consideration to that recommendation because of the circumstances in which people between 65 and 69 years of age find themselves at the present time. I continue:

Recommendation 3:

Provision should be made for a continuing review and periodic consideration of adjustment in the amount of the universal flat rate pension on the basis of adequate statistical data relating to such important factors as minimum needs and levels of expenditure of older people.

I am sure all hon. members of the committee have during recent months received letters from organizations representing old age security recipients and old age pensioners' organizations urging reconsideration and adjustment of the present basic rate of pension because of the increase in the cost of living since the pension was raised in 1957. We have given consideration, and properly so, to disability war pensioners; we have given consideration to recipients of war veterans allowance, and I think it is now appropriate for us to recognize the needs of those on old age security and old age assistance.

Recommendation 4:

Financial assistance should be made available by the provinces to all persons 65 and over who are in need, with federal sharing of benefit costs.

This recommendation encompasses assistance to two groups of persons in particular, recipients of the universal old age security pension who are in need, and persons 65 to 69 years of age who are in need. I know this is not as simple a problem as appears on the surface, but I trust that in the very near future we will hear of a conference being called among the federal government, provincial governments and private agencies to discuss the problem faced today by the aged in Canada. At this stage I wish to compliment the hon. member for Niagara Falls on what I thought was a very logical speech. It showed good preparation coupled with, as usual, excellent presentation. I continue:

Recommendation 5:

A joint parliamentary committee should be established to study the question of contributory wage-related old age benefits in addition to the universal pension and to make recommendations to parliament.

When the minister replies to the various questions raised on item No. 1 I hope he will inform the committee whether the government has given consideration to that recommendation. I continue:

Recommendation 6:

Whether or not a compulsory contributory old age pension program is developed, the dominion government should lay down appropriate standards for private pension plans in connection with which income tax deductions are granted.

At this stage I certainly want to support the remarks of the hon. member for Timmins, who urged the government to make provision, in co-operation with the provinces, for a national portable or transferable pension scheme which would cover all persons in Canada. There is responsibility on the federal government because this question is directly related to exemptions from income tax and the action of the federal government will largely determine the benefits and the type of legislation which will be put into operation by the provinces. The leadership in this field must come from the federal government if the provinces are going to provide any satisfactory type of transferable or portable pension. The next recommendation reads as follows:

Recommendation 7:

There should be a federal public assistance act which would be, in effect, an extension of the Unemployment Assistance Act—

Then it spells out the details. I do think there is great need for further consideration of that problem in view of the present liabilities and costs thrown upon municipalities. That is a rather involved and complicated question, and I certainly support the recommendation of the council. Recommendation No. 8 reads:

The operation of all public assistance programs should be based upon sound and clearly defined standards, particularly with respect to:

a. Amount of assistance.

i. A definition of what constitutes a minimum level of health and decency.

ii. A schedule of minimum requrements based upon this definition, and related to the age and size of the family unit.

iii. The periodic translation of minimum requirements into monetary terms, appropriate to the specific community, which would form the basis of public assistance payments.

I think that is very necessary indeed. I have read statistical tables dealing with the minimum requirements, for example in Toronto and in some other places in Canada. No standard has been set which can be taken as a yardstick across this country as to what minimum requirements are necessary.

In connection with unemployment insurance the council makes several recommendations, but as those do not come under this department I shall not mention them. The council concludes with a recommendation for intergovernmental co-operation and administrative standards. I think that is very necessary indeed. There is a great diversity of standards between the federal government and the provinces with respect to administrative practices and, shall I say, uniformity of administration and procedure.

I think something could be done in this connection along the lines of the uniformity of legislation committee which meets once every year. I understand the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general of the provinces, or their representatives, meet once a year in order to maintain uniformity of legislation. I think this could be the basis of an excellent study. I think this is the sort of problem to which the other place, having more leisure and freed from day to day, shall I say, partisan strife and things of that sort, could devote some attention after the fashion of their present land use study and the excellent study that has been made with respect to manpower and employment.

This is the type of study that takes time in order to assimilate the information with respect to procedures in other countries and Canada and, on the basis of that information, devise a standard of administration and procedure which is accepted from the Atlantic to the Pacific and will provide greater efficiency, lower costs in relation to the units served and therefore more service to the Canadian people from the tax money expended. Recommendation 19 reads as follows:

The dominion government should make funds available for demonstration and research projects, in the causes and prevention of dependency, social and economic rehabilitation, and similar problems.

That was mentioned, Mr. Chairman, by previous speakers and it has validity. This would take some time, possibly years, to accomplish but it should be given consideration. Recommendation No. 20:

Machinery should be devised to ensure regular communication among provinces, and between provinces and the dominion government, on all welfare matters of common interest.

I do not know whether there have been any changes in the channels of communication since these recommendations were presented to the government, but I presume that as years go by they are improving. I remember that when the old age pensions act was first introduced, I think it was in 1926, dealing with the problem in British Columbia, in conversation with officials we were faced with the atmosphere—this is the impression I obtained—dealing at arms length, as it were, with the senior government. However, I think that situation has greatly improved over the years. Recommendation No. 21 provides:

The dominion government should establish a broadly representative body of competent persons, the purpose of which would be to keep under constant review all aspects of Canada's social security program and to advise on changes and improvements that may from time to time be desirable.

That is in general terms a very worth-while recommendation. I am not sure just how it can be given effect, but possibly it could be accomplished by including it on the agenda of the type of conference mentioned by the hon. member for Niagara Falls. I think it should be given serious consideration.

The final recommendation is:

The dominion government should appoint a royal commission to study all aspects of social security for which it has a direct or indirect responsibility and more particularly to make recommendations with respect to—

The present royal commission I understand will not be as comprehensive as that provided for in the recommendation of the council.

We are living in a changing society in which we are depending more upon industry than agriculture. This creates many problems which did not exist 40 or 50 years ago. We cannot remain stagnant. First of all we must try to catch up with those who are ahead of us in the United Kingdom and Europe, but we have some way to go before accomplishing that.

I am not suggesting for one moment that these problems are to be solved easily or overnight, but I think the recommendations of the council should be seriously considered by the government and by the members of this committee because they come from a body with a long history of experience in this field.

I know the minister has great respect for the work being done in Canada at this time by similar agencies on national and provincial levels, but we in this group have the feeling that we have not, to date, laid the broad foundations upon which to build the very necessary and comprehensive over-all social security program which Canadian people need and which Canada can well afford.

A few minutes ago I was looking at the report in respect to the problem of social security for aged people in United States and Canada submitted by Dr. Robert M. Clark, which was tabled in the house on March 5, 1959. So far that report has been apparently a matter of academic interest, as far as the government is concerned. Possibly the minister can give us further information as to what the government intends to do in respect to those proposals which can be related to the information contained in this report. I suggest this report indicates how slowly we are moving in this field.

As years go by the need increases, but the government has not, from our point of view, laid the broad foundations necessary to erect the structure of over-all security. Leadership must come from the federal government in this field first of all, although there is a great deal of work done by provincial governments and private agencies, because it is the central government and has the facilities as well as the opportunity of providing the financial assistance required. That leadership must be followed by co-operation between this government and the provincial governments. They must first reach an agreement on the basis of an over-all security program. There are some very good portions of this in effect now, but agreement must be reached in respect to the financing of this program, as well as agreement regarding its administration.

I am confident that if the Canadian people were presented with such a program and told of the cost they would accept it. We do not get something for nothing, but only that which we are willing to pay for, whether it is from corporations or individuals, because two and two make four under a capitalist or socialist administration. I am sure that if the government laid the groundwork for an over-all security program and presented it to the provinces and the people, informing them of its cost and the taxation necessary to carry it forward, it would be acceptable. We in this group do not suggest that we can get something for nothing, but I am sure Canadians would welcome such a forward step which should have been taken years ago.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question now. I did not wish to interrupt him while he was speaking.

Mr. Herridge: Certainly, and I shall answer if I am able to.

Mr. Woolliams: I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. gentleman had to say, and I take it from his remarks that he wishes to extend the benefits of welfare. My question is, does he believe that if we extend these benefits we can do so without increasing taxes of all kinds, including income tax, levied on the entrepreneurs or employees of this country?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not for a minute suggest that we can provide these extra services without collecting more revenues. However, we in this group maintain that we can collect that extra revenue without any difficulty from the corporations and private individuals who have the capacity to pay.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should first like to wish the minister a happy birthday. I am sure he can hear me although he has just left his seat. I hope he will have many more as minister of this department. I should also like to congratulate him for the splendid job he has done as well as for the capable and efficient manner in which he is administering his department.

Perhaps I might just mention a few of the things which were badly needed that he has provided. They are; the doubling of grants in respect to hospital beds, the implementation of hospital insurance as well as the various other building grants to hospitals for internes' quarters, nurses' residences, and so forth. Those are only a very few of the legislative measures which have been brought forward since this minister took charge of this department.

I am sure that I do not need to remind him that he also heads the department which spends 22 cents of every dollar that is spent by this government, and in that regard is second only to the Department of National Defence which spends 26 cents of each dollar spent. I am sure that if we look ahead we will find it is only a matter of years until the Department of National Health and Welfare becomes the largest spending department in the federal government.

As one looks ahead and realizes that more and more hospital beds will be required as the span of life is increased one will understand that special emphasis must be placed on the provision of hospital accommodation for elderly people who are chronically ill. Surely those individuals will not require the expensive equipment and buildings necessary for the treatment of active and acutely ill patients for whom we must construct hospitals at a cost of $12,000 to $15,000 per bed. I suggest accommodation could be built for the chronically ill at approximately half that cost.

It is my contention that chronically ill elderly citizens are the responsibility of governments. Many of these people find it difficult today to find accommodation unless they live in areas where nursing homes have been certified. Those certified homes receive $5 per day per patient from the commission. In comparison, I suggest that the average cost per active permanent hospital bed in Canada is over $18 per day, or almost four times the cost of treatment and accommodation for chronically ill individuals. This certainly applies in Ontario. I also wonder how many active patient hospital beds are being used at this high rate of chronically ill individuals who could be looked after in nursing homes. In this connection I should like to deal in a few moments with mental health. While I appreciate that this is the responsibility of provincial governments, I wonder whether more research could not be done at the federal level. I am aware that Dr. Farquharson has pointed out the scarcity of personnel to carry on this work, but I am also aware of the old proverb that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

I am going to speak for a few moments on the mental health of our people because I believe, with the stresses and strains we are now subjected to, more and more of our people suffer emotional upsets. In this regard I think we should take a look at this very important problem when we realize that one out of 10 babies born in Canada will wind up in a mental institution; that mental and senile deterioration will increase as our life span lengthens. In the last 60 years it has lengthened 20 years. The fact is that one out of every 10 people is either mentally unbalanced or has a serious problem in adjusting himself. It is estimated that 2 per cent of our population is substandard in intelligence. It is stated that 15 per cent of all our school children and university students need psychiatric counsel and it is a well known fact that 2 per cent of our population are alcoholics and need treatment at various times in hospitals or in mental institutions. Indeed, Dr. Wolf states that 50 per cent of all hospital patients suffer from emotional problems that delay their recovery and their stay in hospital was, according to his figures, three times as long as in the normal case. Thus this has increased greatly our hospital costs of which this government pays one-third.

This makes us wonder whether progress is active enough in the research field including researh on virus infection; whether enough dollars are being spent to explore all avenues. Virus sickness, including the common cold, can cost this nation a vast sum in terms of research, treatment and the loss of time of employees from work. Polio is being conquered. The success in this field is a great tribute to the work being done both by the federal and provincial governments; but, what about some of the other viruses? What about the virus of measles, for instance, that works on the pregnant mother with the end result a defective child may be born? Should all pregnant women who are not immunized be given measles serum? Should pamphlets be put out by the federal government advising that this should be done?

The province of Ontario has a very fine health department. It has a very capable administrator in the person of Dr. Mat. Dymond. Duplication is costly and unnecessary. Let us make sure that we cover the field properly by aiding and helping the provinces in the fields in which they are unable to undertake and incapable of undertaking the necessary research.

What about the welfare of our older people? More and more are living beyond the arbitrary years. The hon. member for Niagara Falls mentioned the importance of our senior citizens. This is indeed a problem. Just as an illustration, there are more than 5,000 people in the United States who are over 100 years old. This is an astounding figure. It just illustrates that more and more people are entering into the geriatric field. Indeed, in the province of Ontario they organized a geriatric section in the Ontario Medical Association. I believe about two months ago they had their annual meeting in the city of Toronto. Our arbitrary retirement age was set at the time of Bismarck, and that is getting close to 100 years ago. It is ridiculous for us today to be following the same premise. At the time of Bismarck, the average person lived to be 40 years of age; today he lives to be 70 years. We have to take another look at this question.

A great many of these older people live in their own homes, but they are unable to carry on normal household duties to the full extent that they should. The husband and wife are living there. In many instances, if a well cooked meal was prepared and taken to them they could continue living at home. That is being done in some parts of the United States; they call it "meals on wheels". Those people get one good cooked meal a day and they stay in their homes where they are happy in their own environment, without the cost of housing them, thus saving the government millions of dollars. The same thing applies to cleaning up and looking after the house. If a welfare worker were to go in the home once a week and probably do some of the heavier work the old people could carry on. The premises would be kept clean and the old people would be cheered up by the welfare worker. I would suggest to the federal government that they give leadership to the provincial governments in some of those things that have been pointed out, particularly by the United States geriatric society.

We always speak about the pensioners and the increases needed in their pensions. I believe in this. I am in favour of increases but also let me say that I have seen old people die not for want of money but for want of love. Love and the feeling of being wanted are very necessary if we are to have a successful program for the aged. As a matter of fact, this is fundamental. Again this is something that should be instituted at the community level. It costs nothing. Let us put it into practice.

I want to touch on another problem which concerns our children. I hope I am not making too many suggestions to the minister because I know some of the problems he has. I believe that the federal government should assist in or carry out a plan across Canada to supply milk to all the school children. This is done in nearly every country today that has a standard of living comparable with ours. Canada is particularly fortunate in having some of the finest dairy cows in the world. Why we should be behind other countries in this field is very difficult to understand. No better food could be provided for a growing child at such a low cost.

I want to say a few words about cardio-vascular diseases which are caused by a high cholesterol diet. The villain is said to be cream, butter, animal fats, all products produced in abundance in our northern climate. Not only are they important to our economy but milk and cheese are cheap sources of protein, calcium, riboflavin and vitamin A. It has been contended that butter, cream and fat in the meal would cause heart disease, particularly coronary thrombosis. People have been urged to use less fat, to discontinue butter and cream and to drink skim milk or powdered skim milk instead of whole milk.

I believe it is readily admitted today that humans obtain their cholesterol in one of three ways: first, by eating foods that contain it; second, by manufacturing it from the starch, sugar and protein they consume; third, by manufacturing cholesterol within the body which varies in reverse with the amount of cholesterol they have.

I think it is pretty well accepted now that cardio-vascular disease runs in families; that only a small percentage of people run cholesterol over normal on normal diets, and those that do may be helped by diet, but more likely will have to be helped by a drug which will control it as insulin controls diabetes. The perfect drug to control it has not been developed but there is a drug that does stop the body producing cholesterol just short of its synthesis.

[Mr. Rynard.]

The medical profession, and I plead guilty with them, may have unwittingly done a great deal of harm to the dairy industry. To prove how fallacious our concepts may have been may I say that we in Canada use far more butter and have far less coronaries than our neighbours to the south. In talking to representatives of health departments in Great Britain and Europe I learned that no particular diet was stressed. The only thing they did stress was to avoid obesity and to control weight.

In examining the matter more closely we must have in mind that milk has been a food for human beings since life began. Perhaps the health and welfare department could emphasize the importance of milk, cheese and dairy products in general in our economy as being the cheapest sources of calcium, riboflavin and protein.

I wish to dwell for a few minutes on the shortage of trained personnel. We hear so many people say: We will put in a health plan tomorrow and we will cover all dental and medical care. Let me say this. I am wondering what can be done federally by the Department of National Health and Welfare to encourage young people graduating from high schools to enter the fields of dentistry and medicine. Something has to be done if the high standard of dentistry and medicine, the finest in the world, are to be preserved.

It is shocking to learn that only 193 dentists graduated in 1959 compared with 306 in 1950. Nine out of every ten people suffer dental destruction and all children need dental attention before the age of 15. To do all this work in Canada there are only 4,579 dentists in private practice or one dentist for over 3,000 people. In Sweden there is a dentist for every 1,400 and in the United States there is one dentist for every 1,800 people. To meet the need of prevention partially, V.O.P. is training dental hygienists as auxiliary helpers in this field, particularly with regard to the maintenance of healthy mouths in children.

How do we increase the number of dentists to the point of at least keeping the present ratio of dentists to the number of patients? Dentistry schools would have to be enlarged. How are the costs of the course to be met? How are the students going to be able to meet the fees and the other costs of attending university? If they are able to borrow this money, will their earnings be high enough to compensate them for the five years of expensive training plus dental office equipment costing between $7,000 and $10,000 and high rental offices in our cities? Has the federal Department of National Health and Welfare undertaken any research in this field to learn the answers?

Would a course of four years, with an additional month or two months per year, cut the costs and allow more students to be graduated? The same buildings could be used for the extra two months without any or very little additional cost. I am wondering whether, with our high cost economy in every field, we can allow our educational buildings to stand idle for some months in the year bearing the cost of depreciation and interest charges? I know it will be said that we are short of teachers to carry on any program like this. Yet we met that crisis when the war was on and many of our medical and dental men were away in the services.

There is another point. Should tax incentives be granted until the young graduate has some of his debt off his shoulders? I am speaking particularly of the dental profession although the statements I have made can be applied to many of the other professions, including my own. In the dental field there is now insurance as to dental care with free choice of dentists. Yet what is the use of health insurance or dental insurance if we have insufficient personnel to give the necessary care?

In the medical field it seems to me that everyone wants to be a specialist. In many places there is, I believe, a shortage of general practitioners. Is there anything that can be done to make general practice more attractive to the young graduate? It seems to me that today a young man goes through medical school and rarely meets a general practitioner. Should qualified general practitioners be put on the teaching staffs of universities?

When I went through school all teachers, as I remember, had done some general practice work, the work of the man who has been so aptly described as not only the healer but the friend and counsellor of the family. Too many specialists add to the costs with which the public is already overburdened. In case I may be misunderstood, let me say that the specialist often is able to save lives. Special training is very necessary in many cases, but do not let us lose the general practitioner.

In this field we need many more graduates. Had we not taken in so many doctors from other countries, we would not have sufficient medical personnel today to look after the people of Canada. Again, as I have suggested with regard to dentistry, should the time be cut from six to five years and the course each year lengthened? Should tax incentives be offered young medical graduates? Is the fear of a government dominated health plan scaring away promising young men from the medical and dental fields? Should we encourage young women in our high schools to go into this field, a field that appears to me is being vacated by the young men? In some countries in Europe women doctors are more numerous than men. Perhaps we should learn some of the answers before it is too late and we find ourselves short of necessary medical care. It is my hope that judge Hall and his commission will come up with a sound scheme that will not have to be put in reverse because of hasty, ill-conceived plans.

Mr. Regier: Would the hon. member permit a question? I know he is an honoured member of the medical profession. However, there is a suspicion abroad that the medical and dental professions are closed union shops and that there are limitations imposed upon the numbers who may become doctors or dentists. Would the hon. member for Simcoe East, who has a considerable reputation in this field, comment on this allegation that we hear so often?

Mr. Rynard: We have the highest standard of medical care in the world and there has to be close scrutiny of the students and personnel who are trained in the medical field. We want to maintain our standards if we can.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on that part of the estimates dealing with the emergency advisory committee and radiation protection. I do not believe anyone today has touched on that part of the program of the minister, and this is a fact I deplore. I believe there is great apathy among the people of Canada and I am sorry to say that it seems there is great apathy in the House of Commons regarding this very important matter. I do not believe it is possible to exaggerate the necessity of having a program for human survival in the event of war. In the newspapers on June 21 last we noted that Douglas Dillon, treasury secretary of the United States, had said that today the Berlin situation is crucial and that a house foreign affairs expert had said that it was possible the United States would be at war with Russia by the end of the year over Berlin.

In the report of the special committee on research I have read that Dr. Stewart said:

> I know of no approved shelter in the country, no shelter that has a stamp of approval.

We have had a civil defence organization for ten years and if we continue at the same tempo for the next ten years and war comes we will be totally unprepared. I feel that it is only by a well organized and well thought out civil defence, which will provide fall-out shelters for all Canadians, that this nation will survive a nuclear attack.

With the recent threat of Mr. Khrushchev that he will make a separate peace treaty with east Germany by the end of this year and with the firm warning of President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan that they will resist such a move, hon. members will agree that the tension in the world today has almost reached the cracking point.

While a military defence may have the desired effect against an attack, one must not forget that a well established civil defence is also a great deterrent. If a nation is organized for human survival in the event of a nuclear war, the effect of the nuclear bomb is diminished to the damages caused by the explosion. The greatest damage a nuclear bomb can cause lies in the after effects of the radioactive fall-out. It is of the utmost importance for national survival that precautionary measures be taken at once to safeguard our population. Since 1955 when, at a meeting in Edmonton on August 31, military experts and nuclear war experts warned the nation that the time to act was "now", almost six years have passed.

Although in the last two years a vigorous publicity campaign has been waged by the authorities, there has not been any significant progress toward provisions for human survival. We can say without hesitation that, while the danger of nuclear attack has been brought home to the Canadian people, no concrete measures for the protection of the Canadian people have been taken. There is no purpose in being like the ostrich and burying our heads in the sand. The only way to bring about satisfactory results is through action by the government in enlisting the people in a national defence organization in the same manner as the nation would do if it were at war. The time to act is "now", when we have idle hands, people who are not actively employed in our industry should be enlisted in the same manner as soldiers during a war emergency. There is no point in pretending that we are getting anywhere in our civil defence. We can come to the definite conclusion that if we proceed at the same tempo as we have been proceeding since August 1955 when the nation was told that the time to act was "now", then we will not be ready when war comes. It will then be too late. We must prepare for civil defence now.

In the Toronto Saturday Night of June 10, 1961, there is an article by General F. F. Worthington, former civil defence co-ordinator, comparing what Russia is doing with what Canada is doing. I quote from that article:

[Mr. Regnier.]

Russia: People are trained and organized

In the U.S.S.R., civil defence training is mandatory for every male person between the ages of 16 and 60 and for every female person between 18 and 50 not in the armed forces or excused for medical reasons. The government provides, maintains and supplies both blast shelters and fall-out shelters.

The basic component of the Soviet organization is the "self-defence group" in heavily populated areas and the "unitary team" in sparsely populated areas.

In peacetime, the duties of both groups, as set out in the Soviet union's civil defence manual under the title "Defence Against Agents of Mass Destruction", are to maintain a constant state of preparation against an attack and to work with the regular authorities in such services as fire prevention.

In the event of an attack, they give first aid to the injured (and veterinary aid to animals), organize the evacuation of the population from destroyed areas and generally work to eliminate the after effects of an attack.

Self-defence groups consist of a chief, his deputy for political affairs, a property manager, communications officer and fire fighting, anti-chemical, emergency rescue, medical (two), shelters, law enforcement and veterinary (in farm communities) teams. Each team is composed of a team commander, four to seven members and a reserve of two men.

Canada: Survival is up to the individual

Survival for Canadians in a nuclear war is very much a voluntary decision. The government provides no bomb shelters, no fall-out shelters and no supplies or services, apart from essential national services, to aid the citizen. Canadians may, if they choose, build their own fall-out shelters following a government approved plan. Or they may not; no one is compelled to take any precaution against a nuclear war. Those who do choose to take what action they can to protect themselves face a difficult task.

In "eleven steps to survival", publication No. 4 in the blue print for survival series by the emergency measures organization, it is made clear that to be at all effective they must know the effects of nuclear explosions, the facts about fall-out, the warning signals (and have a battery powered radio), have a shelter and fourteen days' emergency supplies (100 items), know how (and when) to fight fires; know home aid and nursing, know emergency cleanliness, know how to get rid of radioactive dust, know municipal emergency plans, and finally, have their own plan for their own families.

In all this, the government and government supported agencies provide only the basic information. In many cases, particularly in municipal emergency plans, even the information is as yet unavailable.

As I have just said, in Russia the people are trained and organized. In Canada, survival is up to the individual. It is not sufficient for the government to give good advice to the nation. The government must save the people in spite of themselves. We cannot permit this nation to commit suicide. We must save the people. It is foolish to keep an army just to pick up the pieces after the bomb falls. While first aid is important, it is more logical to avoid casualties and thereby take the sting out of the bomb. As I said before, I feel it is impossible to exaggerate the necessity for a proper civil defence organization. I should like to say also that if we did have the proper civil defence organization, we would have no unemployment in this country. We could employ anyone who was willing to work and in this way we would have prosperity in peacetime and we would have some assurance of protection in time of war. Let us not kid ourselves. If we did not have insurance agents, we would not buy insurance. If the insurance agents were not paid, we would have no insurance. We will have no proper civil defence organization as long as we are not ready to organize it in a businesslike manner. We know that today the war clouds are all over the world and if we are not careful we will be caught without preparation.

I am sorry to see that there is no more interest in the discussion of this most important item in the estimates. I know the government has advised the people of the dangers; they have told the people what to do, but I believe the people are entitled to more leadership in connection with this matter.

Mr. Regier: I was greatly interested in hearing the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface. If I have taken his words down correctly he said, "In Russia the people are trained and organized". I do not mean to say very much on the subject of civil defence of our population in case of a nuclear war. However, I should like to inform the hon. member for St. Boniface that, even though the people in Russia may be well trained and organized as to how to defend themselves in case of a potential nuclear war, I am not at all impressed because if nuclear war comes I can assure the hon. member that I do not expect to survive. I can also assure him that if I should be unfortunate enough to survive I would not regard the world as worthy of living in afterward regardless of political organizations or of all kinds of ideologies that may be involved. I consider this to be a whole bunch of nonsense. I think the hon. member might be well advised to consider what he, I and all of the rest of us in the eastern world and in the western world are able to do to prevent this horrible catastrophe from happening.

I have also a brief observation to make on the remarks of the hon. member who preceded the hon. member for St. Boniface, namely the hon. member for Simcoe East. He made a reference to the issue of chronic hospitals. At this point I wish to compliment our government on making available hospital grants and also maintenance grants in respect of the problem of chronic hospitals. I should like to condemn our provincial departments of health in this respect. I completely agree with the hon. member for Simcoe East in his contention that we are operating most uneconomically when we are maintaining in our hospitals many people who ought to be looked after in chronic hospitals.

I believe that our provincial governments are guilty in that they have not supplied any leadership whatsoever with respect to the initiation and the building of hospitals for those who are chronically ill. For a number of years now our federal government have offered to make a major contibution towards the construction of these hospitals; and under our national hospital insurance plan they have also offered to bear what I consider to be a major share of the cost of operation of such hospitals. Yet our provincial governments are evading their responsibilities in this field. This evasion is costing the taxpayers needless amounts of money and it is also causing a great deal of needless human suffering.

Further, I wish to call to the minister's attention at this time especially one particular item. If a man and his wife are each beyond the age of 70 years they are entitled to and receive $55 times 2, namely $110 a month. At the moment either the husband or the wife dies the survivor—and statistics will show that the husband usually dies first and then the widow survives—is left with $55 a month.

I know this issue does not arise in the case of the people who have gone through the means test. However, we have ever so many hundreds of thousands of cases in Canada in which a man and his wife live on the $110 a month. They receive no supplementary benefits. They have been independent people all their lives. They have a minimum amount of savings. They may even have their own home. They may even have an income by way of annuity or pension or what-have-you. However, the moment that one of them dies there is a reduction of 50 per cent in their receipts. This reduction places many of these people in the position in which the survivor—and as I indicated previously in most instances it is the widow—has to submit to the means test in order to receive whatever supplementary benefits are available within the province or within the municipality. I feel that this is most unfair. I feel that we ought to adjust our social security act in order that the survivor, upon the death of the other partner, might be able to receive a little more than 50 per cent of the amount that had been received previously. I know that this issue involves the marginal case.

Mr. Brundsen: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Brunsden: As usual the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is dealing in the abstract. He is pointing out cases. He is deploring conditions. Would he care to make a concrete recommendation?

Mr. Regier: I would indeed, Mr. Chairman. I note that the hon. member for Medicine Hat is again in his regular old form. Every time I speak he raises a point of order. However, at this time he did not raise a point of order; he asked a question. I would recommend that a man and his wife receive, as they now receive $110 a month. However, if one of them dies, I would recommend that the survivor receive at least $75 a month. I believe this would be a compensation in the case and would eliminate the need for the survivors to subject themselves to the means test and to have their houses and whatever other small annuity or income they might have subjected to scrutiny by welfare officers. I believe it would help to maintain the dignity of these people.

This is an issue that has been called to my attention many and many a time. I pledged my word that I would raise it on the appropriate occasion. I have written letters to the minister and in his replies he always refers me to the ability of the provincial governments and the municipal governments, to deal with the matter, and says that in the case of need they may grant supplementary allowances. I do not think the minister has completely understood the issue involved. All these people know they can apply to the municipalities and provincial governments; that they can submit their case to a means test. However, I feel our basic law is wrong and is weak in this respect, because the basic expenses of maintaining a home for one are not half what they are for maintaining a home for two. The grant should recognize this fact. I think the minister appreciates it. Perhaps our Old Age Security Act ought to be amended in this respect, because as it is now operating we are forcing all kinds of people needlessly to appeal to the municipality or the provincial government, to plead poverty and be humiliated in a way that I think the Old Age Security Act never intended.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my thanks to the minister for his résumé this morning of the work of his department. I think the minister gave us some very interesting figures to consider. The minister pointed out, as have other hon. members, that the Department of National Health and Welfare is now the second largest spending department of the federal government, being second to the Department of National Defence.

The minister also pointed out that of this $1.6 billion we are spending on health and welfare, 94 per cent is statutory. We know that as our population increases and as people live longer this statutory grant is bound to increase year after year. Of course the figures the minister gave us this morning do not tell the whole story, because in addition to federal spending there is provincial spending.

I do not know whether the minister has available the total amount spent on health and welfare throughout Canada. If he has that figure, I think it would be very useful to have it on Hansard, because I think the federal figure would be much more meaningful if we could consider it against the background of the total cost of health and welfare services throughout Canada. As I have said, these amounts are going to increase year after year and, comprehensive as are our plans for health and welfare, there are still many things we would like to see included in this program.

Some hon. members mentioned portable pensions this morning. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat mentioned that the pension plan should be revised so that the survivor would receive $75 a month instead of the $55 he now receives under the present plan. I think these suggestions are worthy of consideration and are certainly things we would like to include in future plans.

However, because of the kind of economy we have in Canada, we can only have as much as our country can afford. I think this raises the point of whether or not it is possible to organize our expenditures on health and welfare in a more efficient manner than is the case at the present time. According to the figures which the minister gave us this morning, of the $1.6 billion we are spending this year, approximately one quarter will be spent on health. That, of course, is a considerable sum in itself, but we must consider that health is the primary responsibility of the provinces. Therefore the total amount spent on health throughout Canada will be many times that figure.

I have been wondering whether it is possible to find out just what relationship exists, or whether there is any relationship between expenditures on health and expenditures on welfare. I do not know whether the minister's department has carried out any study in this regard, but I think it would be useful to undertake such a study.

Money spent on health must be regarded as an investment, because health means wealth and more production. Health is an important factor in our economic production. Today we have a program of preventive medicine and I wonder whether it might not be possible to extend that preventive idea a little further than we are at the present time. At the present time we think mainly in terms of vaccines to prevent certain diseases. This morning the minister spoke of physical fitness programs, and these are certainly directly related to health.

I was impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe East concerning nutrition and diet. I noted that in the minister's report there is a section on nutrition; we are examining certain foods and setting up certain nutritional standards. However, I think these things should be correlated; I think they all tie in together. I say this because it is my opinion that as a people we Canadians are not healthy. I think we are far too soft physically, mentally, morally and in many other ways.

If we are going to have a program of physical fitness, let us go all out and have a co-ordinated plan, not just a separate plan for physical fitness, a separate plan for nutrition and a separate plan for dieting; let us have a program in which will be incorporated all the factors that contribute to health. I should like the minister to tell us what consideration his department has given to this question.

The minister mentioned another point this morning which was of great interest to me. I refer to radiation protection activities undertaken by the department. The minister said the level of strontium-90 in milk had declined to 9.5 micromicrocuries from 15 points a few years ago. I understand that figure to be an average figure, but I wonder whether the minister could tell us what the latest figures are in respect to the range of levels in the various parts of Canada.

The question of radiation hazard is not confined merely to radiation fall-out. We have now reached the point in our industrial development where atomic energy is coming into greater use. I suggest this raises the problems of hazards from atomic wastes.

I am informed of the decision of the United States court of appeal which prevented the establishment of an atomic power plant at Lacoona beach on lake Erie, some 30 miles southwest of Detroit. That court held that the United States atomic energy commission in issuing a provisional licence for this plant was unmindful of the welfare and safety of the 2 million people who live within a 30 mile radius of that location. I wonder whether, in view of the advent of atomic power in industrial use, Canadian cities and centres might not also be endangered, and should like to know what steps are being taken to forestall this.

As the number of plants using atomic energy increase the disposal and dumping of wastes and radioactive garbage becomes more and more of a problem. We know that the Ontario hydro electric commission has chosen a site 15 miles north of Kincardine for the establishment of a 200,000 kilowatt atomic power generating plant. I should like to ask the minister what arrangements are being made for the disposal of atomic or radioactive wastes from that plant. I understand that this waste will be disposed of in the waters of lake Huron.

Last November health authorities in Nova Scotia became concerned about the United States atomic energy commission dumping atomic wastes in the ocean 200 miles south of Yarmouth. Individuals who live on the eastern seaboard depend primarily on the products of the ocean—various fisheries—for their livelihood and are very much concerned about the possible effects of radioactive contamination. About that time the Nova Scotian authorities reported this matter to the department of health in Ottawa, but so far as I am aware nothing has resulted since. I should like the minister to comment in respect to this problem when he replies because it seems to me that if radioactive waste dumped into the ocean can be a hazard then the radioactive wastes being disposed of in our inland waters would certainly be a much greater hazard.

Before I resume my seat I should like to thank the minister and his department for the co-operation which was forthcoming a year or so ago in connection with radioactive hazards in my own riding. This radiation hazard occurred in the fluorspar mines at St. Lawrence. Through the co-operation between the minister's department and the provincial departments of health and mines arrangements were worked out whereby safeguards were adopted to protect the health of miners working in that area. It was also my understanding that some arrangements would be arrived at whereby the miners themselves would be provided with some means of monitoring the radioactivity in these mines. I know a lot of miners working there who have been exposed to what they consider the limit and who left because they did not wish to expose themselves any further. I should be grateful if the minister could bring us up to date in respect to what has developed in connection with the radiation hazard in these mines.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the minister's department is not one with which I have had much dealing or contact and I am, therefore, not in a position to be either critical or flattering in respect to its administration. However, I do wish to ask the minister a few questions and make several comments in regard to one phase of a topic which is considered to be of interest at the present time, and has been of interest for a number of years.

We are all, of course, aware of the situation which has developed in connection with Jean Talon hospital in Montreal, and I am very curious and interested to receive an explanation from the minister as to how grants from the federal government were allocated to this particular institution. I should like to hear about the timing of those grants.

I should like to ask a question of the minister resulting from a certain dissatisfaction with an answer he gave in the house to a question relating to a press release which emanated from his office embodying a speech he made in the constituency of York-Humber while assisting the hon. member representing that riding at a constituency meeting of some kind. I should like to know whether the minister has looked closely at the contents of that speech and whether he does not think he owes his political opponents an apology for embodying in that release very hard hitting, critical and nasty references to both the Liberal and C.C.F. parties. It was a bit of a shock to me that the minister would use his facilities in order to give wide distribution to an out and out political attack such as was embodied in that press release. We appreciate that, politics being what they are, the minister is entitled to have his view that the Liberals are a bunch of rogues and the C.C.F.'ers a scandalmongering group, but when allegagations and accusations such as those are embodied in a speech emanating from his office one wonders about the coherence of the minister's attitude toward his role as minister. I would appreciate an early explanation in this regard.

Another field in respect to which we deserve some kind of an outline, which I do not believe the minister covered in his introductory remarks, has relation to a fitness council or the rumoured and heralded legislation that was going to be brought forward this session in relation to major support for a physical fitness program. I am sure the minister knows the sad fate of the fitness council which was set up during the war by the previous administration, and how it gradually fell away and finally was put to one side as a useless field of endeavour for the federal government.

A little over a year ago the Prime Minister indicated that the idea of a national fitness council had won his support and that he was going to have federal authorities study the possibility of government participation in such a program. We must assume that this is part of the legislation heralded in the speech from the throne. I think we need to hear from the minister as to what form the plans are taking. Anyone who goes back and reads the concluding debate that wound up the affairs of the previous national fitness council and the legislation with regard to it knows that it sickened and died despite whatever merit or purpose it may have had. If we are to get into the field again I think we are entitled to an explanation of what went wrong with the previous legislation. What was wrong with the liaison and the co-operation among all the bodies that made up the former fitness council that led to its demise? If we do not get this information it seems to me we shall be faced with an attempt to do what has already been attempted and found to be a failure.

The aspect of the fitness council that has, of course, more public interest, more fascination, is whatever it may do in the nature of supporting national sport. Here again I think we would welcome from the minister some indication of the role he feels the federal government or his department may play in supporting the national athletic reputation of Canada. My own feeling, and I think that of many of my friends, is that this is not a line of endeavour that should be sponsored by the federal government. And yet increasingly in other nations of the world the national team, whether it be track and field, or team athletics, is becoming an aspect of national pride and national heritage. This being so, a decision has to be made concerning the role the federal government will play. Somehow or other we have never been very bold in determining what that role will be. Since legislation is supposedly coming in this session about it, I think the minister should give us an indication as to the reasons why we should get into this field, or why we should not.

The debate which has taken place in the public mind on this matter has taken place largely on the sport pages of the Canadian newspapers. While I do not think the sport pages are the favourite reading matter of politicians, as someone who checks them with some regularity I can say that in the main the writers of the sport pages of Canada, when they turn to this problem, use an editorial line which is strongly in support of some kind of national endeavour in the field of sport in order to improve the status of Canada's reputation in this regard. Some writers have tried to deal with the very difficult and delicate problem of what role professionalism is to play in this kind of endeavour. In general, no one has worked out a clear-cut approach as to when a sport or an athletic activity becomes of importance to the national government. We can see this problem in hockey perhaps more than in any other place in that we cannot field a good amateur team in world competition that is a genuinely amateur team according to the traditional classification of amateur, and yet our players have to face units that are organized, developed and sponsored by the states, particularly by the states in the Soviet bloc, where their attitude toward athletics seems to be that, both individual sport and team sports are an important adjunct of life and fully deserve the support of the government.

I think an example we should look at in this particular field is the United States where for many years the state department has backed the sending of United States athletes to different parts of the world, supporting them, providing an appropriation that does not recompense the athletes in terms of professional stipend but ensures that United States athletes are prepared and trained and participate in athletic events around the world.

Of course, the United States, through private auspices, comes forward at Olympic time and at the time of the Pan-American games and provides exceptionally large, or relatively large, sums of money to see that Old Glory is well represented in the athletic fields of the world. One of the reasons the United States can do this without getting into it to the extent that this country can is that the four semester system in their universities leads to a much greater thoroughness and intensity in the kind of training that can be given to athletes of all kinds. In a sense they are subsidized.

I had the pleasure of reading the local newspaper the other day and seeing where three students that I had once taught had graduated from a United States university, and their whole education at these universities was subsidized because of the fact that they were excellent hockey players. Another lad who graduated was an excellent runner. Well, the Americans have built into their universities this promotion or subsidization of their athletes, and so it becomes a support for their international performance. We have not that situation in Canadian universities particularly in track and field sports and in others. Therefore, Canada continues to make a terribly poor showing.

Several weeks ago a bound volume was put out in commemoration of the Olympic games that were held in Rome. If Canadian nationalism is sparked or supported by seeing indications that Canadians have done well, hon. members would be very disappointed in looking at this volume, because continually they would see that athletes from New Zealand, Australia, United States, Poland, Hungary, Norway, Finland were all there on the rostrum accepting medals for doing very well. You could see what a reflection of national pride it provided. For Canadians there is almost nothing. I think we have one picture of the famous Ottawa skier, and that is about it. In terms of the actual text of that very thick volume Canadians hardly appear at all. I am not putting it to the minister that this is a very grave or a very serious condition in my opinion, but many people in the country feel that it is, and I am trying to put it to the minister that we should have some indication from this government as to what its views are because whether I, the hon. member for Greenwood or the hon. member for Kootenay West think it is important, it is an issue in much of the country with a certain number of people.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question. In his research—and it has been very interesting—into the relative success of Canadians and others in international competitions has he discovered whether the success or failure of representative athletes has had any effect in the relative countries on the participation in healthier athletic games?

Mr. Fisher: It has had a tremendous effect, according to what I can find out, because of the tendency today for younger people in particular to search for heroes and symbols of success. When a country does not produce any people who stand in the forefront of world achievement, there is no one to look to for an example. This is one of the difficulties.

Of course, in the Soviet bloc an athletic person of high performance is given a tremendous amount of respect and encouragement and the same, as we know, applies in the United States. We do so too but most of our athletic hero worship at the present time is tending to focus upon activities in two fields, professional hockey and professional football. In the one those who do the chore are mostly Americans and in the other field they are concentrated in a fairly small league of six teams. It is not really international competition in a sense. Good as Jean Beliveau may be, he is not of world stature such as a runner like Herb Elliott or a runner like Vladimir Kucs or some of the British runners.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask the hon. member a question? In the list of countries which produce many champions he would include Great Britain, would he not?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member with, I would almost say, his British-Israelite zeal should recognize that many people in Britain are greatly disturbed about the situation. They have had the Wolfenden report on the situation which was prepared by the same man who did the study on homosexual psychopaths. He made a study of playground facilities and other sport facilities in Britain and very recently the government there provided more funds for playgrounds and coaching activity in line with the report. If the hon. member wants to look at the British for an example, I would point out that they are very concerned about this problem. It is not surprising to find that in very serious, one might say stodgy, media such as the London Times and the Daily Telegraph, strong support for the old English tradition of games and athletics. We do not seem to have that here.

In concluding this particular aspect of my remarks, I want to say to the minister that I am not advocating that we come out with a policy that strongly supports national endeavour in the field of sport because I am not sure it is a line we should pursue. However, as long as we are going to have an organization like the Canada Council operating in what one might call the field of high culture, we have to recognize that a much larger group of people in Canada strongly believe that in their particular popular culture, sports culture, there should also be leadership. It seems to me that the government has indicated by its acknowledgement in the speech from the throne that it is going to do something about this matter. We would like to know how far it is going to go and what it feels the real urgencies are.

The last point on which I want to touch relates to a very general field that was brought to my mind by the remarks of the medical member for Simcoe East who issued not quite a lament but at least an appeal for the general practitioner. In a couple of contracts I have had with groups of doctors recently I noticed that if you are talking to a surgeon or some other kind of specialist his attitude toward medical insurance is much different from the attitude of the general practitioner. The general practitioner seems to be the doctor who is most against any extension of state operated medical insurance in particular. I should like to refer hon. members to one of the most entertaining articles on doctors that I have ever encountered. It is entitled "Doctors and Politics". It is written by William A. Glaser and it appeared in the American Journal of Sociology for November, 1960. It is filled with a certain amount of sociological jargon but it analyses the medical profession in terms that seem to me to be true. I start with this quotation:

> The doctor is a highly trained expert who uses a codified and technical body of knowledge and skills to solve complicated problems with certainty and with a high rate of demonstrable success. The politician uses common sense knowledge and personal relations to promote and adjust the demands of competing groups, and his solutions are never permanent and seldom unambiguously successful. From their perspective at the pinnacle of the achievement and reward systems—

He just means that doctors make more money than most people and are looked up to more than most.

> —many doctors may look down upon politicians and lay pressure groups as inept and inferior. Medical journals sometimes publish patronizing harangues against politicians. In two surveys doctors and medical students described politicians as people less intelligent, moral and dignified than themselves. The editor of a leading medical journal sums up a viewpoint probably widespread in the profession:
> "The doctor's dilemma today emerges from the fact that politics is a dirty-hands business, and medicine has always been a clean-hands profession. Healing and heeling don't go together. Actually, what exponents of pressure-group action by doctors may be saying is that a good end justifies evil means—a doctrine that has been rejected by philosophers since the time of Hippocrates and is shunned by most doctors today in their personal and professional lives."
> For all these reasons, the average doctor is not an unusually active participant in campaigns and is neither able nor willing to maintain the year-round involvement in lay politics which yields the greatest political influence.

This analysis of the medical profession and the attitude of the doctor toward politics seems to me particularly relevant at a time when the Canadian Medical Association is trying to give leadership to the doctors in meeting a challenge that is coming from the fact that most political parties have gone on record as supporting a medical insurance scheme that will apply to all or the great majority of the people in the particular jurisdiction in which that party may be interested.

If this analysis is true, it seems to me that the doctors are perhaps peculiarly or particularly inexperienced in understanding or appreciating the pressures that politicians may be under and also the situation into which they are now fully settled. It is for that reason that I would hope that both the provincial medical association and the Canadian Medical Association will continue to do everything in their power to maintain a progressive attitude. If they feel, as their bulletins indicate, that the medical profession can accept this challenge and provide through doctor-supervised plans some complete answer to the medical needs that the people are wanting to have satisfied at the present time, then I think we will tend to be grateful. However, because I believe that this analysis has some sense and is a fairly correct one, I have grave doubts whether doctors as a whole will be able to weather the kind of storms that they will face in producing such a scheme. I would only ask that they do their best to recognize that, whether or not they produce a scheme that is acceptable to the politicians, they must accept the fact that the country wants a state supported or state sponsored or state led medical scheme for all of the people of the country. It seems to me that as long as they keep trying to come up with something that through co-operation and liaison with government leadership will provide the service, then just so long will they remain in the forefront of their profession both in its practising aspect and its administrative aspect. Of course, it is the administrative aspect that draws them into politics.

One of the answers I always get when I ask both doctors and dentists why they are having difficulty in recruiting at the present time is that there is so much socialism abroad that they cannot attract people into the profession. There is not nearly the urgency to be a doctor or a dentist today because of the fear these professions are going to be taken over by the state. This always seems to me a most incomplete and unsatisfactory response because when one analyses what the medical profession in particular has done, one finds that they have formed into clinics and co-operative groups themselves. They have been doing this for a very long time. The tendency, at least in the part of the country from which I come, is to have a kind of co-operative arrangement among doctors. You rarely find a single doctor operating any more. I am sure there are good reasons for this. There are the expenses that need to be covered, the increasing complexity, the complementary nature of so much that is done in specialized fields in the medical profession.

It seems to me that in answer to that kind of response, I am correct in saying that you, yourselves, in the medical profession have started and have gone along with this trend toward socialism. One of the points I noted two years ago was that the Canadian Medical Association indicated in a statement that one third of the doctors in Canada were on a salary. Surely, if there is that large a proportion of the doctors in Canada on a salary, the whole idea that the trend of the times is undermining recruiting in the medical profession must be haywire. When the percentage is so high, there is every indication that the payment of a salary does not inhibit people from going into the medical profession.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would he agree with the statement that one third of the doctors in Canada today came from the socialist medical plan in Great Britain?

Mr. Fisher: Why should I agree with that statement? I do not know whether or not there is any substance to it.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This is a statement that has been bandied about quite a bit, and I wondered whether or not the hon. member had read it and agreed with it.

Mr. Fisher: I have not read it. However, I have met a great many doctors from Great Britain in Canada who are great advocates of socialized medicine. I want to tell the hon. member that in the year or so I was attending university in England, I could not find a Conservative anywhere who wanted to ditch the national health plan.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There still seems to be a number of Conservatives over there.

Mr. Fisher: Well, there certainly are and those Conservatives, I point out to the hon. member, are supporting the national health plan. I am sure that his party will be, too, when this subject becomes an election issue.

The last point I wanted to make in relation to this situation of inability to recruit professional men, I think that the difficulty is the cost of education, that is in so far as doctors and dentists are concerned. I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe East that the urgency in connection with dentistry is even greater than in connection with medicine. We are desperately short of dentists in this country. Unless we are prepared to do something to ameliorate the tremendous costs that fall upon people going into these two professions, then I think we are going to run short of practitioners. However, I would hate to believe that the fact we are getting fewer dentists and fewer doctors stems from a situation in which young people today are worried about the encroachment of the state. I would hate to believe that there are not still challenges and worth-while roles for young people in medicine and in dentistry.

I come back to the point again that I feel it is because the training is so long, so expensive and in a way so difficult, it is no longer attractive to very many young people who can get an easier education and a quicker means of earning their living today. The only way we can balance this situation is by giving greater incentives to people who are in training for both those professions.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to inform the hon. member of this, but his time has expired.

Mr. Benidickson: It was not my intention to delay the estimates—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If I might interrupt the hon. member, I would say that my own remarks would probably take until six o'clock, if that is his objective.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not my objective. Would the minister like to answer some of the questions and speak now?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I would prefer to answer them all at once.

Mr. Benidickson: I would be pleased to sit down and allow the minister to reply to some of the questions that have been put this afternoon.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If the hon. member has a question, I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. Benidickson: I would want to be assured that we would not, within 20 minutes, take any chance that there would be a hurried reply on the part of the minister to the very important questions that have been raised by so many members, including members on his own side this afternoon, when we are dealing with expenditures of $1.6 billion. I have remained seated after having spoken earlier today until all other members had an opportunity to make their first remarks in connection with this opening item of this department.

I did not have time this morning under the rules to raise a question that disturbed me after I looked at the white paper presented in connection with the budget this year. I refer to certain tables which relate to the Department of National Health and Welfare found on page 81 of that white paper. In these tables one can find the federal government share of old age assistance, disabled persons' allowances, blind persons pensions and unemployment assistance. The minister and I both represent constituencies in the province of Ontario. Only two or three days ago I observed some of these figures. I rise again because I felt it very important to ask the minister to explain why Ontario, with a larger population than that of the province of Quebec, seems to have received a disproportionate amount in connection with these matching grants related to federal statutes.

I refer to old age assistance in the province of Quebec, the same federal formula being applicable all across Canada, and I notice that the province of Quebec asked the federal government for $10.8 million for these needy people in 1960-61 and received $10.8 from Ottawa. The benign Mr. Frost of Ontario, who has created for himself very sucessfully an image of benevolence, kindness and so on, heads a larger population. I assume, there is in Ontario an equal proportion of needy people in the age group that would ask for old age assistance, under his administration. Claims are advanced from Ontario to the federal government of only $6.7 million. I thought perhaps the minister would explain why this has occurred. I believe that the opportunities are the same in each province.

Then when one comes to the disabled persons' allowances, with the same understanding that the population in Quebec is smaller than is the population in Ontario, one wonders why under a national basis offer made to Ontario as well as to Quebec, Ontario asked for only $3.9 million of contributions from Ottawa for disabled persons in the year ended March 31, 1961, as compared with $8.5 million given to the province of Quebec.

If one looks at blind persons' allowances, one finds this. According to this latest white paper presented by the Minister of Finance in the province of Ontario with a population, as I repeat, which is larger than that of the province of Quebec, the Frost government seemingly applied for grants in this category of $800,000 compared with applications from the province of Quebec and granted in the sum of $1.5 million. I am not going to deal with the next column of the statistics in the budget white paper.

Mr. Broome: Go ahead.

Mr. Benidickson: Would you encourage me to do so? All right, the next column of statistics refers to unemployment assistance.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Regnier: By those figures does the hon. member imply that there are more blind people in Ontario than there are in Quebec?

Mr. Benidickson: I think perhaps the hon. member for St. Boniface was casting a personal aspersion. But putting that matter aside, I wish to say that I do not believe that. I believe that there is the same entitlement or the same amount of people in Ontario who are needy, or who might be entitled under old age assistance, who are handicapped because of blindness, who perhaps have the physical handicaps that give them entitlement under a law passed by a Liberal government giving disabled persons allowances. I think that in a quantitative way the situation would be the same physically in one province as in another. My point is that these requests for help for these people must be funnelled through provincial agencies. I say that the figures indicate that in Ontario today there seems to be a harsher measure of examination of the entitlement of these needy people than would seem to be the case in the province of Quebec. I would hope that the minister perhaps later would say something about this matter.

With regard to the column that I have been challenged now to speak about, namely that relating to unemployment assistance—

Mr. Cardiff: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: Will the hon. member give us the figures that were in the vote four years ago?

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to assure the older parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture that four years ago we had the same government in Ontario as now and no person who needs old age assistance, no disabled person or no blind person can get anything under the legislation that the former Liberal federal government provided unless he has what I would regard as a reasonably kind government in the province. The provincial government must advance to the federal government its request for assistance under this welfare legislation. I say that these figures indicate that the great old province of Ontario, with its big population, seems to fall behind the province of Quebec and every other province relative to population according to the table. I say that Mr. Frost must answer to the old age assistance applicant, to the disabled and to the blind as to why there are fewer successful applicants in Ontario for this kind of benefit which was put on the statute books by the federal Liberal government years ago and why they have less opportunity to derive the benefits than seemingly is possible in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: Has the hon. member any figures as to the number of rejections of applications for the social allowances in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Benidickson: May I say this to the parliamentary secretary to the the Prime Minister who is an intelligent man, I know. Surely, it would appeal to him as I think it would appeal to all in the country that these figures speak for themselves. There are surely the same number of needy people between the ages of 65 and 70, relative to population in the province of Ontario as there are in the province of Quebec. I do not imagine that there are more blind people—and I say this in answer to the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary and to the hon. member for St. Boniface—in Quebec than there are in Ontario. With regard to the disabled and the need for taking advantage of what the former Liberal government provided in legislation of this nature some time ago, in co-operation with the provinces, I say that it is unlikely that the situation en masse would be any different in the province of Ontario than it would be in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: Does he know of any specific cases in Ontario in which these applications have been refused?

Mr. Benidickson: Of course I do. I am a resident of the province of Ontario. I am in public life, and I receive from my constituents applications for the benefits that were provided in federal legislation by the former Liberal government that made possible these disability pensions, our old age assistance, these blind pensions, etc.

Mr. Broome: What are you doing with them?

Mr. Benidickson: Because of our constitution I am obliged to say to my constituent that he must utilize the welfare organization of the province in each county of my province. What I am disturbed about is that apparently the welfare officials in Ontario who must know of the availability of the federal grants, are instructed in Ontario at some level on a sterner, harsher basis than would appear to be the situation in connection with the province of Quebec. I observe that the figures show that the province of Quebec has requested from the federal government and the minister and received grants under the same legislation that according to population, are disproportionate. I think this is a very serious challenge.

Mr. Broome: You mean they want more?

Mr. Benidickon: Who wants what?

Mr. Broome: Quebec; that is what you are saying.

Mr. Benidickson: No. I say that here we have legislation for the needy, the most needy people in our land; those who are without assets and without jobs at 65 years of age and before they get the old age security pension automatically. I refer to the people who are disabled, those people who are unfortunately blind, those who are unemployed, and I say that federally we must have a standard that is applied from coast to coast.

Mr. Broome: Do you not believe that standard applies to blind people right across Canada? Are you saying that blind people in Ontario are not treated as well as blind people in Quebec?

Mr. Benidickson: I am saying that these figures indicates that going through the crucible—

Mr. Broome: The which?

Mr. Benidickson: The crucible—

Mr. Broome: What is that?

Mr. Benidickson: —of administrative provincial screening—I think the hon. member knows what that means—and considering the attention that must be given administratively under the government of Premier Frost of Ontario, it would appear there is less likelihood of an applicant for old age assistance, a disabled person or a blind person getting as kind or as careful attention as he would get if he happened to reside in the province of Quebec and made his application in that province. The figures bear that out.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he mind telling the committee when the hon. member for Essex East will be back?

An hon. Member: Not today.

Mr. Benidickson: That is completely irrelevant. Mr. Chairman, I think I have provided a good summary of what the statistics tell us when we look at page 81 of the white paper attached to the budget of the Minister of Finance presented on Tuesday, June 20.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Five more minutes to go.

Mr. Benidickson: I think that I have made a very serious indictment—

Mr. Broome: You have talked it out.

Mr. Benidickson: —as to the examination in Ontario of these applications, in kindness and consideration, with regard to what the federal laws provide when I recite—

Mr. Broome: The crucible.

Mr. Benidickson: —the final expenditure figures in all these welfare categories comparing Quebec with the province of Ontario. In his opening statement the minister did refer to the fact that, perhaps for the first time, the old age assistance fund was coming into balance. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that it did come into balance this session, but it came into balance only because of a financial trick typical of the Minister of Finance.

I raised this matter a year ago. Until the budget last year never before has a minister of finance of this country refrained from taking into his budgetary expenditures the deficit in the old age security account. This Minister of Finance did not do that a year ago.

Mr. Hodgson: We are on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Benidickson: And as a result of doing that, $28 million was put out of the budget for 1960-61. That was, of course, to achieve his objective of having a $12 million surplus last year when the minister presented his accounts. If one looks at the report of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the old age security fund, one finds that this deficit to which I referred a year ago, which I complained about a year ago, has not been recovered in the budget accounts of 1960-61.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: I say in addition, Mr. Chairman, that we want some of these questions answered by the minister. I think they are very important. We expect a more realistic report from the minister regarding the relationship of his department to the care of human beings across this land. Before we conclude the discussion on item No. 1 I wish to hear the minister's explanation of the relationship between the unemployment insurance fund and sickness. This question has been raised on previous occasions. Are we going to revise the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Do you mean unemployment insurance, or unemployment assistance?

Mr. Benidickson: Are we going to have this bankrupt unemployment insurance fund revised during the current session? It has gone down from $900 million to $100 million in four years. In the amendments that will be necessary to revise it, are we going to have the opinion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Will we have some recognition of the fact that we should have co-ordination between his department and the labour department and that there should be coverage for those who are unemployed by reason of ill health? Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 255 carry?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, as I have a few remarks to make on this item, I wonder whether we might call it six o'clock.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The Liberals like to hold up the house.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, last evening the house leader indicated what the business would be for Monday and Tuesday. I presume there is no change. I wondered whether we could be told the business for Wednesday.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the business as announced. On Monday we will start off with second reading of Bill No. C-114, an act respecting the Bank of Canada, followed by the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport. The third item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the industrial development bank.

I think we will have to see what progress we make on Monday before announcing the business for Tuesday and Wednesday. It might be that we will continue with the budget debate, but I would prefer to leave it open until the announcement of the business on Monday night.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I just remind the house leader of this fact. Did he not indicate that on Tuesday we would be resuming the budget debate?

Mr. Churchill: I said that was likely, but it is not possible at this stage of the session to determine too far in advance exactly what we will be taking up, because we are not certain how long the session may last.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

LABOUR-MANAGEMENT PRODUCTION COMMITTEES

Question No. 258—Mr. Pitman:

1. When did the Department of Labour first hire field men for the purpose of setting up labour-management production committees?
2. What was the peak number of persons employed on this type of work during the last war?
3. What was the low peak, and the date, of the number of persons employed on this type of work in the labour-management co-operation service since the war?
4. If increases in the number employed on this work have been made since the low peak after the war, what were the numbers involved, and on what dates?
5. What was the cost of maintaining this service for the years 1944, 1950, 1956, 1960?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. The Department of Labour first hired field men for the purpose of setting up labour-management production committees in 1944, following establishment of the industrial production co-operation board by P.C. 162 of January 18, 1944.

2. The peak number of persons employed on this type of work during the last war was 20 in 1945.

3. The low peak of the number of persons employed on this type of work since the war is 11 in 1961.

4. Not applicable (see answer to 3 above).

5. The cost of maintaining this service was $72,461 in 1944-45, $127,000 (estimated) in 1950-51, $143,297 in 1956-57 and $162,750 in 1960-61.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 26, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO PRIME MINISTER OF JAPAN AND PARTY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to mention the presence in the gallery of various distinguished visitors including Hon. Hayato Ikeda, the Prime Minister of Japan, and his charming wife. The Prime Minister is accompanied by the foreign minister, Hon. Mr. Kosaka. This is the first visit the Prime Minister has made to Canada, and because of his very busy schedule his visit will be brief. It is my hope that a further opportunity, not too long removed, will again bring him to our country to enable him to know Canada and the Canadian people better.

The Prime Minister of Japan, together with the foreign minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I have had useful talks this morning with respect to matters of common interest and concern. Canada's relations with Japan have been, as the house knows, particularly close in recent years. We have a similarity in approach to international problems; we have close and ever increasing mutual relations in trade. Indeed, during the past four years the increase in trade between our countries has amounted to 40 per cent. Last year the total trade between Canada and Japan was almost $290 million, and I believe it will continue to expand to the mutual benefit of both our countries.

Within the past two or three years there has been an increasing number of Canadian visitors to Japan and Japanese visitors to Canada. The result has been an improvement in the understanding that each country has of the other. Another, but not the least, of the links between our countries is the fact that some 26,000 Canadian citizens who are making valued contributions to Canadian society, industry, the arts and professions are of Japanese origin, deriving much of their cultural heritage from Japan, Canada's nearest neighbour across the Pacific.

I believe, and that belief is intensified on each occasion I meet with leaders of the various countries, that these meetings are most valuable. Particularly is that so at this time. Close co-operation is necessary among the leaders of the countries which believe in democracy because, if Mr. Khrushchev is to be believed, we are now entering into the potentially momentous remaining six months of this year which will be of great importance to the nations everywhere in the world, and in particular to those who believe in the maintenance of democracy and parliamentary government and those abiding principles to which Japan now gives its adherence.

I wish, therefore, to express a very wholehearted welcome to the Prime Minister. I can say this: having talked with him yesterday and today, I believe Japan has a leader wise and far seeing, who is dedicated to the principles of democracy.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side in the opposition share wholeheartedly and most warmly the welcome that has been so fittingly expressed by the Prime Minister to the Prime Minister of Japan, his wife, the foreign minister and all the members of his party. I am sure all Canadians also want to share in that welcome.

One of the happiest developments, I think, since world war II has been the growth in political and economic relations between our two countries. We all hope there may be even a strengthening in these political relations and an expansion in these economic relations. Japan and Canada are two Pacific countries now in more than a geographic sense. We stand together in the Pacific, in the United Nations and indeed in the world for freedom, democracy and peace.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group joins with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in extending a hearty welcome to the Prime Minister of Japan and his colleagues, and through him sends greetings to the people of his country.

As a member of the Canadian delegation to the interparliamentary union meeting held in Tokyo last fall I, with the other members of the delegation, will long remember with great satisfaction our visit to a beautiful and hospitable country. Our association with the Japanese people left us all filled with admiration for their progressive ideas, their industry, their charm and their unmatched hospitality. I think I can best express the feelings of the Canadian delegation by saying this:

> When Time, who steals our years away,
> Shall steal our pleasures, too,
> Fond memories of those days will stay
> And half our joys renew.

On behalf of this group, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that the visit to Canada of the Prime Minister of Japan and his colleagues will strengthen the ties between our nations and will result in agreement on economic and other matters that will further cement and strengthen our present bonds of understanding and friendship.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Third report of special committee on research—Mr. Murphy.

First report of special committee on the Civil Service Act—Mr. MacLellan.

BANK OF CANADA

ANSWER TO STARRED QUESTION NO. 420 RESPECTING PENSION PLAN

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is not the day on which starred questions are called, but on Saturday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me if I would endeavour to bring to the house, prior to today's debate, the answer to starred question No. 420. I would be prepared to do that now if I have leave of the house to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to answer the starred question at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question is as follows:

Question No. 420—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has the Bank of Canada a contributory pension plan for its staff?
2. When was this plan established?
3. Is any contribution made to the pension plan from the federal treasury?
4. Is Mr. J. E. Coyne a contributor to the pension plan?
5. If so, when did he begin to contribute, and what percentage of his salary has he contributed in each year since that date?
6. Is there any statutory authority for the supervision of the pension fund of the Bank of Canada by the Minister of Finance or any other minister, and, if so, what is the authority?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are six parts to this question. The answers to the first five are suplied by the Bank of Canada and I am supplying the answer to the sixth one. The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.
2. March 12, 1936.
3. No.

4. Yes.
5. In accordance with the provisions of the pension fund rules, Mr. Coyne's contributions commencing from the time of joining the bank on February 7, 1938, have been at the following rates:

February 7, 1938 to December 31, 1949—5 per cent of his salary.

January 1, 1950 to December 31, 1953—10 per cent on the first $15,000 of his salary.

January 1, 1954 to December 31, 1956—12 per cent on the first $25,000 of his salary.

January 1, 1957 to February 15, 1960—6 per cent on the first $25,000 of his salary.

February 16, 1960 to date—6 per cent on the first $40,000 of his salary.

With regard to No. 6, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of legal interpretation.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BANK OF CANADA MONETARY POLICY

Motion No. 151—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1960, between the government and the chartered banks, any organization, or person or persons, regarding the monetary policy being pursued by the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, subject to a matter of interpretation there will be no objection taken to the passing of this motion. However, in case there is question about the implications of the words "any organization, or person or persons" I would have to stipulate, in the light of decisions taken by the house last week and having regard to the fact that communications between the government and the Bank of Canada are confidential, that those words do not include the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, the word "organization" is used in my usual innocent sense as meaning private organization.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the explanation given, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BY-PASS ROAD, TERRACE AIRPORT, B.C.

Motion No. 152—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any agency or branch thereof, and any other person or government since January 1, 1960, dealing with the construction of a by-pass road at or in the vicinity of Terrace airport, B.C.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this motion, subject to the usual reservation as to the consent of the province to the production of any correspondence there may have been between the government and the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BY-PASS ROAD, TERRACE AIRPORT, B.C.

Motion No. 153—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all directives or instructions issued by the Department of Transport to any of its officials or employees since January 1, 1960, dealing with the construction of a by-pass road at or in the vicinity of Terrace airport, B.C.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this motion calls for the production of any directives or instructions issued by the department to any of its officials or employees since January 1, 1960 regarding certain road construction.

I would point out that it has been the long established practice of this house that correspondence of this type, that is intradepartmental correspondence or documents, have always been regarded as privilege. Therefore in the circumstances I would ask the hon. member if he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that directives or instructions are things which normally might reflect government policy. I have reason to believe there is some divergence between policy and directives issued in this case, and I think the motion should be put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO SUMMER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can give the house some indication of the plans of the government for the business of the session in the days immediately ahead.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that the government has given some thought to this matter. I have found on the part of members in all parts of the house a desire to have available to them the summer months of July and August. However, there are some—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, for just a moment until that belated interruption I was almost convinced that I did not have the feeling of the house in this regard. There are some matters that must be dealt with before we adjourn. I have in mind, if the house agrees, to adjourn until some date in September, but before adjournment takes place there are certain matters which will require to be dealt with. In that connection I might point out that there is the budget, and the resolutions and bills under the budget. Second, there is the Canadian National Railway financing bill, which cannot be postponed. Then there is the question of dominion-provincial fiscal relations. There is a tariff bill dealing with goods and commodities of a class or kind similar to those produced in Canada, which was passed by the house and found its way to the other place where it was amended. Finally there is something that I omitted to give consideration to earlier, the need of providing interim supply in respect of those departments that have not received attention or have not been fully dealt with. There is also a short matter connected with the supplementary estimates having to do with the provision of the necessary funds for assistance in Cape Breton, and another item dealing with war veterans allowances.

I would hope that if we apply ourselves to these items and deal particularly and fully with those in respect of which there is disagreement, the date of adjournment will not be long delayed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in thanking the Prime Minister for the information I wonder if he will permit me to ask him whether he does not think, in view of what he has said, that the recess which the house has so richly earned is likely to begin about the proposed date of reassembling.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in the same spirit in which the question was asked I say to the hon. gentleman that while governments naturally begin sessions, oppositions end them.

TRADE

REPORTED PLAN FOR SALE OF U.S. AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the announced change of policy by the United States department of commerce which will permit the sale of subsidized farm surpluses to the Soviet union and her European neighbours, and in view of the fact that Mr. C. W. Gibbings, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, has called the United States change of policy a new threat to Canadian wheat producers, is the minister in a position to inform the house what effect this change of policy will have on Canadian overseas wheat sales?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is our understanding that the announcement made by the United States government relates to the sale of agricultural products on a commercial basis to European communist nations. It is impossible to state what effect such a policy will have on Canadian sales in this area. Canada will, of course, continue to make every effort to maintain and increase our sales to these European countries in competition with all other exporters, including the United States.

If the hon. member is talking about public law No. 480, it is our understanding that it does not apply to this particular announcement by the United States government.

COAL—CONTINUATION OF SALES FROM ALBERTA MINES TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister of Japan and other delegates are here, I wonder whether real consideration can be given when they are discussing questions of trade between Canada and Japan to the continuation of coal sales from the province of Alberta to Japan.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that this important matter will be considered during the discussions which will take place today.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—MORTGAGES SOLD IN 1960-61

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of clarification may I ask the indulgence of the house to refer to a question asked on Thursday last, as reported at page 6860 of Hansard for that day, by the hon. member for Nipissing concerning my answer in reply to his question of the previous day appearing at page 6849 of Hansard with regard to the sale of mortgages to approved lenders, investment dealers and ultimately the public in 1960.

I wish to reiterate that no sales of this kind had been made in 1960 and 1961 until the first offering. However, the trustees of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's pension fund, believing that this fund should give a lead to other pension funds in its holdings of insured mortgages, have in recent years bought such mortgages from the corporation itself. This amounted to $403,000 in 1960 and $928,000 in 1961.

In the context of the hon. member's question concerning general offerings to approved lenders and other institutions I had, of course, indicated that this was the first such auction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—REPORTED CLAIM TO SHEIKDOM OF KUWAIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the implications involved, whether he has anything to say about the announcement made by Prime Minister Kassem of Iraq regarding the taking over by Iraq of the newly independent sheikdom of Kuwait.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As members of the house are aware, the United Kingdom government announced on June 19 that it had signed an agreement with the ruler of Kuwait cancelling the Anglo-Kuwait agreement of 1899 which recent developments had rendered obsolete and inappropriate. The exchange of notes between the United Kingdom and Kuwait by which this was effected, however, stated that relations between the two countries would continue to be governed by a spirit of close friendship, and reaffirmed the readiness of the United Kingdom government to assist Kuwait if the government of Kuwait should so request.

We have not yet received any official reports on the statement reportedly made in Baghdad yesterday by Prime Minister Kassem in which he laid claim to Kuwait as an integral part of Iraq. If, indeed, a dispute does exist between Iraq and Kuwait, I should naturally hope that the parties concerned would refrain from any action which would exacerbate the situation, and that the recognized international procedures would be followed for a peaceful settlement.

It so happens that our ambassador to Lebanon, Mr. Beaulieu, is now in Baghdad in the course of presenting his credentials as the newly appointed ambassador to Iraq.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has Canada any treaty commitments with Kuwait?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the answer to that question off hand but I will get the information for the hon. member.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that there are still approximately 100 delivery points with a 4 bushel quota, could he indicate the progress being made with regard to box car allocations and quotas at these points, leading to the end of the crop year?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, although speaking from memory I think the figure for June 19 was 103 points on a 4 bushel quota. Since that time there have been some changes, and I should hope the report due this morning will show that these points are off the 4 bushel quota. It is the expectation of the Canadian wheat board that nearly all points in western Canada, some time in the first ten days of July, will be on the 6 bushel quota and that we will then be able to strive for a 7 bushel quota for as many places as possible.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—LETTER RESPECTING NON-FRATERNIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. On June 3, 1961 I asked the minister the following question, as reported at page 5805 of Hansard for that date:

> I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if he has yet received a reply from Mr. Finlayson, president of the Canadian Marconi Company to the letter sent by the minister regarding the so-called non-fraternization clause in the contracts of employees of the company and, if so, whether he would be prepared to table it.

His answer at that time was that he had not as yet had any reply. I wonder whether the minister since received a reply from Mr. Finlayson.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received a reply from Mr. Finlayson in which he requested further clarification on the matter. I have in turn replied to him pointing out that the present administration is encouraging the best possible intercultural relationships, and that it is our intention to provide equal opportunities and rights for all Canadians everywhere and to remove any element of discrimination that existed in the past under the former administration.

Mr. Howard: I should like to ask a supplementary question. The correspondence prior to this date was tabled in the house by virtue of a motion for the production of papers, and I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to table these letters as a matter of courtesy rather than having to go through the formality of a notice of motion for production.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the subject is a matter of current discussion, and I think on that basis I should have to delay compliance with the hon. member's request.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REGULATIONS RESPECTING INVITATION CARDS TO ONTARIO YOUNG LIBERALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General relating to postal regulations. My question results from a resolution adopted by the Ontario young Liberal association last Saturday urging that efforts be made to seek an alliance with the C.C.F.-New party. This resolution causes us some concern, Mr. Speaker. My question is, in view of the possibility of thousands of invitations and greeting cards being sent to members of the young Liberal association, could the minister inform the house whether these cards should be sent first, second, third or fourth class mail?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in view of some of the attitudes of Her Majesty's opposition I would think that any invitation to join the socialist party would be somewhat redundant at the present time. If the invitations are to be sent I should think they might go as third class mail, because it includes "matter which is wholly in print without reference to process", and such things as "plans without specifications", "reproductions obtained by a multiplying process, easy to recognize", and "miscellaneous articles such as pathological objects rendered harmless by the mode of preparation and packaging".

Mr. Speaker: It sounds to me like a conspiracy.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSTAL DIRECTOR, DISTRICT NO. 2—BILINGUAL REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Could the minister explain to the house how it is that in a competition for advancement to the position of director of district No. 2, which covers part of Pontiac county, the counties of Gatineau and Hull, and part of the counties of Labelle, Argenteuil, Glengarry-Prescott, Russell, Stormont, etc., where French Canadians form the greater part of the population, the incumbent is not required to be bilingual?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I shall take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker, and provide an answer tomorrow for the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

APPLICATION OF U.S. COMPANY TO OPERATE SERVICE INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Fort William asked whether a licence had been granted to Aero-Flight Service Incorporated of Minneapolis to operate an air service into Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northwestern Ontario. I am advised by the air transport board that an application has been made by Aero-Flite Service Incorporated for a licence to operate a class 9-4 international non-scheduled charter commercial air service from a base at Minneapolis, Minnesota, to points in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, using group C aircraft. The application was advertised on June 15 and is being processed in the normal manner. A decision by the board has not yet been given.

IMMIGRATION

MRS. MALONEY—STATEMENT ON REPORTED DANGER OF DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a question was asked on Saturday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The answer is as follows.

On April 14, 1961 Mrs. Frances Maloney, a citizen of the United Kingdom and colonies was ordered to be deported on the expiration of her prison sentence. Although there is no provision for an appeal against a deportation order such as the one issued to Mrs. Maloney, I ordered this case to be reviewed by the general board of immigration appeals. As a result of this review and because of information provided in the written representations of Mr. W. A. McLennan, M.P., I decided to suspend the order of deportation for a period of six months to give this woman an opportunity to rehabilitate herself.

Mrs. Maloney was released from detention on Friday, June 23.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment this morning on the fact that the Canadian Parliamentary Guide for 1959 listed Mr. Courtemanche as a director and treasurer of l'Hôpital Jean-Talon, Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure what administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister is involved in the Parliamentary Guide and what it contains.

Mr. Cardin: A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, we were told that all the ministers had been asked to resign from any participation as directors of companies.

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is that the hon. member asked this question last week and that I indicated to him that I did not think it was an appropriate question, that it was rather in the nature of an argument than a search for information.

Mr. Cardin: I had asked two questions the other day, Mr. Speaker, and you allowed the Prime Minister to answer the first one. Today I am asking another question which has to do with the Parliamentary Guide for 1959. If the question was allowed with regard to the Parliamentary Guide for 1960, I do not see why my question would not be allowed when I refer to the Parliamentary Guide for 1959.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it the hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to comment on the contents of the Parliamentary Guide for 1959. Surely that is not an urgent matter. That Parliamentary Guide has been in publication for two years.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to comment on a fact which appears in the Parliamentary Guide and which appears to be in conflict with a statement by the Prime Minister about government policy on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Then I suggest that the hon. member frame his question appropriately having regard to the Prime Minister's previous answer.

Mr. Cardin: In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago concerning ministers of the crown not having directorships in companies, will the Prime Minister tell the house whether he feels that the listing in the Parliamentary Guide for 1959 which gives Mr. Courtemanche as a director and treasurer of l'Hôpital Jean-Talon, Montreal, is contradictory to the statement he made previously?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman answered his own question when he quoted what I said, namely that the ministers were asked to remove themselves as directors of companies. The hon. gentleman realizes that, as an eleemosynary or philanthropic organization, a hospital organization does not come within the category of companies. I am surprised that he is so shocked that the Parliamentary Guide so records the fact after the experience we had through the years of ministers of the crown being directors of companies that were dealing with the previous government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are we going to have a debate?

Mr. Cardin: I have a supplementary question. Would not the Prime Minister feel that an association such as a hospital that has direct dealings with the government in the form of subsidies—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is entering into a debate on the point which the Prime Minister introduced himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that question was asked, Mr. Speaker, because it was answered the other day by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. There are no dealings with hospitals on the part of the federal government. The dealings are between the provincial government and the hospital. Each month, as I understand it, the provincial government states that certain advances are being made and then an account is sent to the federal government. There are no dealings as between the federal government and the hospitals.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman chose to bring my name gratuitously into this matter and to enter into a debate. I think I should remind the right hon. gentleman that this hospital was in receipt of federal grants at a time when a cabinet minister was its treasurer. Anything more improper is hard to imagine.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making gratuitous statements.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORTATION

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED APPLICATION TO BUILD RAILWAY TO ALASKA BORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Prime Minister. My question is based upon an article in The Machinist of June 22 relating to a railway route through northern British Columbia to Alaska. It reads in part as follows:

P.N.R.—

Meaning Pacific Northern Railway.

—also has applied to the Canadian government for a licence to build another 460 miles of track through Whitehorse to the Alaska-Yukon border.

I regret not having been able to send the Prime Minister notice of this question, but the matter just came to my attention. My question is this. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether the P.N.R. has made such an application? If, so what has been the disposition of the application?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of that matter. The question is one that should be put on the order paper.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can add anything further to what has been said regarding the disarmament talks between the two great powers. Has any development taken place since the question was asked a few days ago?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have an answer ready for the hon. member for Essex East on this question also.

Hon. members are aware that these talks, which began on June 19, represent the continuation of discussions between the United States and the Soviet union which took place at the fifteenth general assembly. They are designed to prepare the way for the early resumption of general disarmament negotiations which Canada has been striving to achieve. Our understanding of the purpose of these talks is to settle the framework in which resumed disarmament negotiations would take place and procedural questions such as the composition of the negotiating forum.

As the house is aware, these negotiations are confidential in nature, but I can assure hon. members that Canada is in close consultation with United States authorities and that we are receiving full and detailed reports of the progress of the talks through our embassy in Washington.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the government has yet prepared the regulations governing the assistance for shipbuilding which was announced as a matter of urgency early in May.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, just about a week ago I said in the house that these regulations should be ready within two weeks or ten days. They will be ready in accordance with what I said last week.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—STATEMENT ON INTERIM DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): On Friday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Timiskaming asked a question about the interim deficiency payment on eggs. The support price for eggs is for the 12 month period October 1 to September 30. The accumulated weighted average price to producers for grade A large eggs for the 37 week period, October 3, 1960 to the week ended June 17, 1961 is 33 cents. The support price for eggs is a national average of 33 cents per dozen for grade A large for the 12 month period. There is therefore no basis for making an interim deficiency payment, since the accumulated average price received by producers to date is equal to the support price.

Mr. Speaker, I have made no secret of the fact that I am not entirely satisfied with the working out of the legislation in regard to eggs. I put this up to the advisory board at their last meeting last month. The advisory board is composed of representatives of farm organizations right across Canada. They unanimously recommended that I make no change in the price support for eggs until they had time to examine more carefully the experience of this year's operations.

BANK OF CANADA

CREATION OF VACANCY IN OFFICE OF GOVERNOR

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-114, respecting the Bank of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on this matter in the house on June 14 I opened my remarks with this observation:

> I should prefer to speak on an occasion of this kind with restraint. I do not wish to add to the injury which I believe, and believe with deep regret, the governor of the Bank of Canada has done to himself. Least of all would I wish to see any prolongation of controversy, particularly political controversy, in relation to the Bank of Canada.

It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I speak today in moving second reading of this bill. First let me make it very clear that there has at no time been a personal aspect to the present issue. There has been an attempt in the press and elsewhere to dramatize this issue and picture it as a Coyne versus Fleming issue. It has been no such thing at any time. There is no personal element whatever in this issue, and there never has been.

I say that notwithstanding the fact that in the attacks which the governor has been making upon the government in recent days he has singled out the Minister of Finance for special mention. Let me make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that throughout this entire situation I have acted as the spokesman of the government, on the instructions of the government, carrying out decisions of the government, decisions that were not lightly arrived at.

On the other side let me make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that the bank as such has not been involved save to the extent to which the governor has, I say improperly, embroiled it in a controversy that has assumed a political character. On the contrary, the board of governors of the bank has taken a clear line and the governor has acted in a manner diametrically opposed to the views expressed by the board of directors of the bank in a resolution passed on June 13.

Therefore this bill is not, as it has been represented in some quarters, the outcome of what is called a feud. There has been no feud. So far as I personally am concerned I have endeavoured to work with the governor of the bank in matters in which our respective positions required contact. Certainly this is not, as it has been represented in at least one journal, the outcome of "a long struggle for economic power between two men". Mr. Speaker, statements of that kind are simply nonsensical. So far as differences exist, and of course there are deep seated differences, there was no acrimony in these differences until the governor injected it in his attacks commencing on June 13.

The real issue presented to parliament, Mr. Speaker, is one not simply of government versus governor. It is that in the broad sense. It is more specifically an issue of government plus board of directors versus the governor. In a more complete sense it is the government serving the public interest, plus the board of directors serving the best interests of the Bank of Canada, versus the governor in his determination to cling to office, unwanted, for six months more.

I say, Mr. Speaker, and I speak with deep regret here, that after being afforded every opportunity to go quietly, decently and with dignity, the governor has chosen to force an issue before the public and into parliament. He has defied the government; he has defied the board of directors in the most deliberately provocative manner. In this situation either the governor must go, and go now, or the government must go.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They should have gone long ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Parliament must decide who governs this country.

Here, Mr. Speaker, let me refer to an observation appearing at page 2201 of the Hansard of the present session, an observation for which I am indebted to the Leader of the Opposition. He said:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

Note the words:

> —the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I did refer to that quotation when speaking in the house on June 14. I find there has been some liberty taken by the Hansard printers with the quotation and it reads, not that "the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign", but that "the government has no alternative, of course, but to resign".

Mr. Pickersgill: How right they were.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might consider this an improvement, but it is not what he said on the occasion when I quoted him, at page 2201 of Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite correct and I should have made that correction at the time. It is a regrettable inaccuracy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not a matter for correction by the Leader of the Opposition. This was my quotation of his speech on this occasion, so I do not hold him responsible. The governor of the Bank of Canada is not required to account to the sovereign electors of Canada for his administration, but the government is. We will not accept responsibility for the governor and his actions when we have lost all confidence in him. The government has no power, under the law of this parliament, to remove the governor. That power is reserved to parliament, and to parliament alone. Parliament, sir, must now decide.

In presenting this bill to the house it has therefore been deliberately drawn in a form which will present the issue to parliament for determination in its clearest and most direct form. The measure is stripped of non-essentials and presents the house with the opportunity and the challenge to make a clear cut decision. The one clause in this bill reads:

The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that effort has been made to deal with this issue in the measure as impersonally as possible. The governor is not mentioned by name. As I said, this measure presents the issue in a clear and direct form. Other questions can be resolved in due course and at the proper time. All other questions depend on the outcome of this issue before parliament. The issue presented by this measure is essential; the decision on it must precede anything else.

In the statement which I made on June 14 I laid certain facts before the house in relation to the matter. I shall enlarge somewhat today, though clearly and briefly, I hope, on the facts as they pertain to the issue now before the house.

When the present government came to office on June 21, 1957, the present governor of the Bank of Canada had already been in office for two and a half years. He had been associated with the tight money policy which we who now sit on the treasury benches had, when we were in opposition prior to 1957, attacked in parliament. Nevertheless, having come to office, we resolved to work with the governor as far as it was possible to do so. I have no wish to speak personally of the present governor. No one will ever say that he is an easy man to work with, but the government has done its best to work with him. He is a man of very great ability, but I think many people have found him sadly lacking in judgment and in ability to see the other person's point of view.

In the winter of 1957-58 I conveyed to him a request for an easing of the requirements respecting the liquidity reserves of chartered banks. That request, which was designed by the government to ease tight money, was rejected by the governor firmly and angrily. That sent me scurrying to the Bank of Canada Act—particularly in the light of things I had been arguing in this house while in opposition about the relationship of the Bank of Canada and the government in matters pertaining to monetary policy and money supply—only to find that parliament had there given the government no power over the bank in such circumstances. Hon. members will understand the effect of this situation in the light of subsequent events which I may take occasion to mention.

In his annual report for the year 1957, which reached me on the last day of February, 1958, or the first day of March, in the middle of an election campaign, the governor chose to insert a couple of paragraphs in which he firmly asserted that there had never been a tight money policy. I had to make the decision as to whether that report should be released to the public in the middle of an election campaign. The government was widely dispersed. It was customary to release the annual reports of the governor of the Bank of Canada in the month of March. I knew very well that if that report was released in the middle of an election campaign, assertions of that kind on a subject which was a burning issue in the 1958 election as well as in the 1957 election would be seized upon by the Leader of the Opposition and an endeavour made to make political capital out of them.

I had to make that decision, and I reached the decision to allow the release of that report in March, 1958, in the middle of the election campaign. I did not intend to have anyone tell me afterwards that I had endeavoured in any way to suppress views which had been put forward by the governor of the Bank of Canada. That report was released. It was broadcast and, of course, the anticipated result immediately followed. The report had not been public more than a matter of several hours before the Leader of the Opposition in that election campaign seized upon this political manna from heaven and sought to make political capital out of it.

I am sure there are those who will say, with the benefit of what we know since, that the government in those circumstances ought to have asked for the resignation of the governor at that time. The fact is that we as a government could not compel his resignation. Only parliament could do so. In the light of what has happened since, perhaps we ought to have taken steps at that time. Perhaps there were other occasions when we should have done so. I am sure that had we known our efforts to carry on and make the best of the situation would be frustrated, as they have been, and that this matter would eventually come before parliament for the kind of decision the house is being asked to make today, we should all have agreed it would have been better if this issue had been brought before parliament earlier.

We did hope for better relations and we desired, above all, to avoid creating controversy involving the Bank of Canada. We attached, as a government, the highest importance to the bank and its functions. It was a creation of a Conservative government. We recalled that under the previous governor and under the same statute there had been harmony and co-operation between the governor on the one hand and the government on the other, between the bank on the one hand and the public on the other. Therefore we resolved to carry on and hope for the best, knowing that the governor's term of office would in any event expire on December 31, 1961. Let me tell the house that as far as my responsibility is concerned I have done my best to carry on in a co-operative attitude.

In the field of debt management, the field for which the government holds responsibility, the governor of the bank has rendered to the government good service. In this field the bank operates as an adviser to the government and as its agent. It supplies technical assistance. The government takes full responsibility in this field. Often when advice was tendered we did not accept the recommendations so far as they related to interest rates or prices. Nevertheless I wish to make it very clear that the government takes full responsibility for what has been done in the field of debt management, and we have in respect of this field of operations made full use of the bank's very efficient facilities.

In the second place, in the field of foreign exchange operations, here again the Bank of Canada acts as the government's agent; and in this field, which is directed by Mr. Rasminsky, the deputy governor of the bank, the bank has operated very efficiently. The government, of course, takes full responsibility for what is done in this field.

Third, in the field of fiscal policy which is, of course, the government's responsibility, the bank, through the deputy governors, has been consulted on general aspects of budget policy in the writing of the budgets. It has never been the practice of the governor himhelf to sit in on these discussions. In this field I stress again that the responsibility is entirely that of the government.

Fourth, in the field of monetary policy, let me be very explicit. The government's relations with the governor of the Bank of Canada in regard to monetary policy and monetary operations have been set within the framework of the position which the governor took in that meeting to which I referred in the winter of 1957-58. The Bank of Canada has operated monetary policy, in full control of it. The government has had no control over monetary policy. The bank authorities were always willing to explain and defend their operations, but the policy followed was always the policy of the governor. The government had not determined it. Dealing with various criticisms which have been made during discussions in the house, I have endeavoured at all times to make it clear that the government was not to be associated with monetary policy for the reasons I have mentioned.

Until the autumn of 1959 the governor had not made a practice of making public speeches, but at that time be began to do so. For the next year and a half he made them with increasing force, frequency and fervour. Never was I or any other member of the government consulted at any time in any respect whatever in regard to the making of those speeches or their contents. They quickly attracted public attention, which increased with each of those public utterances, principally because they were devoted almost entirely to fiscal, not monetary, policy and thus entered upon one of the most controversial subjects in the whole political spectrum. The governor did not directly attack the government, but it was not long before the government was bearing the full weight of his criticisms and strictures. He contended time and again with ever increasing vehemence that the country was suffering from wrong fiscal policies and the absence of needed fiscal programs. Such, under our constitutional system, Mr. Speaker, are the responsibility of the government, not the responsibility of the Bank of Canada.

The press and the public quickly grasped the significance of the governor's criticisms. Indeed, everybody in Canada seems to have been well aware that the effect of those speeches was to direct criticism at the government; everybody seems to have been aware of this except the governor himself. The opposition in this house seized on the governor's statements and debated them in this house with a view to exploiting the embarrassment, the political embarrassment, which the governor was causing to the government. You have an example, Mr. Speaker, in the debate in this house on February 20 and 21 of this session. You have another example on March 22, in a discussion on the annual report of the governor. These statements of the governor were variously pictured by the opposition as government policy, which they were not, or as showing that the governor was at odds with the government; or they were made the occasion of taunting the government.

Perhaps, in the light of what has now happened, Mr. Speaker, the government should have intervened drastically earlier. However, we were very reluctant to attempt to place a curb on the governor, knowing well that in the political atmosphere which was becoming more tense on the subject we might have been ourselves denounced by the governor or the opposition, or both, for attempting to muzzle free speech when it was critical of government policy.

It has to be remembered that the governor is not a civil servant but the official head of a most important public institution, so we endeavoured patiently to live with this situation hoping that the governor might adopt a wiser course, and one more in keeping with the responsibilities of his high office, or that December 31, 1961 might come soon. In the meantime the governor was being warned by members of the board of directors of the bank that the course he was pursuing was involving him and the bank in politics; as one director put it to the governor, involving the governor "right up to his neck in politics".

The governor did not yield to advice from this quarter to discontinue those speeches. I was receiving communications from investors in the United States, in the United Kingdom and Canada who were very disturbed by the governor's pronouncements against foreign investment in Canada. It was as difficult to explain to them that the governor spoke for himself alone and not for the government as it was for them to understand this fact. For example, in January of this year I made a speech in New York to the Canadian club of that city, designed to clarify Canada's attitude toward foreign investment and to reassure those investors in the United States who had investments in Canada, or who contemplated useful investments in Canada, as to this country's intentions and attitudes. In March the governor made a speech in New York which was interpreted to the very opposite effect from my speech in January.

I am sure I do not need to remind the house that the fiscal policies which the governor was advocating in his numerous public utterances were in their nature isolationist, bureaucratic, anti-American, centralizing. They could have done violence to our international obligations; they would have provoked retaliation against Canada by other countries; they would have increased taxes, restricted trade, increased the role of government in business in this country, and would have centralized more authority in the federal government at the expense of the powers and authorities of the provinces under our constitution.

The suspicion inevitably grew that he was building up some kind of case. His speeches seemed to fall more and more into a pattern openly challenging the government. The memorandum which he sent to me on February 16, and which he made public on June 19, bore in tone, content and timing all the earmarks of an indictment and challenge directed against the government. The appearance of creating self-serving evidence was very strong. I deliberately refrained from public comment on the governor's public utterances, accepting much unjustified criticism in consequence, and I did so for the sake of avoiding controversy affecting the Bank of Canada.

This, however, did not deter the governor from pursuing with undiminished vigour the same course which had given rise to controversy. It reached the point where I was frequently asked by serious people whether the governor was deliberately seeking to undermine the government. I was placed in the equivocal position of appearing to defend the governor because of my desire to preserve the bank from the weakening effects of harmful political controversy, while at the same time I disapproved strongly of the public course the governor was following.

That position could not continue. It was obvious that parliament and the Canadian public would be entitled at some time to expect from me an accounting for the position of the government in a situation in which the governor appeared to be openly challenging the government.

It was, even in the face of the views that many serious people expressed to me, hard for me to believe that a man in such circumstances would deliberately attack the government or seek to undermine it. Personally, for myself, at that time I expressed the view that the governor was not doing this for the deliberate purpose of seeking to undermine the government, but I did hold him responsible for the creation of this result, whether or not it was by deliberate design on his part. And in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker,—and for this I have no apology to make to anyone—I could no longer give the governor my confidence.

We met at my request on Saturday afternoon, March 18. He gave me his categorical assurance that all communications between us, including the memorandum he had already sent me and my reply dated February 20, were confidential. I shall say only that our discussion was frank and I spoke plainly.

His published letter to me of June 9 that he had stopped making public speeches then is to be qualified, if it is to be regarded as a virtue, by his accompanying statement that he had no further speeches scheduled at that time. However, he did say as he has said in the letter of June 9 that he has now published:

> I saw nothing improper in the making of speeches or in anything that I had said.

So, Mr. Speaker, the governor on his part, while expressing regret that his speeches might have hurt the government politically, asserted that he withdrew none of the things he had said in his speeches.

It became increasingly clear to the government that the governor had so deeply involved himself and the Bank of Canada in political controversy that there could be no possible redemption of the situation as long as he remained governor. The government was engaged in formulating a budgetary program of far-reaching proportions about which I wish to say two things. First, that program could not be fully implemented without strong co-operation on the part of the Bank of Canada. Second, that program was built upon certain fundamental principles which were widely at variance with the views repeatedly expressed by the governor and held by him firmly, yes, even dogmatically, in his numerous public utterances.

If we credited the governor with sincerity in these views that he expressed, and I told him that I did, it was abundantly clear, therefore, that if he was sincere he could not be expected by the government to support a program which the government deemed necessary in the public interest. The government had long since decided that it could not approve his reappointment as governor on the expiry of his term on December 31. It now concluded that there was no other course open to it in the national interest but to ask for the governor's resignation.

In this situation the government made inquiry concerning the pension provision made for the governor. It was then for the first time that the government or myself became aware of an amendment to the pension bylaw passed by the board of directors of the bank at its meeting on February 15, 1960. At my request I was furnished with an extract of the minutes of that meeting and, as I explained to the house on June 14, as found at pages 6315 and 6316 of Hansard, the government was shocked to learn that as a result of that bylaw the governor purported to become entitled immediately on the conclusion of his service to a pension for life on retirement of $25,000 per annum, compared with a pension entitlement prior to that meeting under the same circumstances of just under $12,000 per annum. The fact that the governor, though not participating in the board proceedings at which the bylaw was passed, and notwithstanding the fact that he possesses veto powers under the Bank of Canada Act, did not inform the government of its passing nor publish the bylaw or notice of it in the Canada Gazette was in the view of the government a serious dereliction of duty on his part.

On May 30, in pursuance of a decision taken by the government, I invited the governor to my office where, in the presence of the deputy minister of finance, I informed him with deep personal regret—and I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker—that the government, after full consideration of the matter, had decided to ask for his resignation. I further said that I was prepared to give him the reasons for the government's decision if he wished those reasons.

The governor in his public statement of June 13 has given the impression that the only reason related to his pension. He has had something to say on this subject of which I should remind hon. members. Referring to me, he said:

> To aid me in my consideration of this matter he—

That is myself.

> —said the cabinet were upset by the fact that the bank's board of directors had taken action in February, 1960, to improve the conditions of the pension which, according to the rules of the bank's pension fund, had always been provided immediately on the termination of service of a governor or deputy governor. He said the government were considering what action to take in the matter of the pension, had not yet come to a decision, and wanted my resignation before they came to a decision.

That last statement is not correct. I certainly did ask for his resignation. I did say that we had not come to a decision, but I did not say that the date of the resignation related to the decision. He continued:

> Mr. Fleming also said the cabinet were of the view that I had failed to discharge the responsibilities of my office in allowing the board of directors to take the action they did take unanimously and after thorough consideration in amending the pension fund rules, an action which the Department of Justice had said was entirely within the powers of the board. This slander upon my integrity I cannot ignore or accept.

That passage is the only one in the public statement issued by the governor on June 13 in which he purports to give the reasons which I stated on that occasion had led the government to ask for his resignation.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it is not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is on this interpretation that certain articles have appeared in the press and statements have been made over the radio. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, and I do hope I can make this clear for all to understand, that in the course of our discussion on May 30, one hour in length, I gave the governor five reasons. In the order in which I advanced them they were as follows: First, in his speeches he had shown that he was openly at odds with the government on important policy questions. Second, he had embroiled the Bank of Canada in political controversy. Third, his views were incompatible with far-reaching programs upon which the government was about to embark. Fourth, he did not possess the confidence of Canadian financial institutions with which the Bank of Canada must work. Fifth, his pension arrangements, and failure to notify the government or the public of the bylaw increasing his own pension.

These were the five reasons. Each of these was discussed as fully as the governor wished on this occasion. I stress that the government had given the subject very full consideration, and that he was asked to submit his resignation in time for the board of directors to take action on it and to appoint his successor at its meeting scheduled to be held in Quebec city on June 12 and 13. I stressed the fact that in the view of the government it would be most undesirable that there should be anything like an interregnum at a time when the co-operation of the bank was required in the fulfilment of these important and far-reaching programs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to finish by one o'clock. There will be an opportunity for questions when we go into committee on the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question has to do with—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The governor asked me three questions which with my answers I related to the house in my speech on June 14, which will be found at page 6353 of Hansard, for that date. He said he withdrew nothing of what he had said in his speeches. After an hour of quiet discussion, the governor asked for time to think the matter over. He said nothing about any attack on his character or his integrity. We shook hands and quietly said goodbye.

In his statement of June 13 he denounced my reference to his failure to report his pension increase as a slander upon his integrity which he could not ignore or accept. People who hear words that they regard as slander upon their integrity usually react very swiftly to them. There was no such reaction on the part of the governor in our hour-long discussion on this occasion. Our conversation was carried on quietly throughout, and we shook hands and parted with, on my part, an expression of personal regret that matters had given rise to this situation.

I received no direct answer from the governor, apart from several letters of an obviously self-serving nature, carefully timed to reach me on the morning of June 12, and which he has since evidently released to the public. I think his letter of June 13 was mentioned in this house by the Leader of the Opposition, that letter having reached the Leader of the Opposition apparently as soon as it reached me.

In taking the action that he did on June 13 the governor rejected firmly and flatly the resolution passed by the board of directors of the Bank of Canada by a vote of 9 to 1 requesting his resignation.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was dictation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement, Mr. Speaker. It was no dictation. The board of directors of the Bank of Canada had reached a decision, as responsible men would under the circumstances. What we have just heard from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is the same kind of insult to the intelligence of these responsible men on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada as the governor himself directed toward those persons.

The governor issued his public statement on June 13 at a time when the board had, at his request, suspended its discussions on the resolution and before it had adopted that resolution to request his resignation. He deliberately timed the release of his statement, according to his own admission, so that it would hit the House of Commons at its opening that day, and would reach the public before the Minister of Finance could make any statement on the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the minister quoting from there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am quoting from a statement that was made by the governor on this occasion.

I had taken elaborate and careful precautions to avoid publicity in order to spare the governor embarrassment to the utmost possible extent. Had the government wished to make a scapegoat of him, as is falsely alleged by some malevolent and prejudiced persons, the government would certainly not have followed this considerate course. It was by the governor's deliberate act and intent that this question became a public issue. He has pursued his objective and attracted to it the maximum publicity regardless of the harm it may do to relations between the Bank of Canada and the government and between the Bank of Canada and the public. He has sought to keep himself in the headlines, and has evidently enjoyed the personal publicity which he has attracted to himself. He has repeatedly made himself heard by the entire nation not merely in his own defence but in audacious attacks on the government. No public servant in Canada's history has ever been heard so much and so often. There have been many hearings, including an appearance just two months ago before a Senate committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not before the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I guess the hon. member for Essex East is glad now that he did not appear before that committee.

Mr. Pearson: The appearance was denied by this government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Since June 13 the house has debated this subject. It was debated on June 14. Having openly declared war on the government in his statement on the morning of June 13 and in his press conference that night in the board room of the Bank of Canada, the governor has pressed his political campaign against the government with ardour. Had he resigned he would have regained his full right to debate the political issues publicly. He did not wait, however.

Making full use of the facilities of the Bank of Canada and continuing to draw his salary as governor, he used his office in the bank as a base for operations against the government. He has made very wide distribution in Canada of his statement of June 13, mimeographed by the bank, presumably at bank expense, mailed out in Bank of Canada envelopes stamped by the postage meter of the Bank of Canada. Some of these envelopes have been sent to me by recipients who have expressed indignation and disapproval of this improper use of bank property. It would be interesting to know what the cost to the bank has been in mounting this political attack against the government. Let me say that if the facilities of the bank had been used on this scale and in this way, not to attack the government but to aid it, I am very sure that the opposition in this house would have been up in arms because of this abuse. That is not so now.

In the publicizing and distribution of June 19 of this memorandum he sent me on February 16 in confidence, a confidence which he reaffirmed on March 18, I say that the governor acted most improperly. I say that the governor's conduct since June 12 has of itself been such, without regard to what had happened before that time, as to have made necessary his dismissal from his high office.

Mr. Speaker, I see that it is now one o'clock and I have been unable quite to finish.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the last point with which I was dealing prior to the luncheon recess concerned the events transpiring on and after June 13; and in the light of the actions taken by the governor in this period I had submitted to the house that the governor's conduct since June 12, of itself, has been such as to have made necessary his dismissal from his office.

I turn now to certain specific points. This morning I made mention of this subject of the slander upon his own integrity that the governor purports to find in the reference to his failure to notify the government of the action taken by the board of directors on February 15, 1960, in increasing his pension by more than double. I leave it to the house, Mr. Speaker, to decide whether or not this is to be regarded as a slander. Certainly no such expression was used at any time before the governor resorted to this expression on June 13.

I disclaim completely the kind of article that has been written in certain quarters picturing what has been done in this situation as a "political assassination". That, I regret to say, is the title that appeared in The Economist of London on June 16 over an article written by the Ottawa correspondent of that journal, namely Mr. Michael Barkway. I wish to make it very plain that there has been no such thing as character assassination here. The governor did not on May 30 interpret to that effect anything that was said on that occasion. Never a word or hint did he drop of interpreting anything that had been said as being a slander upon him or upon his integrity. If there has been a slander in his misinterpretation of it, then the broadcasting of it is his own personal responsibility.

The next point I wish to draw attention to is the fact that on this very subject, in his statement on June 13, the governor chose to go completely outside the scope of the issue that he saw between himself and the government in relation to his tenure of office as governor of the bank. Having used the sentence to which I have referred concerning the alleged slander, he added:

> It appears to be another element in a general campaign of injury and defamation directed against crown corporations, their chief executive officers and other public servants. I cannot and will not resign quietly under such circumstances.

I ask the house to draw its own inference from the fact that the governor, who was saying at this time that he should have been permitted to continue in office until the end of December, chose to go completely outside the scope of the Bank of Canada or its relations with the government in order to engage in a political accusation against the government concerning its relations with other national institutions or crown corporations or persons heading them. I leave it to the house to decide whether, under those circumstances, it was proper for the governor to engage in that kind of deliberate, omnibus, general political accusation against the government. This accusation came at a time when he was asserting that the government should have had confidence in him and in his co-operation. It is an interesting sidelight on that kind of assertion on his part.

The next point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that the government takes full responsibility in the realm of fiscal policy. Its program—I refer to the kind of program that was introduced in this house last Tuesday evening—requires effective co-operation of the authorities in the fiscal and monetary fields. The governor's campaign has been aimed at absolving monetary policy of responsibility for economic conditions and for action to meet economic conditions. He has deliberately sought to throw on to fiscal policy the full burden of meeting economic problems. In my respectful submission, this is not only an unsound and untenable proposition but it was part of the campaign to pillory the government. He has carried it on in his statement of June 15. He states:

> As I see it, the trouble has not been in the field of monetary policy—

And so on. Further down he states:

> What has been lacking so far is adequate action in the field of fiscal policy.

If that is not a deliberate attack on the government, I do not know what can be an attack. What is required, in the view of the government—and it was implicit in what I said to the governor at our meeting on May 30—is that for the solution of Canada's present economic problems there must be a co-operative approach by the authorities in the fiscal and monetary fields.

As to the extent of the deep seated differences of approach to economic problems and responsibilities of the authorities in these two respective fields, fiscal and monetary, I shall not repeat what I said last Tuesday night. It is on record on pages 6666 to 6668 of Hansard, and any further comment on this subject no doubt could be more appropriately reserved for the budget debate. In that, Mr. Speaker, I include any comments upon the February memorandum which the governor released a few days ago.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I have drawn attention to the governor's disclaimer of the responsibility of monetary policy for meeting economic conditions. But the governor in his statement of June 15 chose to go further, and indeed he has sought, as I have indicated, to throw responsibility off his shoulders and all responsibility on to the government in a field where the view of the government is that responsibility must be shared and action must be co-operative. Well, sir, he may say now that he disagrees with the view I have expressed in this house, that the government has not had responsibility for monetary policy. He has in these statements undertaken to express disagreement with my interpretation in that respect. All I have to say, Mr. Speaker, is that he was well aware of that interpretation. It was given to the house under the circumstances of the situation at the time in various debates in this house over the past two sessions, and although he must have been well aware that statements were being made in Hansard, never once did he express himself to me personally as not sharing the view I was expressing, or taking issue with it. This statement that he has recently made in this respect is the first intimation that has ever come from him to me of a view that the responsibility for monetary policy was a responsibility of the government and not simply that of the Bank of Canada under the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act.

Next, Mr. Speaker, let me draw attention to what the governor has said in his statement of June 19. Referring to the February memorandum which he released—the confidential memorandum—he has said:

> I have been anxious to have constructive discussion of these matters but the Minister of Finance has not found time to discuss the substance of them with me.

Mr. Speaker, I must take issue with that statement. A number of these matters that are referred to in the February memorandum were discussed last autumn at meetings in which the governor and others and myself participated. There were, I should say, a large number of various items that appeared in the February memorandum which had already been discussed. Let me say this, that having read the February memorandum I did not need extended discussion to satisfy me that such a program as he was putting forward in broad outline in that memorandum was in many of its aspects not acceptable to the government. I have referred to the fact that it would have involved a breach of our international obligations; that it would have provoked retaliation against Canada by other countries; that it would have restricted our trade; raised taxes; involved more governmental intrusion into business in this country, and would have necessitated for its fulfilment a federal intrusion into the affairs of the provinces, and other reasons.

It was not necessary for us to have extended discussion in the light of those facts. But let me draw attention to this; that when the governor complains that I was not sitting down and talking to him at length on the contents of that memorandum, I asked him—this is when we met on March 18—if he had made any attempt to call me, telephone me, or make any appointment for the purpose, and the answer of course was in the negative. He had chosen, rather, to sit in his office and write these letters, and then complain that he was not being properly used because I had not sat down to discuss these questions with him at length.

The next passage in the statement of June 19 I think is of interest to the house as well. It proceeds:

He—

That is referring to myself:

—has also for four years refused to allow the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons to study my annual report or to examine my views as to whatever extent might be desired by members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, that statement is untrue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was in 1959 that a question was asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. He did not press it. He asked if the government was going to refer the report to the banking and commerce committee. A halfhearted question was asked in the 1960 session by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. It was only in the present session that this matter has become an issue.

Mr. Pearson: That is entirely wrong.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When the governor of the Bank of Canada makes this assertion that for four years I refused to allow the banking and commerce committee to study the annual report, what he is saying is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: At which time did you not refuse?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, let me refer to something one of my predecessors had to say on this subject. I am putting this on the record to refute the statement of the governor and also to clarify issues that have been beclouded in this house in the present session. There has been only one year when the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada has been referred to the banking and commerce committee for study. That was in the year 1956. Let me draw attention to the year 1957, not after the change of government but the session of 1957 that preceded the general election and change of government of that year. The request was made at that time for reference of the report to the banking and commerce committee. I refer to Hansard of February 14, 1957 at page 1277. The hon. member for Greenwood put this question to the then minister of finance:

Governor of Bank of Canada

Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that I understand the Bank of Canada report for 1956 will be down shortly, will the minister be able to tell us that the banking and commerce committee will have an opportunity of having the report presented and discussed by the governor of the bank, as was done last year?

The answer was:

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall give consideration to what appears to be a request.

Then we find that the matter was revived a month later. Hansard of March 11, 1957 indicates at page 2064 that the hon. member for Greenwood returned to his question and asked the minister of finance:

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is the intention to have the governor of the Bank of Canada, now that the report is out, appear before the banking and commerce committee as he has done in the past?

To this question the minister of finance, Mr. Harris, made the following reply:

Mr. Speaker, I think I may have slightly misled the house—

He was obviously referring to what he had said earlier on February 14, which I have read:

Mr. Speaker, I think I may have slightly misled the house and the hon. member for Greenwood by a reference I made in answer to a question such as this earlier in the session. I find that it has not been a custom for the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before the banking and commerce committee. It is true that the former governor and the present one have appeared before it on occasion but a good deal less frequently than I had thought when I made the answer. It would therefore not be correct to say that it has been customary, although on occasion it has been done. I shall consider whether or not it ought to be done in this case.

That is the end of the quotation and having considered it he did not propose that the report go to the committee.

Mr. McIlraith: Dissolution came.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Dissolution did not come for another month. I think that puts that matter in its proper light.

To what I have already said in reference to debates in this house, let me add this further comment on what the governor has said. Never once in all these years did the governor say anything to me about wishing to appear before the banking and commerce committee or wishing his annual report to be referred to the banking and commerce committee or to any other committee. This statement of June 19 is evidently calculated to give the impression that he was telling me he wanted to appear before the banking and commerce committee to discuss his annual report and that I did not let him.

Such impression could not be further from the truth; and when the governor talks about my refusing to allow the banking and commerce committee to study his report, if he is referring to anything that passed between us in this regard I have to say categorically that nothing of this sort has passed between us. If he is referring to debates which took place in the house, then I have to say to him that this is an intrusion into political debates in the house that ill becomes a man who aims to cling to office as governor of the Bank of Canada.

What is more, his statement does not accord with the facts, as the records of this house will plainly show.

The only time the governor ever talked to me about appearing before any committee of the House of Commons was not in relation to his annual report or to the banking and commerce committee at all; it was in relation to his appearance before the industrial relations committee of the house on June 9, 1959, when he was called as a witness in relation to the investment policy of the investment committee under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I may say that on that occasion he expressed himself to me in terms of outrage—that is not too strong a word—over the shockingly unfair way in which, he asserted, he had been treated in that committee that morning by the hon. member for Essex East who, the governor said, had made lengthy speeches instead of asking questions, and who would not give him an opportunity to answer the questions.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister what he is quoting from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The comment of the governor himself arising out of that experience.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did you write it down at the time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wrote it on the tablets of my memory and it is very plainly written there.

Mr. Pickersgill: Your memory.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to have the opportunity of questioning the Minister of Finance in the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would love to have the opportunity of exposing the hon. member for Essex East and all the shilly-shallying he has done on this subject for a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us go to the committee.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the attitude which the governor took in relation to the kind of questioning which was directed to him by the hon. member for Essex East on June 9, 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: According to your say so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The next point which perhaps merits mention was the observation in the governor's statement of June 13 that he has always co-operated with the government and would, of course, do so. This is a case where the governor invites the government to believe that he has never failed to co-operate. Although he has carried on this campaign which has embroiled the Bank of Canada in controversy and has put himself plainly at odds with the government on basic questions of policy, he is asking the government to believe that his co-operation can be counted on at a time when he is accusing the government of having slandered him and of having carried on a general campaign of injury and defamation against crown corporations. In the face of that, and all it amounts to, he asks that he be permitted to continue in office and that his protestations of readiness to co-operate should be accepted at face value. This assertion that he had always co-operated and was prepared to co-operate was never made until some days after a request had been made for his resignation.

I have found, to my great regret, that the governor has not possessed the confidence of the public and of those institutions in the Canadian economy with which the Bank of Canada must work. I shall not go into the question of the attacks which have been made upon monetary policy in this country by those in the academic field who are students and authorities of this subject, but I would point to the fact that there is a reflection of the relationship of this issue to public finance in what has happened in the bond market since this matter became public by the act of the governor on June 13. The bond market has been stronger since that time. Bond values have been rising and interest rates have dropped slightly.

It must be plain to all concerned that there is a dispute, and a deep seated dispute, between the governor and the government here. I refer to the statement made in this house by the Leader of the Opposition on February 20, as reported on page 2201 of Hansard:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

There may be one question remaining. Suppose a case arises where the government on its part says there is a deep seated dispute between itself and the governor with respect to general policy. Suppose the governor then says oh, well, I really should not be interpreted as having attacked government policy or as differing with it; I am ready to co-operate; I say there is really no deep seated difference between us. In these circumstances who is to judge whether there exists in fact a dispute, a deep seated difference in policy? Again I am indebted to the Leader of the Opposition for supplying the answer to this question. He did so at a television conference, broadcast from Ottawa last Thursday evening. From the script I quote the two following questions and answers, the answers being supplied by the Leader of the Opposition.

Who is to be the judge of whether there is or is not a dispute? If the government says, yes, there is a dispute, and the governor of the Bank of Canada says he knows of none, whose judgment—

A. Oh, the government's views must prevail in these matters. The government, of course.

Another question:

Q. You take the position, then, that if the government asserts that there is a dispute the governor of the Bank of Canada must resign?

A. I think that if there is a dispute of that kind the governor of the Bank of Canada should resign, of course.

Mr. Pearson: Read on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me make it very clear that the government asserts that there is a dispute with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After four years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are deep seated differences to which I have now made reference, and in the face of this situation the house should be under no misapprehension. We say there is a dispute and, therefore, having regard to the principle put forward by the Leader of the Opposition himself, it is the duty of the governor to resign. Indeed, that is the only course.

Perhaps it would have sufficed if instead of my detaining the house at such length I had simply read the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition on February 20, told the house that in the view of the government there is a deep seated dispute between us, and then referred to the further statement of the Leader of the Opposition that the government is the judge of whether there is a dispute, and that if the government says there is a dispute the governor must resign. That would have been a complete presentation of the case.

Mr. Pearson: The minister having quoted part of my answer, I wonder whether I might ask him—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am making my speech. The Leader of the Opposition will have an opportunity to make his, and we shall be in committee later on and there will be opportunity there for questions.

Mr. Pearson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say that this regime must, in the public interest—Mr. Speaker, there is no question of privilege whatsoever.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are the Speaker as well as the executioner. Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition rises on a question of privilege. I have to hear him.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a question of privilege because the minister has quoted from a statement I made the other night. He has quoted only one part of the statement and has drawn his conclusions from that part. I am now asking him to complete the quotation.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter of explanation which the Leader of the Opposition will have an opportunity to present himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that I read in full two questions and his answers to those questions, and any attempt to pretend otherwise just does not agree with the facts. The Leader of the Opposition may repent now of the answers he gave, but his answers are there and they were recorded at the time. They are very plain and categorical on the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: You don't dare to read the next paragraph.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: You don't dare to read it; you don't dare to.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members cannot prescribe the way in which another member presents his speech, provided it is in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: A deliberate attempt to mislead the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been acting this way lately, Mr. Speaker; he has been going into hysterics almost every day in the house. It is evident that it is time to administer some kind of sedation to him. He is quite unable to control himself.

I say in conclusion that in the public interest the present regime in the Bank of Canada must give way to one in which the good relations which previously existed between the bank and the government and between the bank and the public will be restored and co-operation in fiscal and monetary policies will prevail.

Sir, the present governor of the bank was appointed to his high office by order in council. That order in council is P.C. 1954/1789. It is dated November 18, 1954, and it purported to appoint the present governor as governor at a salary of $50,000 per annum, the appointment to take effect as from January 1, 1955. Under section 6, subsection 2, paragraph 3 of the act, his appointment is for a term of seven years during good behaviour. In an office so exalted the standard of good behaviour, Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree, should be of the very highest. It is known to all that the governor has lost the confidence of the board of directors of the bank; he has lost the confidence of the government, and he does not possess the confidence of a good many sections of the public with which the Bank of Canada is expected to work.

Enough has been said, I believe, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate that the governor has not fulfilled the terms of his appointment in November, 1954; that the public interest is suffering from his continuance in office; that the government itself has no power to remove him from office; and that in the face of his open defiance of requests from the government and from the board of directors of the bank for his resignation, only parliament can remove him. By the present bill parliament is asked to take that action, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister permit a question before he sits down? I should like to ask him just one question arising out of his statement. In view of the statements he has made, which have been contradicted by others, including the governor and directors of the bank, and in view of the desirability of clearing up these contradictions without delay, will the minister give the house the assurance now that immediately on the second reading of this bill it will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce where evidence can be taken and witnesses heard?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you will notice that the Leader of the Opposition has chosen to couch statements within the framework of what purported to be a question. I take issue at once with the statements he has made, which are not statements of fact or truth at all. When he says that the statements I have made have been contradicted by the governor and by members of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada he is not telling the truth. The answer to his question is no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Shame.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a very short bill, but that does not mean that it is not a very important one. Some of the most important legislation in democratic history has been very short, and some of the most important attacks on freedom and democracy have been in very short bills; therefore the significance of this bill is not to be determined by its length. It reads:

> The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

I leave aside certain doubts about the constitutional validity of a bill of this kind. It does not, of course, amend the Bank of Canada Act. We have been told in the house that that would be required to bring about this result. Indeed, you might find a case for argument whether parliament, if it passes this bill declaring this position vacant, is the only body that can fill it. According to this possible argument it remains vacant until parliament takes action to fill it.

I leave aside these legal points—they may be brought up later—to speak for some time, because the minister spoke for some time, on the substance of the bill and what is involved in it. And I hope, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to speak without those chattering interruptions to my left.

Mr. Jones: The hon. member interrupted frequently.

Mr. Pearson: The minister told us that he was going to speak with restraint. In the light of his remarks, especially at the end of his long statement, I leave the house to judge how much restraint he showed in his personal attack on the governor of the Bank of Canada, and indeed in quoting not from a record but from his own memory of a statement purported to have been made by the governor of the Bank of Canada a long time ago.

At this time I do not intend to deal with many of the points the minister raised, but they will be dealt with; because the minister may have considered that he spoke with restraint, but we consider he spoke in a manner which requires to be answered, and he will be answered point by point. But I cannot forbear to mention two points in the minister's statement, one of which relates directly to me. He quoted from my television interview the other night, and I stand by what I said in that broadcast. But, as is his custom, he did not continue the quotation. I said, of course, that if there is a dispute between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government, the governor should resign. I said that in the House of Commons at a time when the minister was defending the governor against that kind of action. Then the next question was:

Do you think he should resign now?

My answer was this:

I say his usefulness is over as governor.

Of course that is true, Mr. Speaker. His usefulness has been destroyed by the government. Then I went on:

But Mr. Coyne apparently is determined to defend himself against certain charges which he believes reflect on his integrity. And that is why surely Mr. Coyne should have his day in court, and by in court I don't mean issuing statements which he feels are necessary because he isn't permitted to appear before a committee—and he states in one of his statements that he hasn't been allowed to appear before the banking and commerce committee to discuss the Bank of Canada report for four years.

Mr. Montgomery: That was a lie at the time. That has been denied.

Mr. Pearson: I hear an hon. member saying "That is a lie". I take it he will withdraw that observation.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member spoke in haste and will be quick to make amends for something that has universally been held to be contrary to parliamentary practice.

Mr. Montgomery: I withdraw the first part. I said that had been denied.

Mr. Pickersgill: A lot of things have been denied.

Mr. Harkness: Wrong again, Mike.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly sounded like "a lie" here. In any event, that is what I said, that the minister did not quote; that before this dispute is settled in favour of the government the man who has been attacked should be given a chance to appear before a committee and defend himself.

Mr. Chambers: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: I will answer questions, like the minister did, at the end if my statement. There is something else the minister said which should be replied to immediately. The minister made a great play in building up his case for this dispute between the bank and the government which has extended now over four years, on the fact that in 1958 the governor of the bank refused to take the action which the government asked the bank to take with regard to tight money and lower interest rates. He had some strong things to say about the governor angrily refusing to take certain action. It is surprising that the minister, having made that statement, did not take this opportunity to tell us the evidence on which it is based; because on June 21 we asked him a question on this very point. The hon. member for Welland put the question.

Mr. Pearson: Page 6812. The question reads as follows:

1. Did the Minister of Finance ask the governor of the Bank of Canada to increase the money supply on any occasions since June 21, 1957?
2. If so, on what occasions?
3. Did the governor refuse to accede to any such request?
4. If so, which ones?

What did the minister say on that occasion? Compare this with what he has tried to say this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, the communications between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance have always been regarded as privileged.

Then the hon. member for Welland put this question:

1. Did the Minister of Finance ask the governor of the Bank of Canada to take steps to reduce interest rates on any occasion since June 21, 1957?
2. If so, on what occasions?
3. Did the governor refuse to accede to any such requests?
4. If so, which ones?

This was the answer of the Minister of Finance:

Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is the same as that given to the previous one.

The minister, however, purported to give an answer this afternoon, and the answer he gave this afternoon is contradicted by his own statement at the time. On February 14, 1958, according to a Canadian Press story the minister had this to say, and I quote from this report which has never been denied:

Whatever may have been said for the tight money policy in 1955 and 1956, it is evident that it does not fit the needs of 1958.

Then he went on to say this:

Money is more plentiful, credit is somewhat easier and interest rates have been reduced to a remarkable extent in recent months.

Does that look as if the Bank of Canada was not co-operating with the Department of Finance in these matters?

Mr. Pickersgill: He just said that for the electorate, of course, during an election campaign.

Mr. Pearson: Of course, Mr. Speaker, that was an election speech, and as the Minister of National Revenue, whose absence from the house and especially the reason for it we all lament, said on one famous occasion, "Election promises really do not mean very much".

This short bill which we have before us, Mr. Speaker, is the result that was made necessary by the difficulty, if you like by the mess, that the government has got itself into through its mishandling of this matter, through its customary ineptness and procrastination, this time extending over four years, in dealing with a problem through its customary procedure, its customary practice of allowing a problem to deteriorate until it becomes a crisis and then taking sudden and panic action to deal with it. This situation in which the government finds itself, this controversy between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada, has already—the minister himself has said this—done harm to Canada's prestige and Canada's position, and I agree—

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Pearson: —with the minister and with all members of this house, I hope, that this matter should be cleaned up with a minimum of delay. But it should be done in the right and proper way. Justice cannot be subordinated to speed, desirable as speed is in this case. I agree and I have just repeated that the governor's usefulness has ended as long as this government is in charge of finance.

An hon. Member: Are you going to hire him back?

Mr. Pearson: But the governor's usefulness has been destroyed by this controversy precipitated by the government, and I will go into that in some detail later. Because of that the governor has become a scapegoat, and he is becoming a scapegoat without an opportunity for an inquiry and without parliament being given an opportunity to inquire into all the facts, into the charges—and more have been made this afternoon—and the countercharges.

The bill makes no such provision before dismissal, provision for the right of inquiry, the right of every public servant to have an inquiry, whatever his position, before dismissal if he does not hold his position at pleasure, and the governor of the bank does not. Incidentally, the minister referred to the governor of the bank as a public official, which is correct. The Prime Minister referred to him incorrectly over the air the other night as a civil servant.

The governor of the Bank of Canada does not hold his position at pleasure. He holds it during good behaviour. When a man in his position is being forced out of office as he is by this legislation, then irrespective of the merits of the case he should be given an opportunity to state his case before a parliamentary committee because it is parliament, the high court of the land, which is being asked to take action. If parliament is being asked to take this kind of action, surely in simple justice the man concerned should be given the opportunity to appear before a parliamentary committee. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister once again after his statement this afternoon whether he would not ensure that the bill would be referred at once to a committee where evidence could be taken and witnesses could be heard. If he had said yes, and he should have said yes, that would have ended second reading as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Instead of hanging a man on the prejudiced statement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: And, Mr. Speaker, this action, this denial of justice, this denial of the right to appear before a committee of the House of Commons which is asked to discharge this man, is being taken by a government which boasts so often about the bill of rights it asked this parliament to pass, one part of which includes words to the effect that no such act—Canadian act of parliament—order, rule, regulation or law shall be construed or applied so as to "deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations".

Perhaps the Minister of Justice will tell us whether he has examined this bill in the light of the bill of rights and whether this bill, in the form in which it is presented to us and in the light of the refusal of the government to permit the hearing we have asked, is consistent with the letter or at least the spirit of the bill of rights.

The issue in this bill is not, as the minister tried to tell us this morning, who governs this country. There is no doubt about that. Parliament and the people govern this country. The issue is not who governs this country; the issue is how this country should be governed. The issue in this bill is not Mr. Coyne or his financial and monetary views. We on this side have criticized his views when the Minister of Finance defended him. The minister brought forward some evidence a few moments ago, and I am not quite sure whether he was in favour of Mr. Coyne or against him. He brought forward the statement which he said he remembered Mr. Coyne made, that it was outrageous the way we criticized Mr. Coyne in committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was the hon. member for Essex East in that committee to whom he referred.

Mr. Pearson: The minister quoted the governor's statement which he remembered so well, which was not in writing, that the questioning of the hon. member for Essex East, who was speaking as a Liberal member of parliament, was outrageous.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It was.

Mr. Pearson: Therefore the financial and monetary views of Mr. Coyne, we not having been given the opportunity to question them, have been sometimes criticized on this side of the house at a time when they were defended by the government, when the government refused to allow the governor of the bank to appear before a committee of the house for further questioning.

That is not the issue in the terms in which the minister put it before us. The issue is an historical issue of responsible government; of the control of the elected representatives of the people over the executive and the right of parliament to scrutinize every act of the executive, including any act which forces out the governor of the Bank of Canada.

By this bill the executive is seeking to make the elected representatives of the people rubber stamps, because they are being asked to take action without information, with the exception of that information which they receive from the minister who has put the bill forward. We are being told with respect to a matter of vital importance, the consequence of which may be with us for a long time, only what the Minister of Finance wishes us to hear, and on the minister's say so we are being asked to give a blank cheque to the government to control the bank without any parliamentary scrutiny. That is what we are being asked to do today, Mr. Speaker.

What excuse does the minister give us? On "The Nation's Business" broadcast the Prime Minister said:

> Public servants are not the masters of the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. Speaker, that is perfectly true, of course. But here we have two chief public servants—the Prime Minister, who is a public servant, and the Minister of Finance, who is also a public servant—forgetting that they are public servants and telling the elected representatives of the people that we must declare the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada vacant and—this is the heart of the matter—without any reasons being given in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: There is no provision in this bill for scrutiny by a committee of the house. We are being asked to do this because one public servant, the Minister of Finance, has given us highly partisan and prejudiced accounts of his relations with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): How ridiculous can the hon. gentleman be?

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is ridiculous; there never has been such a ridiculous procedure put before this House of Commons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor such arrogance.

Mr. Pearson: I agree with the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance in his effort to come to the defence of his minister.

The Bank of Canada is not a part of the executive; it is not under the control of the executive branch of government. Why is it not? The Bank of Canada is not a part of the executive because parliament decided that final control over the policies governing money supply should not be entrusted to the government in secret, but to parliament in the open. History demonstrates that control by the executive over money supply is one of the shortest roads to a dictatorship. That is why every free country has taken the most elaborate precautions to prevent the control of the supply of money falling into the hands of an arbitrary executive, free of any effective parliamentary scrutiny or control. What is the use of having parliamentary control of the right to tax if we are going to give the executive a blank cheque to start the printing presses rolling to pay their huge deficits?

Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada Act was carefully designed to prevent this from happening, and that is why it provided for a representative board of directors who were to be independent of the government. That is why the board and not the government was given the power to appoint the governor and deputy governor, which is something the minister carefully avoided referring to when he was talking about the appointments this afternoon, although approval of these appointments by the government is also required to ensure, it is hoped and has, indeed, been the case, the necessary harmony between the governor and the government. That is why the governor was appointed for a fixed term, subject to good behaviour, not subject to pleasure. Parliament intended the bank to be independent of control in that sense and to act independently of government control within its own sphere, but not, of course, to act in a fashion that would frustrate the policies of a government. There is no difference between us on that score.

In other words there was to be harmony and co-operation between the government and the governor, because without that harmony and co-operation one can understand the difficulties that would ensue. If that harmony and co-operation could not be maintained, and if the governor did not resign voluntarily, a responsible government under our system has a clear duty to bring this situation at once to the attention of parliament, the source of all authority and control, and to propose suitable action which parliament could take, but only after due and proper parliamentary inquiry in accord with simple decency and justice.

The minister told us two weeks ago, and repeated with vigour this morning and this afternoon, that the necessary harmony has been lacking for four years between himself and the governor of the bank. However, until two weeks ago he kept that disharmony in secret from parliament, and denied every suggestion of the opposition that any lack of harmony existed. I will have something to say about that latter. There is plenty of evidence that can be produced in respect to the question of lack of harmony which so recently has been discovered and which now, four years after, the minister complains about very bitterly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Information which came to us then for the first time.

Mr. Pearson: As the hon. member for Essex East says, the information came to us for the first time in the last two weeks. This concealment by the minister from parliament is a self-confessed breach of the minister's duty to parliament. When this disharmony arose, as we are now told it arose years ago, surely then if the minister could not do anything about it the Prime Minister, the head of the government, should have stepped in and restored the position, if that was possible.

We do not even know whether the Minister of Finance told the Prime Minister about this disharmony over the years. We do know he is very sensitive himself about being told anything in respect to the administration of the bank and financing and all that sort of thing. We know from his words again this afternoon that although he had his assistant deputy minister at a meeting which dealt with pensions, when the minutes of the previous meeting were read, yet in spite of this kind of representation he himself did not know what was going on at that meeting of the board of directors. We do not even know what information the Prime Minister had about this fundamental disharmony. Surely if it exists—and it has existed for four years, we are told—the Prime Minister might have stepped in at any time, as any prime minister with a sense of responsibility would have done, and done his best to clear it up without the damage to the country and its prestige that has occurred by the events of the last two or three weeks. The trouble with this government is that it is too busy running a campaign to run a government.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where have you been lately?

Mr. Pearson: If the government were convinced that the governor of the bank was really obstructing government policies—and they claim to be convinced now; it is a kind of ex post facto conversion or conviction—parliament, as I have said, should have been fully informed, but it was not informed, and the governor of the Bank of Canada as head of an institution responsible to parliament, should have been given a full opportunity to explain his position and defend it. If he could not or would not explain his position and defend it satisfactorily, then and only then parliament should act. Instead of doing that—and that was the right course to follow—the Minister of Finance let the situation drift for nearly four years until his patience became exhausted or something else happened. He prevented the appearance of the governor before a committee of this house. Although he denied it this afternoon, the fact is that the governor of the bank did not appear before a commons committee during those four years. If there was this fundamental disharmony which we hear about now for the first time, why would it not have been the first desire of the minister to see that the governor of the Bank of Canada went to a committee of the house and explained his policies so that the government could explain to the committee where this disharmony lay and so that action could have been taken?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What action?

Mr. Pearson: Instead, suddenly out of the blue the minister, on May 30, demanded the resignation of the governor of the bank, not because of some previous difference, so he told us two weeks ago, but because the minister believed, and he repeated this today, or pretended to believe that some unspecified future policies of the government would not be acceptable to the governor of the bank, even though the governor did not know, of course, what these policies were, because he had not been consulted over all these long months during which the budget was being prepared. In other words, the Minister of Finance went, as he himself admitted, on the government's orders—and that, of course, means the Prime Minister's orders—behind the back of parliament and tried to intimidate the governor of the bank and get him to resign as quietly as possible so that parliament, which had the right to know, would never know what had happened. That is the action taken by a government pledged to restore the rights of parliament.

Let us now look at the role of the bank's directors in this matter. I mention this because the minister himself had something to say on this score, something which has been contradicted by at least one of the directors himself and that will be put on the record also during this debate. The board of directors, which was to be independent and responsible and which had supported the governor over the years, when this situation developed,—and only after this situation developed and only after contact between some members of the board of directors and the minister,—then stated with regret, and in view of the circumstances, that the governor should resign. I can understand what they meant by "in view of the circumstances"; and I can also understand what they meant when they said "with regret". What they should have done, of course, was to have demanded a meeting with the minister and the fullest possible explanation from the minister in the presence of the governor of all the differences between them. Then if those differences could not have been resolved, they should have asked for a public explanation and a full opportunity for parliamentary inquiry. But this particular meeting which, according to the records we have, was sought by the directors, was refused by the minister.

We have also had—and it was repeated this afternoon—this determined, despotic refusal by the government of any kind of parliamentary inquiry into this matter; and that is the heart of the issue. Now this bill asks us, without any reason being given, to remove from his place a man who is responsible not to the minister but to parliament. The question is not the policy and the tactics of the governor of the Bank of Canada but is the intolerable, arbitrary procedure of the government of getting rid of him by a bill of this kind. If we meekly pass this bill in the form in which it is submitted to us, without the most searching discussion, as the government apparently expects us to do, and without any parliamentary inquiry, as we have been told we must do, what will be its effect? The effect will be, of course, to remove the governor of the Bank of Canada. But a far more important effect than that will be to endanger the position of the governor of the Bank of Canada in the future and of the Bank of Canada in the future and to put that institution in a position in which it may be considered merely as a creature of government.

All the directors of the Bank of Canada are supporters of the present government. They have already demonstrated their reaction to government intervention and so they will obviously appoint as governor someone who will be persona grata to the government; and in the light of the experience we have had in the last two or three weeks, all that has happened and the procedure which has been followed, the new governor will know that, unless he toes the line, his fate will be an unpleasant one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is unfair.

Mr. Pearson: That is the main issue in this bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is very unfair.

Mr. Pearson: Are we going to suppress the right of inquiry, which is essential to the ultimate control of the Bank of Canada by the elected representatives of the people, or are we to hand that control over to be exercised in secret by a government with the record this government has had of lopping off the heads of able public servants?

If this bill is passed in this form, without any recourse to a parliamentary committee where witnesses can be heard and evidence can be taken, what will be the effect of this action on the prestige and morale of the public service? Let me repeat what I have already said. The governor holds his position during good behaviour, not at pleasure. In addition to the judges, there are only a very few public servants who are appointed during good behaviour. What does that phrase mean? It means that such public servants can be removed only for cause and not because they happen to displease the executive in the discharge of their duties.

What the minister is doing in demanding Mr. Coyne's resignation, or what he was doing on May 30 when he demanded Mr. Coyne's resignation, was the equivalent of calling in the chief electoral officer and saying this to him: "We are going to change the electoral law in a way we believe you will not approve, so please resign quietly and thereby maintain the dignity of the office and let us appoint someone who will do the government's will".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Pearson: That is exactly what happened in the case of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Ridiculous.

Mr. Pearson: It was the equivalent of calling in the president of the C.B.C. and telling him this: "We have a new broadcasting policy that you will not like. It is too secret to reveal to you, it is true, but please get out quietly and make way for one of our friends". Mr. Speaker, the procedure followed in this bill is no better than that. It is true parliament has the opportunity to vote. Theoretically the bill could be defeated. But before the House of Commons is asked to vote we are being refused the right of inquiry into the nature of Mr. Coyne's alleged misbehaviour. We get that only from the minister himself, who will not I am sure complain when I call him, in this matter at least, not an impartial witness. This merely turns parliament into a rubber stamp for the executive.

If there are grounds for Mr. Coyne's removal, there is a proper way to do it. I have put it on the record and I repeat it because it is the heart of the matter. The proper way is that we have a full parliamentary inquiry at which Mr. Coyne as well as the minister, and members of the board, if you like, could fully and freely present their differences, if any, and be cross-examined. If that inquiry, which could be concluded very quickly—it need not take long—showed that there are legitimate causes for removal on the ground of misbehaviour, then parliament could and should take appropriate action to that end.

That action, I suggest, should not take the form of this kind of bill. That action, I suggest, would require two stages. First an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act, an amendment which we were told by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) not long ago would be required in this situation, to provide a procedure for removing the governor similar to that contained in the Judges Act, so we could not have this kind of situation in the future. Then a joint address of both houses with the full particulars which justify the removal of the governor.

That would be due process of law and it would help to preserve the necessary independence of the office of the governor of the bank and the assurance that the government was not tampering with the money supply for partisan or other improper purposes. It would also confirm, beyond the reach of contradiction, parliamentary control in such unhappy disputes. We have not that in this bill. What we have here is a return to the processes of despotism. This bill before us is in essence a bill of attainder, a procedure outlawed by the bill of rights in the United States constitution and not used in England since 1798.

This bill is introduced into this house by the governor's accuser, the Minister of Finance, and the accuser alone is allowed to give evidence before parliament. He alone passes judgment and to parliament is given the dignified and appealing role of executioner. This, Mr. Speaker, takes us right back to Tudor days.

It was not always thus in this house so far as hon. members opposite are concerned. Listen to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in earlier days when he was in the opposition; listen to what he said on June 9, 1955, as reported at page 4563 of Hansard:

> I ask the Prime Minister now: Do you have to circumvent the rule of law in order to achieve power under this legislation? Nothing of the kind! Have the powers, but in order to assure that no individual shall be discriminated against and denied equality before the law, to assure that the individual shall not be a puppet in the hands of the minister, give to the individual who is able to establish that he has been discriminated against a right of review by the courts of the land. Surely, we have not arrived—

Said the present Prime Minister:

> —at a state of mind in this country when parliament is asked to abdicate the rights of the courts for an indefinite time in the future in order to satisfy the desire for power of any minister or of any government.

Then again, in the same debate, as reported at page 4566 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> With respect to constitutional power, read Burke. What did he say? What were his words? The tyranny of the majority is a multiple tyranny. No better answer can be given today than that. It is no excuse—

Said the present Prime Minister:

> —that you have a big majority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker, let me look at some of the issues behind this procedure which we attack. This is the basic problem; it is basically the procedure which we attack. Let us look at some of the issues behind this legislation and what the minister said today justified the action he is asking the House of Commons to take. Let us look at the record. Apart from the procedure being followed, which is to be condemned, has the government made its case that the governor should resign? Has he in fact been non-cooperative in working with the government? Has he obstructed government policy? Is that the basic cause of the dispute?

If that is true—and the minister has stated it is true—it has been denied by the governor and it has not been proven at any inquiry. It has only been stated by the minister. The public evidence available to us—not that which we have secured from the minister alone—indicates that Mr. Coyne on May 30 and subsequently has been put up by the government both as a scapegoat and a target. After all, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing like publicly knocking down a bank president to take one's mind off massive unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: There is nothing like this kind of smokescreen and confusion to conceal the inefficiency of the government, its fumbling and bumbling in economic and other matters. The charge made and repeated this afternoon is that the governor of the bank was a proponent of restrictionist policies, tight money, high interest rates and all that.

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Pearson: Indeed the Minister of Finance said specifically in the house on Tuesday last, I think it was, and again over the air the same night, that this was the main difference between him and the governor. I will quote his words again; he confirmed them this afternoon. He said:

> Mr. Coyne's rigid attitude on the maintenance of high interest rates—

That caused all the trouble, and that is what he had to fight. "That is why we were incompatible", said the minister. I suggest that from the Minister of Finance this is hypocritical nonsense, and "nonsense" is one of his favourite words.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One of his virtues.

Mr. Pearson: When the opposition in this house pointed out time and time again the dangers to the economy, at a time of recession, of tight money and high interest rates, the minister argued vehemently that our charge was false and absurd, that in fact interest rates were down, rather than up. If hon. members read Hansard for March 31, 1960, page 2671, they will find that was the minister's argument in this respect. In the debate on monetary policy last February to which the minister has already referred, the minister insisted that monetary policy and the question of money supply was a matter for the bank alone, not for the government. He threw aside all governmental responsibility.

The minister, therefore, could at that time have thrown the whole responsibility for any tight money, for restrictionist policies, onto the bank. He could in that debate have told parliament about the differences which he says now have existed for a long time. He could at that time have met head on the issue which he says now has existed for so long. Well, did he? If hon. members read the debate, they will find he did not do so. In direct contradiction to what he said in his budget speech of last Tuesday, he argued last February that bank policy had been such that the money supply as of December 31, 1960 was larger than it had ever been in Canada. He then praised the governor, he praised Mr. Coyne, and I note that as reported at page 2266 he added complacently:

> —there never has been the slightest interference by the government with bank monetary policy.

There never had been the slightest interference in the monetary policy of the bank. Presumably, this was because things were going all right. There was no reference to disagreement, no reference to fundamental disharmony. There never had been the slightest interference with monetary policy. Well, if that policy at that time and for years earlier had not been satisfactory, why did the government not intervene, at least to the extent of drawing its views to the attention of parliament? The government never interfere. Well, they are interfering now, though a few months ago the minister said that in the matter of interest rates the bank could not be criticized because the rates were not excessive compared with rates in countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States. Hon. members will find that statement reported at page 2207 of Hansard. Yet the minister said exactly the opposite when he made his budget speech last week. We are entitled to ask him: what kind of double talk is this?

Mr. Pickersgill: Which time do you believe him?

Mr. Pearson: We on this side expressed worry over the bank rate and over the monetary and fiscal policies of the government. We did the worrying and we did the criticizing and the Minister of Finance defended both the government and the governor. Indeed, he attacked me in February last, as will be seen at page 2688 of Hansard, for bringing the Bank of Canada into a centre of controversy by raising these question in the House of Commons, claiming I was unfairly attacking the bank and its governor which he was defending. This was in February, 1961; then on May 30, 1961 he asked the governor to resign. In view of this, could anything be more hypocritical than the minister's recent statements and his statement today about relations between the bank and the government? Could anything be more phony than this pretence of patient long suffering in the face of the governor's policy, which he was defending as recently as February?

What is behind all this? Well, the minister has suddenly become the champion of expansion. The governor, he says, is restrictionist. Perhaps that gives us a clue to the greatest conversion since the conversion loan of 1959. But the minister cannot get away from the record, and the record shows that it has been the opposition which has been pleading in this house for expansionist policies during the last four years and the government which has been opposing our expansionist proposals. Even with massive unemployment in a static economy, the minister was still possessed with the fear of expansionist proposals becoming a danger to the stability of the currency, leading to inflation. That was the burden of his sermons in those days. Inflation was the great villain, the great threat. And this was a view he shared at that time with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

On Tuesday last, however, at a time when expansion is in full flow according to the Prime Minister with a consequent increase of inflationary pressures, we no longer get a sermon from the minister on "work and save" or on the necessity of preventing inflation at all costs. We are to be spared these pedantic little homilies on financial responsibility. The text is now to be expansion. The minister has become complacent about the dangers of which he warned us earlier. There is not, he says, and I quote from his budget speech of the other night:

—any serious danger of inflation in present circumstances with so much unused capacity in our economy.

That is another conversion. He did not talk like this previously when there was even more unused capacity in our economy than there is today. Oh, no.

To conceal this about-face, to obscure the real issue, there had to be the smokescreen of a scapegoat. This was provided, without any consideration for decency or fair play, even to the extent of refusing to give the scapegoat the right to be heard and to defend himself against his accusers before a parliamentary committee. The elementary procedures guaranteed by the bill of rights were ignored, as were the procedures which give to the most junior civil servant the right to defend himself against charges before dismissal. The scapegoat was the head of a bank and bankers, of course, can be treated in this way without votes being lost. So goes the cynical reasoning.

So now we have what is called the Coyne affair to cover up this evidence of government misamanagement and ineptness and we are faced also with a refusal to allow any inquiry into this matter in a manner which would enable witnesses to be called and all the facts to be brought to light. This is all we are asking for on this side, but apparently it is not at all to the government's liking; that would not suit the government at all. The minister calls in the governor of the bank and says: get out at once; resign quietly, or else. This is the minister who a few months before had argued that he had nothing to do with monetary policy let alone the administration of the bank. Now he says: resign, or else.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no "or else".

Mr. Pickersgill: We can see the "or else". It is here.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: The alternative was perfectly clear: resign quietly or we shall throw you out by act of parliament without there being a chance to appear before parliamentary committee. All we are asking is that this man and his accusers be invited by parliament, which is asked to take action, to appear before a committee of the commons where the facts can be ascertained.

Listen to what the minister said on February 21 on this point:

The government has no authority over the bank.

I particularly call the attention of the house to these observations by the minister which are to be found at pages 2256, 2257 and 2258 of Hansard:

The government must keep its hands off the bank just as it keeps its hands off the C.B.C.

That should have made us suspicious. Perhaps we were derelict in our duty by not attaching the proper significance to that observation by the minister.

Then the minister went on to say this as reported at page 2260. He asked himself the question:

Can the government change the management of the bank?

Then he answered it himself:

It cannot. The government has no power whatever, once appointments are made, to change them.

But it can bring the most extreme pressure on the governor to resign. Surely that is trying to change the management, and it is mere sophistry to argue otherwise. Therefore, the minister went to the governor without warning on May 30. He must have known it would provoke a crisis and he must have known, also, that there were only six months or so before the end of the governor's term of office. Knowing this, and knowing also that a committee of the board of directors of the bank was already working on finding a successor, the minister, in effect, says to the governor: resign at once, before the budget, which we have not discussed with you at all, but which we know you will not like even though we have not shown it to you. So resign at once.

The shabby insincerity of this attitude has been shown, particularly, by a question and answer in the house on February 21 as reported at page 2264 in the course of a discussion which is turning out to have been an important debate. The minister was speaking, and he was interrupted as occasionally happens by my friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who said:

Does the minister agree with Mr. Ilsley's statement in 1941 that, in the event of a disagreement between the Bank of Canada and the government, it would be necessary for the governor to resign?

To which the minister replied:

No, no. Not in those terms—not at all.

Whereupon I intervened to say: "We do". That is, we Liberals. Then the minister made the following statement. I want to quote everything he said, not just a part; he quoted me in part but I shall quote him in full. He went on to say:

Unless, in the event of disagreement, the governor ... chose to resign.

Then he went on:

There is nothing that the government is in a position to do in that situation except to ask parliament to change the legislation, or wait for the expiry of his term.

This bill does not change the legislation; it does not alter the Bank of Canada, and the minister did not wait for the expiry of the governor's term.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is sophistry now.

Mr. Pickersgill: A bill of attainder.

Mr. Pearson: Let me turn to another matter. Need this crisis—and it is a crisis and a most unhappy one—ever have arisen? Of course the answer is certainly not, if it had been properly handled much earlier, and if there had been close and continuous contact between the governor and the minister. There was no such contact. The minister himself will not deny that. In the loss of such contact and in the face of this disharmony, as I have said previously in this debate, then it is for the Prime Minister to step in. If only the government had accepted its proper responsibility for monetary policy and exercised it at a time when, according to the minister now, Mr. Coyne was first proposing ideas and policies and making speeches of which the government did not approve. He was making speeches which included things we did not approve and we brought this up in the House of Commons. The minister, however, had nothing to say about the speeches in the house. But in 1961, I think it was in February or March, the minister did at last tell the governor to stop making speeches of this kind—

Mr. Benidickson: In March.

Mr. Pearson: —and the governor did. If the minister felt this way about the governor and his speeches and his policy, why did he wait until March, 1961? My own speech in this house on February 20, 1961 gave the Liberal view on both responsibility and policy. I emphasized in that debate the necessity for sound but easier money and for easier credit policy. I mentioned certain criticisms of the governor, of his alleged restrictionist ideas on these matters. In that debate I begged the government to tell us what were their views on those matters, to clear up the confusion and resolve any conflict, if there was one, not only between the government and the governor but between ministers inside the government. I begged them to tell us on this side and to tell the House of Commons who was responsible for what. My own view was clear. The minister has put it on the record and I am glad to repeat it:

If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

But after an inquiry into the accusation made against him, and only then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition did not say that on February 21.

Mr. Pearson: That is simple elementary justice; it may be strange to some of my hon. friends opposite who talk so much about parliamentary justice and rights. I went on to say that if the governor operated in the field of monetary policy without any indication of government disapproval, the governor then has surely the right to assume that the government supports the policy he is putting forward. The evidence of the minister's statements—and I have quoted some of them—shows that they did support that policy even though they attack it so bitterly now. Look at the speech made in Toronto on January 11, 1960, by the new crusader for expansionist finance, when he talked about the difficult decisions that had to be made in 1959, and I quote; "in the cause of steady rather than explosive and inflationary progress". He added, as found at page 2 of the text of his speech:

Our concern today is not whether we will continue to grow but what kind of growth we wish and will have.

Was that Coyne or Fleming speaking? Well, it was both. The minister went on:

Too often we have been tempted to pursue too rapid a rate of growth with too little regard for the inevitable consequences.

Was that the governor or the minister speaking? Listen to this. It will be found in the same speech:

It was not yet a time—

This was 1959.

—for a severe application of fiscal restraint, but the situation did require a reduction in the stimulus which government fiscal policies had injected into the economic stream.

And so he went on. He said we must avoid:

—expenditures not strictly necessary now and bring government revenue and expenditures into better balance.

This was the minister, the restrictionist. What about the banks? What did he have to say about the banks in those days? Well, in his speech in Toronto he indicated that he was pleased because:

> The restraints imposed by the chartered banks on the growth of over-all bank credit and their more selective policy of lending appears to have brought about a more orderly situation within the banking system.

Part of the same speech reads as follows:

> Credit restrictions continue to impose difficulties for certain sections of the economy although there is no evidence that from the over-all viewpoint they are interfering with the process of growth.

Was this the governor of the Bank of Canada? No, this was the Minister of Finance speaking in January, 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: The expansionist.

Mr. Pearson: I will quote more from his restrictionist speeches. He said in the same speech in 1960:

> We are seeking deliberately to bring our revenues and expenditures into closer balance in order that we may not find it necessary to make new borrowings.

In the same speech in Toronto he concluded as follows:

> Those who practice thrift are entitled to the reward of the protection of their savings against the ravages of inflation. I shall continue to do all that lies within my power as Minister of Finance to encourage and protect the savings of the people, however small.
> If Canadians can hold production costs in line and demonstrate renewed efficiency as producers and salesmen, and if they are prepared to take the self-denying measures needed to resist the lurking dangers of inflation, the present period of expansion could carry the Canadian economy far beyond the high water marks heretofore attained.

Then, a year later at Brantford, in January, 1961, in words that could have come from the governor himself, in words that make a mockery of the present attempt to pin on the governor, the blame for tight money and restrictionist policies the minister had this to say about the money supply:

> The chartered banks are in a strong and improved position compared with a year ago. Their total assets increased during 1960 by approximately $750 million, or 6 per cent. Over the same 12-month period the total money supply increased by $687 million, or a little more than 5 per cent. During the year the general loans of the chartered banks increased by $275 million, or 6 per cent, and the ramainder of the increase in their total assets was reflected in the rise of more than $475 million (or 12 per cent) in their liquid and quickly marketable assets. This included, in addition to a rise in their cash, day to day loans and treasury bills, an increase of $260 million in their holdings of government bonds, and their net foreign assets have risen by $100 million.—

The minister who now condemns the governor of the Bank of Canada because he was a restrictionist in those days, went on to say:

> In other words, the Canadian banking system has increased its loans during 1960 without strain on its liquid position; in fact it has added to its liquidity and is in a position to meet all reasonable borrowing requirements of credit-worthy businesses and institutions.

The minister used those words, but Mr. Coyne certainly could have used them at that time. That was the policy in 1960, and its virtues were sung—

Mr. Benidickson: Just a few months ago.

Mr. Pearson: The speech was made in 1961. The virtues of the policy were sung repeatedly by both the minister and the governor in other speeches.

In following these principles of that day the minister had a goal which he reaches, he thought, in last year's budget, which has now been repudiated by him though apparently it has not been repudiated by the governor of the Bank of Canada with whom he shared the desire to reach it last year. And yet now the minister complains that the governor and the government have become incompatible. "The government's policy" the minister says "is expansionist—the policies advocated by Mr. Coyne are restrictionist". Well, of course, some of the governor's policies are, but so are many of the things advocated by the minister in his earlier budgets. His 1960 budget, he admitted himself, was a stand-pat one. His baby budget of last December was hardly better. It was certainly not one to which the governor of the Bank of Canada could object. Expansionism, apart from some proposals in the 1958 budget as bait for the 1958 election, has been conspicuous by its absence in government policy during a time of recession when it was most needed. Yet we are now told that this was the basis of the government's difference with the governor of the Bank of Canada, a difference which is very hard to detect in the budget of this year. Mr. Bruce Macdonald, writing in the Globe and Mail of June 20, had this to say:

> So far as the outsider could tell, the government had come to accept the monetary approach laid down by Mr. Coyne, and the finance minister, the soul of orthodoxy, came to be regarded as his guardian angel.

I think that is quite enough, Mr. Speaker, though I could quote a lot of other things to demonstrate the hollow mockery of the ex post facto case that the governor of the Bank of Canada over all these years had been restrictionist while the government was expansionist and that finally they came to a parting of the ways and on May 30 the minister said: "We can go along no longer; you resign at once, or else".

In the face of this statement of the minister the governor says, in effect, that there is no question affecting bank policy or cooperation at issue between us and that the bank has in fact always co-operated fully with respect to government policies and measures. He said this too:

> At no time has the government expressed disagreement with the operations of the Bank of Canada under my management nor has there been any occasion on which the Bank of Canada has failed to co-operate... in support of government policy. I have never opposed government policy and do not wish to do so.

There is a statement from the minister which I have quoted and there is a statement from the governor which I have quoted and in the face of both these statements contradicting each other, in the face of a statement by a member of the board of directors contradicting what the minister has said today—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Pearson: —in the face of that situation the minister has the effrontery to stand up and say that he will not allow this matter to go before a committee of the House of Commons where the facts can be found and the truth ascertained. That is all we are asking. We are not supporting the governor. We are not supporting the governor's tactics.

An hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Churchill: You are on both sides of the fence as usual.

Mr. Pearson: That is not the issue before us.

Mr. Cathers: All over the map.

Mr. Pearson: We are the only party in this house that has criticized some of the things that the governor has put forward. Some of the things he has said and done have been good. Some of the things he has said and done have, according to our thinking, not been good for Canada. That is not the issue. The issue is simple decency and justice. The issue is whether a man in the high and responsible office of this man can be thrown out of his office by an act of parliament—

Mr. Hodgson: He threw himself out.

Mr. Pearson: —which does not give him the opportunity to face his accusers in a parliamentary committee. The high court of parliament, the House of Commons, is being asked to take action in this matter. We are asked to take as important a decision as the House of Commons can take, to discharge the governor of the Bank of Canada. We are being asked to do this without access to the facts except in so far as members of the government give us those facts. We are asked to do this before the man accused is given an opportunity to face those accusing him in a committee of the house which is being asked to take action. This is an intolerable position, and I suggest that even now the government will surely fall back on its own bill of rights—I should like to read it back to hon. members of the government again—and give this man the opportunity to be heard within the spirit of the bill of rights about which they boast so much. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the following amendment:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill (C-114) be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce."

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I regret that, unlike the minister who introduced the bill and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), I have only a limited time. I had eight hours of material ready for this debate and the minister in introducing the bill supplied me with an additional eight hours of material. I should like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition immediately on the excellence of his performance and the excellence of his arguments. I want to say at once that I have never heard him in better form. It is obvious that he read the headlines this morning in the Globe and Mail, as we all did, I am sure, and is doing his utmost to make a bid for the leadership of the new party which the Ontario young Liberals would like to see him do.

After looking at the bill before us and hearing the explanation of the minister I can only say in all sincerity, what arrogance and what a horrible insult to the intelligence of the Canadian voter his recitation was. When he sees fit to accuse the governor of the Bank of Canada, as he said, out of the tabloids of his memory, all I can ask in response to that is: Does this mean that his head is indeed made of stone because tabloids are inscribed on stone?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Tablets, not tabloids.

Mr. Regier: If the minister had not taken so long he would not have wound up with his neck stretched out nearly as far as it is for the opposition to hack off. The longer he talked, the longer his neck became. He even went to the extreme of attempting to take credit for the representations made to him a number of months ago in this regard by learned people in the university field. He forgets completely that they complained not of the attitudes of the governor of the Bank of Canada but rather they complained basically, as we also have complained, of the lack of co-operation that obviously has existed in this regard.

Governor of Bank of Canada

I believe that the minister exposed his small stature and also the smallness of the government when, in a vain and desperate attempt to heap additional criticism by way of attack on the activities of the governor of the Bank of Canada, he complained about the use of paper belonging to the taxpayers and the use of a postage meter to which the governor of the bank had resorted in an attempt to defend the integrity of the office of governor and, indeed, the role of the Bank of Canada itself. I believe this was really hitting below the belt. We thought that the complaint about the pension plan was hitting way below the belt, but this complaint about the use of the postage meter is even lower than that.

I hope the Minister of Finance will remember that until royal assent has been given to the bill now before us—and in light of the number of trained seals that abound in this house I have no doubt that royal assent will eventually be given—the governor of the Bank of Canada is yet the governor of the Bank of Canada and is completely entitled to use whatever facilities are available to him to defend, as he sees fit, the integrity of the occupant of that office as well as the integrity of the institution itself.

I think the minister can fairly be accused of literally heaping piles of abuse on the governor of the bank while at the same time denying his right to reply before a committee of this house. The Minister of Finance was most vindictive in the whole of his speech and it is obvious that in this whole matter the government as usual has been playing it by ear and has proven itself to be quite deaf at that.

I find it very difficult to understand the minister's claim that he has defended the prestige of the Bank of Canada. I feel that it is very difficult at this stage to decide who is the more adequate defender of the prestige of the Bank of Canada, whether it is indeed the governor of the Bank of Canada or the Minister of Finance. I should like to call the minister's attention to a statement he made, and this is in line with a number of complaints he has had made recently, and again this morning, as recorded at page 2258 of Hansard of February 21, 1961:

> Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have no right of censorship over the speeches of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He does not refer them to me. Why should he do so? This is a free country. He makes his own speeches and chooses his own themes.

The minister complains now that the governor of the Bank of Canada in fact did not consult him but made his own speeches on his own particular theme.

Before I go much further I should like to make our position perfectly clear. We believe that the Bank of Canada belongs to the people of Canada. We recognize that all of the shares are owned by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the people of Canada. We reiterate the basic position taken by the former governor, Mr. Towers, as well as by a former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley and other former ministers of finance, Mr. Abbott, and Mr. Dunning—and these expressions are all on record—that if there is a basic conflict of interest, or difference between the policies of the government and the head of the Bank of Canada, then the will of the owners of the bank, as expressed through the government of the day, must prevail.

We in this group appreciate at once that if the Conservative government is going to remain in office for any considerable length of time the continuation of Mr. Coyne in the office of governor is completely untenable. This has been admitted by Mr. Coyne himself in a number of releases which he has made since this issue has arisen. However, we also believe that to ask the parliament of Canada to approve of this bill without hearing before a committee of this parliament the accused man presenting his own case is an insult to the House of Commons itself. We in this group, therefore, intend to support with all the vigour at our command the amendment which has been put forward by the leader of the official opposition.

This is a battle in essence between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada; the Minister of Finance versus Coyne. Which side of the coin is he on, or is he simply opposed? We have heard the minister speaking about devaluation of the coin of the realm. Is this a sign that the value of the coin of the realm is to prevail or is Mr. Coyne less dear?

We have also assumed that the basic philosophies in respect to monetary policies of the minister and of the governor were identical. We have always been led to believe so and, even at this late date, still think there is no fundamental difference between the basic approach of the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada. However, we now realize, after reading submissions made a number of months ago by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance, that we have now arrived at a stage of socialism plus Tory policies rather than socialism versus free enterprise upon which ground the Prime Minister announced the next election campaign would be fought.

During the budget speech the Minister of Finance presented a number of projects recommended to him by the governor of the Bank of Canada, such as the vast expansion of the industrial development bank. The governor of the Bank of Canada also encouraged, as the minister has so often done, an increase in savings by Canadian people, and he advocated a specific arrangement for a national development corporation. He also advocated the establishment of a local government finance corporation. I suggest we now have socialism plus private enterprise, and I should like to ask a question in all sincerity. Did Mr. Coyne indeed have a point of difference with the Minister of Finance when he pointed to the continuation of repeated attacks upon crown corporations, or does the government intend to pursue a policy of selling these crown corporations, thereby pursuing a policy of private profit versus a continuation of the very profitable crown corporations that we now have in Canada?

The governor of the Bank of Canada has repeatedly offered his co-operation. He claims, along with many other leading Canadians, that massive action on the part of the government is needed. I want to at least say this for him; although we may disagree with many of the measures he advocates, he has assumed responsibility for the welfare of Canada and Canadians, and has recommended to the government a program of massive action in order to meet the recession that we are now experiencing.

I should like to ask the minister, in light of the statements which he has made in regard to the governor of the Bank of Canada, where the basic difference lies. Despite the length of the minister's speech today he has not yet identified the real area of basic difference between himself and his policies and the governor of the Bank of Canada and his policies.

I realize the impracticality of the measures advocated by the governor of the Bank of Canada in the field of tariffs. I much prefer an honest proposal such as that made by the governor of the Bank of Canada in this field —even though I am very much opposed to it —to the back door method of raising tariffs that this government continually insists on pursuing.

The governor has called attention to the need for co-operation in the field of monetary and fiscal policy. This need was underlined by the standing committee on manpower of the other place. This need is becoming more obvious to many Canadians who have given any thought to the matter. I believe even the minister, in his announcement that a royal commission is to be appointed to examine the role of the Bank of Canada, is now admitting that there must be a tie-in between monetary and fiscal policies and that the minister is now admitting he was in error when he insisted that fiscal policies are the exclusive responsibility of government and monetary policies are the exclusive responsibility of the Bank of Canada and never need the twain necessarily meet. I think the minister is now definitely on the defensive on this score.

I should like to recall to the house what the governor of the Bank of Canada had to say in his submission to the government dated February 15 last:

> Monetary policy undoubtedly has a part to play in any anti-recession economic program and also in fostering long term economic growth. Unfortunately very exaggerated views appear to be held in some quarters as to the degree to which monetary policy by itself can be effective for these purposes. There are several reasons why general monetary expansion, particularly if not tied in with government measures directly increasing production and employment, may not serve any useful purpose and may even have perverse effects opposite to those desired.

He added a little bit later:

> —unless steps are taken in other fields of economic policy to ensure that increased spending by Canadians will direct itself to the purchase of goods and services produced in Canada, and thereby promote increased employment in Canada.

The governor of the bank also had this submission to make at page 3 of the same report:

> The whole range of economic policy must be focused on the goals of promoting full employment and a satisfactory rate of economic growth without inflation, and restoration of equilibrium in the balance of payments.

He went on to say this:

> It is urgently to be desired that a strong new initiative be undertaken, aimed directly at achieving increased production and employment in Canada.

This does not sound like the voice of a restrictionist. It sounds like the voice of an expansionist. Before the budget was brought down the minister asserted that he was the expansionist and that the governor of the Bank of Canada was the restrictionist. After listening to the budget it now appears that the minister is the restrictionist because in the budget there is hardly anything to substantiate his claim to being an expansionist; and it now appears that the governor of the Bank of Canada would not have opposed a deficit, even one of this size, if it was aimed at an expansionist policy. However, as I said before, we all know that the deficit is only because of some very poor housekeeping on the part of the government.

In his recommendations the governor of the Bank of Canada advocates the removal of the excise tax on automobiles; I refer to the excise tax of 7½ per cent. The minister announces it in his budget. I see no basic conflict there. The governor goes a bit beyond the minister's announcement. He calls for measures to handle such difficulties as the lack of regional development. He advocates a national highways program much beyond that which is in existence today. The governor of the Bank of Canada especially underlines the need to develop effective demand on the part of Canadian consumers and he makes many recommendations whereby effective demand in the hands of consumers might be enhanced. He is much more expansionist in this regard than are the policies that have been recommended to this house by the Minister of Finance.

The governor of the Bank of Canada on February 15 last recommended the establishment of a secondary mortgage market. We have since heard that this idea has now been adopted by the government. He recommends that our dollar on the international market be regulated. The only conflict I can see is that the policies of the Minister of Finance leave the potential value of the Canadian dollar very much in doubt. We do not know whether it is going to be discounted at 5 per cent next week, at 15 per cent or at any percentage. The recommendation of the governor of the Bank of Canada was that it be given a definite and fixed rate of exchange and that it be maintained at par with the United States dollar. We therefore fail to see very much of a basic conflict between the policies that have been adopted by the government and the policies that have been advocated by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

This morning we heard a long harangue. First of all, we had the crocodile tears shed on behalf of the personal welfare of Mr. Coyne. I believe that in the long run of things the Minister of Finance ought to be worried more about his own potential welfare in the years to come than about the welfare of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He said there is no personal element involved. Yet in all the releases I have read from the governor of the Bank of Canada there has been a lack of involvement of personalities. That is something that we certainly could not say for the speech of the minister of this morning. It was merely a diatribe attacking the integrity of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He complains of the attack of the governor on himself.

I believe that all the minister and the government are really worried about is that, after the governor of the Bank of Canada was made completely aware of the intentions of this government, he outmanoeuvred them, he outsmarted them at every turn, that he is now ending up on the top of the heap and the government finds itself on the short end of the stick and they are regretting it; and therefore, as the only way out in a desperate move, they are attempting to attack the integrity of the governor himself. How else can we explain the government's suddenly waking up to the fact after 16 long months have elapsed, that an increase has been allowed to the pension of the governor, despite the fact that the minister had the assistant deputy minister in attendance at this meeting 16 long months ago? The Canadian people will regard this only as a smokescreen.

The minister complains that confidential documents have now suddenly been released to the public. Did the minister expect that a responsible officer, the leading officer of the Bank of Canada, was going to allow his office to be dragged through the political mud from the Atlantic to the Pacific and that he would remain bound by that promise that all exchanges would remain confidential? Certainly in what the minister told us this morning he revealed many of the confidential discussions that had taken place. I contend the only complaint is that hon. gentlemen opposite are smarting under the ability of the governor of the Bank of Canada to outmanoeuvre them. This was something they had not expected. As I said before, they were so inflated with their arrogance that they did not think a civil servant would have the guts to fight back and defend his rights, much as I disagree and much as my group disagrees with many of the ideas that have been submitted over the past number of years by the governor.

There is another matter I wish to mention. The minister was asked the other day whether the international monetary fund people had been consulted on the proposal to tamper with the value of the Canadian dollar. The minister replied, in effect, that he could not be sure; Mr. Rasminsky, who is a deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, had been in New York on the day the budget was presented and he may have had discussions with the officials of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Speaker, we must consider this in the light of the minister's claim that the governor of the bank himself has not been consulted about the contents of the budget. The minister was very firm in making that claim. The minister inadvertently admitted that he has been consulting, regarding the contents of the budget before its release in this house, whom, if you please, but the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada; but he did not deem it advisable to consult with the governor of the Bank of Canada himself. I say this because unless Mr. Rasminsky had knowledge of the proposals contained in the budget, he would have been in no position to discuss these proposals on Tuesday last with officials of the international monetary fund. The minister really opened his flanks on that score, and it is one more clear indication that the minister over the past number of years, as it now becomes obvious, has made very little, if any, effort to work in harness with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The minister claims that he gave the governor every opportunity to go with dignity. What a farce this claim becomes when the minister himself admits that one of the five things he discussed with the governor when he asked him to resign was the issue of his pension arrangements, which had been settled by unanimous decision of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada as far back as 16 months previously.

How do you claim that you are asking a man to go with dignity when 16 months after the event, and after the minister's officials knew of this event, you raise this as a matter for discussion? The minister admits that the governor of the Bank of Canada asked for an hour to think it over. I want to compliment the governor of the Bank of Canada. He did not immediately rise in wrath, as the minister so often does in this House of Commons. He considered that his basic integrity had been attacked, but he at least asked for an hour to cool off, to think it over and to come back with a suitable reply. I think this is a procedure the minister himself might adopt on many occasions in this House of Commons and not be so perfectly ready to interject with "utter nonsense" and words of that kind.

The minister complains that the governor of the bank released confidential information to the Canadian public on June 13 last. The governor on that day knew and had already been informed that the arms of the directors of the Bank of Canada had been twisted and that very same evening they would be asking for the governor's resignation. All I can say is that the government have raised a phony issue here and their basic resentment is that they were outmanoeuvred by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The minister says that parliament must decide who governs this country. I contend that parliament must also decide whether or not we get all the facts, and up till now it is obvious that we have not received the facts. To say that parliament must decide, in the light of the lack of the facts, is merely to say, "we will use our rubber stamp majority in order to enforce our will in this regard". The minister says:

> We will not accept responsibility for the governor and his actions when we have lost all confidence in him.

I would like to ask the minister how this happens to square with all his indications over the years that he has complete confidence in the Bank of Canada to determine monetary policy. The minister complains that the governor of the Bank of Canada had been requested to ease the tight money policy in the winter of 1957-58. I would like to ask the minister, how does this square with his continuous pledge to the House of Commons that he dare not interfere in the determination of monetary policy? Now today, at long last, he admits to us that he attempted indeed to interfere in the activities of the Bank of Canada as far back as 1957 and 1958.

I believe that the only complaint against the governor, as recited by the minister, in 1958 was the governor's action in releasing the annual report of the bank at the normal time because it was politically embarrassing to the government. This, in the eyes of the minister, was most reprehensible. Apparently he expected the governor of the Bank of Canada to consider the political fortunes of a political party over and beyond his responsibilities and his duty as governor of the Bank of Canada.

I feel this admission on the part of the government was most regrettable. They complain about that matter although the governor performed his functions in a proper manner. It happened to be unfortunate, I will grant, for the government of the day to have the annual report of the Bank of Canada released at that time. However the unpardonable sin of the governor of the Bank of Canada was that he performed his responsibility and released the annual report of 1957 in 1958, at the time this report is normally released. It happened to be embarrassing for the government, and therefore Mr. Coyne's head must roll.

The minister admitted that perhaps the government should have asked for the resignation of Mr. Coyne a long time ago. We agree with this wholeheartedly. If we are to believe the statements the minister has made in the last week or two, the government has shown itself to be utterly derelict in its responsibility to the people of Canada in not asking for the resignation of the governor. However if we are to believe the statement made by the minister over the years in regard to the activities of the governor of the Bank of Canada, the only conclusion we can come to regarding why now the government suddenly claim he is the evil influence on Canadian prosperity that they contend is that an election may be drawing nigh and they have to attempt to blame somebody else for their own lack of action over the past four years.

The minister agrees that it is up to the House of Commons to decide when the governor has to go. The governor himself has admitted that he ought to go if and when there is a basic conflict of attitude between the governor of the bank and the government of the day. But the minister today has not produced any evidence that such a basic conflict exists. I recommend that hon. members read the statement of the governor of the bank submitted on February 15 last. In the main his prescription to end unemployment in Canada is not very far removed from many of the statements made recently by the Minister of Finance himself. The minister says this question should be left for the house to decide. I want to warn this government that though the matter might well be left to this house—and I have no doubt the house will likely go along with the government in reaching a decision—there is an even higher court than this parliament, namely, the court of the people. This smokescreen about the release of confidential documents, which is of more recent origin, is not going to work. The Canadian electorate today has gone beyond grades 1, 2 and 3. I believe the Canadian electorate will realize that this is nothing but a smokescreen. There is such a thing as character assassination. We contend that there has been nothing else, in essence, but character assassination in this issue. In no circumstances do we endorse a pension of $25,000 a year for any man in Canada. But let us not forget that this is not the responsibility of the governor of the bank. This was done by the unanimous decision of a Tory appointed board of directors of the Bank of Canada. If the minister is now able to twist the arms of the directors in order to persuade them to get rid of Mr. Coyne, how much easier would it have been for him 16 months ago when this pension issue arose to have twisted their arms and prevented this increase in pension being provided for a man who is supposed to be the retiring governor of the Bank of Canada.

The minister himself admits there is a need for the integration of fiscal and financial policies, but he has had to confess there was no consultation with the governor of the bank on the basically valuable submissions—I say this though I am not in agreement with them —made in the field of economic policy by the governor of the bank to the government on February 15 last.

I think the government imagined they could get away with it by going to the voters and carrying on an appeal against the bankers and those terrible people who increase their own pensions from $12,000 to $25,000 a year. I take the view that the Canadian people support fair play and believe that every man should be heard in court. Therefore we take great pleasure in endorsing the amendment which was moved by the leader of the official opposition.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): I watched the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) taking part the other night in a conference on television. My impression from what he said was that he intended to drop Mr. Coyne like a hot potato. I think the hon. gentleman's speech here this afternoon has borne out that impression. He has dropped the governor of the Bank of Canada like a hot potato. Not one logical argument did he put forward why Mr. Coyne should not be fired by act of parliament. Not one argument did he bring forward why we should not proceed with this bill. I noticed no one questions whether or not Mr. Coyne should go. It is obvious to all that there has been a disagreement between the government and the governor of the bank, and in that situation the Leader of the Opposition and everyone else in this house agrees that the government should stay and not Mr. Coyne. The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that before Mr. Coyne leaves his post—before he leaves his barricades in the Bank of Canada —we should have a committee of the House of Commons inquire into the situation. The hon. gentleman says that under the bill of rights Mr. Coyne has the right to appear before a committee of parliament to state his case. He says that the bill of rights which was established to provide for the liberty of the subject, should keep Mr. Coyne from taking his liberty at the earliest possible date.

The question of Mr. Coyne's pension has been introduced. That is not germane to the particular question at issue. That is not the reason he was asked to resign, but certainly it is worthy of consideration by this house that the governor of the Bank of Canada in preparing for the conclusion of his term in office in December of this year should have made arrangements for a pension equivalent to that paid to former presidents of the United States, a pension which is some $22,000 greater than that received by the last prime minister of Canada. Of course, that is not the reason why Mr. Coyne was asked to take his leave, but it does indicate something of the nature of Mr. Coyne, something of his arrogance, something about what he himself, at any rate, thinks he is worth to this nation.

Why should there be an inquiry into this request that Mr. Coyne submit his resignation? The issue is a simple one. In the case of a disagreement between the Minister of Finance who speaks on matters of finance for the people of Canada, and Mr. Coyne, it is the governor who goes and not the minister of finance. That is in accordance with our parliamentary system. The only question before the house today is whether there has been a disagreement, whether the minister feels he can no longer work with Mr. Coyne. If that question is answered in the affirmative, the bill should be passed without a dissenting vote.

Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member who has just taken his seat agree that Mr. Coyne has no right to remain in office after being asked to resign, but they say he does have the right to appear before a parliamentary committee to state his case. It seems to me that the reasons are very clear why Mr. Coyne has to go. His statements were on many occasions contradictory to those of the Minister of Finance. It was obvious for all to see that Mr. Coyne did not agree with the fiscal policies of this government which he criticized from time to time. It is obvious there was sufficient difference there to justify the Minister of Finance in coming before this house and asking for a replacement.

Mr. Coyne is a man who stands for high tariffs, isolationism, ultra-protectionism. He seems to find in these policies the answer to Canadian employment and economic difficulties. He attacks deficit budgets, both federal and provincial, which would release more money to provide more purchasing power for our people and, above all, give us the opportunity which has been taken by the Minister of Finance in the budget, to stimulate those areas of the economy which need stimulating. Mr. Coyne's way is to increase taxes. Mr. Coyne's way is to disregard our international agreements, to raise tariffs and shut out goods of other nations. His way is to ride roughshod across agreements we have made with other countries of the world and to interfere with the movement of goods across international boundaries. The policy of this government has been entirely the opposite of that. It may well be that Mr. Coyne has the same purpose in mind as the present government but his proposed methods are entirely different.

This government has been working for four years to stimulate the economy of Canada. Policies have been brought forward to encourage the use of Canadian money in Canada, to encourage investment of Canadian funds in Canada. During the past winter we saw a trade conference called by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to try to speed up the sales of Canadian goods throughout the world. We have seen the vocational training legislation brought forward so that the young people of Canada who badly need new skills, mav obtain the ability to run the machines of our modern community. The government's desire is to give them that training. We have seen the special effort to sell agricultural products and we have noted particularly the tremendous success of the Minister of Agriculture in placing large orders with the republic of China. We have seen the development of our forestry industry. All of these moves have been purposed to stimulate the Canadian economy. All in this parliament, I am sure, like this government, want to stimulate the Canadian economy but not by ultraprotectionism, not by the inflexibility of interest rates, not by isolationism and anti-Americanism.

It is obvious to all of us that the conflict between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada had to do with fiscal policy. Indeed, it has been asked what authority or what business the governor of the Bank of Canada had in going across the nation to weaken the work of a government which has been attempting to stimulate the economy of Canada. His position has been that if it will not be done my way it will not be done at all. This is the reason parliament is being asked today to declare a vacancy in the governorship in the Bank of Canada.

Every effort has been made in this budget to stimulate and aid the automobile industry by reducing the 7½ per cent sales tax. The whole economy will be helped by the decision to lower the rate of exchange on the Canadian dollar as against the United States dollar. This is a decision which would have been opposed by Mr. Coyne.

The Minister of Finance put up with Mr. Coyne as long as he could. He did everything he could to try to avoid a public quarrel with the governor of the Bank of Canada, to try to keep from open conflict which he knew would occur if he asked the governor of the Bank of Canada to resign. However, when this budget was to be introduced with its special accent on the development of the Canadian economy, the minister knew that Mr. Coyne could very well step back on the hustings, as he has been doing in the last few years, to attack the budget and the policies of the government.

In his very small argument on behalf of the governor of the Bank of Canada the Leader of the Opposition raised very few points. First he said there should be an inquiry. An inquiry into what? To illustrate the thing that is most obvious to all Canadians, namely that Mr. Coyne differed very widely from the Minister of Finance? He said the bill should not be brought forward and should not be passed by this house because no reasons are given in the bill for asking that the governorship be made vacant. Well, sufficient reasons have been supplied even up to this time in this debate to show the Leader of the Opposition why this bill should be passed.

Then there is the very weak argument that Mr. Coyne after all is being charged as a criminal and should have the right to come before the courts to defend himself. No one is taking anything from Mr. Coyne that infringes upon his liberty. No one is discriminating against him because of his colour or his creed. How can the bill of rights apply in the matter of a public servant who finds that he cannot agree with the government of the day and who in his arrogance refuses to resign at the request of the representative of the people of Canada?

Another argument the Leader of the Opposition made was that if Mr. Coyne should be fired he should have been fired long ago. Many hon. members might agree that Mr. Coyne should have disappeared from the public scene long ago; that he has done harm to Canada in the speeches he made, in the policies he advocated, particularly when he spoke from a position which would lead the people to think that he spoke for the government of Canada. But the reason put forward by the Minister of Finance I am sure will indicate to every hon. member that he made every attempt possible to prevent a public quarrel with Mr. Coyne, and indeed only asked for his resignation as a last resort, because his removal is necessary to the measures proposed by the budget.

Last Friday, I believe it was, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), in speaking in the budget debate, raised questions with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Coyne, or the request for his resignation. Then he gave the house a list of the names of people who for one reason or another had resigned or retired from the public service and he attempted to argue that these people were fired from their positions; that the government was persecuting people in the public service. He suggested that the men whose names he listed were people who had been ousted from their jobs on government demand. He mentioned Mr. Hector McKinnon, chairman of the tariff board. Mr. McKinnon retired some three years ago at age 70. He certainly retired of his own volition; there was no question of his being asked to leave his post. I might say also that since then Mr. McKinnon has been working for the government and at the moment he is chief negotiator at Geneva where the GATT agreement is under negotiation.

Mention was also made of Mr. Clarence Shepard, the former chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners. Mr. Shepard also left of his own volition to take up an occupation which he felt would be much more profitable. He is now vice president of British American Oil of Toronto.

The hon. member also referred to Mr. George McIvor, chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board. Mr. McIvor retired from the wheat board because of age and for no other reason. He certainly retired of his own volition.

Reference was made to Mr. Davidson Dunton, formerly chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C. It was well known to every member of this house that Mr. Dunton retired from the chairmanship of the board of the C.B.C. only because he much preferred a post he was offered as president of Carleton university.

The hon. member also referred to Mr. Ernest Bushnell, general manager of the C.B.C. who retired some time ago. I am sure that every hon. member, except the hon. member for Leeds, knows full well that Mr. Bushnell left the C.B.C. to set up the private T.V. station CJOH, Ottawa, which is certainly a much more profitable occupation than continuing in his work with the C.B.C.

Mr. L. H. Nicholson, formerly commissioner of the R.C.M.P. was mentioned. He retired from the R.C.M.P. after a difference with the Minister of Justice, as he ought to have done. This was a question on which the commissioner and the minister could not agree. Mr. Nicholson retired because he could not agree with the minister and his department, but he did not attempt to challenge the authority of the minister, the department and of the public of Canada as Mr. Coyne seeks to do.

Mr. Mitchell Sharp, former deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce, also left of his own volition. Mr. William Buchanan of the tariff board left that board to establish himself in Ottawa as a tariff consultant and I am sure he would very much prefer to continue in that work than in his former post. Mr. Alan H. Jarvis, director of the national art gallery, left for reasons quite clear to everyone in the House of Commons. Mr. Charles Gavsie, of the St. Lawrence seaway, left the St. Lawrence seaway to become a partner in a Montreal law firm. Mr. Jean Lessard, of the St. Lawrence seaway, left that post to become chairman of the Quebec hydro.

In all of these cases, which are routine cases, men who were in the public service and who had received valuable training in the public service left to take up work which was more lucrative or which gave them a wider field for their abilities. It is the type of thing that always goes on in the public service and none of these situations are tantamount to the request that was made to Mr. Coyne for his resignation.

As a matter of fact, far from the charge of the member for Leeds that the government is persecuting senior civil servants and public servants, everyone in the house is quite aware of the work that the government has done to restore civil servants to their proper position in the nation. The new Civil Service Act, which will shortly be before the house, is the first legislation in 43 years to improve the position of the civil service and the civil servants of Canada. It sets up negotiation procedures, grievance procedures, appeal procedures and so on which have been requested by the civil service for many a year. Needless to say, their words fell upon deaf ears for many years before 1957.

The Leader of the Opposition said there should be an inquiry. It is rumoured around the house today that this Bank of Canada debate could well take four or five days. Who is this proud man who refuses to accept the invitation of the Minister of Finance to resign? Who is this man who says he will not accept the will of the elected representatives of the people and says he will take his case over our heads to the people of Canada? Who is this prima donna of the Bank of Canada who would tie up this house for four or five days and then ask that in addition an inquiry should be conducted before a standing committee to go into a matter which is already obvious and clear to the Canadian people?

I am sure that there has been no more arrogant man upon the Canadian scene in many years than this man who refuses to resign and insists upon asking parliament to take up its time, when we have so much legislation before us necessary for the stimulation of the Canadian economy, to deal with his case alone. If this debate lasts four days or if it lasts 24 days, I venture to say there will be no member of the House of Commons who will get up and say that he is sorry to see Mr. Coyne go. I venture to say there will be no member of the House of Commons who will arise to say that Mr. Coyne should not have resigned when asked to do by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Peters: Yes, there will be. There is one right here.

An hon. Member: And lots more.

Mr. MacLellan: I am glad to hear that Mr. Coyne has one friend in the House of Commons because up to now there has been very little argument put forward to support him.

Miss LaMarsh: That is not the issue.

Mr. MacLellan: Certainly as far as I am concerned I am prepared to support the bill and I am sure that most members of parliament will be glad to see this post in the Bank of Canada become vacant and a successor to Mr. Coyne appointed. The work of the nation must go on. Who is this man who will hold it up because he refuses to do what any other man would do in the same situation and yield to the constitutional privileges of the Minister of Finance and of the parliament of Canada?

Indeed, it has certainly come as a surprise to me to see so many members of the C.C.F. party rallying to the support of Mr. Coyne, although such support will not go so far, I am sure, as to say that this man should succeed and the people of Canada should fail. It is startling to hear that members of the C.C.F. party, who always pose as the champions of justice in the house, feel that Mr. Coyne after 6½ years in office is entitled to a pension of the type he has provided for himself. It is startling to hear that they are supporting a man whose policy, uttered many times across the nation, is against deficit financing at a time when more work could thereby be provided for people who are unemployed in the nation. It is interesting to hear members of the C.C.F. party rising to support a man who champions high interest rates and inflexibility in exchange rates.

It will be interesting to hear members of the Liberal party, who have always pretended to assume a position against high tariffs, rise to support this man who is the proponent of arbitrary high tariffs. I doubt very much, as I have said, if anyone will be sincerely sorry to see Mr. Coyne go. Indeed, I know that all members of the house agree that when a conflict arises between the government of this nation and the governor of the Bank of Canada, no matter how majestic the governor has made himself he should retire before the will of the people.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the principle involved in the discussion before us is not complicated. No one, I think, will deny its importance. Therefore I am a little surprised that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) should not have been supported today by some of his ministerial colleagues, particularly by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Give him time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can only suspect that the Prime Minister has not taken part in the debate and has not been in the house this afternoon because of preoccupations involving the Prime Minister of Japan. But it is inconceivable that in a matter of this importance the ministerial benches should not have been filled and that evidence should not have been given by the ministry and by the Conservative party as a whole of a deep interest in this matter. Instead, we have had a statement by the Minister of Finance and now one by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan).

I must say I am amazed that a young member of parliament of the quality of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond should have been guilty of some of the statements he made in the course of his speech this afternoon, particularly some of the questions that he put to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). Among those questions were: Why should the Leader of the Opposition plead for the right of the governor of the Bank of Canada to be heard? Why should the Leader of the Opposition urge this house to give to someone who opposed the Minister of Finance the opportunity of replying in another forum to arguments put forward today by the Minister of Finance in the exercise of what the hon. member said were the constitutional prerogatives of the Minister of Finance, whatever they may be?

I say to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond that he cannot have followed clearly what the Leader of the Opposition said. I can only say that the hon. member has not fully understood the meaning of the phrase, rule of law. He has not fully understood what we mean by due process of law. He has not understood the implications in the mischievous bills of attainder of the Tudor period. He has not understood how Hitler dispensed justice by totalitarian methods without giving opportunity of reply to the accused. He has not understood the meaning of the energies and the exploits of Patrick Henry.

The hon. gentleman said, why should this house be put to the inconvenience of a five-day inquiry?

Mr. Pearson: Terrible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the hon. gentleman not understood that justice is something that cannot be confronted with the argument of inconvenience? Would the hon. member not be the first to rise in his place and defend the right of any accused, notwithstanding the inconvenience to which it might put any individual member of the house, whether it be a member of the government, whether it be a member supporting the government or a member in the opposition groups to make a defence of his position? If there is a violation of justice of any kind under our system of law and our form of government no man should be denied the opportunity of having his full day in court. That is the gist of the plea made today by the Leader of the Opposition.

Does the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond not recall the words of the bill of rights which he so strongly supported last year, that bill of rights which provides in section 2, as the Leader of the Opposition reminded us, that no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations?

If the bill of rights is now to guarantee to one charged with a violation of the Criminal Code the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of justice, is the governor of the Bank of Canada, who has not violated our criminal law but who has simply disagreed with the policies of this government, to have less than that which is provided in that guarantee of the bill of rights for one who violates the Criminal Code?

The bill of rights also provides that no law of Canada shall be so construed or applied so as to deprive a person charged with an offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law. The hon. gentleman I am sure in his studies is aware of the common law right of the citizen to be presumed innocent until found guilty, a presumption which, not without some effort, we in the Liberal party last year were able to have incorporated in the bill of rights.

Is this presumption of innocence to be accorded to a criminal, yet denied an important servant of the government of Canada? That is the issue in this particular situation, and it is one to which we have not had the Minister of Finance address himself.

The Minister of Finance comes in with a meagre bill asking this house to declare vacant a post which comes into existence as a result of a decision taken by the directors of the Bank of Canada, subject to the governor in council. These directors act under the authority given them in the Bank of Canada Act, yet we are now asked to declare this post vacant and to accept in substantiation of that plea of the Minister of Finance not the written evidence of the accused as well as the submissions of the prosecutor, but ex parte statements of the Minister of Finance made in the absence of the governor of the Bank of Canada, without giving him the opportunity of putting his side of the case before this house.

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) now seems to express some disagreement with me. I should remind that hon. gentleman, one of the younger members of this house, of his proud boast that one of the reasons he came into this chamber was because he could add his voice to the defence of freedom and our concept of the rule of law. Here is the opportunity for that hon. gentleman, with his whole future before him, to say to the government, I do not agree with what the governor of the Bank of Canada has done, nor with his policies, because I do not believe there can be two sovereignties in our country—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but where a man is charged by one side and not given the opportunity to put his case forward then I must say, on the basis of an appreciation of what is often called ordinary British justice, I am going to fight for the right of that man at least to have his day in court. We are not getting that kind of support from the hon. gentleman. The two hon. gentlemen I have singled out are two young members of the Conservative party, and they should be among the first to join with the Leader of the Opposition in the plea that he has made today.

When I said a moment ago there could not be two sovereignties in this country the Minister of Finance applauded that statement. I should like the minister to know that this is not the first time I have made that statement in this house. I made that statement—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On March 22.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I made that statement on March 22 and I repeat it today. I have always taken the position, as has the Leader of the Opposition, that there is no room in this country for two sovereignties and that where there is a difference between a leading official in the public service and the government of the day there can be no public disagreement unless that disagreement is concurred in by the administration. We in this party have always stood for that principle. We have complained about the position taken publicly by the governor of the Bank of Canada, and no one has taken a stronger position in that regard than I have myself, and I am not afraid to defend that position. That is not what confronts us now.

When we argued that the governor of the Bank of Canada had publicly taken a position different from the government of the day in matters of fiscal policy in areas outside the monetary field, the Minister of Finance at no time indicated in this house, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, until very recently, that there was any disagreement between the governor of the Bank of Canada and himself. We were told this morning for the first time of a situation that eventuated in 1957-58. The Minister of Finance as a result of that admission today stands indicted by his own words. If that was the situation three and a half years ago the government of this country, and particularly the Minister of Finance should have taken the step, but taken it in circumstances that would not have destroyed or weakened the confidence which the Canadian people and people outside in other countries should have in our financial institutions, including the Bank of Canada. That is the situation that confronts us now.

We have asked repeatedly in this house for the right to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada on these statements in areas outside the field of monetary policy, a field in which, under the Bank of Canada Act, he is given the power of formulation and direction. That does not mean, of course, as we have heard repeatedly argued, that the government has not a responsibility in that field as well. We have taken the position, and we reiterate this position, that the government of Canada is responsible for policies laid down by any agency of government in our country. No government, unless it wants to abdicate its functions and abdicate its responsibility, could take any other position. In the field of monetary policy, this has always been done as was pointed out by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) a few moments ago in respect of the position of the Minister of Finance of Canada. That was the position taken by Mr. Charles Dunning when he said:

> A long continuance of a policy that conflicts with the government view becomes impossible.

That was the position taken by Mr. Ilsley when he said:

> The monetary policy which the bank carries out from time to time must be the government's monetary policy.

That was the policy of Mr. Abbott when he said:

> The ultimate responsibility must fall upon the government.

That was the policy of Mr. Harris when he said:

> The government is satisfied ... that ... it was desirable to moderate the rate of monetary expansion.

The Minister of Finance is the only minister of finance who takes a different view. I compare what the minister has said now with what Mr. Rhodes said, in 1934 when the Bank of Canada Act was introduced in this house by the Conservative government, that the government has no authority in the field of monetary policy, because he has forgotten that, as a private member of this house in the banking and commerce committee, the member for Eglinton of that day, now the Minister of Finance, said the minister of finance had a very direct responsibility.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was before 1957-58.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There can be no doubt as to the position of the government in relation to the Bank of Canada in the field of monetary policy. If the governor of the Bank of Canada had at any time formulated a monetary policy which was in disagreement with the views of the government, the course was clear. It was clear it was the duty of the government, in such circumstances, to make that position clear to the governor. From what the present governor has said and from what the former governor has said we know that in such circumstances there would be no alternative but for the governor of the Bank of Canada to resign. But there is no question of such disagreement here in this particular situation between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government on monetary policy. That is not the issue before us.

We learned only a few days ago from the Minister of Finance that it was only on May 30 that the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada profoundly disagreed in those areas outside of the governor's specific legislative authority, namely, in fiscal and financial matters and that there was a disagreement between the governor and himself. He says today that there was disagreement away back in 1957-58. I repeat that was the time for the Minister of Finance to act in accordance with what are erroneously called the constitutional prerogatives of the Minister of Finance.

This question of the responsibility of the government in the matter of monetary policy is important in this discussion. We have had circulated today two letters, one dated June 9 and one dated June 26, signed by the present governor of the Bank of Canada and addressed to the Minister of Finance. I want to comment on these two letters in supporting the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition today, that this whole matter can be satisfactorily disposed of only by full opportunity being given for the full disclosure of all the facts. The Minister of Finance cannot, in all fairness, take the position that he alone is in a position fully, fairly and objectively, to disclose the facts.

We have here before us the letter of the governor of the Bank of Canada of June 9.

I think it is important that some excerpts from this letter be placed on Hansard at this time. In the second paragraph of this letter the governor of the Bank of Canada states:

> On this last point I have expressed the view frequently, and I have no doubt this has been reported to you, that the relationship of the bank to the government should be clarified and the overriding responsibility for monetary policy declared to rest on the government (as it always has done in fact) by appropriate provision in the statute. Lord Cobbold, the governor of the Bank of England, on his last visit here told me, and perhaps you also, that the provisions to that effect in the Bank of England act carried his complete support and did not in his view derogate from the operating independence of the Bank of England or from its status as an entity separate from the government and with a responsibility of its own, although in certain circumstances the governor of the bank might find himself in such fundamental disagreement with government policy as communicated to him that (unlike a civil servant) he would find it necessary to resign, no doubt giving reasons for his resignation and allowing those reasons to become the subject of public information and discussion.

We were not told anything about this by the Minister of Finance. We were not told that the governor had explained to him, as he explains in this letter of June 9, what his position was with regard to resignations in the matter of a disagreement in the context as visualized by Lord Cobbold and by the governor of the bank himself in this letter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That letter I said was received on June 12.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend said there was a letter but he did not tell us what was in that letter.

Mr. Pickersgill: He concealed it from parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not tell us that, any more than he told us what was in the letter of Mr. Bryden about which I am going to have something to say. We have not heard anything of this story yet. If the Minister of Finance wishes to create in the minds of the people of this country the confidence that he should promote as Minister of Finance, he should be the first to assist us in the fullest exposition of all of the dirty circumstances involved in this matter.

I stand here and I fully except the charge made by the Minister of Finance that in the industrial relations committee I had taken issue with the governor of the Bank of Canada and, I learn now for the first time, in such a manner as to warrant the latter's seeking the intervention of the Minister of Finance by way of protection against me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I took issue with the governor of the Bank of Canada; I took serious issue. However, I tell my hon. friend that I took my issue with him in an open manner. I was not afraid to tell the governor of the Bank of Canada what I thought about the policies of the investment committee of the unemployment insurance commission. I therefore stand today with the Leader of the Opposition, not as a protagonist for all that the governor of the Bank of Canada has done. I believe in the desired stability of the Bank of Canada and because I believe in fair play and British justice, I say that the only way in which satisfactorily to conclude this matter is to give the governor of the Bank of Canada an opportunity to answer the Minister of Finance before a responsible committee of this house.

Here is another letter from the governor of the Bank of Canada dated June 26, in which he states this:

> What is at issue here is the right of Canadians to know why I refused to meet the demand of the government.

If it is the right of Canadians to know this, it is also the right of their representatives in parliament; and that is why we want a committee. The governor goes on to state this:

> The terms of Bill 114 make it clear that you, Mr. Fleming, and the government are still not prepared to accept a broad and ultimate responsibility for monetary policy, but merely want to have the power to change the governor at a time when it suits your political purposes to do so.

That is a serious charge. Is it true? That is a charge made by the governor. Let us confront him and find out whether that is the fact.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it is not true, then let us determine that fact in a committee. On that committee will be a majority of members of the Conservative party. They can listen to this charge and they can determine, in their objective manner, whether or not it is true, that the government has acted only for political purposes.

Then the governor goes on to say this:

> The point which I am concerned to bring before public opinion—and which you, Mr. Fleming, and the government are trying to prevent me from bringing before a parliamentary committee—is that the position of governor of Canada's central bank will be destroyed, and the whole institution will become merely an arm of a political machine, if the governor is to be terrorized into resigning whenever the government of the day wants him to, without any issue of policy being raised, without the government stating its monetary policy in parliament or elsewhere, and without the government accepting responsibility for monetary policy.

Those are serious charges. In the face of the bill of rights, in the face of the attack made by the Prime Minister on any violation of the rule of law, are we in this house going to take the position now, in the face of these serious charges, that this house must make its mind up on the mere say-so of a prejudiced Minister of Finance?

Then on page 3 of his letter of June 26 the governor goes on to state this—

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the end of my speech I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In his letter of June 26 the governor goes on to state this:

> On March 20th after telling them of my talk with you, Mr. Fleming, (of March 18) I asked them in open meeting whether any of them felt I should resign. Every one of them said, "No".

I say to the Minister of Finance now that it was a result of his intervention that action was taken by the directors, not in accordance with the terms of section 5 of the Bank of Canada Act but in spite of those terms, that the directors expressed their regret in asking for the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I say that the Minister of Finance had no right to do that. I charge him now, first of all with improper relations with the directors of the bank.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I charge him with exercising unfair duress on the directors of the bank. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but the people of Canada will not laugh when the facts of this matter are properly exposed. Then I ask hon. gentlemen to laugh at this. The governor goes on to point out at page 4:

> You, Mr. Fleming, were told by Mr. Bryden about a possible change in these provisions six months before the directors acted in February, 1960 and you have a letter from Mr. Bryden to prove it, which you persist in concealing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The governor goes on:

> The deputy minister of finance was told by Mr. Bryden about the actual proposed action a week before the directors' meeting at which action was taken and he said he thought the proposed change was reasonable.

I would like to examine the governor on the matter of pension. I would like to examine the board of directors on all the circumstances of this pension. I am told that Mr. Bryden is a close friend of the Minister of Finance. I am told that he was a supporter of the Minister of Finance and a worker in the minister's electoral interests. I am told that Mr. Bryden, after taking the initiative in the meeting of the board of directors, discussed this matter within ten days of that meeting with the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and yet the Minister of Finance told us the other day that he did not know of this except in the month of February last.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, you did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said I first heard of it in the spring of 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I challenge the minister to deny that he was told by Mr. Bryden long before that, not only of the fact but the reasons which prompted him to take the initiative that he did take with regard to this pension about which, as one member of this house, I would like in turn to question the governor and the directors of the bank, to ascertain what are all the facts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member challenging my statement and saying that I heard about this action taken by the board on February 15, 1960—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have made my statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —within ten days of that meeting, or some time before—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say, within ten days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say that statement is utterly false, Mr. Speaker. I repeat what I said earlier, that I first learned of the action taken by the board of directors on February 15, 1960 in the spring of 1961.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is your flag?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me read further what the governor said:

> I believe the public are entitled to have these charges and the true facts reviewed by a parliamentary committee—before I am wrongfully removed from office—and to have all aspects of the matter brought out and considered. I demand that they be reviewed by a parliamentary committee where I can be given a fair opportunity to be heard, and where they can be submitted to the judgment of public opinion. The use of smear tactics, and the attempt to intimidate public servants with the idea that smear tactics will be used against them in public if they do not bow to improper suggestions from the government, should not be allowed to go on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is where the smear lies; you are spreading it.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend means the Bryden matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am referring to what you just read.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me read it again:

> You, Mr. Fleming, were told by Mr. Bryden about a possible change in these provisions six months before the directors acted in February, 1960 and you have a letter from Mr. Bryden to prove it, which you persist in concealing.

There is the statement made by the governor. I am not saying it is true; I am not saying it is untrue; but I am saying it is not at all what the Minister of Finance said.

An hon. Member: You are not saying anything at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is contrary to what the Minister of Finance said, and we are entitled, surely, to ascertain in a matter of such fundamental importance which of the two witnesses, the Minister of Finance or the governor of the Bank of Canada, has made a statement in accordance with the facts. Are we now to be denied again, by one of the partisan witnesses, the Minister of Finance, the opportunity of contesting his statement or having a contrary view put forward by someone who does contest it? That is the issue, pure and simple.

This government has a large majority behind it. Hon. members opposite can pass this bill without any difficulty, if they want to. Tyranny of the majority is something that this government has exercised on other occasions before this particular one—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but that will not settle this matter in the minds of hon. members of this house or in the public mind, because whatever views there may exist in Canada at the present time regarding this regrettable matter, there is one view that one hears all over, and that is that the government has ineptly handled this whole situation and the only way to restore confidence is for the governor of the Bank of Canada to be given an opportunity of saying exactly what he believes the situation to be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are saying it for him now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the final page of this letter we have this statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Here is the governor saying, "Give me my day in court. Put me under the provisions of the bill of rights. Let the rule of law apply to me. Let me not be denied justice. If you give me that right, then I make this statement to you"—and here it is; and what more fair statement could one find? The governor writes:

> If in the end, following such discussion, an honest difference of opinion proved to be unbridgeable, then it would be the duty of the governor to resign and to give the people of Canada a full explanation of the reasons for his resignation.

What could be more reasonable than that? Under the Bank of Canada Act the governor holds office for a period of seven years during good behaviour. The Minister of Finance has not alleged today that any of the circumstances which are put forward in an ex parte manner by him constitute a violation of the meaning of the phrase "good behaviour". Therefore the only way in which the governor can in law be compelled to resign is where there is a difference in policy; where first of all, let us say, in the field of monetary policy the government does not agree with the policy pursued by the governor of the bank.

That situation is not before us. The Minister of Finance says that is clearly not the situation, because under no circumstances does this government in any way accept responsibility for monetary policy, notwithstanding what may have been the position of preceding ministers of finance. Then in the field of public debt, in the field of financial policy, in fiscal matters, the governor has not up until very recently, we were told, expressed any views that embarrass the government or are not in accord with the government of today.

We learned there was disaccord only as a result of the revelations by the Minister of Finance this morning. It was only in the middle of May that there was a conflict in this regard. The minister need not look at me seriously as though he did not understand; he has repeatedly taken the position in this house that there was no dispute between the governor of the Bank of Canada and himself until a few days before we learned that he had asked for the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada, thereby—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is your imagination there.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —leaving open to public conjecture the inevitable suggestion that there were political reasons for the course the government took on May 30. It is significant that on May 29 four by-elections were held in this country and in those four by-elections—

Mr. Churchill: You got licked in three of them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the total vote was overwhelmingly against this government. The government had to look for a scapegoat, and what better scapegoat than the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We always had you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the disgraceful position in which we have been placed. I say this to the Minister of Finance. For this kind of situation to have eventuated on the eve of the presentation of a budget represents, I suggest to him, a most irresponsible course of action. I am not alone in this thinking, because I find that the governor of the Bank of Canada says at page 2 of this letter:

> In the absence of any other real explanation of the government's action it may yet be proved that political intentions were the real purpose of the move to get rid of me.

Is that true? Is that the true situation? Are we not to be given the opportunity of finding out whether there is any basis of fact for this statement which appears in today's letter of the governor of the Bank of Canada?

This matter has concerned the people of Canada. I am sure we are all aware of the public interest in this discussion. We have not had in many months as deep an interest in our affairs as we have had since the presentation of the budget in this situation known as the Coyne-Fleming affair. The result is, whether or not hon. gentlemen agree, all over the country there is disquietude. There is the feeling that this government, composed of men who have had no great business experience, have allowed themselves to get into a position where our financial structure stands in danger and where there is uncertainty whether it may be further endangered as a result of the dispute which has arisen between the head of the central bank and the government of this country. This has never happened before. This has never happened in any country where there is a central bank. It has never happened in the United States; it has never happened in the United Kingdom; it has never happened in any of the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. Churchill: There is only one Coyne, that is why.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is only one Fleming.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The reason this has happened in this country is that we have a government which is prepared to prostitute the interests of the nation in furthering its own political advancement. If that statement is found to be too strong, then the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) and the other ministers who are here have the opportunity to live up to the terms of the bill of rights which they have put on sheepskin, which they have distributed all over this country as a symbol of fundamental freedoms and liberties in Canada. Let us have as a first manifestation of the integrity of that expressed faith an acceptance of the proposal that in a matter of this importance where no protagonistic position is taken by the Liberal opposition, for or against, we should give to the accused an opportunity of stating his side of the case.

The Minister of Finance need not sit there in great smugness. He may be able to show that certain banking institutions and others in this country feel that this matter has, finally, to be resolved. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, undoubtedly this regrettable situation has reached the point where the usefulness of the governor has been impaired. But that position has been brought about by the way in which this matter has been handled by the government and in particular, I regret to say, by the Minister of Finance. I cannot believe that the Minister of Finance having taken the position throughout all these months that there was no disagreement between himself and the governor could have agreed in the dying days of the month of May to take the course he did without the greatest pressure being put on him by his colleagues and perhaps by the Prime Minister. We do know that we had been seeking for weeks to ascertain from the Minister of Finance when he was going to bring down his budget, a budget that had been delayed as no other budget in our history had been delayed. Undoubtedly, there were special reasons. We now perhaps have found what some of those circumstances are in the letter of June 26 circulated today by the governor of the Bank of Canada when apparently in the mind of the minister was a budget of an altogether different type from the one put forward the other day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): It is always most interesting to listen to the hon. member for Essex East. I have found it fascinating from time to time to follow his grandiloquent rhetoric, his rolling inconsistencies, and I have often wondered where he picked up that particular style. I have wondered where, in the background, was his mentor. I came across it the other day in a book which gives an account of a speech by the Hon. A. E. Windheaver some years ago. I should like to quote briefly from this speech in order to show the similarity of style:

> Literary movements grow, fashions change, and people leave the country. But geology is founded upon a rock. The great Liberal party, which I have the honour to represent and which is not responsible for these roads, may some day pass away. But when that day comes, and I say it advisedly, when that day comes, the price of wheat will be down to 20 cents, f.o.b. Fort William, the fodder crops will rot in the fields, and these here roads will be the home of the rearing cactus and the gopher. The Liberal party has always fought against that type of thing. But when that day comes, I want to say that geology will still be geology. We've got the whole north country unexplored and undeveloped. Think of it! Over four million square miles of solid rock. And we are going to use that money to put the agriculture of Saskatchewan on a solid footing.

It is sometimes a useful trick.
May I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All the young members of the Tory party.

Mr. Chambers: I trust the Hansard reporter caught that remark of the hon. member for Essex East, because it is exactly those young members of the Conservative party who are most concerned with the issue facing us tonight.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They should be concerned with human freedom.

Mr. Chambers: The issue is one of responsible government. The question before this parliament today is how we should be governed, whether our policy should be made by those who have been elected by the people of Canada or by officials.

The young members of the Conservative party to whom the hon. member made reference take their stand quite squarely in favour of responsible government, in favour of having the conduct of our affairs in the hands of those who have been chosen by the people of Canada. Under our system, when any issue arises between those who have been elected and chosen by the people to conduct their affairs, and those who have been appointed as officials, then the elected government must prevail.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No doubt about that.

Mr. Chambers: We are really not concerned with what the policy differences are between the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada; what concerns us is the fact that the disagreement exists and, as has now been demonstrated by the public utterances of the governor, those differences are certainly on his side, irreconcilable. We have evidence now in the public press, in the frequent publicity hand-outs of the governor—

Mr. Brunsden: Twenty five pages.

Mr. Chambers: —of the type of difficulty that the Minister of Finance has been faced with over the last four years. The only comment I can make on that is one of amazement at the extraordinary patience of the Minister of Finance in the face of such an attitude.

This afternoon the hon. member for Essex East made much of the bill of rights. The bill of rights is a most important enactment. The right we are concerned with here is that of the people to be governed and to have their policies formulated by people of their own choice.

Let us consider for a moment what the Leader of the Opposition would do were he faced with a similar situation, and we have some evidence in that regard because at a press conference on television the other day he was asked a question and his reply was as follows:

It never need have arisen—

He was referring to the controversy. He went on:

—and when it did arise between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, surely that is where and when the Prime Minister of this country should have stepped in, taken his responsibility and settled this matter.

He was then asked this question:

And ask for Mr. Coyne's resignation?

This is his answer:

And settled this matter in a way which would not have resulted in public controversy and it could have been done, I am sure.

Today this same hon. gentleman rises in this house and says that this whole matter should be debated before a committee of the house. Here surely is a way to avoid public controversy; here surely is a way to maintain the integrity and dignity of the Bank of Canada, which are so important to our reputation both nationally and internationally. In effect, what the Leader of the Opposition has said is that the government should have tried to arrange for the governor of the Bank of Canada to go quietly. This is exactly what the Minister of Finance did, Mr. Speaker.

Over the years the Minister of Finance withstood the embarrassment that was created for him by the public utterances of the governor.

Mr. Pickersgill: For him, yes.

Mr. Chambers: The minister defended him in the house. He has tried in every way to reach an understanding whereby the governor of the Bank of Canada would see his duty. When the time came that it became evident beyond all question that it was impossible to instruct the governor in his duties, he then tried to give the governor a way of gracefully withdrawing without any public controversy, as the Leader of the Opposition has recommended. The governor would then have had the choice of keeping his peace or as a citizen making whatever statements he felt should be made on the public platform because every citizen has that right except those whose duty it is to co-operate with the government in the fulfilling of the policies that the government lays down.

Instead of accepting the offer that the Minister of Finance made, what has happened? The governor embarked on an open attack on the Minister of Finance and the government. Using all the resources of political publicity, using all the resources of the bank, which were not designed for such a purpose, he attempted to muster public opinion behind his views and to cast discredit on the views of the Minister of Finance and the government.

Hon. members in the opposition say that the governor must be heard. Be heard. We have heard nothing else in the last few weeks. The noise of the governor is deafening. How has he been heard? He has been heard in a political attack on the government of the day on questions many of which are not in the realm of the responsibilities of the Bank of Canada. This is political action, Mr. Speaker, and I for one would welcome the governor of the bank on the political battlefield when he so arranges his affairs that he is eligible to take up that position. So far he has not. He even goes so far in his latest communiqué as to speak of elections.

Everyone in Canada has the right to discuss politics and elections but in the case of a public official he must first resign. This is the long tradition that has been observed in this country and in those other countries whose traditions we share. Many times a public servant has found himself in such disagreement with the government that he feels he can no longer carry on. The honourable course has been known for years. He must first resign and then make his views known. This was the course that the governor rejected.

It is suggested, according to the amendment, that we should place this whole matter before a committee of the house, and it is interesting, it seems to me, to speculate on why members of the opposition would like to follow this course. They would like to follow it because they want to see before that committee a debate on policy between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada. They themselves have not the desire or the courages—or whatever it may be—to espouse the policies of the governor but they think the enuciation of these policies before a committee might damage the Minister of Finance, and that is what they want. The fact that it would also damage the Bank of Canada, damage our public credit at home and abroad, means nothing to them. Not at all. Let us have the circus. Never mind what happens to Canada's position in the world. Let us have the circus. Let us see if we can damage the Minister of Finance. This kind of thing would be unprecedented.

It has been forecast that there will be a royal commission that will investigate this whole area of our public affairs. It is not possible to forecast what witnesses such a commission would call but it is perfectly conceivable that the governor of the Bank of Canada, having resigned and having recaptured his right to public comment, could ask to appear before that commission. Our concern, Mr. Speaker, is to get over this unfortunate matter with the least damage to the Bank of Canada and to the credit of Canada as a whole.

The forum for debate of fiscal and monetary policies is here in this house and the people who are chosen by the electors of Canada to conduct that debate are here in this house. For our side they are the Minister of Finance, his colleagues and those who sit behind him, and for the side of the opposition similarly it is those who have been elected for that purpose. Here is where the debate should take place between those who represent varying degrees of opinion in the country, not in a debate between elected representatives and public officials.

I mentioned a few moments ago that the governor had taken a most extraordinary course. Instead of resigning, as tradition demanded, and then making his views known, instead of accepting the offer of the Minister of Finance to let him conform to our traditions with dignity and resign, he chose the one way that is forbidden to public officials. He chose political action. I must say that he has been a keen student of political action, and I wonder whether possibly some member who sits across the floor has found himself in a position to advise him on tactics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: It sounds like it.

Mr. Benidickson: Let us have a committee and find that out too.

Mr. Chambers: No doubt as opportunity arises those hon. gentlemen who are friendly with the governor will be in a position to deny this. But certainly he showed great tactical skill in the release of the letters at a time when the minister was in the house and had no opportunity to prepare a reply, the release today of a letter dated June 26 which was delivered, I understand, to the office of the Minister of Finance over in the Confederation building when he was here, but somehow was also—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One hour after it was given to the press.

Mr. Chambers: One hour after it was given to the press, and not only here but somehow also at about the same time it was delivered to newspaper offices at least in Montreal and I suspect in the rest of the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Through local Bank of Canada offices.

Mr. Chambers: I was able to get a copy of this letter by telephoning the public relations department of the Bank of Canada. They informed me that copies were available.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister had it just as fast as we had it in the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I got it one hour after it was released to the press. Did you get that?

Mr. McIlraith: He is just copying the minister's technique.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chambers: There has been some question whether in fact a sufficient degree of disagreement existed between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government that he should resign. There is another factor which, as far as I know, has not been considered. I refer to section 16 of the Bank of Canada Act which reads as follows:

> Every director, officer, clerk and employee of the banks shall before entering upon his duties take before a justice of the peace or a commissioner for taking affidavits, an oath of fidelity and secrecy in the form prescribed in schedule A.

The first part of schedule A can be summarized by saying that it is the oath to faithfully fulfil the duties, but the second part I should like to quote as follows:

> I further solemnly swear that I will not communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information relating to the affairs of the bank, nor will I allow any such person to inspect or have access to any books or documents belonging to or in the possession of the bank and relating to the business of the bank.

Mr. Speaker, apart from whatever else may be said, it is my contention that the governor of the Bank of Canada is in violation of that oath. Such being the case, this is not the time for prolonging a controversy, as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, and I agree with him. This is not the time for dragging out things which will do further damage to the bank and the country. This governor should stand not upon the order of his going, but go at once.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Brunsden: I am directing a question to you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. Brunsden: I should like to ask the hon. member whether or not the very voluminous documents that have come from Mr. Coyne's office, not only to us but to all parts of Canada, have been paid for by himself or by the government of Canada?

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot go any further than to say the documents I have obtained today were obtained from the public relations department of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, there was one observation made by my friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) with which I profoundly agree and which goes to the very basis of this debate today. My hon. friend said that there could not be two sovereignties in this country. He was absolutely right. It is perfectly obvious, sir, that—

Mr. Benidickson: Heads will roll.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is perfectly obvious, sir, that there is only one sovereignty in this country and that is this parliament. There has not been one jot or tittle of evidence produced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) or by either of the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken for him to suggest that the governor of the Bank of Canada in anything that he did at any time sought to usurp the power of the government.

Mr. Drysdale: Where have you been, Jack?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have paid as much attention to this matter as anyone has. There is abundant evidence that this government, which is the servant of this house, has usurped the rights of parliament. The minister beat his breast over and over again disclaiming the responsibility which was his and which Mr. Coyne has urged him to assume.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, he did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: As my friend the hon. member for Essex East pointed out this afternoon, the minister has dodged and shirked his responsibility and when he got in a jam he got orders from the east block—from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—to get rid of Coyne. The minister then went behind the back of this parliament—he sneaked behind the back of this parliament—in an attempt to get the governor to leave, as he says, with dignity and as quietly as possible.

The minister himself has told us that the governor was responsible to parliament, not to the government, yet the minister seeks to undermine parliament by taking away the rights of parliament, assuming them for himself, in seeking to make a secret deal, conniving to make a deal with Mr. Coyne about which, if Mr. Coyne had complied, this parliament would never have known of. That is the kind of thing that has been happening. If Mr. Coyne had been as gutless as the Minister of Finance showed himself to be by his speech this afternoon when he talked about not having had the courage to take this step for four years, he might have succeeded and Mr. Coyne would then have supinely gone his way. He did not because, whatever else you can say about Mr. Coyne, you cannot say that he has not got courage.

An hon. Member: He certainly has got gall.

Mr. Pickersgill: No one can say that he has not got a high sense of his responsibility to this parliament. I say that the Minister of Finance confessed the other day that he tried to usurp the rights of parliament by putting himself in the place of parliament. That is what he tried to do. This is all the more extraordinary when one recalls some of the things that have been said by the Minister of Finance in the past. I intend to recall only one of them, because it is very relevant. The Minister of Finance in 1955—

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: In 1955 the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Stormont is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has endeavoured to mislead the house in that he said there was not one jot or tittle of evidence that Mr. Coyne endeavoured to usurp the prerogatives of this house. I contend that he has usurped the prerogatives of this house because, as the Leader of the Opposition stated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. The hon. member, as he has indicated himself, is presenting a contention, not raising a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was about to recall to this house, and perhaps to the hon. members who have been more recently elected, one of many statements in respect to the rights of parliament made by the present Minister of Finance in the year 1955 when that hon. member professed to have some concern for the rights of parliament, which he has certainly not demonstrated since the day he took his seat on the treasury benches. Not even excepting his leader, no other member on the treasury benches has shown uniformly the contempt for parliament and for the members of parliament, or for the opposition, that the hon. gentleman has shown throughout his term there. In those days when he was over here showing contempt for the Speaker and the Chair, which was his main line when he was over here—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is more foolishness.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, you just don't like it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is just more foolishness.

Mr. Pickersgill: You do not want to hear what the minister said as a private member, but I think it ought to be on the record. The minister quoted these words:

> "Parliament is the grand inquest which has the right to inquire into anything and everything."
> Those were the words of a man who spent a great deal of his life holding ministerial power in Canada; those were words uttered in 1861 by Sir John A. Macdonald. In those days parliament was a grand inquest with the right to inquire into everything and anything, but it is not today, when we see secrecy imposed by the government, and hon. members of this house in the discharge of their solemn obligations to the constituents who elected them denied information they ought to have.

If ever any minister was convicted out of his own mouth, the minister convicts himself in respect to this bill by those words which he uttered in this house some years ago, because he denied on a pretext of secrecy the answers to questions asked by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan). He denied Mr. Bryden's letter in getting these—well, sir, I will not go into that. We have not got Mr. Bryden's letter but we now know what was contained in it and why it was denied to this house.

His leader, the Prime Minister, had the effrontery, on the very day he asked his followers to vote to suppress that information here in this house, to go on the air and say that the case of the governor of the Bank of Canada was now out in the open where it could be thoroughly discussed and assessed in the light of the facts. That is what the Prime Minister told the people of Canada on television. That statement is patently false. The Prime Minister made it false that very day in this house by denying the information to us. He has joined or indeed led his government into suppressing this information which parliament is entitled to have if it is the grand inquest the minister said it was and which it ought to be. This is the most extraordinary procedure. Of course, it is characteristic of that careless use of language found in every reference the Prime Minister made to Mr. Coyne, including describing him as a civil servant. If the Prime Minister does not know better, he ought to do so. If he does know better, he was trying to mislead the people. Hon. gentlemen can have it either way. It does not seem to me to make much difference which view you take of it, it is not very creditable to the Prime Minister of this country. Nor is it very creditable to the Prime Minister of this country who allowed, according to the Minister of Finance, this situation to persist for four years while doing nothing about it, and who apparently made not the slightest effort to compose this difference, and who then seeks to exacerbate it by going on the air and making statements that are not in accord with the facts which were established in this house on the very same day.

As hon. members know, I have had some association in the past with real prime ministers who attended to the administration of the country and did not merely conduct a constant political campaign. We have had a continuous election campaign in this country since the spring of 1957, and the Prime Minister has never had time, in the midst of this election campaign, to give any attention to the government of this country. That is one of the principal reasons this country is in the shocking mess it is in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: When hon. gentlemen realized that in 1961 the public at last had twigged to the fact that they were responsible for the mess, after they had blamed the Liberals in 1958, they had blamed the Americans in 1959, and then in 1960 they had a recovery; and we know what happened to that recovery. We remember the minister's boast about a balanced budget and the unemployment going with the snow. That is a fair indication of the kind of leadership we have had from this minister. When he found himself so hopelessly wrong in 1961 he says, "I have got to have a victim; I have got to take attention away from myself". Maybe he said it or maybe it was the Prime Minister who ordered him to do it. I suspect the latter. It is an extraordinary thing, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out earlier today, that there seems to have been an amazing consonance of view, not dissonance, between the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance right up to a date as late as the minister's speech in January, 1961, in Brantford and which the governor might equally well have made. This sudden conversion, this turning of Saul into Paul that happened some time in the spring,—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: —this great light that suddenly came upon this former pagan, this conversion to expansion, the expansion that only a few months ago he was decrying, was worrying about, as I say, was an extraordinary change indeed. But, oh, no; the governor must go and he must go quietly in order to preserve the dignity of the Bank of Canada and to conceal the facts from the people of Canada and the parliament of Canada. What instrument do they use to do it when the governor refuses to resign? Do they come here in parliament and make their case? Do they allow us to perform our functions as an opposition? Do they allow this parliament to be sovereign? No, Mr. Speaker. They say, "We have a huge and servile majority; we will put a bill through this house to take away the rights of this man without letting him be heard".

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what you are doing. It is precisely what you are doing.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He is in the headlines every day.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Carleton who, I believe, is a member of the bar, is now suggesting to us that if a man makes a statement in public outside the courts, he is to be denied his right to access to the courts. If that is the new doctrine of the bill of rights, it is not a doctrine that any Liberal could espouse, but it is perhaps what one would expect from the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman indicate to the house whether he has been in communication with Mr. Coyne since the first of June?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am making a speech. I realize, of course, how effective the interruption will be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman allowed me to ask the question; apparently he does not wish to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: If there is an answer, I would be unable to hear it.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a very well known fact that I have known Mr. Coyne for 30 years and that he is one of my personal friends. I live in a free country and of course I have not denied myself communication with my friends, even under this Tory despotism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: If hon. gentlemen maintain a gestapo so far as public servants are concerned in this country, they can boast about it in this company.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The bubble is pricked now; now we know.

Mr. Benidickson: Any member of parliament can phone him. I have not done so, but I have known him equally long.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to say something I had not intended to say in this house. It is also known, I think, to a few hon. members that I had a brother who was beaten to death by the nazis in a concentration camp at Buchenwald; and no one will ever make me vote for legislation to condemn a man without a hearing.

Mr. Jones: Why did you not say that when you threw Bob Pitt out of a job without a hearing? I refer to Bob Pitt of Winnipeg and Saskatoon. What hypocrisy it is to make such a statement now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Saskatoon forgets that the floor is now held by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Those who wish to speak will have an opportunity of doing so only if they allow one member to continue at a time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that this was a bill of attainder. I said that this was a procedure which was now unknown to our practice, and which is forbidden by the constitution of the United States, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this afternoon. I should like to read to you, Mr. Speaker, because it is so apt, the description of a bill of attainder found in the encyclopedia Britannica, the 1959 edition. I hope hon. members opposite will listen very carefully to the language of it. It is as follows:

> First passed in 1459, such bills were employed, more particularly during the reigns of the Tudor kings, as a species of extrajudicial procedure, for the direct punishment of political offences. Dispensing with the ordinary judicial forms and precedents, they took away from the accused whatever advantages he might have gained in the courts of law; such evidence only was admitted as might be necessary to secure conviction; indeed, in many cases bills of attainder were passed without any evidence being produced at all.

As is the case here.

> In the reign of Henry VIII they were much used, through a subservient parliament, to punish those who had incurred the king's displeasure; many distinguished victims who could not have been charged with any offence under the existing laws being by this means disposed of.

That, sir, is very simply what the government is asking us to do in this case.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rot.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the reason why the Leader of the Opposition made the amendment he did to provide an opportunity to Mr. Coyne, who needs no defence from anyone else, who is perfectly capable of defending himself if this parliament will allow him to do so. If there is enough freedom left in this house to allow him to do so, if there is enough sense of justice in this house left to allow him to do so, he will need no defence from any of us nor should he get any. He should be allowed to defend himself and to explain himself. Why? Because he is one of that very limited group of persons who, under the statutes of this parliament, apart from the judges, are appointed during good behaviour. What does that historic phrase mean? It seems that many hon. gentlemen opposite have lost the sense of it. It means the government, the executive, must not in any way seek to remove those people except by showing cause, and doing so openly in this parliament, not secretly behind closed doors. That is what it means.

What the minister did on May 30 in his office was done behind closed doors, when he asked Mr. Coyne to go quietly so that his family would not suffer and so that the dignity of his office would not suffer, and so the government would not be embarrassed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I said nothing about the family at any time. That is a red herring that has been brought into this matter by the hon. member. Never was a word said about the family.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it was certainly behind closed doors; it was certainly done in secret and parliament was not intended to know anything about it except the fact that Mr. Coyne had quietly resigned and gone away, so parliament would never know what design the government had after they got rid of him.

As my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this morning, it is exactly equivalent to asking us to pass a bill to remove the chairman of the civil service commission because, say, the Minister of Finance does not like the colour of his eyes, to put someone else there who will give the jobs to the hon. gentleman's friends. That is exactly the same thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course it is.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: The chairman of the civil service commission is appointed during good behaviour. It is fortunate that statute contains an additional provision that there must be an address of both houses. The Bank of Canada Act does not, but there is no doubt the intention was the same in both. The same is true about the president of the C.B.C. This government tried to have him appointed during pleasure and we did our best to have an amendment passed in this house to include good behaviour. Our amendment was refused.

However, hon. ladies and gentlemen in the other place, having more respect than was shown by the majority here for the rights of the people and for the non-partisan character that the broadcasting service must necessarily have, amended that legislation. This government reluctantly accepted that amendment in 1958 in order to give a measure of independence of partisan control to broadcasting.

Parliament decided that civil servants should be above partisan control, and parliament decided that the electoral system should be above partisan control, and parliament decided that the Auditor General should be above partisan control. There is no difference between this bill and bringing in a bill to remove the Auditor General and declare his office vacant without any cause given. Perhaps if that were done hon. gentlemen could appoint someone who would not look into the hospital grants, for example, and who would be more complacent with regard to some of the activities that some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to find so interesting in these times.

I say that the provision that these offices that parliament said were to be held during good behaviour, whose incumbents were to be removed only for cause, cause shown in open assembly and in open court and with the right of discussion, was made for a reason.

That was done to prevent what the Prime Minister spoke about on June 4, 1955, in the days when the Prime Minister was still interested in these things; those days seem to have vanished:

> ...there has been no suggestion on the part of the government that it intends to deviate one whit from the trend that apparently is to be followed, of establishing for ministers of the crown and this government an absolutism.

That is what they are seeking to do by this bill so far as the Bank of Canada is concerned. If they can get rid of Mr. Coyne without giving any reasons; if they can use the tyranny of a majority to clear him out, to get that block out of the way, as the Prime Minister so felicitously put it—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When did the majority become a tyranny? Is that a new thesis in this country?

Mr. Pickersgill: I commend to the hon. gentleman the pipe line debate. He seems to have forgotten that we heard a lot about the rights of the minority from some hon. gentlemen opposite in those days. That has all been forgotten now.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all: you are still speaking, we were not allowed to speak then.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have not quite dared to expel the opposition from this house. This is a man that a previous parliament decided could only be removed by cause, whom they do not allow to say a word in his own defence in the only place where he could be cross-examined. This is just one more step in that direction.

Why did previous parliaments decide that the governor and the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada should be appointed during good behaviour and should be removable only for cause? The answer is very obvious. It was given by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. It is because in no free country, with a constitutional government, would a partisan executive be given the uncontrolled right to start the printing presses. The most ancient of all our rights is the right of the elected representatives of the people to decide what the taxes will be. There is no taxation that is so unfair, so insidious or so inexorable as inflation and there is no doubt whatsoever that this block that Mr. Coyne was, according to the Prime Minister, was a block to that uncontrolled right. First they got a collection of Tory hacks as members of the board of directors. They did not dare to act against Mr. Coyne—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame on you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not a bit ashamed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You should be.

Mr. Pickersgill: One of them was a defeated Tory candidate and has been running around here ever since.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is what the hon. gentleman will be after the next election.

Mr. Pickersgill: They had to get them first, and they had to wait for four years. After waiting four years, these men yielded to the crack of the minister's whip and did what they were told to do; they passed the resolution he dictated to them—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Improperly.

Mr. Pickersgill: —improperly—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that was dictated by the Minister of Finance behind the back of parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is utterly untrue. That is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, you will not let us go to a committee where we can find out whether or not it is true.

Mr. Benidickson: You are the accused now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let us see these directors and ask them questions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: The only person who has any voice in this parliament is the accuser.

Mr. Pearson: Keep them out of Ottawa.

Mr. Fulton: You could telephone one of them. You telephoned Mr. Coyne.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Telephone Jim again.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is this alleged dispute about? What is this supposed adequate reason on the minister's say-so, without any evidence, without any supporting documents, without any chance for us, the representatives of the people, the sovereign people, to examine Mr. Coyne or to examine the directors? We have to take the word of this omnipotent little minister, this omnipotent little creature of parliament who sets himself up above parliament and says, "You must do what we say". If they get away with this—

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member sounds like eviscerated poultry right now.

Mr. Pickersgill: If they get away with this in the case of Mr. Coyne, it does not matter who they appoint; it does not matter how eminent he is; the new governor is going to know they have done it once—and that, of course, is the way of dictators; you do it once and then it is a lot easier to do it the next time—and he is going to hesitate a long time before he fails to do whatever he is ordered to do by the Minister of Finance or the successor of the Minister of Finance.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, as I said the other evening, that the Minister of Finance himself is not going to survive this debate very long. He has made a mess of this business and the Prime Minister will not forget it.

An hon. Member: We will see.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say—

Mr. Benidickson: If he does not resign, he will be fired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that the fundamental reason why this matter is so important is not Mr. Coyne at all; it is the office of governor; it is the necessary independence in that office to protect the value of our money. I predict that if this government gets away with this measure; if they can appoint their stooge as governor—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame on you.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that within six months the Canadian dollar will look like that, and in a year it will look like that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a mischievous, false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: What these ministers are confronted with is an impossible deficit. They have not got the courage to deal with it in a proper fashion and they want some subservient person in that office to start the printing presses. That is what they want. That is the real danger to the people of this country. That is why parliament provided that the governor could only be removed for cause given in open court, and that is why it is the duty of the governor even if he has only a suspicion of the motives of the government, to do what Mr. Coyne has done.

I would like to quote in this connection some of the evidence given by Mr. Graham Towers before the committee on banking and commerce in 1954 as reported in the proceedings of the committee for that year. I think it was on March 16. This is very relevant to what we are discussing, and nothing could be more important to the people, than this question of the money supply in this country and effective parliamentary control over it. Mr. Towers said:

> The situation is that parliament has placed squarely on the shoulders of the directors and management of the Bank of Canada the responsibility for monetary policy. It would be of no use for us to come before a committee of this kind and say in respect to certain actions which were criticized, we did not like that, but the government wanted us to do it. The proper question would be: in what act has parliament said that you should do something in the field of monetary policy in which you do not believe? Therefore, we must and do take full responsibility for everything which we have done. Now, I think myself that the Bank of Canada Act is in this respect a very good act, and better than most, because it is clear. There is no alibi possible for the central bank.

This is the really important part, and it is something the minister does not seem ever to have understood:

> On the other hand, there is no alibi possible for the government, because if government said: well, we disagreed with what the central bank did, but parliament has placed the responsibility on them, so what could we do? The answer obviously is that the administration of the day, supported by a majority in parliament, can always alter the legislation.

But not decapitate the governor—alter the legislation. Mr. Towers went on to say:

> In fact, I doubt whether a disagreement would ever necessitate such a thing, because there are various ways and means by which directors and management can be got rid of.

Mr. Towers spoke, perhaps, better than he knew.

> I am sure that in the case of a serious disagreement that is what would take place. There is a long history behind this thing in central banking—and I assure you I won't take up much more of the committee's time—but in the days when kings and princes ruled the roost, they had rather a nasty habit of debasing the coinage when they got into a fix, and even later on parliamentary governments sometimes did the same thing, in the modern sense of inflation. Therefore, it is interesting to notice that in all the many countries of the world—I think it is 60 or more which have central banks—they have always been set up not as a department of government but as separate institutions. In many cases, they have been nationalized, but they have been left as separate structures with the idea that then there are certain checks in respect to the possibility of doing that insidious thing which not one person in a million understands, debasing the currency. In some cases, of course, the independence, while intended to be encouraging to the public, is a pure façade. Obviously that is so in a totalitarian state. But even in some other places in recent years there have been governments—we have had them in sister countries of the commonwealth—which felt that they could not bear the thought that even for a day someone should frustrate or delay the policy of the administration of the day. So on top of the façade which, so far as the public is concerned was supposed to convey an idea of check and balance and independence, they would write in a clause saying the policy of the central bank shall be that dictated by the Minister of Finance from time to time. Myself, I think that that is a sort of mongrel arrangement, and the central bank should be either a pure department of government and known to the public as such, or it should have independent responsibility.

I am not sure Mr. Towers would say that today. We do know that Mr. Coyne does not say that. We do know that Mr. Coyne says the Bank of Canada should be in the same position as the Bank of England; that the Minister of Finance may in writing impose the views of the government, and if he does that and the governor disagrees and they cannot reconcile their differences, then the governor should resign. That is what Mr. Coyne has said. That is right. That is proper.

But Mr. Coyne should not resign, and no governor should be expected to resign, merely because the minister does not like the colour of his hair or the amount of his pension or even some speech he has made. If Mr. Coyne had persisted in making speeches after the minister had said he should not make them that would have been another matter. The minister would have had a real cause and he could have come into the house and made his case, but he never protested at all. Instead, he came here and beat his breast and talked about freedom of speech and asked: would you deny freedom of speech to the governor of the Bank of Canada? That is what he said very recently. I could look it up if I had a little more time; it is familiar to all of us.

The plain fact of the matter is that there has not been the slightest evidence produced that the governor of the Bank of Canada by any act, as opposed, perhaps, to some words which the minister did not like, has been in conflict with the present administration. The minister may not have liked some of those words because they were embarrassing to the government inasmuch as they indicated that the government should be doing certain things which they were not doing. Apart from that, there is nothing, except for some mysterious thing in 1957. Either that incident in 1957 was important or it was not. If it was important, an issue should have been made of it then in parliament and Mr. Coyne should have been removed then. If it was not, does anybody in parliament, knowing the Minister of Finance as we all know him, think that if there was any incident more recent than that of 1957 he would have had to go back to 1957?

The plain fact is that any policy the bank has been asked to carry out, it has carried out. We know that, because we know that otherwise we would have heard a howl from the minister long ago. That is why the hon. gentleman would not answer the questions of my hon. friend from Welland. It is because he would have had to say "no" to both of those questions, and his whole case for the dismissal of the governor would have fallen completely to the ground if he had given a truthful answer to those questions. That is why the minister hid behind a pretence of secrecy.

As to this business of secrecy, it is perfectly true that in the ordinary operation there should be secrecy. The governor of the bank respected that to the letter until the minister fired him, or tried to. He then felt he had a duty to this parliament and to the people of Canada whose servant he was—not the servant of the government, not the servant of the minister, but the servant of parliament and the people of Canada. He felt it was his duty whatever happened to him to tell us that something was wrong and to give us a chance to find out. That is the issue. If there is something wrong with the governor, surely the government would be delighted to produce the evidence, delighted to give him a hearing and show he is wrong. Why is the government so scared? Why is the government so frightened?

Why do they not want this inquiry? The fact of the matter is that there is nothing substantial to inquire into. As a matter of fact they want a scapegoat for the past and—what I suspect is a great deal more serious—they want a compliant tool in the office of the governor of the Bank of Canada to deal with their deficits for the future.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): First, I wish to express the views of most of the members of this house in offering heartfelt congratulations to the Minister of Finance for the magnificent manner in which he has handled this whole Coyne affair. How he could have exercised the patience he has displayed, how he has had the wisdom that he has displayed, how he could have kept his dignity and decorum in the face of such constant insults and slights over a long period is beyond the understanding of most of the members of this house. Certainly he is a long suffering man and a man of very great mercy. If sympathy and kindness did not dominate his nature we could not have had a situation where a person who had become almost an anarchist would have been treated with such sympathy and understanding.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is tonight in a semi-hysterical state of mind, and I do not blame him for that. He has been under great strain and stress. We did not realize it; for not only is he conducting the business of the house, taking the place in parliament of the Leader of the Opposition, but at the same time he has been the confidential adviser of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I have a question of privilege here. I would simply say that that libel answers itself.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has admitted that he has been in constant touch with the governor, Mr. Speaker. I ask him to deny it; if he has not been in touch with the governor of the Bank of Canada. I will withdraw my remarks if he has not. Has he, or has he not?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said I had been in touch with him as a friend.

Mr. Walker: Well, out of his own mouth—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would at least allow me to finish. I said I had been in touch with him as a friend of many, many years. I saw no reason, simply because of this action, to alter that friendship in any way whatsoever, nor do I think it is necessary to do so in a free country.

Mr. Walker: May I ask another question of the hon. member, since he is so willing to rise and answer these questions. These letters, reams of which I have been reading today, have a strange familiarity. I ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate this question. Did he not assist the governor of the Bank of Canada in the drafting of them, including the one of today?

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer to that question is no.

Mr. Walker: The answer is no; all right, I have to accept the hon. member's answer in that regard.

The fact is that on the admission of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate we have a governor who has been aloof from political turmoil and the member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been in touch with him. I can only assume that the governor of the Bank of Canada has been accepting the advice of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Some hon. Members: Order. Shame.

Mr. Walker: I think it is a shame also; it is a crying shame that all these actions are not the actions of the person who we thought was a quiet, dignified banker but are the actions of the semi-hysterical member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Therefore, for the first time in this whole debate I have a certain sympathy for the governor of the bank who no doubt has been tremendously misguided.

May I ask this question. Is it not a fact that over the week end Her Majesty's loyal opposition have been in touch with the governor of the Bank of Canada—

Mr. Regier: Shame.

Mr. Walker: —in an effort to have him resign now so that they will not have to vote on second reading of this bill? Is it not a fact that as late as last night the governor of the bank refused to resign?

Mr. Regier: I never knew how low one could sink.

Mr. Walker: Just a moment; out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, and the hon. member for—

Mr. Regier: I have been here longer than the minister and I will be here longer as well.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Walker: The hon. member has almost reached the summit of his career here and it will soon be over. When the vote is called —and I undersand the opposition is going to keep up this interminable delay for four days —I suggest that the official opposition to a man and to a woman will vote in favour of the governor of the Bank of Canada being discharged. There is no doubt about it; I challenge them to deny it.

We have a suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition today, the only one of which I have to take cognizance, that the governor of the Bank of Canada should have another "go" at this thing in a parliamentary committee. Here is a man who has explained his position in reams of well-written letters in the Pickersgillian style. Here is a man who has called press conferences at midnight, at any other hour of the day or night, either in Quebec or Ottawa, under some expert political coaching. He has given fabulous interviews. Here is a man who, as time creeps inevitably onward to bring to an end his meteoric career, kicks out in all directions. Here is a man who has appeared before a Senate committee to be cross-examined by members of the other place who have no interest in being re-elected, to be cross-examined by members of the political faith of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. After cross-examining him on all the speeches he has made up and down the country for a couple of years, what did they discover? They found out that he has no solution, no panacea, no facts, nothing to settle the problems which he himself has brought on. And yet, after that Senate committee hearing, it is now suggested by the Leader of the Opposition that this man, who is acting more like an anarchist than a governor of a bank, should be called before a committee of the House of Commons. Would I not like to have the opportunity of acting as counsel in that committee, of cross-examining him.

But why exacerbate the self-inflicted wounds of that poor man? I feel sorry for him for the first time because I know he has been misguided. But to bring him before a parliamentary committee at this time would be to create greater shame and greater degradation than have already taken place. And to what avail? What is there that can be brought out that was not brought out in the Senate committee? What is there that can be brought out now that we have the confidential letters which were put in the hands of the press before they reached parliament? What is there that can be said in this whole shameful story that has not been said already over and over again?

I think it is to the eternal credit of the Minister of Finance, who could have really seen himself vindicated in a superlative degree by having this man appear before a parliamentary committee, that he has not seen fit to agree that this be done. Under all the circumstances it is a great pity that a man who held the rank of the governor of the Bank of Canada, whom we liked as a person and as a personality, should have been so badly advised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and others that he has set himself up on Mount Olympus superior to the government of Canada, and because this government represents an overwhelming majority of the people of Canada, in conflict with the people of Canada themselves.

I am not going to say very much about the increase in the pension from $12,000 to $25,000. Whether the increase was negotiated with the advice of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I do not know. But I can say this. From the time the governor of the Bank of Canada believed that even though he retired at the end of his term in December of this year he could feel secure with a pension of $25,000 a year with the hope of living another 30 years at a cost to the taxpayers of this country of three quarters of a million dollars, it is a fact, whether or not he was advised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in this connection, that from the time he got that increased pension he became bolder and bolder and bolder. He took issue from the Atlantic to the Pacific with whatever the government of Canada was doing, whether it was in the domain of banking or whether it was not. He invited, he urged that he should be fired. He urged that a year ago by his statements, and if I had been the minister of finance—and it is a good thing I was not—he would have been fired long ago and not on such terms as have happened under all the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: I say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, whom I like personally but who is overwrought, distracted and somewhat hysterical, that when he comes back to his normal thinking ways after the summer holidays he will be very much ashamed of the scene he made in the house tonight. He will be terribly ashamed. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) at least had a reasoned speech but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just dealt in emotional pleas and in almost personal, bitter and degrading attacks on the Minister of Finance. I say to you, why do you keep saying that this is a little man? Why do you say that one of the greatest of Canada's finance ministers is little?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: I have heard this said over and over again and I think they must be referring to his physical size.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I call the minister's attention to the fact that it is customary to address the Chair.

Mr. Walker: That is quite so. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I think we should continue to do that. Let us have an end of this whole thing. Let us get over this unfortunate incident which we all regret, which has now reached the realm of personalities and, believe me, I am not immune to that sort of thing. I admit that, but let us be done with it all. Let us bring down the curtain on this sad and unfortunate incident.

Mr. Pickersgill: You would certainly like to.

Mr. Walker: The only explanation I can give is that this man, who has descended from the heights of Olympus to get into a political brawl and has conducted himself not like the gentleman I always thought he was, has now almost reached the stage of being an anarchist in his latest letter. I say, let us pity him. No doubt his nerves are also taut but under all the circumstances his advice has been abominable and for that advice we can only blame hon. members of the opposition led by the person who would be the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, my first words tonight will be to commend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for his masterful statement to the house this afternoon, on what will be labelled in the future "the exciting Coyne affair".

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition proved himself a consistent, bold and particularly honest man. He was the first in this house to differ with the present governor of the Bank of Canada. The Leader of the Opposition is the one who for years had been asking the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) whether he shared the views of Mr. Coyne, and in every case the minister endorsed the views of the governor of the Bank of Canada. It was only after four years that things took a new turn.

I say that the Leader of the Opposition has been bold and honest, because while he has been dissenting with the views of the governor of the Bank of Canada for the past four years, he nevertheless rose in his place today to ask the house to give this official a fair hearing before Canadian public opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I and all those who are in the galleries and in the house have just heard the man who is called the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). At the outset of his remarks, he took great care to tell the house that it was very hard to maintain one's dignity in the house in the face of the insults and abuse of the opposition.

Well, Mr. Speaker, after hearing the rest of the minister's speech, it is obvious that if there has been abuse, if there has been nonsense, it came from the mouth of the Minister of Public Works, who having warned the house that he would take no abuse, added in the same breath that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was hysterical.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member speak more slowly because it is impossible to follow him?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, there is simultaneous translation; the minister should use it and listen, because I have many other things to tell him.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of following in the footsteps of the Minister of Public Works, but I want to tell him very slowly, so that he will understand, that his plea was very insignificant tonight. Because, Mr. Speaker, when somebody rises in the House of Commons to speak about an issue of the greatest significance to all citizens in this country, it should be done in a more serious vein than the minister's attempts if one wants to discuss the matter fairly.

We, on this side of the house, in no way shared the ideas of the governor of the Bank of Canada, but we can say with some pride that, under Liberal rule, no man in Canada was ever deprived of the right to defend himself especially when he was accused publicly.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud tonight to belong to the opposition team and to sit, on the Liberal side, behind such a sincere great and worthy man as the Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works spoke for 15 minutes. Did he refute any one of the arguments brought forward with such consistency by the Leader of the Opposition? Not at all. Did he refute a single, serious, valid and well considered point made this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)? Not in the least. For 15 or 20 minutes, the Minister of Public Works just tried to attack, to insult and abuse the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall say this: this evening I propose, as all members of the opposition, to speak on the Coyne-Fleming issue in an objective way. I intend to prove—and it is easy to do so—that this Conservative government, which felt so great, and so extraordinarily consistent and just when introducing the bill of rights in parliament, did not wait very long to violate the legislation, which it had so much boasted of having produced.

Mr. Speaker, I shall ask my friends some questions, for instance how it could happen that, in so little time, the government's attitude changed so much, as its members are always boasting to be the great defenders of the rights of parliament and of the people. Let us look into their attitude and see how they reacted to the bill of rights.

Mr. Speaker, we maintain that the governor of the Bank of Canada is being denied the right to appear before a parliamentary committee in order to justify his position, a right that any free citizen is entitled to expect. We say that by violating this principle, the Conservative government openly disregards the bill of rights.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker to read from the record a few statements made by the hon. members opposite on July 5, 1960. A year ago, on July 5, the Minister of Public Works said this when the bill of rights was under discussion:

> One of the purposes of this bill has been to ensure that fundamental freedoms and human rights cannot be secretly or clandestinely done away with.

And the Minister of Public Works went on to say:

> It does not make any difference what stupid government might in another 20 years follow this government. No matter what it does there will always be the bill of rights to ensure that even though an act may have been passed clandestinely or surreptitiously, or people may have missed the meaning of it, there is nevertheless superimposed upon that particular piece of legislation the protective terms of the bill of rights.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that we did not have to wait 20 years to have the kind of stupid government which would deprive someone of his rights. We have it in office, that stupid government which violates human rights.

It would be interesting to know how many copies of the statements made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works will send to his constituents. If I say that, it is because on July 5, 1960, the Minister of Public Works stated:

> As far as I am concerned, I am going to frame a copy of the bill of rights for every school in my riding, and I am going to distribute 40,000 copies to my constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that when he distributes those framed copies of the bill of rights, he should write at the bottom of each copy: Here lie the rights of the governor of the Bank of Canada which we violated in the Canadian parliament, under a Conservative regime, in 1961, barely one year after we adopted the bill of rights.

This afternoon, we asked the government why they refused to let a parliamentary committee examine and cross-examine the governor of the Bank of Canada, on the one hand, and the Minister of Finance, on the other.

Every citizen is entitled to a defence. Every citizen has the right to make himself heard, the right to a fair trial in democracy. Well, Mr. Speaker, the governor of the Bank of Canada is now being refused the right to come and state his views before a committee of the house and to tell his side of the case.

The Minister of Finance stated that there cannot be two authorities. It is correct. The opposition admits as much. There is no place for two generals in an army. There is place for only one. But if a private shoots his general in the back or commits an error, he is not immediately convicted; he is not shot on the spot. Even a private is given the right to be tried by court-martial before judgment is passed.

Mr. Speaker, the same right is given the ordinary worker in this country as in all democratic countries. Plumbers, since the minister likes plumbers, are entitled to a hearing before a grievances committee when they are accused or when they are injustly treated. Lawyers are entitled to have their claims heard and to put their case before the bar association whenever an attack is launched against them or they are charged with some offence or mistake.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when an accusation is made against a person before a board of inquiry, whether it be a senator or somebody else, that person is allowed a hearing before the board, and is not charged unjustly without benefit of trial.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I say tonight that the people of Canada are disgusted with the outrageous attitude, the inconsistent attitude of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, we had to wait until the 24th parliament to see such a breach of our liberties and it had to be just a year after that the bill of rights was adopted.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have never seen here in Ottawa a government show such an utter contempt for the rights of a citizen, particularly when that citizen is the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. members opposite claim that we are coming to the defence of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Not at all. We are coming to the defence of civil rights, to the defence of a man who has been indicted and has been denied the privilege of coming before a committee of the House of Commons to give evidence.

There is certainly someone who is not telling the truth. The statements of the Minister of Finance and those of the governor of the Bank of Canada are at odds. In letters read this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) charges are made against the Minister of Finance by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance does not want to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons, he should at least let us use the lie detector on him; we would then know who is telling the truth.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side have no intention of extending this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wish to apologize for interrupting the hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. A few moments ago I asked one of the page boys to bring my mail to me. I have here a letter dated June 26—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Brunsden: —addressed to the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I should have the opportunity of hearing what the point of order is.

An hon. Member: He wants to read his mail in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to indicate that I cannot rule on the point of order because I have not heard it as yet.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, the point of order is simply that the hon. member is accusing the government of not hearing Mr. Coyne, but Mr. Coyne is making himself heard by—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest that is an argument, not a point of order.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a long speech, but I regret to see my hon. friend suffering so much when we talk of giving justice to the governor of the Bank of Canada.

That injustice is glaring and I have no intention of repeating all the arguments so properly made this afternoon by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, I should like, however, like all members of this house and all citizens of Canada, to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) give us his opinion, his views about this bill we are called upon to adopt, a bill of merely two and a quarter lines:

The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

For four years, the Minister of Finance has told us that the governor shared his views. For four years, while we were putting questions to him, the Minister of Finance said he agreed with the governor of the Bank of Canada. For four years, while the governor of the Bank of Canada was making speeches all across the country, we were asking the Minister of Finance whether he authorized the governor of the Bank of Canada to make statements all over the country, and the minister used to answer: "But who would dare refrain the governor of the Bank of Canada from exercising his democratic right to express his views?"

Well, Mr. Speaker, after four years, that is on May 30 last, the Minister of Finance, clear out of the blue, publicly states that the governor of the Bank of Canada, with whom he was in such harmony and whose views he shared, should tender his resignation.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill C-114 reminds me of the arbitrary and dictatorial legislation that was enacted during 15 years in the Quebec legislature under the Duplessis administration. It is exactly like the legislation in effect at that time, when laws unfair to some individuals were enacted without giving the latter a chance to defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker, all of us would like to hear the Minister of Justice express his opinion on the constitutional merits of Bill C-114 with regard to the Canadian Bill of Rights.

If the Conservatives want to make political capital out of the Coyne-Fleming affair, they will find out that it will not be to their advantage, because no Canadian would admit that the government deny to a man as competent as the governor of the Bank of Canada the right to explain his views before a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to end my remarks by saying that if the Minister of Finance refuses to answer the specific accusations which were levelled against him, it is because they are true. If he is afraid of appearing before a parliamentary committee, it is because he fears that the truth will come out.

Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) is in his seat. Why does he not take the floor to defend human rights as he did on July 5, 1960, when he quoted Pius XII, as saying that the purpose of the bill of rights was to——calm the agitation and bitterness of all those who feel threatened or injured in their existence or deprived of the free exercise of their activity.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the governor of the Bank of Canada feels threatened and injured in his existence and in the free exercise of his activity, and that the attitude of this government is contrary to the bill of rights, the doctrine of Pius XII and also to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State and all those who, last year, made long-winded speeches on freedom and spoke for hours and hours on the deep convictions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) with regard to parliamentary rights.

Let us talk about parliamentary rights. We in the opposition merely ask the government to call a meeting of the committee on banking and commerce to give the governor a hearing. However, the opposition is refused the right to discharge its responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, we heard the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Chambers) tell us of the regulations of the Bank of Canada and say that no one has the right to divulge letters or other documents dealing with the business of the bank. His remarks have convinced me that the Minister of Finance, for his part has no right to lay unsubstantiated charges against the governor of the Bank of Canada, particularly if he lacks the courage to set up a committee so that the house may investigate the matter.

Mr. Speaker, would you like me to quote another gem?

We heard the member for St. Lawrence-St. George say he was glad to point out to the house that the regulations of the Bank of Canada were binding on the governor as well as on anyone else. Let me quote from a statement made by the hon. member on July 5, 1960:

> The world today is divided between those who believe that the only things of importance to mankind are the material things and those who believe that the spirit of man and his dignity as an individual are of first importance. It is time that the people of this country through their parliament should declare before the world to which of these camps they belong.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I say that we, from the Liberal party, belong to the second group, comprising those who respect the spirit of man and his dignity, while the Conservatives are part of the first group, that is the group of those who busy themselves with material things, trying to save a minister who has just brought down his fifth deficit and is attempting to mislead the electors. They feel that their position is threatened, that they have deceived the people to whom they had made so many promises.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude with the following:

If we really want to revive parliamentary freedom and democratic freedom in our country, we must vote against Bill C-114, and I am addressing myself here to all the government members who profess a high regard for human rights, asking them to indicate by their vote that they disapprove the attitude of the Minister of Finance and that they wish to allow the governor of the Bank of Canada, as a free citizen in a free democracy, to come and state his views, instead of seeing, as we do now, the Minister of Finance make statements and launch specific accusations and finally submit a bill as insignificant as this one, which has only two lines and one tenth and reads as follows:

> The office of governor of the Bank of Canada shall be deemed to have become vacant immediately upon the coming into force of this act.

Mr. Speaker, if the bill is passed, there will be only one alternative, that the Canadian people avenge Mr. Coyne, because he was unfairly treated. At the next general election, the Canadian people must say this: The post of Minister of Finance has now become vacant because the Minister of Finance is no more a member of parliament and the Liberals are back in power to restore freedom in this country and see to it that the bill of rights which a Conservative government enacted and violated is observed by a Liberal government.

(Text):

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed happy to take part in this debate tonight. I think it is fitting that I do so, as part of the constituency which I have the honour to represent used to be part of the constituency of the late R. B. Bennett, the man who led the government which brought in the Bank of Canada Act which for the first time made the question of monetary policy or monetary affairs independent of the government. As part of the constituency of Bow River used to be represented by the late R. B. Bennett, a former prime minister, I thought it was most fitting that I should take part in this debate.

I am also happy at having the opportunity to participate in this discussion in order to answer some of the arguments that have been presented by my good friends in the Liberal party. I was rather amazed that the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency of Bonavista-Twillingate, with his experience and his scholastic achievement, out of the 30 minutes, would spend the time he took in his argument not on the bill itself but his usual old song—I know it almost as well as "Down by the Old Mill Stream"—smearing the name of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). If that is the only goods the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has to offer I am sure that, when parliament is dissolved and the government goes to the people, the people will have an answer for this kind of mud slinging. It seems to me, as a backbencher, that it is about time this debate got on the rails. There seems to be three main issues in relation to this short bill; first, should Coyne go; second, is there enough evidence for this court, the highest court in the land, to substantiate the type of vote in reference to the question before this court; third, is this a court at all?

Let me take these three issues and deal with them. First of all, as to the question, should Mr. Coyne go, may I say this. I say without any reservation whatsoever that this is the highest court in the land. I think that is one thing the Liberals have forgotten. They have been talking about people being taken before the court without the right to give evidence. If there is any court in the land which believes in democracy at all, it is this, the highest court. I have had the honour and the opportunity, as a young Canadian, to appear in every court in the country including magistrate's court; district court; the supreme court, trial division; the court of appeal of the province and the Supreme Court of Canada. But the highest court in which I have ever appeared is the court in which I speak tonight. I think that is the main thing that is overlooked.

I should like to call as my first witness before this court a statement of the Leader of the Opposition who spoke in this house on February 20, 1961. What kind of evidence did he put before the court? This is what he said. Surely if you analyse what he said we need go no further because I do not think there is any hon. member in this house tonight who does not feel there is a difference between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government. That seems to be fairly obvious, because there is a volume of evidence coming from the governor and we have heard the statement of the Minister of Finance and other members of the government. So there seems to be a big difference.

If there is a difference, is that substantial evidence to bring in; is that the kind of evidence we need for considering the kind of bill that is before the highest court of Canada? This is what the Leader of the Opposition said, and he is the leader of the Liberal party, the spokesman for that party:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

Let me repeat that. This is what he said on February 20, 1961:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

There is no question tonight but that there is certainly a difference between the governor and the government and I am going to show that in evidence which I will produce in my speech.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to finish my speech first and then I will answer any questions hon. gentlemen have.

Mr. McIlraith: Read the next sentence.

Mr. Woolliams: I will read the whole paragraph and I would ask the hon. member to listen and bear with me. I will read the whole quotation because I do not intend to leave out half of it, which is the policy and practice of some hon. members of the opposition. I wish to read this again:

> If the governor cannot agree with the general policy which the government desires him to implement, then the governor has no alternative, of course, but to resign.

My good friend wanted me to read on:

> If the governor carries out the general policy in the monetary field without any indication of government disapproval, and as the government is responsible ultimately for monetary policy, I think the governor has a right, as we have, to assume that the government of the day is not opposed to the policy he has put forward.

There are two propositions. No. 1 is—and I repeat it—there is no question that there is a difference between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government on policy. The Leader of the Opposition has said, if that exists, he should resign. Here we have a man who says, "I will not resign", so his trial takes place tonight, and probably tomorrow, in the highest court of the land, which is parliament. If we had gone along with and endorsed the policies of Coyne, the Leader of the Opposition said, it would be assumed that we were approving everything Coyne said and did.

I am going to show that there are two kinds of budget. There is the budget of the government and there is the Coyne budget, one that rolls along on its end. Surely this is the issue the Minister of Finance put forward; it is the government serving the people's interest and serving the people with responsibility plus the fact that those responsible for the Bank of Canada, exercising their responsibility, said that Coyne should go.

What is the evidence as far as Mr. Coyne is concerned? Mr. Coyne has certain functions. Those functions, as governor of the Bank of Canada, are in reference to the monetary affairs of the country. Does he stay within the realm and the jurisdiction of those functions? I suggest he does not. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there has been the situation mentioned in one of the statements of Disraeli. Disraeli said:

> He who controls the exchequer controls the world.

It seems to me I could rest my case immediately on this fact, that Mr. Coyne deliberately set out knowing that if he controlled the monetary policy of this country without any interference, and the fiscal policy of this country without any interference, he would become the dictator of this country and we members of parliament and members of the government would be merely children in a playpen dancing to the tune of Mr. Coyne, the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I am quite certain that this is as far as he wanted to go. He wanted to be the dictator in every regard as far as this country was concerned. What is the evidence before parliament, the highest court in the land, in reference to Mr. Coyne? On June 19 this year, just at budget time, Mr. Coyne put out a new budget. Is this a budget that would be palatable to the Canadian people and palatable to the Canadian economy? Is this the kind of budget the government would endorse? If it is not, then there is a difference between the policies of the governor of the Bank of Canada on the one hand and those of the government on the other. If that difference exists, the Leader of the Opposition says Mr. Coyne should resign. If he does not resign, I repeat that this is the court in which this matter is properly raised and in which such a bill should be introduced so that he will vacate his position if parliament votes to that effect.

Let us look at Mr. Coyne's budget and see how it differs from the expansive budget that was brought forward this month by the present government. I am referring to an article in the Calgary Herald. Mr. Coyne gave several press conferences. This is what he said, and this is No. 1, the first thing he would do:

A temporary tariff surcharge of 10 per cent on most imports to reduce import buying and stimulate Canadian production;—

In other words, he believes that we should have an immediate 10 per cent tariff on goods coming in from the United States and other countries. What would this mean? What would it mean to the producers of this country? What would it mean to the farmers in this country? What would it mean in terms of those things we buy?What would it mean to industry? What would it mean to the employees who work in industry in this country? It would mean that the cost to the consumer would go up; the cost of production would go up and this country would be placed, I submit, in a recession. Then he says:

Augment incomes of unemployed by a 25 per cent boost in unemployment insurance benefits until the unemployment rate falls below 4 per cent—

I think everyone is sympathetic with the unemployed and everyone appreciates that when they are truly unemployed the unemployment insurance benefits they receive are probably not quite adequate. But Mr. Coyne does not say who is going to pay this 25 per cent increase. Is that going to be an extra charge on the employer, or will it mean less take home pay for the employee? There, too, are some of the ingredients that might increase the cost of production. Then Mr. Coyne says:

A three year temporary increase in personal and corporation income tax—

Surely that would mean less take home pay for the employee. That would leave management and corporations with less capital with which to expand their business in order to bring about full employment in this country. Then Mr. Coyne advocates:

Higher taxes on luxuries including liquor and tobacco.

This would mean higher costs to the consumers and employees of this country because many of them use tobacco and alcohol. Then Mr. Coyne says:

Repeal the tariff-free treatment now given on imported automobile parts up to 40 per cent of the value of Canadian-made cars,—

This would mean the price of all automobile parts coming in from the United States would be increased by that percentage. This would increase the cost to the consumer and the cost of production to those people who use automobiles in their industries. Then he says:

Levy sales tax on foreign goods brought back by Canadian tourists and remove for two years the tariff exemption now allowed on such goods.

I have said that the tourist trade is most important to this country, bringing with it needed money from other countries. Compare that budget, which in brief recommends an increase in taxes for everybody in Canada and advocates a high protectionist policy, with the expansionist policy of the government. Then I ask this question. Is there a difference between the policy advocated by the governor of the Bank of Canada and that advocated by the Minister of Finance and the government? I am confident, as I stand in my place tonight, that if ever there was an occasion in this parliament—we have heard a great deal about the large Conservative majority in this house —when the backbenchers of the Conservative party were 100 per cent behind the Minister of Finance and the government that occasion is now here. We support the decision that Coyne must go, and go now by an act of parliament.

Mr. Howard: You do what you are told.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, that is a matter of opinion. I have not seen that small group in the corner divide up their votes. All I can say about you is that you want to amalgamate with the Liberals to save your skins and the Liberals want to amalgamate with you to save their skins and time will tell where you sit. Probably your corner will get smaller and smaller until you evaporate out of this chamber altogether.

Mr. Benidickson: The price of bread has already begun to rise.

Mr. Woolliams: I will deal with that later. I thought the hon. member said bread prices had started to rise. I remember Jimmy Gardiner saying the farmers of this country had to take less to put bread on the table so the people of this country could eat it. The farmers have not forgotten that, and that is why you have not got a farm representative in this House of Commons.

Before I digress in answer to these questions I want to refer for a few moments to an article in the United States News and World Report. The issue is dated July 3, 1960—it is a little ahead of its time. I want to refer to an article written by an American describing the way the Americans see the policy of the government at the present time. This is what they say about it:

> Recently a change began. Canada's dollar began to fall in value in relation to the American dollar. On June 21, the blow fell. The dollar of Canada that had been worth $1.05 a year earlier fell to 97 cents. There were predictions that days ahead might see it drop as low as 90 cents.
> The meaning? Canada had decided to force down the value of its money as one means of beating a severe recession.
> Americans going to Canada today can get a premium for their dollar. The tourist who buys woollens or chinaware, or other Canadian goods, finds that the $10 bill that he offers will bring $10.30, not the $9.50 that it brought a year ago. If some forecasts are right, before long the U.S. $10 bill will buy $11 in Canadian goods or services.

This is the important part. This is where the expansionist policy of the Conservative government differs from the Coyne budget which was not delivered in this house but which was delivered to the press.

> All Canada's producers of raw materials—aluminum, uranium, nickel, iron, oil—can expect to benefit from the lower value of the Canadian dollar, just as the paper producers see a gain.
> Wheat farmers also stand to benefit. The export price of wheat, controlled by the government, was increased to compensate for the drop in the Canadian dollar. Foreign buyers of wheat, however, will pay no more because of the lower value of Canadian currency.

Even if we do not export more goods we will see more purchasing power in the pockets of the producers. Compare that type of budget with the Coyne budget and see how palatable our budget is to the Canadian people as compared with Coyne's. Then, to come back to my original argument, it is obvious that there is a difference between the policy of the Bank of Canada and the policy of the government. This being the highest court of the land, we are here to judge and weigh that evidence and vote as we see fit. I am confident when the vote is called the government will certainly get the support of every backbencher.

It may seem a small matter to mention but it does seem that here is a man, the governor of the Bank of Canada, preaching austerity, asking Canadians in all walks of life to tighten their belts. That is the kind of austerity he wants. And at the same time, while he was going from coast to coast, as the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) said, peddling austerity, he called in the group of directors to increase his own income when he retired, or got fired, from $12,000 to $25,000. In other words, he said to the Canadian people: you tighten your belts, and if my austerity program lowers the prices of the goods that I may buy I shall have more money in my pocket so I can buy them. I ask these simple questions: what does the farmer think of the governor's budget? What does the coal miner think of it? What does the contractor think of it? What does the average worker think of it? What does industry think? I am confident that industry would reject higher taxes. I am confident that the western farmer would reject high tariffs.

I listened today to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) saying this was a matter of politics. May I suggest that the politics are being played the other way. The only criticism of the federal government which I would make is that they have been too tolerant, too lenient, too statesmanlike with the eggheads who use their knowledge and research not to serve the country but to endeavour to perpetuate Liberal rule during a period of smashing Liberal defeat. I think we have been too tolerant in this respect because, surely, some of these eggheads have been using their knowledge and research since they were placed in their present position by the former administration to perpetuate Liberal rule even in defeat, and Coyne may be no exception.

What do the newspapers have to say? Let us go back for a few moments. I think that the erosion of the idea governing the Bank of Canada started with Mr. Harris. We all remember that in 1956 and 1957 there was a real recession in this country and real unemployment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know what it was like in your province, but all building in Calgary had been brought to a standstill by the tight money policy under Liberal rule. Now was this Coyne policy or was it the Liberal policy? At any rate, Harris endorsed it. He was made the victim, and Coyne carried on. Let us go back and read some of the statements that were made. I wish to quote from the Financial Post. These statements were made by various ministers of finance of our time. The first is by Charles Dunning, a Liberal, who held office from 1935 to 1939. I do not think the present Minister of Finance would quarrel with this statement, but if hon. members will bear with me they will see how these statements change, and how they changed the mind of Coyne until he thought he was the economic dictator of this country. Dunning said between 1935 and 1939:

> A long continuance of a policy that conflicts with the government view becomes impossible.

Surely Coyne's policy is impossible to endorse in the face of the present budget. So, Coyne must go. What did Mr. Ilsley say? He held office from 1940 to 1946, and he said in 1941:

> The monetary policy which the bank carries out from time to time must be the government's monetary policy.

Surely, that speaks for itself. What did Mr. Abbott say? Mr. Abbott said, during the time he held office from 1946 to 1954:

> The ultimate responsibility must fall upon the government.

By the way, that statement was quoted with approval by the present Leader of the Opposition.

Then we had a change, and this change is revealed in a statement made by Mr. Walter Harris who was finance minister from 1954 to 1957:

> This action is the action of the governor of the bank and his responsibility alone.

When Harris made that statement, as set out in the Financial Post, may I suggest that that statement was understood only by the present governor of the Bank of Canada, because this action is the action of the governor of the bank and his responsibility alone. It was then that we got the tight money policy in Canada. I think that was one of the main issues in the past elections. I have heard many people talk about various issues, but one of the main issues was the tight money policy of the former government.

I shall say this in conclusion: I repeat, I do not know a time when there has been more unity in the party on any matter which has been brought into this house since I was elected in 1958. The backbenchers are behind the Minister of Finance. They have confidence in him. They know that if he is going to implement the kind of policy set out in the budget brought down by the government in June it can only be implemented if Coyne goes. I believe that the debate the Liberals are now carrying on—I do not know much about eastern Canada, but I know western Canada—is going to put them in this position. If they had any votes left before the debate started this morning they will have few left tomorrow morning if they keep on supporting Coyne and his tight money policy.

Mr. Cardin: I wonder whether the hon. member for Bow River would permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Cardin: In his speech, which I think missed the main point of debate, the hon. member stated that he had the privilege of appearing in all the courts of the land, including the highest court, which is of course this parliament. Can the hon. member tell the house whether he has ever pleaded in any court of the land where the accused was not present and indeed was not allowed to appear in his own defence, as is the case in this instance?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my answer to that is exactly what I quoted from the Leader of the Opposition. Where there is a difference the governor must go. There is plenty of evidence, in fact there is reams of mail and that mail, those statements, in a criminal court, if they are used, can become evidence under certain circumstances. There is no rule governing that here. We have the evidence. All we need say to the Liberals is there is a difference, a difference between the policy of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the government. If anyone in the Liberal ranks can stand up now and say there is not a difference I wish to see that person stand in his place.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, if there was any doubt in our minds about the importance of this debate I think it has been dispelled by the fact that the government in its desperation to bull this thing through at any cost has called on its two best known hatchet men within the ranks. I am referring, of course, to the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for Bow River. Both of these gentlemen have built up quite a reputation in the courts of this country as being outstanding lawyers. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that if their performance across the country is as weak as it was tonight I wonder where they built up the reputation.

First of all, we had the Minister of Public Works who assumed that Mr. Coyne has been operating solely on the advice of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Well, I would say this is completely in keeping with the whole government case, because it is an assumption from first to last.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate listed some of the alibis that this government has used in the four years that it has been in office. Of course, he did not realize that his list would be out of date almost by the time he completed it. In 1958, the situation was all the fault of the Liberals. In 1959 it was the Americans; and in 1960 prosperity was around the corner. In 1961 it is Coyne and now, according to the Minister of Public Works, they even blame the Coyne affair on Pickersgill.

As far as the hon. member for Bow River is concerned, he first of all proceeded to establish the fact that this is the highest court in the land. There can be no question that he believes it is the highest court in the land. He referred to it many times. Then before this highest court whom or what did he call? He called a statement, a statement of the Leader of the Opposition. Well, unfortunately, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres this highest court in the land must operate on a statement and under no condition can we have witnesses appear before it. I also should like to know what other court in the land operates on this principle?

I personally would prefer to endorse the analysis of this problem as expounded by the Leader of the Opposition. I believe he put his finger right on the problem, which is, can any man in this country, let alone a key public servant, be condemned without a proper hearing?

Much to the surprise, and obviously much to the chagrin of the present government and in particular the Minister of Finance, Coyne did not do as he was supposed to do. He did not fold his tent and steal away in the middle of the night like an Arab. He was a man with enough courage to fight back.

One noticeable thing about the statements issued by Mr. Coyne is that they have been consistent throughout. He has never changed his story; it is the same today as it was when this case first broke.

I recall that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence said he was quite surprised at the tactics, the timing and so on of the statements that we read in our newspapers. It should be no surprise to the parliamentary secretary or to any other hon. member because Mr. Coyne was a very high officer working for a government which has governed by headlines in the last four years and he should be quite adept at headlines by this time.

There is one thing that we should emphasize, and it should be emphasized throughout this debate, namely that the governor of the Bank of Canada is almost within six months, I believe, of completing his seven years which is the full term of his appointment. Four of those seven years have been served under this present government.

In contrast with the consistency of the arguments put forward by the governor of the Bank of Canada there has been complete and utter confusion on the part of the government, the Minister of Finance and other spokesmen of the government throughout this debate. They complained about the governor going to the press. At the time they complained about him they refused to allow him to appear before parliament to which he is responsible. No matter what efforts the opposition has made over the last four years to call the governor of the Bank of Canada before a parliamentary committee the request has always been refused by the government. If they will not permit the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before parliament to which he is responsible what objection can they take to this gentleman doing the only thing that is left for him to do, namely to turn to the press to see whether his story can be told?

The Minister of Finance said that parliament must decide, but we must decide in the dark; we must decide blindly; we must decide just on the statement of the minister. We are not allowed even to get the minister before a committee where he can be cross-examined.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; you will have the committee of the whole after second reading.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I believe that in his remarks today the minister gave the whole show away, the whole underlying causes that have culminated in the debate we have before us today, when he told us that the governor of the Bank of Canada had committed the unpardonable sin of issuing an annual report at the normal time, at the same time it is issued every year, but it just happened to be during the election campaign of 1958. These statements always come out in March but because the government for political expediency decided to call an election then the governor of the Bank of Canada, supposed to be free and independent of the cabinet, had the nerve to issue his annual statement at the normal time and it embarrassed the government. I think that was when Mr. Coyne signed his own death warrant.

Then we saw how on May 30 the minister wanted the governor to resign because of some future disagreement they might have. Yet on June 26 he wants him to resign because of past disagreements. It is obvious to me and to many others, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a struggle going on within the government but the struggle has not been between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Coyne because both of them have been on the same side for the last four years. The struggle was between the old Tory orthodox financial policy of Coyne and the Minister of Finance on the one hand and the political expediency of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the other. That has been the struggle that has gone on for four years.

Mr. Grafftey: You are looking under the bed again.

An hon. Member: And the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees).

Mr. Martin (Timmins): And the Minister of Trade and Commerce as an hon. member says. Over the last four years the Minister of Finance has always won. He is a pretty tough little scrapper. It is also obvious to everyone that Mr. Coyne is a pretty fair scrapper and when the two of them teamed up apparently they were more than a match for the Prime Minister when he wanted to embark on some of the political expediencies that he thought might be advantageous to the Tory party at the moment.

But this time the other side won. Expediency won, and where did this leave the Minister of Finance? He had to do an about-face. He could not very well do it and save face at the same time, so the only thing he could do was to turn on the man with whom he apparently had no disagreement over a period of four years and make him the goat of the whole thing.

I think that the smallest thing of all has been the way an attempt was made to use the pension of Mr. Coyne as a lever to get him out without his story being told. First of all, I do not want anyone to get the idea that I approve of a $25,000 pension for a man with seven years' service, especially when our old age pensioners are trying to get along on $55 a month. But I want to make one thing very clear. The Tories are responsible for both. The $25,000 pension was approved by the Tory appointees on the board of governors of the Bank of Canada and the $55 pension for old age pensioners is also the responsibility of the present government. So they cannot evade the blame for either one.

Mr. Brunsden: It used to be $40.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under the Liberals $46. That was their limit.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): There we go back into ancient history again.

An hon. Member: You started it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) both made a great to-do about the 10 per cent boost in tariffs advocated by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Our position on tariffs is very well known in the house and I do not think it needs to be reiterated today.

Mr. Brunsden: What is it? We don't know.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to know what the difference is between an honest proposal such as put forward by Mr. Coyne and which would be applicable to everyone in the country and the policy of the present government which is to place dictatorial power in the hands of one minister so that nobody will know what is going on and so they can reward their friends and punish their enemies through their tariffs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You do not believe that yourself.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to know what the difference is between an honest proposal such as the governor of the bank made of a 10 per cent increase in tariffs and the method now being adopted by the Minister of Finance. If the Canadian dollar is devaluated, it seems to me that it would have exactly the same effect as if tariffs were increased. People will pay that much more for imports coming into the country. The governor of the bank had an honest way and apparently that is unacceptable to the government.

It is obvious that the governor of the Bank of Canada had to be the sacrificial lamb on the altar of Tory political expediency and that is why he is in the position he is today. We found that the present government was determined to push through the house a bill to make the tariff board a government toy. Now they want the Bank of Canada to be in the same position and because the governor of the bank will not go along with it his head must now come off.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing about which the government is consistent and that is their slogan, do it now. I understand that the term of office of the governor of the Bank of Canada expires around the 1st of December of this year. But the government cannot wait for that. They must do it now and it is obvious why. If they wait for six months their greatest alibi will be gone.

There have been many rumours recently, and I am not sure they are finished, of a federal election in the very near future. That is why we see this attempt to lay the responsibility for all the ills, all the mistakes, all the blunders of four years of Conservative rule on the shoulders of the governor of the Bank of Canada. If the government and its spokesmen, and they have got some "dillies", can pull the wool over the eyes of the Canadian people, if they can make the Canadian people so furious about a $25,000 pension that they will forget that only two years ago the government scrapped an airplane that had cost the Canadian taxpayers over $450 million, embarked on another program that cost another $300 million and have now turned around, I understand, and embarked on another program that is going to cost another $300 million to buy a plane inferior to the one they scrapped two years ago, it is no wonder that they want to fight the next election on the issue of a $25,000 pension.

Neither myself nor the other members of my party, Mr. Speaker, have ever agreed with Mr. Coyne or if we have it has been to a very limited extent. We have disagreed with him far more often than we have agreed with him in the past, but we maintain that even our enemies are entitled to a fair trial. If the day ever comes when I find myself saying or doing what the Minister of Finance and the government are asking the house to do today to try, condemn and execute a man without giving him any opportunity for defence, then I will say that I am no longer a democratic member of a democratc country.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): By all means.

Mr. Brunsden: From his remarks I take it that he is in favour of increased tariffs. I take it he is in favour of raising present tariffs by 10 per cent? Is that correct?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If the hon. member had attended the house often and had listened attentively, I do not think there would be any question in his mind where I and my party stand on tariffs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You do not want to answer that question.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for having introduced this bill.

Mr. Coyne, for a long time, has been making fools of our citizens in trying to sabotage the policy of this responsible government of ours.

The speeches he made across the country are a challenge. The annual report of the Bank of Canada was nothing but an election pamphlet. Under this government the governor of the Bank of Canada had become arrogant; he followed in the footsteps of the opposition like economist Lamontagne.

The Minister of Finance, with his usual wisdom and care has always been patient, not wanting to press on unduly, thinking that Coyne, the economist, would come to his senses and would actually discharge his duties as governor of the Bank of Canada and stop being a political instrument in the hands of the opposition.

In Mr. Coyne's mind the economy of Canada was Mr. Coyne. His attitude is in glaring contradiction with the principles of responsible government. It was time that the Minister of Finance took action because I should not have been surprised if Mr. Coyne had substituted the Queen's picture for his own on our currency.

The people have passed judgment on him. I have visited my riding as all Conservative members do. My constituents told me that it was high time that the government got rid of Mr. Coyne once and for all, and that policy-making be handed back to the responsible government. It would be stupid and illogical to have that man appear before a committee of the house. He is condemned by the public course of action he has chosen. His conduct has been in utter opposition with the minister's.

Logically, he should have resigned without the government having to introduce a bill to that effect. He has instead stood up against a majority decision of the directors of the Bank of Canada. He urged Canadians to save and to tighten their belts while he was having a handsome pension voted for himself.

Here is another argument that condemns him, in my opinion, without any need for a parliamentary committee.

What is serious is that he made public his discussions with the minister. It is unfortunate and hard to understand that Mr. Coyne did not realize the terrible unscrupulousness he was committing.

A minister remains silent at all times about any discussions that take place in a council of ministers.

What is serious, is that out of revenge, Mr. Coyne published a confidential document, namely a memorandum sent by him to the Minister of Finance and containing his views about what should be included in the budget. In so doing the governor threatened the very basis of the whole structure of officialdom and destroyed the secrecy of relations between the cabinet and its advisors.

I must say that I was quite surprised —and interested—to hear the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) read the section of the act which forbids Mr. Coyne to violate his oath and to divulge secret matters. I think that was sufficient reason for Mr. Coyne to resign without being heard by a committee.

The Minister of Finance was right when he said:

The fact that the governor has chosen to violate the confidential nature of these communications is no reason for the government to do likewise and to make public facts which it has always been agreed are of a confidential character.

The opposition has chosen to ask for a vote to show its disapproval of the minister's conduct. In so doing, however, it went against a tradition which ought to be respected at any cost and which it had itself upheld on January 20, 1960 when the famous confidential report was made public.

I hope that the Senate will act wisely and will not oppose this bill.

Mr. Speaker, it can properly be said that Mr. Coyne has been the executioner of the Canadian economy in collusion with the opposition. I should not be surprised to see him run as a Liberal candidate in Manitoba in the next election.

Mr. Speaker, the point at issue here is whether the representative of the Canadian people is Mr. Coyne or the present government. The case in point is whether we should return to democratic principles and responsible government.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition is in hot water over this bill. They do not know what to do about it. If they confess to the people that they lacked judgment and good sense when they appointed Mr. Coyne as governor a few years ago, they will recognize their lack of responsibility and automatically repudiate the governor's monetary policy. If they vote against this bill, they will give up responsible government for dictatorship.

I will vote for this bill because I am in favour of responsible government.

(Text):

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to one particular aspect of this debate. Many times in the past I have warned the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) about matters in his department having to do with debt, interest rates, fiscal policy and exchange rates. I might say that I have also warned him about matters pertinent to the troubles in which the government now finds itself and particularly the appointment of members of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada, which I feel is pertinent to the troubles which have arisen now between the government and the Bank of Canada.

I have some quotations from statements I placed on Hansard in the past concerning the appointments to the board of directors. In Hansard of March 18, 1959, over two years ago, at page 2037 I had the following to say:

In my opinion there is one fundamental weakness in the Bank of Canada Act. Members of the judiciary are appointed by the different parties when in power and I think they can be said to be above reproach. However, the members of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada might not always be held to be as much above reproach as they should be. Just the other day, for instance, we heard about one director contributing large sums of money toward the election of different members . . .

Mr. Fisher: Conservative members.

Mr. McMillan: That is right.

And then I continued as follows:

I am not accusing any member of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada of not acting in the best interests of Canada but the implication is there that sometimes they may act in a certain way for political reasons. If a man is contributing $20,000 or $25,000 of his own money to a political party, what assurance do we have that the people of Canada will get the best action from him as a director of the Bank of Canada? Will he always have the good of Canada at heart?

Then I went on as follows:

If we look at the list of directors of the Bank of Canada we see that more than one is a recent political appointment.

When I said "more than one" at that time it was rather an understatement. Then I continued as follows:

Our fiscal policy at the present time is not good. We have the highest bank deposits we have ever had in our history. Yet the Minister of Finance cannot get the people to buy his bonds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true. The last issue was oversubscribed.

The minister was of course right because he used all kinds of tax gimmicks in respect to that particular issue and it was oversubscribed. Then I went on to say this:

He tells us that he requires money. If so, why are there so many bonds held by the banks? I call on the Minister of Finance and the government to have members on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada who have no political axe to grind and who will at all times give their best consideration to the people of Canada and not make decisions based on political reasons.

Then later, on April 14 I again spoke on this subject and called on the government not to make political appointments to the directorship of the Bank of Canada. I went back and read the debate in 1936. I thought I would see what Mr. Dunning, Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King and Mr. Bennett said at that time in connection with the board of directors. On June 1, 1936, as found at page 3257 of Hansard of that date, Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the then minister of finance, moved that the house go into committee to consider a resolution that it was expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act in order to provide, among other things, an increase in the capital stock of the bank; to enable the minister of finance to purchase certain shares of the Bank of Canada to assure ownership of a majority of the shares by the government; to increase the number of directors; and to provide for election and appointment of directors in such manner as to assure voting control of the board by directors appointed by the government.

I was struck by this whole debate and by the remarks of those who took part in it. I will quote just one sentence in connection with the election of the various officers of the bank. It is by Hon. Charles A. Dunning, the then minister of finance, and is be found at page 3263 of Hansard of June 1, 1936:

> I am sure no member of the committee need have any fear that such appointments will be subject to political pressure or to partisan influences.

It is true that Mr. Dunning that time criticized the election of the first directors under Mr. Bennett, but he criticized them on one point only. He said at that time that the Canadian chamber of commerce, which was an organized business group, had intervened in the election, submitting a slate of nominees all of whom were elected. He also said that he was not criticizing the personnel of the board. In fact, he paid tribute to the various members of that board who had been appointed under Mr. Bennett, and said that they had done a great service for Canada. He was looking to the future. Of course, they were bringing more directors in at that time and he wanted to get away from the position in which one business organization might nominate directors and have elected all the directors whom they nominated. Even Mr. Bennett did not make any political appointments to the board in his time. This resolution resulted in a bill which passed through the house without any division except one, and that was in connection with the chairman's ruling.

In his speech in the house on that day, Mr. Dunning gave some quotations from the speech of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King when he was leader of the opposition, as found at page 4228 of Hansard of June 22, 1934:

> I do think the directorate of the bank ought to be so formed that, whether the pressure is upon the bank from the government on the one side, or upon the government from the financial interests and through the bank on the other, there should be on the board of directors some one or more persons who will be quick to sense the situation, give the danger signal, and arouse the country to the pressure which is being brought to bear. There is the danger of a government bringing too much in the way of pressure to bear on a central bank.

It is interesting to note that in that debate Mr. King, Mr. Dunning, and Mr. Bennett, all three, agreed with that particular argument. This government is carrying on with all political appointments to the board and that is quite contrary to the thinking of our two former prime ministers, namely Mr. King and Mr. Bennett. I heard the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) say tonight that he represented the constituency that Mr. Bennett represented at one time. He certainly did not put forward any of the arguments put forward by Mr. Bennett in that debate.

An hon. Member: Part of the constituency.

Mr. McMillan: If hon. members will read that debate, I do not see how anybody can come to any other conclusion but that our two former prime ministers of this country would consider the present position intolerable in respect of the composition of the board of directors.

My question again to the members of this house is this, and I submitted it two years ago. Would such men, highly political appointees, have the good of Canada at heart or have they the good of the party at heart? Does a director of the Bank of Canada, whose qualification for that position seems to be that he contributed $20,000 to the party funds, have the good of the party at heart or does he have the good of the Canadian people at heart?

According to the reports, the directors of the Bank of Canada one day are on the side of Mr. Coyne; then after they hear from the Minister of Finance, without any change in government policy and without any change in bank policy, they are all against Mr. Coyne, except one. I say that this is irresponsible action on the part of the board of directors. The minister himself admitted that Mr. Coyne did not know what was in the budget. He therefore should not prejudge him. I am sure that Mr. Coyne did not vote—as a matter of fact, he had no vote—for an increase in his pension. If the minister is going to censure anybody in connection with voting that increase in the pension of the governor and the deputy governor, I think he should censure the members of the board of directors appointed by this government. I also think that the minister should have expected some report from the board of directors concerning this action they had taken. I think it is quite consistent with the minister's statements in this house that one or more of the board of directors consulted the minister beforehand and may in fact have received his permission for this increase in pension.

The minister then would be technically right in saying today that he did not know it had been passed if he had not read the minutes of the board of directors and if someone had not told him that the increase was there. He could easily avoid reading these minutes if he thought they contained any material that might be of use to him at some later date, when in trouble, as is the case now. It seems to me that if we as a parliament discharge a high government officer, responsible only to us in this parliament, without giving him a hearing, even though he may be 100 per cent wrong we are going against all the concepts of justice in the bill of rights.

If the government have a case, as they say they have, I want to vote with the government. I heard one minister say we are contacting Mr. Coyne. I have only seen Mr. Coyne once, and that was at the time he appeared before the committee inquiring into the unemployment insurance fund. As I say, I do not think we can have two sovereignties in one country, but unless we get some information, unless we get the facts I do not see how anybody can vote with any intelligence. It seems to me that the rights of an individual are involved here. The government should not be afraid to have him come before a committee of parliament. They will have a majority there, as they will have a majority in the committee in this house.

If this government does not allow this, I would say that the bill of rights, framed and accompanied by the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) which were meant to immortalize the words of that bill of rights, should be turned face to the wall and never hung face out again unless it is edged in black and draped in mourning, because this is the first great infringement of the bill of rights in the parliament of Canada.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said in connection with this very sad affair, but I must say it is not my desire to review in detail all that has been said by the opposition. This afternoon we had a long speech by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson)—

Mr. Chevrier: That was this morning.

Mr. Lambert: —and frankly what he did was to proceed in a tortuous way to set up men of straw and then try to demolish them. He said the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was pedantic. We all know that the Leader of the Opposition was a former professor of history and in so far as pedantry is concerned no one can show him the way in this house.

However, I would draw particular attention to that most remarkable speech by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I would not want to be too unkind to him, but I would say he was almost psychopathic in his personal bitterness toward the Minister of Finance. He lost all reason; he lost all judgment. As a matter of fact, the hon. member is a man who, in attacking the minister and the government for denying, as he says, the rights of parliament, has conveniently forgotten his own actions and attitudes when he was a member of the previous administration.

Mr. Benidickson: But you were going to change all this.

Mr. Lambert: If we were to follow the example of the hon. member from Essex East (Mr. Martin), who delivered what I thought was a rather patronizing lecture to some of the younger members of this house, I might say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that a man who lives in a glass house should not throw stones.

He is the master of innuendo. That is what we heard this afternoon—innuendo, smear, hypothetical cases concocted in his own mind. He then proceeded to try to place the blame on the minister and the government. He went to ridiculous lengths and thereby showed merely the paucity of his own thinking.

In so far as the hon. member for Essex East is concerned, we heard from him a great lecture on the bill of rights. He talked about the accused having the right to be heard. But, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the question, who is the accused in this case? Is it not the government that is being accused on all sides? Who first laid the charge but the governor? He is the man who ran out into public print and laid the charges of unfair treatment—

Mr. Howard: He would not be silenced by that arrogant little character over there; that is the reason.

An hon. Member: Communist.

Mr. Lambert: The comments we have just heard of course demonstrate the prejudice that exists in certain minds; the refusal to recognize the situation with a certain amount of objectivity to see what is the principle involved here. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) referred to the accused being denied the right to be heard. If—and I say "if" advisedly—the governor is the person who has been accused, then he has certainly been heard. He has had a whole series of advocates, and if we wish to use the simile of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), in a court of appeal the accused does not appear; he is represented by his advocates. We have Mr. Coyne's advocates all across the other side of the chamber. He is not without voice and he is certainly not on his own.

We have been besieged by an almost schizophrenic frenzy of literature emanating from his headquarters in the Bank of Canada. I will not go into the question of the propriety of the governor using the facilities of the bank in putting forward his own personal case, not the case of the Bank of Canada, and utilizing the facilities of the bank, not only to send some copies of letters to members of parliament but to spread them across the country.

Mr. Brunsden: Eight pages today.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoke about the fact that two sovereignties could not exist in one country; that they were incompatible. If they admit that, what purpose is being served by their argument? It is wholly sterile. The fact is that the governor has set himself up as a sovereignty and we have the governor of the Bank of Canada challenging the government. That is the clear issue before this house.

Who is responsible for this situation? It is obvious that it is the governor. The governor could have accepted the requested resignation; he could have resigned and governed himself accordingly. He could also have received the request, refused it, kept quiet and carried on his business; or he could have done what he should have done, that is, acceded to the request to resign. If he had a case—

Mr. Benidickson: And the Conservative government could start the printing presses.

Mr. Lambert: —to protest, he could have put his case forward. There was no difficulty. We have here a strange precedent that is being sought. The opposition are asking that where a public servant is in disagreement with the government he may demand the right to appear before a committee and that he can cross-examine a minister of the crown before that committee. From that time onward, every public servant would have that right. But, surely, it is completely illogical to consider that a public servant, such as a general in the army who, on disagreeing with a minister would be relieved of his command, could still stay effectively in command bawling his arguments at the top of his voice. That would not be permitted. It would be the same thing in the case of a high public servant, such as a deputy minister, who refused to resign.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and others indicated that if there was disagreement between the minister and the governor in 1957 or 1958, this was the occasion to have dealt with the matter. Perhaps he and his friends, too, had prior occasion to disagree with the governor. They did not speak about that. What would have been done at that time, in such a case? What could have been done, except to ask for his resignation? If he had refused, it would only have been possible to have come before this house to ask for his outright dismissal. The procedure would have been the same and we should have heard the same cries of persecution.

The position of the governor of the Bank of Canada is completely unsupportable. If there is any disagreement with the government he must resign. Opposition speakers did say that the minister was wrong in not disclosing that there had been differences of opinion or disputes earlier but, surely, it is an accepted fact that the first time you have a dispute you do not necessarily rush out to the public and shout from the rooftops that you disagree with this or that person. Certainly, there must be an attempt, and a serious, determined attempt, to overcome those differences and to try to work together. I think there is ample evidence that the minister determined to do just that.

We have heard a great deal about the accused having a chance to speak. But since when is it the accepted practice that the government, if charged, must be wrong unless it proves it is right? That is precisely the burden of the argument put up by the opposition. They are prepared to make all sorts of charges, reasonable or unreasonable, and then the government must prove itself to be right. I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite that he who makes charges must either come forward with the evidence or keep quiet. There is a very trite saying, a very popular saying, that you either put up or shut up. That is what I would say to those who make all these charges, fanciful and otherwise, that the government has misbehaved in this regard. Either they should come forward with facts or else they should keep quiet.

Why has this controversy arisen? It has arisen because the governor of the bank willed it so. He is the man who rushed to the press. As far as the minister is concerned, he did the proper thing in asking the governor for his resignation. The next thing we heard, some 12 days later, was that the governor had issued a statement to the press. Then followed a barrage of correspondence and statements, confidential documents which he spread far and wide; then, again, today, we got this document—a most contemptible document. I say this in all earnestness; it was a most contemptible document deserving nothing but the greatest amount of scorn. Charges of blackmail are made. I am questioning whether the governor of the Bank of Canada is the true author of this document though it is true his signature appears upon it. When we look at it, no man with the degree of responsibility which a governor of the Bank of Canada should possess could stoop to such a document unless he was motivated by reasons other than the proper conduct of his office.

There were on another occasion words used which I think are appropriate to this occasion, and I would apply these words to the governor of the Bank of Canada today. For God's sake, go.

May I call it 10.30?

Mr. Caron: May I call it 10.30, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has already asked to call it 10.30, which I see it is.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the budget and if that is completed we have four items of legislation which are ready; item No. 1 on today's order paper, Bill No. S-28, an act to amend the Trust Companies Act, and item No. 2, Bill No. S-29, an act to amend the Loan Companies Act.

As the third item we would consider the bill to amend the Civil Service Act which has been reported back to the house, and there is a further item, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance with regard to the industrial development bank.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house whether it is the intention to continue this debate tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: No. I said we would go on with the budget debate tomorrow.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED BY PRIME MINISTERS OF JAPAN AND CANADA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table and, if the house agrees, have printed as an appendix to Hansard the joint communiqué of the Prime Minister of Japan and myself issued following our discussions yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the joint communiqué referred to by the Prime Minister be printed as an appendix to Hansard today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of communiqué above referred to, see appendix.]

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT CONDITIONS IN WEST—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the drought conditions prevailing in western Canada which threaten an imminent collapse of cattle prices and farm income.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is unnecessary to hear any argument on this question. It seems to me that it is a matter which could very readily be debated in the budget debate which continues today. The requirement of urgency of debate therefore is hardly satisfied. I accept the proposition that this is an urgent and important public matter to which the Leader of the Opposition draws attention. It is a definite matter of public importance. However, that is not the criterion in determining whether standing order 26 should be applied. The criterion is whether there is an opportunity to debate this matter in an effective way.

Mr. Pearson: Before you make your decision, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to explain that, as you have stated, this is a matter of urgency; it is not only a matter of urgency of debate but a matter of urgency of action on the part of the government to deal with a situation which is so serious and is becoming worse every day and which, across the border in the United States, has resulted in five states being declared disaster areas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The urgency of debate—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to say anything about urgency of debate I will hear him, but not on the issue, because that matter can be debated.

Mr. Pearson: Urgency of debate I should think would be required, Mr. Speaker, so we can ask the government at once to tell us what action they propose to take in regard to the collapse of cattle prices because of lack of fodder, and in regard to the necessity of doing something about this matter and the decline of farm income generally in the face of this situation. It is quite true that in the budget debate we can deal with these matters, but a special debate would give to the government the opportunity of telling us at once what plans the government have to deal with this situation which is now so very serious.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In view of the statements made by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out first that the opportunity is available to discuss this matter today. There is no necessity for any adjournment of the house because the government has acted already, has given consideration to that matter, has already received representations from the province of Manitoba and will receive representations from the province of Saskatchewan if they have not come to hand this morning. Every assistance is going to be provided in connection with the provision of fodder and also the transfer of cattle from non-fodder areas to fodder areas.

In so far as the reference to the United States is concerned may I say this. We have been in touch with the government of the United States, our purpose being to secure from the United States permission to have those areas that have been put in grazing or in hay under the soil bank available to us in Canada for the cutting of the hay. The United States, in view of the circumstances in which it finds itself in the northern states, is giving consideration to that request but I do not look hopefully in that direction. Action has been taken already.

Mr. Speaker: I think the matter might be pursued by a question on the orders of the day if hon. members so desire, but I am not satisfied that there is not ample opportunity to put before the house and the government all the considerations that apply to this important matter in the debate which will follow immediately after the calling of the orders of the day. Therefore with regret I cannot accede to the request of the Leader of the Opposition.

LIVESTOCK

CATTLE—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what steps the government have taken to prevent the imminent collapse of cattle prices in the prairies. Have the government given consideration to putting at least a temporary special floor under cattle prices?

An hon. Member: There is a floor price under cattle.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that there is a floor price under cattle, or possibly I should say he does not know, because he would not have asked the question had he known.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister—I do not pretend to be infallible, as the Prime Minister does—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pearson: —but may I ask the Prime Minister again what action he is taking to prevent the collapse of prices in the prairies, and what steps he has taken, if any, for freight assistance to transfer cattle from the prairie provinces to the east, where feed is available. Perhaps he will try to answer that one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a matter for information, and I will give it. I was giving the information; the hon. gentleman did not have it. The committee of the privy council have given consideration to this matter and an order in council has been passed which in effect is as follows. Due to drought conditions the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta face a very serious shortage of fodder for livestock and there has already been considerable distress in various areas of the west. To avoid a heavy liquidation of livestock, extraordinary measures will be necessary to provide fodder to drought areas and to move cattle from those areas to other areas for summer grazing.

The provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are now formulating policies to bear part of the freight costs of bringing fodder to and moving cattle from drought areas, and have requested that the federal government share equally with the provinces the cost of such assistance. I think a similar request will also come from the province of Alberta.

As the house knows, similar assistance was provided to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba in 1958 due to drought conditions, and to all three prairie provinces in 1959 due to the loss of fodder from early snows. Therefore authorization has been given for the payment to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta of one half of the amounts paid by these provinces for their transportation costs on shipments of fodder, for the movement of cattle to feed, and for the transportation of haying equipment from June 26 this year to March 31, 1962, subject of course to such terms and provisions as may be prescribed by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the Prime Minister give us the date of the order in council?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The date is today.

Mr. Chevrier: You did not move very fast.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, but I would first congratulate him for getting under the wire.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Will the Prime Minister keep the house informed of the agreements made with various provinces and the progress with respect to this assistance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would say yes, we shall. As a matter of fact I might add that I will be meeting with representatives of western Canada this afternoon to ascertain at first hand something of the situation in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba to the end that, as always, immediate action is taken as soon as action becomes necessary.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Reverting to the order in council, can the Prime Minister give the house an assurance that the order has in fact been passed, and will he kindly table it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I will get the order in council and have it tabled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED INTENTION TO REPLACE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if it is a fact that the government is seeking to replace the under secretary of state. If the answer is in the affirmative, will he tell the house for what reason?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Apparently the information which the hon. gentleman has obtained is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Chevrier: We shall see.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLOWANCE TO POSTAL EMPLOYEES WORKING ON JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Has the minister received representations from local 89 of the letter carrier association, in Sorel, requesting that the 1st of July be observed as a statutory holiday? If so, what decision was taken by the government?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question should be directed to the Postmaster General. Moreover I think he is in a position to give an answer.

(Text):

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): On Saturday the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me a somewhat similar question, giving me notice, and I have now procured the information which I think will answer all aspects of this subject. It concerns post office employees and the effect on their working time of the holiday of July 1.

Those who normally would not work on this day and who are required to work would be compensated at the rate of time and one half. Those who would normally not work on this day and who do not work—and they include the great bulk of the civil service, besides some post office employees—receive neither addition nor deduction from their salaries or hour reserve. Those who would normally work on this day, such as letter carriers, and who do not work are required to make up the hours they do not work on July 1 in one of several ways. The "how" is not important. It is not important how they make up the hours; the contentious point is that they will be required to make up the hours.

At first glance it seems most unreasonable that a letter carrier, for example, who normally works on Saturday but gets Saturday off because it is also July 1 should be required to make up this time in some way. This was my first reaction when I heard of it. However, on investigation I came to the conclusion that the course being followed is the only fair one because of one further fact. Employees normally required to work on Saturday are given, or enjoy, another day off during the week. To take a specific example, a letter carrier who normally works on Saturday might have Thursday off each week. In the week in question, the week including July 1, he would have Thursday off and Saturday off, though the rest of the civil service would enjoy only Saturday. If he was not required to make up the Saturday that he had off he would enjoy two holidays against only one for the rest of the civil service.

I might say that the same set of regulations works in reverse to help such people when a holiday on a regular working day for the civil service falls on their day off. Taking my previous example again, the letter carrier who regularly worked on Saturday and enjoyed Thursday off would be paid overtime in cash for work performed on Friday if a holiday fell on Thursday which was enjoyed by the civil service. In other words, his holiday would be moved to the Friday so that during the week he would work five days as against four for the rest of the civil service, but he would be compensated for having worked the extra day.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the explanation sounds complicated. I had difficulty in understanding it myself, and I would be surprised if at first glimpse anyone in the house were to grasp its nuances. However, I think if hon. members will study what I have said it will become clear.

The significant factor in answer to the question is that the effect of the civil service regulations and the action here is to provide equal treatment for all civil servants whether or not they normally work on July 1. I might add one further comment of interest to the letter carriers. Because of the fact that they are not working on Saturday, July 1 they will have an unusually heavy load on Monday. In many cases where it is necessary because of that load they will be asked to report to the post offices earlier on Monday morning, and will be credited with overtime in respect of that time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADVANCES ON LABOUR COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the particular period during which the winter works program is instituted is always that period of the year when municipalities are short of funds, and in view of the fact that payments for labour costs are only made in arrears after the work has actually been done, would the minister consider a system of advances on labour costs, where necessary, thus permitting municipalities to increase their participation in the winter works program?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that during the past winter we introduced a new system of interim payments to provinces in respect to this program.

MOOSONEE, ONT.—REPORTED USE OF INDIANS AS STRIKEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production whether he has checked complaints that Carter Construction Limited are using treaty Indians at Moosonee as strikebreakers on a Defence Construction Limited project and paying them less than the rate in the fair wage section of the contractor-government contract.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I understand from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that the answer is no, but I wish the hon. member to know that before the strike was declared against Carter Construction Company there were 14 Indians working on the project. I do not know whether they were working as carpenters or otherwise, but they were on the job at the time the strike was declared. I am having a check made to see if the number of Indian workers has been increased. We certainly cannot prevent Indians from working at this site. I have not changed my attitude that this is a provincial matter and that it is for the provincial government to take action with respect to the labour dispute. We hope that the dispute will be settled as soon as possible in the interests of the continuance of this project.

AIRPORTS

WILLIAMS LAKE, B.C.—OPENING BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice based on a press release of the Department of Transport of today's date. The press release, which concerns the minister, reads in part as follows:

> Ottawa—Sporting a 10-gallon hat, justice minister E. Davie Fulton is to officially open a new—Department of Transport airport at Williams Lake, B.C., July 5—
> Mr. Fulton will use a short handled, double bladed axe rather than a pair of scissors to cut the ribbon held by Williams Lake stampede queens Paddy Twan and Vivian Chelsea.

My question to the minister is this. Is the double-bladed axe, like the syringe used recently by the Minister of Agriculture, gold plated and, in that event, does the minister not think that in view of the continuing deficits of this government some economy in the use of these instruments ought to be exercised?

Hon E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his great interest in my activities, and I am glad to be able to assure him in the first place that the opening ceremonies, as I understand it, are being arranged and generously paid for by the contractors who built the airport. I do not understand that the double bladed axe is gold plated, but like the Minister of Agriculture, my thoughts will be directed in certain directions as I swing that axe to cut the ribbon.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether this press release was issued at the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think that question will have to be directed to the Minister of Transport, but I should have thought the hon. member who has been, as a matter of fact, on the treasury benches as parliamentary assistant, on reflection would realize that he is just taking up the time of the house by asking that question, because the answer is within his own knowledge.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have no apology for taking up the time of the house in the interests of the taxpayers.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my implication was not that the hon. gentleman should apologize for taking up the time of the house, but should apologize for taking it up uselessly.

Mr. McIlraith: The taxpayers' interest is not useless.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—USE IN WINTER

On the orders of the day:

(Translation):

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Transport have any comments to make in connection with the article which appeared in this morning's Gazette and which contained the following sentence:

(Text):

The government will continue to discourage foreign shipping from using the St. Lawrence in winter.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have read the article in question, and I must say that it is obviously in error.

Yesterday afternoon I had a most interesting meeting with a delegation from Halifax and St. John. I had occasion to discuss the problem of navigation on the St. Lawrence river, on the gulf of St. Lawrence and winter navigation generally. I then recalled the decision we took on November 24 last with regard to winter navigation.

For the information of the house, I think I should again read the instructions we issued at the time:

The services of icebreakers in operation in the Quebec area will be as follows during the winter season, i.e. in addition to priority work assigned to each icebreaker, they will assist maritime traffic in the area. They will provide all possible assistance first to ships reinforced against ice, then under the authority of the departmental regional officer, will provide an escort when needed to coastal ships between Quebec and Cap aux Oies and to ships entering or leaving Quebec harbour.

Now I repeated to that delegation what I stated last winter, that ships not reinforced against ice, ocean-going ships not reinforced against ice and proceeding down the St. Lawrence as far as Quebec do so at their own risk.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question. Notwithstanding what the minister said to the delegation, does he intend to encourage navigation on the St. Lawrence during the winter?

Mr. Balcer: For the next season we will apply the exact policy I have just described.

COASTAL TRADE—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister taken cognizance of a question which was asked in the United Kingdom parliament of the joint parliamentary secretary to the transport ministry, Mr. Hughes-Hallett, in connection with Canadian proposals to reserve domestic Canadian trade in the great lakes area of Canada for Canadian ships, in reply to which he said that the British government had no previous consultation whatever with the Canadian government with respect to this matter? Has the minister seen this report, and in view of the question asked and the statement made in the British House of Commons has he any comment to make?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have not seen that article, but I have read similar articles in another newspaper. All I can say is that prior to the announcement of policy we had some discussions respecting the matter of coastal trade with the high commissioner's office here. However, since the new policy was announced in the house we have received no official representations from the high commissioner's office. We are actually sending notices along the lines of the announcement I made to all countries of the commonwealth which have signed the commonwealth shipping agreement.

Mr. Chevrier: This is the object of the question I asked the minister, because the reply given was that the British government had no previous consultation whatever before the Canadian government announced its proposal in the House of Commons. That was the answer given by Mr. Hughes-Hallett.

Mr. Balcer: Prior to the announcement of the policy we had approached the United Kingdom government a few times to ask them to take some action about the fact that use was being made of ships flying the flags of British colonies to the disadvantage of Canada in our inland waters. The British government informed us that they could not do anything about the matter, and it was folllowing these representations and this answer that we took the decision we did.

POSTAL DIRECTOR, DISTRICT NO. 2—BILINGUAL REQUIREMENT

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, is the Postmaster General in a position to reply to the question I asked him on June 26 last with regard to a promotion competition for the post of director of district No. 2?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to reply tomorrow.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

VANCOUVER AIRPORT—USE OF U.S. CONSTRUCTION MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister aware that a Vancouver contractor, Beaver Construction Company, who are carrying out a contract with the department to build aprons and ramps for the R.C.A.F. at Vancouver airport, are using aggregate imported by scows from the state of Washington and thus are violating the general conditions of the contract which call for the use of Canadian materials and labour where possible?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this contract which is being carried out by Beaver Construction Company. I am having inquiries made to ensure that they are using Canadian materials. I am not aware that they are getting gravel from the United States, but an inquiry is being made and I will report just as soon as I have the information.

Mr. Broome: I have a supplementary question for the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue. Will he investigate the importations of aggregate by Deeks McBride, a company headed by a former Liberal cabinet minister, from both Stillicum and Friday Harbor in the state of Washington, with special reference to whether dumping laws are being broken through special pricing arrangements or other means such as options to purchase?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): We will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broome: A further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Broome: This is a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member.

[Later:]

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Will the minister have his officials in Vancouver check into impending lay-offs at crushing plants in the Vancouver area because of the importation of crushed aggregate from the state of Washington?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GERMANY—REPORTED REQUEST BY CANADIAN TROOPS FOR PAY INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the report that Canadian troops in Germany have asked for a pay raise is accurate, this request resulting, as the report indicates, from the fast rising cost of living in Germany and the drop in value of the Canadian dollar.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I have had no information to that effect, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The papers are full of it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KUWAIT—STATEMENT RESPECTING CANADIAN TREATY COMMITMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East asked me whether Canada has any treaty commitments with Kuwait. The answer is that there are no bilateral agreements concluded directly between Canada and Kuwait. Both countries, however, are parties to a number of multilateral conventions such as those constituting the ICAO, UNESCO, the international telecommunications union, the universal postal union and so on. Incidentally, I would point out that in the heading of the question asked yesterday, as found at page 7035 of Hansard, there is a mistake. It now reads "Iraq—Reported Claim to Shakedown of Kuwait". The word "shakedown" should be "sheikdom".

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has Canada any political commitments with regard to this sheikdom arising out of prior treaty arrangements between it and the United Kingdom which might cover this country?

Mr. Green: This is a very complicated question which the department is investigating, but I am advised that there is certainly no obligation as far as defence measures are concerned.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the threatened invasion of or aggression against Kuwait, has the minister any information from the United Nations on this subject?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the observation made by the Minister of Finance a few moments ago prompts me to see that he is not ignored this morning, and I should like to ask him a question. In view of the fact that we are approaching the end of the session, and in view of the fact the unemployment insurance fund has reached a low and most perilous state, somewhere between $64 million and $70 million, will the minister say what policy the government proposes to announce with regard to replenishing the fund and ensuring that the contractual rights of individuals in this country are not denied under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I direct the attention of the hon. member to my observations on this subject in the budget speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister not agree that the only observation he made in his long budget speech was with regard to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Essex East is anticipating what he would like to say in the budget debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I am asking an extremely important question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question to my mind is not one seeking information, so far as I have heard it. The hon. member proposes to contest what the Minister of Finance said in the budget speech, and that surely is not something to be taken up at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not put my question in such a way as to make it fully understood by Your Honour, and with your permission I will rephrase my question. We are going to conclude our session shortly. The unemployment insurance fund has reached the perilous state to which I referred. I am now asking the minister what the government proposes to do to replenish that fund.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I again invite the attention of the hon. member to what I proposed in the budget speech in relation to the financial side of this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said nothing in his budget address.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not have entire responsibility in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but on the financial side there are measures proposed in the budget that will be of great benefit but which apparently are not yet known to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Pearson: The answer is "nothing".

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

(Translation):

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly impressed by the speech made last Tuesday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The duty he was faced with then was most tricky, difficult and consequential.

Any budgetary measure has repercussions on the economy of a country, on its trade, its industry and its relations with other countries. One can imagine the tact, the know-how and the knowledge required to perform such a task. The Minister of Finance proved once again last Tuesday that he possesses all those qualities to a great degree, and all members of the house should be unanimous in commending him in spite of the differences of opinion they might have.

I should also like to emphasize the courtesy he showed us, his French-speaking fellow citizens. Ever since his first budget speech, he has made it a point to express himself in our language to summarize some fundamental proposals. Since then, he has always been true to that line of conduct. I wish to congratulate him and to thank him. That means that he recognizes the important role his compatriots of French language and culture are called upon to play with their fellow citizens of English language and culture, in the economic life of our country. A reminder of this basic truth can only bring the two great people who founded this confederation of ours to work more closely and more efficiently together.

I have read with mixed feelings the speeches which were made concerning that most important document which was laid down by the Minister of Finance. A few of them were meaty and contained specific suggestions but, unfortunately, many of them seemed to go astray into the doubtful avenues of demagogy. However, if there is a debate that ought to be kept far and above all partisan or petty considerations, it is surely this one, because what is at stake in this instance is all the more serious as it involves our nation's economic progress and well-being. Faced with such a problem, it seems to me that we should proceed by the straightforward and enlightened ways of good sense, logic and objectivity in seeking the solutions called for by circumstances.

In order to fully understand the nature and the full weight of this budget, we should judge it on its substance and in the light of the facts and events of which it is but a result. It matters little whether the December estimates have met with adverse winds and have thus been in part invalidated by conditions for which surely the Minister of Finance cannot be held responsible. Under our system of government, where planned economy cannot be the rule and where economic activities are generally left to private enterprise, we have no cause to be shocked at this juncture. The government's role is limited to seeking and submitting measures which, in the present circumstances, seem most appropriate for stimulating this nation's economy and giving it such impulse that will carry it forward toward new achievements. There you have considered in its true perspective, the problem related to the budget and facing us as well as the Canadian people as a whole.

The measures introduced by the Minister of Finance have not been brought about in a haphazard way. Quite the contrary, they are part and parcel of a policy laid down previously, a policy which dominates those measures and a prerequisite of which is the economic independence of the nation.

They go back to the actions first taken by this government since coming into power and they are in line with the task assumed by the Conservative party, which is to throw off the yoke of foreign domination, under which we were gradually sinking.

As early as December 1960, the Minister of Finance had laid the necessary and logical basis in his little budget which was a sort of prelude to the one which is now submitted to us. Both are based on the same spirit and have the same purposes. A brief summary will confirm this.

Most of the measures advocated by the Minister of Finance last December fall into three main groups—an increase and a channelling of national savings invested in Canada, an increase of income tax on revenues transferred abroad; and, finally, a review of the customs tariff.

The purpose of the first group of measures is to bring investment companies and pension funds to invest most of their money in Canada. In accordance with this, new industries in depressed areas that undertake to use local raw materials which have so far been exported and manufacturers of products which until now have been imported from abroad are entitled to double depreciation for one year.

In his budget speech, the minister stressed the interest with which this action was received by some industries. It looks as though we might expect good results in the field of employment and industrial development.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Dorion: Certainly.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister tell us, at this stage, how many industries have been set up in the depressed areas of this country, under that legislation proposed by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance himself replied to that question in his budget speech, when he said he had received over a hundred requests, I think, from companies wishing to take advantage of that legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I would not like to interrupt the Secretary of State, but I wonder whether he could tell us how many industries have been set up in the depressed areas of this country?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, surely I am not in a position to give more information than the Minister of Finance himself.

The second category of measures provided for an increase from 5 to 15 per cent of the tax now levied by the government on income earned in Canada and transferred abroad. There is no question, under that legislation, of simply ballyragging foreign interests, but rather of ensuring that those interests contribute more to public expenses, and that the entry of foreign capital be limited to proportions more in line with the requirements of our economic independence.

On the other hand, and in order to encourage our own investments, the surtax of 4 per cent on the dividends of Canadian investments was abolished.

The third category of measures provided for the revision of some items of the customs tariff, and for the redefinition of products of a type made in Canada.

That redefinition, as wrote Mr. Jacques Parizeau, Montreal economist and professor at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes, in Montreal:

—is probably the most important aspect in the budget.

That was also the opinion of some particularly experienced businessmen. That measure could facilitate the working of anti-dumping legislation and at the same time protect our own manufactured products against certain imports which, by evading the intent of the law while observing its letter, can take advantage of the lower tariffs.

Other measures were also proposed such as the establishment of an export financing bank to help our industry to increase its sales abroad, in order to stimulate production and employment in this country.

Again, according to Mr. Jacques Parizeau, that December budget.

—is probably an outstanding event in the history of Canadian economic policy.

Another economist, Mr. Roland Parenteau, also professor at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes in Montreal, then expressed his views as follows:

Inasmuch as we are faced with a structural crisis, the nature of those various measures may turn the tide in the right direction. Already, the exchange rate has moved in a direction favourable to our trade balance. That alone might do more towards a permanent eradication of unemployment than all conceivable public works.

In his annual report to the shareholders of the Montreal city and district savings bank, Mr. Guy Vanier, chairman of the institution, also commended the Minister of Finance for setting the country in the right direction. Here is what he had to say:

Processing firms, provided they can count on a steady domestic market and on proper foreign trade possibilities, could, more than anything else, reduce unemployment in a progressive and permanent way.

Those are eloquent marks of appreciation resulting from an objective and unbiased study and which are certainly just as good as any criticism heard in this house. Being of immediate and long term significance, this budget encourages the growth of Canadian enterprise while reducing at the same time the benefits of foreign investors in Canada. Well, it is with that logical system that this budget was prepared as it is with that logical system that the various policies of this government have been pursued since the people of Canada gave us the responsibilities of power.

Like last December's budget, one of the main purposes of this one is to check foreign capital inflow into Canada while promoting Canadian investment in our own business.

Have we often stopped to think that since 1950, U.S. investments alone in Canadian business have reached over $3 billion, half of which have been invested in the oil industry? Should this government not be concerned and not increase the steps it had already taken to ensure Canadian economic independence?

As a second aim, we want to balance our foreign trade as much as possible. International trade is a two-way road, but if the incoming road is wide and spacious while the outgoing one is narrow and difficult, it creates an unbalance which eventually bears heavily on the Canadian economy. The result for us is a weakening congestion of our manufacturing industry and a consequent increase in unemployment.

The government's present policy is in fact reversing the trend. In 1960, our exports rose by $225 million, or 5 per cent over the previous year, reaching a total of $5,395,300,000; our imports, with a drop of 2.1 per cent in relation to the previous year, totalled $5,495,800,000, leaving a total deficit of $100,500,000, as compared to a deficit of $368 million in 1959.

Some have been shocked at our budget deficit. However, should our international deficit not be our first concern? Should we not give top priority to a better balance in our external trade, and to the balance of payments, and try to maintain our main industries and to increase their production and manpower?

On this last point, I should like to point out the tariff amendments which are provided to ensure greater protection to some sections of the textile industry. I have been reading the complaints of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) in that regard, and his bitter words to the government and to Quebec members on the government side.

Apparently the hon. member is totally unaware of the origin and nature of the problem, because otherwise, he would have kept cautiously silent or would have directed his complaints to his friends in the opposition.

Instead of reproaching others for their silence, he should have made a serious study of the problem and come up with specific proposals to solve it, proposals which his friends in the opposition would have been prepared to support.

First of all, I will remind him that it was the Bennett government which, through the 1932 Ottawa agreements, first afforded adequate protection for the textile industry. The measures then adopted in that field produced such results that according to economists that industry was one of those which suffered the least from the depression which affected most areas of the Canadian economy, a depression that did not originate with the Bennett administration, as some are wont to say, but with the financial crash of 1929, which occurred when the Liberal party was still in office. Following the return to power of the Liberals in 1935, the textile industry started on a downgrade. Since 1939, under their rule, specific duties protecting it have only been reduced. That is how the friends of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska cared about an industry which in the province of Quebec, apart from the city of Montreal, involves at least one seventh of the labour force.

In that field as in many others, we had to endeavour to right the wrong that had been done, while complying with the international agreements binding our country. Therefore, as soon as he was sworn in, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) invited the tariff board to undertake a complete review of all GATT items regarding textiles, clothing and their manufacture. He gave them very definite instructions that in their recommendations they seriously take into account the economic situation of our own textile industries. In June 1958, the first findings were released and later on the minister hastened to order an increase in the tariffs on woollens subject to the British preferential rates.

What was the reaction of the leader and the friends of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska? I would ask him to read again the speeches made in this house on August 13, 1958, particularly the one delivered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the one, even more peremptory, delivered by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). If I had time, I would quote extensive extracts from that speech. But I will be content with reading the two paragraphs which in my opinion are the most characteristic:

(Text):

It is rather difficult to think of any industry that is much less indigenous. The raw material comes from abroad; the machinery in the plants comes from abroad, and the skills originally came from abroad. It is certainly not by any stretch of the imagination an indigenous industry.

What is being proposed, if it is seriously intended and if the government gets away with it this time, is to provide really high protection and really to make us self-sufficient in woollens at the expense of other Canadians. If that is so I would say we are embarking upon a most dangerous course. We should know now whether we are embarking on that course. It does not matter whether you look at this from the point of view of the generality of Canadian consumers or from the point of view of those particular industries that depend upon markets abroad—the United Kingdom, Italy and Japan are the three principal exporters to us at the present time of woollen goods—it seems to me that this policy is folly. It is contrary to our interests.

(Translation):

There you have the off-hand way in which the hon. member dealt with that industry set up in Sherbrooke in 1844, which numbers more than 800 plants throughout the country and which provides employment for about 70,000 people in the province of Quebec alone. In other words, that meant that if that industry could not subsist without protection, there was only one thing to do, and that was to drop it. Previously, he had made the following remarks:

(Text):

I consider that to increase the tariff on wool against the British is a very bad thing in itself. I will say something more about that, though I cannot add much to what was said so admirably by the Leader of the Opposition on that point. But I say this is just part of the policy; this is just the prelude to an increase in the most favoured nation rate against a country which is an essential market for our primary producers. The only excuse the tariff board could find was that this industry had social significance.

(Translation):

What does this mean? Would that reason not be sufficient? Are social consequences really such a poor excuse to the introduction of legislation? Since when does the concern for social classes or some of them not form part of the considerations that should command the attention of legislators?

Most fortunately, this government considers its obligations in a very different light. In view of the difficulties facing the textile industry, the government started negotiations with countries enjoying the most favoured nation tariff. On April 10, 1959, an agreement was reached under which the tariff on woollens with those countries was increased proportionally to the increase in the preferential tariff. On May 31, 1960, the tariff board submitted further recommendations of which the most important, on that occasion, referred to coloured cotton goods. Through further agreements involving on our part concessions in other fields than the textile industry, and without the industry in general being adversely affected, tariff rates were increased.

A lot could also be said about the negotiations which the Canadian government has successfully conducted with Japan. Suffice it to recall that on May 5, 1960, the association of Canadian clothing and textile manufacturers commended the government for having, and I quote:

> —tried to restore order and logic in our market which was upset by Japanese exportations.

And the president of the association, Mr. Peters, added:

> Had it not been for the determination shown by the Canadian government in its discussions with the Japanese authorities these last months, the dangerous inflow would have been devastating.

Just a few weeks ago, the house was told by the Minister of Finance that Japan had consented to new voluntary quotas for the year 1961.

The present proposals of the Minister of Finance concerning textiles are pursuant to the logic of this policy. It is not surprising therefore that these last days, Mr. G. B. Gordon, president of Dominion Textile, stated that he was hopeful because of the firm intention of the Minister of Finance to avoid resorting to the most rigid forms of GATT during tariff renegotiations.

True to the imperatives which inspired the budget he brought down in December, which was aimed at reducing the flow of foreign capital to Canada and at encouraging Canadians to invest in their own country, the minister has also proposed a certain number of monetary policies which have already had an effect on business. The reduction of the interest rates will stop Canadian borrowing on foreign money markets and will stem the tide of imported capital. His task will be all the easier since the federal government will strive to put as little pressure as possible on the bond market.

To achieve that end, the government will finance its operations through short term credit and leave the whole long term bond market to municipalities, provinces and private enterprise. In that same frame of mind, the bonds which constitute the reserve of the unemployment insurance fund and are negotiable at any time will be replaced by non-negotiable bonds. Moreover, to free the market, a government bond redemption fund will be created with a capital of $100 million, which will enable the buying of government bonds on the open market. Finally, the funds of the industrial development bank will be increased from $160 million to $400 million. Financing means available to our business firms will be increased accordingly.

It is with a feeling of relief that all those measures and others of a similar nature have been received throughout Canada. Among a great number of views expressed by both labour and business there is one which seems to summarize them all and which I would like to quote. It was expressed by Mr. F. D. Mathers, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association:

> Of particular significance are the measures aimed at the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, as well as those reducing interest rates. The abolition of the excise tax on new automobiles and the tariff changes announced should help the industries concerned. Those items in the budget as well as the broadening of the industrial development bank's field of operations, the increased allowances for capital depreciation and for expenditures relating to scientific research, represent so many encouraging factors which, within the budget, should have a beneficial effect on employment opportunities.

In the establishment of the economic policy, the government's contribution must first of all be of a supplementary nature. It consists in promoting the co-ordination of efforts and in providing the community with general and specific means likely to make private enterprise more productive. To meet this requirement the present budget includes both fiscal and monetary measures. In the government's pursuit of policies leading to economic recovery, both types of measures are as related to one another as a pendulum to a clock. That is why obstacles had to be removed. I am confident that thanks to the hope which the minister's budget has given to the Canadian people, to the combined efforts of labour, business and finance, to that spirit of industry, co-operation and mutual help which prevails within the Canadian community, he will achieve the happy results we expect and will largely contribute to restore the economic independence of our country.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the Secretary of State? Following the changes which were made in the Customs Tariff, could the Secretary of State tell us first, how much the textile industry has benefited from the measures mentioned, and second, whether it is true that the domestic production of Canadian industries has fallen from 52 per cent in 1956 to 47 per cent in 1960?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to ascertain the figures the hon. member is quoting. But I believe it is beyond all question that evidence given by Mr. Gordon bears out that the present budget of the Minister of Finance can help the textile industry in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister permit a question? Is he aware of the evidence given in the other place by Mr. Berry, chairman of The Primary Textile Institute, to the effect that in the last 3½ or four years, the number of textile workers has dropped by 25,000?

Mr. Dorion: I am not aware of those figures, but I am aware of the evidence that was given and I admit that the figures given by my hon. colleague may be correct. Yet, what I said remains true. It is the result of a policy of the former administration, which had taken no account of the textile industry and had resulted from the principles laid down by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), as shown by the quotations I read a few moments ago.

(Text):

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): For the last 30 minutes we have listened to the Secretary of State trying to prove to this house that on March 30 of last year the Minister of Finance introduced a budget forecasting a surplus of $12 million and that on December 20 this forecast resulted in a further baby budget forecasting a deficit of $286 million, which has resulted on March 31 of this year in a net deficit of $353 million.

I feel it has taken a long time for the hon. gentleman to extend all his congratulations to the Minister of Finance. However, it now appears obvious that the members of the mutual admiration society have settled their strike after having been instructed by the dictatorial head of the government to keep mum during the last two days of discussion of this budget. They have finally realized that such an attitude is not good for the proper conduct of parliamentary debate and not in the interests of the country. Probably this morning someone has brought to their attention an article which appeared in today's Globe and Mail entitled "Parliament's Business". I wish to put on record one paragraph of this article, which reads as follows:

> It would be a mistake, for example, to attempt to cut short the current debate on the budget. Finance Minister Donald Fleming's proposals are among the most important business to come before this parliament and neither the government nor the opposition parties should attempt to stifle reasonable expression of opinion from the back benches.

As I have said, it now appears that this article has had some effect on the government side, because it now seems obvious that they intend to participate in the debate on this budget.

In introducing his budget on March 31, 1960 the Minister of Finance stated, as reported on page 2670 of Hansard:

> Last year we emerged from a recession which has been caused by a number of factors.

Here we are on June 27, 1961, 14 months later, and according to the minister's present budget which is now under discussion we are still emerging from the recession. The Minister of Finance was not the only member of the cabinet who expressed similar views. Two months previously, as reported on page 517 of Hansard on January 29, 1960, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) said this in the house:

> What about the recession? Everybody knows the recession is over. Everybody, that is, except hon. members opposite, particularly the hon. member for Essex East and his group.

Only one month later, on February 17, as reported at page 1164 of Hansard, the Minister of Public Works had this to say:

> Although heavy government expenditure and government deficits are appropriate in times of recession I think we will all agree that in normal circumstances government expenditures should be limited to our income.

Now, every member of this house recalls the presentation of the budget on March 31, 1960. Every member of this house recalls the applause and desk thumping by supporters of the Minister of Finance when he announced that with revenue estimated at $5,892 million and expenditures at $5,880 million, he expected a surplus of $12 million for the coming year. It was on that occasion that the Minister of Finance said he was confident that employment would increase as the coming of spring opened up new job opportunities and as the economy, to use his words, continued its upward trend. As we on this side of the house said at the time, the only cure in the mind of the Minister of Finance was to hope that unemployment would disappear with the melting of the snow. As the snow disappeared unemployment decreased to some extent, but within two or three months it had increased again to a record high and has remained at that level since. In fact the last report made public by the dominion bureau of statistics indicates that at the end of May of this year unemployment in Canada was 30,000 higher than it was at the same date last year.

I suggest we have here a government of confusion which has refused for two or three years to admit that there was a recession; a government which refused to admit that there was unusual and abnormal unemployment in this country. This is the government which refused to recognize the recession but which told us two years later that the recession was over and that we were then emerging from it.

Let us see what the Minister of Finance had to say about the government's tax policy at the time he introduced his budget on March 31, 1960. As reported at page 2681 of Hansard for that date the Minister of Finance is recorded as follows:

> The fiscal policies we followed during our first year in office had a major influence in reducing both the depth and the duration of the recession, and by the third quarter of 1958 the low point of the recession had been passed and the forces of expansion began to gather momentum. By the spring of 1959 recovery was well on the way, and in my budget speech a year ago I recommended to this house policies which were designed to bring us back to a position of budgetary balance as soon as the economy had recovered the losses of the recession and was moving firmly forward and upward to new record achievements in production, employment and investment.

The minister then carried on to say:

> The position we have now reached, with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget,—

He insisted upon having a fully balanced budget. Then to continue his statement:

> —represents the fruits of carefully designed policies carried forward over the past 18 months. This is not something that has just happened. It is the result of considered aims and efforts. It began with the great conversion loan of the summer of 1958 which made possible a policy of sound debt management which in turn restored public confidence in government credit and in our determination to control the powerful forces of inflation. It was continued in the expenditure controls and the tax changes of 1959, and is reinforced in this year's program of reduced controllable expenditures balanced by the continued promotion of constructive national development.

I ask what have been the results and what have been the fruits of these supposedly carefully designed policies carried forward by the present government over the past 18 months. The policies of the present government were so carefully designed and put forward that within nine months the Minister of Finance had to introduce in this house the baby budget of December 20, 1960. As a result of the supposedly carefully designed policies of the government the $12 million surplus of March 31 had been dissipated and in the minister's misconception there was born a new baby, a forecast deficit of $286 million. Furthermore we learn now, five months later, that this second forecast of the Minister of Finance has been wrong again, and from these carefully designed policies of the government the deficit is now increased to $353 million. In other words the December 20 baby has grown by another $77 million in a period of less than six months.

That was the result of the carefully designed policies of the present government; policies under which the debt of this country has increased by over $1,500 million in the last four years; policies under which unemployment in this country has reached a record high comparable only to that period of the hungry thirties when again there was a period of Conservative government. I ask, has this country ever before in its history seen more confusion, lack of policy or lack of leadership than it has from this government?

This is the government which, in 1957, told the people of this country that every Canadian man, woman and child was having his or her pocket picked by $30, and that every Canadian family was overtaxed by $120. This is the government which told the people of this country that it was time to take the unrepentant tax masters off the backs of the Canadian people. Those words were repeated throughout the campaign again and again by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I ask what has been the fiscal record of this government since it took office in June, 1957. The record is as follows. In 1958 there was a deficit of $38 million; in 1959, a deficit of $609 million; in 1960, a deficit of $413 million; in 1961, a deficit of $300 million; an estimated deficit for the current fiscal year of $650 million, and there are clear indications now that it will likely be much higher than that. There has been deficit after deficit.

Notwithstanding these deficits the present government by its carefully designed policy has, in the last four years, dissipated a fund of $900 million which was reserved for unemployment insurance to protect the labour class of this country. In other words the record of this government—a blue government, always in the red—is that in the last four years it has added some $750 to every Canadian taxpayer's load. That is the government which, after its first year in office, blamed the situation on an administration which had left it with a $500 million surplus and a fund for unemployment insurance of over $900 million, with an average 3 per cent to 3½ per cent unemployment average in this country. This is the government which, as I said earlier, through statements made in this house by its Minister of Labour and its Minister of Public Works, made it clear over 18 months ago that the recession in this country was over. These statements were confirmed in no uncertain terms, as I have shown, by the Minister of Finance in the presentation of his budget of March 31, 1960.

In introducing the present budget last week the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 6642 of Hansard of June 20, 1961:

> When there is a substantial degree of slackness in the economy, in the form of excess productive capacity and idle manpower, budget deficits can provide an important stimulus.

We have had deficit after deficit since this government took office, and we are still waiting for the important stimulus to which the Minister of Finance referred. The minister then went on to state:

> By means of such a deficit the government, through its expenditures, places in the hands of the public substantially more purchasing power than it withdraws through taxation. If appropriately planned and timed, a substantial deficit can encourage higher levels of output, employment income and savings, without incurring risks of inflation.

I repeat, this is what this government has been doing since it took office in 1957, and it has failed to create that stimulus which should have benefited the economy of this country. In view of the highest series of deficits in Canadian history, such as the $609 million in 1959 and the $413 million in 1960, has this government succeeded in obtaining the results which it claims it now can achieve with the present forecast deficit of $650 million? If it could accomplish nothing but unemployment in the last three or four years, how can we expect a deficit of $650 million this year to revive the Canadian economy?

I want to repeat what I have said before in the house; that the present government, with its Minister of Finance, is shirking its responsibility. In the first two years of the present government the previous administration was blamed for the state of affairs in the country. When at last they found that their "what would you do" questions were not being taken seriously any more by the general public, they had to put the blame on someone else. We had such statements as we have heard on many occasions from the Minister of Finance and other ministers of the government to the effect that the rate of economic expansion in Europe had shown some hesitation and was having an effect on our country; that conditions in the United States were responsible for the slow-down in Canada.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Suddenly, however, after realizing that it had failed to implement policies such as were suggested on many occasions from this side of the house, the government had to find someone else on whose shoulders to put the blame for its failure. Realizing that it had to reverse its stand on fiscal and monetary policy, the government chose to put the blame for the whole state of affairs on the shoulders of the governor of the Bank of Canada. There again we have the government and the Minister of Finance shirking their responsibility. In their despair they had to find a scapegoat.

If conditions are such today that the governor of the Bank of Canada is to be blamed for the failure of the government to administer the affairs of this country in a sound and satisfactory manner, why did the government not take action two or three years ago when the situation was in as great a state of confusion as it is today? If, after a series of deficits unprecedented in Canadian history and amounting to almost $1½ billion in less than four years, the government has failed to stimulate the economy of the country, I ask again how it can be expected that a further deficit of $650 million will be fruitful in stimulating productive efforts which could result in an expanding economy.

I find very little in this budget, Mr. Speaker, which will have the effect of stimulating productive efforts in this country. In fact the deficit of $650 million forecast by the Minister of Finance is to cover estimates of the different departments which were arrived at almost nine months ago. A large proportion of those estimates has already been discussed and passed by parliament, and I must say that to our great disappointment we have found in those estimates nothing new, nothing sensational, nothing like the $1,180 million public works program forecast by the Prime Minister in 1957 and 1958.

I agree that unemployment is not a problem that the federal government alone can solve; nevertheless this government assumed the responsibility of solving the problem of unemployment when its leader repeated time after time "No one will suffer from unemployment as long as I am Prime Minister of this country, deficits or no deficits". I recall at this time the words of the Prime Minister on his "Nation's Business" telecast of September 2, 1960, when he said:

> I have not the time to outline the many other practical approaches which we are taking to increase the total number of year-round jobs and to alleviate seasonal unemployment. To give just one example, instructions have already gone out to senior government officers across the country to recommend any federal project which can be undertaken at once in any area where unemployment is high.

For four days during the present session, Mr. Speaker, the house has discussed in detail the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and I must say that if instructions such as were mentioned by the Prime Minister have gone out to senior government employees across the country to recommend federal projects which could be undertaken in areas where unemployment is high, either the senior government officials have failed to make the recommendations or, as we have more reason to believe, such instructions have never been issued.

I ask the Minister of Finance and the government, what is there in the budget that is to the advantage of the Atlantic provinces? What do we hear about such projects as the Chignecto canal and the Northumberland strait causeway? In the case of the Chignecto canal a survey is supposed to be under way. What amount has been reserved in the estimates to assure that the feasibility study of the Chignecto canal will be carried out satisfactorily and that a report will come out which will prove once and for all whether this project, which is needed in the Atlantic provinces and is being requested by them, is feasible?

I ask the Minister of Finance, what is the government doing about the survey of the Northumberland strait causeway to link Prince Edward Island with New Brunswick? We know that approximately three quarters of a million dollars has been spent to date, and we are not even able to obtain a report from the Minister of Public Works on the results of this survey. I ask the minister, what action is being taken by the government to provide certain ameliorating works which would be directed toward the development of harbours in fishing areas and fishing communities? In these communities the level of unemployment is among the highest in Canada. We have the means to provide work for these fishermen if the Department of Public Works will provide the necessary facilities so they can carry on their fishing operations.

I ask the minister, what is there in the budget to guarantee capital investments in the Atlantic provinces, to guarantee certain tax incentives which would be an inducement for industry to establish in the Atlantic provinces? We have now in my own constituency great development possibilities. A new company has just been formed to carry on the development of the mineral deposits in Gloucester county. I ask the minister, what incentive is there in the budget which will encourage companies to proceed with such developments that would mean so much not only to my own constituency but to the whole province of New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces generally?

In my opinion one of the major points in the budget has to do with the operations of the exchange equalization fund. The Minister of Finance, in a most obscure and indefinite proposal, has promised to influence the movement of the Canadian dollar toward appropriate levels. How far down will it go? How much will it be depreciated? No one seems to know, including the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Don't kid yourself.

Mr. Robichaud: Let us see what the Minister of Finance had to say about this very same problem just a little over a year ago, on March 31, 1960. I quote the minister's own words as recorded on page 2673 of Hansard:

> I have seen some references to a demand that the government should deliberately devalue the dollar. This kind of talk might have been appropriate when Canada was on the gold standard, or even when it maintained a fixed exchange rate. We have not been on the gold standard for half a century and we have not had a fixed exchange rate for a decade.
> An attempt by the government artificially to lower the external price of the Canadian dollar would involve borrowing or raising by taxes very large sums of money with which to buy up foreign exchange. It might well be that the government could not reduce the inflow of funds sufficiently without imposing direct controls on capital movements and then on the movement of goods. Apart from the economic objections to such policies it would be a very difficult matter to work out effective technical means of control. Even then the controls would not be effective unless the objective were one which commanded the broad public support which is necessary for general compliance. In other words we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

It would be interesting to know the reasons for such a transformation in the minister's attitude toward devaluation of the dollar. It seems to be generally agreed that had the premium been forced down and kept down some years ago it would have helped Canada keep down the rising costs which now menace our economy. We ask the question, are high living costs going to result from the new policy of the government? We already have indications which lead us to believe this will be the case. With such high costs part of our general way of life, we ask ourselves how effective this action to reduce the dollar premium will be. If the government, even with $1.5 billion in successive deficits, has failed to provide an incentive to promote business and stimulate expansion, how does it expect to succeed by the implementation of these policies? Where is this relief from high costs, this relief from high taxes about which the minister was talking when sitting on the opposition side of the house? The Minister of Finance must admit he has failed to introduce a program which will lift the economy out of the doldrums. He is offering too little too late.

The incentive needed for a move forward is not found anywhere in this budget. The 1961 budget may be described as a deluge of words which will dry out with time, without producing any satisfactory results. This budget is a confession of failure when viewed in the light of the promises of a balanced budget, fiscal responsibility and a free exchange rate. Doubts, and very serious doubts, are being expressed throughout the country on the uncertainty of the measures introduced for the purpose of stimulating the economy. What is needed is a program which will result in peak employment and promote a boom in the economy. Such a program is not included in the present budget.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is most interesting to note the comments from all parts of the country on the budget introduced in the house by the Minister of Finance, on June 20 last.

This anxiously awaited budget seems to have caused a pleasant surprise to those who are interested in the development of the Canadian nation and who were wondering what action would be taken by the government as regards present problems.

Mr. Speaker, before coming to the heart of the matter and expressing my views about some of the measures contained in the budget, I should like once more to emphasize the harm done to our domestic and external economy by that policy of doom and gloom advocated for too long by both parties of the opposition. By incessantly harping on unemployment, by predicting large, tragic disasters, by repeating on the hustings, over the radio and on television that the Canadian economy was going to pieces, the Liberals succeeded in bringing about such unfortunate results that the effects are still felt both in Canada and abroad.

Mr. Habel: That was the present government's doing.

Mr. Sevigny: The misgivings thus sown in the hearts of Canadians have succeeded in checking development projects in many industries and the building projects of several contractors. A large number of Canadians were prevented from putting their money in circulation by buying a car, furniture or a house.

We succeeded, in spite of our opponents' efforts to the contrary, in putting our economy back on the high road to new records, but the government is convinced that the expansion could have started earlier and would have achieved more progress if our friends opposite had not spread fear and even dread in the minds of Canadians with such utterances of gloom and doom so often made by the leaders of both opposition parties.

Even more unfortunate is the fact that foreign newspapermen got hold of the speeches made by our hon. friends and have made no bones about saying everywhere that Canada is no longer the country with a future for everyone, but a land of depression with nothing but unemployment, gloom and misery.

And I urge the members of the opposition to read the articles of certain English papers like The People, The Observer, News of the World and others. They will find that far from praising Canada, foreign reporters, inspired by speeches that had been made right here in Canada, almost advise English and European people to stay away from Canada and to keep their investments away from this country.

The consequences of that attitude are already being felt as far as both investments and business are concerned and I, for one, feel sure that Canadians will have to work hard to give Canada back its reputation, which the opposition has unfortunately and perhaps unwillingly succeeded in tarnishing.

It is one thing to yearn after political power, but it is another to try to get it by any means.

I sincerely hope that the day is not too far off when our opponents will finally learn what it is to indulge in petty politics, to place the interests of a party above the better interest of the nation.

Mr. Habel: You have learned it in the past three years.

(Text):

Mr. Sevigny: If the budget has been so well received in financial, business, banking and commercial circles, it is because the experts recognize that in many ways the budget is an attempt to use fiscal and commercial policies for national purposes. A definite effort is being made to arrange the various taxes in a fashion which will be helpful and stimulating to many segments of the economy.

The government has never claimed that it could, by itself, correct all the ills and worries which have afflicted the businessmen of this nation during the last few years. However, the government does accept the view that business climate-making is one of its basic roles. It has become obvious that because of the measures adopted in last year's budget and also in the so-called baby budget of last November, the bottom of the recent slump has been passed and that our nation can look forward to a long period of definite prosperity. The present budget will permit the business indicators in the forthcoming months to mark progress, and there is no doubt that the people of this country will give credit where it is due. That is to the Conservative government, which has given to Canada a budget which will contribute to the expansion of the nation. Even our severest critics will admit that the budget contains a large number of items which will be beneficial to Canada. In answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who seems to be so engrossed in his newspaper, I will now name only a few.

Mr. Benidickson: I am listening.

Mr. Sevigny: I cite the encouragement of research in Canada, the extension of the functions and powers of the industrial development bank—

Mr. Benidickson: It was the financial experts I wanted the hon. member to talk about.

Mr. Sevigny: —which will certainly slow down the sell-out of Canadian businesses. The measures affecting the bond markets make sense, and the announced plan for a thorough examination of our financial institutions is timely and a positive necessity.

The positive improvements and the original thinking which is at the basis of this budget indicate the amount of work that went into its preparation. Some will ask how it is that these measures were not adopted previously. The answer lies in simply stating that there is still a great deal to be done, that caution must at all times be exercised in view of the inflexibility of the present situation, and that great thought must be exercised before stepping forward in any manner or form.

There are, we know, some serious problems which confront the Canadian leaders. The question of chronic unemployment is one. The slow moving upsurge of our secondary manufacturing industries, the serious problem of the continuous increase in foreign ownership, and the imbalance in our foreign payments are all problems of deep concern to those interested in the financial and monetary future of Canada. These basic problems exist and are recognized by the government. It will also be recognized by the people that the measures contained in the budget are steps in the right direction and are intended to correct these ills which unfortunately affect this nation.

There has been a great deal of talk concerning the effects of large imports into our country. There is no doubt in my mind that many industries are seriously affected by the determined efforts of our competitors in foreign lands to rival our Canadian products in our own domestic fields and also in other countries where we offer our merchandise. The problems of these affected industries are of deep concern to us, and we are at all times studying all questions which may permit us to help the situation of these affected industries.

However, it is rather obvious that we cannot tolerate the threatened destruction of certain industries by an exaggerated flow of imports. It also must be realized that if we expect to sell our goods in foreign lands, we must also expect to trade with other countries and to give to foreign businessmen a chance to offer their products to the Canadian public. If we build a thick tariff wall around our nation we shall quickly discourage foreign merchants from considering Canada a nation with which they can trade, and we shall isolate ourselves completely from world markets. This, of course, is most undesirable and cannot be contemplated seriously by those who study the economic picture.

The answer to our problem lies instead in an ever increasing flow of exports which will mean increased production by our manufacturers with the resultant additional employment of labour and the inevitable expansion of premises and manufacturing capacity. In order to increase our exports to foreign lands a high pressure and very effective campaign has already been started by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in order to sell Canada, to sell Canadian products, and especially to sell abroad Canadian know-how. This campaign has been started, is progressing and is bringing immediate results.

In order for this campaign to gain steam it was necessary to take a long, hard look at the present price structure of our products in comparison with the prices of similar goods produced in competitive nations. The study made us realize that in many sectors our Canadian products were possibly not overpriced if we looked at the price structure according to domestic patterns, but were certainly offered at prices which were unattractive to foreign buyers. It is just plain common sense to accept the fact that if a buyer considers two products of similar quality he will almost inevitably purchase the article offered at a lower figure; and it is futile to hope that results can be achieved by those who maintain a rigid price structure and remain inflexible in their bargaining tactics.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was in the process of explaining the nature of the very strong export drive which had started in Canada, promoted by this government, in order to interest more and more foreign buyers in the quality and the worth of products manufactured in our land. I was mentioning the necessity of being competitive in the pricing of our products, and that it was impossible for Canadian manufacturers to hope to secure orders unless they could offer products of equal quality at prices which were close to those of our competition. I was explaining that the only way we could expect a heavier flow of business was by getting more and more orders from people interested in what we could produce and making these people aware of the fact that our prices were competitive.

It is of course extremely important to bring our prices in line with those offered by our foreign competitors. In this particular field government can help, and the government in fact has done just this in the recent moves which will produce the devaluation of our dollar, which is already quite evident, on world markets. In order to give help to those interested in the export field it is logical to reduce the value of our Canadian dollar. It must be remembered that one of the reasons for Canada's enormous expansion in the immediate post-war years was the fact that our dollar was then below the value of the all-powerful United States currency. There is no doubt that a devalued Canadian dollar will give our merchants an additional incentive which they need to offer Canadian products at competitive prices.

This will mean more sales, more revenue for our manufacturers; and there is no doubt that this additional revenue will be used to expand industries and production facilities. There is also no doubt that since research will be tax free, according to the measures introduced in this budget, a vast program will be undertaken by both our larger and our average industries to improve existing facilities and also in order to find new products which can be produced in Canada and sold in our domestic and foreign markets. This will mean more production and more jobs for our people.

The government is doing its share in this respect, but it must be realized by all Canadian people that government cannot do it all alone. If business is to increase, prosperity will ensue mostly through the combined efforts of all those interested in Canadian trade and Canadian industry. It must be realized that it is a fallacy to expect that this can all be done by the government alone. Charity well ordained begins at home, and those interested in their own welfare must themselves make the individual effort necessary for the prosperity of their business.

There are two things that should be done by private enterprise people in order to increase the amount of business that can be done here in Canada. First of all industry must take a close and very hard look at its price structure and accept the fact that although higher prices may in some cases mean higher revenues, they will also mean a smaller flow of trade. Industry today must try to make its profit more through a large volume of business than through high profits on the individual items.

Industry must also accept the necessity to co-operate with the labour force of Canada. It may be that additional people could be employed if more people worked fewer hours in various factories. Industry must continually be ready to discuss its problems with the labour leaders in a spirit of friendship and co-operation. On the other hand, labour must realize that incessant demands for higher wages or increased benefits can quite easily paralyse the well-ordained plans of industry. Labour must realize that threats which too often result in disastrous strikes are not the answer to the welfare of the individual worker or to the expansion of individual industries. Labour must try to adjust its requests to the capabilities of the employers and only thus, through co-operation between labour and industry, will we achieve the results we seek.

The budget indicates that the resources of the industrial development bank will be increased from the present $160 million to about $400 million. This is a step in the right direction, since it means that a large number of Canadian firms will be permitted to avail themselves of the facilities offered by the industrial development bank. There is no doubt that this is preferable for those who wish to expand to borrow from Canadian sources and pay interest in Canada rather than go to the United States and elsewhere to secure the capital sums required for expansion. The main aim of this extension of the services of the industrial development bank is to help Canadians retain ownership of their companies instead of having to look abroad for new capital and new investments. This will certainly help all firms which have problems arising from financial consolidations and changes in ownership.

There is no doubt that this question of financing or refinancing private enterprise has presented a very serious problem to the industrialists and manufacturers of this nation. Too many of our people have had to go south of the border or to European countries to try to secure the necessary funds to finance the expansion of their existing business or to build and open up new businesses. Yet there is, here in Canada, a vast source of money, and by affording to our people the chance to borrow this money from the industrial development bank and pay the interest which is normal on such loans we shall make it possible for this money to remain in Canada and work for the better interests of Canadians, thus in the long run enriching the citizens of this country.

There is too little time at my disposal to emphasize the definite gains which will be derived from the new budget by those interested in the automobile industry, the textile industry, the electronics industry and so many other fields of Canadian endeavour. But a study of the budget will permit the realization that this budget has been prepared by men who understand that the expansion of Canada is closely related to the prosperity of our Canadian businessmen. All will benefit from the dynamic measures contained in this expansionist budget, and within a very short time the useful effects of the minister's strategy will be felt in all sectors of our economy. They will be of benefit to Canadian industry, to Canadian business and, in particular, to the labour force and Canadian farm industries.

(Translation):

Before I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in particular to the people of the province of Quebec who take an interest in the economic life of the country. The Minister of Finance's budget presents some most interesting aspects this year. The concern for economic expansion which is apparent in each and every one of the measures which were announced, should please all French Canadians who have, for a long while, been trying to find means of enabling our fellow citizens of the province of Quebec to participate more and more in the economic life of the country.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec have made giant strides in the past 15 years; everywhere in the province, one can see flourishing industries managed by our people and projects which will certainly lead our businessmen to unprecedented achievements. But as I said earlier, this economic development that keeps growing from day to day does not come about of itself. The government alone is unable to ensure the economic welfare of the nation, neither is it possible for businessmen, tradesmen and industrialists of Quebec to expect reaching the required level of prosperity if the federal government does not give them help, if possible. Fortunately, we note that confidence now prevails among businessmen, on the one hand, and government authorities on the other hand, and I am convinced that the businessmen of my province, the financiers, the industrialists, in a word, all those interested in the steady development of our economy, will welcome the Fleming budget as a progressive measure likely to enable the province to forge ahead toward further achievements.

Mr. Speaker, there is no denying that the province of Quebec has undergone tremendous development in the past 15 years, and whatever my hon. friends in the opposition may say, I think a large part of the economic success of our province was due to the man who ran the province during that period. I therefore pay tribute to a great Canadian and a great Quebecker, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, who did more than his share to enable the French Canadians to develop the potential that existed in the province and to take advantage of all the wealth that was to be found.

Today, steps are being taken to promote economic development in the province. Everywhere we see chambers of commerce and civic action groups at work, trying to improve the conditions of industry and trade in our community and to find means of developing the tremendous natural resources, of which we have barely scratched the surface, in our land.

I am sure the Fleming budget has been hailed with respect by Quebec business people, because they realize it contains provisions that are likely to help the future economic development of the province. It is indeed unfortunate that our opponents, instead of realizing that this budget represents an economic effort that will enable the whole country to go forward, again only repeat the same old songs of depression, poverty, despair, and the same prophecies of gloom and doom for the future. If at least they could occasionally come forward with constructive suggestions that could perhaps enable us to further improve present conditions, we would gladly accept their criticism, but as long as their remarks remain destructive rather than constructive, I feel that we and every right thinking citizen of Canada should support and thank the Minister of Finance for so ably introducing a truly constructive budget.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this stage of the budget debate to be repetitive in any way in respect to the remarks I made when we were discussing the subamendment. However, because of the limitation of time it was not possible for me at that time to comment in respect to one or two aspects of the presentation made by the Minister of Finance in relation to which I desire to speak this afternoon. I personally feel it rather imperative to answer some of the statements which have been made by the cabinet ministers and backbenchers of the Tory party who have spoken in regard to this matter.

In particular I should like to make some comment regarding the speech we have just heard delivered by the Associate Minister of National Defence. I noted that in the last words of his English presentation he made comments in respect to what he called the Fleming strategy. I suggest it would have been far more appropriate for him to refer to it as the Fleming tragedy. If we try to assimilate the speeches of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works and the Associate Minister of National Defence, we can only arrive at one conclusion; it is conclusively apparent that the Tory government since it took office some four years ago has been slipping and drifting along with no more knowledge of its destination than a blind man on a raft floating somewhere between the coast of British Columbia and the coast of Hawaii.

It is not very often that I become incensed in this house, but the Associate Minister of National Defence made one remark which, if he had said nothing else, should certainly have brought me to my feet. I refer to that despicable statement he made almost at the beginning of his presentation to the effect that both parties in opposition were doing a disservice to Canada and bringing disgrace upon it because they had the temerity and the daring at this session of parliament to rise not once but many times regarding the serious problem of unemployment. I say that is a despicable statement. He may expect Mr. Coyne to shut up and say nothing, but he need not expect those individuals who realize their responsibilities as members of parliament to do the same.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

I have the honour to represent, as I have represented for a great many years, a constituency in Vancouver which is strictly a working class residential area. After representing it as an M.L.A. and M.P. for 28 years I feel I know my responsibilities to the residents, and one of those responsibilities has regard to employment. If they are unemployed I maintain it is my duty to seek an answer to the situation. According to the Associate Minister of National Defence, to do so is to do a disservice as a member of this house to the people of this country.

I should like to draw to his attention and to the attention of all hon. members of this house the situation which exists in my home city. According to the records I find that from March 1, 1960 until March 31, 1961, a period of 12 months, the unemployment insurance office in the city of Vancouver paid out more than $25 million in unemployment insurance benefits. Why has that office had to do that? I suggest the answer lies in the fact that during that 12-month period there were 134,000 applications for unemployment insurance benefits. Let us not forget that although there may have been 134,000 applications and $25 million paid out in unemployment insurance benefits during that 12-month period, that is not the grand total of unemployment, because many thousands of individuals were not entitled during that period to unemployment insurance benefits.

What do the figures show in relation to the Vancouver unemployment insurance office during that time? Those figures show that in January of this year there were 40,651 individuals drawing unemployment insurance benefits from that one office in Vancouver at a cost of over $3½ million. Because this government always likes to refer to the lesser figure, let us consider the best month of that 12-month period, which was July. In July, 20,945 individuals were drawing unemployment insurance benefits from that one Vancouver office at a cost of over $1 million. Taking that 12-month period from March 31, 1960 to March 31, 1961 we find that the average number of unemployed individuals was 5,000 more than during the same period a year before.

The Associate Minister of National Defence has the unmitigated gall to say that because we are representing the people in our constituencies in respect to this matter of unemployment in an attempt to do whatever is possible, we are doing a disservice to this country. Let me suggest that it is not a disgrace to be a responsible member of parliament and to question the government's policy in regard to this situation, but that it is a disgrace on the part of the government, because it has done nothing about it and has not found a solution to the problem.

I suggest the Associate Minister of National Defence should study basic economics before rising in this house, if he has a desire to intelligently discuss a finance budget. What did he say in this regard? He said, and I quote his words: "Canadians will have to work harder to overcome our disgraceful name overseas."

I think Canadians are prepared to work harder, Mr. Speaker, but we have between 30,000 and 40,000 in the Vancouver area who would love to have the opportunity to work at all, let alone work harder. Produce your policies to produce the jobs. The Associate Minister of National Defence said that really hard work went into the budget. I suppose that is true, but it is too bad that the hard work has not produced more than what we have seen so far.

But even with all that the associate minister said in favour of the budget, what did he also say? I wrote it down as he said it. He said that one of the biggest problems still facing the government is the problem of chronic unemployment. Yes, the minister said that chronic unemployment is still with us, in the same way that R. B. Bennett used to talk about prosperity being just around the corner. The budget does not solve the problem.

The minister also said that we had to be careful about tariffs because tariff walls will isolate us from foreign markets. I agree with him. But what I cannot understand is that a so-called responsible minister should get up, put forward a bunch of rotten window dressing and tell us that increased tariffs will be dangerous and will isolate us, while at the same time completely ignoring the fact that a devalued dollar is the same thing as a tariff increase. A devaluated dollar is a tariff increase because we have to pay for imports in Canadian dollars. Other countries have to export to Canada in order to obtain Canadian dollars, and if we have to pay for those goods with devaluated dollars then for every 1 per cent our dollar goes down in value it is the same as a tariff rise by a similar amount. So why should we have this type of foolishness from one who is supposed to be a responsible minister of the crown?

Why does the government completely ignore the basic facts of economics? I can still hear the eloquence and vehemence of the associate minister when he said that a flow of exports is our goal. We will all agree that a flow of exports should be our goal. We will all agree that everything has to be done to increase our exports. But there the minister stops. We are not going to export for nothing. We have to be paid for our exports in Canadian dollars, and how do these countries get Canadian dollars unless we import?

The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works, the Associate Minister of National Defence, every backbencher completely ignores that side of the balance sheet. Before we are finished with this budget I think it is going to be very interesting so far as the other side of the balance sheet is concerned if we can get an explanation of Conservative economics that will give some indication that the budget is not simply window dressing, not just wishful thinking; that the government, as I said, is not just drifting like a blind man on a raft between British Columbia and Hawaii, that they have thought things through.

There, of course, is where I challenge them. They have not thought things through. They do not know how to think things through. They are just hoping that something will turn up to rescue them from the fiasco brought about by their own complete and absolute ineptitude. If they carry on as they have for the last four years there is only one rescue, war; and God forbid that that should happen, because it would be suicide for the world. I say, sir, that I just want to take some of the statements made by the cabinet ministers who have already spoken.

However, I do not want only to be critical. Let me offer something they have not thought of that may help a bit. The Minister of Finance has brought in a deficit budget. Without doubt there are times when a deficit budget is in the interests of the country to deal with an immediately serious situation. But I think the Minister of Finance in his presentation has been absolutely unfair in bringing forward a deficit budget without national planning. Let it be remembered that the deficit budget of $650 million—and I do not agree with that figure because with the borrowing they are going to have to do it will be over $1 billion—is tied in with the three previous deficit budgets, and the presentation of a further deficit budget is only an immediate solution to get the government off the hook. What they are doing about national planning is saying to our children and our children's children, "You will pay for the incompetence of this government". The deficit has to be repaid, and it has to be repaid with interest. If we know this government, the deficit is not only going to have to be repaid with interest but the interest is going to have to be paid by further borrowings involving more interest. In other words, it is our children and our children's children who are being asked to pay to get this incompetent government off the hook on which it finds itself through not being able to solve the problems to which they told us they knew all the answers.

I say, sir, this is not fair. I imagine our children will have enough problems without us passing on our problems to them. That is what will happen unless, of course, we have a change to a good government.

As I have said, I recognize that the immediate occasion may call for a deficit budget, but at the same time I believe there should be planning along with it. The associate minister said that a lot of work had gone into the budget, but I say that the work was only half done. I suggest that along with a $650 million deficit budget there should have been a policy statement involving government control of investment capital so the government could at least have some direction as to the type of productive work that would be initiated by that investment. I say there should have been a policy of control of excess depreciation reserves. Let us not fool ourselves. Corporation after corporation in Canada is cheating its stockholders, cheating the corporation and cheating the income tax department because of the way it manipulates its depreciation reserves. There should have been some provision in that regard as an offset to the deficit.

This afternoon the Associate Minister of National Defence said so piously that charity begins at home. That being so, why was there not some policy statement and planning with regard to government control of excess profits so as to do what the minister said we should do, and see that the profit-hungry corporations of this country have a decent sense of responsibility? Members may not want to admit it, but these corporations do not have a decent sense of responsibility so far as profits are concerned. They want more and more and more, and the only time they will ever behave is when they are brought under control. It was necessary to control excess profits in time of war, and I say it is still necessary in the critical period through which Canada is passing at the present time.

Yes, the Associate Minister of National Defence really made quite a remark when he said that industry must limit its profits. I am afraid industry will not do so of its own accord, and that is one reason we must have a national government policy. I have mentioned excess profits and I also mention capital gains. When I think of the many speeches about Texas buccaneers made by hon. members opposite when they sat on this side of the house, I also recall that they have been in office four years and as yet they have not done anything about these buccaneers. What is one of the big reasons why money comes into Canada? It is because the United States has a 25 per cent capital gains tax. Canada, of all the countries in the world, is the happy hunting ground of the financial, monopoly buccaneers of the world. The minister referred to charity beginning at home, and I think it is time that Canada looked at this question of industry limiting its profits.

I could have found a deficit budget far more acceptable if the government had followed through on national planning. I have just given a few indications of what I mean by national planning. Let us go further. I am following along the lines suggested by the Associate Minister of National Defence. During the latter part of his remarks he said that our prices must be competitive. Of course our prices must be competitive if we are going to succeed in the export market. Why then, when the Minister of Finance announced the establishment of a policy to devaluate the Canadian dollar, did he not introduce policies to enable us to remain competitive in the production field?

Of course in my own province the pulp and paper and lumber industries are going to gain some advantage in export markets as a result of the devalued dollar. However, Mr. Speaker, their production costs are going to go up. Why is this? This result will be produced because none of the major machinery required in the pulp and paper and lumber industries is manufactured in Canada. It has to be imported into Canada from the United States. This imported machinery which they must have to maintain production has to be purchased with the devaluated dollar.

Government policy, therefore, is increasing the costs of production of these industries, in spite of the fact that the minister who spoke before me said we have to maintain a competitive level. If the government had thought things through, at the same time they devalued the dollar to aid our exports they would have changed the tariff level on those things which must be imported to maintain our productive capacity. If this had been done we could maintain our present cost of production and not increase it. Both sides of the question have to be considered. This has never been done by the government. They are not facing up to the issues, the practical issues, the financial issues or the economic issues. They are not wearing gold-hued glasses, they are wearing a blindfold. This is dynamite for Canada, to have a government wearing a blindfold.

What I have said with regard to cost of production is also true with regard to the cost of living. The government must have known, if they gave any thought to it at all—surely they have economic advisers who could tell them—that if you devalue the dollar you have to pay more for your imports. I want to speak now about one thing, and that is the imports into Canada that we do not and cannot produce.

I have spoken about this in relation to manufacturing, but how about the consumers, the forgotten men and women in this budget? Is there anything in this budget to protect them from the devalued dollar as it affects the necessities of life? Has anything been done about coffee, tea, spices, or about the many other things we have to import because it is impossible to grow them or manufacture them here? A government that was thinking across the board, a government that understood economics, a government that had any interest at all in the consumer, when devaluing the dollar would have given some thought to the regulation of the economy so that as the dollar went down in exchange value the tariff would go down correspondingly on those necessities that must be imported so that the standard of living would be maintained. No, sir, we have nothing of that type. Not only does the government not take care of those things that we have to import, but they have not even protected us in relation to those things we grow and manufacture ourselves. Some of these things are already increasing in price.

What I said about the tea, spices, coffee and cocoa is also true of the imported fruits and vegetables which come on the market prior to our own. An announcement has already been made that prices on the Vancouver market for fruits and vegetables are going up this week. My hon. friend laughs. The increase may be half a cent, one cent or two cents, but this means a lot to old age pensioners, blind pensioners, veteran pensioners, in fact to everybody. When it comes to basic economics all these things have been completely ignored.

Why has something not been done directly to encourage Canadian industry? Sometimes I think they do not want to encourage Canadian industry. Let me give one example. I know of a firm that started manufacturing in Vancouver and which now has a manufacturing plant in Ontario, one which is going to mean a great deal in the future. Approximately two thirds of this manufacturer's product is produced in Vancouver or in Clinton, Ontario. About one third has to be imported from the United States. Although this manufacturer has travelled from Vancouver to Halifax he cannot find a plant that can or will produce what is absolutely essential to his product. He has to bring this element in from the United States. He is faced with excise and customs taxes on those items he is forced to import of 27½ per cent plus 10 per cent. Here is a man who is trying to develop a business in Canada and get things going, yet he is faced with customs and excise taxes of 27½ per cent plus 10 per cent on those elements he cannot obtain in Canada.

I say, sir, it is quite obvious that this budget has not been thought through, that this budget is related to only one side of the question and not to both sides of the question. It is a deficit budget, but its implications have not been considered. I do not think that is right. We hope, Mr. Speaker, that part of it which is good will really work, but we are rather afraid, because the whole budget has not been thought through, the repercussions can be serious. The rosy picture painted by the Minister of Finance and others may not be realized because they refuse to see both sides of the picture.

I want to conclude by saying, and all the supporting speeches made on the budget thus far only indicate, that it has been half thought out and that it is half baked. However, there is still time this session to rectify the omissions, and that is the most important thing. I appeal to the government and to the Minister of Finance. The well-being and the welfare of the people of Canada demand that before this parliament closes, prorogues or is dissolved, the government and the Minister of Finance in particular get busy and overcome their four years of irresponsibility and indecision and give some indication at least that they know something about government planning and administration.

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, last week on the public works estimates the hon. member for Laurier neglected the affairs of Laurier and took up the time of this house by making another incursion into Stormont. He is either an incurable busybody or he suffers from an unquiet conscience.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): No. The hon. member can ask questions afterwards.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a very reasonable one.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I shall be glad to answer questions afterwards. The hon. member for Laurier put up a smokescreen around all the damage he had done to his home constituency of Stormont by locating the seaway locks on the United States side and then abandoning this constituency like a sinking ship. Now that the present member and the government of which he is a supporter are attempting to rectify some of this damage by erecting a harbour, he is attempting to jump on the band wagon and claim credit for it. The people of Cornwall and the people of the St. Lawrence valley know that the time to have built a Canadian seaway was when the seaway was being constructed. No 27-foot channel ending in an 80-foot wall is a substitute for a Canadian seaway. The disastrous decline in tonnage on the Cornwall canal is due not to the competition of air lines, buses or trucks, as the hon. member for Laurier alleged, but is due to the fact that the Cornwall canal is now a stagnant backwater which also ends in a blank wall. The traffic now passes through the United States seaway locks.

If the new industrial complex adjacent to the seaway locks was the result of cheap power in New York state, as the hon. member contends, rather than the United States seaway locks, then why on earth did not the hon. member, who did all the seaway dealings for his government, and his provincial Liberal colleague in Ontario not endeavour to protect the interests of this area? Obviously the time to have extracted concessions from Ontario hydro was when the joint project was being constructed, at this time when the Ontario hydro were looking out for all of Ontario by putting the power from this area on the Ontario grid in the same way the power from Niagara Falls serves the whole of the province of Ontario.

I should also like to ask the hon. member for Laurier how much of the $800 million spent on the seaway that he boasts so much about went to Cornwall people, as he alleged, and how much went to Montreal and Toronto contractors. My precedessor also said that the former municipal administration in Cornwall spent $140,000 to expropriate land at Gray's creek at Cornwall for harbour purposes on the recommendation of the C.N.R. economic survey, which he no doubt ordered himself. The overburdened taxpayers of Cornwall will be very much interested indeed in knowing who is responsible for this large and so far useless expenditure, with all the interest that has accrued thereon.

Last year I informed this House of Commons of the assassination of a city by its favourite son and of its betrayal by the former minister of transport.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one ever did as much for Cornwall as the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): This hon. member tried to justify himself again last week on the estimates. He can twist and squirm till the cows come home, but he will not get off the hook. When I was a boy down on the farm, if a trusted dog killed a chicken we tied it around his neck until it rotted. The hon. member for Laurier today has a chicken tied around his neck called Cornwall seaway city.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it eviscerated?

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): It is eviscerated. The people of Stormont and the people of Laurier see it every time they look at him. He is a desolate man. By night he is haunted by the ghosts of two stillborn infants called the Canadian seaway locks. By day he is pursued by two illegitimate children born of a United States mother and called the Eisenhower and Snell locks. There are persistent rumours in northern New York state that the people of Massena, the village across the river from Cornwall, are going to erect a suitable monument to the father of the Snell and Eisenhower locks. They say that that mausoleum in Cornwall, that consolation prize for Cornwall—I refer to the St. Lawrence seaway headquarters building which he erected as a monument to himself—is not appreciated there. It is located in the wrong country.

I did not intend to go into the matter of the budget, but I cannot allow this opportunity to go by without saying a few words on unemployment insurance and the budget. I firmly believe that this latest budget will do very much to hasten the economic recovery which is evident not only in Canada but in the United States. However, it is quite possible that with the increased automation we have throughout North America and indeed throughout the world we shall still have a large measure of structural unemployment even during periods of economic booms and expansion. If so, I should like to make a few suggestions regarding unemployment insurance and such matters for the consideration of the government.

My first suggestion is this. I believe it is desirable that the age of retirement be lowered to 60 years and that we spend more money on contributory old age pensions and less on unemployment insurance. It is desirable that older men enjoy the evening of their years in comfort and leisure so that men in the prime of life can have the jobs that will provide for their families and enable them to retain their self-respect.

I now proceed to my second suggestion. British Columbia fishermen have been known on occasion to make as much as $8,000 to $10,000 in several months if they get an exceptionally good catch. Loggers sometimes make the same amount during a cutting season of five to six months. Women who happen to be married to prosperous businessmen or professional men often quit work after a few months owing to pregnancies or for other reasons. In each of these three cases, and no doubt in other similar instances, these people draw unemployment insurance for the remainder of the year. When the breadwinner of a family has a total annual income exceeding a certain ceiling—and that ceiling, of course, can vary with the number of children or other dependents—I believe that he or his spouse should not be eligible for unemployment insurance for the remainder of that year. If the regulations were changed in this respect it would not only reduce government expenditures but would be conducive to thrift, self-reliance and independence in our people.

My third and final suggestion with regard to unemployment is more far-reaching. I believe there should be a fluctuating scale of unemployment insurance payments varying with the degree of unemployment in the country. When unemployment is high the payments could be almost as high as the average person's income over the past three to five years. These high unemployment insurance payments would maintain consumer purchasing power at a high level, thus encouraging production in the country and increasing the number of jobs. When prosperity returns; when unemployment drops and jobs are plentiful, then the unemployment insurance payments could be reduced to a mere subsistence level. When unemployment is high, if some loafers do not want jobs it does not matter very much anyway because there are no jobs available; but when jobs are plentiful the low payments would induce them to go out and find one.

I realize that these suggestions will require very careful study and I think they would be difficult and complicated to administer. But if we can invent atomic bombs, it should not be beyond the wit of man to devise practical means of providing economic security in such a rich country as Canada. These suggestions with regard to unemployment insurance have the great merit, in my opinion, of fitting into our present economic system with a minimum of dislocation and without resorting to a socialistic planned economy.

I cannot resist a few comments on the budget and on the crisis in the Bank of Canada. First let me commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for resisting the urgent demand of the governor of the bank that he raise income taxes. Let me commend the minister on the aid his budget has given to the hard pressed textile and automobile industries. Let me further commend the minister on increasing the scope and resources of the industrial development bank. More than one motel in Stormont that I know of will be saved from bankruptcy if they take advantage of these provisions.

Let me especially commend the minister on reducing the exchange value of our dollar, which is the equivalent of a 5 per cent general increase in tariffs, to protect secondary industry at home and a 5 per cent general reduction in costs to assist our primary industries to sell abroad. Nothing could possibly do more at this time to stimulate our economy than this measure. Mr. Coyne's proposal, for a 10 per cent surcharge on tariffs, may be desirable but, like most of his suggestions, it is academic and entirely impractical because of our international treaty obligations, many of which were incurred by our predecessors.

Let me further commend the minister on his responsibility and restraint under extreme provocation in trying to work out some peaceable basis of co-existence with Mr. Coyne until his term of office expires at the end of this year. The minister did all that was humanly possible to avoid bringing the Bank of Canada into disrepute, but the governor's exhibitionist antics in calling an unprecedented press conference, in releasing his own budget statements and in exposing numerous confidential letters caused this whole unseemly explosion. Let me finally comment the minister on his refusal to bring this matter before a committee of the House of Commons, which would produce the kind of circus that would cause a crisis in confidence in the economy of this country throughout the world.

May I say also to the minister that if I were minister of finance Mr. Coyne would long ago have been fired as he deserved, and he would have been exposed to the ridicule of a parliamentary committee as he requests. That is probably one of the reasons why I am not minister of finance. May I say, further, that he would probably be in jail for misappropriation approaching larceny in using the facilities of the Bank of Canada to promote his private purposes; or if not on that indictment, for a breach of confidence approaching perjury in broadcasting the internal affairs of the bank in defiance of his oath of office.

In this whole unsavoury matter we must not lose sight of the fundamental issue involved. This fundamental issue is very, very simple indeed. It is this: who is running the country? Is it parliament and the people, or the bankers and the bureaucrats? The last time any parliament set up under the British system was challenged to this extent by any one man who was not representing the people was in 1611—and King Charles lost his head. If the Liberals had any conception at all of how our constitution works they would not be defending Mr. Coyne; they would be impeaching him, for he has usurped the functions of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Pearson) whose prime duty it is to criticize the government. There is an old proverb, Mr. Speaker: Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

I have here a fantastic letter, a letter such as never before in this country has passed between a public servant and a people's government. It is the latest scandal sheet put out by Mr. Coyne. The instigator of this scurrilous letter could only be the same pathological man whose conduct we witnessed in the House of Commons last night. May I ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)—I see he is not here, but I shall ask him at the earliest opportunity; no doubt my words will be conveyed to him and I would like an answer—whether he also supports Mr. Coyne in his bid to take over the leadership of the Liberal party; or does the hon. member prefer Mr. Charles Templeton, the apostate evangelist and C.B.C. actor? Which is his choice?

It is a pitiful sight, Mr. Speaker, to see gentlemen who were once honourable behaving like carrion, snapping at the dry bones of the leadership of a once great party. Even the younger and the more virile elements in this party, or what is left of it, have such a death wish that they hope to submerge themselves in the arms of the socialists. I need not waste much time on the antics of Mr. Coyne, which are known to all hon. members only too well. He went up and down this country preaching austerity and yet he voted himself, in the most clandestine manner, a pension for life of $25,000 annually after only six years of service.

Let me say further that that very great gentleman for whom I have always had the utmost respect, Rt. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, after 17 years of outstanding service in this house, during each of which he contributed toward his pension, now receives $3,000 per year less about $660 for old age pension. This is a standard of comparison. Mr. Coyne went about preaching; he pleaded with us; he pleaded with the government, with the country and with the ordinary housewife to reduce our imports, and yet he ordered custom-made cars from Kalamazoo, Michigan, for himself and his staff to ride around in. Then he criticized this government in a most political and partisan way, but when he was called before a Senate committee largely made up of his own political sympathizers, what had he to say? He had no cure; he had no panacea; he had not even a constructive suggestion to offer about the economy—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He was muzzled by the Minister of Finance, that is why.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement.

[Mr. Campbell (Stormont).]

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I say, Mr. Speaker, that there has been more confusion and more controversy among this government and its predecessor and the Bank of Canada in the last six years than there was in the previous 20 years under Mr. Graham Towers, who incidentally was appointed by Mr. R. B. Bennett. Mr. Graham Towers served his country in this position with distinction and competence. There is another basis of comparison.

Leading professors of economics in our Canadian universities, Mr. McLaughlin of the Royal Bank and most of our leading bankers, our union leaders and most responsible people in this country insist and indeed demand that this governor must go. Even the société générale de Belgique and other leading foreign financial houses in their bulletins distributed to their customers and clients throughout the world insist that confidence in the Canadian economy will be restored only with his passing. Yet we see in this house the members of the official opposition being his most valiant supporters.

May I say in closing that the Minister of Finance has the best possible precedent for his present action. Christ chased the money lenders from the temple when they became too arrogant. The Minister of Finance is, as it were, chasing them from the government in asking for the resignation of Mr. Coyne, who threatens the existence of the government by his arrogance.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday night, June 20, the whole country which had been waiting for a long time for its health report, heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) put forward in a very long and rather confused speech what he intended to do for the 1961-62 fiscal year.

The main theme of his speech, that night, was that he was introducing a budget of economic expansion and that, to this end, he intended to give Canada fiscal, financial and trade policies calculated to create more jobs, stimulate production, in a word, to improve the general state of our national economy.

Since this administration took over the Minister of Finance introduced four budgets and in every one of them, he gave indications of optimism and hope about Canada's economic situation.

In 1958, with a deficit, the Minister of Finance said he had inherited from the Liberals a bad economic and commercial situation, and especially unemployment, and that it was imperative to make adjustments in the then forthcoming year.

In 1959, with a deficit of $609 million, the minister admitted that there had been a recession, adding that our economy was recovering, and he predicted results and a marked reduction of the number of unemployed.

In 1960, after forecasting a surplus of $12 million and offering optimistic indications about the country's economy and the revenues that would accrue to the government, the minister expressed the idea that it was time we came back to a policy of balanced budgets. Of course the minister's aim was poor, since the forecast of a $12 million surplus was changed in fact to a deficit of $345 million.

With regard to his desire to have a balanced budget, this is what the Minister of Finance said last year, as reported on page 2681 of Hansard:

> —and in my budget speech a year ago I recommended to this house policies which were designed to bring us back to a position of budgetary balance as soon as the economy had recovered the losses of the recession and was moving firmly forward and upward to new record achievements in production, employment and investment.
> The position we have now reached, with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget, represents the fruits of carefully designed policies carried forward over the past 18 months. This is not something that has just happened. It is the result of considered aims and efforts.

As can be seen, Mr. Speaker, the minister was quite sure of himself, but "the result of considered aims and efforts" was not very good since the whole thing turned into a deficit.

Each time he presents a budget, the Minister of Finance announces that the economy is recovering and that the situation is again flourishing but, when he tables his next budget, he never admits that he was mistaken; he merely says that things are seen under a different light.

In the present budget, the minister tells us that the steps he advocates, such as the free devaluation of the dollar and the reduction of the interest rates, will not create inflation.

However, he does not give any reason to justify that statement. The devaluation of the dollar will mean more money for the tradesman, the businessman and the industrialist, but what about the small wage-earner and the labourer?

When I studied political science, I learned that the devaluation of a country's currency means a premium on exports. There can be no mistake but that our exports will increase, that tradesmen, businessmen will make more money, but will those surpluses result in a lower salary for workers and labourers? We do not know. But on the other hand, it is obvious that the price of our imports will climb and without listing them all, I have in mind certain essential commodities such as tea, coffee, sugar, cocoa and other products of which our families are in constant need. Who is going to pay, when the price of those commodities goes up? It will be the low-income people, the wage earners, the labourers, and if those people's incomes do not increase they will be faced with a rise in the cost of living which they will not be able to bear.

On that point, I should like to quote the statement of Mr. Donald MacDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Labour Congress, as reported in La Presse, last June 22.

> The federal budget contains no improvement in the field of social security, no true relief for the small taxpayer, nothing which is likely to increase substantially the consumer's purchasing power.

I regret that the minister did not give us his views on that point, and although I could ask him several questions on that matter, I will merely ask him one.

If the government must borrow money to finance its budget deficit, what will happen to the loans that municipalities, provinces or big business will have to raise abroad?

What will be the loss resulting from the exchange rate for the provinces and the municipalities which have already borrowed money abroad?

Has the government provided anything to allow public bodies to borrow more easily to finance their debt or undertake large scale projects in order to reduce unemployment?

The minister told us that his expansionist budget would create more jobs, would stimulate industry and increase production. Those words are delightful to hear, but I would have liked to know from the minister to what extent that expansion will go and how many jobs that new policy will create.

The minister is asking the provinces and the municipalities to raise a large part of their loans in Canada. I do not question the minister's good intention because it is a very desirable objective. But, if the government drains the market to finance its loans, what will be left to the provinces and the municipalities? They will be forced to go on foreign markets and to repay their matured loans with devaluated dollars. It means that they will find themselves paying millions of dollars that they did not expect to pay.

How will all that balance? We know nothing about that, because the minister provided no explanation. It would have been interesting to have his views on that point, in which case he would have not only enlightened the people on the matter but also made the borrowers aware of the effects of this measure.

I mentioned a few minutes ago that the Minister of Finance had stated that all those policies he was advocating would create jobs, but that he did not give us any idea of the number of jobs which would result for the Canadian people.

There constantly exist in Canada, Mr. Speaker, certain vague conditions which cannot escape being noticed by everyone, a chronic and gnawing disease to which the government does not seem to pay too much attention: unemployment.

I appreciate that since the beginning of the present session, the government has enacted legislation conceived to relieve unemployment. I am aware of such things as the productivity council, assistance to technical and vocational schools, financial assistance to small enterprise, double depreciation and amendments to the National Housing Act. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that all those measures are going to help create jobs and reduce unemployment.

But I do not agree that housing is going to remedy unemployment, because it has been found that Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, is also the city with the most houses to let. When the government got elected in 1957, it invested heavily in building. On the other hand, I recall that in 1957, the Hon. C. D. Howe, addressing the lumber dealers association, said that house building had to keep a steady pace because activity in the building trade is a sign of prosperity.

What happened is that we invested heavily in building and as a result, the price of the building lots went up. Houses are nowadays selling at prohibitive prices. And with the land selling at prohibitive prices, some builders have gone out of business.

I heard on television that in the city of Montreal, building had increased 4.6 per cent last year. That is no stimulus and no way of creating many jobs.

It is in the field of one-family units that the situation is most disastrous. A house is sold to a buyer who is asked a ridiculously low down payment. Enthused, he wants to have his own home. He goes visiting housing developments. He is told that he will have to pay only so much a month. But what happens is that when the municipality starts putting in sewers, waterworks and other services, the assessments increase and the amount the buyer expected to pay annually is changed. In addition, those who buy one-family houses in suburban Montreal have to buy a car for transportation, and after two or three years, which is not so surprising, the buyer cannot fulfil his obligations any more and has only one alternative, to give the house back to C.M.H.C.

I do not think that housing creates so many jobs and that it is the solution to the unemployment problem. Proof of that is in the still sizeable number of our unemployed.

I have here an article of La Presse of June 24 last, written following an interview with Mr. Charles Renaud, director of the department of social welfare of the city of Montreal. I quote:

> 2,740 needy unemployed in Montreal.

And the article goes on:

> In the month of May, 5.8 per cent of the 46,500 unemployed in Montreal were in dire need.

The 2,740 unemployed in question were no longer entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. Their unemployment insurance benefits were exhausted, and they had to rely on the social welfare service of the municipality for their subsistence. Naturally, they came under unemployment assistance and had to satisfy themselves with what they were given for their subsistence. Those people have no jobs at all. When are they going to work? God knows.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to certain statements made by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny). After having praised the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), he told us that his budget would be beneficial to Canadians. He made a digression to say that the people of Quebec who are interested in Canada's economic life will find something beneficial in this budget. I do not agree with the Associate Minister of National Defence on that point and I suggest to him that, quite to the contrary, all Quebeckers are interested in Canada's economic life, as are all other Canadians.

He told us of the climate of confidence that prevails in the relations between the government and the businessmen in our community. Of course since June 22, 1960, there is a climate of confidence in the province of Quebec between the government and the Quebec businessmen.

But the Associate Minister of National Defence wanted to go back 15 years and promote again the idea of erecting a monument to Mr. Duplessis, a matter of which we do not hear any more in Quebec. He wanted to tell us that Mr. Duplessis always sought, during the 15 years of his administration in the province of Quebec, to draw all the advantages he could out of his relations with Ottawa, to the benefit of the people of Quebec.

Well, I must tell the Associate Minister of National Defence that he is badly mistaken. For 15 years, Mr. Duplessis, for political expediency purposes, always criticized the Ottawa government, always tried to debase the authority of the government in Ottawa and to have the population of Quebec believe that Ottawa was not our country's capital, out that of a foreign country.

Now, if Mr. Duplessis has always taken advantage of federal legislation, as the Associate Minister of National Defence claims, I will say for his information that, because of Mr. Duplessis' stubbornness the province of Quebec lost in 15 years close to $1 billion, and here is how. In never wanting to participate in joint plans for forest protection; in never wanting to participate in joint plans for the construction of the trans-Canada highway; in refusing to co-operate in fiscal matters from 1944 to 1956; in refusing to accept grants for vocational schools.

Mr. Duplessis, logical in his autonomy, refused at that time to accept the federal government's money for vocational schools. During all the time Mr. Duplessis was at the head of the province of Quebec, I repeat for the Associate Minister of National Defence, the province lost $1 billion. If Quebec had that money today, perhaps there would not be so much unemployment in the province, and Quebeckers might be happier.

The Associate Minister of National Defence said, on two different occasions, that the opposition was singing dirges of gloom and doom and was voicing nothing but destructive criticism. I would say to the Associate Minister of National Defence that if he was unable to be in the house, he should at least have read the official report of debates to be better informed.

Last year, the house discussed the estimates of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) for 12 days. At that time the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) submitted to the Minister of Labour their proposals for an over-all plan to reduce unemployment. The hon. member for Laurier mentioned then that in 1945, when this country was in a transition period from war to peace, and our soldiers were coming back from overseas, an economic emergency had to be faced, and added that the Hon. C. D. Howe, then the minister of reconstruction, had tabled a white book in which he planned for the reconstruction of the country by means of an eight point over-all program to help our economy, which was to be carried out over a period of 15 years.

Now, again last year, as I was saying a few moments ago, hon. members for Laurier and Essex East submitted some constructive suggestions, and the government did not follow up any of those suggestions which formed an over-all plan to help remedy unemployment; nothing was done. Therefore, it ill becomes the Associate Minister of National Defence to say today that the opposition not only is singing dirges of doom and gloom, but fails to make any constructive criticism.

Mr. Speaker, the budget submitted by the Minister of Finance is a mess of high-sounding words. The Associate Minister of National Defence asked us to put our trust in this budget. He sees in it the corner stone of a remarkable development and maintains that thanks to the measures that are provided in it we will at least have a climate favourable to employment. Mr. Speaker, I want to stress that we must always take the budget of the Minister of Finance with a grain of salt. It is the fourth one which he has submitted, and, each year, he describes the situation as encouraging, saying that it is far from alarming, and the following year, as conditions have not improved, he still finds comforting words for describing it. But nothing happens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are right in not trusting the Minister of Finance, because this fourth budget submitted to us proves worse than the previous ones.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Meunier: Certainly.

Mr. Pigeon: Does the hon. member prefer Mr. Coyne to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Meunier: Listen, I do not know whether Mr. Coyne worked on the other budgets, I do not know whether he worked on this one. It is quite probable that Mr. Coyne had nothing to do with drafting this budget, but the Minister of Finance has never indicated that Mr. Coyne had helped him in any way with the preparation of previous budgets. I therefore cannot answer the hon. member's question, because it is baseless.

(Text):

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with other members of the house in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on his budget which will be welcomed by Canada, a budget designed to increase employment and expand the economy. The pleasing aspect of the budget is the fact that there is no increase in taxes, a fact that points up the faith, and justified faith, that the government has in the Canadian people and the Canadian economy.

The retention of the tariff on turkeys and the new five to ten cents per pound tariff on dressed chickens will be of great aid to our farmers. Tariff adjustments will be welcomed by the textile industry, although apparently the minister did not go far enough for the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger). He advocates the imposition of dumping duties on textiles. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) would like to impose higher tariffs on automobiles and parts entering Canada. Hon. members of the Liberal party have been advocating the adoption of the proposals of the governor of the Bank of Canada, increased taxes, increased tariffs and trade restrictions. How do they reconcile their present attitude with previous public statements? The views on tariffs of the member for Essex East, the spokesman for the party, seem to vary daily. People are rapidly reaching the conclusion that this is due to a complete lack of Liberal policy, cynical application of the divide and rule theory and political expediency of the moment.

The position of the third party was expressed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I assume he was speaking for his party when he stated in the house that he did not believe in tariffs. He preferred quotas and currency restrictions, the most vicious form of protectionism ever designed. The present government, in contrast with the opposition groups, is fully aware that Canadian prosperity depends on world trade, that high tariffs and restrictions have no place in our economy. The government policy is one of moderation designed to ensure a fair balance between all segments of the economy. The reduction of the sales tax on various items is welcome. The automobile industry will benefit and the consumer will benefit.

The municipalities have been requesting direct aid from the federal government. I do not know whether this is possible under our system of government, but the addition of further items to the long list of sales tax exempt materials required by municipalities, payment of 50 per cent of the labour costs on municipal projects under the winter works program, credit for the inception and extension of which must be given to this government, increased hospital construction grants and the new grants for equipping and building technical schools have been of great assistance to the municipalities and the taxpayers.

All branches of the pharmaceutical profession have recently been receiving a great deal of publicity with respect to the high cost of pharmaceuticals and pharmaceutical preparations. The critics were not well enough nor fully enough informed to justify their sweeping generalizations. It is for this reason that the profession welcomes the public inquiry to be conducted under the Combines Investigation Act. If the investigation should show that any segment of the profession is conspiring to maintain prices at an unwarranted level, I am sure the profession itself will take steps to remedy the situation.

The cost of medicine to the sick could be reduced by the removal of the sales tax on those ingredients used in medicinal preparations. I confess to extreme disappointment that this step was not taken in the present budget. I urge the Minister of Finance to give this suggestion careful consideration. If it would not be practical to remove the sales tax on the whole range of medicinal products, consideration might be given to removing the tax on those drugs and preparations contained in the schedules of the Food and Drugs Act and the provincial pharmacy acts, that is, for drugs and preparations that can be supplied to a customer only on the signed authorization of a doctor.

The pharmaceutical profession in all its phases is vitally concerned with the physical welfare of Canadians. There was deep disappointment throughout the profession when it was not given representation on the royal commission on health. It is felt by this group so closely associated with the health problems of Canadians that the inclusion of one of their members on the royal commission would have made a substantial contribution to the findings of the commission. I would ask the government to consider including a member of the pharmaceutical profession on the commission.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh). Perhaps my interest was due to the personal charm of the member and the ease of delivery. Certainly I could not maintain my interest in the hon. member's speech when reading Hansard. The whole speech was particularly sterile. The hon. member intoned with pathos: We have drought in the west which is deepening; we have insects in the west, and so on. These were words that would lead her listeners to think that she really believed that drought, grasshoppers and cutworms were the visitation of a higher power to punish the prairie people for daring to vote anything but Liberal. Bathos!

The members from the prairie provinces know that there is drought in certain areas; grasshoppers, cutworms and a late June frost hit others. The obvious relish with which the Liberal speakers catalogue these disasters leaves a sour taste in our mouths. We are too familiar with the hardship and frustration suffered by our farmers in affected areas. The members of this government are more concerned with devising ways to relieve the hardships caused by the ravages of nature. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) announced this morning that emergency measures are now in effect to meet the situation. The Liberal leader could only suggest that the house go into committee of supply to debate crop conditions. That is all they have ever done for the western farmer—talk.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls went on to say: "Many members of this house were children as I was", referring to the 1930-39 period. In discussing the events of the period, the hon. member apparently suffered a lapse of memory. Since I am slightly more mature, my recollection of the period will not be so childish. I believe, if my memory is correct, that a Liberal government came into power in 1935. That year was not a profitable year on the prairies; we had drought, grasshoppers, Russian thistle and extremely low prices. The following year, 1936, saw a continuation of these conditions. The year 1937 saw what was, probably, the most complete crop failure in the history of the prairies. The years 1938 and 1939 showed little, if any, improvement. I would not insinuate that the prime minister of that day was responsible for the vicissitudes of nature, but what were the members of that Liberal government doing, other than sitting on the benches wringing their hands with the attitude, the Almighty will look after us and we will collect taxes where we can? I repeat, what were the Liberal government doing in the face of business stagnation, rampant poverty and unemployment? They did nothing, yes, absolutely nothing, to their everlasting discredit and shame.

The year 1939 marked the outbreak of the war. Checking back on the statistics for that year provides interesting reading. In spite of the large number of Canadians who hastened to enlist, unemployment was very high, business was unsettled. The war years, ah yes, that was the period. Controls were slapped on the economy. It was a wonderful world for those forming the government. There were no decisions to make because world events had taken that need out of their hands. There was nothing to do but administer. Those superbureaucrats proceeded to foster and promote the growth of the biggest bureaucracy in the history of the nation.

Canadian farm income, in spite of worldwide shortages, showed only moderate gains in the post-war years. Obviously, there had been no effort to put the economy on a peacetime footing. The Korean war gave a boost to the economy. Farm income rose rapidly until 1951, and levelled off in 1952. The nations of the world were stockpiling for an emergency. From 1952 to 1954, farm income fell rapidly to the 1946 level; a slight increase in 1955 and 1956 was followed by a sharp decline until June 1957. After eleven years, two wars and the death of half a million Canadians, the country was back where it started. Farm income was reduced to nearly the 1946 level, with a rising cost of living, unsettled business conditions and rising unemployment. Indeed, this is a remarkable record.

When the present government took over, steps were taken to strengthen and improve the economic position of our farmers. The improvement has been steady, but perhaps not as rapid as hoped because we were too optimistic in expecting to clean up, in 22 months, the mess left on our doorstep by 22 years of mismanagement and incompetence of a Liberal government.

This government has replaced indifference with positive legislation and action. In the first three years under this government, Canadian agriculture producers have received $499 million from the federal government, an increase of 111 per cent, compared with the last three year period under the previous administration. The 1959-60 payment of $190.9 million was 112 per cent more than the largest payment made in any year by a Liberal administration.

This government paid 50 per cent of the unharvested grain assistance; 50 per cent of the cost of moving equipment and fodder into, and livestock out of, drought areas; instituted cash advances on grain; introduced and put into effect the Farm Credit Act, increasing the maximum amount and repayment period of loans; widened the scope of farm credit and pegged the interest rate for these loans at 5 per cent; introduced Canada's first Crop Insurance Act, under which the government will pay 50 per cent of the administration, 20 per cent of the premium and will loan provinces 75 per cent of the amounts required to meet indemnity requirements; paid out $82.6 million in acreage payments; increased the compensation for cattle slaughtered in the control of tuberculosis and brucellosis; undertook to pay 75 per cent of the cost of the South Saskatchewan dam.

The water level of the Saskatchewan and Qu'Appelle valleys will be controlled so that use may be made of waters which were for many years wasted. This government also raised the maximum amount of farm improvement loans from $5,000 to $7,500 and eliminated the double security clause on loans over $2,000; 15 per cent more farmers now benefit under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as a result of the Conservative government's amendments. The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act has been passed. The Conservative government's program under this act will operate in three ways to rehabilitate and develop Canadian agriculture. It will provide for the development of alternative uses for marginal agricultural land; assist local groups in developing new income opportunities; provide projects for soil and water conservation. So that western grain producers will not have to pay storage charges on wheat stocks in excess of the normal carryover, the Conservative government paid storage charges amounting to $39.8 million in 1958, $43.6 million in 1959 and $51.7 million in 1960. Wheat exports have risen substantially due to an aggressive selling campaign and Canada's increased contributions of wheat and flour to the Colombo plan.

These are a few and by no means all the steps taken to help Canadian agriculture. The Agricultural Stabilization Act is a new approach to the problem of stabilizing farm prices. The act is basically sound. Minor adjustments have been necessary. Snags were bound to develop that only experience in the application of the act could reveal. There are adjustments that are still necessary. I speak now of the operation of the act with respect to hogs and eggs. Under the present regulations the prairie farmers are not receiving full benefit of the act with respect to hogs and eggs. I am not satisfied that the present regulations are fair to the farmers in my area. The farmers are not satisfied.

Let us look at the hog situation. The prescribed price is $23.65 per hundredweight Toronto, on a quota of 100 hogs per producer. A deficiency payment is made when the national weighted average price is below $23.65. The present transportation differential between Regina and Toronto cannot be justified and the differential should be narrowed.

It is possible to have a situation develop where there is no deficiency payment by using the national weighted average, and yet, the prairie producer will have received a price for his hogs below the prescribed price.

The situation with respect to eggs is more extreme. The prescribed price is 33 cents per dozen Toronto-Montreal for Grade A-XL and Grade A-L with a quota of 1,000 dozen per producer per quarter. The transportation differential between Regina and Toronto is not warranted. The use of the national weighted average price is not fair to the producers in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Let us take an example. The cumulative national weighted average price to producers for Grade A-XL and A-L was 31 cents per dozen on June 10 this year. If there were to be a deficiency payment for this period, it would be two cents per dozen. The weighted average price per dozen during this period for the three prairie provinces is 23.9 cents; British Columbia, 33.2 cents; central Canada, 33.05 cents; the maritimes, 33.4 cents, and Newfoundland, 47.9 cents. The prairie producer would receive 25.9 cents as a final payment, the other areas would receive from 35.05 to 49.9 cents per dozen. The inequality between the prairie region and the other areas in Canada is obvious.

I urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) to give serious and immediate consideration to equalizing with the rest of Canada the returns received by producers in the prairie provinces. I would suggest that deficiency payments on eggs be made quarterly. The producer can receive a deficiency payment only on a maximum of 1,000 dozen per quarter. In other words, if he markets 800 dozen in the first quarter, 700 dozen in the second quarter, 3,000 dozen in the third quarter and 3,000 dozen in the fourth quarter, he can receive a deficiency payment on only 3,500 dozen, although he exceeded the 4,000 dozen maximum for the year.

I suggest that the calculation for deficiency payments should be based on a regional weighted average price for British Columbia, the three prairie provinces, central Canada, the maritimes and Newfoundland. This method would be fair to producers across Canada and would place the prairie farmer on a more nearly equal footing. The stabilization board and the advisory committee recommend that the present system be continued for the balance of the year. I do not agree. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I believe this is a matter of urgency which should receive immediate and careful consideration by the Minister of Agriculture and the government.

(Translation):

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, on June 20 last, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) introduced his budget for the fiscal year 1961-62. The people have proved that they had been anxiously awaiting the budget speech, because on that occasion, the galleries of the house were filled to capacity, and most hon. members were in their places.

I also noted a striking difference between the situation prevailing in this house in 1957, and the situation on June 20 last. In 1957, the present Minister of Finance brought down his first budget, and on that occasion, every hon. member on the government side including the Minister of Finance had a nice smile and wore a blue tinted white carnation in his lapel. This year, no one wore a blue tinted white carnation, no one had a flower in his lapel, and at the end of the minister's speech, you could see on the faces of Conservative members an expression of disappointment and discontent. Needless to say, cabinet members did not display the broad smile they had in 1957.

The budget speech of last week was the longest in all the history of Canada, but that is not its main feature. The Minister of Finance has forecast the highest deficit ever recorded by a peacetime government. But this deficit budget does not surprise the Canadian people, because ever since the Conservative government took office, we have only had deficit budgets. In 1958, Canada had a deficit of $38,500,000; the deficit reached $609,500,000, in 1959, $413 million in 1960, and $300 million in 1961. For the year 1962, the minister tells us that the deficit will range from $650 to $700 million, which makes up a total deficit of more than $2 billion for the four years in office of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, there is in my province and in the country a common saying to the effect that when the Conservatives are in office, we have deficits, tax increases, unemployment, tight money, high interest rates, numerous bankruptcies, a higher cost of living, in short, drudgery and hardship for a great many Canadian citizens.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a misrepresentation.

Mr. Leduc: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say that it is a misrepresentation.

Mr. Leduc: You say it is wrong?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Leduc: It is a realistic interpretation. If you can deny it, do so. If you are realistic, you will agree with me.

An hon. Member: The industrialists of this country do not say the same thing in their comments.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, it is often said that history repeats itself. We are witnessing today a recurrence of history in this country. Many of us lived through the years 1930 to 1935 under a Conservative administration. And what is the difference between the situation which existed in this country between 1930 and 1935 and that existing today?

An hon. Member: It is even worse.

Mr. Leduc: I agree that there is a difference, and it is because from 1935 to 1957 the country was run by a Liberal administration which prepared everything and provided for a Conservative administration.

When the Liberals were in power, they took action to remedy unemployment. In 1941, they put in the statute books the Unemployment Insurance Act and, from 1941 to 1957, the unemployment insurance fund reached over $900 million. Since the Conservatives took over, in 1957, the fund has dropped from $900 million to less than $100 million.

Not only did the Liberal party give the country the Unemployment Insurance Act, but they adopted a series of social security measures. There was the Family Allowances Act, a piece of legislation which was not quite welcomed by certain Conservatives when it was introduced in this house. Among all the electoral promises of the Conservative party, I have never seen any to the effect that the Conservative government would increase family allowances.

The Liberal party also provided for pensions for the aged, the disabled and the blind persons.

Mr. Speaker, if the people of Canada did not have today all those social security measures, I am sure that the situation, on account of the high cost of living, would be worse than between 1930 and 1935.

True enough, the budget announces certain tax reductions, of which the most important is the abolition of the excise tax on passenger cars. I am satisfied with that decrease, but I should like or rather I would have liked it better had the minister thought also of our farmers, settlers, workers who have to buy a small half-ton truck and forgo the passenger car. It seems to me that the minister should also have abolished the excise tax on half-ton trucks.

The major announcement in the budget speech is the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. I am not an economist nor a financier, but I am convinced that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar will increase the cost of living in our country. A great number of foodstuffs that we have to buy daily such as fruits, vegetables, tea, coffee, sugar, etc., are imported, and I am convinced that we shall have to pay more for those products. In addition we have to import a great deal of manufactured products. As another member so rightly stated earlier, some industries have to import from the United States the machinery they require to develop and to replace their equipment.

I am also convinced that the towns, provinces, municipalities, corporations and individuals who borrowed money on the American market and elsewhere will have to pay more for principal and interest, which will mean a supplementary tax for the consumer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You prefer unemployment.

Mr. Leduc: In his budget speech, the minister stated that he expected a substantial increase in our exports. Well, I hope that prediction will come true, but I am doubtful. Many Canadians are doubtful also, because this is not the first time that the minister makes predictions and his forecasts, in my opinion, are seldom correct.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, the debate on the budget gives an opportunity to hon. members of this house to speak on a variety of subjects, which in the course of ordinary debate we cannot do. I have been listening for the last four years to many speeches from both sides of this chamber and a number of special words have been used more often than others.

I have no intention of referring to the word "we", which is the most popular word in Hansard, but to more specific words used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget speech. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance used the word "vision". When he talked about his expansion policy he said that was a vision which would create greater exportation and bring about more work and more revenue to this country. I hope that this vision will be better than other visions which were expressed during the campaign of 1957 and 1958 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and other members of the government.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are men of vision. We in the Liberal party are very proud of some of those men of vision we had in the past. Just to name a few I would refer to the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. He was a man of vision. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was another. Then there was a great one in the Right Hon. C. D. Howe. I was reading just a few weeks ago a speech made by our ex-prime minister, Louis St. Laurent, in which he expressed the view that what is lacking in this government is a man of vision like C. D. Howe.

Another word that was used and which is very familiar to the Minister of Finance is "taxation". In the electoral record of 1957 and 1958 there are many pages of promises to reduce taxation, and today we find that the government is collecting more money than ever in taxation from the Canadian people. So "reduction of taxation" is only a phrase not a fulfilled promise. Then there is "inflation". Well, the minister has always been opposed to inflation and I am opposed to it too. I hope this new devaluation of the Canadian dollar will not bring about inflation.

There is another word, "conversion". We all know what happened with the conversion loan. I believe that the conversion loan is responsible for some of the financial difficulties that the government is in today, because this conversion loan has increased the interest and the government has got to tax the people in order to pay that interest, or mortgage the Canadian people.

"Double depreciation"—that is a new phrase in Hansard; I have never seen it before this year. It has not brought much result as yet. Let us hope that it will bring results. "Diversion"—this is a word that was very popular in the campaign of 1957 and 1958 when hon. gentlemen opposite were talking about trade. The Conservative members and candidates were then talking about diversion. They were not talking about expansion of trade in those days; no, it was diversion. Well, we know what kind of a result diversion has had in this country.

Then there is the word "expansion". This is a very popular word now. It is the main word in this budget. We will have to wait until the next budget to see whether the meaning the Minister of Finance gives to that word proves to be correct. Then there is the word "confusion". This is a very popular word too, and we know there is confusion. The minister, in his exposé yesterday, said there was confusion between himself and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Then we have the word "devaluation". This is a new word too. "Devaluation" is another word used in the monetary field, so we will know by next year what this means to this country. "Prediction" is another word. I have talked about predictions. We know all the predictions of the minister and I hope all his predictions, especially one, will come true. I hope his prediction comes true that in two years from now we will have a balanced budget and in three years we will have money with which to start repaying the loans we are obtaining today.

Another very popular word is "consultation". In this debate and previous debates the minister said he had had many consultations with the governor of the Bank of Canada. I had to consult the dictionary to find out what the word "consultation" really means, and according to Webster's dictionary it means conferring for mutual counsel. I am sure the minister has used fully the consultation process with the governor of the Bank of Canada, because when the consultation process breaks down we have another word that comes to my lips and it is "decapitation". Those are some of the words which the Minister of Finance used often in this house.

But there are other words used by other ministers and by members of the government which are also very interesting. There is one I think of readily—"misquotation". I recall a few months ago that the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) said to a good many members: why don't you join the club of the misquoted? He said that because almost every day there was a member rising on a question of privilege and saying he had been misquoted.

Another word is "commission". We all know that when the government is in trouble over a problem it appoints a royal commission to settle or delay the problem. Another word is "consideration". It is a very vague word but it is a very useful word for the government. The Prime Minister used it today. Whenever the government is embarrassed by a question asked by the opposition the minister concerned has only to stand up and say: we have this question under serious consideration. Rehabilitation. That is a good word—rehabilitation. When hon. members opposite are speaking of the unemployed people they speak about rehabilitation. There is a good example of rehabilitation in my riding and many of the municipalities have protested. They are going to rehabilitate prisoners from St. Vincent de Paul, Montreal. They will take them to the Gatineau park, about 25 miles from Ottawa and put them to work. Fortunately they are bringing them into the riding of my hon. friend from Hull (Mr. Caron). They are bringing about 100 criminals there to rehabilitate them but they are depriving local citizens of that work. They have no work for honest workers who have families. There is no need to bring prisoners and place them within 30 miles of Ottawa. I am not against rehabilitating some of these prisoners but why not take them into the Northwest Territories where the government is going to build a railroad? That is where these men would be of use.

"Illusion". Well, there are many illusions and I am sure the government is full of illusions about this budget, but I would not be surprised if the illusion of today proved to be the disillusion of tomorrow. Another word we hear about is "elections". That is an important word. This is the word, this is the subject, and this is the thing that hon. gentlemen opposite believe will get the government and the country out of this mess.

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): We have heard a number of interesting observations today. Before I make some comments on this budget I should like to congratulate the minister on this lengthy yet meaty item which contained many points of particular interest to my riding as well as points of general interest to many people across Canada. More of that in a moment or so.

The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) who has just resumed his seat has made a very clever play on words here today. But words are a two-edged sword, I suggest, and I would like to evaluate a few of the words he has mentioned in application to our budget, and his party. The hon. member talks about depreciation and devaluation. I wonder whether we should not apply this in evaluating the Liberal party and its appreciation of our budget here today. The hon. member talked about rehabilitation and I can think of no better use of the term than to apply it to the Liberal party. I think the members of the opposition sitting across the aisle are at this time probably undergoing some form of rehabilitation and perhaps after another two decades or so their rehabilitation will be consummated.

The term confusion has been used and confusion, I suggest, is rampant on that side of the house. It is rampant also, Mr. Speaker, among the group who sit on your immediate left. I would perhaps stretch that further and say even hysteria. I notice a trace of hysteria on that side of the house. Hysteria, I am told, may amount in a medical sense to illusions of grandeur; in the case of hon. gentlemen opposite, illusions of being elected, or of power. We could go on and on.

The term consultation, a most useful word, has been applied just recently to consultations between the Liberal party and the New Party and, possibly, after the motion by the Ontario young Liberal group, to consultation about the amalgamation of those two parties. This consultation represents temptation, as the hon. member for Gatineau would say—temptation to achieve power by any means whatsoever. This is the way one could apply words of many meaning to different people and to different situations.

Devaluation, a change in the value of the Canadian dollar, is having an important effect on many companies in my riding. In the last few days people in the county of Halton have expressed to me a feeling of certainty that many new export markets will be opened up as a result of this measure. They are very happy about this. They believe that the increased sales they may be able to make as a result of this proposal could lead to further employment and much greater prosperity for the companies and for the region concerned.

I wish, now, to say a few words about the industrial development bank. We have heard of the increased lending figures which have played a part in the story of this bank in the last year or two. The volume of the increase has certainly been proved by the amount of money lent by it to the various companies and businesses throughout Canada. Nevertheless, this recent change, increasing its capital from $160 million to $400 million is a most important move, as is the enlargement of its field of operation to cover virtually all businesses in Canada. The reservation is that organizations such as the farm credit corporation must take precedence before the industrial development bank, particularly with respect to certain specialized types of businesses, such as farming. This increase in the money, the facilities and the scope of the industrial development bank represents a most important move, one of which has been greatly welcomed by people in business all across Canada.

The automobile industry has an effect upon us all. In my riding of Halton we have at Oakville the assembly plant of the Ford Motor Company of Canada. Many thousands of automobile workers live in that area and adjacent ridings. We are hopeful that the dropping of the 7½ per cent excise tax on cars will have a marked effect on car sales, with resultant employment in our area. This is a proposal of great importance and one which is welcomed, indeed, by the buying public all across Canada.

In respect to new plant facilities, we were happy, indeed, to note the 50 per cent increase in the rate of capital cost allowance allowed from now on in relation to new assets acquired by businesses, provided it is additional spending over the normal volume in the immediate past. I am sure this will indeed help to speed up reconversion, modernization and expansion of various businesses in our country, and in this regard the government should be congratulated.

It has been my interest while a member of this house, at the meetings of the special committee on research to examine a number of scientific problems which exist in our country, particularly in regard to crown corporations and in the whole field of scientific research in Canada. I think that the provisions in this budget represent an important step toward assisting industries, which are becoming more research conscious, to apply this consciousness and appreciation for increased expenditures in this field in a practical way. Their ability to write off capital expenditures in research not over three years but over a period of one year, is an important advance. I hope this provision will increase research expenditure by various companies.

This type of measure has received the enthusiastic approval of the heads of various corporations including the president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada and others, who have pointed out that they come at a time when industry, government, and the public generally across Canada are becoming much more research conscious.

The lifting of the 5 per cent ceiling on deductible income in respect to research expenditures may enable many firms to spend more in this regard. It has been puzzling to me to decide whether some of these research expenditures have actually been listed under development, expansion or some other heading, but in any case these industries will now be able to give a more accurate listing of research spending under that heading, now that the ceiling has been lifted.

It is very important also to note that donations to non-profit research foundations will now be deducted from income. This is a matter which has received legal attention recently, and has been given realistic and practical consideration. For instance, in Canada, we have new research foundations such as the Canadian uranium research foundation, sponsored by the various uranium mining companies in this country. This foundation may well conduct research in regard to the methods of processing and alternative uses of the metal uranium, and through its funds it may well let contracts for specific projects to universities or other research organizations. I presume that this projected legislation will enable such foundations to increase their work, and would enable various trade and industrial groups to set up further foundations to carry out much needed research and development work in Canada. If such a tax provision will enable these groups to carry on this research to a much greater extent, it will prove a most valuable change indeed.

I now come to the specific subject of volunteer firemen. The subject of volunteer firemen has been a very touchy one in my riding. I suggest the problems in connection with this subject commenced in my riding in the town of Oakville and spread to Hamilton and various other sections of southern Ontario. As the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) and his parliamentary secretary will appreciate—

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) had something to say about that subject.

Mr. Best: —this has been a thorny problem indeed. I hear echoes and the wagging of tongues across the way in the distance, Mr. Speaker, but I can't make out the words.

We are very happy to witness the government taking action on this problem and in this regard I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue for their consideration of my case.

Up to $300 may be deducted retroactive to 1958 as expense money paid to various firemen. It has been a very difficult problem for small municipalities, which must provide fire protection services to do so, and the residents of those small municipalities have had to depend upon the loyalty, integrity and ability of the hardworking numerous volunteer firemen. In my riding I would suggest hundreds of individuals are involved. It seems to me a fair and excellent decision to allow money paid to them by way of expenses not to be included as income from now on. This measure is to be retroactive to 1958.

Mr. Benidickson: Thanks to the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. Best: Mr. Speaker, I again heard something from the hon. member but it was so indistinct that I shall let it pass.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, before private bills are called, I should like to state that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) who is absent because of the death of his father should under normal circumstances have asked at this time for the unanimous consent of the house to proceed with non-contentious bills somewhat out of order. I am not sure that unanimous consent will be forthcoming but I should like to ask that we commence our consideration with item No. 4 on the order paper under private bills, an act respecting the Canadian council of the girl guides association, followed by items Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 in that order. Those items would then be followed by items Nos. 3, 1 and 2.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the bill, which is item No. 1 on the order paper, is still considered to be contentious? I ask that question seriously in view of recent developments which have taken place. As hon. members appreciate, a provincial body has given considerable consideration to the various pipe line companies which appear before us, and has seen fit to grant a licence to the particular company mentioned in this bill. I should like to ask if it would be possible now for us to proceed with this bill.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who indicated he felt there was no controversy with respect to certain private bills which he enumerated. He will understand that I was not a member of the committee that discussed these measures. I know the hon. member would not mislead the house in any way and in expressing his views with the certainty that he did I am sure he felt that those in the opposition would have no objection to his motion. On that basis I am prepared to go along with the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka without reservation. I am sure he speaks for the government and for my part may I say on behalf of the opposition that I have heard of no objection to the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite know what the situation is now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary South was endeavouring to ascertain whether any member wished to indicate that he was still opposed to item No. 1. I think that was the preliminary matter before we deal with the proposal of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): My point has to do with delaying this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: I had that exception in mind.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I understood that perhaps there was clarification of the picture with respect to this bill. Any delay does have an effect on a particular portion of the province that I represent and I hope that hon. members will let us proceed with the bill.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Speaking on behalf of this group, may I say that we are prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. However, the hon. member for Calgary South has raised a question regarding one bill which is certainly contentious now, if it has not been contentious in the past, for the reason that a decision has been made by the Alberta conservation board to grant a licence to a company which has not yet received incorporation under federal law.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): That is not correct.

Mr. Benidickson: May I say that I withdraw my unanimous consent so far as item No. 1 is concerned. I would want the hon. member for Calgary South to have his full rights with respect to item No. 1.

Mr. Speaker: The proposal before the house, which I take it will not now receive unanimous consent, was that we begin with item No. 4 on the order paper under private bills and follow through to item No. 10 inclusive and then revert to items Nos. 3, 1 and 2 in that order. Is the house agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I take it, Mr. Speaker, that item No. 4 is the bill introduced by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine). The member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) said that it was Bill No. 4; under public bills. Am I right in my understanding that it is Bill C-41?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Item No. 4 is Bill No. S-20, an act respecting the Canadian council of the girl guides association.

THE CANADIAN COUNCIL OF THE GIRL GUIDES ASSOCIATION

On the order:

House in committee on Bill S-20, an act respecting the Canadian council of the Girl Guides association. (Without amendment).—Mr. Morton.

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I would ask leave of the house to move this item for the hon. member for Davenport who is absent because of the death of his father.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Prince leave to move on behalf of the hon. member for Davenport who is absent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Phillips (for Mr. Morton) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-20, respecting the Canadian council of the girl guides association.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Phillips (for Mr. Morton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UKRAINIAN EVANGELICAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. S-18, to incorporate Ukrainian Evangelical Baptist Convention of Canada—Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the committee and I would ask the sponsor if he would mind explaining what this is about.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Does the hon. member wish an explanation of clause 1 or of the bill?

Mr. Winch: The principle of the bill. I have not had time to study the bill.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): The statement I made on second reading of the bill explains the principle. The purpose is to incorporate the Ukrainian Evangelical Baptist Convention of Canada which is now in operation with headquarters in western Canada at Saskatoon and in eastern Canada at Toronto. The convention represents more than 7,000 Baptists of Ukrainian origin and there are more than 500 pupils attending Sunday schools conducted by the convention. There are 21 organized churches with an adult membership of more than 800 and in addition there are some 25 mission stations where services are held periodically. The convention has ten resident ministers and ten missionaries.

On clause 13—Power to acquire and hold property.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the sponsor of this bill why the usual limitation on the right to hold property in bills of this kind is not included.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): As to why the usual limitation—?

Mr. McIlraith: On the right to hold property, yes.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): What does the hon. member mean by "the usual limitation"?

Mr. McIlraith: It is frequently the case in bills of this kind that there is a limitation as to the amount of property the organization may hold. Was the omission of that clause in this bill intentional or an oversight?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): This clause, Mr. Chairman, is identical to section 9 of the Evangelical Mennonite Act which was passed by parliament in 1959. This clause was copied verbatim from that act.

Mr. McIlraith: This does not answer my question. The limitation was omitted from that act after consideration; it was a deliberate decision. I am wondering if the applicants wished the unlimited power or if the omission of the limitation was inadvertent? I have no objection to them having the power.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): It was copied specifically from the Evangelical Mennonite Act.

Mr. McIlraith: This does not deal with the point I am raising. It is usual, in this type of bill, to have a limitation on the right to hold property. The act to which the hon. member has referred did not contain that limitation because the incorporators dealt with the point and wished the limitation to be omitted. I am wondering whether that is what these incorporators wish or what is the reason for the omission?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): That is my answer, Mr. Chairman; this organization wished the limitation to be omitted and therefore they copied the exact section from the Evangelical Mennonite Act which deals with this matter.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-26, respecting the Congregation of the Sisters of the Holy Family of Bordeaux in Canada—Mr. Morissette.

NATIONAL MORTGAGE CORPORATION OF CANADA

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. S-16, an act to incorporate National Mortgage Corporation of Canada. (Without amendment but recommending that the title of the bill be altered to read "An act to incorporate General Mortgage Service Corporation of Canada")—Mr. Morton.

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): I ask leave to to move this bill on behalf of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken).

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member has leave to move this bill on behalf of its sponsor?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Phillips (for Mr. Morton) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-16, to incorporate National Mortgage Corporation of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Phillips: In accordance with the report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, I would move that:

All the words after "of" in line 15 be deleted and that the "General Mortgage Service Corporation of Canada" be substituted therefor.

Mr. McIlraith: I think if the sponsor will look at the form of his motion, he will find he wants the words "hereinafter called the corporation" left in the clause. He has deleted all the words after the word "of" in line 15 and then just substituted the name of the corporation. If he will look at the form of his motion again, I think he will find it does not do what he intends it to do.

The Chairman: I think the purpose of the amendment would be fulfilled if the words "National Mortgage Corporation of Canada" in lines 15 and 16 were replaced by "General Mortgage Service Corporation of Canada".

Mr. Phillips: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: This is not now a contentious matter, but I think the amendment is significant. This bill was introduced in the Senate and a very hot, contentious and earnest fight was conducted there and lost in connection with the name of a company that intends to operate as this company does. I wish to say that the banking and commerce committee took up this matter. It is not my intention to enlarge upon the evidence that is available by looking at the record of the sittings of the banking and commerce committee with respect to the National Mortgage Corporation of Canada. Complaint was raised earlier, when the bill was introduced in the Senate, with regard to the right of private people to use names such as "national", "Canada" and so on. I indicated that I wished to be brief. I shall therefore simply refer all hon. members of this committee and the people in the country to the record of our proceedings in the banking and commerce committee when we examined this problem.

May I say that I think this was an example of the usefulness of a parliamentary committee. Politics did not enter into the matter at all. If such had been the case, it would not have been possible to change the name of this corporation after protests from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which felt that there was some conflict or confusion or some element of difficulty for the public in connection with the name. That crown corporation made the same representations to the Senate. They failed there in getting an amendment.

I simply wish to pay tribute to the general attitude of those who are elected across the country as members of the House of Commons and to refer to the fact that it was felt that no corporation entering into this important field of second mortgages, which is a unique field, was checked to the extent that, as a private enterprise organization, it must use a title that would indicate that it was a private enterprise organization and not a government sponsored organization. This was not a political partisan affair. The suggestion came from members of all parties who attended the meeting of the banking and commerce committee. It was their feeling that corporations, no matter how important their national service might be, must be careful not to use names or appellations that might give rise to confusion in the mind of the public or possibly indicate that they were government sponsored.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: I also should like to say a few words on this bill, and to add my condolences to those of the mover of the bill today on the death of the father of the previous sponsor. We all offer our condolences.

In this bill, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has mentioned, we have seen some of the best operations of this house and of the work of the committee of this house. A great deal of contention was raised in my mind immediately by two events which occurred fairly close together. One was the announcement by the Minister of Public Works that offerings would be made in the secondary mortgage field in relationship with Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation. The second was the advent of this company which had the appearance, because of the name of the company, of being in the mortgage field in competition or of being in the field in such a manner that, because of the name, some difference of opinion would arise whether it was in effect in a field in which we would prefer to see established a crown corporation rather than a private company. The fact that this company has agreed to and the committee has endorsed the idea of changing the name to one more appropriate to a private company and reserving for the crown a name that would of necessity be more acceptable to a crown corporation certainly has been of advantage with regard to the passing of this bill.

In other respects there are many unique factors. One is that we now have a uniform secondary mortgage company that has by law established certain rules and regulations as to its capitalization and to the method of its capitalization. All members of the house, no matter what their political affiliation, I am sure were pleased to note that this company asked that 75 per cent of their directors be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada. I am sure they were also pleased to note that this company asked for and made part of their bill the requirement that for a period of 15 days at least 60 per cent of any stock offering up to $10 million, with a proposed increase of $5 million to a total of $15 million, would be allowed for sale in Canada to Canadian citizens.

Mr. Benidickson: In essence, what does that mean? It means nothing.

Mr. Peters: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is with us. She would be in a much better position than am I to define what is a Canadian citizen ordinarily resident in Canada. But whatever it is, it sounds fairly good to me. It is a great deal better than we have had in the past.

We have the fact that this company has been established and that there are to be two types of mortgages. The first type is one that can be bought by companies and will be held under trust by this corporation, with a small payment being made for the management of their bonds. The second type of mortgage will be that in which a number of people can participate, those who wish to do so and who are willing to put their money into second mortgages but who normally would not have enough capital to handle one secondary mortgage. Through its proposals this company has set up the machinery which will allow those people with less than the normal amount of money required for a second mortgage to participate and to take advantage of the opportunity in this field. I think that this bill is an exceptionally good one. I believe it will offer something to the Canadian people, provided that the interest rates are reasonable; and I presume and hope that will be the case as the company have been reasonable in other respects. I believe that this bill will do two things. It will allow the accumulation of the money necessary at the present time for second mortgages, something which will tend to eliminate the very high premium that is now paid on second mortgages, including in many cases an unreasonable bonus. It will also allow people having a limited amount of savings with which to engage in the secondary mortgage field to participate on this basis, with a company that has set up the machinery that will protect the investment they care to make under this legislation.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I believe the bill now before the committee is rather unique and I should like to say a few words about it. In the first place, I heartily endorse the amendment that has been proposed. I do believe that we must be—and we have not always been—very cautious before we authorize the use by Canadian companies of such words as "national", "royal" or "dominion" in their name. Equally so, I believe that a company incorporated in the province of Ontario carrying in its name the word "Ontario" operates at unfair advantage over other companies. A company incorporated in British Columbia ought not to be permitted to use in the name of the company the words "British Columbia". I say this because to the average, innocent Canadian there is the implication that this particular company might have the backing of either the province or the nation. Therefore I want to compliment the committee for proposing the amendment that is now before us, that the word "national" be eliminated and another word be substituted for it.

We have long asked for action on the part of the government to eliminate the racketeering that exists in the sale of mortgage paper in Canada. Several months ago the government announced its intention of moving in this direction in that C.M.H.C. was going to place on the market blocks of half a million dollars each of real estate paper. As I understand it, this company is specifically designed in order to take advantage of these potential offerings of the government. I would like to heartily congratulate the company for many aspects of its articles of incorporation as they now appear before the committee. In the first place I notice that the shares are going to be offered in denominations of $10 each. I would advise any Canadian with idle investment capital, no matter how small, to participate in an effort of this kind. I believe this is a bona fide—

Mr. McIlraith: Is this what you are recommending?

Mr. Regier: Yes, the money will be invested in insured mortgages.

Mr. McIlraith: You are recommending investment in fixed securities rather than in equities, in a period of inflation. Did you not hear the budget?

Mr. Regier: I am not going to discuss inflation at the moment. I believe this is a bona fide Canadian corporation and they realize the possibilities that exist in this field of buying and selling mortgages on real estate. I would also like to endorse the commendations made by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I notice that this company insists that not less than 75 per cent of its directors shall at all times be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada.

I also like another aspect of this matter, whereby before there will be any offerings of the stock of the company on the world market Canadians will be given at least a 15-day leeway in which to participate. I realize at once that this is only one of many hundreds of Canadian companies and corporations which will be eligible to submit bids on offerings of mortgage paper by C.M.H.C. and to deal in other types of mortgage paper. However, I believe this is the first time this parliament has been asked to incorporate a company that is basically a Canadian company in concept and also in its intentions as to manner of operation.

Mr. Benidickson: Nonsense. Anybody can buy stock in this company.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, having heard the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam I feel obliged to say a few words on this matter. I am not opposing the incorporation of this company, because countless companies based on principles similar to those enunciated in this bill have been incorporated by this parliament. However, when federal incorporation is required, as a member of parliament I think I should warn my colleagues that it is just wishful thinking to believe that some of the clauses in this bill are different than those in bills incorporating other mortgage corporations.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam referred to the fact that 75 per cent of the directors must be Canadian. To me that means nothing. It is a question of whether or not the directors are truly owners of the stock in the company, or whether they are simply nominees of foreign holders of stock in the company.

To me several clauses in this bill are simply window dressing, eyewash and nonsense in so far as any drive on our part is concerned for effective, proper legislative control to reduce foreign ownership. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I am not opposing the bill, but I do not like the eyewash and the suggestion that this is a good measure because 15 days are given as an opportunity for subscription for stock. In my opinion that means nothing, in connection with the National Mortgage Corporation of Canada.

In my opinion dummy residents in Canada could subscribe for stock within that 15-day limit, and realistically it has nothing whatever to do with the terms of this bill. I am not opposing the bill, because we have approved bills of this kind for a long time; but I do want to indicate that we are not being misled in any way that this is more of a "Canadianization" bill than any other bill of this kind which has been presented to parliament for federal legislation.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It is more Canadian than is Aurora.

Mr. Benidickson: I think perhaps similar faults prevail in both cases. I am saying that the technical devices, the legal devices applied to invoke the principles that might be in the minds of all hon. members of this parliament when we think of Canadianization are really, if we look at this bill, completely defeated by reason of the fact that 15 days after the opportunity for Canadians to buy, a United States or foreign investor could buy through a dummy Canadian citizen. I simply want to warn other applicants for incorporation that we in parliament are not so stupid about our wishes with regard to incorporation and Canadian ownership that we think if they put some of the meaningless clauses into a private bill such window dressing enhances its likehood of passing through the House of Commons.

I say I intend to vote for the bill because we have not voted against similar bills in the past, but I am not for a moment misled about the appointment of directors or the offering of stock for 15 days to Canadians. I am not misled for a moment into thinking this necessarily means the Canadian ownership and operation of this company in the future.

Mr. Howard: This question is obviously of great interest to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I think I do not have the same appreciation of Canadians he has. I cannot apply the word dummy to them, not to all of them, at any rate. Of course, when one looks across to the other side of the chamber the word may come to mind.

I think that perhaps in essence what the hon. member says is true, namely, that the intent set out here could be subverted. That is correct, but that is no reason for not adhering to the principle and the hope, barring any international barriers placed around the country which prevent the movement back and forth of people and money. Barring these things I do not think we shall ever be able to develop any legislation, which will be completely effective along these lines.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not opposing this bill but I do not want parliament to be kidded by this clause.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that. I think I have the same appreciation as the hon. member does of the effect of this. I realize the intent and the purpose of this could be destroyed very easily by the company itself, as far as that goes, and also by others who have an interest in it and who want to act on behalf of individuals who have money outside the country. I think this would be true in all instances. But it is no reason for us to sit back and do nothing about it. I think we should consciously attempt to promote Canadian ownership of corporations just as we should consciously attempt to promote Canadian control of another company whose affairs may come up for discussion following this.

Mr. Regier: I cannot lightly pass by the warning issued by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. The hon. member called this particular aspect of the bill nonsense and mere window dressing. However, if I understand this matter rightly, if I own some equity in a Canadian corporation and if I attend the annual meeting I am able to cast votes according to the equity I hold. If I have 5,000 shares I am able to cast 5,000 votes while another man, who may have only 11 shares, can cast only 11 votes. However, this does not apply once you have been elected to the board of directors. I have never yet heard of a board of directors where the vote of one director counts for more than the vote of another director and if this bill says that not less than 75 per cent of the directors must be bona fide Canadians I cannot understand why the hon. member should call that nonsense and window dressing.

Mr. Benidickson: A director could be a dummy if he was appointed to the board because somebody else in the United States could own 75 per cent of the stock.

Mr. Regier: I appreciate that. Yet there is in the hearts of Canadians, I hope, such a thing as loyalty to their nation. I can well imagine that the recent rumpus we had over the unloading of grain that we sold to China or the rumpus we had some years ago over the issue raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East when the sale of rubber belts or conveyor belts to China was blocked would never have happened if 75 per cent of those who had the right to cast a vote had been Canadians basically.

Mr. Benidickson: In 1958 in connection with Ford products they got their orders from Detroit.

Mr. Regier: I know there may be Canadians who will subvert the national interest for their own selfish interest. I know nothing at all about the men who are responsible basically for the organization of this company. However, I have reason to believe they are bona fide Canadians and I would much prefer to support the incorporation of a company of this kind than to support, as we are often asked to do in this house, a company being organized by a legal firm which we know is acting on behalf of outside financial interests. I am sure even the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is happy to know that the men responsible for the sponsoring of this bill are not merely a smokescreen for the Household Finance Corporation, for instance, which is a United States interest.

Mr. Benidickson: I hope not.

Mr. Regier: There may be some merit in what the hon. member has said. He has attempted to warn the house that we ought not to be misled, that our intentions can be frustrated despite the terms of this bill. However, I believe the expressions contained in this bill will have a beneficial result on our national interest because I think that in the years to come we shall see more and more incorporations including clauses along these lines, and despite any dirty work that may go on behind the scenes at times I think the long range intention is good and that it will have a good effect.

Mr. Benidickson: Having heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam I shall say very tersely that I agree in large part. I will only repeat that the clauses of the bill in my opinion are windage, not legally binding, containing such words as "maybe" and "perhaps". They indicate a course on which we would both agree though we would hope they would have some legal application in so far as directors are concerned and the holding of stock. I have indicated twice that I do not propose to vote against the bill but I felt that this was just window dressing to the extent that it talks about Canadianization and I thought all of us in the House of Commons should beware of bills of this kind.

On the title.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the title I should like to repeat that the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons performed a very important function. I am not sure whether that committee has re-established a principle in doing so in so far as names relating to companies which apply to the Secretary of State for incorporation as limited companies, or apply to parliament for incorporation, are concerned, but I think this is a very important development in this connection. I hope that parliament will regard this as such when it adopts this practice of restricting the use of the words "national" and "Canada" and so on. That is all I intend to say in this regard. I suggest amendments such as this are very significant, although they can be reversed by our successors.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the title has been amended.

Mr. McIlraith: It has not been amended yet.

The Chairman: A report has been received recommending the amendment but it has not yet been adopted.

Mr. Aiken: I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to that proposal?

ACADIA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-22, to incorporate the Acadia Life Insurance Company—Mr. Aiken (for Mr. Morton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in respect to this clause, and I hope to be brief.

It will be noted in this clause the petitioners are seeking to incorporate this company under the name The Acadia Life Insurance Company, and in French, L'Acadia Compagnie d'Assurance-Vie herein after called "the company".

The point I wish to make is that this follows the desirable practice which has been adopted by the house of granting alternative names to companies incorporated by special act. Under our Companies Act, companies seeking incorporation by letters patent do not have the same right and can only take a name in one or other language. This fact presents a great deal of difficulty to national companies which do business in all sections of Canada who have to use a name in a language which may not be used in a particular section of the country. I have reason to suspect that there are many companies, and some I know for certain, which would prefer to have alternative names for use in different parts of the country. I can see no objection at all to the same practice being used under the Companies Act as is used in these special acts of incorporation provided the translation of the name is carefully done. I should like to draw this situation to the attention of the government and request the minister to give consideration to appropriately amending the Companies Act at some future date.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Best: Before dinner, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing some of the measures introduced by our recent budget and the particular effect they have on the various groups of people in my riding. These measures, such as the one with respect to our dollar, write-offs in respect of capital expenditures in various fields, new provisions for new plant facilities and research expenditures, are measures which I am sure will please and affect many areas of our country.

I was drawing attention to the fact that two particular measures play an important part in my riding and before their implementation I had discussed these at some length with the ministers of the departments involved. The provision in respect of payments to volunteer firemen is one such measure, and the matter of a duty or tariff on chicken imports from the United States is another. This latter matter is one which will affect many specialized farmers, broiler growers, those who produce eggs and, indeed, the whole chicken industry. There are many hundreds of these specialized farmers in my riding and in adjacent ridings. They have for a long time wanted some equality of duty or tariff on fowl coming into Canada with our own exports to the United States. This measure introduced by the government has been warmly greeted by people in the riding of Halton who are concerned with this business. This duty of five cents per pound on eviscerated chicken, will apply to cut up and cooked chicken as well, and will thus be important to our broiler growers and all people associated with the poultry industry.

There are other budget measures which we could discuss this evening if time permitted, such as the complex financial matters which will have a profound effect over the weeks and months on various sections of Canada. The opposition, as voiced by some members of the Liberal party and the C.C.F. party, has been particularly weak in the days succeeding the introduction of the budget. The opposition has been lengthy but rather empty of content, I would suggest, as is the Liberal amendment itself, which mentions trade restrictions and so forth. I feel that the measures introduced may not really be restrictive of trade at all. Indeed, they may stimulate a great increase in our export trade. I believe the total effect of these measures upon our country will be beneficial, particularly to our export trade.

In considering the various opposition speakers, most of whom are not here tonight, I would say it has been noted in recent days that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has demonstrated a mounting, increasing hysteria as evidenced by the volume and loudness of his attacks on the government. We all realize that the session has been long and perhaps the hon. member for his own sake could stand a good rest and a bit of refreshment before he continues mounting these attacks in this house. We were very much interested in his comments just a few days ago and the fact that he does not read a high proportion of the letters he receives. I think that few of us could say that we read absolutely everything. Most of us try to read all of our correspondence. An admission of this sort by a former Liberal cabinet minister but now a private member, is a most interesting one indeed.

Perhaps I can continue in relation to the tariff measure on chickens that I was discussing previously and note his off-hand reference to gutless chickens, as he put it. If this indicates the importance attached to this matter by the hon. member and indeed by the Liberal party, it is something of which I feel the farmers of Canada ought to take note in a very serious degree. We cannot blame them too much on the opposition side, however, since the position of farm or agricultural critic seems to be constantly shifting around among a variety of members on that side of the house.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in a previous debate in this budget set of speeches mentioned something about "off with the heads" of senior civil servants in this country. I do not think the people of our country have any thought whatsoever that any action which the government is now taking in reference to the Bank of Canada means this sort of thing at all. As a matter of fact, in my own opinion and in that of most of the constituents from whom I have heard, we have really leaned over backwards to be fair, honest and, if at all possible, accommodating with respect to the governor of the Bank of Canada. The same thing may be said with respect to other senior people in public life. I think we have been extremely fair in this matter. I would suggest to the Liberal members that they look into their own background in this field before casting such aspersions at others.

I mentioned agricultural matters. It was rather interesting to see in recent days the trespassing by various other members of the Liberal party in this field which I had come to think belonged to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), for instance, got into the grain trade business in recent days. The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) commented rather plaintively on matters of drought and grasshoppers in the west. Indeed, today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) got into the cattle market, perhaps to his subsequent sorrow. This business of an agriculture shadow cabinet minister has really been travelling the circuit in the Liberal party opposite. I am sorry the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) is not here this evening as he was so much in evidence this afternoon. Perhaps we should congratulate him in that he seems to have maintained his shadow or shadowy position of opposition financial critic.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) in this budget debate a few days ago commented on various topics. He suggested that we have cut down on various important works in this country. When this procedure was necessary and when it seemed wise, we have indeed done so. But, Mr. Speaker, I would call to your attention and to that of the people of this country the tremendous increase of funds, and the building and construction in general which has taken place in the last three or four years. I could name hospitals, roads, dams, house construction, public building construction, airports and so on, a whole long string of projects, which this government has fostered to an increasing extent and which really negate and deny any such argument on the part of the hon. member for Trinity.

But this hon. gentleman a few days ago, as found at page 6888 of Hansard, mentioned that if the government took itself seriously it would realize that these skills must start at the top, and that we must have a skilled government. By inference I presume he meant that a skilled government could arise from the members sitting opposite us. This is a rather ludicrous thought. We may have seen, of course, in recent weeks prior to the by-elections at least, I suppose fully half of the members of the Liberal opposition counting on various cabinet positions for themselves. We can see this subtle build-up and we can see the much more sudden deflation following the by-elections which they won in the proportion of one out of four. Hence if a skilled government is necessary, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we have it now; and I submit that the alternatives on the other side of this house are simply not in existence at the present time.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls, in discussing the budget, talked about various problems out west, as I said before and I think really typified, along with others, the sort of mounting hysteria which we have noticed in the opposition party. The obvious divisions within this party about which we hear in private and which are frequently exemplified in public, are ones which will have to be worked out in the period of years that follow.

I observe my friend the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) sitting down at the far end of the chamber. We were interested in his comments on the budget as well. With regard to some of the very interesting remarks he made, I think we could agree with him. I note the comments which the hon. member for Peterborough made, as found at page 6895 of Hansard where he states:

> Indeed, there are few extreme positions; life is nothing but finding compromises.

I suggest that this is not the spirit of a New party member. While it may be a wise personal decision on the part of the hon. member for Peterborough, I am sure he must be suffering acute indigestion in the group in which he finds himself at the moment. I would rather agree with his position, but it is not the philosophical position of the incipient party to which he belongs.

Then we go on to the hon. gentleman's other comments about this country perhaps becoming a banana republic and so on. I believe there is instance after instance in which this government has asserted in a true and independent spirit our differences with the country to the south of us, our great friendship with it but our distinct differences. It has taken a government such as that which we have had in the last four years to assert these differences, to stand up from a position of honesty and strength in various difficult and individual positions which have fallen upon us. In short, Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the long and frequently windy but completely vacant and empty opposition which has come to the present budget. We do not pretend to say that it has solved all our problems but it has made major steps in many directions.

I cannot sit down without one final comment on these various remarks from the two opposition parties. We have talked about various types of fowl, farm problems and a number of miscellaneous items. One which came to my attention just a few days ago involved a mouse and a tiger. This mouse and tiger combination is one which I think may ring down the succeeding months and years with loud reverberations. When the president of the Liberal association of Ontario describes the approach of his party to the incipient New Party as a mouse coming to a tiger, I think perhaps half of that description at least is correct. I would not say that about the whole of it. But I welcome with an open heart the honesty of this man in voicing his opinion and his true feelings, and we are glad indeed that it has come to the public's notice in recent days.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, the reason members of the government in power did not speak on the budget before today is no doubt due to the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) put them to sleep when he made his marathon speech on budget night. They woke up suddenly today. We had nearly three hours of words, words, words—30,000 of them—when the whole thing could have been said in one hour at the most. I have never heard the Minister of Finance make a speech so uninteresting, so devoid of interest as was the budget speech. Of course a budget that offered so little had to be couched in many words. I have great respect for the Minister of Finance, but he certainly disappointed me on budget night. The Canadian public soon realized that this was again a deficit budget, in which the Minister of Finance specializes, and soon lost interest. It made me think of the old saying: You may fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you cannot fool all of the people all the time.

Mr. Speaker, may I quote from a Montreal financial weekly under the date June 22, 1961. E. J. DeSeau, the financial editor had this to say. It is a long article and I will not read it all:

> The budget was not worth delay. Not even size of cash deficit offered any new surprise.

The article continues:

> The platitudinous preambles to the budget were undoubtedly spoken in Donald Fleming's voice but the words were those of the Prime Minister.
> This is clearly a government by fall guys.
> We would say that nobody really knows who is next in line for some sort of misery. But what matters at this moment is this budget.
> Was it worth being delayed from April till June? It was not.
>
> Is it an expansionist budget?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Bourque: Due to this budget provinces, corporations and municipalities which have borrowed in the United States will find the cost of their reimbursements greatly increased. The finance commissioner of metropolitan Toronto said each drop of one cent in the value of the Canadian dollar would add $200,000 a year to Toronto's costs on its United States indebtedness.

May I, Mr. Speaker, read from the annual address of Mr. W. Earle McLaughlin, president of the Royal Bank of Canada.

> It is time we stopped talking dangerous nonsense about using fiscal and monetary policy, not for their legitimate purposes, but as an allegedly "easy" way of bringing down the exchange rate or the interest rate, or both. We are blaming the steam gauge for the lack of pressure in the boiler. There is no easy way to bring down our long term interest rates or to achieve an excess of exports over imports or cut down on foreign borrowing, if we think any or all of these things desirable; and the sooner we recognize the facts of life as they relate to economic policy, the sooner we will achieve the goals we seek... increased employment and balanced economic growth without inflation. They cannot be attained—indeed our problem can only be made worse—by concentrating on and trying, through monetary policy, to manipulate the exchange rate, or long term interest rate differentials between Canada and the United States.

I should now like to quote from a Montreal newspaper of Monday, November 14, 1960:

> U.S. investment brings more good than harm.
> "Problems have arisen," Edward R. Ernst of the Bank of Montreal told a Canadian-American seminar, "but I am certain that in the absence of foreign capital we would have a much bigger problem on our hands".

The article continues:

> "It was United States capital that opened the iron fields of Labrador and Steep Rock, the nickel deposits in Manitoba and to a large extent the petroleum and natural gas resources of the west."

From 1931 to 1935 inclusively, under a Conservative regime Canada had a yearly deficit. This deficit, for the five years under a Conservative regime as I stated previously, totalled $668,346,999. From 1947 to 1956 inclusively, under a Liberal regime Canada had a total surplus, not a deficit, of $2,120,537,800.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why did the hon. gentleman jump 12 years?

Mr. Bourque: We had a war in between. You can make your speech later. In 1957—I know hon. members opposite are not going to like these figures, but they are the truth—for the period before the accession to power of the present government, the Liberal government had a surplus of $257,505,582. From 1958 to 1959 inclusively, under this Conservative government, a period of two years, Canada had a deficit of $647,939,576. Add to this, based on the estimated figures of the Minister of Finance, a deficit of $345 million for 1960 and a further deficit of $650 million for 1961 and the estimated total deficit for the years 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961—a period of four years—adds up to a total deficit of $1,642,939,576.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We will probably beat that this year.

Mr. Bourque: Tory years are always depression years. "Deficit Don" has done it again. The minister will depend on, and no doubt will hope, for a lowering of the interest rates in Canada. How this is to be done was not clearly explained in the budget speech. The effect will be to make investments in Canada less attractive to foreign lenders. It has been said that this government will have to borrow an average of $100 million a month for the balance of the fiscal year to meet the estimated cash deficit of $650 million. It is anticipated that the expenditures for 1961 will be $6,415,000,000, and the anticipated revenue is $5,961,000,000. The Minister of Finance and this Tory government have added $2,056,000,000 to Canada's public debt in four years.

Mr. Speaker, may I read from Labor, a weekly publication, issue of Saturday, March 25, 1961:

> Business failures jump in Canada.
> Business failures increased 21 per cent between 1959 and 1960, according to the dominion bureau of statistics. Defaulted liabilities under the provisions of the bankruptcy and winding up acts reached $148,253,000. The increase in business failures were substantial in general merchandising, auto products, building materials as well as in iron and steel and wood products manufacturing industries.

The high taxation with which industry is saddled is stinting our competitive ability. The government should realize how badly off industry is in comparison with most of our foreign competitors. Gross corporate earnings are taxed at a flat 50 per cent rate. No distinction is made between what is distributed and what is ploughed back into the company to provide for expansion, thereby enabling it to manufacture a cheaper, better and more competitive product.

Canadian industry is allowed less favourable depreciation rates than most of its foreign competitors. Under our tax laws, not much more than 20 per cent of the cost of a piece of equipment having a 15-year life can be written off in the first year. Britain and Japan permit a first year write-off of about 50 per cent; Sweden, 40 per cent and Italy more than 30 per cent.

The United Kingdom provides many other exemptions such as 20 per cent on new machinery and plant in the year of acquisition deductible from taxable income. This is in addition to the regular depreciation on machinery which would amount to approximately 15 per cent plus an extra initial allowance of 10 per cent in the first year. This government should take a leaf out of the Britishers' book in this matter of investment allowance. Semi and fully manufactured products account for more than one third of all the export dollars we earn in any given year. The last final figures available are those of 1959. They show that such goods brought us in $1,860 million, or 37 per cent of the total income from the export of Canadian products in that year. Our 1959 purchases abroad of fully manufactured goods, were equal to $244 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

The amount spent by Canadians for competitive imports is little short of fantastic. Individual Canadians bought 4.7 times as much fully manufactured goods as did the Britishers in 1959, nearly 4.9 times as much as the west Germans, 6.4 times as much as the Americans and 27 times as much as the Japanese. We have a favourable trade balance with European nations and a heavy adverse balance with the U.S.A. How long will European nations continue to pay for our luxurious imports from the U.S.A.?

One thing is sure to result from this budget. The cost of living will rise as our dollar declines. We have a serious unemployment problem but it is as nothing compared with what this problem will be unless we take immediate measures to check the uncontrolled flow of printed matter from foreign countries and principally from the United States. Our small population in Canada is called upon to support the greatest volume of imported printing of any country in the world. Sixty per cent of United States printing exports are absorbed by Canada. Only 5 per cent of our printing exports are absorbed by the United States. The population of the United States is approximately 180 million. Canada's population is about one-tenth of that. For every rabbit we sell to the United States we have to purchase 12 elephants. This applies to the printing industry only. Possibly similar comparisons can be made in other industries.

Printed imports to Canada from the United States and all other countries for the year 1953 amounted to $130,679,553, as compared with $183,716,509 for 1959, which represents an increase of $53,036,956. Printed exports shipped from Canada to the United States and all other countries for the year 1953 amounted to $5,451,234 as compared with $8,927,732 for 1959, which is an increase of $2,994,038. Let us compare the difference. In 1959, Canada imported from the United States and all other countries printed matter to the value of $183,716,509 and in the same year the total Canadian exports were

I understand that a group of officials was sent to Europe recently where they visited Her Majesty's stationer in England and some of the leading European industrialists. Though I cannot vouch for this, my information is that in England they were looking into the possibility of Her Majesty's printer doing some printing for the government of Canada, and that they were also looking for information about British government printing operations in order to justify our own printing bureau to the Glassco commission. I also believe that this delegation visited the Olivetti company in Italy. What was the reason for this delegation? Is the government thinking of importing more printed matter from Great Britain and other European countries, thereby increasing unemployment in the graphic industries in Canada?

We are now experiencing the influx into the labour force of many tens of thousands of young Canadians, those born after the end of the second world war. Industry will have to absorb a large proportion of these if we are not to be faced with chronic unemployment. The planning to put an end to unemployment must be undertaken right now. Too long has this government been dilly-dallying with this problem. It will be too late and worse than useless to be throwing up our hands in consternation five years from now. The government should confer immediately with industry, labour, educators and parents in order to prepare the way to put to work every single one of these young Canadians. They must be trained, however, so that they will possess the knowledge, intelligence and skills that industry needs and must have in these difficult times.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question? Before he leaves that matter of the importation of printed material I wonder whether he would indicate to the house specifically what he would propose. He has indicated some degree of alarm at the volume of the inflow into Canada of printed material. What is it, precisely, he is proposing as a solution to the problem he described?

(Translation):

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Speaker, I had a speech to make. I did not come here to supply information to the minister. The minister should know his business and know what to do. He can inquire later. If he wants my co-operation, he can telephone me, and I shall be pleased to go to his office and tell him what I think he should do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has succeeded in evading the question.

(Text):

Mr. Bourque: In a period of serious unemployment there are many thousands of jobs going begging in Canada today for no other reason than that there are too few people with the necessary education and technical qualifications to fill them.

Long enough has this government dodged its responsibilities. It should invest in the training of such people rather than continue indefinitely to help them in uneducated idleness draining the unemployment insurance fund dry, or subsisting on government relief.

I have gleaned much of my information from the address given by the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association at its ninth annual general meeting. The unemployment insurance fund sank to $110,051,922 at May 31, the lowest point since its building era. A year ago the fund was at $299,293,000, and at April 30 this year it stood at $143,651,000. The $33 million dip in May was one of the sharpest May declines in the fund's 20 year history.

Municipalities could play an important part in restoring and maintaining full employment. For this purpose large sums of capital would be required at interest rates which the local communities could afford. Most Canadian municipalities have reached the limit of their borrowing power. They are forced to compete in the financial market with the more attractive securities of the dominion and the provinces making municipal borrowings practically impossible.

If the federal government created a national development fund to assist municipalities in financing improvements in public services and utilities at a reasonably low interest rate, this would create jobs for thousands of unemployed throughout Canada. Unless immediate measures are taken to get the unemployed back in jobs Canada faces the unenviable prospect of continued unemployment and a grim future of poverty and dire misery.

Since 1956 approximately 41,000 employees have been dropped by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. These figures relate to one type of industry only. We are told the railways are losing money, their losses are increasing every year. If their earnings do not increase we can expect to have further curtailment of railroad services. Chances of any increase in the passenger or freight traffic do not look very bright. Let us put back to work the 625,000 unemployed persons in Canada and soon the goods manufactured by these people will keep traffic moving at a rapid pace. We must set to work right now, resolved to find a solution to our problems.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Spencer, the hon. member has offered none.

Mr. Bourque: The Canadian market is saturated with Japanese goods. Most of these goods should and could be manufactured right here in Canada which would give employment to thousands upon thousands of our unemployed. The textile industry has been greatly affected by our purchases of Japanese goods. Japanese shipments of clothing, textile products and fabrics to this country totalled $40,200,000 in 1960 and $41,500,000 in 1959 as compared with $5 million in 1954. The textile workers union of America recently wired the Minister of Finance pointing out that 35,000 Canadian textile workers had lost their jobs. They demanded immediate government action to curb the flood of imports. In 1951 the textile industry employed 102,000 Canadians and produced 75 per cent of the textiles sold in Canada. They now produce 48 per cent to 52 per cent of the market and employ about 70,000. In the first seven months of 1960 Japan exported to Canada a total of 3,220,000 square yards of man made fabrics against 3,411,000 square yards for the whole of 1959 and 1,049,000 square yards for all of 1958. Based on the above figures, Canada will have absorbed more of these goods in 1960 than in the two previous years.

I should now like to quote from an article by John Meyer which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of April 14, 1961:

> The Japanese argument for continued access to the Canadian market on their terms is, heaven knows, familiar enough. The Japanese buy more from us than they sell; they insist that the only fair trade is a balanced trade. They buy a million dollars worth of our goods; we buy a million dollars worth of their goods. The economics of such a contention, if fully applied, would bankrupt Canada in short order. The products we sell to Japan create jobs; the products we buy from Japan destroy jobs.

I have touched only on the textile industry but, apply the same thing to all our industries and you will soon realize what the principal cause of our unemployment problem is.

"Japan Today" written by Christopher M. Young, Southam news correspondent supplies the following information:

> Ninety three million people occupy a land area slightly smaller than the province of Newfoundland where fewer than half a million people live. The busy millions of Japan provide a ravenous domestic market for the products of industry. Despite its huge domestic market, Japan depends for its prosperity on its sales abroad. Its own national resources are limited.
> To manufacture in quantity and to feed its people, Japan must buy heavily abroad. To pay for these imports, it must sell heavily abroad.
> Japan's markets today are North America, southeast Asia, Africa and Europe in that order. Ninety three million people in a land the size of a small Canadian province simply cannot survive without trade.

We do not want the Japanese to starve but if we import more of their goods Canadians will be threatened not only with increased unemployment but also with starvation. The government must take proper measures to increase available jobs for Canadians and thereby decrease unemployment.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bourque: I am nearly finished. You can ask your question after.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thank you.

Mr. Bourque: There is an urgent need for the establishment of some positive form of Canadian control. There is no question about the desirability of trade with Japan. The question is, to what extent can Canada afford to allow any one Japanese product a predominant position on the Canadian market, particularly when at the expense of Canadian producers and Canadian workers.

Canada, as a nation which prizes human values, must enable all to share its material wealth and lead useful lives. It must find a suitable formula to assure to its citizens full employment, and retrain, relocate and otherwise fit displaced workers for new job requirements and take measures to prevent future vocational maladjustment of young people.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to indicate that he would be prepared to answer a question. He has indicated his concern regarding the volume of imports of Japanese goods. Would he be good enough now to indicate what measures he would propose to abate, reduce or prevent that inflow of Japanese imports?

Mr. Bourque: I will tell the hon. gentleman what I told him a few moments ago in French. You are the elected and responsible government and therefore if there are any measures to be taken it is up to you to take them. If you assume power thinking that you are going to settle all problems, it is not up to us, but if the minister will telephone me I will be glad to come and discuss the matter with him at any time and give him the benefit of my experience.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the hon. member for his answer. It is quite clear he has no solution.

Mr. Bourque: May I say to the minister that I have a lot of solutions that I will be glad to give him if, as and when he calls me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member will not give his solutions to the House of Commons.

(Translation):

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in the budget debate but considering the lack of sincerity displayed by the Liberals and the complaints they made, I have decided to show the other side of the picture.

Since the beginning of the budget debate, we have heard members of the opposition complaining that the Conservative government never presents anything but deficits. Yet, during the campaign which preceded the last by-elections, we heard none other than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) urgently call for deficit budgeting. That is an example of the inconsistency and lack of sincerity of the Liberals. The only thing they are interested in is power, and ever since they have been removed from power, they have not stopped whining. It has become an obsession with them to be in the opposition.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think they should get used to it because as far as the people of Canada are concerned, they are going to stay there for a long while.

Another very convincing proof of their lack of sincerity is that in the same breath they proclaim themselves leaders in the field of social justice and think of themselves as champions because they have introduced the Unemployment Insurance Act, while at the same time they deplore that Canadian workers are deprived of unemployment insurance benefits.

That is a sure sign of their lack of sincerity. It goes to prove that when they introduced unemployment insurance, they did it merely with a view to extorting money from the workers, because they had no intention whatsoever that the workers should benefit from that legislation. They complain now that workers are taking advantage of the Unemployment Insurance Act that we, Conservatives, have improved and will keep on improving. Let our good friends opposite shed tears and whine. I can understand that after spending 21 years in power they can hardly get used to being in the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few moments to show the other side of the picture. The two Liberal members who spoke before me contended that bankruptcies were increasing under the Conservatives. Well, let us see what the real situation is. I have here Le Devoir of Tuesday June 27, 1961. Here is what I read on page 10:

> In the first quarter of 1961, commercial bankruptcies under the Bankruptcy Act and liquidations numbered 729, which means 3.8 per cent less than the 758 a year earlier, whereas liabilities dropped considerably from $78,495,000 to $26,999,000. Average liabilities per bankruptcy were $37,000, compared to $103,600 a year earlier.

However, that will not stop the lamentations of the opposition—they contend that bankruptcies are on the increase in Canada, while the contrary is rather the case.

My Liberal friends seem used to speaking the opposite of the truth and they seem to thrive on it. Opposition members like to spread confusion throughout the country, hoping that it will be to their advantage.

There you have the true face of the Liberal opposition. We should not bear too big a grudge against them—their education is at fault.

I want to report here what the newspaper La Presse said last Thursday, June 22. The article was signed by Mr. Eric Kierans, president of the Montreal and Canadian stock exchanges and dealt with the budget submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I quote a few excerpts:

> Because of existing conditions, the proposed deficit should mean expansion and not inflation.

And then it goes on:

> From the point of view of the manufacturing industries, the advocated legislation is, on the whole, rather satisfactory. Last week, Mr. Fleming had given to understand that he would bring down a budget to promote economic expansion, and he did.

Further on it says:

> This budget generally, like all the others, will somewhat disappoint those who were expecting special concessions, like a lowering of personal income tax. On the whole it should pave the way to a significant business recovery.

I can understand why the economic upswing should throw the Liberals into confusion: it does not answer their hopes.

Never in this house has there been greater joy in the Liberal ranks than when workers were hit by unemployment. In such cases they lost no occasion to stress the fact that 10, 20 or 50 workers had been laid off. However, they kept silent about the action taken by the government to provide employment.

Again I say unemployment is the best weapon of the Liberals. They like nothing better than to see it grow, and see workers without jobs. It helps their propaganda.

Mr. Rouleau: It is something we deplore.

Mr. Ricard: Something you deplore? It is rather something you enjoy, because every time a lay-off is announced, you rise in this house and ask questions and try to spread fear. That is your way of working on the unemployment problem.

Mr. Denis: That is all nonsense.

Mr. Ricard: Before going on to another part of my speech, I should like to place on the record a statement made by Mr. G. B. Gordon, president of Dominion Textile, who knows more about economics than the coffin expert from Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger). In his remarks, Mr. Gordon has this to say:

The budget will be of some help. He saw some encouragement in the proposals aimed at eliminating the premium on the Canadian dollar and even discounting it in relation to American money. Part of the increased production to be expected from this measure, Mr. Gordon stated, will be directed to the export markets. However, a substantial proportion of the additional goods will be sold on the domestic market.

And he goes on to say:

Moreover, the Minister of Finance did not conceal his determination to bring about the highest possible degree of flexibility in the necessary tariff adjustments, especially those concerning the textile industry and other industries affected by competition from abroad. He stated that he was hopeful on account of the minister's firm intention to avoid the more rigid GATT formulas during tariff re-negotiations, and because of the remarks concerning the recommendations of the tariff board.

Our Liberal friends like to say: "Tory times are hard times".

Mr. Speaker, I have here a newspaper clipping dating back to 1937. The Liberals were then in office. This is how the article reads:

People in the professions were affected like the others. When they went really hungry, they went on relief.

A list of the professions follows. This was happening under our beloved friends, the Liberals, who are striving so hard to improve the lot of the nation. What a joke.

The following statistics are for Montreal and apply to 1937:

Lawyers, 2; notaries, 3; doctors, 2; dentists, 4;

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Ricard: You were one of the briefless lawyers mentioned here; you could not earn a living.

Opticians, 4; nurses, 35; teachers, 51; civil engineers, 6; chemists, 11; accountants, 73; architects, 13; painters, 10; musicians, 51; photographers, 12; journalists, 8.

Mr. Speaker, that is the Liberal balance-sheet. And they are the ones who cry:

[Mr. Rouleau.]

(Text):

If you want to follow me, Mr. Speaker, I shall, during the next few minutes, make a comparison between what was going on during the time those Santa Clauses of prosperity, the Grits, were in office and what we are giving to this country. In 1956 the gross national product was $30,584 million, whereas in 1960 it was $35,959 million. Gross earnings in 1956, Mr. Speaker, amounted to $14,890 million, whereas in 1960 under Conservative government they totalled $18,514 million. Gross personal income under those Grits, those manufacturers of prosperity, amounted to $21,884 million, whereas under the present Conservative government it amounted to $27,442 million. Personal savings under the Grits amounted to $13,020 million, whereas under the present Conservative government they amounted to $16,075 million. Can we honestly say that Tory times are hard times when we have more money, when we are saving more, when we are earning more than ever before in the history of Canada? It takes the hypocrisy of those Grits to stand up in this house and pretend these things. I challenge any one of them to contradict what I am saying now.

They say we have done nothing for the people. Let us look at the record again. In August, 1956, there were 5,892,000 Canadians at work, whereas in 1960 during the same month, August, under a Conservative government we had 6,271,000 Canadians at work. The average weekly earnings—

Mr. Boulanger: From what are you quoting?

Mr. Ricard: Oh, I will come to you in a minute.

The average weekly earnings in different sectors of our economy, sir, were as follows: In 1956, the textile industry had average weekly earnings of $55.96, whereas in November, 1960, textile earnings were $63.51. In the manufacturing industry in 1956, average weekly earnings amounted to $68.72, and in 1960, $79.16; construction industry, 1956, $70.78; 1960, $81.46.

Now, let us see what the taxes were under those Grits who love the workers so dearly. Here is what the Grits were taking from the pocket of a single man earning $60 per week; they were collecting in taxes $7.30, whereas we are collecting from him only $6.05. A married man earning $60 per week had $3.60 deducted from his pay under the Grits, whereas we are collecting only $2.75. A married man with two children earning the same salary paid $2.60 in taxes under the Grits, whereas we are collecting only $1.47 from him. A married man with four dependents had $1.60 deducted from his pay, whereas we are collecting only five cents from him. In the face of the ignorance of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), may I say that those figures were taken from the dominion bureau of statistics.

I should like now, sir, to deal with another item which interests me greatly. I refer to the textile industry, and may I revert to French at this point because I want the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska to understand me.

(Translation):

The other day, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska read a letter into the official record. It is not my intention to brag about this, but I should like also to put on record a letter that reads as follows:

Dear sir,

On behalf of the federation—

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this letter is addressed to me.

Mr. Dupuis: What is the date?

Mr. Ricard: July 15, 1959. The letter reads as follows:

Mr. Theogene Ricard, M.P.
Parliament buildings
Ottawa, Ont.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Ricard:

On behalf of the federation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is raising a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, before reading that letter, I think the hon. member should tell the house who signed it.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I will give that name in a short while; I would ask the hon. member to wait—he is too anxious.

The letter reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

On behalf of the building workers' federation of Canada, it gives me great pleasure to thank you most sincerely for having honoured us with your presence during the deliberations which marked the thirty fifth anniversary of our organization, for having attended the banquet which was offered on that occasion, and for the good words you had for us in your speech, indicating your interest in the promotion of labour.

Mr. Dupuis: Very badly read.

Mr. Ricard: It is signed:

Yours very truly,
The Building Workers' Federation of Canada,
Per: Jos. Arcand, Secretary General.

Mr. Boulanger: Is that the fascist?

Mr. Martel: Not the same Arcand.

Mr. Ricard: In a speech interrupted by sighs, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska cast some doubts on a statement I made last May 3 to the effect that 11 industries have been established in St. Hyacinthe since the Conservative government came to power. I have here a pamphlet entitled: Statistics concerning the industries established in the city of St. Hyacinthe—

Mr. Dupuis: Who signed it?

Mr. Ricard: —which gives a list of the industries established in St. Hyacinthe. I see the following names: Alan Corporation Reg'd., established, 1957; Lucien Carrier, established, 1959—

Mr. Denis: What do those people do?

Mr. Dupuis: Do they sell hot dogs?

Mr. Ricard: Delly Dress Shop Co., established, 1957; Exquisite Form Brassiere (Can.) Ltd., established, 1959; Jace Tapes Incorporated, established, 1960; Kimberley-Clark of Canada Ltd., established, 1958; Megantic Knitting Co. Ltd., established 1959; Mercury Wire and Nail Co. Ltd., established, 1957; Modern Plastics Co. Ltd., established, 1957; Produits Laitiers Mont Saint-Hilaire, established, 1959; Regent Chocolate Co., established, 1959.

At present, these new industries employ 413 people—

Mr. Denis: Name the others.

Mr. Ricard: I named them earlier.

Mr. Boulanger: Name the industries that closed down.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should now like to read into the record some extracts from a publication entitled Quebec Industriel, May 1957 issue. On page 18, this is what I find:

That is why from 1950 to 1954, almost 70 establishments had to close down, and as a result 21,000 workers were laid off.

It should be noted that this happened at the time of the Liberals, the easy-going, the Santa Clauses—

Mr. Denis: Just Santa Clauses.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, these things cannot be repeated too often. The kindly Grits forced 70 firms out of business.

On page 16 of the same magazine, I find this:

> The Canadian primary textile industry is left untouched by the wave of prosperity which is now sweeping the country, notwithstanding the fact that this industry is 84 per cent, under Canadian control, a fact which should earn it our best encouragement. While in 1955, the profits of Canadian corporations were on the whole slightly higher than in 1950, those of the textile industries were reduced to almost one third.

Mr. Speaker, various articles in this magazine have convinced me that it has always been under a Liberal government that tariff rates have been the lowest. As a matter of fact, page 24 reads as follows:

> For 20 years now—
> Under the Liberals.
> —(except for the depression in the 30's) customs duties on imported textiles have been going down steadily.

And those gentlemen would have the population believe that they were the protectors of our textile industry. In fact, Mr. Speaker, they are the ones who betrayed the industry and, today, because the government has to pay the piper and make good their mistakes, they try to take advantage of the situation. They refer to the 30's, but they forget to say that when they were in power, in 1937, for example, the number of unemployed under a Liberal government—

Mr. Dupuis: Following the Bennett government.

Mr. Ricard: —was 400,000; it was up to 522,000 in 1938 and in 1939, after four years of Liberal administration there were 529,000 unemployed and 423,000 in 1940 for a population of 12 to 13 million.

Those people today shed crocodile tears while we have to rebuild all they have neglected. When the Bennett administration came to office in 1930, the worst crisis in Canadian history had just been prepared by the previous Liberal administrations. Mr. Bennett and his team restored Canada to her feet. And when the 1935 elections came around, the Liberals launched a huge campaign about unemployment. They claimed, as they did in Quebec last year, that they would remedy unemployment overnight.

The figures I just quoted, Mr. Speaker, show their lack of sincerity and their incompetence. I am not the only one who knows that—the whole population of Canada knows it too.

The Canadian people know what good administrators they are in periods of prosperity brought about by war.

They were saved by the 1939-45 war and again by the Korean war. But in 1957, the situation was too difficult and the people of Canada put them where they belong. And today, under a Conservative government our workers earn more than ever before, save more than ever before and more Canadian workers than ever before have jobs. However, this does not deter our Liberal friends from trying to confuse the population, from spreading fear, dread and discord, and this for one purpose only, that of playing petty politics.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, a while ago when the minister asked the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) a question, the latter remained silent at first, and then suggested an appointment by telephone. Those people, as their past arrogance has shown, have never been able to come down to the grass. They admit it now—they had lost contact—

(Text):

They lost contact between the brass and the grass and they have lost it for a long time, for the good of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard). Could he tell me what the political speech he delivered tonight has to do with the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) finds himself lacking in intellectual capacity, it is too bad, but I would not like to waste any more of my time.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Denis: Saved by the bell.

Mr. Dupuis: As for Mr. Fleming, he fled before the bell—he had had enough.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, throughout the first two days of this debate I wondered what had happened to the hon. members on the government side. I finally came to the conclusion that they were stunned by this budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Now apparently, while their condition has not changed, listening to the government members today I see that at least they have got their speech back.

We have heard this budget; we have seen the reaction to it of hon. members on the government side; we have seen the reaction to it of hon. members of the opposition. I think it might be interesting for a moment to look at the reaction to this budget expressed in some of our newspapers. For example, in the Globe and Mail of June 27, in an article by Mr. Bruce MacDonald we find the following words:

> Failing any change in policy, Mr. Fleming, who has a vested interest in the silver lining in the clouds,—

What a beautiful description that is of our Minister of Finance:

> Failing any change in policy, Mr. Fleming, who has a vested interest in the silver lining in the clouds, conceded in his budget that only a modest increase in gross national production of 3 per cent is to be expected this year.

Then he goes on to say:

> When he brought down his budget in March, 1960, Mr. Fleming failed to see any basic weaknesses in the economy and denied that the deficit balance of payments presented any real problem.
> In his budget last week, Mr. Fleming said a substantial reduction in the imports of goods and services had become urgent in order to reduce the deficit balance of payments.
> Whether or not there are any structural defects in the economy, it is apparent from the minister's own statement that something must have gotten badly out of balance to allow this situation to develop.

That brings us to the headline of that article, which is:

> Face swift relapse if Fleming fizzles as medicine man.

I suppose "medicine man" there means someone in the nature of a prophet. I am afraid that if the Minister of Finance is no better a prophet this year than he was last year we are in for some mighty serious trouble. Let us take a look for a moment at what happened last year. Last year when the minister brought in his budget he forecast a surplus of $12 million, and wound up at the end of the year with a deficit of some $353 million. In other words, the situation was about 30 times as bad as the minister forecast when he brought down his budget.

This year he has forecast a deficit of $650 million, plus another $330 million for other cash requirements of a statutory nature. In other words, he is forecasting a deficit of $1 billion. If the situation is 30 times as bad as his estimates for next year, as was the case last year, and if the Minister of Finance is as wrong in his guess, we can look forward to a deficit of $30 billion next year. I do not think even the maladministration of this government can get us quite into that kind of situation.

An hon. Member: You never can tell.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I believe I heard an hon. member say, "You never can tell", and perhaps he is right. I should like to read from another article in the Globe and Mail of June 22. This is a summary taken from various newspapers across the country giving their opinions of the budget. I am not going to read them all. However there are two that I think are worthy of note if for no other reason than that they list themselves as independent newspapers. The first one is taken from the Victoria Colonist, and from what I hear of the Victoria Colonist it is just about as independent politically as is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker). It says:

> In letting Canada go further into the red by $1 billion—$650 million in a budgetary deficit and $330 million for other cash requirements of a statutory nature—Mr. Fleming apparently feels that the upturn in the economy is already well under way, and needing only minor pump priming. It would be safest perhaps to say at this stage that it is a mildly protectionist budget, but one that shows Canada is in no way anxious to erect new tariff walls—

And so on.

If this analysis is correct and this is a mildly protectionist budget, what is all this talk about expansionism that we have been hearing?

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I dislike interrupting the hon. gentleman, who normally makes a very effective contribution to debate in the house, but I think he is now infringing the rule. The hon. member is quoting from newspapers which are reflecting upon proceedings within the house, and he is doing this for the purpose of attempting to influence decision in the course of debate here in the House of Commons.

In Beauchesne's fourth edition, on page 133, there are two citations which I think are worth considering. In citation 157, subsection 5, Beauchesne says:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Subsection 6 reads:

> On the 17th March, 1933, a member quoting a newspaper in debate was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker who said: "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others... Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order".

I think the hon. member who has been addressing the house has been using these quotations from newspapers in order to attempt to affect opinion here in the course of debate. I suggest to you, sir, that according to the rules the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Regier: Wait till the Prime Minister does that.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have no wish or desire to transgress the rules of this house. I only hope that the minister is as quick to check the Prime Minister the next time he starts quoting from newspapers.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a good deal of quotation in the course of the budget debate. As long as it is in general terms relating to the budget as a public issue I think it might be acceptable to a limited extent. However, when it does get to the point of direct reference to proceedings in the house, what the minister says in undoubtedly true. Therefore I trust that the hon. member will limit his quotations to those which do not reflect on the proceedings in the house.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Well, Mr. Speaker, rather than tread on the tender nerves of the hon. minister—

An hon. Member: How about following the rules?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I think possibly I had better paraphrase some of these statements.

Mr. Churchill: Use your own ideas and not somebody else's.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the quotations I have been reading are a reflection of my own ideas, and although I may have found them in a newspaper they none the less correspond completely with my own thoughts, particularly what one prominent newspaper had to say. It went something like this, that we are still in an era of improvisation and groping. There was another article which I believed described the situation very well and the headline, as I recall it, was to the effect: "Too little, because too late". It suggested, as we have suggested so often in this house, that by the time this government gets around to applying a measure to solve some situation, unfortunately the situation that it is trying to solve is some 20 years old and a whole new list of problems has grown up in the meantime.

[Mr. Churchill.]

The Globe and Mail, that good old friend of the Conservative party, after offering some mild criticism, went on to agree completely with the government. I hope the minister does not take any objection to that. It pointed out that the minister had emphasized the need to maintain at all costs the good old private enterprise system and added that the minister had listed a number of worth-while measures which the government intended to take. For example, they were going to increase the depreciation allowance for business; there were three or four different measures they were going to adopt in order to bolster industry and business, and the reason for this was because it had been requested for a long time. But there are also many other things which have been requested for a long time; I do not see them in this budget and I do not think anybody else can see them either. For example, for a long time people have been recommending a decrease in income tax or, possibly, an increase in exemptions under the Income Tax Act. I fail to find anything of that nature in the budget. The same thing applies as far as the sales tax is concerned, a tax which affects each and every individual regardless of his circumstances. The unemployed have been looking for jobs for a long time, now. But there is nothing in this budget to indicate that they are not going to continue to look in vain.

Nevertheless, there is one thing we can find in this budget. We have noticed it already. The old age pensioners have something to look forward to in this budget, and it is not an increase in their pension. It is an increase in their cost of living brought about by the measures taken by this government.

What are these Tory measures? What are these measures which the minister advocates and which receive so much praise in the Tory newspapers? Well, it follows the good old Tory policy that the only solution they can find is to try to help business, to let the "haves" get away with more and more. As a result, we shall have to soak the "have nots" to make up for it. What amazes me is that both the minister and this government and the Tory newspapers go blindly along this road completely ignoring the fact that they have been trying these measures for 94 years and that is what has gotten us in the mess we are in today. I do not know how many times they will have to be shown this before it will ever sink into their heads.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that I had the time and the facilities to tally up the measures passed by this government in the last four years and see how many of those measures were designed to prop up business and how many were in the interest of the individual taxpayer. I think it would be an impressive score. It seems strange to me that this government cannot understand that there are only two ways in which we can run a country. One is to raise enough money to do it and the other is to borrow enough money to do it. Apparently this government has decided that the only way they can accomplish it is by the second way. They refuse to do it the first way but they adopt the second solely for the reason that by doing so they can fool the public for a little while longer.

There is one bright side to our economy today, and only one that I can see. That is housing, the bright spot in the building industry. It is interesting to find out just why. We find that in an article by Farrell Crook in the Globe and Mail of today. We find that activity in the over-all construction industry is up some 16 per cent compared with the same period in 1960. Why is it up 16 per cent? We find that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation reports that in the first five months of this year starts were made on 29,337 dwelling units in centres of more than 5,000 population, a jump of 40.7 per cent compared with last year. So it took a 40.7 per cent jump under this socialistic measure to give us a 16 per cent increase in our over-all picture. If we look through further we find out again why—it was because the free enterprise part of our construction industry, according to contract awards, is down 30 per cent as compared with last year. It makes me wonder just how long this self-illusion on the part of this government can be maintained; how long they can hang on to the idea which is propounded by the Prime Minister in his clarion call that the next election should be fought on the issue of free enterprise versus socialism.

Bad as the situation has been, I wonder whether the government has stopped for one moment to think what the situation would have been like over the last three years if it had not been for our old age pensions, our old age security payments, our blind and disabled pensions, our veterans pensions, family allowances and unemployment insurance, building and construction under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, our industrial development bank, our much lauded winter works program, our home improvement loans and public works department construction? Had it not been for all these measures—measures which I do not think anyone by any stretch of the imagination could call free enterprise measures—we should be back exactly where we were in the early thirties. Our country would be in chaos.

I think it is interesting to note what the Economist of London has to say about the over-all situation in Canada. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of June 3, 1961 entitled "Plan for Growth" which reads as follows:

> One of the western world's most authoritative and respected publications, the Economist of London, says Canada faces a bleak decade unless it re-examines its ineffective economic policy and begins to plan for something better.

Mr. Lambert: Gloss upon gloss.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This editorial then quotes from the Economist, as follows:

> "Entirely new planning arrangements bringing together the public and private sectors, are urgently necessary.
> A new purposive sense is needed in the federal government's economic thinking."

The editorial then continues as follows:

> The fact is that Canada is one of the few industrial nations to scorn national planning.

It is needless to add that it is also one of the few industrial nations with an unemployment problem today.

The editorial continues:

> The closest we have come to it is with the new national productivity council, which seeks to find ways in which our resources in manpower and machines can be used more effectively, but it must rely primarily on exhortation to industry and labour.

How many times have we heard the ministers of this government stamp up and down the country exhorting labour and industry to try and do better in the future but apparently each exhortation falls on deaf ears because we have not seen very much improvement. The editorial then continues:

> The contrast between this limited function and those employed elsewhere is startling. Whether in Europe's "common market" or in the Red bloc, planning is a vital fact of economic life. And even south of the border, in that bulwark of free enterprise, U.S. presidents have had the help of a council of economic advisers.

The editorial continues, as follows:

> If we as a nation are to grow and prosper; if we are to adjust our efforts to the conditions in the new and thoroughly planned world, we ourselves better begin planning.—For, as the Economist suggests, the alternative is continued decay.

Mr. Speaker, I have one more article here which I think is apropos of this debate. I should like to read a portion of an article appearing in the Globe and Mail of June 27, 1961 writen by Ronald Anderson entitled "Economy at Midyear", which reads as follows:

> In the first quarter, the economy made no improvement. National accounts figures, to be released later this week by the dominion bureau of statistics, are expected to show a sideways drift, possibly a slight decline, up to the end of March.

When I read that statement it reminded me of the words of Samuel Taylor Coleridge as they appear in his poem, "The Ancient Mariner". That verse goes something like this:

> Day after day, day after day
> We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
> As idle as a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean.

Then of course things changed as of March 31 and we started to move, as indicated by the headline "Upturn Well Under Way, But Some Sectors Slow". In other words, it is a trip on the Diefenbaker track, one step forward and two steps back. I remember another verse of "The Ancient Mariner" which fits this situation very well. It goes something like this:

> The sun right up above the mast
> Had fixed her to the ocean,
> But in a minute she 'gan stir
> With a short uneasy motion
> Backwards and forwards half a length
> With a short uneasy motion.

I think that is an excellent description of the economy of this country.

Until such time as our government endeavours to find or finds a solution different from that they have tried unsuccessfully so many times in the past, I am afraid, like the ship on the ocean it is going to go back and forth with a short uneasy motion.

Of course there is one measure contained in the budget about which I expect we will hear a great deal for the next few months and that is the 7½ per cent cut in excise tax on automobiles. Certainly for the residents of my area and others in the province of Ontario this is not a cut at all because in the first place only 3 per cent of that cut will be given to the province. As a result of the dominion-provincial fiscal policies this government is now adopting the province of Ontario beginning September is imposing a 3 per cent sales tax which will in effect take up 3 per cent of this 7½ per cent. That means that our saving is cut down to 4½ per cent. Our dollar has already dropped five cents which means that we have lost half a step on the triple T already—that is the Tory tax treadmill. We are not even to start off.

I sometimes wonder in view of all the talk we have heard about unemployment and the cures for unemployment, and so forth and so on, whether this government really wants to cure unemployment. I wonder if this government has fallen so far under the domination of industry that it is now thinking what many in the industrial field advocate, that it is very nice to have a pool of unemployment because it makes unions behave and prevents strikes, or if it does not prevent strikes, it breaks strikes. I never fail to wonder at this very blind and shortsighted view on the part of industry. I cannot understand why they do not realize that unemployed people are unable to buy the products which they produce. That has always been a mystery to me. I do not understand why governments do not realize that unemployed people not only are a drain on the federal treasury but also a loss to the potential income of the federal treasury. To allow this unemployment to continue—both on the part of industry and government—is merely to cut off your nose to spite your face.

If industry gets itself in trouble it has found a much more friendly ear in this government than have the unemployed. Perhaps that is one of the reasons industry carries on the way it does. Maybe it feels that because it in the main was where the money came from to elect this government that this is its government. Certainly there is nothing in this budget to prove otherwise.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the early stages of this debate it was rather difficult to assess the true position of the official opposition as regards this budget. Certainly during the first day we were not given any true inkling. We have, however, had more time to find out what hon. members in the official opposition thought after the second day of the debate and their almost exclusive participation in it.

The member who just resumed his seat wondered why hon. members on this side of the house did not participate beyond a certain stage in this debate. Frankly, as far as I am concerned, it was because I felt that I should participate in a debate, and up until that time nothing had been said which could be debated.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The minister spoke for three hours.

Mr. Lambert: The minister has spoken but I do not have to re-echo his words to participate in the debate. When I wish to participate in a debate I shall exchange thoughts and criticize the thoughts of others, but when there is an absence of thinking on the other side we just stay out of it until we see what they have to say. Hon. members opposite were given full scope and while they have filled many pages we are not much wiser even now. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the reason is that the Liberal party is at sixes and sevens in its attitude toward the budget. Fury and storm have been promised, a real side-raking, slashing attack, but apart from the exhibition put on by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) there has been none of that fury and storm.

We did see a frenzied and, I would add, rather frantic performance by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate exceeded only in slight degree by that incredible speech of last night in another debate. Had he not been suffering from a bad case of foot-in-mouth disease, and we have heard the reference to gutless chickens and his confessions about letters from constituents and elsewhere, we would have thought that he was putting on a display of histrionics in competition with the dramatic festival of much greater note and worth at Stratford at this time.

However, the prerogative of putting on that great dramatic show is reserved for his running mate, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), as he thunders away, as he postulates and postures, as he plays to the gallery, always in mock indignation oblivious of all but the self-intoxicating volume of his own exuberance.

But other than these minor blows there has been none of that fighting attitude that had been announced with such fanfare and such ballyhoo and, as we know now, such false bravado last January. That bravado has been displayed from time to time since then but, Mr. Speaker, there is a curious parallel between 1961 and 1958. In 1958 there was a conclave in January. To the sound of trumpets and a great to-do the Liberals came up posturing for a fight. There was a great thumping of chests, cries of bring on the lions, and after a violent travail those of us who were here in January, 1958 saw the Liberals give birth to a puny runt of a mouse. How the people of Canada reacted to that mouse was well recorded some two months later.

Again in 1961 we have had the sound and fury, the January conclave, the trumpets and the ballyhoo, the threatening growls and, quite in keeping, the puny runt of a mouse. That mouse is the amendment put forward by the genial member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) as financial critic for the official opposition. Not for a moment do I believe that the hon. member is the author of that amendment. He certainly was not the author of that other notorious and unlamented—by the Liberals—amendment of January, 1958. We rather know who was the author or at least the inspiration for that one. I would say the same for the present amendment. That busy, busy man of the Liberal party I think was not too far away when the present amendment was concocted.

I had some other remarks about his inspirational authorship last night, and if one credits the number of stories about the hon. member's activities prior to his entry into the house, then he is keeping quite in character. Truly sir, this amendment really says nothing. Let us look at it.

> This house is of the opinion that the financial proposals of the government, as set forth in the budget presented to this house by the Minister of Finance and contrary to the advance publicity—

I ask, Mr. Speaker, whose advance publicity? That of prognosticators in the press? After all, they have a right to speculate, but that was not advance publicity from the government.

> —are restrictive of trade and thoroughly inadequate to expand the production and jobs needed to ensure the growth of the economy, despite the burdens imposed by a fifth consecutive deficit of a record size.

We will talk about deficits a little later, Mr. Speaker, and about the attitude of the Liberal party toward deficits, their attitude since 1958 and what their program since that time has meant in potential expenditure.

> And the house believes that for this reason, and because of the general mismanagement of the country's financial affairs, the government is not entitled to the confidence of the elected representatives of the people.

These last few words are very reminiscent of 1958 and for that reason they mean just as much as they did then. My only thought is that obviously this amendment is intended to gain the support of the hon. members of that group which is casting about for a name and for a leader but can quite easily answer to the name of the third party. Not only do the Liberals in this house seek to garner unto themselves the elected representatives of that new party but it would appear that the order may have gone out to do the same at the lower echelon; at least, so the young Liberals would appear to have thought in Toronto last week.

I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River deserves a better fate than to fight the cause of such an amendment. His was a curious speech but because my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), has dealt at some length with last Thursday's opener by the opposition financial critic I shall make but one or two short comments. First of all, there was an unseemingly long dredging into the past for items of speeches, for statements, some reported accurately and some otherwise, statements taken out of context, glosses put on statements, excerpts from the red bible. I wonder whether they have the red dean too. How that book has been in evidence. On all of the glosses, the excerpted statements, the hon. member built up a number of men of straw. Oh, he worked hard and tortuously to get these creatures to stand up so as to be identifiable at least, but just as hard he worked to knock them down. To what purpose? To consume the major portion of his speech.

I would say that he neglected most of the really important items in the budget. What of the tariff changes? We had heard the hon.

member on previous occasions speak at great length about tariffs and yet this time I do not recollect having heard him so speak. As financial critic, surely he would have had a good deal to say about the provisions for dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements. These were concretely stated and were not something intangible like the possible effects of the devaluation of the dollar which has so many indefinables. But then I suppose such a course of action as he took was more in keeping with the Cassandra-like mood of the hon. member the other day.

Surely if he were really interested in the economic welfare of the country he would have dwelled much more on the changes concerning the industrial development bank, for instance. These are two-pronged and are most important, and I intend to discuss them in more detail later.

However, Mr. Speaker, the official financial critic was subsequently followed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who gave the first of two speeches in the last four or five days which indicate that the hon. member is finding the session long. I am not going to refer to yesterday's effort, but last Thursday evening's effort was quite a contrast with the reasoned though laboured effort of the opposition's opening critic. There was no intelligent development of argument. It was a resort to invective, to personal vilification of the Minister of Finance and of the Prime Minister. One would say there was smear by innuendo and of course there were exaggerated gestures and language. I do not think the indignation he showed was as synthetic, and certainly was not of the order of that which we often get from his running mate, the hon. member for Essex East.

However, there was one thing he said with which I agree. At one stage the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate gloated that he was not thin-skinned. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will agree that at times he has the hide of a rhinoceros. The other night, however, I believe he displayed other characteristics of that animal, certainly in so far as the intelligence of his speech was concerned. Thursday was a bad day for the hon. member as was indicated earlier by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Best). "Gutless chicken" will be as long remembered as "Canadian babies".

I thoroughly enjoyed the spectacle of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), that coiner of pat phrases. I have had experience of him in last year's committee on defence expenditures. He has not changed a bit. On all and sundry occasions we hear flat assertions from him, relying for their validity on the fact that they are statements by the hon. member. He had a great deal to say about planning and tried to chide the government for a lack of planning. His remarks were general, I point out, and applied to no particular sector.

This love of planning exhibited by the hon. member for Trinity is touching. He was one of the co-chairmen of that famous January conclave. He was one of the backroom boys, sir, who steered the meetings, the conclusions and resolutions. We know just what the result was. If there was any vestige of planning in what came out of that January meeting of the Liberals then the hon. member for Trinity stands alone in the Liberal party in his great love of planning. Of course, we all remember the Pearson plan of 1958. We recall it rather dimly, mind you, because it lived for two short months and has been buried for the past three years.

The hon. member for Trinity tried to make much about the reduction of taxes. He dug into the past, into 1956 and early 1957 for excerpts of speeches by the Prime Minister. Then, the red book came out. He forgot, though, about the reduction in taxes in late 1957 which were worth about $178 million. There were reductions in the rates of personal income taxes, increases in the exemptions of children. Of course, one can forgive the hon. member for Trinity for forgetting that because he was not here then. Undoubtedly, he has forgotten these minor items as well as the upward revision from $25,000 to $35,000 of corporate profits to which the lower 21 per cent rate applies. If this is not lowering taxes, then I do not know what is.

A great deal was said by the hon. member for Trinity about deficits. This was echoed by other members of the opposition, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and others. However, they conveniently forgot what their leader said about deficits in 1958. He cheerfully promised tax cuts up to $400 million in addition to the $178 million that the Conservatives had put into force in 1957. What has become of the promise to aid young married couples about which we heard so much? We know that the other day they supported increases in family allowances. What about the plan to bring spring wheat, oats and barley under definite price supports? Wheat was supposed to be $1.50 per bushel in 1957 and 1958. This program would take a lot of money, but the Leader of the Opposition was quite candid about it. He cheerfully accepted the fact that he would have to engage in heavy deficit financing.

I would ask hon. members of the opposition, why all this lately discovered concern about deficit financing by their group? Let us ask them the cost of that great platform of January, 1961. I have heard the estimate put as low as an additional $1,000 million and as high as $1,600 million. Certainly, though, no Liberal who participated in the production of that famous platform has ever publicly admitted that fact, and certainly not the leaders of the Liberal party. They have not admitted the cost of these programs. Unless they are prepared to increase taxes to meet the cost of these items, they are going to have to engage in deficit financing. If they are not so prepared, then the whole program is a sham to deceive the Canadian people. When one considers the added cost today of the $270 million annually for hospital insurance which the Liberals did not have to face prior to 1957, the Liberal program of last January makes absolute nonsense of the opposition's lamentations about deficits, and even greater nonsense of the plea of hon. members such as the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) for tax cuts across the board. I said earlier that the Liberal party was at sixes and sevens in its reaction to the budget. We have had more than ample proof of this fact, Mr. Speaker.

I should like now to turn briefly to the speech of the leading C.C.F. member, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). All I can say is that the part of it in which he made direct reference to the budget beggars all description as to its logic. The hon. member complained about exploratory exemptions, and so forth, which he said led to the reckless expansion of our resource industries in the last few years. I should like to see him come out to Alberta and say that. I challenge him to come out there and say that. I defy him to go to any part of the country in which development programs such as we saw in connection with oil and gas, resulted in economic growth in many sectors of the country and tell that part of the country that we have had reckless expansion.

His lack of logic was illustrated in his next remark when he lauded the higher level of the gross national product in those years. How can he reconcile his two arguments? We have these developments of our resource industries which have contributed, in the main, to the development of the gross national products and will continue to do so. He approves of this increase in the gross national product, but he spent a good deal of his time chiding the government because there had been a decrease in the rate of increase in the gross national product. His logic was completely lacking in this argument.

I did say, sir, that I would refer to the industrial development bank. We have seen a great need in this country for medium and long range financing in all types of business enterprise. The banks do a good deal of financing. The Canadian chartered banks have a record for which they have no cause to be ashamed. They certainly have participated to the full in the economic growth of this country. However, by reason of their structure and the limitations of the Bank Act, they cannot engage in this medium and long range financing. There has grown over the years, therefore, some use of the industrial development bank in a limited sector. We will now see that use expand in so far as these facilities are available to industry in this country.

If I might make a gentle suggestion to the Minister of Finance, it would be that the true spirit of the amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act be carried out in the regulations and that we do not hamper or inhibit the use of the credit facilities under the Industrial Development Bank Act. That is one side of the amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act. However, there is another side and this is a point on which I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance has acceded to the representations which were made not only by myself but by other hon. members and by various organizations throughout the country.

I refer to the fact that in this country, as the minister indicated as found at page 6647 of Hansard in the second column, on accasion problems arise where the principal owners of a firm, be it a family owner or otherwise, are facing or anticipating difficulties in connection with estate taxes. We know of instances in which national firms may be developed through the enterprise, genius and drive of two or three men; those men provided the key to the success of that firm. They may be all able to insure one another so that if, for some reason, one of them should disappear, they are able to buy in his interest and to maintain it within the firm. They are not obliged to sacrifice in order to deal with estate taxes or to settle with the deceased partner's estate and so on.

But there are instances—and I know of some very difficult ones—in which one of the persons involved is not able to get the insurance. There is no means whereby provision can be made for those funds required to clear up the estate taxes or to purchase the interest of the estate. It is suggested that under the Industrial Development Bank Act the bank may be able to participate in the purchase of the shares and in that way to assist the remaining members of the company to keep it together, so that it will not have to be sold at fire sale prices. Again, there is the case of an individual who anticipates that he is not long for this world and that he is going to have quite a sizeable estate.

I know of one case that was referred to me some time ago by the gentleman concerned. His estate will have to pay a very heavy estate tax, and he does not object to paying it; but in order to raise the cash for that purpose, that business will have to be liquidated possibly at fire sale prices, under forced conditions, to the detriment of the estate and any continuing business interest they may have. Yet, on the other hand, today he has offers from foreign interests to buy his business as a going concern. He can take cash to protect his family and to take care of the estate tax problem. But on the other hand, the loss has been that of Canada because a flourishing business has had to be sold to foreign interests. Here again, if I may make a plea to the Minister of Finance, I would express the hope that the regulations, which will embody the spirit and principle of the Industrial Development Bank Act, will be so fashioned and interpreted that we can get the maximum use of it.

I have not referred in very great detail to the provisions of the budget, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance gave a clear picture of those provisions. Hon. members have copies of all of its provisons. I commend it to them for those features which will give to the people of Canada those necessary incentives to improve the economic climate of this country. It is positive action such as that embodied in this budget which will create the right atmosphere for the people of Canada to go forward and not the carping criticism and denigration which we have heard from far too many members of the opposition. Mr. Speaker, I would commend this budget to hon. members of this house and to the people of Canada.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the budget now under debate presents some very interesting contrasts with previous budgets that have been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The increase in wordiness and the decrease in information have already been commented on by various hon. members. I do not think anything more need be said on that score. However, when we examine this budget in the light of last year's budget we can surely be pardoned if we question the accuracy of the minister's economic forecasts and the competence of this government to manage the financial affairs of our nation.

In March, 1960 the minister told us he was budgeting for a surplus of $12 million. In December, 1960 he came and told us the $12 million surplus had now somehow turned into a $286 million deficit. A few days ago he told us that on March 31 instead of a $286 million deficit we were going to have a $345 million deficit. These figures hardly inspire confidence in the minister's judgment. I can remember the time, and it is not so many years ago, when the minister rather prided himself on the accuracy of his forecasts. He now seems to have given up completely in despair. He told us that we were moving out of a recession and that, even if there were no changes in the budget proposals, we could expect a three per cent increase in our gross national product. He refused, however, to predict how much extra increase would be brought about by his budget proposals. He has now come to the point where he will not even predict what his deficit will be. He cites a figure of about $650 million to $700 million and provides himself with a comfortable margin of $50 million even on his deficit.

With respect to the competence of this government in managing our national affairs may I say this. This government has produced a deficit every year since it took office. There have been four successive deficits and a fifth deficit of $650 million is predicted for the current year. The result of these deficits has been to add over $2 billion to our public debt and to increase our interest charges to about $800 million, making them now the third highest item of federal expenditure, second only to national defence and national health and welfare, When we consider all these things, we can hardly regard this performance as an example of good national housekeeping.

There can be no disagreement, however, with the objectives of the budget; to get our economy rolling; to create jobs; to lower interest rates; to finance a greater proportion of our industrial expansion with Canadian capital. Everyone will welcome the tax cuts on automobiles and the other measures such as research allowances, exploration and development allowances and the extension of the operations of the industrial development bank. All these will receive, I believe, general approval.

However, when these proposals are viewed in the light of our national problems, problems of unemployment, economic slow down, the problem of underdeveloped areas and our unfavourable balance of international accounts, then there is room for a great deal of doubt both as to their adequacy and their effectiveness.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I must record my personal disappointment that apart from the extension of the operations of the industrial development bank this budget contains nothing whatever to stimulate the economy of the Atlantic provinces—

Mr. Morris: Who wrote the speech you are reading?

Mr. Carter: I am not reading it.

Mr. Morris: You are reading a speech. Who wrote it?

Mr. Carter: I wrote it myself; I write my notes myself. I do not have to come to you or anybody else to write my speeches.

Mr. Denis: You all do that.

Mr. Peters: Why didn't you look around this afternoon when four or five members read their speeches? You did not say anything then.

Mr. Denis: Didn't you see the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon)?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am having great difficulty in determining who has the floor. I think it is the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo.

Mr. Carter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In particular my constituents will be disappointed that apart from putting net making machinery on the free entry list, bringing it down from—

Mr. Morris: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman is reading his speech and has been reading it up to this point. That is against the rules.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Robichaud: The Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) did the same thing this morning.

Mr. Speaker: What has the hon. member to say to the point of order?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I think it is well known that I am not in the habit of reading my speeches in this house.

Mr. Morris: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is holding the script from which he is now reading his speech.

Mr. Robichaud: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: The practice of the house, and the rule of the house nominally is against the reading of speeches, but in the final analysis it rests with hon. members to observe the rule. If the hon. member indicates he is not reading the speech, the house will accept his statement.

Mr. Carter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member has not said he was not reading it even yet.

Mr. Carter: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not reading my speech. I have some notes to which I am referring, like every other hon. member.

Mr. Habel: He is not reading a newspaper, like you did the other day.

Mr. Carter: I am quite willing to send them up to Your Honour, if Your Honour wishes to verify it.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member proceed?

Mr. Pallett: Have you lost your place? It is the fourth line from the bottom.

Mr. Morris: Read on.

Mr. Carter: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that my constituents will be particularly disappointed that apart from putting net making machinery on the free entry list, bringing it down from the most favoured nation tariffs, which means a reduction of only 5 per cent, there is nothing whatever in this budget to assist the fishing industry.

I wish to refer to the recommendations of the Fisheries Council of Canada. Here I am going to read quite extensively from my notes, Mr. Speaker. I am going to read the recommendations of the fisheries council from notes rather than from the letter which I have here. It is more convenient and I think I will save time by following this procedure. The recommendations of the Fisheries Council of Canada that free entry under item 682 be extended to include trawl doors, inflatable life rafts, aluminum fish boxes and pen boards, cordage with metal strands, salt fish dryers and parts, and electrical generating equipment have been completely ignored. Even their request that the 15 per cent duty on anchors weighing under 40 pounds should not apply to commercial fishermen has been refused.

It is doubtful whether the depreciation of the value of the Canadian dollar will be of very much benefit to fishermen. It is true that it will make fish exporters more competitive, but the New England fishermen are already complaining that our fish products are too competitive in their market. While it may tend to increase profits of fish exporters, there is no guarantee whatever that this increase in profits will be passed on to the fishermen in terms of higher prices. On the other hand, their cost of living will rise, and rise substantially. As other hon. members have already pointed out today, not only will their cost of living increase, but their cost of production will also increase because most of the equipment that the fisherman uses, in my province at least, has to be imported.

In view of the risks involved in using the exchange stabilization fund to depreciate the value of our Canadian dollar there is great room for doubting even the wisdom of this proposal. The most heartening thing about the present budget is that the minister has at least conceded that our Canadian economy is sick. However in this budget, as in previous budgets, the minister seems to have overlooked two very important factors. These are that no matter how accurately he has diagnosed our economic ills, and no matter how good the remedies he has prescribed, there are still two things necessary to make them effective. These two things are the intelligent co-operation of the people and the confidence of the public, particularly of the business community.

The minister cannot expect to get the intelligent co-operation of the people if they do not understand what is required of them and why. I want to suggest to the minister that the wordiness of his budget tends to defeat these two very desirable and necessary ends. If a person comes to me and spends 20 minutes saying something that could be said in five minutes, that certainly does not inspire my confidence in him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is this not the hon. member's second speech in the course of the budget debate?

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The first was on the—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And did the hon. member not spend some time on this very same theme in the first of his two speeches in the course of the debate?

Mr. McIlraith: That would be as repetitious as the minister's budget speech itself.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I am repeating it to lead up to a very important point which I do not want the minister to miss. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Morris: Don't obscure it in verbiage.

Mr. Carter: —I do hope the minister will give serious attention to this—

Mr. Morris: Read on.

Mr. Carter: —because, as I say, if a person takes 20 minutes to say something—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Or makes two speeches.

Mr. Carter: —that he could say in five minutes, that does not inspire anyone's confidence in him. If, in addition to that, he uses those 20 minutes to talk about minor details without giving the vital information that is necessary to form a balanced judgment, then I not only lose confidence in him but I also get suspicious. I want to suggest to the minister that in my opinion—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are a suspicious man.

Mr. Carter: —the public mind reacts in much the same way. In this connection the budget leaves unanswered some very important questions.

An hon. Member: Didn't the Liberal budgets do that for years?

Mr. Carter: The Liberal budgets were never like this.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are right. This is a good budget.

Mr. McIlraith: Good for nothing.

Mr. Carter: I am reading from page 6642 of Hansard. The minister had this to say:

> When there is a substantial degree of slackness in the economy, in the form of excess productive capacity and idle manpower, budget deficits can provide an important stimulus. By means of such a deficit the government, through its expenditures, places in the hands of the public substantially more purchasing power than it withdraws through taxation. If appropriately planned and timed, a substantial deficit can encourage higher levels of output, employment income and savings, without incurring risks of inflation.

Well, it is evident from these words that the minister has at last been converted to the merits of budgeting for a planned deficit. We have been urging that course of action on the minister for the last four years.

An hon. Member: You have?

Mr. Carter: Oh yes. Budgeting for a planned deficit.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question? Are we to understand that the hon. member is saying that he and his colleagues have been urging on me for the last four years the virtues of planned deficit financing?

Mr. Carter: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A moment ago you complained about deficits.

Mr. Carter: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) a few moments ago—was not the minister listening to his own colleague? —was decrying the Liberals for all the deficits we were proposing in our resolutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And you were complaining about the deficits.

Mr. Carter: I want to recall to the minister what the hon. member for Edmonton West said. He said the Liberal leader came out and asked for a deficit of $400 million. That was a terrible thing. Here we have the minister telling us that last year he had a deficit of $350 million which was not planned at all. Not content with that, he comes before us and tells us he is going to have another deficit of $650 million or $700 million this time, and that is not planned either. I am going to prove to the minister just how little planning there is in this budget, but before I go on I just want to answer another thing that the hon. member for Edmonton West said. He went on to say that we have to find $298 million for the hospital insurance plan; the Liberals never had to face anything like that. I want to tell him that as far back as 1957 we had $89 million in the budget for this contingency. So at the time when we were in the depths of a recession the minister steadfastly rejected any suggestion that he should budget for a planned deficit but now that we are on the way out of it he suddenly espouses this cause and becomes alive to its merits. Why has the minister changed his mind? Surely the people are entitled to know. Is it because he has tried everything else and has come to this as a last resource?

I want to tell the minister that it is open to serious doubt whether he has in fact presented us with a planned deficit. The minister has said this is an expansionist budget and I think everybody would agree that if the economy is moving upwards a little more momentum would be all to the good and it would not be a good thing to try to slow it down before it really got under way. We want it to get enough momentum to keep on going. On the other hand we do not want it to get out of control. It might be good politics on the part of the minister to talk about an expansionist budget when the economy is moving upwards, because if the economy is moving up we are going to have expansion anyway. The minister has told us to expect a 3 per cent expansion apart from any effect brought about by his proposals. Will the minister take credit for all the expansion that occurs next year, or only for the expansion that occurs in excess of 3 per cent? I want to tell the minister that there is not much expansion indicated in this white paper which is entitled "Private and Public Investment in Canada Outlook for 1961". If this is really an expansionist budget, how much expansion does it represent? To be healthy, our Canadian economy needs to expand at the rate of at least 6 per cent—2 per cent to take care of the national increase in the working force, another 2 per cent to take care of the backlog of unemployment and a further 2 per cent to provide capital for reinvestment and improvement and to raise our standard of living. Do we have a deficit that is planned to accomplish this? If so, how is it to be achieved? It is certainly not clear from what the minister has told us so far.

A planned deficit, as I understand it, has two components. One component is designed to put extra purchasing power into the hands of the people and the other is to carry out planned projects. The minister told us when he brought down his budget that his proposals would put only $100 million extra purchasing power into the hands of the people in the whole year, and that for the balance of this year they would receive only $65 million extra spending money. Well, I submit that that is not going to have very much impact on the economy. What about the rest of the budget? What about the rest of the deficit? Last year we had a deficit of $350 million and that was totally unplanned and totally unexpected. Now we are going to have $650 million—$300 million more. To what plans are that extra $300 million deficit geared? The minister has not told us. But the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has suggested that it is geared to the spending program which was approved eight months ago. If that is so, and it seems very likely that it is, then it is not related to any expansion project at all.

Another vital question which has been left unanswered is this. What is behind the minister's sudden conversion in favour of using the exchange stabilization fund? Last year he told us it was too dangerous even to contemplate. What is the difference now? He has not told us that.

Mr. Chevrier: Gigantic speculation.

Mr. Carter: We know that the cost of living will go up, but in addition what will be the cost to the treasury to bring our Canadian dollar down, and not only to bring it down, but to keep it down particularly in the face of the United States dollar which may tend to get stronger on the world market? Where will this money come from? Will we borrow this money or will we just print it, and how will this affect the deficit? In fact, is $650 million a realistic deficit and, if not, how will it affect our cash requirements?

If, as the minister has told us, he already will need $1 billion, if our cash requirement will be $1 billion and if in addition to that we have to borrow more money for the industrial development bank and for the exchange stabilization fund, will that not defeat the minister's efforts to keep interest rates down? Surely that will have the effect of an upward push of interest rates.

Then again what will be the effect of a devalued dollar on other sectors of government spending, for example, in regard to the armed forces? I have an article before me which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on June 24, 1961 headed "Canadian Troops

Ask Pay Boost" and bears the date line, "Soest, Germany". Part of this article reads as follows:

> Until about a year ago here Canadians received approximately 4½ marks on the dollar, give or take a few "phennings" (100 to a mark or the German equivalent of our cent).
> Since then, however, the value of the dollar has dropped 15 per cent, 7.5 per cent of this since mid-January this year, taking in the March revaluation of the Deutschmark.
> On the basis of $100 you used to receive 440 marks; now you only get 384, or 57 marks less, equivalent to a loss of about $15.

A later paragraph of the same article reads as follows:

> Sometime this fall the strengthened Deutschmark is to be revalued again. And the question asked is: "If the Canadian dollar is only worth 3.75 now, what's it going to be worth then?"

We might very well ask what it will be worth after the minister has devalued it.

These are all very important questions. I should like to suggest to the minister that the success of his budget proposals will be in direct proportion to the confidence he can inspire in the business community. Businessmen are not interested in the political aspects of the budget and will not be fooled by changes made for political purposes without economic justification. Their confidence will depend on to what extent and with what forthrightness the minister provides the answers to these important questions.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I listened a few moments ago to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) who had risen to take part in the discussion of the budget. The hon. member said that he had no intention of taking part in this debate, but that, in view of the lack of sincerity, or of the "insincerity" of the Liberals, to use his own words, he had decided to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking you, is it a lack of sincerity on the part of the members of the Liberal opposition to take up the case of the unemployed in this country? Is it a lack of sincerity, Mr. Speaker, to defend the businessmen who are having trouble since the Conservatives took over in this country? Is it insincere on the part of the Liberal opposition to make an appeal on behalf of businessmen in Canada? Is the Liberal opposition lacking in sincerity because it wants to defend the Canadian workers and taxpayers? Is it a lack of sincerity, Mr. Speaker, for members of Her Majesty's official opposition to try to co-operate in the restoration of full employment in Canada, in the restoration of prosperity and of the finances of the state?

Mr. Speaker, who is guilty of insincerity, if I may use the expression of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot? Certainly it is those who, in 1957 and 1958, made irresponsible promises. They were guilty of insincerity in failing to provide to the Canadian people what they had been used to receive during the 22 years of Liberal government.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot managed to pull another neat trick tonight. In taking part in the budget debate, he managed to say not a single word on the budget itself. That shows what the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot really thinks of the budget speech delivered to us by the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot suggests that we, of the Liberal opposition, are glad to see the unemployment insurance fund depleted. Well, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more untrue. What we complain about however, we, Liberal members, is that the unemployment insurance fund that we had succeeded in setting up during our administration, because we were able to ensure full employment, is seriously threatened by the bad administration of the Conservative government which is directly responsible for the present unemployment in our country. But before long, Mr. Speaker, it will be those who sit on this side of the house who will have the responsibility of replenishing that fund, as we did in the past, by restoring prosperity and full employment in Canada.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot stated here tonight in front of his colleagues, that we, on this side of the house are glad that there is unemployment in Canada. Well. As a young Canadian, as a Liberal, as a politician, I take objection to the statement of the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. As a Canadian who loves his country and his fellow-citizens, regardless of party affiliations, I cannot rejoice that there should be so much unemployment in our country. As a Liberal, as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, nothing would please me more than if unemployment were on the way out and if all those who suffer at present could find the jobs to which they are entitled and which would enable them to earn their living and benefit from the natural resources with which providence has endowed our country.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot asserts that all we want on this side of the house is to get back into power.

After four years of Conservative administration, after having travelled here and there in the country and having heard Canadian citizens from all classes complaining, I should say that it is less a case of Liberals wanting to get back into power than a case of the Canadian people being anxious to get rid of a government in which they put their trust in 1957, but which they do not trust any more and which they would gladly replace by one having shown its mettle, namely a Liberal administration.

The member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot told us that we wanted to get back into power only for the sake of being in power. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot would do well to read again the report of the Conservative convention held in Ottawa in 1957 when the young Progressive Conservatives were stating that in order to take hold of power in Ottawa they only had to mobilize all the discontented Liberals.

Mr. Tom Bell, then president of the young Conservatives stated:

We are going strong, united and anxious to do a job for our party, and the easiest way to do that is to turn against the Liberals.

Such was the program that the young Conservatives held before the Canadian population.

Well, on this side of the house, we have a concrete program to offer. We have concrete proposals to submit to the people, as we have done during the present session. Unfortunately, those members opposite did not want to listen to us, nor take into account the suggestions we made, so that their administration has put us in a sad plight.

Mr. Speaker, the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is not usually so vocal. Perhaps it is the presence here tonight of the candidate to the leadership of the Union Nationale party, Mr. Daniel Johnson, that inspires him. That explains perhaps the severe attitude of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Speaker, let us come back to more serious matters. Our political institutions, like our parliamentary traditions, favour a system of political parties representing various shades of opinion.

A certain group, known under the name of Conservatives, accept men and institutions as they are. It is the present Prime Minister who gave that definition of the Conservative party. In practice, that party has shown some preference for restrictive and protectionist policies and a certain leaning toward financial interests which it seeked to protect.

Another group, the extreme left group, known as the C.C.F., advocates a radical evolution in our institutions, including nationalization of production.

The middle of the road party is the Liberal party, which believes that reforms are always required because it is always necessary to adapt oneself to changing conditions in these modern times.

The Liberal party wants to protect the average citizen; it does not want changes as radical as those advocated by the socialists, because it believes that free enterprise is of great service to the nation. But it wants to ensure a more equitable distribution of the wealth of the nation and the fruits of production through social security measures and reforms it has always advocated.

These three schools of thought are constantly opposed in Canada but more particularly in the House of Commons where the elected representatives of the nation meet.

If it falls to the party with the largest number of representatives to govern, to administer the nation's business, the opposition which represents a large proportion of Canadian citizens, has the duty to criticize, and criticize severely when needed, the government measures. The opposition has the duty to point out the faults and omissions of the government, to make observations and suggestions and, let us admit it frankly, to show the nation, the Canadians, the shareholders of this country, that it is more capable of running the country than the government of the day.

In their respective fields, the government, and the opposition, must never forget their responsibility, which is the welfare of the nation and the sound management of the affairs of the country, coming first, before the promotion of a political party.

The government must never make use of its majority in the house to stifle the opposition. It must listen to opposition members with attention and sometimes, let us admit it, with patience.

Opinions are certainly different as to the policy to be followed in order to bring about the general weal. This is something we must never forget in our discussions, but we must take for granted and for sacred the fact that the public weal is the sole care of every member of this house. Any member who does not entertain such an ideal would not deserve to sit in this house.

The system of government we have in Canada encourages such an ideal and I, for one, am convinced that we have now an ideal system of democratic government of which I am proud to be a member and I am grateful to the voters of the Dollard constituency for giving me the opportunity on their behalf to take part in that government.

It is with this preamble as a background that I rise tonight to take part in this debate on the budget.

I wish a greater number of my colleagues of the ministry had participated in this debate, but I find that they, who are usually so loquacious, especially during the present session, when they continuously rose to talk about the most trivial matters, to praise this or that minister, to shower flattery upon the government on all occasions, have become hesitating when it comes to deal with one of the most important measures, if not the most important of all the reasons why we are here, that is the Canadian budget which will directly affect, during the next 12 months and even during years to come, the life of every family, of every Canadian citizen, and which will also affect our relations with every nation of the world.

Our hon. friends opposite, after the applause of the budget night has faded away, are somewhat stunned. They are as quiet as frightened partridges. You would think they are ready, like panic-stricken ostriches, to hide their heads in the sand.

It is no wonder that they are afraid. They have reason to fear not only the anger of their constituents, in view of the complete failure of four years of Conservative administration, but also the worst for the Canadian economy, because of the tremendous gamble the Minister of Finance is taking in his budget. No one can say where we are headed. The experience of the past four years has taught us to fear the worst.

Four years of Conservative administration have given us the following result: five deficits in four years; an increase of $2 billion in the national debt; corresponding increase in the interest on the debt; deterioration of our commercial relations throughout the world; deterioration of our relations with our American neighbours; irreparable deterioration, in some cases, of relations between the government and senior officials, as well as various government agencies.

The Minister of Finance has announced an expansionist budget; indeed the budget is expansionist, but in its deficit.

Last year, he forecast a $12 million surplus and ended up with a deficit of some $345 million. This year, he predicts a deficit ranging between $600 and $700 million. What will be the situation next year?

The policies of the Conservative government have resulted in unenviable records, record deficits, record unemployment, record increase in the interest on the debt in peacetime, and record hesitation, contradiction, incompetence and irresponsibility.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The responsibility of the Department of Transport for the prevention of dumping of waste or refuse in navigable waters is confined to oil pollution by ships. Within this area of responsibility, the answers to the questions are as follows:

2. Vessels are boarded by department inspectors in Vancouver for the purposes of examining oil record books. Public notices are also posted warning of the penalties for discharge of oil into Canadian waters and pilots bringing vessels into west coast Canadian ports are provided with cards advising the master of the ship of the penalties for discharge of oil.
3. Section 495A of the Canada Shipping Act provides for a penalty of up to $500, and/or six months' imprisonment.
4. Surveillance of vessels on a continuous basis is not possible but arrangements have been made with the masters of Canadian government ships and the masters of fisheries inspection vessels to report any cases of oil pollution which come to their attention.

APPENDIX

JOINT COMMUNIQUE BY PRIME MINISTERS OF JAPAN AND CANADA

June 26, 1961.

The Prime Minister of Japan, Hon. Hayato Ikeda, has concluded today a visit to Ottawa made at the invitation of the Prime Minister of Canada, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. Prime Minister Ikeda was accompanied by the foreign minister of Japan, Hon. Zentaro Kosaka, and a number of officials of the government of Japan.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker and Prime Minister Ikeda, together with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Hon. Howard C. Green, and the Japanese foreign minister, exchanged views on a number of international problems of mutual interest and concern and on questions affecting the relations between Canada and Japan.

They examined the state of east-west relations, with particular attention to recent developments in the Far East. They agreed on the need for a genuinely independent and neutral Laos and on the importance of economic co-operation with the less fully developed nations of Asia. They further exchanged views on communist China.

Prime Minister Ikeda and Prime Minister Diefenbaker welcomed the continuing co-operation of the Canadian and Japanese delegations to the United Nations. They emphasized that they looked forward to even closer co-operation in the future.

The two Prime Ministers also reviewed economic relations between Canada and Japan. Prime Minister Ikeda reaffirmed the principle of orderly marketing of Japanese exports to Canada of products competitive with Canadian production in order to avoid injury to Canadian industries. Prime Minister Diefenbaker confirmed that the government of Canada looked forward to the continued expansion of mutually beneficial trade between the two countries.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker noted the Japanese interest in the possible establishment and development of Japanese investments in Canada and indicated that mutually satisfactory arrangements would be made for the entry to Canada of Japanese nationals required in connection with certain of the operations of these enterprises. Prime Minister Ikeda explained his government's plans for further liberalization of imports, including commodities of interest to Canada.

The two Prime Ministers agreed that in view of the increasing importance of Canadian-Japanese relations, there should be established a Canadian-Japanese ministerial committee which would not be a negotiating body but would provide a valuable means of contact between ministers of the two countries. The activities of the committee would consist primarily of visits of ministers to each other's country from time to time to exchange views on matters of common interest particularly in the economic field, and to familiarize themselves with the problems of the other country.

At the close of their discussions Prime Minister Ikeda renewed the invitation to Prime Minister Diefenbaker to visit Japan. Prime Minister Diefenbaker accepted this invitation to visit Japan at a mutually convenient time in the near future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

BROADCASTING

Third and final report of special committee on broadcasting—Mr. Fairfield.

GRAIN

STATEMENT ON DELIVERY QUOTA POSITION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform hon. members of the grain delivery quota position in western Canada. As at June 27 there were 62 stations on a 4 bushel quota, 607 on a 5 bushel quota and 1,325 on a 6 bushel quota. The railways have been instructed to give priority to those stations on a low quota, and those producers on 4 and 5 bushel quotas can be assured, therefore, that box cars will be available shortly.

Hon. members from western Canada in particular will wish to have some indication of the maximum quota levels which may be reached this crop year. I discussed this subject with officials of the Canadian wheat board yesterday and can now inform the house that an effort will be made to have all stations on a 7 bushel quota by the end of the crop year.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that no complete assurance can be given to producers at this time that it will be possible for them to deliver a full 7 bushel quota. There are several hundred stations presently on a 6 bushel quota where space is now available, and in order to take full advantage of the situation the board will issue instructions today that producers at these stations may deliver grain against a 7 bushel quota. As space becomes available at other stations the elevator agents will advise the Canadian wheat board when there is sufficient space to warrant an increase to a 7 bushel quota.

Under the extremely adverse conditions now prevailing in western Canada it is impossible to predict with any degree of accuracy the extent to which producers may wish to avail themselves of delivery opportunities. Many producers may in fact wish to retain supplies of grain on their farms for feed and seed purposes. In other areas where crop conditions are more favourable producers may wish to deliver their grain to the maximum extent possible. It is for this particular reason that, whereas producers are assured of a full 6 bushel quota, the extent to which deliveries may be made against the 7 bushel quota may vary as between stations and areas.

With my full approval the Canadian wheat board will endeavour to equalize delivery opportunity to the extent possible, consistent with the No. 1 task of ensuring that supplies of grains and grades of grain are available to meet export and domestic commitments.

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT CONDITIONS IN WEST—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FEDERAL AID

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister informed the house of the grave drought conditions prevailing in western Canada and outlined certain actions to be implemented by the government to assist farmers in obtaining adequate supplies of fodder.

In addition to fodder requirements the government and the Canadian wheat board have received requests from certain areas for the retention of stocks of wheat, oats and barley in store, country elevators, to fulfil anticipated local requirements. Following discussions with officials of the wheat board I am pleased to inform the house that the board is now prepared to facilitate the holding of necessary grain supplies for local sale purposes provided prior arrangements are completed with the local authorities with respect to the payment of carrying charges on stocks held for this purpose.

Accordingly the Canadian wheat board will issue instructions today authorizing local elevator companies, when approached by municipal authorities requesting stocks of specific grain to be held for local sale, to immediately contact the board. The board will then enter into provisional sales contracts with the company on the understanding that carrying charges are for the account of the municipality. In the event that more stocks are contracted for than are ultimately required, the board will agree to cancel the provisional sales contract and the balance of the stocks will be reclaimed by the board, which will again assume the carrying charges.

I have had discussions with the provincial ministers of agriculture of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and I am today trying to contact the minister of agriculture of Alberta, to let them know of this action immediately. I do not think I need tell the house that this action is now being taken to avoid a recurrence of what happened in 1937 and 1938 in the prairies.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia will be delighted to know of this favourable response on the part of the government to his representations.

STARRED QUESTIONS

FLOODS; ETC.—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCE

Question No. 410—Mr. Herridge:

1. What is the policy of the federal government with respect to assistance granted to the provinces suffering flood and other disasters beyond their financial capacities to meet?

2. (a) What is the total amount of money granted by the federal government to each province since 1945, in connection with assistance to meet the costs of flood, and other disasters? (b) on what date was each grant made, what disaster had occurred, at what place, and what was the amount of the grant made for each disaster?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer to this question. It is very lengthy and embraces many figures. I wonder if it would meet the wish of the house if it were placed on Hansard without being read.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: the answer referred to above is as follows:]

1. Federal assistance for disaster relief is granted only if a request for assistance has been made by the provincial government and if the amount of the damage is beyond the financial capacity of the province.

Where these basic conditions apply, the policy which has been developed and applied in the last two instances of flood damage has been to share equally with the province a portion of the cost of building repairs on privately owned homes and associated structures (outbuildings, business premises attached to the home, etc.) In both these instances, the eligible portion of the cost has not exceeded 80 per cent of an amount equal to the total damage suffered by each individual less $100 deductible; in addition there was a maximum on the eligible portion for each establishment of $5,000. There have also been various arrangements in past cases for taking into account any insurance recovery.

Where non-flood damage has been concerned, there has been no standard formula and federal aid has depended largely on the particular circumstances of each case.

[For answer to part 2 see table on following page.]

ANGOLA—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON REQUEST OF CHURCHES

Question No. 430—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What action has the Canadian government taken on the request of the Canadian council of churches, Canadian Baptist foreign mission board, and United Church of Canada, on May 29, 1961, to "Use its influence through all possible channels to the end that the excessive punitive action being carried out in Angola be brought to an immediate halt"?

3. What action has the Canadian government taken on the request of the Canadian council of churches, Canadian Baptist foreign mission board, and United Church of Canada, on May 29, 1961, to "Impress upon the Portuguese government the legitimate claim of the African people of Angola to fundamental human rights and to participate in the processes of government"?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. This request was discussed on May 29 when I received a delegation including representatives of the department of overseas missions of the Canadian council of churches, the Canadian Baptist foreign mission board and the executive of the general council and the board of overseas missions of the United Church of Canada. I gave a report of that meeting to the house on May 30.

The representatives of the churches concerned were informed that Canada supported the resolution of April 22 of the general assembly which set up a subcommittee to inquire into the situation in Angola because the government considered that the resolution offered a moderate and helpful approach to a complicated subject, and the Canadian government hoped that the subcommittee would be able to make recommendations which would ease the situation. The subcommittee consists of Finland, Dahomey, Sudan, Bolivia and Malaya.

On June 9 the security council approved a resolution on the situation in Angola which, among other things, asked Portugal to extend every facility to the subcommittee set up by the general assembly and requested the subcommittee to implement its mandate without delay.

The security council also expressed the hope that a peaceful solution will be found to the problems of Angola. The Canadian government is awaiting with interest the report of the subcommittee on Angola and, in the light of that report, will consider what further action might usefully be taken.

Parts 2 and 3 to the question are answered by the answer to part 1.

CANADIAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO PORTUGAL

Question No. 431—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What military assistance has Canada provided Portugal under Canadian mutual aid each year since the program was established?

2. What form has this military assistance taken?

3. Is any consideration being given to additional military assistance to Portugal under mutual aid?

4. Has Canada sold any arms, ammunition, or other military equipment to Portugal since NATO was established?

5. If so, what material has been sold?

6. Have there been any Portuguese requests to purchase Canadian arms, ammunition, or military equipment this year?

7. If so, what material was requested?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to parts 1 and 2 of this question, the information is contained in a table and I ask leave to have that printed without reading it. The answer to part 3 is as follows.

As the Prime Minister stated in the house on June 22, the Canadian mutual aid program was designed for the purpose of helping our European NATO allies to build up their capacity to resist aggression. It is carried out under NATO sponsorship, and allocations are made on the basis of recommendations from the central NATO military and civilian authorities.

Under this program Canada has given assistance to Portugal. Such assistance has been provided on the understanding that it be used only to strengthen the capacity of NATO to deter or resist aggression and only for the defence of the NATO area as defined in article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty. The question of future mutual aid shipments to Portugal will be determined in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time such requests are received, taking into account the principles I have just outlined.

4. Yes.

6. No.

7. Answered by the answer to part 6.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to incorporate the table referred to as part of his answer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO RAILWAYS, B.C.

Question No. 268—Mr. Regier:

1. On what dates and for what railways has the British Columbia government, or other interests, within the last fifteen years, requested federal assistance?
2. What was the amount of such assistance requested in each case?
3. What has been the response of the federal government on each such occasion?
4. Have any such requests remained unanswered to date?

PUBLIC SERVICE—COMPENSATION FOR SATURDAY STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

Question No. 269—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from any organizations or groups of civil servants requesting pay for statutory holidays which fall on Saturdays, with particular reference to Dominion day and Remembrance day 1961?
2. If so, from what organizations have such representations been received?

AIR TRANSPORT

RENEGOTIATION OF U.S.-CANADA BILATERAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether there is a Canadian team from his department in Washington renegotiating the Canada-United States bilateral air agreement. If so, what success has that delegation had?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes, we have a Canadian delegation in Washington at the present time to renegotiate the bilateral air agreement. As far as the success of the delegation so far is concerned, I have not received a report this morning, but of course we accept the fact that the present talks are only preliminary.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is Canada seeking to obtain fifth freedom rights on a Montreal-Los Angeles route as well as on the Montreal-Toronto-Miami route?

Mr. Balcer: The position of the Canadian delegation is that we are insisting on a complete renegotiation of the bilateral agreement in all its facets. This is a long, involved discussion, and that is why I said the meeting is only preliminary. It is my understanding that the matters raised by my hon. friend will be discussed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC—STATUS OF DIPLOMAT IN TRANSIT THROUGH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is prompted by inquiries from Vancouver. In view of the fact that Juan Garcia, former chief of the secret police for the late dictator Trujillo of the Dominican Republic, has reportedly been cooling his heels in Vancouver for some time while en route to a diplomatic post in Japan, and in view of reports that he is being watched or guarded by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, can the minister inform the house as to this man's status and whether he is travelling under a diplomatic passport or visa or as a visitor? Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been instructed to watch or guard him? If so, for what purpose?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The status in Canada of the Dominican citizen, Juan Abbes Garcia, is that of a transit traveller. He is travelling on a diplomatic passport with a diplomatic visa for transit through Canada to Japan where he has been appointed counsellor at the embassy of the Dominican Republic in Tokyo.

I have no knowledge of any instructions issued by the R.C.M.P. in connection with Mr. Garcia's transit through Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question. Has the minister any knowledge of such instructions?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I even knew the gentleman was in the country.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INITIAL PRICES FOR 1961 CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house when the initial prices will be set for wheat delivered in the new crop year beginning August 1? Will these initial prices take into account the recent increase in wheat board selling prices?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I cannot give the time when the government will announce the new initial prices, but when that decision is made it will be announced in due course. In so far as I am concerned, there is no intention to change the initial price for wheat owing to the new high prices. What really counts with the farmer is the final payment.

QUEBEC—REPORTED PROTEST AS TO TRANSPORTATIN COST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Following the brief submitted to the federal authorities by the "Fédération de l'UCC du Saguenay" and the "Chaîne coopérative du Saguenay" concerning discrimination in freight rates on feed grains and grains generally, could the Minister of Agriculture indicate whether a favourable decision has been taken with regard to these representations?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for Chicoutimi and Lake St. John have been discussing this question with me in the last month or so. I hope to make an announcement in the not too distant future about some adjustment to be made in relation to this matter.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—REPORTED REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO PROSECUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which was sent to him earlier. Has the minister received a request from Mr. Terrence Whitfield for permission to prosecute Canadian Marconi Company under the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act? If so, what decision was made with respect to the request?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I did receive a letter from Mr. Whitfield on about June 9, in which he voiced his complaints against the Canadian Marconi Company and asked for clarification of his position with regard to the Canadian Fair Employment Practices Act. There was no formal or direct request for permission to prosecute. Following Mr. Whitfield's letter my officials have been in contact with the department of northern affairs to ascertain the facts of the case. I am waiting for a further report from my officials on this matter.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister in a position to report to the house on the negotiations for assistance to Prince Edward Island potato growers?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to get in touch with the government of Prince Edward Island today to tell the minister of agriculture that the government has agreed to share with the province in the cost of compensation to those who have suffered losses greater than 15 per cent due to fusarium rot, to a maximum of $600 per farm.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked about the returns concerning which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired on Saturday, as recorded at page 6988 of Hansard. These returns, it should be noted, call for orders in council for which no statutory authority exists. They are not, as he described them, returns for which no legal authority exists. These returns will require the examination of tens of thousands of orders in council running back for many years. This work has been commenced but it will take a considerable time for completion. Consequently I am not able to inform the hon. member just when the returns will be ready.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask whether she is aware of any negotiations going on between the Sarnia band of Indians and Dimensional Investments Limited? If so, are such negotiations being carried on with the hon. lady's approval?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member I only know what I read in the newspapers. The reported negotiations if there are such, are at this stage being carried on between the Indians and the interested parties themselves, and have not reached the stage where the department is involved.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. lady inform us whether the surrender that was executed for the purpose of making this deal is still in effect, or whether there would have to be a new surrender if there was a new deal?

Mrs. Fairclough: There would have to be a new surrender.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED INCREASE IN REMAILING RATES ON U.S. PUBLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the Postmaster General informed United States publishers that the remailing rate on United States periodicals in Canada will be raised 25 per cent on August 1?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): We do propose, Mr. Speaker, to increase the rate for United States periodicals placed in the mails in Canada. The new rate will be 5 cents per pound. I am not sure whether the effective date is August 1 or September 1.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statements in the report of the royal commission on publications to the effect that these remailing rates seem to have no legislative or statutory basis, is it the intention of the Postmaster General to seek such legislation to regularize this rate?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, we will follow the same practice which was followed when the rate was introduced some years ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR PAID HOLIDAYS FOR PART TIME EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that part time postal employees are now required to pass examinations because, according to the minister, their wages have been increased to the wage level of regular postal clerks, for the same reason would the Postmaster General explain why part time employees do not enjoy holidays with pay as the regular postal clerks do, which I am sure the minister would agree would be the humane thing to do?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. member's preoccupation with holidays at this stage in our parliamentary session. I think many hon. members are preoccupied with the same consideration. I must say this is the first time I ever heard an increase in salary argued as the basis for holidays as well.

In this particular case these people are working three or four hours a day. It is not full time employment. They are perfectly free to arrange for holidays if they wish. There would seem, with respect to part time employees, no obligation to pay them for their holiday time under our present regulations.

Mr. Denis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that in the province of Quebec the employers of part time employees have to grant holidays to their workers? In the case of those who have worked for less than six months they grant at least 2 per cent of the wages earned during the time they have been employed. The Postmaster General must know that those part time postal employees are working seven days a week—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has completed one question, and I think he should give the minister an opportunity to answer if the minister wishes to do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in pursuing this debate at this time. There are appropriate occasions when this subject might be raised on my estimates.

(Translation):

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a similar question of the Secretary of State? Would he consider the possibility of giving all part time government employees the same right to paid holidays as permanent employees get?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the question actually concerns so many departments that I could not answer it. In fact it is rather a matter of government policy.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSTAL DIRECTOR, DISTRICT NO. 2—BILINGUAL REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Is the Postmaster General in a position to reply to the question I asked him two days ago?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The Ottawa postal district includes the eastern Ontario area up to Peterborough and only a small part of Quebec.

The largest post offices in the area are those of Ottawa, Hull, Cornwall, Brockville, Prescott, Kingston, Belleville, Picton, Trenton, Cobourg, Peterborough, Perth, Smiths Falls, Arnprior, Renfrew and Pembroke.

Consequently, bilingualism is not an essential requirement in the competition for the position of district director, but as always, a bilingual candidate would have an advantage in the competition.

Under the district director there are four regional superintendents, and most of the Quebec section of the district is under the jurisdiction of a bilingual regional superintendent who also looks after that part of eastern Ontario where most of the communities mentioned by the hon. member are located.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Will applicants in this competition have the privilege of answering the questions either in French or in English, as they prefer?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That question, I think, is a matter for the civil service commission. However, I think the usual practice is that the applicant is allowed to answer in either of Canada's official languages.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—EFFECT OF IMPLEMENTING RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General and ask him whether he has been advised by Reader's Digest that if the recommendations of the O'Leary commission are put into effect, Reader's Digest will lay off some 400 employees in Canada?

[Mr. Dorion.]

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that representations have been made to various ministers within the cabinet by Reader's Digest and their employee associations. I have received some representations. I am not completely conversant with the details, but I remember that a claim somewhat along those lines was made.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION FOR BANK MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether there is presently before him an application for the merging of the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no application.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BIRTH OF DAUGHTER TO WIFE OF MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance relating to an increased demand on the consolidated revenue fund in the form of a family allowance which will be paid to Mrs. James McGrath, wife of the hon. member for St. John's East, who gave birth yesterday to a nine pound two ounce girl.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members will agree that no family allowance was better earned.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 27, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was dealing with the rather unpleasant records to which four years of Conservative administration in this country had led. Yet, in view of those records I mentioned last night, the Conservatives persist in saying that the situation in Canada could not be better. As

I cannot believe that the government is either blind or in bad faith, let me say this—the Conservative party has beaten another record, that of naivety.

In the light of all those rather unenviable records and their disastrous results for the nation, it is not surprising to find that the Conservative members are reluctant to participate in this debate. When you see them so silent, you would think they are attending someone in the throes of death. There is not even a whisper. They are awaiting the demise of this government and trying to keep it alive a little longer by giving it shots in the arm like the Coyne affair, which I am sure, will have no effect whatsoever.

After months of anguish and hesitation on the part of the Minister of Finance and of anxious expectation on the part of our people, the Minister of Finance, in all his greatness, has at long last condescended, at the very last moment, to submit a financial report on the country's business together with the budget for this fiscal year which is a few months old already.

Considering how long it had taken to prepare it, we were entitled to expect, if not a masterpiece, at least a decent piece of work, but the minister just gave us a daub, and a bad one at that.

As Mr. Paul Sauriol wrote in Le Devoir of June 22, 1961:

> That document scarcely answered the public's expectation. It contained no surprise and hardly any changes in the taxpayer's yearly return—Such a budget should make one think, because it reflects disquieting problems in our national economy.

The minister had indicated an expansionist fiscal policy, but as I said last night at the beginning of my remarks, the expansionist trend of the budget only applies to the deficit.

There are, of course, new tariff barriers in it and on the whole it will add to the burden for the Canadian taxpayer.

The average Canadian will suffer from the devaluation of the Canadian dollar more than he will benefit.

Anyhow, that fluctuation is a new contradiction, or rather a new about-face in fiscal matters on the part of the minister.

In his budget speech, last year, the minister had objected to all suggestions in favour of a fluctuating Canadian dollar on the world market, and vehemently denounced it, stating that such a policy would necessarily require the purchase of uncalculable amounts of American dollars, which would be a bad thing for our economy.

Yet, this year, he advocates the policy which he had radically rejected at that time.

What will be the direct results of this policy for the Canadians? We will have to pay more for imported goods and heaven knows how much we must rely on imports for our day to day requirements.

This is what was written by Mr. Norman Campbell, parliamentary reporter for the Ottawa Citizen in the June 21 issue of that paper:

> There is nothing much in the budget for the consumers except the prospect of higher prices.

This is where we stand after four years of a Conservative administration. From its prosperous position of 1957, Canada has now fallen to the depths of an economic slump. We are facing all kinds of economic difficulties resulting in unemployment and concern for thousands of families who only ask to be allowed to work, to live and to share in the tremendous resources with which this country was endowed by Providence.

We are all the more entitled to demand from the Conservative government an account of the administration of the nation's business entrusted to them by the people, since the present government had promised them the moon and stars.

Everybody remembers the famous statement made by the Conservative leader:

> As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, no one will suffer.

In another sermon delivered before the young Conservatives of eastern Quebec, in Quebec city, on December 8, 1957, he made the following statement as reported in La Presse for December 9:

> The Conservative party considers it its mission to rebuild the country from its ruins... You can be sure that it will not fail in its task and that, in its activities, it will never forget the beauty and greatness of our dear country.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to believe the Prime Minister when he claims that he has the beauty and greatness of our dear country at heart, but I readily maintain that the result of his four years of administration has proved that he and the members of his government do not have the required administrative qualifications to achieve that purpose.

They took over a prosperous Canada and are leading it to bankruptcy. If the government has its reasons to demand the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada, if it passes a special act to remove him, the Canadian people are justified in withdrawing their confidence from the present government and they are logical in doing so. They will be justified in replacing this government by another at the next rendering of accounts when we go to the country.

Yes, members on the government side should indeed be hesitant to participate in the present debate.

In order to distract the public's attention from the sad state of the nation's affairs, the Conservative government has been making, through its Minister of Finance, a lot of fuss about the Coyne incident, and this just before the budget presentation.

If that incident were not so tragic, it could be called: A comedy in three acts by Donald Fleming. Producer: Donald Fleming; Star actor: Donald Fleming; Publicity: Donald Fleming.

In the first act enters the Minister of Finance cast in the part of an offended virgin; he goes into a tirade—the governor of the Bank of Canada had a $25,000 a year pension voted for himself, without my knowledge. What a shame. He must resign, he has to go at once.

But the strange and bewildering thing is that this pension was voted 16 months ago by the board of directors appointed by the Minister of Finance himself, and in the presence of the assistant deputy minister of finance. Surely all these people must keep quite a lot of secrets from the Minister of Finance, since, during a period of 16 months, he was kept unaware of what had been going on in an organization of which he is the boss on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers.

Then the curtain rises on act two. The scene has changed. Enters the same actor in a new part and with new lines.

The governor's pension hovers in the background. Now, the governor must quit because he and the government do not agree on economic and monetary policies.

All this is quite hard to follow. The plot of the play is getting complicated. In 1954, the present Minister of Finance who then sat on the banking and commerce committee agreed with Mr. Graham Towers, who was then governor of the Bank of Canada, that in case of a serious difference between the governor and the government in matters of economic and monetary policy the governor was bound to resign.

Since he took over as Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Eglinton went through a certain evolution and has been contending for the last four years, especially when faced with criticism concerning credit limitations, that he could not do a thing because monetary policy was outside his realm and within the exclusive province of the Bank of Canada.

And yet in February 1961, he asserted in the house that there was no dispute between him and the governor of the Bank of Canada. So, according to the minister, they were on good terms then. In February 1961, there was the brotherly hug and the curtain fell on the second act.

Then the curtain rises again on the third and final act, to wind up the play.

It was the budget speech. The minister gave a good performance. His lines kept him going during two and three quarters hours, and the minister did not even stop for a drink. During those 165 minutes of speech, he barely spoke a few minutes in French for the gallery.

An hon. Member: That was more than previously.

Mr. Rouleau: That torrent of words did not give rise to a strong reaction. To hide the omissions, the deficiencies of his speech, the minister wound up in a high voice, he looked up, pointed an angry finger and ruthlessly condemned the governor of the Bank of Canada: "There is the man responsible for all our ills. It is because of him that we have deficits and unemployment, his policy is wrong, he must go, he must resign. If he does not resign, I shall throw him out." Exit the governor. The minister calmly resumes his seat and the curtain falls. The volunteer firemen gratefully enter to put out the fire.

The audience—in this case the Canadian taxpayer—remains puzzled and again it has to pay the cost.

Deficits will continue to accumulate; the debt will continue to rise; the servicing of the debt will continue to increase; consumer products will be more expensive; unemployment, unfortunately, will still exist, and next year, before the election, someone will be found to bear the blame for the government's deficiencies.

For the characteristic of this government is to find someone on whom to cast the blame. There must be a scapegoat to explain the bad administration of the nation's business, resulting from inexperience, incompetence, lack of any sense of responsibility, indecision and complacency.

We could forgive all that to the present regime when it took over four years ago. The government was then progressing timidly, like a child taking its first steps. But today, the government, without ever having reached adulthood, is proceeding with the clumsy gait of a centenarian. The government is already suffering from senility.

Four years ago, our friends opposite made their first faltering steps, tripping on the minutest speck of dust, accusing their Liberal predecessors of being the cause of their failure or throwing themselves into the latter's bosom saying: "Tell us what to do, save us please."

Today in the throes of death, they are looking for scapegoats and behaving like old people who, having made a mess of their own lives, are in despair and blame both God and men for their failure. But they are the only ones to blame.

Still, they received a nice inheritance. The finances of the country were in order, prosperity was the attribute of Canada which caused the nations of the world to wonder in awe.

If, during those four years, the opposition have been critical—as it had good cause to be—they have also expressed their views and put forward concrete suggestions. Those suggestions fell upon deaf ears.

And now the governor of the Bank of Canada is being blamed for the whole thing. Long before today we have had occasion to say how much we disagreed with his policy. The minister used to reply that he was in agreement with the governor. We had no call to demand his resignation. We feel that when a public servant, whoever he might be, is called upon to advise the government, he has a strict duty to carry out its orders, or else he ought to tender his resignation. If he fails to do this, the government must immediately take action.

According to the minister in February 1961, only four months ago, there was no disagreement between him and the governor. Suddenly, just before the budget is brought in, the conflict breaks out.

Under those circumstances the opposition and the people of Canada have a right to ask that light be shed on the matter, that the governor and the minister be summoned before the banking and commerce committee to explain their positions so that facts may be assessed on their merits.

To our fair request the minister's answer is no. He will have only himself to blame if we harbour doubts and if the people of Canada are not satisfied.

Because of the conflict between the two men, the budget was introduced without the assistance of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He was not consulted nor even advised. This is a further source of concern to Canadian taxpayers, businessmen, industrial leaders, financial institutions and nations that do business with Canada. In the last few years, the Conservative government should have been fighting unemployment. Instead of this they have been fighting inflation through credit restrictions. Today we are faced with the results of that mistake.

The last budget is leading the ship of the nation into uncharted seas.

The experience of the last four years prevents us from trusting the pilot, in this case the Minister of Finance.

Our only hope now is to change the pilot before the ship goes down.

Directors who commit error upon error and accumulate deficits would not be kept long at the head of any corporation. The same thing applies to the government. This country's shareholders do not want to face bankruptcy; they look forward to the day when they can change their board of directors, before it is too late.

Mr. Paul: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Rouleau: Certainly.

Mr. Paul: The hon. member blamed the Minister of Finance for having spoken very little French during his budget speech.

Would the hon. member name a minister of finance in any Liberal administration who spoke French when introducing his budget in the house and, if so, would he give us the reference?

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Abbott did give part of his speech in French when introducing a budget.

Mr. Paul: In what year?

Mr. Rouleau: I cannot give the hon. member the exact reference, but I know that he will be able to look it up himself.

(Text):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the budget is always a subject of major interest in any session. This year a desperate government, well aware of the political erosion it has suffered in the last two sessions as a result of its haughty contempt for parliament and its unbridled lust for power, has staked all its chances on the budget. It is the kind of budget that might be expected under those circumstances.

It is a budget full of pretence. It claims to be anti-inflationary. It is nothing of the kind. It is a delusive budget. It seeks to make people think they will be taxed less when the fact is that they will be required to pay more in taxes. It seeks to make people think that the government is holding the line against inflation when it is not.

It is a cynical budget. It contradicts what the government has been saying and doing. It is an opiate budget. The government openly boasts that the public has a short memory and can be made to forget the past as well as the present welter of the government's own contradictions.

It is a transparent budget. Its pose cannot hide its timing and purpose. It is an illusory budget. It proposes changes, large in number but small in individual extent in every case, and seeks to create the impression of importance by their mere multiplicity. The banquet table is long. It is well dressed. The best silver and china are used. The lackeys are well trained, but the fare is thin. The guests have left unsatisfied.

Mr. Churchill: What is the quotation from?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, those are not my words. They are the words of the Minister of Finance when in the opposition he spoke in this house during the consideration of the budget on March 21, 1957. They were words which he addressed to the house four years ago concerning the last balanced budget which this country has seen.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to turn to another matter and address myself particularly to the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), because he did take part in the budget discussion.

In fact, he spent minutes congratulating the Minister of Finance for his masterful speech.

It is usual for an hon. member to congratulate the Minister of Finance, but when a member of the same cabinet commends his colleague, it is something rather strange, because in fact, he congratulates himself.

Does that not show a lack of solidarity as between members of the same cabinet? We had occasion in the past to witness a deep seated difference of opinion between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) and some of his colleagues. I refer to the case of the C.B.C. producers' strike in Montreal. The Minister of Transport said the strike was legal, while the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) called it illegal. Placed between the two was the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), who did not dare to say whether it was legal or not.

The Secretary of State spoke of last year's budget. It matters little, he said, if the December forecasts met with adverse winds.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, last year's budget met with highly adverse winds.

In analysing this budget, there are four different aspects to consider.

First, let us look at the forecasting errors of the Minister of Finance. Last year, he predicted that we would have a surplus of $12 million. What happened? He first said there would be a deficit of $285 million, and it finally reached $345 million.

Surely, that is a very serious error, which had never been committed before by a Minister of Finance in bringing down his budget.

Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that in the circumstances the estimated deficit of $650 million for the current year will prove more accurate?

Last year the Minister of Finance told us that unemployment would disappear with the melting of the snow. Yet we have now a greater number of unemployed than we ever had in the past 20 years.

The Conservatives claim that this is something they inherited from the Liberals.

The truth is, they cannot stand on their own feet, they cannot accept their own responsibilities.

They always have to find an excuse, the Coyne case for instance.

The Minister of Labour stated in early March, 1960 that the 1958 recession was over.

That statement was true. How, then, can the Conservatives claim that the Liberals are responsible for the new recession which began only in 1960?

Last year we were told that the recession was over, that there would be prosperity throughout the country. Unemployment is on the rise. It has now reached 7 per cent of the labour force in Canada. Who should be blamed for that situation?

In 1957, the Liberals left the Conservatives a legacy worth recalling.

The Liberals left an unemployment insurance fund of $900 million. That fund has dropped to less than $100 million and yet the government does not make the slightest move to improve the situation.

The minister stated that the national product was going to increase by 6 per cent, but the increase was only 3 per cent.

Are we, in the circumstances, to put faith in the minister's budget forecast, when he says that the deficit will reach between $600 and $700 million?

Is it not more likely that the deficit will reach the billion dollar mark?

Another point: the omissions in the budget. The minister did not provide anything for farmers.

What cure did the Minister of Finance propose to the Canadian farmers? Not long ago, he made a speech in which he told farmers to work and to save money.

How could Canadian farmers, especially those from the province of Quebec, work and save money when they barely earned enough to make a decent living?

An attempt by the government artificially to lower the external price of the Canadian dollar would involve borrowing or raising by taxes very large sums of money with which to buy up foreign exchange.

The dominion bureau of statistics has supplied figures to show it. In 1959, farmers net income was down 11 per cent; during the session, the Minister of Agriculture forecast that farm income in 1960 would be still lower than in 1959.

What is happening today, in 1961? At a time when farm income is steadily decreasing, the Conservative government advises the farmers that they must save and work; it provides nothing at all for them in the budget.

There is nothing either in the budget for underdeveloped areas. The budget provides nothing for our trade policy except for the maintenance of protectionism.

With one hand, the Minister of Finance promotes freer trade and with the other hand he leans towards protectionism.

Third, he said that interest rates would go down. If he actually has to borrow $1 billion, how will he manage to reduce interest rates? Moreover, he will have to get funds for the C.N.R., for all the crown corporations and for a number of non-budgetary items which I cannot enumerate because I have not enough time at my disposal.

That is, therefore, contradictory. If, on the one hand, interest rates are to go down, while the interest on the debt keeps on increasing, on the other, how will he succeed in borrowing those huge sums of money and reduce interest rates at the same time? Unless, of course, the person who is appointed as governor of the Bank of Canada increases the money supply, becomes the government's handyman and does exactly what the government tells him to do. If, by any chance, that happened, we would have inflation. Prices would go up, the cost of living would go up and, consequently, pensions would lose a great deal of their value.

Fourth, I should like to speak of the exchange rate. The devaluation of the Canadian dollar has been mentioned. The minister advocated a significant reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar. But when asked, in the house as well as during a press conference, what would be that significant devaluation, he refused to answer. However, his present stand is in direct contradiction with the one he adopted last year. Here is what he said about devaluating our dollar in his budget speech of March 31, 1960:

In other words, we would have embarked upon a gigantic financial speculation without any chance of success. Yet, this year he is embarking himself upon that gigantic speculative action he condemned last year.

Mr. Speaker, this gigantic speculation is the only action spelled out in the present budget. As the minister said, to significantly reduce the value of the Canadian dollar, we must buy American dollars. For how much? We do not know. How? We do not know either. Apart from the billion already referred to I do not think this is the right way to go about it. It is better to let the Canadian dollar finds its own level than to resort to artificial means of devaluating it.

The directors of the international monetary fund have already reminded the Canadian government of engagements entered into with that institution and, more particularly, of its pledge to maintain our currency at par. This will therefore entail heavy buying of American dollars. To reduce the value of the dollar is, consequently, to increase the cost of living, the cost of everything we import into this country. And everyone knows that we import much more than we export. This means, therefore, an increase in the cost of living. Recently, a probable one cent increase in the price of bread has been forecast.

The minister also favours an expansionist budget. It is obvious that this expansion will directly lead us toward inflation. The capital of the industrial development bank is to be increased from $160 to $400 million. But while the government propose to increase the capital of that bank, what steps are they proposing with respect of the economically underdeveloped areas? Not only is there not a single word in this budget about the underdeveloped areas of Canada, but no assistance is provided for them. No municipal fund where the municipalities could borrow. The municipalities will find it difficult to borrow in Canada. For a few years they have been borrowing in the United States at rates lower than in Canada; today, due to the devaluation of our dollar and the premium on the American dollar, they will not be able to borrow in the U.S. any more.

The real cause of the present economic stagnation is the fiscal and monetary policies of the government. They have increased long term expenditures instead of reducing taxes. They dealt with the recession as if it were a depression. Long term expenditures have brought about budgetary deficits; we have now reached the fifth budget and the accumulated deficit reaches $2 billion. The government had to sell bonds to make up the deficit. The Bank of Canada had to increase the money supply by $1,700 million, or 16 per cent. The result was inflation, and the bank had to check the inflation.

The government had to borrow to make up its deficit, and in doing so, found itself in competition with private enterprise, corporations, companies, municipalities and provinces all across Canada. What did this mean? It had to raise interest rates, to the serious detriment of the small borrower, to the man in the street.

Interest on the debt went up by $300 million. The public bodies borrowed in the United States, as I said a moment ago.

The tightening of credit had disastrous effects on small borrowers, on trades people and merchants.

As for secondary industry, it suffered more than anyone else. All we have to do is to compare the present situation with conditions prevailing from 1945 to 1957 to know where things stand. Indeed, the London Economist, in an editorial dealing with the way in which Canada managed its business and budgeting, said this:

No country in the world has managed its economy as efficiently as Canada has done.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State spoke about textiles. He upbraided the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) for what the latter had said with regard to that industry. Yet, no member in this house is as keen and shows greater interest in this matter which affects the people in his riding, as the hon. member. On several occasions, he rose in this house to defend their interests. He is interested in textile workers and has shown it on many occasions.

With regard to the textile industry in Canada I shall say that, in the last four years, several plants had to close down. I have a list here and can name them. To quote a single instance, in Hamilton, the very riding of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough), that industry was employing 1,000 workers. There are also textile plants at Grand'Mere, at Cornwall, three of which at least closed down—but never mind.

In the last four years, as was said in committee of the other place, the number of textile workers has decreased by 25,000. However, the crux of the matter is that the present government, whose members are facing me, had promised to settle that problem. The Prime Minister himself, when he travelled through all ridings with textile mills, stated that, as soon as he took over he would protect that industry, thanks to his good management and adequate methods.

I lack the time to read those statements into the record, but as everybody knows, the Prime Minister of Canada declared that, once in power he would protect the textile industry as well as he had protected agriculture.

In 1958, he submitted to the house a bill known as the anti-dumping legislation in order to help the textile industry. Here is what a parliamentary correspondent, Mr. Richard Gwyn, had to say on June 1, 1959, under the heading:

(Text):

Government has means to curb textile imports

The government now has in its hands an instrument which could save the textile industry without any further action. This is Bill C-51, known as the "anti-dumping legislation."

C-51 gives revenue minister George Nowlan power to slap high tariffs on any goods dumped on the Canadian market at prices lower than production costs plus a fair profit mark-up.

More important he has the power to place prohibitive tariffs on goods coming in from countries where production costs are far below those of Canada.—

Only trouble is the government hasn't used C-51, though it has been on the statute books a year.

(Translation):

That legislation was passed by parliament almost three years ago. Why is it not used?

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Did the hon. gentleman vote against it or for it?

Mr. Chevrier: The point is that the Minister of Finance said at the time that this was going to be of tremendous assistance to the textile industry, but why has the government not used it? I doubt very much if it has used it on more than half a dozen occasions.

(Translation):

The Secretary of State referred to what the Bennett government had done with regard to textile mills. Let me say to him that from 1930 to 1935, when the Bennett government was in office, textile workers suffered as they suffer today, and notwithstanding the assertions of the minister, it does not seem that the problem can be settled through increased tariff protection. And to prove my point, I shall quote from a statement made by the president of the primary textile institute, Mr. Berry, before a Senate committee:

(Text):

Our position on the tariff could be put quite briefly, and it is this: We have just barely completed a three-years' review by the tariff board of tariffs on textiles, and whatever we might think of the results, we must conclude that the revisions that have been made have been made within the framework of the present Canadian policy. We only have two comments to make on that policy, and one is that a policy which allows penetration into a market to the extent which has become apparent in our business is not likely to be a good policy for Canada for an indefinite period. Our views on that are somewhat supported, we think, by an observation that the tariff board itself made, in their first report in the textile series, having this to say: "There may be recommended for the industry a measure of assistance that will permit it to continue to fight for its existence at least until such time as there may be initiated by the proper authority a carefully considered decision on high policy regarding the future of the industry." This indicates to us that the board was probably then in need of policy direction, and in so far as we are aware none followed.

That was the statement.

(Translation):

Mr. Berry made that statement in reply to a question. When someone asked whether he anticipated any tariff assistance, he said no, just as he had said in the Senate committee, as reported on page 1014 of the record of proceedings.

(Text):

I see that my time is fast coming to a close. I did not want to complete my remarks without saying a word about the statements made yesterday by the hon. member for Stormont. Unfortunately, he is not in his seat. I told him I had a few nice things to say about him.

Mr. Cathers: Why?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I have never said any unkind things about the hon. member for Stormont, and if the hon. member follows me closely he will see that I will do the same thing again today, unlike the manner in which his colleague proceeded.

The hon. member for Stormont seems to be very jealous of his prerogatives as a member of parliament, and that no one should interfere in his constituency. Well, Mr. Speaker, do you think even if you are invited by the constituents of the hon. member you should not interfere? I have been invited on numerous occasions. I should like to say to this house that I receive perhaps as much mail from the constituency of Stormont as does the hon. member himself. I cannot explain why the hon. member's constituents come to me for advice. They do, they have and they will continue to do so. It is easy for me to understand why the hon. member is annoyed. He is annoyed not so much at me—

An hon. Member: Just bragging again.

Mr. Chevrier: He is annoyed at himself because his constituents will not come to him. The proof of this lies in the fact that on matters concerning the St. Lawrence seaway, particularly those having to do with pilotage, they came to me. Is it not strange that they came to the member for Laurier and not to the member for Stormont? A debate took place on that legislation for almost two days. The member for Stormont was not even in his seat. The bill was referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. We had a discussion that lasted two days. Again the member for Stormont was not in his seat except in the dying hours, and then only at the request of the hon. member for Port Arthur who said, "Where is the member for Stormont?" He came in and this is what he said:

I am vitally concerned with anything having to do with the seaway but I am not directly concerned with the pilots as there are none of them residents in my area.

Mr. Chevrier: There are several sitting right behind you now.

The hon. member did not even know there were pilots in his riding. There have been pilots in the constituency of Stormont since time immemorial; since I was a child I remember seeing pilots walking up and down the streets. Furthermore, the Minister of Transport was asked whether there were any pilots in Cornwall and he said "Yes, sure, there is a pool of pilots that has been established there; there are 21 or 24."

Here is this man who makes a vicious attack on me, and I understand why. Again I say it is not because of me. He is annoyed at himself, and he is doing his constituents a great disservice first when he says there are no pilots in his riding. I am sure they would like that. Second, he is also doing his constituents a great disservice when he says that the constituency of Stormont, particularly Cornwall, is a depressed area. Imagine a member of parliament rising in the house and so maligning his constituency by saying that it is a depressed area.

Mr. Pallett: What about the member for Niagara Falls?

Mr. Chevrier: What do you think industry is going to do in that respect? Then again he complained bitterly about the locks being on the United States side, and the place being stranded, and so forth. He seems to forget entirely that there is a 27-foot waterway right in front of Cornwall on the Canadian side from St. Regis island right up to the dike. It is so patent that the Minister of Public Works would not be spending $400,000 and perhaps more to put a wharf there if there was not a deep-sea channel in order to bring deep-sea vessels. Therefore when he suggests there are no 27-foot facilities again he is maligning his constituency and doing his constituents great harm. He is not only doing them great harm but he is causing a great deal of embarrassment to those who have supported him since he was elected.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: At the end of my remarks. He says the seaway building which has been erected there is not appreciated. Well, the seaway building employs almost 150 people. I see he has been not only firing some of those who were there before but he is employing, I am sure, friends of his in this building. There is no doubt that this building which he depreciates on the one hand is one in which he is most anxious to put workers on the other.

Again, he does not like the idea of a power block having been set aside for United States industrial development and no power block for the province of Ontario. He says that is the fault of the then member for Stormont and the former minister of transport, who should have seen to that. Well, we all know who is in charge of the government of the province of Ontario. Premier Frost is the head of that government. I am told he is a very close friend of the member for Stormont. They are great buddies; they see each other quite frequently. I hope the member for Stormont will make the required representations so that Cornwall and the whole St. Lawrence valley in that area will get a block of power for industrial development in the same manner and to the same extent as did the New York side of the line.

I say the member for Stormont has ignored the pilots who live in his riding. He calls his constituency a depressed area. He emphatically states no 27-foot facilities are established there. In saying these things he is doing great harm to the constituency. He says that the canal ends in a high wall 80 feet in length. But a turning basin has been made available there in the same way as there is a turning basin in the Lachine canal so that ships can move in and out. I say that no one is doing more harm to his constituency than is the hon. member by his statements.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is it not true that most of the mail from the riding of Stormont—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time of the hon. member having expired, questions may be put to him only with the consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask the hon. member for Laurier if it were not true that most of the mail directed to him from the riding of Stormont was to tell him to stay away because of what had been done to the city of Cornwall under his administration.

Mr. Chevrier: The senior hon. member for Halifax must be living pretty close to the member for Stormont. No, that is not the kind of mail I receive; otherwise the pilots would not have come. It is not the kind of mail I receive; otherwise I would not be invited into the constituency, and I could be there quite often. No, that is not the kind of mail I receive. On the contrary, I receive every week from the constituency of Stormont demands for assistance and advice. I can only conclude one thing, namely that if the member for Stormont were looking after his constituency in the way he should, I would not be receiving that mail.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), in a desperate effort, tried to have the house believe that the new budget did not have the support of the Canadian people.

You need only read the comments in the press, the statements made by businessmen in various segments of the economy, to realize that the Canadian people support this budget.

In fact, according to the Canadian Press, the primary textile institute has stated, following the tariff changes announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget speech, that some aspects of those changes are encouraging for the primary textile industry in Canada. The institute stressed the fact that the government's decision not to lower tariffs on textile products was particularly welcome in view of the competition from Asian countries.

Ever since he has been in this house, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) has been the champion of the textile industry in Canada and I wish to commend him for that.

Mr. Denis: Without success.

Mr. Pigeon: In fact, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) even commended last year the hon. member for Sherbrooke for his courage and efforts in favour of the textile industry.

When this government took over, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals had completely sabotaged the textile industry. Everything had to be built up again. I have here a brief of the primary textile institute which praises the Minister of Finance because, in his budget, he began to put the tiller right so that the textile industry may live again the life of yesteryears.

Besides, the Canadian exporters, according to Mr. John McDerby, general manager of the Canadian exporters association, find the Fleming budget satisfactory, generally speaking.

The Canadian automobile association, which has a membership of 600,000, commended the government for having granted its request for the abolition of the 7½ per cent excise tax on passenger cars.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) did not mention that. He said that the Fleming budget did not meet the needs of Canadians.

However, I have here the many statements made by businessmen in this country.

In the cigarette manufacturing industry, for instance, Mr. J. H. Devlin, chairman of the Rothman company, said he was satisfied with the change announced in the excise tax on cigarettes. He said that the decrease in excise tax would result in longer cigarettes and an increase of tobacco purchases by the Canadian industry. Mr. Devlin added that tobacco purchases will increase by nearly 10 million pounds compared to last year.

Speaking for the farmers and the tobacco growers of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm riding, I should like to congratulate the minister for having taken this step which will prompt the tobacco growers to increase their production and thus to obtain higher returns.

Mr. John Magee, secretary of the Canadian trucking association, spoke very highly of the decision taken by the government in its new budget to increase the capital of the industrial development bank so that it will now be able to lend up to $400 million. Before, the credit margin was only of $160 million. Moreover, the new budget gives the bank the right to loan money to all groups of industries.

Mr. Speaker, I have only given the testimony of a few Canadian industrialists. The newspapers are filled with them, as one can see in reading the financial pages.

Only the Liberals are disappointed. They are not satisfied, because they realize that their popularity is now going down in the country. They know that they are disappearing from the electoral map and that they will probably disappear for good unless they amalgamate with the New party to have at least a few representatives in a corner of the house.

I have here a copy of Le Devoir of Tuesday, June 27, 1961, where I find this:

Liberal party and N.P. amalgamation recommended by Liberals.

Milford Bay—To the dismay of the majority of the delegates who were at a dance party, a group of young Liberals of the Ontario association of young Liberals adopted a resolution recommending the amalgamation of the Liberal party with the New party in order to defeat the Progressive Conservatives.

The Liberals themselves admit they are defeated. They know that the voters have no more confidence in them, but, in order to stay in the opposition after the next election, they want to amalgamate with the New party, for they know that they will disappear from the electoral map, because they have lost contact with the people. Besides, they have always been remote from the people, they have never cared for the people.

Here is what I read, Mr. Speaker:

Wheat producers favoured by the budget.

The farmers form an important class. The Liberals speak of unemployment, but they forget the statement of their leader (Mr. Pearson). Time magazine of February 17, 1958 reported the following on page 14:

It would be stupid and unfair to blame the Conservatives for the present unemployment.

Therefore, the present Liberal leader criticizes the hon. member for Laurier, as well as all Liberal members in this house who claim that the Canadian government is responsible for unemployment. They are condemned by a statement of their own leader.

Then again, La Presse of September 23, 1960, reports a similar statement by Mr. Pearson:

Unemployment, he added, is the concern of all levels of government; it cannot be considered the sole responsibility of the federal government.

That is a further condemnation of the hon. member for Laurier and of the Liberals who sit in this house. That is why the young Ontario Liberals are right when they say their party should merge with the New party; they know that the political ground is getting slippery under their feet.

There is talk about unemployment. But here is what Mr. Georges Villeneuve, a former Liberal member of parliament for Roberval, had to say when the Liberals were in power, as reported on page 614 of Hansard for January 27, 1955:

Mr. Speaker, I find that in my constituency unemployment does not cause as much concern now as it did last year.

Not as much concern as last year. That means that in 1954, under a Liberal administration, unemployment was causing concern.

He added:

However we have seasonal unemployment and it is a problem which requires our attention as well as all our ingenuity if we want to solve it.

That is a further condemnation by a Liberal member, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and their colleagues in the cabinet for the efforts they are making to stimulate our economy.

Once more I encourage labour unions and industry to launch a campaign in order to have Canadians buy Canadian products.

Are we aware, for example, that each Canadian buys an average of foreign products amounting to $262 a year, when the corresponding average is only $48 in England and $28 in the United States?

I ask my fellow citizens to buy Canadian.

Canadian manufacturers of capital goods will now be in a better position to compete on foreign markets. To finance their sales abroad they will have the support of a company put up jointly by the larger banks of Canada and the federal government with a view to extending credit facilities to our exporters. It will be easier this way to find buyers for our products.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) is to be commended for such enterprising spirit.

Mr. T. R. McLagan, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said in Montreal as reported in La Presse of October 28, 1960:

A strong policy promoting the sale of Canadian products remains one of the most realistic measures against unemployment.

He also added:

The lowering of production costs also seems to be a vital question, when we consider it in the light of exports. Canada is having difficulties getting into foreign markets, because her products are expensive and face very stiff competition. To answer that problem, we would have to sell cheaper, and we can do this only by materially reducing the production costs of our exported raw materials and finished products.

Of course, the cost of production is not the only barrier to the balance of our economy, but it does seem to be the main one, the most difficult one to overcome, because to do so, we must count on the co-operation of most of the people and of the leading labour and employer groups.

Mr. Speaker, there is much talk about unemployment. I have here a copy of the newspaper La Réforme, for November 19, 1960, which says:

Unemployment—a family problem and a provincial responsibility.

It is clearly stated in La Réforme that unemployment is a provincial and family responsibility.

Let the provincial government, which controls various sectors of the Quebec economy, highways, public works, construction of schools and hospitals, take its responsibilities.

Let it fulfil its promises, let it solve the unemployment problem.

Unemployment—a family problem and a provincial responsibility.

Let the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier reread the statement made by his leader, the Hon. René Hamel, minister of labour, on November 23, 1960:

The proportion of unemployed is going down in Quebec.

I also advise him to read an extract from the open letter published in La Presse of August 20, 1959, signed by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard), which read as follows:

The fight against unemployment is the concern of the government as well as of the governed, of management as well as of labour, of the public man as well as of the businessman, of industry as well as of banks. In a word, everyone must constructively co-operate in abolishing that social ill, while avoiding demagogy.

By the way, the hon. member for Laurier should carefully listen to this:

What must be avoided is any attempt to promote a political cause or ideal at the expense of those who are victims of a scourge like unemployment. There are too many demagogic politicians whose main ambition is to sell their product or to promote their own advancement by taking advantage of the least social disorder which, in their eyes, becomes only an accident, or a further opportunity in their prearranged pursuit of political aims.

These are formal statements; they are meant for the hon. members for Laurier, for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau), for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), and for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), and for all others of their ilk.

There are too many demagogic politicians whose main ambition is to sell their product or promote their own advancement.

The hon. member for Lapointe protests against the political ambitions of some of his colleagues.

Nevertheless, the hon. member for Laurier has no confidence in the future of this country, under a Conservative government.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pigeon: It is under the Conservative administration, Mr. Speaker—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform hon. members that it is contrary to the rules to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, either by voice or otherwise.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Laurier has no confidence in Canada's future.

Yet, it was under a Conservative administration that the hon. member for Laurier became a director of the Provincial Bank of Canada. We find this appointment in La Presse of September 15, 1960, where there is a list of the bank's new directors.

In Le Devoir of September 22, 1959, we find the following:

The Hon. Mr. Chevrier has been appointed to the board of directors of the North American Fund of Canada Ltd., a mutual investment fund in operation both in Canada and the United States.

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with the budget?

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Laurier is opposed to the construction of a Bomarc base at La Macaza. It is dangerous, he says. Should a war break out, this base would be the first objective of the Russians and it could cause destruction for 100 miles round.

He was trying, in his remarks, to frighten the Canadian people, trying to blackmail them.

As a matter of fact, in criticizing the construction of that Bomarc base, the hon. member for Laurier was playing the game of the communists in this country. On September 10, 1960, the communists organized a march against setting up that Bomarc base at La Macaza.

In short, every means is welcome to reach one's own ends.

Mr. Chevrier: How do you connect this with the communists?

Mr. Pigeon: You play the communists' game, who denounced the Bomarc base. You therefore acted in their interest.

But the hon. member for Laurier does not stop to consider that this project creates many hundreds of jobs for the workers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: How many workers exactly?

Mr. Pigeon: I shall answer the hon. member for Laurier in the words of Mr. Jack Wallace, assistant director of the federal emergency measures organization who stated this in La Presse of November 9, 1960:

I disapprove of the defeatism of those who think Canada would be destroyed and its whole population liquidated by the explosion of nuclear bombs.

The hon. member for Laurier, in opposing the Bomarc base, tried to deprive Quebec workers of hundreds of jobs. Curiously enough, however, he was at the same time confident in the future of Canada, in its development and prosperity, because he accepted a directorship in the Provincial Bank of Canada in addition to the directorship he has held since last year in the North American Fund of Canada Ltd.

The Liberals are pessimistic, and the young Liberals are defeatists. They want to merge with the New party because they know they are doomed.

Their leader is not as brilliant as they and the hon. member for Laurier thought at one time.

The mayor of Portage la Prairie, Mr. Henderson, a candidate to the leadership of the Liberal party, made this statement in Winnipeg on January 7, 1956:

The Hon. Lester B. Pearson will be the choice of the convention, but he will not conquer the voters. He does not know the ordinary voter.

Mr. Speaker, I see here a sad thing and in concluding my remarks I wish to quote the following words of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent in the newspaper Le Devoir of September 4, 1958:

I miss active politics.

Mr. Speaker, do you know of any one member from the province of Quebec, including the new citizen of the province of Quebec, the ex-member for Stormont and present member for Laurier who took Mr. St. Laurent's defence when he was vulgarly excluded? No, they were all mute as a fish.

Mr. St. Laurent misses political activity. I think the young Liberals of this country are right when they think of joining the New party so that some of them at least might sit in the opposition.

(Text):

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is always refreshing to listen to the Union Nationale member from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I can appreciate how frantic he, the Associate Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State and others must be when they think in terms of what may happen to them in the next election when they will not have—

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Skeena said that I have been a member of the Quebec legislature—

Mr. Habel: That is not what he said.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I was unable in the hubbub to get the earphone to my ear in sufficient time to hear what the hon. member said. However, I can still appreciate that he and the cabinet ministers whom I mentioned must be looking with a great deal of apprehension to the next election, because they will no longer have the forces of the corrupt Union Nationale political machine to help them. I will say further that I am not too fussy about accepting the Liberal party and its adherents as such, as I see them in this house, into the New party; they are certainly Liberally minded people. But when it comes to accepting Union Nationale members, I say "never".

This is a somewhat strange budget debate, Mr. Speaker. We see how much reluctance there is on the part of Conservative members to associate themselves with the budget. They want to concern themselves more with engaging in smear tactics against a particular individual who has been in the news lately, and about whom I intend to say no more at this stage.

There was some thought that parliament might recess at the end of this week. It appears, though, that the suggestions or requests—perhaps one should call them demands —made by the Prime Minister earlier this week have pretty well eliminated that possibility. I am sure all hon. members at least from one point of view will not be too upset about that for it will afford them the opportunity to accept the warm and gracious invitation issued by Mr. Arthur Blakely of press gallery fame to attend a gathering this week end.

I was reading some debates of the house in earlier times—1954 was one—when some mention was made of reform of the other place. In that particular debate, in which the present Prime Minister took an active part together with Mr. Drew, the then leader of the Conservative party, reference was made to a period at least back to 1926-27 when Mr. Mackenzie King had made some efforts toward reformation of the other place, and how it was not too long ago that the present Prime Minister was campaigning on the basis of Senate reform.

I would say that this need for reform is no less urgent now than it was when the Prime Minister made those promises before 1957. In fact I think it is even more urgent in view of recent developments which have been taking place in the Senate. Perhaps I may indicate a case in point. I think the disdain and contempt with which Senator Roebuck treats other hon. members of the Senate divorce committee would indicate that some reformation is necessary. If that honourable senator seeks to develop his pet hobby to the point where he establishes himself in effect as a judge of divorce in the other place, that would indicate that we need even more movement in the direction of some reformation there, but not the type of reformation that the Prime Minister has engaged in, which was that followed by his predecessor, of merely filling the Senate with people partial to his own points of view. However, Mr. Speaker, I intend to go no further into that matter. I saw that you were becoming a little active in your seat, and I took that as an indication that perhaps I had gone just about far enough along that line.

I should like to make reference, in so far as this budget is concerned, to a previous budget introduced by the Minister of Finance in 1959, and read just two short sentences from that budget speech as contained on page 2408 of Hansard of April 9 of that year. When dealing with one phase of economic matters in this country the Minister of Finance had this to say:

> Advancing technology might have been expected to reduce the cost and selling price of many products to consumers. It is evident, however, that developments in corporation pricing policies, in labour organization and even in our political democracy are producing increased rigidities which inhibit the free play of competitive forces and thereby promote inflation and price increases.

Two years ago the Minister of Finance, if we are to believe what he said in those statements—and there is some doubt that we should believe everything the minister says—had knowledge of the fact that, as he put it, there are increasing rigidities in the pricing policies of corporations which tend to depress what he called "the free play of competitive forces and thereby promote inflation and price increases".

I think it is commendable that the minister should have understood the force which is brought into play upon our economy by corporate price fixers and by what is perhaps loosely referred to as a system of administered prices, or in other words activities which are criminal in their operation and contrary to the statutes of this nation. Even more surprising, though, than the budget we have before us is the fact that the Minister of Finance two years ago recognized these factors and did nothing about them or was denied the opportunity to do anything about them by other members of the cabinet who would like to see other situations develop. However, I believe the Minister of Finance is a strong enough individual to get his point of view across on a number of occasions, and I am inclined to think that even though he recognized this two years ago, he really did not believe that his government wanted to do anything about it because it was contrary to the philosophy and intent of the Conservative party.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether at this stage I might call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howard: I do not know whether it is a portent of things to come but I notice there is an equal number of Liberals and C.C.F. members in the house at the same time, or there was a moment ago.

There is a large contingent of members in the house who are advocates of what is known as the free enterprise system. I think it is unfortunate that the prescience of the Minister of Finance in 1959 in calling attention to the effects upon the economy of rigidity in price structures and price fixing was not carried forward in this particular budget, because the danger has not diminished during the passage of the last two years. In fact, it has increased as I shall show in a moment. There is a tendency on the part of the advocates of the so-called free enterprise system to equate free enterprise with lower prices, a better quality of goods and materials, more durable goods and the like. However, I think a much better case could be made for saying that the predominant relationship is of an altogether different kind. In other words, we can equate it with price fixing, with restrictions on production, with the carving up of markets for certain products and the like. Let me give hon. members a brief account of the record here in Canada during the past 11 years since 1950. This information was tabled in the house last year but I am afraid I do not have the reference to the specific sessional paper. It showed that the following industries and corporations in those industries have been found guilty of conspiracies and illegal actions under the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. I find they include the glass industry, bread, baking, matches, rubberwear, tires, rubber footwear and all kinds of rubber goods; papers, both fine and coarse; electrical materials, wire and cable; farm fencing and other types of fencing; bedding, quilts, coal, roofing materials, pulpwood, culverts and transmission and conveyor belts. Companies in all these fields have been found guilty of illicit practices under the Combines Investigation Act and have been fined in the courts for engaging in price fixing.

It was not more than a couple of weeks ago in the United States, for instance, that attorney general Kennedy issued a statement to the effect that preliminary investigations there had indicated that in practically every major industrial field in the United States companies were engaged in the practice of fixing prices and increasing them by agreement without regard to the cost of production of those commodities. Here in Canada I think this government has proven by the failure of the Minister of Finance to give concrete expression to those two sentences he mentioned in the 1959 budget that it is not really concerned with the welfare of consumers in this country, not really concerned with protecting them against encroachments upon their rights by corporate monopolies and oligopolies. This view is, I suggest, borne out also by this government's action in ramming a particularly obnoxious bill through the house amending the Combines Investigation Act in such a way as to make it easier for corporations to engage in these illicit practices and easier for them to escape detection. The sanctions and authorizations given, in effect, by last year's amendments to the Combines Investigation Act will illustrate this contention more clearly as time goes on.

On the general question of the operations undertaken under the Combines Investigation Act I should like to say it is extremely unfortunate that an investigation into the production and distribution and sale of raw fish in British Columbia has been postponed and delayed by a series of legal manoeuvres and skirmishes in the courts to prevent the restrictive trade practices commission from hearing the charges made by the director of investigation and research and coming to a determination with regard to them. That situation has existed because parliament has agreed to continue to extend the moratorium in respect to the activities of the fishing industry. That industry on the west coast is faced with continuation of a restrictive agreement regarding the number of boats which may engage in the herring production and fishing industry. I mention the herring fishery because of the restriction that exists in regard to it. The longer this continues the more difficult in an economic sense this will be for the fishing industry on the west coast.

We too often tend to think that competition brings benefits to the citizens of this nation through so-called free enterprise. We think of this free enterprise competition in relation to a number of different fields and often feel that it applies to different industries in a like manner. I suggest we have a number of different types of competition some of which may be beneficial but others which may be detrimental.

There exists competition in the field of prices to consumers and, I submit in this regard, there is very little which takes place in relation to major industries. There is perhaps a good deal more among smaller businesses because there does not exist there the same control in respect to competition and quality of goods.

In terms of competition we can think of advertising in regard to the quality of the commodity which takes place in an attempt to make the products more attractive to the consumer. I submit that is all that is taking place in the way of competition. In Canada over the past number of years the original concept of competition which involved the price and quality of products has been misdirected and now relates almost exclusively to the field of advertising. I suggest that competition in the field of advertising does not in a general way result in benefits to consumers. We are all being inundated with advertisements appearing in newspapers, heard over the radio and seen on television, for example in regard to the various beneficial aspects of different types of toothpastes. I suggest that there is very little difference between the different brands except differences such as one being red, one being striped, one containing a special mint flavour and so on. Such toothpastes include a bit of glycerine, but in essence they are all the same. However, there is a great deal of competition regarding this particular product in the field of advertising which results not in any saving or increased quality to the consumer, but an increased cost. This same situation applies in respect to various other commodities. An individual may have a preference for a certain brand of cigarettes but, after all, cigarettes all contain tobacco and very likely have the same deleterious effect, if any.

An example of this type of so-called competition with lack of resultant benefits to the consumer was reflected by a report tabled in the house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton). I might say that the tabling of this particular document was in direct contravention of an order of this house, but that did not seem to bother the minister at that time. That report indicated that so-called competition in industry had the direct result of increasing prices rather than decreasing them. I suggest when we find 25 per cent of the activity of the average drug company taking place in the field of advertising, which involves the inundation of doctors and others with gimmicks of all types, we also find this competition increases costs.

As I said earlier, smaller companies do not have the same control in regard to quality or price of products the larger corporations do, nor have they the control over the primary products involved. As an example of this suggestion, one might consider the local service station, which is a relatively small operation with no control over the primary product, because that control remains with the oil companies. I suggest this same situation applies to all small industries and operators who are helpless against the large corporate structures. They are not being helped by this government at all in this regard.

In recent years there have been many comments heard in regard to a recession and a collapsing economy. In recent times this government has begun to think in terms in line with these comments and, after four years in office, it has decided to curtail this and that, in an attempt to correct the situation. I do not understand how this is going to help our economy, particularly in light of the extremely high degree of unemployment that has continually affected this country since this government took office. The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) suggested that this problem was a chronic one.

I suggest that in light of the unemployment picture and the economic position as it exists today we should consider how the corporate elements of this nation, which control our national resources, have fared during this period when so many people have attended bread lines and walked the streets day and night looking for work.

On page 32 of the Financial Post of May 13, 1961, there appeared an analysis of the economic conditions of a selected 313 companies, showing the changes which have taken place over the years, and particularly those changes which have taken place between 1959 and 1960; that period of time when the level of employment in this country was at its lowest. This is a statistical table of averages and accordingly individual companies may not fit into the picture presented here. However, we find the net value of the oil industry during this period of high unemployment, poverty and misery among the consumers increased by 3.8 per cent. We find the value of the metal industry increased by 6.8 per cent; the iron and steel industry by 2.8 per cent; the pulp and paper industry by 8.6 per cent; transportation by 1 per cent, merchandising by 8.2 per cent; the textile industry by 1.6 per cent—we heard a good deal about the difficulties of the textile industry today—the milling and grain industry by 4.1 per cent; construction by 3.4 per cent, and public utilities by 5.2 per cent. We also find that the food industry, representing a basic requirement of everyone in this country, increased in value by 15.5 per cent; the beverages industry by 6.1 per cent, miscellaneous by 4 per cent, and the lumbering industry by 4.1 per cent, with a total average increase in respect to 313 companies involving all our basic resources of 4.7 per cent.

All this took place at a time when, as I said, unemployment was rampant throughout the nation and when people were practically starving to death and getting rid of their furniture and other household goods and equipment which had been bought on a credit basis. In the face of this the Associate Minister of National Defence has the unmitigated gall to say that it is impolite to talk about unemployment; that it does not do a service to the country to talk about it. I can appreciate that he and his government, having the attachment that they have to certain vested interests in this nation, would not like to have unemployment discussed. They would like to see the working class continue to be subjected to this sort of illicit piracy which exists among corporations generally in this nation.

If the Minister of Finance two years ago had the foresight to say that the rigidities of the price system permitted inflation and higher prices and then did nothing about it, it is another indication why we have less and less reason to believe his statements and certainly not the forecasts and prognostications of the minister or of anybody else in the government of the day.

A number of phrases have been used and a number of words have been groped for to describe this particular budget. The Minister of Finance called it an economic budget, whatever that may mean. It is certainly a "deeper in debt" type of budget. One interesting development arising out of it I should like to mention is that a few years ago a bond conversion program was entered into by this government after a massive sales pitch by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, which had the direct effect of increasing interest rates. It was also supposed to regularize the debt picture of the country so that it would be easier to cope with it as the years went by. We are now in almost the same situation we were a couple of years ago out of which this bond conversion program was supposed to take us. In the 1961-62 fiscal year this government is going to have to find by borrowing one way or another $2,610 million. This amount is more than 40 per cent of the expenditures of this government for this particular year. This is an indication of what is happening with the government we have in office. Its sole concern is the paying off of election commitments made to those who financed the party to office. Coupled with the concern to continue in office is the intoxicated feeling that it received by virtue of the fact that it has power. That is its sole concern; in addition, stay in office regardless of the circumstances and how they affect anybody else, including the people of this country.

The first impression I had with respect to classifying the budget by name when I listened to the Minister of Finance that glorious evening last week when he took so long to say so little was a word connected with his baby budget of last fall. I think we can properly classify this budget as a miscarriage.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I have been trying to decide what all the sound and fury are about, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this budget. I have heard the opposition speakers and I have taken home their speeches to read at night, but I cannot find that any useful point has been raised in criticism of the budget of the Minister of Finance. If you will read it at home, Mr. Speaker, as I have read it—I know it was a long speech but it was a fascinating one; it cannot be digested all at one sitting—you will find that the answers are all there. It was a masterful exemplary presentation that we had the other night. For instance, everybody admits—the Leader of the Opposition and his party admitted it—that there should be an expansionist budget. The C.C.F. group admit that there should be an expansionist budget and there is. It is designed to increase the gross national product of Canada. This is the primary object of it and it comes at a time when it is very necessary to do that. It is designed to increase employment by hundreds of thousands and the minister has explained how this will come about. It is designed to lower interest rates, for which, of course, we need the co-operation of the Bank of Canada. Primarily, it is designed to lower the value of the Canadian dollar so that we can get our share of the export market.

Of necessity it is a deficit budget. Under these circumstances, when the government has these matters in mind, there is no other way of having a budget. The only other alternative is to increase taxes and to do so at this time would be to do harm to business by taking away capital which could be used in the plans of Canada for great expansion.

It is interesting to note that since this government came into power 80 per cent of all the tax-paying public, the people paying income tax, are paying less income tax than they did when we took over from the Liberals. May I also say that the Liberals advocated this. There is no criticism of us for having a deficit budget. There has been no criticism from the Leader of the Opposition. The other night in his press conference, when he was pressed by those able newspapermen who did not get anywhere with the Minister of Finance the night before, the Leader of the Opposition agreed that the government was right at this time to have a deficit budget.

Therefore, as far as policy and principle are concerned, we seem to be ad idem with the official opposition.

I make this statement. There would be no deficit even this year in our expansionist budget if we had not increased the social benefits to Canadians, the social justice payments, and if we had not increased the federal-provincial grants.

It is said that there will be a prospective deficit of $650 million. Well, the two items I have just mentioned make up $1 billion. When we took office the federal-provincial payments for 1956-57 were $689 million. In this current year they will amount to $1,470 million. When we took office old age pensions amounted to $379 million. In this current year they will be $607 million. In other words, in these two items alone there is a difference in excess of a billion dollars. If we had kept the even tenor of the Liberals' ways over the 22-year period and denied Canadians the social justice payments to which they were entitled and denied the provinces the payments to which they were entitled, instead of having a deficit of $650 million, we would be budgeting for a surplus of $350 million this year. Is there anybody who would want to take away hospital insurance which amounts to $274 million?

The other matter on which we have been criticized a great deal is the delay in the budget. Well I am not blaming any particular group or any particular member in the house but it is a fact that only recently were we able to get through the baby budget. We have in this session of parliament been delayed interminably. This is not a personal attack on anyone, but let us all examine ourselves and what we have done.

The longest session in the history of the House of Commons was in 1903, when the session lasted for 155 days. I believe that this is the 144th day of this session and the end is not in sight. May I just cite some examples? I had a statistician check some figures to ascertain certain things. Up to June 21 of this year the total number of pages of Hansard, Mr. Speaker, from November 18 to June 21 amounted to 6855. Let us take a member of parliament and ascertain what his contribution was. Let us take the last speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). The estimated number of pages that the hon. member for Skeena filled in Hansard amounted to 125. The percentage of the hon. member's contribution to the total contribution of parliament in the way of words was 1.8 per cent, nearly 2 per cent. The number of days in the session up to June 21, my latest figure, was 138. The number of days consumed by the hon. member for Skeena if he had started talking before the orders of the day when the house convened at 11 o'clock in the morning and continued through until 10.30 at night, would have been 2½ days.

The daily cost of operating the House of Commons, on the basis of an estimate appearing in Hansard of August 8, 1960, page 7757, is $20,000. The total cost, therefore, of having the benefit of the wisdom, advice, understanding, sympathy and kindness of the hon. member for Skeena would be $50,000. This is the cost to the taxpayers of having the hon. member for Skeena in parliament. This cost, of course, does not include the $10,000 which the hon. member receives annually. There are 265 members. If each member spoke at the same length as the hon. member for Skeena, the session would last 662 days per annum.

Mr. Leduc: What about the Minister of Finance? What is he costing this country?

Mr. Walker: I will come to that, and I will come to you, too.

As I have said, this would mean 662 days per session, that is full days up to 10.30 at night. Even on the basis of six days a week, this would be equivalent to approximately 110 weeks a year, if all hon. members spoke as long as this very modest member for Skeena. The aggregate estimated cost to Canada of such a session would be $13,340,000. If the average member of the house consumed as much time as the hon. member for Skeena, the session each year would last for more than two years. I understand there are approximately 1,000 words on a page of Hansard. The number of words contributed by the hon. member for Skeena so far this session—this does not include the time he was excluded from the house—amount to 125,000 at a cost of 40 cents per word. In other words the hon. member for Skeena, and it is his right to do it and in his wisdom he has done it, talks five times as much as the average member of parliament, as one can see from the number of pages of Hansard consumed.

Now, this results in delaying tactics. I suggest, with the greatest respect, that in some instances the delay is deliberate, and for no other purpose except to delay. I am not ascribing this to any member, I am not naming anyone. I have just been using an example for the purpose of illustration. I have been noting how some contributions by some members are constructive, and some contributions are not. In addition to this the hon. member for Skeena—we have to take some example and there is nothing personal about this—who insists on talking five times as long as the average member, also insists that the average member should not have any extension of his time at six o'clock when we ask for five minutes or ten minutes to complete some item of business. The rules of the house enable the hon. member to call it six o'clock. As I say, these calculations do not include the time during which he was excluded.

Let us take another example. I am just picking these out of the hat. I refer now to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Up to June 26, there were 7,103 pages in Hansard. The number of pages which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had filled amount to 276, so the percentage of the total number of pages of Hansard attributable to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was 3.8 per cent. The number of days which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would have filled if he had started talking at 11 o'clock in the morning and continued through until 10.30 at night is 5.3. He would be talking for a solid week without stopping. Now, the daily cost of keeping the house in session, as we know, is $20,000. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made a contribution to parliament, therefore, which cost the Canadian taxpayer $106,000. This is the cost of keeping this precious flower in parliament. In addition, of course, he gets a nominal consideration of $10,000.

Now, if the average member of parliament spoke at the same length as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, every session of parliament would occupy four years. It must be obvious that the hon. member speaks twice as long as the hon. member for Skeena and about ten times as long as the average member of parliament. If he assessed his value to the house at twice as much as that of us ordinary mortals, I could understand it. Perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate considers himself and his contribution to be three times as valuable as the rest of us, or four or five times as valuable.

However, Mr. Speaker, I ask you with great humility—and at the moment my heart is full of humility—has any member, no matter how brilliant he may be and no matter where he comes from, no matter what regime he is representing in that pocket borough, particularly when he sits in opposition and has nothing to do with the business of the country except criticize it, the right to talk ten times as much as the average member? Now, you can give your own answer to that question. I am not going to suggest he has not because I know that he is highly esteemed in certain circles—particularly self-esteemed. I have heard from him about his greatness and his ability so often that I am sometimes convinced he perhaps has a right to talk longer than ordinary members. But not ten times longer.

This is my contribution to this budget debate. It is a pleasant one, a happy one and ends on a happy note. However, it might explain to the members of the house, Mr. Speaker, why we are here going through these dreary days and evenings; why as July 1 approaches we are here when we had contemplated that we were going to get home to our families and plan those things which since November last we have been prevented from doing; and why we are now promised with breaking all records and being in session longer than any other parliament. I say to you that "the fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars but in ourselves". That is where it lies. This speech is not political; it is factual. I obtained those figures from a statistician.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with as much care as possible to what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) has just said. I am greatly surprised that a minister of the crown has taken about 25 minutes in participating in a budget debate and that, of those 25 minutes, he has used 15 minutes in criticizing other hon. members of this house, particularly the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Even though he has statisticians to work for him, I would have thought that a minister of the crown would work on the statistics dealing with the economy of the country. I think the minister should also have told us that since 1960 we have been here in this house in this parliament for at least 15 out of a total of 18 months; and if the business of this nation during those 18 months was not carried out in less than 15 months it is on account of the mismanagement of the business of this house. He should have told us also that with respect to some measures on which everybody agreed those on this side of the house could have had many speakers. I have reference especially to the resolution with regard to increasing the pensions of veterans, and on which everyone was in agreement. The government had 48 speakers.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, there are several conflicting theories on Canada's economy. There is the theory of cyclical budgeting, the theory of deficit budgeting and finally the theory of surplus budgeting.

It seems that the longer the speeches made by the present Minister of Finance, the heavier the deficits. Apparently, it was necessary for the government to drown its incompetence and mismanagement in the flood of words spoken by the Minister of Finance on June 20 last.

Since 1957, when the present government was elected to office—that was four years ago—we have heard six budget speeches, though the Minister of Finance refers to his December 1957 budget as being only financial proposals.

Since 1958, or over a period of 3¼ years, five budget speeches were made by the Minister of Finance. Four of those budgets predicted deficits; only one forecast a surplus, that of March 31, 1960.

The December 1960 budget was labelled the baby budget. I am inclined to believe that the baby budget was rather that of March 31, 1960, but that the real budget, that was concealed at the time, was the budget brought down on December 20, 1960.

The $12 million surplus that the minister expected in March 1960 had turned into a $345 million deficit by December 1960. This represents a difference of $357 million, or a million a day, as pointed out by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer).

Mr. Speaker, if we look at what the present government has cost us since it accepted the responsibility of office, we find that there is a tremendous difference between what the Canadian taxpayers have to pay and what we have been told by various members in this house.

In 1957-58, a $38.5 million deficit; in 1958-59, a $609.5 million deficit; in 1959-60, a $413 million deficit; in 1960-61, a $345 million deficit. And with the $650 million deficit expected for the current year by the Minister of Finance, we have a grand total of $2,056 million.

Mr. Tremblay: Keep in mind Mr. Lesage's policy.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, in this house I deal only with federal policy and not with provincial policy, with all due deference to my hon. friend for Roberval.

If we add to the last figure I mentioned the depletion of the unemployment insurance fund in the amount of $900 million, and of the national defence special fund which reached $165 million, we get a total of $3,121 million.

[Mr. Roberge.]

In the budget he presented on June 20, the Minister of Finance told us that each and every one of his budgets were aimed at solving current problems. In fact, here is what he said as reported on page 6639 of Hansard:

> The circumstances attending each budget have differed from those associated with the others. Each was aimed to meet the financial and fiscal problems of its time. Tonight's budget is designed to meet Canada's present needs and difficulties.

Everyone will recall the electoral campaigns of 1957 and 1958. Everybody also will recall the promises made by the Prime Minister of Canada and his supporters, especially concerning unemployment.

One of the main problems facing this government ever since it took over is no doubt unemployment. During his electoral campaign, the Prime Minister spoke about it quite often. In fact, he spoke about it in this very city of Ottawa on February 1, 1958. He spoke about it in Prince Albert, on February 14, 1958. He spoke about it also in Brantford, on February 17, 1958. And on February 18, he spoke about it again in a national television broadcast when he said, as reported in the Montreal Star of February 19, 1958:

(Text):

> As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada everything that can be done—everything without regard to limit—will be done to the end that no one will suffer.

(Translation):

We all remember this solemn pledge of the Prime Minister:—

Mr. Tremblay: Add to that the deficits piled up by Jean Lesage.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, I thought that since the relocation of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), we would be rid of his interjections.

Mr. Tremblay: What about Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, what was the unemployment situation in Canada when the latest statistics were issued by the dominion bureau of statistics or published in the statistical report on the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

On May 20, and I am quoting the figures from the statistical report of the dominion bureau of statistics for May 1960, there were in Canada 439,000 people unemployed and in search of employment; this does not include workers on temporary lay-off, because then the figure would be higher; in fact, it would be 457,000.

On April 22 of this year, the number of unemployed people in search of jobs reached a total of 590,000. On March 18, the figure was 664,000.

Now, taking the figures provided by the unemployment insurance commission, in March 1961 a total of 807,000 people were receiving benefits. In April 1961, there were 708,000 people receiving benefits. If the people receiving benefits are not unemployed, I wonder what they are.

There is therefore one sure fact, namely that the most impressive figure is the last one I quoted, the one provided by the unemployment insurance commission. However, for my present purpose, I shall use only the figures found in the statistical review of Canada, which repeats the monthly manpower statistics of the dominion bureau of statistics.

If there was unemployment in 1958, there still is today. If there was unemployment before 1958, and there was, it is even worse today.

Allow me to give certain percentages contained in this publication with regard to the rate of unemployment before the Conservatives took office. In 1946, 3.4 per cent of the labour force were unemployed; in 1947, 2.2 per cent; in 1948, 2.3 per cent; in 1949, 2.8 per cent; in 1950, 3.6; in 1951, 2.4; in 1952, 2.9; in 1953, 3.0; in 1954, 4.6; in 1955 4.4; in 1956, 3.4 and in 1957, 4.6.

Let us now see how those figures went up in the following years. In 1958, 7.1 per cent; in 1959, 6 per cent; in 1960, 7 per cent, and in the first five months of 1961, 9 per cent, 9.98 per cent.

Mr. Tremblay: Let us have the figures for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, if the budgetary measures advocated by the Minister of Finance are designed, according to him, to solve current problems, and if we consider that previous budgets have not solved this problem, I wonder how the present budget will provide an answer to the unemployment problem this year and in the future.

The Minister of Finance presented his first budget on June 17, 1958. What had been the situation for the last year, at that time?

According to the January 1959 issue of the Canadian Statistical Review, there were 164,000 unemployed in Canada when the present government came into power on June 21, 1957. Everyone knows that under the normal trend, unemployment in Canada reaches its lowest level in September, and its highest point in March. Now, we know that in June 1957, when unemployment was at its lowest level for that year, there were 164,000 unemployed in the country; there were 166,000 in July; 176,000 in August; 197,000 in September; 211,000 in October; 296,000 in November; 392,000 in December; 527,000 in January 1958; 563,000 in February and 597,000 in March. The number of unemployed went down after that. In April, it was 522,000; in May, 370,000; in June, 324,000. It is at that time that the Minister of Finance made his first budget speech, that is on June 17, 1958.

What kind of economic recovery did we have? The employment situation continued to improve until September, which was the best month of that year. In July, there were 291,000 unemployed; in August, 281,000; in September, 271,000; the figures went up again in October: 313,000; in November, 361,000; in December, 440,000; in January 1959, 538,000, that is the highest figure for the winter of 1958-59.

The second budget was introduced on April 9, 1959. I am still quoting figures from the Canadian statistical review and from the dominion bureau of statistics.

February, 537,000; March, 525,000; April, 445,000; May, 334,000; June, 234,000; July, 228,000.

According to the Minister of Finance, the budget introduced on April 9, 1959 aimed at bringing solutions to the problems of the time. One of those problems which we had often brought to the government's attention during the session was unemployment. Well, contrary to the normal tendency of employment in Canada, in July, the number of unemployed increased to 228,000; in August, the number was 239,000; in September it was down to 213,000; in October it was up again to 237,000; in November to 296,000, while in December it had reached 370,000.

In January 1960, there were 504,000 unemployed; in February, 555,000 and in March, 566,000 while the number levelled at 517,000 in April.

On March 31, 1960, we had our third budget. Let us see what the budget did that year to settle unemployment.

In May, we had 399,000 unemployed and 300,000 in June; in July, when unemployment is usually lower than in September, the unemployment figure went up again in August, 1959, and in August 1960, the situation was even worse since there was an increase over the figure for June which was 300,000 unemployed and that for July, 311,000 unemployed. This increase continued in August and reached 322,000 while another reduction was registered in September with 305,000. In October, the number went up again to 347,000; in November, it reached 401,000 and in December, 489,000. In January 1961 the figure went up to 630,000 and in February and March, it set the new record high of 664,000.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to include in those figures the unemployed who were laid off on a temporary basis.

The fourth budget introduced on December 20, 1960 was also supposed to solve the problems, according to the Minister of Finance. Furthermore, this budget we are now discussing is also supposed to clear up difficulties. Judging from the figures I just gave and from past experience, I am afraid that, in fact, our unemployed will not be able to find jobs during the coming season. But our friends opposite will say we are prophets of gloom. Nothing could be more inaccurate. We have had, especially during the last session, an exceedingly long debate on the problem of unemployment. We have made innumerable proposals to this government but, at that time, the Minister of Labour replied that the proposed solutions did not make any sense. There is particularly—and those who want to read it can do so—that summary given by the hon. member for Laurier on the occasion of that debate in which he made at least 25 suggestions to solve the unemployment problem.

It is the crucial problem of our times. I do not think that the budget introduced by the minister on June 20, will make it possible to improve the situation, although, Mr. Speaker, I do hope that every Canadian will find a job.

(Text):

I think this government has mismanaged the affairs of our country. I also think the Minister of Finance has miscalculated the effects of his successive financial proposals. It is my belief that the electoral promises made by the Prime Minister and his supporters in 1957 and 1958 were misconceived. This government, in other words, is a complete mess. But the Canadian people now know what to do and they will not miss their chance when the next time comes.

Mrs. Margaret Macdonald (Kings): On rising for the first time to speak in this house I cannot but recall and repeat the words uttered by my late husband in his maiden speech in the twenty third parliament:

I enter on my duties here with a deep sense of humility, with the highest respect for this house and an earnest desire to do the best possible job as the representative of my constituency of Kings of the province of Prince Edward Island, and of this great country of Canada.

It is also for me an honour and a challenge to be selected by my constituents to follow in the footsteps not only of my husband but also of his father who for many years represented Kings county in this chamber and the province of Prince Edward Island in the parliament of Canada. It is my desire and my intention to follow, as best I can, the course which they set.

I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, my feelings of humility but I must also say that I am filled too with sentiments of deep gratitude, first, to the loyal friends of my husband and myself who so faithfully supported me in the difficulties and trials of recent months, and then to those members of the House of Commons who have greeted me so warmly and kindly as I take up my duties as a new member of parliament.

It is the custom for new members to refer in detail to their constituencies in their maiden speeches. It would indeed be easy for me to describe the beauties of Kings county, but because I am aware that this has been done often and well in this house I shall not at this time follow the familiar practice. I should like to say a few words, however, about some matters of particular significance to the economic life of my constituency and province.

Although I have long been interested in the development of Prince Edward Island I have watched with particular interest the events that followed the change of government in 1957 when my husband and three of his colleagues came to Ottawa as supporters of our distinguished Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Prince Edward Island—the smallest province in the dominion and the one with the narrowest base for provincial revenue—is extremely dependent on financial relations with the dominion government to provide the necessary level of services for our people. In these times when all governmental costs are rising a new attitude was required. It was, I think an awareness of this need which made such a great difference in Prince Edward Island and the maritimes generally after June, 1957. Our people were much impressed with the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant of which Prince Edward Island received $2,500,000 annually. This was by far the largest single grant ever received from Ottawa. Under the new dominion-provincial agreements the amount will be substantially larger and the benefits to the citizens of Prince Edward Island will be great.

In our province, where the basic industries are agriculture, fisheries and the tourist trade, transportation is tremendously important. The roads to resources program initiated by the dominion government has given Prince Edward Island the greatest road building program in its history. It will account for 158 miles of pavement in my constituency of Kings county.

The roads to resources program and the camp site and picnic program, which is also a joint dominion-provincial program, have greatly benefited Kings county which until recently was much neglected as a tourist area. We look forward to an increased development of the tourist trade in our province. In this connection I cannot refrain from a word about the causeway, a subject of such great interest to my husband and his colleagues. I am in full agreement with what the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) said the other day and I join with my three colleagues in urging the minister to do everything possible to press forward this tremendous undertaking.

More and more tourists will be coming to Prince Edward Island. Statistics covering the last ten years reveal a sharp annual increase. The existence of new and improved facilities in the province and more and better roads will contribute to the greater importance of the tourist industry. Better markets for the excellent island products require better transportation facilities and it is my hope that this government, which has already done so much for our province, will provide for us the most up-to-date transportation facilities we have yet had.

Members of parliament are always interested in public works projects within their own constituencies. I recently travelled throughout Kings county to see at first hand some of the required projects which could be of assistance to our economy and especially to the fishing industry. In the last four years an impressive number of wharves, breakwaters and warehouses have been built which have resulted in great improvement.

Kings county is one of the important fishing areas in Canada and from time to time I shall urge upon the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) improvements and extensions of facilities to provide greater accommodation and security to our fishermen. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. lady on her maiden speech and suggest that she paid perhaps too much heed to the argument which has been put forward in this house very recently by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) who, I am sure, is trying to make all members of the house conscious of how much they are costing the taxpayer when they open their mouths.

There is very little I wish to say about the budget at this time because the budget speech presents an opportunity to members to speak on almost any topic within the purview of House of Commons business. The subject I wish to address most of my time to today is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the report which was tabled today by the special committee on broadcasting.

Before I do so I should like to say, in relation to the budget, that one aspect of it has found a great deal of favour in the area that I represent. People involved in the pulp and paper industry are very pleased with the indication that the devaluation of the dollar will improve their position in terms of trade with the United States. However, I should like to underline a criticism that has been made in regard to this step in that direction. We are left with a very indefinite idea as to how this devaluation procedure is going to take place. If the devaluation which we have already had is merely a psychological drop and there is not going to be certain control and direction on the part of the government to maintain this difference between the Canadian and the United States dollar at some definite figure, we are going to be in a most difficult situation with respect to our basic industries.

It is very hard to know what is the right figure for the Canadian dollar, but the pulp and paper industry is the bellwether industry in Canada at the present time, especially in terms of export sales. When the Canadian dollar is below the United States dollar, there is a bit of pump priming in that industry both on its capital side and job creation side. I have no doubt at all that if the dollar is devalued below the United States dollar to the tune of five cents or six cents it will lead to the extension of pulp and paper plants and perhaps also the creation of completely new pulp and paper operations in northwestern Ontario.

However, we have not that kind of indication from the minister, and the value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar is a complete mystery at the present time. This situation seems to be too tentative and indefinite for the purposes of the basic economy in our regions. I suggest we must know just what the dollar is going to be pegged at. If this is not done I suggest we will have a further period of haze and doubt in the pulp and paper industry.

Perhaps it is almost blasphemous to refer to one of the kudos which was handed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) during this debate, but yesterday the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell) made reference to something in an attempt to equate or draw analogies between our Saviour and the Minister of Finance. When one reaches a situation of such hyperbole as this, it behooves one to go very, very slowly. I keep looking over there, and have for some time, but am unable to see a halo. Somehow it does not seem to have manifested itself. It seems to me, however, that the hon. member for Stormont in going to such lengths to indicate what a marvellous minister of finance we have should have taken a lesson or two from the sermon on the mount himself and not been so harsh and severe in referring to the head of the Bank of Canada. After all, I am sure that an individual so close to someone who might deliver something similar to the sermon on the mount would not turn around and send the head of the Bank of Canada to jail. It seems to me that he is blind to all the advantages of having such a religious and halotype figure close to him.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Does the hon. member not think that every one of us, including the Minister of Finance, should emulate that Teacher who gave us the sermon on the mount, and that anyone who believes in Him should endeavour to reduce arrogance when it reaches such unseemly proportions?

Mr. Fisher: I quite agree with the hon. member but he seemed more like Pontius Pilate yesterday, and he was a pretty tough specimen.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope you will excuse me from this theological discussion.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. minister says he would like to be excused. I am not suggesting because I cannot see a halo that he is sprouting horns.

Today we had laid before this house the final report of the special committee on broadcasting. I should like to say immediately that I think it is a very unfair report which continues something that was very much in evidence two years ago when the committee met, and represents a very definite attempt on the part of certain members of that committee to do away with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am not critical of their views, but of the method they used in developing those views. It seemed to me those members were more than suspicious of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, more than suspicious of the efficiency of that corporation, and more than suspicious about the way it carries out its programming. I believe they want to destroy the C.B.C. as a public corporation. I believe they would be happy to see the C.B.C. sold or disposed of through some method. I believe they would like to see the C.B.C. completely detached from either programming or distribution, in other words, wiped out. Because this particular attitude of their does not have general support, they proceed on a course of niggling, nose punching, hammering and continually downgrading the organization as such. I should like to return to the report to indicate why I think this is so.

Does the hon. member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Lambert: Will the hon. member permit a question? He made a flat-footed statement about the attitude of members on the government side with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, as he says, of their desire to sell the corporation. Will he give us concrete proof of that?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Lambert: Otherwise he will be running away—

Mr. Fisher: I am not running away. I am not saying that government members as a whole want to do this, but there are certain government members whose attitude toward the C.B.C. is completely destructive. I am saying that this report, like the report of two years ago, is a victory for this group. I am not saying they are a majority within the government party, but they are strong enough to get recommendations through that, I will argue, have no relation to the evidence that we heard and the investigation that was carried out this summer.

I should like to turn to one example which I think is the most serious of all, and it relates to recommendation No. 3, which reads:

> That the number of directors of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be increased from 11 to 15 for the purpose of assuring adequate representation to the French language network.

This is the part I have in mind:

> That the directors be appointed on a rotating basis—

This part is fine, but this is what I want to draw to the attention of the house:

> —and a chairman be named from among their numbers by the governor in council for a period not to exceed five years. Further, that no executive officer or other employee of the corporation be a director of the corporation.

To me, Mr. Speaker, this is nothing more than a downgrading of the president of the C.B.C. to the role of manager. It means the elevation of the chairman of the board, as I conceive it, if this recommendation is carried out, to be the policy spokesman of the C.B.C. And yet it is very well argued—and I know the hon. member for Greenwood is an example—a member whom I respect tremendously—that this will be an improvement because he can give examples of private corporations where such a situation existed. I believe this can do nothing but harm to the C.B.C. because of the role it plays in relation to the public. Who from now on, if this recommendation is accepted, is going to speak for the C.B.C.? Who is going to be the spokesman? The policy-making board will be detached from the executive officers in any real sense in so far as the operating is concerned; the operating officers will be detached from the board so far as policy is concerned. It seems to me, in a situation like this, you are going to create immense difficulties for the C.B.C. in achieving the kind of flexibility that is required of a public corporation that is always in the public eye and always under public criticism. It seems to me it robs it of the flexibility that it has under the present arrangement. There is one thing about it. The thing that really bothers me most about this recommendation, Mr. Speaker, is that the president of the C.B.C., Mr. Ouimet, a gentleman of whom I have been critical in some aspects of his work, made an excellent presentation before our committee for a period staggered over about three months. He did a magnificent job. I know if I were a French Canadian I would be particularly proud of the way in which this man from a French Canadian background, with a magnificent vocabulary and a great deal of information, marshalled and presented it to our committee. He handled himself splendidly in both languages and you felt that here was a person carrying on a magnificent job. I can only regret that through illness he was not available two years ago, at the time the C.B.C. was previously before our committee. As a result of that fine job he did in providing us with information and putting up with us for a day of examination and cross-examination, what does he get? A punch in the nose. He is going to be downgraded to something in the nature of a manager or general manager, and we are going to have a chairman over him.

It seems to me there is an inconsistency in this recommendation in that it does not indicate whether the appointment of the chairman by the governor in council is to be a part-time or a full-time appointment. We had the Auditor General give evidence before the committee in relation to the C.B.C. Some members of the committee seemed to be very impressed with his evidence in certain sectors. Here was an instance where the Auditor General felt that if we were to have a chairman of the C.B.C. he should be a full-time person, but for some reason the committee did not take this into account. It seems to me the recommendation makes sense only if this is a full time appointment.

We have to accept the fact that Mr. Ouimet has been punched in the nose or given his little bit of punishment; I do not know for what reason. But you must have someone speaking for the C.B.C. full time. In an organization of this scope which deals with day to day problems which are cropping up all the time which affect policy, how can you have a part-time person in this kind of role? Certainly the Auditor General, if you respect the advice he had to give, felt that it should be a full-time appointment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I say, I interpret this as another punch in the nose for the C.B.C. and particularly for the president of the C.B.C. who came forward and gave evidence.

To me the real irony in all this is that after Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, gave his evidence suggesting a management consultant should examine the C.B.C., after he had made his recommendation about a full-time chairman of the board, the committee asked, as a result of a motion that I introduced, which was supported generally, that we bring Mr. Dunsmore before the committee, who is I suppose what you might call the acting chairman of the board. I would like to point out that Mr. Dunsmore is an appointee of this government. He came before us and gave evidence for a considerable length of time. Every member had an opportunity to question him. It was not a case of his dodging in and dodging out. In his testimony at which I should like all members who are interested in the problem to look—it appears in the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 27—he gave no indication that the board of directors was satisfied with things in the C.B.C., but he did point out to us, and in his evidence showed, that he had a great deal of business experience, and his associates on the board, particularly the finance committee, had a great deal of experience. They are not rubes; they are not duds. They were appointed by this government. Did he give any indication anywhere that they wanted this kind of recommendation? Not a bit of it. You cannot find anywhere in the evidence here that the chairman of the board appointed by this government felt that the board was not operating well. You cannot find any evidence at all that I can see that can be brought forward to indicate that Mr. Dunsmore felt the corporation was not operating well. I challenged him with the question, is the C.B.C. a bad corporation from the point of view of efficiency? He said he certainly did not think so, or words to that effect. To me he gave an affirmation in the performance of the corporation and the role of the board. And here we are, without any support from this particular group whose spokesman we had before us, with this recommendation from a parliamentary committee that no executive officer or other employee of the corporation be a director of the corporation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this kind of attack on the C.B.C. let me say this. I have never been critical, and never could be as an individual, of any member of parliament who wants to say his piece in public about what he believes in relation to any organization over which the government has any control. All I can say is that if a member believes that the C.B.C. should go, if he believes that it should be doing just programming or just handling the distribution of programs, if he believes that it no longer has a role to play; that private enterprise or private stations and private networks can do the job, then he should come forward and make that point and not proceed by this process of niggling, cutting away and undermining.

I will give another example to indicate what I mean by this undermining in the committee report. As many members know, the C.B.C. has most of its production facilities in Toronto and Montreal. In Montreal these facilities are scattered in over 20 places and in Toronto in over 12. A great deal of cost is involved in terms of communication and transportation. Anyone who visits the various Toronto headquarters cannot help but be overwhelmed by the expensive crazy quilt setup. The C.B.C., it seems to me quite properly, had plans to consolidate these facilities and had a capital investment program in relation thereto. Paragraph 6 in the committee report reads, in part:

Your committee commends the caution of the board of directors in its policy toward large capital investments at this time in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa.

What the committee is commending is the information Mr. Dunsmore gave us that the board is seized of the changes and transitional effects with regard to broadcasting at this time and, therefore, is not going to rush into anything. In other words, the people the government appointed were aware of the situation. The committee then recommends that this course be pursued until all studies and investigations are completed. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the committee is underlining again the fact that it does not really feel the board of directors who are directing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are in control of things. I am prepared to accept Mr. Dunsmore's assurance that the board is watching these matters very carefully. Apparently the other members of the committee—they have this right because they are in the majority—do not feel this way. We have, therefore, a suggestion going out again that the C.B.C., which desperately needs expansion of these facilities in Montreal and Toronto in order to consolidate because of the extra cost involved, is given an O.K., to delay, postpone and procrastinate. This spirit, on occasion, is ideal because of the changing television situation. However, it seems to me there is an attitude of, damned if we are going to allow the C.B.C. to consolidate any more.

Mr. Fairfield: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Fairfield: Does the hon. member consider that caution should be used in connection with expenditures of approximately $70 million?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member is quite aware of the fact that I helped to bring out, by the questioning of Mr. Dunsmore, the position that is involved. I am willing to leave it to the board of directors. I seem to be the only member of the committee who has faith in the appointments made by this government.

Another kind of niggling which is involved in this report, Mr. Speaker, is illustrated by paragraph No. 8. This paragraph reads:

There is evidence to indicate that the supervision and control of scripts and programming has not reached the levels envisaged in the recommendations made by the broadcasting committee of 1959.

There is a honey, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what it was that was envisaged by the broadcasting committee of 1959. I do not know what the evidence is to indicate that the supervision and control of scripts and programming has not reached the levels envisaged in the recommendations made by the broadcasting committee of 1959. This recommendation really does not say anything, except to indicate again that somehow there is something haywire with C.B.C. scripts and programming. If hon. members feel that C.B.C. programming is far afield, if they feel the C.B.C. is getting into what an hon. member from Newfoundland called a lot of subversive stuff, if as other members charged the C.B.C. is dealing too much with indelicate matters such as in the Zoo Story, dealing with homosexuality and other immoral things, why do they not say so? No, they say there is evidence to indicate that supervision and control of scripts and programming has not reached the levels envisaged in the recommendations made by the broadcasting committee of 1959.

Then, the committee, in turn, recommends that every effort be made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to exert a stricter control in this field of public information and entertainment. What are these things of which we want stricter control? What do we want to do, keep more people off the air? What kind of programming is it that is so bad that we need stricter control? Is there something immoral, indecent, improper or subversive in the general level of C.B.C. programs and scripts?

Mr. Macdonnell: I have stated repeatedly, Mr. Speaker, and I state again that I am a strong supporter of the C.B.C. However, it seems to me obvious that there are programs on the C.B.C. which deeply offend a large number of people in this country. I do feel that it is desirable, although I know it is difficult, that more scrutiny be given to these programs.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the hon. member who has put that question, how could you have freedom for the producers and writers if you are always going to be calling for stricter control? Our evidence did not reveal anywhere that there was any crisis or anything seriously wrong in this field. If the hon. member will look back he will find that any broadcasting organization that is doing any kind of job in the field of public information and entertainment is going to be rubbing the feelings of some people the wrong way. I am a politician, and I want to get along with people, particularly the people in my constituency. However, I am always rubbing some people the wrong way. I would expect any live, public institution, whether it is a newspaper or a periodical—or a politician, because he is a public institution in a way—would cause dissent and offend people at certain times in certain areas.

Is the C.B.C. a tremendous offender? I would sooner have the C.B.C. occasionally pull a bad rock in its programming in terms of something that does not come off, than to be airing a lot of things such as we have on private broadcasting systems, the 40 top hits of the day and commercial announcements bursting out every so often.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will agree. I have to confess that there would be programs on the C.B.C. which I know should be carried and which I will not like. Nevertheless, this does not mean there should not be every effort made to improve the scrutiny which is being given. There have been some programs which I have heard about and which I do not believe any reasonable person would like. But I repeat: I am sure there are many things which a competent board would approve, and which I would not like. I accept that fact. I am not infallible.

Mr. Fisher: The point which I am trying to make is that the committee makes this kind of criticism without giving any indication where the evidence was. We did not have any evidence before our committee that I could find anywhere to the effect that the C.B.C. had fallen down in this particular regard. Where were all the scripts and programs? There were a number of cases brought up. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) was interested in a rodeo announcer who came up from the United States. We had considerable talk about the Zoo Story. In 1959, we did have quite a bit of evidence about programs. This year, we had very little about individual programs and scripts. There was nothing to indicate that the C.B.C. was falling down on the job or that we were in any great danger or that there was a continual push of C.B.C. programs and scripts that were offensive.

There are two other points which bother me that I wanted to comment upon in relation to this report. These are omissions. There are two that are important, and one I cannot fathom. In 1959, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was urged by a parliamentary committee to do what the Fowler commission recommended, that is to have a more aggressive commercial policy.

We received evidence before the committee to a degree that this commercial policy is having effects upon the C.B.C. staff, and upon its relationship with private stations or its competition with private stations. We had indications that it has some effect upon affiliates of various kinds of the corporation. However, we received no recommendation on this matter and this is linked with another omission.

The C.B.C. brought forward the idea that was recommended by the Fowler commission, namely that it be put on some kind of financial basis that had a formula, that was not dependent upon what took place each year when it came before treasury board. The C.B.C. and the Auditor General made this recommendation too, namely that some kind of formula be developed for the financing of the C.B.C. upon a per head basis or a per capita basis. I do not know what happened. We had opinions from the Auditor General. We had evidence from the C.B.C. However, in the report there is nothing about that matter. There is in it not a thing about this very difficult question of a commercial policy of the C.B.C.

I should like to make it perfectly clear that a couple of years ago I and our party were against the C.B.C. going out further into commercial operations. However, it is now out there. It is now doing the chore, and commercial revenue is becoming more and more important as a part of revenue to keep the C.B.C. operations going to the extent that they are going. It seems to me that this is one of the key points in the review of the protests we had and the evidence we received that this whole commercial revenue is in an attenuated situation because of the impact of competition from other media and from the private television stations. However, the committee did not get around to making any recommendation in this regard or even any comment upon it as, it would seem to me, would have been quite proper. Those are the two omissions.

I wish to turn last to one point. The board of broadcast governors earlier in the proceedings came before us and asked that the act be changed, section 13, subsection 4, clause (b), in relation to network affiliations so that there could be cross programming. Right at the end of our hearings the B.B.G. came back with a letter. The C.B.C. had indicated the weakness of this recommendation. The B.B.G. came back and changed its mind. Here is the authority that this government appointed, and whose fairness all of us I think should accept, coming back and telling us that they want to change that recommendation, that they do not want it. But does this submission have any effect upon the committee? It has not a bit of effect. We went right ahead. We therefore now have recommended a change of which the B.B.G. is not in favour, and of which the C.B.C. is not in favour; and I was not perfectly clear that the Canadian association of broadcasters were in favour of it in this form.

These are some of the criticisms I have of this committee report. I thought it was important at this time for one member of the committee to rise in his place and express his disagreement with the general line of the committee report.

Mr. Macdonnell: Why at this time?

Mr. Fisher: Because it is just at this time that it has come forth. I know what the whole line is going to be. The hon. member for Greenwood I am sure knows that over half the newspaper circulation in Canada is owned by publishers who also own and control radio and television stations. Anything that is critical of the C.B.C. they seize upon, explode and spread it out. This report is critical of the C.B.C. It suggests a lack of confidence in the C.B.C. in a number of its recommendations. I felt that, if I could do so, I should take the first opportunity to rise in my place and indicate that this was by no means a unanimous report and that some of us have very grave doubts about its fairness.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. F. C. Stinson (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, while in this budget debate it is open to any hon. member to speak about any of the activities of the government of Canada or about anything which is of interest to parliament and while we have listened, I think, with interest and profit to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who has just delivered what might be called a provocative speech, in the few minutes available to me I propose to confine myself to observations on some of the financial proposals made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in the budget address.

Before I do that, however, I should like to welcome to the house the four new members, in particular the hon. member for Kings (Mrs. Macdonald) who so graciously addressed the House of Commons earlier this afternoon and also the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) who is a friend of mine of 15 years' standing and for whom I have especially tender feelings. Thirteen years ago he and I walked the floor of the Toronto General hospital together on a spring afternoon awaiting the arrival of his first son and my only daughter. It seems to me that at that time we were talking politics, Mr. Speaker. Since that time we have had a very friendly relationship although disagreeing entirely on political questions. I should also like to say this, and I hope it will not be terribly embarrassing to the hon. gentleman to whom I refer. I think that the government and Canadians generally are greatly indebted to the distinguished Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). I have known this hon. gentleman for some 13 years. Over that time I have watched his service to our party and to the country. I have admired the diligent way in which he has conducted himself and the great efforts he has put forward to serve his minister and his country. About his minister I shall have something to say in a few minutes.

The purpose of the budget proposals put forward by the minister was to help to create in this country conditions which would give rise to greater employment and steady and sensible growth in the Canadian economy. One of the standards by which our kind of society is judged is the success or otherwise we have in providing jobs for people who desire to work. In my opinion in North America recently we have not come up to a particularly high standard in this respect. When the budget proposals are implemented and when the effects of many of the other measures passed by this parliament are felt, I think we can look forward to a gradual increase in employment opportunities in this country.

Related to expanding employment is the objective of promoting growth in the economy. A mix of reforms, monetary, fiscal and economic, are before the house for consideration and I think that each of these in its own way should be helpful. In the next few minutes I intend to speak briefly about certain developments in the Canadian economy which have had an adverse effect on its growth in recent years and to indicate how I think the proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance may arrest these developments. These developments do not fit into any geometric pattern and one cannot speak with certainty as to the effects they have had or as to the results the budget proposals may have by way of providing solutions to some of these problems. In some respects they are related to each other and in other respects they are not related. They have different causes. Some economists refer to these developments as cyclical, structural and technological, but I do not propose to use these terms. I think that Canadians generally are becoming aware of what these developments are, but I do not think it is yet clear enough that in the 1960's we have quite a different kind of situation within Canada and the world of the 1960's is drastically different from the world of the 1950's.

Of course, one of the factors which has had an important effect on Canadian business is the strengthening of the economies of the countries of western Europe and the resurgence of the economy of Japan. Earlier this year I had an opportunity to see something of this industrial development in Japan and I was terribly impressed by the zeal, drive, enthusiasm and acumen of the Japanese businessmen whom I met. In Europe it is becoming more and more difficult to sell our goods because the countries of that continent are becoming increasingly more capable of satisfying their own needs.

In the case of the western European countries an important impetus was given to industrial expansion after the war by the Marshall plan, and in the case of Japan by United States economic assistance. Developments in these countries have tended to slow down some business activity in Canada, but in the long term I think they will be helpful to Canada. A healthy European economy is needed by our country, which looks to European markets for export trade.

It has been suggested that something akin to the Marshall plan is now required in the less developed areas of Asia and Africa to give them the capital required for a take-off similar to that displayed by the western European countries in the 1950's. I do not think the analogy is a particularly good one, but certainly capital investment in these areas will help them get into a position where they will be better able to purchase Canadian goods. Many of the budget proposals will help Canadian indusry to become more competitive, especially, in my opinion, those designed to bring down the exchange rate, reduce interest rates and those having to do with research carried on in Canada.

May I turn, second, to the question of the balance of payments. This is an extremely complex and difficult field. On June 20 the minister told us that in the past five years we have had net inflows of capital from outside of from $1 billion to $1,500,000,000 each year. Each year the value of goods and services we have bought outside the country has exceeded the value of goods and services we have sold to others. It has been said by some that this shows Canadians are living beyond their means. Certainly it would be a good thing if Canada had all the capital required for developing our own resources, and it would be to our advantage if we had a favourable balance on current international account. But the fact is that now, and for as long one can see into the future, it is going to be necessary for this country to borrow money abroad to develop our resources.

Surely it is obvious that United States investment has been one of the main reasons for our post-war prosperity, and as I say we are going to require and welcome investment by financial institutions in that country for a long time. As to the surplus of exports over imports, it seems to me that this is a problem more easily corrected than that arising from foreign borrowings. At least it is a field where individual Canadian purchasers may help out by wherever possible purchasing Canadian goods and services.

To help correct the imbalance of payments the government proposes to use the exchange stabilization fund. The minister said that the fund would be used "to neutralize, at least to some degree, the effects of the continuing capital inflows". To make any significant change in the rate there would have to be very heavy buying of United States dollars out of this fund, and the minister himself has recognized that the advantage that can be expected by using this technique is very limited because of the huge sums of money which would have to be expended to make any really significant change in the rate.

It seems to me that more important are the government's proposals to encourage borrowings within Canada. Anyone who has had any connection with the financing of capital works of the municipality of metropolitan Toronto will know how dependent that municipality has been on borrowings from the United States to finance its program. It is the hope of the government that to a greater extent than before municipalities such as that will be able to find in Canada the resources they need for their capital undertakings.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes left to me I should like to say something about the co-operation asked for by the minister between government and secondary industry, and in particular about the proposal for expansion of the activities of the industrial development bank. The industrial development bank can be of limited help to secondary industry generally in this country, but it can be of some help, and unless we see greater opportunities for employment in the manufacturing industries of this country we are going to be looking at unemployment figures of something like 7 per cent to 10 per cent of the labour force for a long time to come. I do not believe these figures are acceptable to the Canadian people. In the European countries there has been intimate co-operation among government, labour and management. It seems to me that this kind of co-operation is something that has to be fostered and encouraged by each of these three groups.

I think the work of the national productivity council can be helpful in this regard. In that connection I think it was unfortunate that there were not appointed to that body younger men who have more time to devote to the work of the council than its present members. The members of that council are big names; they are great Canadians in their own fields, but they are too busy to be expected to carry on the amount of important work which that council should do. I can think of a number of young Canadian businessmen who are anxious to serve their country. They are well informed and experienced in their fields and they have not yet had an opportunity to serve their country on a council of this kind.

With regard to the industrial development bank, it seems to me that the managers of the branches of that bank have to start to get more in tune with businessmen who are coming to them with loan applications. I think, also, they have to start to show something of the sense of urgency which we find shown by managers of the large branches of the chartered banks when dealing with applications for loans from the businessmen among their customers. I would like to see some of these people show some of the same kind of drive and enthusiasm which we see displayed these days by the distinguished Minister of Finance. Speaking of that honourable gentleman, I would like to say that I consider him a man of steel, a skilful parliamentarian, a leader of men and one of the great Canadians of our time.

[Mr. Stinson.]

Another field where the government is showing initiative in assisting manufacturers is in the field of tariffs and quotas. Under this administration many sections of the tariff have been revised and at all times the government has fulfilled this country's obligations under the GATT. The quota arrangements recently completed with Japan have relieved to some extent the concerns of Canadian manufacturers of radio sets and tubes. While I know the negotiations have been delicate and difficult—and the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated on a reasonably good result—I sometimes think the government shows undue concern over a country such as Japan cutting down on its purchases of Canadian wheat. There are no price supports on unused tubes and resistors and no public money is used to pay storage bills on the inventories of the electronic and electrical industry. I think these facts should be kept in mind when the government is considering the position of farmers and other Canadian citizens in the course of these trade negotiations.

Mr. Benidickson: You had better come across to this side.

Mr. Stinson: Toward the end of his budget speech the Minister of Finance said that this budget challenges all people to hard work and self-discipline. It is trite but none the less true to say that governments cannot make this a prosperous country. The Canadian nation will be prosperous if Canadians work hard and exercise those old virtues of being resourceful and exercising self-control. Earlier in the year there was a round of salary increases in my municipality for public officials who were already well paid, and the thought came to my mind: Why should these people be asking for and receiving substantial increases in their pay for this year when they are doing no more work this year than last year? The answer to this question, of course, is that they should not have asked for or received more money. As the minister has said so often, for people who have a good rate of pay there is no justification for a pay increase unless there is a matching increase in productivity.

I do not think we should work in parliament or elsewhere for prosperity for Canada alone. Hon. members know that I am an advocate of foreign economic aid. One of the reasons I would like to see all Canadian workers employed is that then we would have more resources with which to help the economic development of less advanced countries. While some of the problems confronting us in the Canadian economy are difficult and baffling, they look comparatively unimportant when set alongside the difficulties facing the emerging nations in Africa and Asia. I wish we could send our excellent Minister of Finance to help them out. He is giving great leadership to Canadians in these exciting days and he has earned the respect of statesmen throughout the world.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has referred to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, as a man of steel. I would ask him whether he would not agree that the policies which have come from this man of steel in the last three years have been policies which are opposed to the policies which the minister proposes in this budget? I point out that the programs for which the hon. member has expressed support today are programs which were advocated on this side of the house last year and this year.

Mr. Stinson: The answer to that question is that the Minister of Finance is a man of steel in that he is unbending in pursuing policies and programs always espoused by the Conservative party for the benefit of this country.

Mr. Benidickson: Myopic is what he is.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, before starting my remarks on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), I would like to thank the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) for the free publicity he gave my products.

As a matter of fact, I can assure him that the coffins manufactured by my industry are of the best quality; that they are made of good sound wood and lined with velvet. Moreover, I have manufactured enough of them to be able to accommodate all Conservative members who will lose their seats in the next general election.

An hon. Member: You will go bankrupt.

Another hon. Member: You should keep one for yourself.

Mr. Boulanger: Yet, I may assure you that the coffin I am keeping for the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, like the one for the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) will be quite comfortable and fit the measure of their mind.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Roberval wants to ask some questions or make some remarks I would ask him to do so from his seat.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I listened here with attention, to the remarks of the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), especially when he dealt with a matter which is of particular concern to me. I am speaking of the textile industry. He had some words for me which I did not treasure very much, and I might reply that it would have been better if he had not mentioned textiles, because he was unable to answer the questions we asked. Yet, those questions were very simple ones.

However, I can commend him for the tone of his speech and the manner in which he presented it. It was a well written and well delivered statement.

Yet, if he had been well versed in textile matters, he would have spoken differently. I see that he is not at all familiar with that industry. Yet, he only had to read the newspapers and skim through the various magazines to follow the reports of some textile organizations to be aware of the present situation of that industry.

May I quote an item published in the Montreal Star of September 21, 1960, just for his own information. This is what it says:

(Text):

Unemployment at present is at a dangerous level and no doubt the large influx of Japanese products at low prices has tended to create the situation as these imports have jumped at least from 500 to 600 per cent in the past two years or so.

(Translation):

It is also stated in a Vancouver newspaper:

(Text):

Japanese textile and clothing imports to Canada were 92 per cent higher in 1959 than they were in 1957.

(Translation):

I could quote many more. Last April it was stated in La Presse that Grand'Mere Knitting, and GM Handcraft of Grand'Mere recently closed down, which left 300 workers out of a job. That brings me back to a speech delivered some time ago in the town of St. Hyacinthe by the Secretary of State.

He said then, in a speech which was probably well delivered because it was well written:

In the field of textiles, the minister explained, history proves that the Conservatives have always been leaders in government action designed to protect this basic industry. Apart from helping to set up one of the first textile unions in Canada, the Conservative party has constantly sought to protect this industry. Since 1935, however, the rights that protected it have been steadily eroded by Liberal governments. Since 1939, the protective tariffs voted by the Bennett government have lost their effect. Protection for our textile products against imports from low wage or soft money countries was partly removed after the war. The Liberal party is responsible for the present problems, due to its failure to endorse the policy of Mr. Bennett.

Since its election to office in 1957, the member for Bellechasse asserted, the Conservative party has made it a point to take important steps to promote and protect this industry which had been neglected by the Liberals.

I should have liked the minister to quote figures. But he did not, probably knowing what has happened to the textile industry since 1957.

Let me quote a few figures. Since last year, cotton imports from the United States have risen by 240 million yards. It is the first time in Canadian history that we imported more cotton than we manufactured.

From 1954 to 1960, Japanese imports jumped from $4 million to $41 million. From 1958 to last year, imports from Hong Kong jumped from $3 to $10 million.

General imports from Japan increased by approximately 170 per cent.

I could have told him also that since the Conservative party took over, some 30 textile industries have closed down in Ontario and Quebec.

I could have told him that only this past year 900 workers have lost their job.

I have here a pamphlet from the primary textile industry association which has its headquarters in Montreal. Here are a few paragraphs from that pamphlet:

> The demand for Canadian textile in 1970 would secure jobs for some 110,000 workers only, someone stated at the special Senate committee on manpower and employment on February 23, 1961.
> The only hope of substantially increasing the present number of some 74,000 workers employed in the Canadian textile industry would be to replace imports by domestically made products, says a brief of the primary textile institute. We have to choose between imports and jobs.
> The 33 page brief, signed by the chairman of the board, Mr. George H. Dobbie, and by the president, Mr. W. M. Berry, says: The rapidly growing labour force in Canada will need more jobs. While lucrative jobs are commendable objectives, no doubt they must be created to a certain degree within the professions where they are supplied in sufficient number in comparison with investments and sales.
> That study prepared by an outstanding economist shows that the manpower natural growth is such that within the next five years we shall have to provide jobs for one million more workers. That represents 200,000 new jobs a year until 1965. In 1960, only half that number has been provided.

That shows that there is a backlog in the creation of 200,000 new jobs a year.

I should like to tell the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) that textile manufacturers are not satisfied with the result of discussions held with regard to the establishment of quotas on goods imported from Japan.

Indeed, in certain sectors, quotas have been increased, while in others they have been cut down.

Quotas on blouses and shirts have gone up by 3 per cent for 1961 shipments.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

The quotas on knitted goods have been increased by 10 per cent.

There was a decrease for other goods, such as table linen, ranging about 10 per cent. There was also a reduction of 10 per cent in the case of knitted goods of textile fibre, etc. But on the whole, imports from Japan have not been reduced as much as we would have liked in the interests of the textile industry.

A greater number of jobs could have been provided in Quebec and in Ontario where 80 per cent of those industries are located.

Mr. Speaker, other basic industries will be affected as well. I refer particularly to the shoe industry. I would have liked the Secretary of State also to mention that primary industry of the province of Quebec.

In 1956, two and a half million pairs of canvas shoes were manufactured in Canada. In 1960, we were importing 69 per cent of our requirements in that field.

In 1956, we were importing a million pairs of rubber shoes; in 1960, we imported 4,750,000 pairs or 36.8 per cent of our requirements.

As far as electronics is concerned, a report handed out to the Prime Minister and to all the members gives figures indicating that before long, electronics will have disappeared from this country.

In 1956, we had 28 electronics plants. In 1960, only 18 of these remained.

From 1955 to 1959, the number of jobs in that industry went down by 28 per cent. I am told that there was another substantial decrease in 1960.

Imports of radios started when the Conservative party came to power in 1957.

In fact, in 1956, we were not importing radios. We imported 69,000 in 1957; 156,000 in 1958; 395,000 in 1959 and 692,000 in 1960, that is 77 per cent of the Canadian demand.

Besides creating unemployment, those imports made us lose revenues resulting from sales and excise taxes. In fact, in 1959, we lost on radios, $750,000 worth of taxes which we would otherwise have had if those radios had been made in Canada.

This is how it works. The 11 per cent sales tax and the 15 per cent excise tax apply on the basis of $20.35 for a radio made in Canada whereas for a similar 6-transistor radio made in Japan, those two taxes apply only on $13.20, which means a difference of $1.87 in the yield of those two taxes. If this figure is multiplied by the number of imported sets, we get a total of $750,000 for 1959 and $1.3 million for 1960.

The Canadian electronic appliance manufacturers association made recommendations to which I give full support.

The first one is to eliminate the excise tax of 15 per cent on products from our industries.

Second, to limit imports to 10 per cent of the sales of our industries.

Third, to use the same valuation for purposes of taxation in the case of imported products as in the case of Canadian products.

If we turn now to the situation of the electronic tube industry, we find that in 1956, no electronic tubes were imported from Japan. In 1960, we imported $3.9 million worth of these tubes at a price of 29 cents each, that is 45.6 per cent of the total Canadian production. That means that we are now producing only 54.4 per cent of our needs, when in 1956 we were producing 100 per cent.

United States imports amount to only 1.7 per cent of their total production, while ours represent nearly 45.6 per cent of our requirements.

This means a lesser number of workers in electronics. In fact, between January 1, 1959 and October 31, 1960, there was a reduction of 34.5 per cent.

The federal treasury also suffered a heavy loss of revenues derived from excise and sales taxes, owing to those price differentials and the disappearance of our Canadian industries.

The recommendations submitted by the electronic tube industry association were the same as the ones put forward by the Canadian electronic industry association.

Recently, following an exchange of correspondence with the Canadian General Electric Company Limited, I received a letter dated November 30, 1960 over the signature of Mr. A. F. Johnston in which the latter made very appropriate observations on the electronic tube industry in Canada. He said, among other things:

> Today, the electronic tube industry and the Canadian people are faced with serious problems arising from the imports from Japan of certain types of electronic tubes. In 1956, no such tubes were imported. We figure, however, that those imports will reach 5.7 million units for the year 1960, that is 45.6 per cent of the total Canadian production. Those figures illustrate the serious disruption caused by those imports to our Canadian production.
> That situation only makes worse the ills already affecting the electronic industry and the whole of Canada.
> 1. Unemployment extending to 23 per cent of the electronic industry is growing constantly.
> 2. The electronic industry cannot succeed in establishing profitable operation bases for the future —the present situation, in that field, is worsening and cannot be readjusted unless the government takes the necessary measures.
> 3. Closing of plants producing material which is essential to national defence.
> 4. Eventual dissolution of the electronic industry.
> 5. No benefit to the consumer.
> 6. Loss of revenue for the government on:
>
> (a) sales and excise taxes
> (b) corporation tax
> (c) personal income tax
> (d) customs tariffs underestimated as a result of too weak a market value if, of course, the statistics given are accurate.
> That situation can take even more alarming proportions, because as soon as the Japanese manufacturers have succeeded in closing down the electronic tube industry, they can and will surely rapidly develop the export of electronic components including complete electronic frames. Those new tactics will force the assembly plants of the Canadian electronics industry out of business, and undoubtedly other sectors of the secondary Canadian industry will eventually have the same fate.

Still, Mr. Speaker, last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) made definite efforts to increase the production of Canadian secondary industries. Many conferences were held to develop our markets and encourage our industry to increase production. And what do we see now? In the budget that he revealed to us some time ago, there is no measure capable of encouraging industry, and the efforts of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are futile. Just to prove that what I am saying is right, I shall quote some figures I take from the publication "The Agricultural Situation in Canada" of May 1961, where it is shown that total industrial production for the month of January 1961 was 4.2 per cent lower than that of January 1960.

The same publication indicates also that corporate profits, before taxes, have decreased by 5.9 per cent for the year 1960 as compared to 1959.

The publication also says that our exports for the first two months of 1961 have decreased by 3 per cent.

I might add that the volume of durable goods produced in January 1961 is 11.2 per cent lower than that of January 1960, and 6 per cent lower than the monthly production in 1959.

It is obvious from these statistics that there is no co-ordination between the policies of the Minister of Finance and those of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, there are other remarks I could make on the textile industry. The reason I spoke at some length on this subject was to answer the Secretary of State's claim that I know little about this matter. I can tell him there are many textile mills in my constituency, and that I have been concerned with this problem ever since my election to this house. I even listened to the speech made by the Minister of Finance in 1957, when he came to Drummondville, in my constituency, to discuss the textile problem.

However, I would not want to end my remarks without reverting to another matter that is close to my heart: agriculture.

Agricultural problems have been discussed at great length in the house. They have been studied in committee of the whole, in the committee on agriculture and colonization, and suggestions have been made. Today, the agricultural situation is no better than six months or a year ago.

On the basis of the policies announced in the budget, it is not expected that the agricultural situation will improve under a Conservative government. In fact, according to page 6 of the May 1961 issue of Agricultural Conditions in Canada, the index of agricultural prices on the farm dropped 2 per cent from December 1960 to February 1961. Moreover, here is what I find on page 7 of the same publication:

> Price indexes for goods and services used by farmers—in 1960, the composite index for all of Canada excluding the "living cost" factor rose by 2.7 per cent, or 7.2 points, in relation to 1959. reaching 276.7 (1935-39 = 100). The index for January 1961, at 271.8, is lower than the average for 1960, but is higher by 1.9 per cent than the corresponding index of 266.7 for January 1960.

I could speak at length on the question of revenue and farmers in this country, but I have a few words to say about the Canadian wheat board. I am not critical of the Canadian wheat board because it has played a role in the past and will in the future. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Milligan) who said on April 11, 1961—and he should be commended because I feel he knew what he was talking about and spoke in a consistent and intelligent way. He said:

> I surely agree that the grain commission is doing an excellent job concerning the sale of grain. I think we have there an example of planned marketing which has proved to be good. My only wish is that we could apply the same marketing system to a number of other products because then agriculture would not be in its present bad situation.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

And the hon. member went on to say that the wheat board was a fine organization. I readily endorse his remarks. However, I might ask what the Canadian wheat board has done to help eastern farmers, especially last fall.

When the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were under consideration, I talked about the Canadian wheat board and more particularly about the losses incurred last fall by eastern farmers with regard to the delivery and the prices of feed grain. Last fall feed grain was hard to get and when we succeeded in getting some, we had to pay quite a high premium. The reason was that the Canadian wheat board had no authority to store grain for the milling of feed for eastern farmers. This matter was dealt with at length during consideration of the Canadian wheat board report which was concluded yesterday.

I must say at this stage that I was most disappointed to notice that few members of the province of Quebec attended the four meetings of that committee. In fact, there was only one Conservative member and he stayed only an hour.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has run out.

(Text):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after having trespassed upon the patience of the house at very great length in introducing the budget on June 20, it is with some diffidence that I rise now to conclude the debate on the main opposition amendment. However, Mr. Speaker, I say in extenuation of this circumstance that, under the rules, this is the last opportunity that I have to speak in the budget debate or offer a reply to anything that has been said in the debate up to this point.

I thank those hon. members who have spoken in this debate, and especially those who have spoken in a kindly fashion about the budget. May I say that the reception accorded the budget generally throughout the country has been unusually favourable and is indeed very gratifying. It is evident that the country welcomes the broad and comprehensive program of constructive action put forward in the budget. Today, Mr. Speaker, by reason of the limitation of time I must confine myself to several points that have been raised in the discussion by hon. members of the opposition who have spoken. In coming to those various matters, of which I shall be discussing several, may I ask hon. members to consider first what are the results of the budget as visible to date in the eight days that have passed since its delivery.

First of all, in regard to the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar, which measures the external value of the dollar and not its internal value in terms of domestic transactions in Canada, may I say that in keeping with the purpose of the budget the Canadian dollar has moved to a discount of approximately 3 per cent in terms of the United States dollar.

Mr. Benidickson: At the moment only by talk. We will see.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will have to ask the hon. member to control himself because time is limited and I am trying to conclude my remarks so that there may be an earlier vote, which I understand is the wish of hon. members opposite.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, a considerable measure of stability has been developed which I think is very gratifying. The next observation, Mr. Speaker, has been the view taken by the financial markets of this country in the eight days that have passed. It must be, in the light of the alarm sounded by hon. members opposite, gratifying that in the eight days that have intervened since the budget the financial markets of this country are stronger than they were before the budget was introduced.

Mr. Benidickson: Equity grabbers after your budget reacted to fear of inflation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member is going to persist, then I am not going to be able to finish in time as I was endeavouring to do. I shall have to deal with these silly and misleading interjections. It rests entirely with him.

In all categories of Canadian bonds, short, medium and long term, the fact is that these Canadian issues are stronger now than they were when the budget was introduced. Correspondingly, the interest yields on these bonds in the market today has been reduced accordingly. I think this is a very good test of the degree of confidence engendered in the government's financial program in the appraisal to which the country has submitted it.

I now come to these specific criticisms. The tenor of observations of hon. members opposite has revolved around first, the reduction in the external value of the Canadian dollar; second, the deficit; and third, the danger, as they see it, of inflation. Let me say that while I propose to reply to their observations, it is not because they put them forward with any semblance of a constructive approach. Indeed, the observations of hon. members opposite on these subjects have been singularly unproductive of ideas or proposals. Indeed, I think it not unfair to say that hon. members opposite have avoided suggesting solutions like the plague.

Mr. Benidickson: Last year and the year before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is up to the hon. member.

Let me speak now about what hon. members say with regard to the dollar. Their criticism has been harsh. They have viewed the decline in the external value of the Canadian dollar by these three percentage points with fear and foreboding. There has been a great confusion on the part of hon. members opposite, a cacophony of discordant and contradictory voices. I take you back very briefly, Mr. Speaker, to the national Liberal convention of December last. It was stated there, and it has been stated elsewhere by what were thought to be authoritative voices in the Liberal party, that this party opposite wanted a lower exchange value for the Canadian dollar. It is commonly understood that Mr. Walter Gordon, who is regarded as a very important spokesman for the Liberal party on financial questions, favoured this course. He was chairman of the resolutions committee of the Liberal national convention. What has Mr. Gordon been saying? He has been reasonably consistent on this subject. On March 17, 1961, he stated:

> We need instead an expansionist approach to economic policy: easier credit, lower interest rates and a lower exchange rate for the dollar.

Again, we have Mr. Gordon saying this on June 5, 1961. He decries what he calls the tight money policy and then he goes on to say this:

> The government should state its firm intention to see that the present artificially high exchange rate for the Canadian dollar is reduced in order to stimulate business activity in Canada.
> This should be brought about by the proposed changes in monetary policy and reduction in interest rates, coupled with skilful operation of the foreign exchange fund. However, if in the opinion of the authorities more direct action would be needed in addition to accomplish some measure of devaluation, they—> —should not hesitate to take it.

Meaning the government.

Mr. Speaker, these are the things we have proposed in the budget. These are the things that hon. members opposite are criticizing. May I say that I will take Walter Gordon's opinion before I will take the opinion on such questions of any hon. members opposite who have spoken in this debate.

Here is Mr. Gordon on this same occasion again on June 5. He states:

> But at present much of our own resources are idle and unemployment, not inflation, is the main problem that confronts us.

I ask hon. members opposite to bear that in mind when I come back to that theme. Again here is a report on that Liberal meeting, the meeting of Liberal minds in Kingston last September. It is a report in the Ottawa Journal of September 7, 1960. Here we have a reference to Mr. Gordon's statement there:

> The best immediate step to assist such industries he thought would be in reducing the present high value of the Canadian dollar.

Here we have a report of January 10, 1961, reporting on the Liberal national convention. They are advocating lower interest rates to remove the premium on the Canadian dollar. Again, here is the Toronto Telegram of January 10, 1961, reporting a speech made at the convention by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). This is what he advocates:

> Maintain, through a "flexible monetary policy", lower dollar exchange rates to aid both the tourist industry and export trade.

Again here we have, on January 11, 1961, another report from that convention:

> New monetary policies would stimulate exports and improve Canada's position by lowering the value of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways. They have turned their backs on what was said at the convention. That is only five months ago. They have thrown the convention platform overboard if they mean what they have been saying in this debate so far on this subject, and it is evident they have thrown overboard what Mr. Gordon has been saying, presumably on their behalf. They have repudiated their platform in this regard. They have repudiated Mr. Gordon.

We say that this movement of the Canadian dollar to this present position is going to aid trade, to aid employment and to aid in redressing the imbalance in our international payments. In this respect the policy of this budget is a continuation of the same policy that was put forward before the house in the two budgets introduced in 1960. Following the budget of March 31, 1960 there was a reduction in the external value of the Canadian dollar. Following the supplementary budget of December 20, 1960 there was a further reduction. This present budget carries further the same progress. This budget is completely in accord with the purposes of those two budgets of 1960.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

I pass now to the next subject which has engaged the attention of hon. members opposite. They complain about the deficit. They see no virtue in the deficit that has been proposed in this budget. They picture the country as going to blue ruin because of this deficit.

It is a large deficit admittedly, Mr. Speaker. It could have been reduced. I could have recommended to the house a budget that would have contemplated a smaller deficit. I could, for instance, have proposed that there would not be any tax reductions. We would have had a smaller deficit if I had not proposed tax reductions. We would have had a smaller deficit if we had not proposed to increase the benefits to veterans in the form of pensions and allowances at this session. Do hon. members opposite wish to see the deficit reduced by denying those pensions and allowance increases to the veterans? My colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) this afternoon reminded us that in the aid this government has given to the provinces and their institutions since we came into office we have moved up, as compared with the last fiscal year before we came into office, the payments to or for the benefit of the provinces from $690 million in that year to $1,470 million in this year. Is it any wonder that we have a deficit? The deficit has arisen by reason of the tremendous increase we have made in these payments to and for the benefit of the provinces. These are transfer payments.

Hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. They talked out of both sides of their mouths throughout this debate. This is not a new tactic. They proposed deficit financing at their convention and they have been saying the same thing since then. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) will not mind if I remind him of a report in the Toronto Daily Star of last September in which he is reported as saying that he would not favour deficit budgeting in normal times. He was asked if these were normal times and he said no, that they are not normal times. He is on record elsewhere. Here he is at the Liberal convention last January proposing a deficit. He calls it a planned deficit. Ours is certainly a planned deficit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a result of deliberate policies and decisions. Make no mistake about that fact, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition has advocated deficit financing for times like these. However, it seems that his followers believe in deficits when Liberals bring them in but that they do not believe in deficits in these circumstances when a Conservative government brings them in. That is the difference.

Do not take my word for it, Mr. Speaker. I have here a statement made last week by Dr. Donald E. Armstrong of McGill University, in a speech he made over the radio. He was speaking first of all about the program proposed by the governor of the Bank of Canada in the statement he put out a week ago Monday, June 19; that is the one that had been sent to me in confidence last February. Of it he says this:

> But judged on its key recommendations, the Coyne budget is just sheer nonsense. The idea of balancing a budget and increasing taxes in order to fight a recession is ridiculous. As far as I am concerned the Coyne budget has shown me that Mr. Coyne's area of incompetence extends far beyond monetary policy, and that he is equally badly informed on matters of trade and fiscal policy.

And further:

> Mr. Coyne is really only the chief propagandist of bad economics. He has achieved that position partly because he is a forceful and persuasive speaker, and partly because he has control of the central bank's propaganda machinery which enables him to spread his nonsense effectively at the expense of the taxpayer.

And further:

> Against this back drop of stagnation, how does the budget look? To me it looks just fine. In its total effects it is very much what the country needs.

And further:

> A $1 billion cash deficit is just about what the economy needs to lengthen and strengthen the upswing. The cash deficit is a measure of the additional spending power which is being pumped into the economy. Provided that it is accompanied by an appropriate monetary policy, this additional spending will be translated into additional employment.

Mr. Speaker, that is what we have in mind and that is what we have proposed to the house in asking the approval of the house. Hon. members opposite will have their opportunity of being judged by what they have said in this debate or the things they have said outside which are contradictory of the things they have said in this house.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) —if he does not mind my reminding him of what he said in the T.V. press program last Thursday night—said, speaking of what would have happened if he had been leading the government at this time, "We would have had a deficit too". So, Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite who have been critical of the deficit apparently have decided to repudiate what has been said on their behalf by their leader and elsewhere.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the minister has quoted me. I know he would like to quote me accurately and I dislike interrupting him, but he stated that I said we would have had a deficit. What I said in this broadcast was that we would have had a deficit in 1958, when we were in a recession; but now, according to the minister, we are not in a recession any longer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, I simply quote the words of the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker. By reason of the limitation of time I cannot dwell on this. He said last Thursday night, "We would have had a deficit too".

Mr. Pearson: In 1958 and 1959.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the Leader of the Opposition say now that he would not be budgeting for a deficit if he were doing the budgeting today? If he does say that, Mr. Speaker, he is contradicting what the Liberal national convention proposed and he is contradicting what Mr. Walter Gordon has been saying. Here is what Mr. Walter Gordon said on June 5, 1961, and here he was laying out in his speech at Simcoe his proposals for the coming budget:

> The Minister of Finance will be budgeting for yet another deficit, and it is difficult to see how, in the circumstances, any over-all reduction in taxes could be justified at this time. This is particularly true if the authorities really believe, as the Prime Minister suggested in a recent speech, that the end of the recession is in sight. In fact, if the authorities expect a substantial improvement in business conditions in the near future, some increases in taxation even may be called for.

Are hon. members opposite calling for increases in taxes? Well, Mr. Coyne did. He called for increases in personal income taxes; he called for increases in corporation taxes, indeed such a rate of increase in corporation taxes as would have set back recovery in this country perhaps very seriously; he called for increases in tariffs on everything coming into the country; he called for a federal gasoline tax, and other things.

These are the contributions to the solution of our existing problems that hon. members opposite appear to be advocating. So far as I am aware, hon. members opposite have chosen to ignore what has been said in the budget speech; the concrete proposals for dealing with the problem of maintaining confidence and strengthening the financial markets. They have not been saying very much about the constructive proposals put forward here with regard to providing a purchase fund so that $100 million may be available this year for purchases of bonds in the open market to strengthen that market, particularly the medium and long term end of it. They have not said anything about the constructive proposal to remove the overhang upon the market in the form of the securities held by the unemployment insurance fund. They have not said anything about the constructive proposals we have put forward in regard to the marketing of new issues. They have chosen to ignore these.

They have chosen instead to try to break down confidence and make the country think that we are in for a horrible experience of inflation. That leads me, Mr. Speaker, to say this. They are talking as though the finances of this country are in a shaky condition. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the house at this point, in trying to save time, to put on the record figures that have been taken from official government records calculating the net debt per capita in this country in the years 1950 to 1961 and as a percentage of gross national product. May I have leave, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to incorporate this table?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: Just one clarification, Mr. Speaker, before those figures are tabled. Did the minister say, the net debt, or the net and government guaranteed debt?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said, the net debt on a per capita basis and as a percentage of gross national product.

Mr. Benidickson: Prepared by whom?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are from government records, Mr. Speaker. The net debt per capita in Canada in 1950 was $849.23; in 1961, $687.98. Net debt. As a percentage of gross national product, in 1950, 70.7; in 1961, 34.6. Is this country going to the bow-wows? Is it heading for blue ruin, as hon. members opposite picture it? Is there any need for lack of confidence in the future of this country?

Mr. Benidickson: Sound as a bell.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are the answers. Briefly, Mr. Speaker, I must say a word about inflation.

[Editor's note: the table above referred to, follows:]

Net Debt Per Capita and as a Percentage of GNP

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a point of order. The minister has been courteous enough to discuss with me the possibility of an earlier vote to meet a personal convenience. I think in the circumstances I would like to withdraw that request and give him the full time for his remarks.

Mr. Benidickson: Give him the other 15 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition. The matter of accommodation here is one in which I think hon. members wish to extend mutual co-operation. I will try to be brief in my comments so that there may be no unecessary time taken. Mr. Speaker, the third matter is inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the vote is to be taken when the minister has finished?

Mr. Pearson: I think in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the minister should not feel inhibited by any request I made and he should be allowed to go on until a quarter to six.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that I will endeavour to finish before a quarter to six.

Mr. Hellyer: He is not saying anything; let him talk on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is very helpful indeed, as one would expect.

An hon. Member: You were not here when he started; you just got in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My third subject, Mr. Speaker, is inflation. Hon. members opposite have referred to speeches I have made over the past several years on the subject of inflation. Let me make it abundantly clear here and now that I take back not one word that I have been saying in any of those periods on the subject of inflation. Two years ago we were faced, in the view of many people in this country, with a serious threat of inflation. Indeed, I have had a good deal to say on this subject. But the climate has changed now and what I am saying now, and what leading Liberals have said in their better and clearer moments, is that the major problem now is not inflation; that the threat of inflation has eased and we can address ourselves now more directly to the problem of unemployment.

Mr. Benidickson: That was last year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what Mr. Walter Gordon said recently; he said that very plainly; and that is what hon. members opposite have said in their clearer moments. Hon. members opposite in this debate, however, have been telling us we were wrong to fear the threat of inflation a couple of years ago. They were telling us then that there should have been expansionist policies; they would have introduced expansionist policies then. If they had had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, the results would have been very serious and damaging. But conditions are different now. Now is the time, however, when hon. members opposite are standing up and criticizing a budget that, in response to the conditions of 1961, aims at expansion of the economy. Now they are critical of an expansionist budget and they have said the most extraordinary things. They have held out the picture of the government turning on the printing presses. Every hon. member opposite knows in his heart that there is no thought on the part of this government of extending any countenance whatever to inflation or turning on the printing presses. An hon. member of this house resorting to the worst kind of buffoonery stood up here not long ago and tore pieces off a dollar bill. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as he got out of the house that evening—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not tear it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —he patched up the dollar bill with scotch tape and probably rushed off to the bank, perhaps even to the Bank of Canada, to present it as a damaged dollar to get back a brand new dollar bill in its place. But after he had finished his performance here he sat down and pounded his desk in applause of his own speech.

They picture this budget as threatening inflation. Well, here is Mr. Walter Gordon who wrote for the Toronto Daily Star on October 15, 1960. He said: "It is unemployment and not inflation that is the immediate menace." How can members opposite contradict Mr. Walter Gordon? Here again the Daily Star sets forth Mr. Walter Gordon's proposals, 12 of them, with illustrations. No. 4 says: "Produce more goods and import less." Hon. members opposite have very short memories. In fairness to Mr. Walter Gordon who has been doing his best to help them they should not repudiate him now in the way they have been doing in this debate. This is a scandalous way to use a very important ally.

They are pretending that the cost of living is going to rise as a result of this budget and they seize on an observation made by a man in the baking business suggesting that the result is going to be an increase in the cost of bread. They have been trumpeting this all over.

Mr. Benidickson: Every economist says so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member opposite had better not call himself an economist yet.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not say I was. I said every economist says so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And I say every economist does not say so, and when the hon. member makes that statement he is talking plain, unadulterated nonsense.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, you have said that before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, following upon the budget and the decline in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar, the wheat board raised the price of wheat by five cents per bushel. The action taken by the wheat board in increasing its asking price for all grades of wheat and in all positions followed traditional policy and, what is perhaps more important, is justified under existing circumstances. If Canadian wheat prices had not been brought in line with the new exchange value of the Canadian dollar, we would have, in effect, offered wheat on the world market at a lower price and this would have had several results, all of which appear undesirable.

First are the international aspects. Wheat is an international commodity and prices are highly competitive. Any major reduction in the overseas price of Canadian wheat would undoubtedly have been met by our competitors.

Second, there are domestic aspects. It follows that as far as wheat exports are concerned, an increase in the price of wheat was the only feasible alternative if our western farmer is to benefit from the downward adjustment of our dollar. And, Mr. Speaker, the benefit to the western wheat farmer was one of the purposes of this budget. Make no mistake about that.

Let us see this matter in its true proportions. Of course, this meant that Canadian millers would also have to pay a higher price for wheat. However, the impact of this on the cost of making a loaf of bread is very small, and it is difficult to see any justification for the claims of at least some elements of our baking industry to the effect that they would have to increase the price of bread to the consumer by one cent per loaf. I understand that an increase in the price of wheat by five cents per bushel will account only for about one eighth or one ninth of a cent per loaf of bread, and a 24-ounce loaf at that. Consequently, the change in the price of wheat, taken by itself, should not lead to a rise in the price of bread. Unless there are other and additional factors which make it difficult to hold the price line, the bakery industry should be able to absorb this increase of one eighth or one ninth of a cent for a 24-ounce loaf of bread. So I do not think we need to be much impressed by these bogeys which are being raised by hon. members opposite.

I have said in the budget speech, and I repeat it now, that in my opinion the effect on the cost of living in Canada as a result of the reduction in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar will be minimal. I repeat that.

I shall not have time to go into detail on the subject of the alternative proposals put forward by the governor of the Bank of Canada but I think I have said on other occasions enough about this to indicate why they were in their principal aspects unacceptable. Let me make one further observation on this subject. When the governor of the bank, in the shocking statement which he put out the day before yesterday and which has been distributed since all over Canada in envelopes of the Bank of Canada bearing the mark of the postage meter of the Bank of Canada, each worth 17 cents postage—when he says in that statement that the budget had been changed as a result of his putting out that statement on Monday he is uttering a monstrous and total untruth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the budget has been changed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The budget has been changed many times up to the last minute and there were many changes in this budget, but not one of them had anything to do with anything that the governor was putting forward or with the statement the governor put out on the Monday in violation of the confidence in which that statement was sent to me in February. So this statement on his part is completely untruthful and misleading.

Finally—and I am compressing my remarks—we have before us and are now about to vote upon an amendment which invites the house to express its lack of confidence in the government. It winds up by saying the government is not entitled to the confidence of the elected representatives of the people. Nothing could be plainer than that description of an invitation to the house to express want of confidence in the government. It was interesting, however, to find that one new hon. member of the house went a step further. The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) went a step further. She was not content to ask the house to say that it has no confidence in the government but she said, as reported at page 6923: I can only say, Mr. Speaker: "Take us to the country."

An hon. Member: She meant to the cleaners.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): She continued:

> "How hon. gentlemen opposite would then find out what the feeling of the country is... with respect to the trifling proposals which were placed before us on Tuesday night."

And then, when she was asked the question by another hon. member of this house whether she was speaking for her party when she made that remark, she replied:

> I am a member of my party. I know they are people of courage, that they have been responsible for a great government, and will be again shortly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hon. members opposite did not take in quite as much territory in their amendment. This amendment invites the house to say it has no confidence in the government. It could just as easily, if hon. members had wished to do so, have asked the house to say that the country had no confidence in the government. That would have been the fulfilment of the kind of statement which the hon. member for Niagara Falls was purporting to make and she seemed to suggest that she was speaking for her party. Other hon. members opposite have been a little more cautious in this respect but in view of the fact that there has been an example here again of hon. members opposite trying to have it both ways, talking out of both sides of their mouths at the same time, perhaps the house should understand that this is a challenge that goes all the way and we are prepared to meet it on any basis.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Aye.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Benidickson) which was negatived on the following division:

C.B.C. GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAX, HALIFAX

Question No. 265—Mr. Morris:

1. Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pay grants to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on Canadian Broadcasting property?

Questions

2. If so, what is the formula used in the payment of such grants, and is the formula related to the so-called commercial tax rate or to the residential tax-rate applied by the city of Halifax to taxpayers?

3. What was the total grant paid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the city of Halifax in lieu of taxation on Canadian Broadcasting Corporation properties in (a) 1956 (b) 1957 (c) 1958 (d) 1959 (e) 1960?

4. What was the total accepted value of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation property on which the 1960 grant to the city of Halifax was based?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The present formula is the equivalent of real property taxes and is computed on the basis of the effective rate of the real property tax applied to the accepted value of C.B.C. owned and occupied property. The commercial or non-residential rate applied by the city of Halifax is now used.

3. (a) 1956, $4,696.35; (b) 1957, $8,243.60; (c) 1958, $21,612.60; (d) 1959, $21,611.60; (e) 1960, $22,849.20.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 29, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) presented the thirteenth report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he can give the house any information about the uranium contract negotiations with the United Kingdom, concerning which details have appeared in the press?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think there is nothing further to report at this time. The house has been made acquainted with the negotiations which took place in Ottawa a fortnight ago when Sir Roger Makins was here with a group of experts representing the United Kingdom. There were exchanges at that time, and arrangements were made for continued discussions at the official level after Sir Roger's return to the United Kingdom.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED NEW TREATMENT FOR DRUG ADDICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the attention of the minister's department been drawn to a report in the Vancouver Province of June 24, 1961, that success has been achieved in treating drug addicts of between two and 28 years' addiction with a natural substance known as DPN (diphosphopyridine) which has been reported by researcher Dr. Paul O'Hallaren in the United States. If so, is this new development being closely followed in view of the serious drug addiction problem in Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. Some days ago the chief of the narcotic control division of my department first heard of the drug mentioned by the hon. member, and immediately wrote to Dr. O'Hallaren in Seattle asking for any information he might be prepared to release covering his research work.

This substance has not been prepared or used in Canada to my knowledge, and I have asked that all possible information on its apparent value be obtained. It would seem that it is used to alleviate withdrawal symptoms when an addict is undergoing treatment for addiction to heroin.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SASKATOON—DISCONTINUANCE OF BENEFITS TO WESTEEL PRODUCTS EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister explain to the house why employees of Westeel Products of Saskatoon have had their unemployment insurance benefits discontinued even though neither a strike nor a walkout exists; and will the minister take immediate action to bring about a new interpretation of the regulations in regard to this and other like cases.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I want to inform him that this matter was brought to my attention some two weeks ago by the steel workers union, and at that time I asked the commission to undertake an investigation.

I am informed by the unemployment insurance commission that certain personnel were laid off at Westeel and that the management gave, as a reason for the lay-off, "anticipating a strike". Under the circumstances, I am advised that the unemployment office at Saskatoon had no alternative but to disqualify these people.

This is a matter which is covered not by the regulations but by the act itself. Section 63(1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act reads as follows:

An insured person who has lost his employment by reason of a stoppage of work attributable to a labour dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed, is disqualified from receiving benefit until

(a) a termination of the stoppage of work,

(b) he becomes bona fide employed elsewhere in the occupation that he usually follows, or

(c) he has become regularly engaged in some other occupation, whichever event first occurs.

In view of this I am informed that the officials had no alternative but to disqualify these people and that those laid off have been disqualified as of June 2.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if I might ask the minister whether he would look into the serious consequences of disqualifying people on grounds of an anticipated strike, and if he will consider introducing legislation to amend the act in this regard.

PAYMENTS TO PERSONS ATTENDING PRECENSUS SCHOOLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether persons who attended precensus schools in Toronto were paid for attending them by the unemployment insurance commission.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such thing happening. I do not know where the hon. member gets his information.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have information that a cheque was received by one of the persons attending such a course from Mr. R. W. Oliver, treasury officer, stating it was from the unemployment insurance commission. I wonder whether the minister would investigate.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONSTRUCTION OF LABORATORY FOR SALMON COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it a fact that the international salmon commission is building a laboratory at Cultus lake in the lower mainland area of British Columbia at a cost of $150,000?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. There is an item of $110,000 in the recently approved estimates of my department for construction of a research field station for the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission. This station is to be constructed at the lower end of Cultus lake for use by the commission in the study of fish behaviour, the effects of pollution, etc. Article VIII of the convention establishing the commission specifies that land acquired for use by the commission will be purchased by the country within whose territory it lies. This principle is being applied to construction of this station. On completion, however, the sharing of costs of operation will apply. The site has been acquired in co-operation with the Department of Public Works, and tenders for construction have been invited by this department.

Mr. McIlraith: The answer to the question is yes.

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REPORTED DAMAGE FROM DUMPING OF DEBRIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister please advise the house whether he has received a petition from the St. John's local of the Newfoundland federation of fishermen protesting against construction companies working on the St. John's harbour development project dumping debris outside the narrows of St. John's, thereby causing damage to the fishermen's nets? If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I want to thank the hon. member for Trinity-Conception for giving me notice of this question. The answer is no.

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister advise the house whether he has received any representations asking for a further extension of the lobster season in district 7B after July 5 and, if so, what decision if any has been reached in this regard?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Representations have been received requesting in some cases that the season be further extended and in other cases that it not be extended further. Up to date figures are now being compiled on the catch as of yesterday or the day before, I am not sure which. The catch has been heavy in the last few days, it would appear to be about a normal catch by July 5. No decision has yet been made, but I expect to be able to make a statement on the matter within the next day or two.

Mr. Russell H. MacEwan (Pictou): May I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has received a communication or telegram from the Northumberland fishermen's association representing fishermen from districts 7A and 7B, asking that the present lobster fishing season be not extended?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have received a communication from this organization, but as to their request I would not want to say categorically at the moment which side of the argument they are on. However, I should be able to give the hon. member a definite reply tomorrow.

SINCLAIR REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLIC HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries this question. Is the government planning to hold public hearings in Vancouver on the recommendations on fishing to be found in Dr. Sinclair's report? If so, can the minister indicate how soon such hearings will be held?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The department has now received comments on the Sinclair report from most of the interested groups in British Columbia. These comments are now being studied, and where necessary clarification of the views presented is being sought. A decision will be made as soon as possible with regard to the possibility of public hearings. If it is decided that public hearings would be advantageous, they will be held as soon as possible, but I would not want to forecast a date as to when they might take place.

GRAIN

ONTARIO WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DEDUCTIONS UNDER MARKETING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is in a position to tell the house whether the federal government has agreed to take action providing for authorized deductions from Ontario wheat farmers under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the fact that application has been made for the extension of the powers of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right, with regard to authorized deductions.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in that connection I can say only this. That matter is under review, and if any announcement is to be made it will be made in due course.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask another somewhat related question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the lateness of the season and the fact that July 1 marks the official and traditional recognition of Ontario farmers with regard to the growing of wheat, will the minister before that date announce the price with regard to Ontario grown wheat?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, last year the price was announced on July 22.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Too late.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The crop year ended on June 20 as the hon. member knows. Several products under the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act are before the government for consideration at the present time, and I hope to make an announcement within the next few days.

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS—INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to Ontario farmers, when may we expect an announcement concerning a floor price on soybeans?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the several products now before the government for consideration.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CROP CONDITIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his recent trip to the prairies, can he give the house a report on crop conditions as of yesterday and the day before?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was in Saskatchewan yesterday and the night before last I was in Winnipeg. Generally speaking the situation is one of grave seriousness in respect to the cattle fodder situation. Every endeavour will be made to meet the problem. In the course of a conversation with an outstanding leader in western Canada I was told that in the province of Manitoba, for instance, even with the fullest fodder assistance being given many cattle will have to be sold.

The situation in eastern Saskatchewan is also a repetition of those days in the past when drought struck the prairies.

With respect to the situation in Alberta, I think possibly tomorrow the Minister of Agriculture will be able to give a general outline of the position there and in the various parts of the western provinces. Suffice it to say the western farmer now faces one of those problems which exercise the hearts of men.

SHIPPING

CORNWALL—INQUIRY AS TO ADDRESSES OF PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask how many of the 24 pilots in the Montreal-Cornwall division and the 32 pilots in the Cornwall-Kingston division have given their address as Cornwall.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the information asked for by the hon. gentleman is statistical information of a kind Your Honour has ruled out of order repeatedly.

Mr. Speaker: It is that kind of information but if the hon. member has given notice and the minister is in a position to answer, I will allow the question.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has given me notice. I hope that all hon. members of the opposition paid close attention to what my hon. friend said. The answer is 7 in the Cornwall-Kingston division and none in the Montreal-Cornwall division.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I ask one supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is there any way of determining whether the 7 pilots referred to have only temporary summer addresses in Cornwall?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Speaker.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—HIRING OF GUARDS BY DRYDOCK COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is based on correspondence from persons interested in the welfare of labour on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Brunsden: And telephone calls.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the minister's announcement of the provision of substantial government subsidies to the shipping industry, and in view of the fact that it would be improper for public funds to be used to subsidize companies considered by organized labour to be anti-union or anti-labour, would the minister inform the house whether he has received any protests with respect to the hiring of guards from the United States-owned and controlled Pinkertons of Canada at the north shore Burrard drydock, particularly during the construction or repair of government subsidized shipping?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall receiving any representations about this matter. However, I will check my files.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—VISIT BY INSPECTOR TO JEAN TALON HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of National Revenue whether he has yet been able to find out from the department whether an inspector from the department visited the Jean Talon hospital to make an investigation and, if so, whether the department is in possession of a report from the inspector.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, an inspector of the department did visit the Jean Talon hospital just as inspectors of the department visit many other businesses during the course of their duties.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a supplementary question. Has the minister's temporary department taken note of and is it making a special effort to speed up its investigations into the various revelations before certain royal commissions in the province of Quebec with a view to collecting income tax?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not going to answer?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have answered the same question many times. I would simply point out that it is not public policy to give statements which would indicate various matters involving income tax procedures.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would ask the minister whether he does not think an exception might be made in this case—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as was done by the Minister of Labour when he wished to defame a certain unemployed person.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the possible adjournment of the house within the next 30 days may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can give any indication when he will be prepared to act or not act on the recommendations of the Bladen royal commission? For instance, is there a possibility of the government acting on this matter in September, if we come back?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Whenever it becomes a matter of government policy to make recommendations to the house in regard to this subject, of course the house will be made acquainted with the government proposals. I dealt with the subject in the budget speech, Mr. Speaker, inviting the house to take action in certain regards and pointing out that certain other recommendations of the Bladen royal commission will be the subject of discussion on the part of interested groups in the course of time. Beyond that, I think the hon. member must be aware that the budget has been put before the house and that we are asking for action on its proposals.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall deal with that this afternoon.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That will be something to look forward to, I am sure.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can give the house any information on the consultations which are now taking place with the United States government in regard to the recommendations of the O'Leary commission report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for many years the hon. gentleman occupied the position of secretary of state for external affairs and he realizes, of course, that any discussions that are continuing are not placed before parliament during the progress of the discussions.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I realize that, but I wondered whether the Prime Minister could give us an indication whether these discussions will be concluded in time for action this session on the recommendations of that report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have long since ceased to have any ideas as to how long this session is going to continue.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF QUESTIONS TO ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a matter with respect to two questions which stood in my name on yesterday's order paper but do not appear on today's. I refer to questions Nos. 238 and 239, which sought specific information about subventions and loans to incorporated companies other than crown corporations and which were phrased in such a way as to ask for such information from each department.

As shown on page 7224 of Hansard for yesterday, answers were filed to these two questions by the Minister of Agriculture and the answer given in each case was "nil". I think an error has been made in assuming that the questions had been completely answered, and as a result they were inadvertently dropped from the order paper. I would ask that questions 238 and 239 be restored to the order paper in order that each department may answer these questions, as was originally requested.

I say that this was perhaps done in error. Question No. 238 reads in part as follows:

> Since January 1, 1950, have any subventions been paid to any incorporated companies other than crown corporations?

The answer given by the Minister of Agriculture was "nil", yet we know that such subventions are paid, for instance, by the Canadian maritime commission to Northland Navigation Company on the west coast. I submit that the answer of the Minister of Agriculture can only apply to his department, and that the question should not be taken as having been completely answered. My request is that questions 238 and 239 be restored to the order paper in order that they may be answered fully.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has reason to be dissatisfied with the answers he is at liberty to restore the questions to the order paper, or I take it that he is at liberty at the appropriate time to complain about the insufficiency or inaccuracy of the answer. I am not sure that the hon. member is correct in asking the Chair to restore questions because he regards the answers as insufficient. It seems to me there are other remedies. However, I shall consider the matter.

AIR TRANSPORT

RENEGOTIATION OF U.S.-CANADA BILATERAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he has anything further to report on the meetings in Washington concerning the application of Canadian air lines for further air routes into the United States?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have nothing to report at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RESOURCES FOR TOMORROW—PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE BY HOMER STEVENS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether it is correct that Mr. Homer Stevens, the communist secretary of the fishermen's union in British Columbia, has been invited to participate in one of the panels of the national conference on resources for tomorrow, and whether this is the same Mr. Stevens who attended the preliminary conference in Montreal last fall.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not come to my attention. I shall investigate and bring in an answer to the hon. member.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLOWANCE TO POSTAL EMPLOYEES WORKING ON JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is it true that postal employees will be celebrating Dominion day this year as a statutory holiday without pay? And is it true that those postal employees required to work will not receive double time as is the recognized practice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will find the answer to his question if he looks back in Hansard. The matter was thoroughly dealt with a day or two ago.

[Mr. Speaker.]

HANDLING OF U.S. PUBLICATIONS REMAILED IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question. In view of the United States postal rate increase to 8 cents a pound for United States periodicals mailed to Canada, effective July 1, has the Canadian post office made preparations to handle a huge increase in remailing of United States periodicals in Canada which will take advantage of the much lower Canadian rate on such material?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we do not anticipate any huge increase. The substantial difference in rates will exist only for one month, since our new rate goes into effect on August 1, and it is not the custom for a publisher to make extensive changes in the way of handling his material for one month only.

I might point out that the reason our rate is underneath the United States rate is to compensate for the cost to the publisher of trucking or carrying this material from the United States to the Canadian point where it is placed in the mails. It is of very great interest and benefit to us to have this material placed in the mails in Canada, because if it is placed in the mails in the United States we are obliged to handle it anyway and we get no revenue whatsoever. We therefore established a rate which, together with the cost of transportation, is approximately equivalent to the United States rate thus getting as much revenue as possible.

COMBINES

RAW FISH—INQUIRY AS TO ACTIVITIES OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he is able to indicate to the house the activities of the restrictive trade practices commission as of this date with respect to hearings into the production, sale and distribution of raw fish, and whether there are still some court decisions that are barring those hearings.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I am not able to give my hon. friend the details as to the position with regard to injunctions, but there are still several injunction applications outstanding which make it impossible for the commission to proceed.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if, before adjournment, he could tell us whether he has been able to complete his study of the Clark report. If so, can he tell us when we may except an announcement of government policy pursuant to the assurances given by the Prime Minister in January of 1958?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): If the hon. member had been in the house last Saturday during the discussion of my estimates I am sure he would have been in a position to have my views.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the minister would ask the Prime Minister why I was not in the house on the day his estimates were introduced in this chamber.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Simply because the hon. member wanted to go home.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 28, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance took two hours and 40 minutes to deliver his budget speech, and some 37 or 38 minutes yesterday to deliver a further speech on it. Of that fact I have no complaint whatever. I think it was quite proper—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thirty two minutes, to be exact.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I think it was quite proper for the minister to do so. The point I wish to make is that I find it somewhat difficult, in the 30 minutes allowed to a private member, to deal thoroughly or adequately with the budget speech. I think the present budget is of such significance to the country that it deserves thorough and analytical examination rather than the shorter, somewhat abrupt treatment that may be given to certain points of it because of the requirement of completing my remarks within 30 minutes. To me it is a matter of regret that as a private member I do not have more time in which to deal with it as I should like to do.

This budget undoubtedly is significant to the economy of this country. It is of very real significance to the economy of this country this year, and I think a great many of its points have very dangerous implications and are of harmful significance. I should like to be able to analyse my reasons for making that statement in a somewhat more careful way than I will be able to do. Because of the time limit it is going to be necessary to leave out reference to many points I should like to discuss, and it also will be impossible to make a proper analysis of some of the points with which I will try to deal.

There is one thing I should like to point out to the minister before launching into a general discussion of the budget. That is that yesterday in his remarks he made the point that since the budget was delivered the financial markets of this country are stronger than they were before the budget was introduced. The term he used was "the financial markets". I point out to the minister that just last night's newspapers that were on so many desks at the very time he was making that statement, as was pointed out to me at the time—I did not interrupt the minister because I did not wish to consume any of his time—were to the very opposite effect. The Canadian Press story in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday evening was headed "Toronto stocks move downhill". That was supported by a subsidiary story on the Montreal market. The Citizen had a story to the same effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was the one day.

Mr. McIlraith: No; the story goes on to say "—continued the downhill move". I could read the lengthy story but I do not want to digress. It refers to the continuing downhill movement in stocks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will agree that I was speaking of bond values and the effect on interest yields.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point I wish to make. I trust the minister will bear with me. I tried to be courteous yesterday and not interrupt him because his time was limited. I will try to make my points as clearly as I can. The Montreal Gazette has the same type of story in this morning's issue headed "Market dips again". That is followed by a story headed "Bonds easier". I think what the minister was seeking to deal with was the bond market only and not the financial market generally. I want to point that out because the other statement is much too wide, as I think an analysis will bear out.

It seemed to me that the budget did not generally represent a well integrated document or program for the economy of this country for the coming year. It seemed to me to be rather a collection, indeed it could probably be called a conglomeration, of contradictory objectives. It is with some of those contradictions that I wish to deal today.

There was one interesting fact that came out of the minister's presentation. It was the rather startling revelation that the budget had not been prepared in conjunction or with the benefit of discussions with the governor of the Bank of Canada. I do not want to digress into a debate on that matter because there is a bill before the house and it can be discussed fully on another occasion. However I do want to point out that this lack of co-ordination of policies and of the benefit of the experience of that institution is very apparent in this budget. Indeed, from the minister's statement it is apparent that there had been a lack of co-operation and co-ordination of the Minister of Finance and his department with the Bank of Canada. That, to me, explains many of the inconsistent policies which the minister has revealed in the previous four budgets, and particularly in this one.

I for one got the impression from the minister's statement on that point in his budget speech, and again from his preoccupation last night with the governor of the Bank as opposed to budget matters which had been debated here, that he had been nurturing a grudge. Whether or not he is well justified is another matter which can be debated on the other bill. The point is that the Minister of Finance must assume the responsibility for not attempting to resolve the problem directly. That part of it must surely belong and rest squarely on the minister's shoulders. If the situation was as the minister described it—and those facts have not all been proven yet; they are the subject of controversy—surely the minister owed an obligation to this country to seek to reconcile the governor to his point of view during these last four years.

It is clear from the minister's own words that he was not doing that; and it is clear that had he followed that proper course and the reconciliation could not have been effected, the governor would have had no option but to resign. But to come forward and have the country suffer because the Minister of Finance, for reasons of his own, did not seek to reconcile the governor of the bank to his views in these matters is something that has sad consequences for the country, and those consequences are reflected in the budget itself.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of specific comments I wish to make on different aspects of the budget. I think by far the most inadequate portion of the minister's budget speech was the part devoted to international trade and international commercial policies. The minister, it seemed to me, did not develop that subject in the way that was his obligation in the circumstances this country is in at this time with relation to the international trade field. The speech contained no evidence at any point to show that the government realizes the urgency which is required on the part of this country to deal with the revolutionary changes that are taking place today in the field of international trade.

The wording of the speech was so similar to earlier speeches that one would think there had been no changes in that field since 1958. As a matter of fact I compared the objectives in that field which the minister expressed in his 1958 budget speech—those objectives will be found at page 1236 of Hansard of 1958—with the objectives given by the minister in his budget speech of this year, to be found at page 6650 of Hansard. It is rather interesting to find what that comparison shows. In 1958 the minister stated five objectives. In 1961 he lists only three. Upon close reading I discover that the 1961 objectives are in part a summary of the 1958 objectives, but there is one significant difference. I want to point out this significant difference and ask the minister to deal with it at an appropriate stage. I wish to quote two parts of these objectives to point out the difference. In 1958 objective No. 3 read:

> To support and promote a regime of law, order and morality in the field of international trade; to respect the spirit and intent of international commitments; and to stand ready to defend our rights and interests if they are challenged or ignored;

In the 1961 budget the same objective reads as follows:

> To support and promote a regime of law and order in international trade; to respect our international commitments; and to stand ready to defend our rights and interest.

I wish to point out to hon. members that there are several important differences. I do not intend to make any point of the fact that the minister apparently no longer wishes to support the promotion of a regime of morality in international trade. Of much greater importance, I think, is this point, which I think should be underlined and dealt with by the government on an appropriate occasion. The government apparently no longer intends to respect the spirit as well as the written content of our international commitments. Perhaps it was an error in drafting; I do not know. If it was, I point out to the government that it is a very substantial error, one which the minister must clarify and one with which he should deal on an appropriate occasion at greater length and with greater care than I am able to deal with it today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I could deal with it now if the hon. member wished. It would only take a moment.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister will surely bear with me. He had ample time in which to deliver his speech, and the house did extend him courtesy in that respect. After all, under our system of government we do discuss and debate these things. I am trying to be strictly relevant to the subject and deal with it as best I can, and surely the minister can abide by the usual rules of conduct in this house.

The minister made much of the use of the exchange fund in dealing with the balance of payments problem and the exchange rate. I point out to him that his remarks in this respect were extremely imprecise. I shall deal further with this matter later. The minister was going to lower the value of the Canadian dollar to an indefinite, unspecified level, and it seems to me that this is contrary to the spirit of the international monetary fund. This is an international agreement which Canada has assumed and which, indeed, we have always been meticulously careful to honour.

It seems to me there is a danger in the failure of the government to speak of the spirit of international commitments for the very good reason that we may be interpreted as not being prepared to live up to the spirit of our commitments in this connection. Indeed, there was a question asked by my colleague from Kenora-Rainy River about what consultations there had been on this point, and the answer was not very clear. Perhaps I can leave that point there. I hope the minister will deal with it fully on an appropriate occasion, because it could have important international implications particularly since our reputation in this field generally has been good, and one of which Canadians are proud.

Before elaborating on this question of international trade I should like to say one thing. It seems to me to be basic that before deciding on any policy there must be a clear analysis of the problem. This step must underlie any successful policy. To act on any other basis or to act on the basis of an inadequate analysis means that the policy itself will be erroneous and inadequate. I believe the minister would agree with me in this respect.

The point I wish to emphasize in relation to this field of international trade is that it seems to me the minister has failed altogether to appreciate the underlying problem. He has failed to make a competent or thorough analysis of the situation. He has failed to pay sufficient attention to the trend toward regional blocs, a trend which may, in many respects, be outside our control, but which nevertheless should not simply be ignored for that reason. There can be no adequate policy developed for Canada unless there is a recognition of what is going on.

I could elaborate a great deal, but it seems to me that in his budget the hon. gentleman has failed to take into account the developments taking place in connection with the European common market. He has failed to recognize the progressive and continuous movement of the outer seven into closer relationship with the European common market group. The minister will have noticed further news items on this very point in today's press. It seems to me that in dealing with our relationship to Great Britain the hon. gentleman has not adapted his mind to the fact that Britain may very well seek to move into the common market. I am not proposing to debate at this time whether she should or should not do so, because that is a matter which will be determined by the United Kingdom and it is not my intention to encroach upon decisions which must remain hers, but we have a very close interest in the subject. The minister's attitude has been in the nature of threats of retaliatory action if they take such a step.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Never.

Mr. McIlraith: My views on this subject were advanced in an earlier debate on April 24 and 25, on one of the supply motions. Perhaps I could leave them now without further elaboration. But there must surely be in this country a greater appreciation of these developments which are taking place, and an attempt to bring ourselves into a better relationship with the facts as they exist. This may involve our having to make some changes.

The minister made no reference at all to the Latin American free trade area which came into effect a few weeks ago. The whole subject is dealt with in the Montevideo treaty. That is something which should be acknowledged and it must be considered when policy is set for the future of this country. It is true that our dollar trade in that area last year was relatively small. I think our exports last year were of the order of $100 million. But the potential there is something which cannot be ignored, and this is certainly a bloc with a very large population. There is every indication that there may be a rapidly developing economy in that area.

It seems to me the minister's policy approach in this direction is completely inadequate. The hon. gentleman has ignored the situation. Indeed, in an earlier debate on the subject of trade I accused him of making speeches which were of a threatening nature, and I sought on that occasion to quote many items in support of my assertion. It seems to me that the same weakness is in his budget speech. It is not satisfactory, and for my part I think there must be a complete new examination and a movement forward to a more constructive position in our own self interest.

We have put forward a program. My leader did it particularly well in the debate to which I have referred and on several other occasions, so perhaps I need not restate the principles which we believe should be asserted in bringing ourselves into better alignment with these trade movements which are coming about in Europe. If we fail to do this, then the unemployment problem, which is a very real problem in Canada, will not be solved. It seems to me that the government has taken no step toward the solution of our trade difficulties in this respect.

Now I wish to turn to another subject, namely the minister's reference in his budget speech to the adjustment of the exchange rate. The minister proposes to use the exchange fund to add substantial amounts to its holdings of United States dollars through purchases in the exchange market. I wish to quote the minister precisely on that point. In dealing with the subject he said "It may well be appropriate for it"—that is, the exchange rate—"to move to a significant discount". That was the language he used. Then in a totally inadequate way he made the bald assertion that the decline in the exchange rate would mean modest price advances. In another place he said the price advances would be minimal. I believe those were the minister's exact words.

In his remarks yesterday the hon. gentleman sought to deal with the Liberal position on this issue. I think he did himself a great injustice in the quotations he used, because if he had taken the trouble to closely examine those quotations he would have seen they were dealing with the artificially high exchange rate in an attempt to reduce it from an artificially high level. I think all hon. members will agree that the balance of payments problem has been and is a very real one in Canada, and that our high exchange rate should be reduced; but that is not what the minister said in his budget speech. He did not take that line at all. He said that it may well be appropriate for it to move to a significant discount.

Hon. members will notice the looseness of language. The minister referred to "a significant discount", but did not say what was a significant discount. Did he have reference to the Canadian dollar being below the value of the United States dollar by the former rate of 20 per cent? Did he mean 10 per cent, 5 per cent, 2 per cent or 1 per cent? That kind of imprecision is not good enough for a minister of finance in dealing with this difficult and important subject. That kind of handling of this subject may have very serious effects on the economy of this country. The minister did not deal with this problem in a well integrated way.

The minister went on to say he was going to use the exchange fund, which I understand has about $1.8 billion or more of United States dollars. That is to say, the Canadian taxpayers have about that amount of United States dollars held in that account. Is he going to add to it? What amount will he add? What are the financial implications of that part of his speech? Did he take the financial implications into account in fixing his estimate of the deficit for this year? What is the minister's attitude on that? Nothing was said. Is it any wonder that there is uneasiness in the financial markets of this country? Is it any wonder that there is in those markets criticism of the minister's imprecision?

It is quite true that bringing down the Canadian dollar from its high level will give an admitted temporary advantage to our export industries. I think anyone would agree that that is desirable. I am sure there is no quarrel with that. But that desirable effect must be weighed against the consequences of what the minister has done in this budget by his attempt to bring down the exchange rate to an undefined significant discount. You will notice he is using the phrase "significant discount", and you take your choice as to what it means. The consequences of doing so may be very adverse to this country. It is that kind of looseness on the part of the minister in dealing with this important subject that caused me at the opening of my remarks to deplore the lack of a well integrated statement on the part of the minister, and the lack of the benefit of the experience of the Bank of Canada in the preparation of the budget.

Let me point out some of the adverse things that must be taken into consideration if the minister succeeds in bringing down the dollar, not to par but to a significant discount. Undoubtedly our cost of living will increase. I was rather shocked that the minister should have dismissed that subject so lightly. It is rather elementary. If you take the volume of imports to this country and consider that some are consumer goods, some are raw materials and some are semi-finished materials going into production, it means an increase in the cost of living. There was no assessment of that counterbalancing problem on the part of the minister. There was no attempt on his part to exercise the judgment and care that should be exercised on this subject so the problem could be dealt with in a way that would not have led to our backing into a worse and more destructive problem.

We must remember that this cost of living increase is coming at a time when the Ontario provincial government is placing a tax of 3 per cent on the sale of practically all goods. When one bears in mind the importance of Ontario to the economy of Canada in terms of population, productive capacity and so on, one can readily see how significant the cost of living increase may be this year at a time when we have a high level of unemployment and much unused capacity. The minister has not dealt with that in a thorough way in his budget.

The minister said he was going to reduce interest rates. That was an interesting statement to come from the minister who did so much to start the increase in interest rates, especially as a result of his mishandling of the conversion loan of 1958. First the interest rates were forced up as a result of his mishandling of that loan. He forced municipal borrowers and many corporate borrowers to go to the United States for their borrowings. If the minister succeeds in achieving a significant discount on our dollar he will force the municipal borrowers to pay a premium on their interest charges in the United States after having initially created the problem for them. He will place an added burden on the municipalities and corporations.

What is the minister's analysis of that problem in his budget speech? I simply do not find it. He simply said he is going to reduce interest charges. He did not tell us what impact his billion dollar borrowings this year would have on interest rates. Can one be blamed for suspecting that the implication of that is that it will tend to increase interest rates rather than lower them? I may be naive, but I thought the federal government going into the markets of this country and borrowing a billion dollars this year would lessen the money available for investment in corporation, municipal and provincial securities, and that it would have created considerable pressure to raise interest rates. But, no; the minister did not see fit to deal with that problem at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is going to use the printing presses.

Mr. McIlraith: Unfortunately that is what I am beginning to suspect. In any event, let me deal with another aspect of it.

The minister is concerned about that problem also. If he is truly concerned, why did he not in his budget deal with the consequences of bringing down the value of the Canadian dollar from its artificially high level not to par but to a significant discount? What effect will that have on United States investment in Canada? It will mean that investment in Canada will be more enticing to United States investors because with $100 of United States money American investors can purchase a larger share of ownership and more securities than they could purchase before the exchange rate was brought down to this significant discount. That is a problem that should be carefully analysed, and I regret that time does not permit me to do so. The minister has not dealt with these things which are inherent in this budget. These are the inconsistencies that show up in the budget.

I wanted to speak about one other thing. The minister said yesterday that we had not put forward positive recommendations. We have put forward positive recommendations as to what should be done to get us out of the economic difficulty in which we find ourselves. We put forward many matters that are strictly budgetary, on April 25 at page 3985 of Hansard and on May 3 at page 3402.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. McIlraith: Those recommendations have been supported by other speakers, and notably by the chairman of the national productivity council.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak briefly in this budget debate for two reasons. First of all, no one will deny that it is an important budget. One has only to look at the things pending in the world, so to speak, such as Britain's trading relation with Europe, our own attitude toward the organization of American states, and the question of aid to underdeveloped countries, as well as other problems. That is one reason I am glad to speak. The other is that I am glad to be speaking because I have an old relationship and friendship with the Minister of Finance and if I can do anything, however small, to help him on his way I am glad to do it. He and I shared a room here for four years. Of course many hon. members will sympathize with both of us for that reason, but we managed to come through it pretty well unscathed.

In my opinion the minister has been very realistic in what he has said, and I want to try to act in the same way. I am not going to deal with the points he dealt with yesterday, the questions of exchange, the deficit, the interest rate, particularly vis-à-vis the opposition, because I think he handled them adequately. I want to say just one word about what the hon. member for Ottawa West has been saying, namely the suggestion that the minister had not been sufficiently concerned with external trade, but that somehow that was being neglected. In that connection I suggest that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have really beaten a path to all kinds of discussions of this broad and important question, both in Europe and in the United States. I feel that any suggestion that it is being ignored or dealt with carelessly just does not click.

My anxiety today is to try to sense public opinion particularly as indicated by the press. In doing that it is useful to see what the enemy is saying. I have looked at those newspapers which we usually find taking the other side. Naturally I went first of all to the Winnipeg Free Press. One can always be sure that in the case of the Winnipeg Free Press, to adopt the words they used to use in the air force, we will get "loud and clear" expression of what they have to say, particularly in that left-hand column with which we are all so familiar. I was not disappointed. I found a couple of typical phrases. I imagine these phrases are probably in what I could call the cliche morgue. We know there is a morgue for photographs. They have them on hand when people die, and I imagine there is a morgue for cliches as well, and in a sense you pick them out perhaps with the help of a card index.

I found a couple of the usual things. First of all I found that the budget was motivated by "desperation and political expediency" and that "the government had decided to exert open and partisan political influence over the economy". Well, there you are. That is exactly what you would expect, and one would be disappointed if the Winnipeg Free Press did not come up with something like that. My feeling about that is that it can be answered in the words of the English yokel who was insulted by one of his friends. He passed it off by saying "It pleases he and it don't hurt I". I feel that is the attitude one can take toward that indomitable left-hand column of the Winnipeg Free Press.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

However, there was a contributed editorial by one signing himself "M.W.". It was not in the sacred left-hand column, it was in the middle. I was really quite astonished because common sense seemed to creep in there, and some things were said which I thought the writer would hardly dare to say. Let me quote just a few words. He said:

> The budget offers various new incentives to Canadian industry to undertake re-equipment, modernization of plant and greater research activity in Canada. These are important but like many of the other changes too detailed for consideration here.

It struck me that that was rather typical. When you come to good things they are "too detailed"; the good things done by this government are too detailed for much consideration in the Winnipeg Free Press.

I go back now to the left-hand column. We had, of course, the usual diatribe about high tariffs, entirely ignoring the loyalty which this government has shown to GATT and to the aims of increasing world trade. But again I say we must not take it too seriously. We must understand; we must realize that they just cannot help it, that they are born that way and these things have to be said. They are still living in the atmosphere of 1911, the time of the reciprocity campaign.

I come next to the Toronto Star, and really something happened that I would not have believed possible. I find myself sympathizing with the Toronto Star. I never thought I could do that. But when I found that in a short editorial they were forced to use words of approval of the Minister of Finance I said to myself these are new days. For the Toronto Star perhaps they are sad days, but they welcomed devaluation and lower interest rates. Of course they covered themselves by saying it was just their own idea which the Minister of Finance had copied. They went on to say that this should "stimulate business considerably".

Of course they had a complaint. The complaint was that the Minister of Finance is "not sure how far and how fast he must go". Well I am quite sure that the Star—and I apply this also to the hon. member for Ottawa West—does not have the idea that the minister is going now to give a lot of figures and tell us just exactly what is going to happen. That surely is not within the realm of common sense. No sane man would suggest that. It has to depend on the march of events, and the minister put it extremely well. He said "Our objective is to achieve an exchange rate which will contribute to a better balance in our current account position." That is common sense, and no common sense man would want to do more than that.

I come for a moment to the Globe and Mail, which in my opinion bravely tries to steer a middle course between the respective traditions of its progenitors, the Grit Globe and the Tory Mail and Empire. While they criticize the minister for failing to reduce taxes, they have some general words of approval which I would like to quote because they have some interesting implications. The Globe and Mail says:

> The public may have been led to expect a major fiscal miracle from Mr. Fleming because the other political parties have not hesitated to assert that, placed in power, they would engage in that kind of hocus-pocus. It should be remembered that these political aspirants base their promises upon two false premises. One, is that Canada is in a hopeless economic condition;—

That is the Liberals. I continue:

> —the other, is that the system which has given us the second highest level of prosperity in the world is a worthless system and ought to be scrapped.

I continue to quote from the Globe and Mail:

> Mr. Fleming approached his budget in the belief, which we share, that Canada is not a ruined country, although it is in difficulties. He justly pointed out that we still have vast natural resources and talent which can be put to constructive wealth creating use. Equally, he held to the belief that on the whole the system of free enterprise and free competition offers the best chance for our progress.

I have quoted that because the Globe and Mail has taken the position I want to take of applauding the minister because he has not believed in miracles but rather has believed in patience, detailed discussion of problems, and dealing with them one by one. As I said, the Globe and Mail did criticize the minister because he did not lower high taxes. My answer to that is that the minister was facing huge expenditures, largely inherited and resulting in a large deficit, and that he might well hesitate to increase this by further large decreases in taxation which might have an inflationary effect. That satisfies me and I think it would satisfy the ordinary sensible person.

I want to say a few words at this point about the course of economic events since the war. There is no mystery about what has been happening. We had a boom for more than ten years. I think the Hamilton Spectator described this period admirably when it said in its issue of June 21:

> In the post-war years when Canada had everything its own way, when a rebuilding Europe and a bursting economy at home had us in the seller's pulpit, with buyers at almost any price we cared to ask, the Liberal government of the day put up massive . . . spending levels.

I think that is true, and I do not know that I am saying it particularly critically. They had the revenue and they were tempted to spend it. At first we did not realize that this boom was coming after the war. We were very apprehensive that things might be very flat, and it is interesting to note that at that time, not realizing the boom that was coming, not realizing that the flames were going to be burning pretty brightly anyway, we fanned the flames in a quite substantial way by a loan of a billion and a quarter to Great Britain, which we approved. I made a speech in favour of it myself.

It is interesting to remember that the loan was put before the House of Commons by Mr. Ilsley, the minister of that day, really on the basis of two main arguments. The first was that Britain, who had borne the burden and heat of the day and had divested herself of many of her investments, was entitled to assistance if anyone ever was. Second, and just as important, he pointed out that this was in our own interests, that our external trade greatly needed to be built up, that Britain was unable to be a purchaser, and and that therefore it was highly in our own interests to make them advances so they could buy. It was really just like a wholesaler who assists an important customer who for the moment is broke. That was the argument which was made. That money was spent here and, as I say, it fanned the flames and, as the Hamilton Spectator said, we really had it all our own way. It would not have been human if we had not taken advantage of it but, mark you, it left a situation which we ought to look at very carefully and try to understand now.

A little later, of course, we had the Korean episode which again fanned the flames and incidentally, of course, at that time the cost of living was going up very rapidly. Between 1945 and 1952 the cost of living went up by about 50 per cent. In 1945 the consumer price index, on the basis of 1949 equalling 100, stood at 75 and in 1952 it was 116.5. It was inevitable that this should happen. I am not criticizing it particularly; I am just pointing out the situation. I want to try to be realistic as I think the minister was realistic. I think we have got serious problems and we ought to face them like serious men. We can never face them if we do not know what they are.

As I say, there is no mystery about what has happened since. That gorgeous period pretty well came to an end in 1955 or 1956. I say there is no mystery about what has happened since. The boom came to an end. One strange thing about booms is that people always think they are going to go on forever but they never do go on forever. The boom came to an end. It did not come to an end with a terrific flop; it came to an end rather quietly. Things flattened out rather than having a tremendous fall.

At the same time two other terribly important things happened. The competition of western Europe came into the picture in a big way. We all know what that meant. Western Europe had been given a flying start by the Marshall plan. I was reading just last night about General Marshall and the Marshall plan. We owe a great deal to that very great man for the courage he showed. But what did it mean? It meant that western Europe had new machinery, new methods and, as I say, was given a flying start. More than that, and this is the thing we should all be registering in this country of ours, they not only had a healthy and skilled industrial class but in some way they managed to make the industrial class feel they were working for themselves. There was a better relationship between employer and employee. I fear we must admit that is so, and if it is true we should register it and seriously consider it. I fear it is true that they had and still have a better relationship, partly because of the laws, between employer and employee. These men realized, as I say, that they were working for themselves, and as a result western Europe has become a formidable competitor in the foreign trade market. This is something we cannot laugh off. One of the things I give the minister credit for is that he is telling us this faithfully and straightly and trying to make us realize that it depends on ourselves to pull up our socks, that it cannot all be done by government.

At the same time we should not forget that Japan has been revitalized and is a great competitor, as we know; that the communist countries, whenever it suits them, can sell at prices which have no relation to cost, and that the United States too is pulling up its socks. There is a danger, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has warned people, that a softening process has gone on. The minister compared us to a boxer—he was once a boxer himself—who has gone soft and feels that there is no real reason for special effort. We have reached the stage now when there is a reason for special effort, and the minister has tried to impress that on us.

There is another thing which has happened which affects the situation and is a commonplace to us all, of course. I am referring now particularly to unemployment and the effect of automation. There is also the movement of people from the land to the cities resulting in a decline in the agricultural population. The bright lights are more attractive and, of course, new and improved farm machinery means that a machine can produce as much food as 20 or 30 men and such machines have taken the place of those who have left the farm.

There is one other thing I should like to mention in passing. There has been quite a lot of talk about a $2 billion deficit over four years. I should like to put on the record the figures as to increased expenditure since the government came into power, nearly all inherited. There has been a rise each year from 1957-58 to 1960-61 over the expenditure of the preceding year, and in the four years the total increase has been $2,719 million of added burdens that the minister has had to carry. It is not very surprising that there has been a deficit.

I said that I thought the minister had been realistic, and I should like to say briefly what I mean by that. He has resisted the idea that we can cure the situation by bookkeeping or by tariff tricks. The minister has refused showy and quick remedies. He seems to me like a man who is trying to build a solid structure and not a jerry-built affair which in a few years we might find cracking and letting us down. I think he has been courageous and wise in what he has done, and I believe that the course of events will prove the value of his decision.

He is not hesitating to accept new ideas, particularly in connection with the matter of exchange. Incidentally, in that connection it is fashionable now to suggest that the minister has changed his mind. All right. It is only people of stature who can change their minds. I like a quotation which I ran across the other day from Joseph Chamberlain, the father of Neville, who was a great figure 50 years ago. Somebody charged him once with having changed his mind. He said "Anyone is welcome to my discarded opinions". I think that is a very good comment on the idea that a man must never change his mind as circumstances change.

As I said a moment ago, the minister has not pretended that governments by tariff or bookkeeping tricks can deal wholly with the situation or bring the economy back to a satisfactory position. He has in plain terms left this burden where it belongs, namely on the energy, capacity and, if necessary, the sacrifice of Canadian citizens. Yes, that is what the President of the United States put up to the Americans, namely sacrifice if necessary. He has had no part in what the Globe and Mail calls hocus-pocus. He is helping people to help themselves.

Let us consider a few of the things which the Free Press did not have time to mention. First of all there is the substantial extension of the powers of the industrial development bank. That is an important matter. It can help a great deal. It can help people who could not get credit previously. Its powers are being extended. There was a time when credit could be given by the bank only when it had been refused elsewhere.

Let us also consider other things which the Free Press had not time to mention. There are the tax incentives to stimulate scientific research; double depreciation, the 50 per cent increase in the rates of capital cost allowance applicable to new assets. These are only a few of the array of things which the budget brought in. What I like about them is that each one of them appears to me to be a sound contribution to assist the economy. They all seem to me to be things which have been investigated, studied and assessed having regard to the value they can be to the economy. The matter cannot be better put than in the way it was put by the minister in his speech. As found at page 6642 of Hansard he said this:

> I need not remind hon. members that there is no royal road, no magic which a minister of finance may invoke to achieve these goals. If there were easy solutions they would have been adopted long ago.

How true that statement is.

> Nor can these objectives be attained by federal government measures alone. In our free enterprise system we shall need self-discipline and the full co-operation of business, labour and all levels of government—indeed of all our people—if we are to succeed.

Those are the minister's words, and I do not think the matter could be better put. There is no hocus-pocus as the Globe and Mail said. There is no claim of magic power on the part of government. However, there is reference to self-discipline, co-operation, courage and caution. Surely this is the kind of language and the kind of action that serious people like ourselves are entitled to expect from the government.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the philosophical apologia given by our highly respected friend the hon. member for Greenwood. I was greatly interested to note that he recognized the international aspects of our economic problems. I think we all must recognize them. There are certain factors over which we have little or no control, and which make our problems more complicated and serious today than they have possibly ever been in world history.

The hon. member made some reference to the editorial writer of the Free Press sloughing over the details of some of the good things in the budget. While I do not blame the hon. gentleman for highlighting them to the best of his ability, may I say that possibly the editor on that ocasion failed to have a microscope with him.

The hon. member mentioned our vast resources in this country. We are not a finished or a poor people. I am sure no members of this house think Canada is in a state of ruin, particularly when we all realize that we have the vast resources mentioned by the hon. gentleman which can be developed over a period of many years. We also have a virile and industrious people who can apply their energy to the development of these resources. We in this group are also very much concerned with the fact that we have hundreds of thousands of working people in Canada who are anxious to have that opportunity.

The hon. gentleman also mentioned the afterwar boom period, and rightly so. One of the fundamental approaches that we take to economic problems is with regard to this continuing boom and bust in capitalist society. We think that the application of human intelligence and a spirit of co-operation can remedy the boom and bust society with its consequent insecurity for large numbers of good people.

The minister delivered what I think has been quite correctly termed his marathon speech with his usual Cromwellian stance and stentorian voice. I always watch the minister with great interest, and I give him full marks for his courage and bold front under economic adversity. I always admire a person who stands up for his convictions and defends what he believes to be the right course. However, I think it is quite fair to say it is obvious that he has changed his direction considerably since the last budget. There are many contradictions in the minister's statements and direction since 1957 which reflect—and I have some sympathy with the minister on this account—the vacillations and uncertainties of the capitalist system under which we live. In my opinion the budget is a sincere attempt on the part of the minister to rationalize the conflict between capitalist interests in Canada, the circumstances that prevail in the country and the politcal necessities of the party in power. I think without a doubt he has done his best to that end, and we give him full marks in that direction.

Mr. Speaker, we are the only group in this house that offers a completely alternative program to meet the necessities of our times.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Herridge: This group stands for the principles of democratic socialism as the only effective alternative to the present unplanned, chaotic, monopoly controlled economy. Before proceeding I wish to read a quotation from a book I was reading recently by Norman Thomas entitled "A Socialist's Faith". I have a great respect for Norman Thomas. I have spoken with him on platforms and have discussed economic and social questions with him. I think he is a man of great character, conviction and intellect. As a sort of prelude to what I have to say later on I wish to read two paragraphs from his book dealing with this particular question of socialism versus capitalism:

> Sound democratic socialism will seek public ownership under democratic control of the commanding heights of the modern economic order. It is neither necessary nor desirable, so long as there is unity of purpose in the main direction of our economy, that there should be a monolithic type of ownership and control.

There is no need for that.

> There is a wholesome stimulus in competition, or emulation, and in diversity of functional apparatus.
> There is large room for private ownership when the owners are serving a useful function, provided that their ownership does not give them undue control over our social life. Public ownership need not be of one type. Generally speaking, the state should be the agency of ownership, and public corporations or authorities of somewhat various types its administrators. But there will be a large place for co-operatives, especially consumers' co-operatives, in the good society.

I read that quotation, Mr. Speaker, because I think it indicates very well the economic philosophy of this group which we have mentioned previously in the house on numerous occasions. It is the mixed economy or dual economy operated for the welfare of the people as a whole and not for the few.

The minister yesterday spoke with great confidence of the press reception of his budget. I think he was somewhat overconfident in that respect. I wish to make brief reference to certain Conservative newspapers which indicate that there is a difference of opinion as to the value of the present budget even amongst Conservative-minded publications. These differences of opinion found coming from Conservative-minded newspapers simply reflect the economic confusion in modern society.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, an hon. gentleman is making some comments in isolation. But they do reflect the economic confusion. I am not blaming any individual. Our present circumstances are the result of a long period of development and evolution and on these occasions I do not believe in blaming individuals. The government of the day is doing its best according to its lights to administer capitalism under the circumstances. However, these various editorials do indicate the confused thinking in the minds of many editors across this country. I mention the Financial Times of June 23, which contains an article reading:

> The budget was not worth delay.
> The platitudinous preambles to the budget were undoubtedly spoken in Donald Fleming's voice but the words were those of the Prime Minister.
> This is clearly a government by fall guys.
> We would say that nobody really knows who is next in line for some sort of misery. But what matters at this moment is this budget.
> Was it worth being delayed from April till June? It was not.
> Is it an expansionist budget? Clearly not.
>
> Do its provisions offset the business uncertainties of the recent past? We cannot see how.

That is a Conservative paper. It is a Conservative editor commenting.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not a Conservative paper.

Mr. Herridge: The Financial Times, of course, is published for persons interested in financial and business affairs in this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not know how anybody could say it was a Conservative paper.

Mr. Herridge: I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is Conservative in the economic sense. Then we come to the Ottawa Journal of June 21. This is another Conservative-minded newspaper. They say, in brief:

> Mr. Fleming's spectacles may be too rosy, and he may be guilty of oversimplification, not to speak of pollyannaism. Only time will tell. What can be said, though, is that this is not the budget of a finance minister who is tired or afraid or unwilling to adventure, and least of all of a finance minister who is thinking of votes or just loves applause. Certainly there is no beckoning for votes, no drum roll of an election, in tax cuts—including a dropping of the 7½ per cent excise tax on passenger cars—amounting to only $65 million this year and $100 million over a full 12 months.

That editorial is not on the whole excited by the minister's budget. Then we come to the Daily Gleaner of Fredericton, New Brunswick. I am not sure of the political complexion of the Gleaner. The editorial is not highly critical, but in the last paragraph it says:

> The budget contains no indication that any special steps will be taken in aid of this area of Canada.

To that extent I presume it is somewhat critical.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It overlooked completely the enlargement of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants.

Mr. Herridge: I am just quoting this editor's opinion. Then we come to the Ottawa Citizen of June 21:

Mr. Fleming's gamble

Mr. Fleming's past performances as a prognosticator being what they are, it is difficult to feel anything but the most profound uneasiness as he offers his new prescription for an ailing economy. The Minister of Finance sounds his usual ringing note of confidence, but the fact remains that he is embarking on a gigantic gamble. It carries the danger if not the outright guarantee of inflation.

I just quote briefly from those few editorials, Mr. Speaker, to indicate the wide difference of opinion among persons who support the present economic order completely. To budget for a deficit of $650 million on current account is very dangerous, in our opinion, and can be costly to future generations. In our opinion it is just the same as arranging a long term loan to pay the grocery bill. We are not blaming the Minister of Finance completely, because of the present circumstances. We are not opposed to deficit financing under certain circumstances, but we do consider it a very dangerous step to begin to budget for this large scale deficit financing for really carrying on the daily affairs of the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly, sir.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What would the hon. member propose to do in the face of this situation, where we are faced with a deficit of $650 million as a result of various measures of which the hon. member is aware? Does he propose that we should reduce the deficit by cutting back on some of these measures, or raise taxes?

Mr. Herridge: I was just coming to that; the minister anticipated my solution. In our opinion the deficit could be considerably reduced. In our opinion corporations are still being allowed to retain too large a slice of their profits under these circumstances when we relate their profits to the situation throughout the country with regard to unemployment. Therefore we believe that this deficit could have been considerably reduced by an increase in corporation taxes and by a reduction of depletion allowances in particular circumstances with respect to certain companies where in our opinion this measure is considerably abused; also by the reduction of depreciation allowances under certain circumstances. We are quite in agreement with the minister's attempt to assist small industry and the development of industry with depletion allowances and depreciation allowances, but we are of the opinion that these allowances under the Income Tax Act are being very much abused in some quarters and that with an increase in these taxes we could have considerably reduced the present deficit. The minister may not agree with us, but that is what we believe.

In addition we must remember that when it comes to the question of income tax, the only persons in Canada when the government can be certain will meet their income tax obligations in full are employees whose income tax is deducted at the source, or farmers selling through recognized marketing organizations. I have some knowledge of business, and on certain occasions I have been appalled to find out what can be done under the income tax regulations. I think we are particularly generous in that respect.

As socialists I think it is only fair that we should offer alternatives to the present budget proposals, and we do that. We believe we are justified in incurring a large scale deficit as the result of investment in self liquidating, publicly owned projects, which would provide for co-operation in financing provincial projects and an extension of such programs as the winter works program. We believe it is quite sound to go into debt on capital investment in self-liquidating projects because the investment is there to equate the expenditure.

Then we believe there should be a planned program of production to assist the Asian, African and Latin American countries, financed in a way very similar to the way the war production program was financed. We believe this is a serious situation and that we can do something to improve our own domestic economic situation and at the same time accept our responsibilities to an even greater extent to other countries abroad. We believe investment in this field is very sound and will prove a good investment in the present world situation.

We believe in increased capital in the industrial development bank to provide long term loans to medium and small sized industry and business. The minister is providing for that to some extent in his budget. However, we say there should be provision in the loan to the medium or small sized industry for the state to become a partner in such industry or business, or the companies concerned having an opportunity for repayment of the loans in question.

I for one recognize that two and two make four. I do not underestimate the difficulties we face today, but we believe that if we could develop a program of this sort based on planned fiscal development and investment policies which would also require, in my opinion, a revolution with regard to our sense of values, the future would be much brighter than it appears to be today. Of course these are the things which restrict governments; you cannot move faster than you can obtain a large measure of public support for a project. But we believe that a program of this type with further extensions, as a result of co-operation among provincial, dominion and municipal governments, co-operation with labour, co-operation with agriculture and even co-operation with socially responsible industry and business in this country—and there are large segments of our industry and business which are socially responsible—would lead to results such as our present policies could scarcely hope to achieve. We can implement a program with desirable national objectives under national direction and with a national purpose—that is a very necessary thing—which would provide the same support for the government and for the program that governments receive during wartime.

I am convinced, and so is the party to which I belong, that we must launch out in another direction. We can mobilize support for a program designed to serve the people and controlled by the people, having long term objectives such as I have mentioned. We do not suggest for a moment that all our ills, economic and social, can be cured overnight, but let us change our direction; let us get on a course which can bring results of the type we desire.

We have some examples to guide us. Go to Sweden. Go to Norway, where with far less natural resources than our own and far less opportunities for a program of this kind some marvellous things have been achieved. I will admit this, that in those countries there is a co-operative philosophy existing among the people, even among the industrialists, which does not exist in this country at the present time. We believe it is up to the national government to give some leadership in this respect. We believe that if we could once change our course, change our direction, we could offer a hope; we could give a purpose to life in Canada, and we could start to march along the road to stability in our economy and basic security for all who are willing to do their share toward this end.

Having made those few remarks with respect to our general approach, I wish to deal with a few of the good features in the budget. We in this group were very glad to hear the minister repeal the excise tax of 7½ per cent on passenger cars. This will be welcomed by many people and will be of some assistance to the automobile industry and the employees engaged therein. It is a worth-while poultice on the ills of society.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But too late.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Essex East says it came too late and I can well understand him saying that because I have listened to him over the years advocate just such a proposal.

Then the provision for a 50 per cent increase in the capital cost allowance in the first year on assets required for use in Canada above a company's normal capital outlay may be of some assistance. However, when we come to consider the resolution we shall wish to have some further explanation how this is going to operate and who will benefit in the long run. I would term this to be a suitable bromide.

Then we come to the extension of tax deductions for expenditures on scientific research in Canada. This should, it is true, promote research, but it will only benefit the larger companies because they are the only ones who can afford research. I would term this a very worth-while aspirin to cure our minor headaches in society.

I am glad to know that voluntary firemen are going to be allowed income tax relief on amounts up to $300. Members of the opposition have urged that for a number of years. It is very welcome. It has no serious effect on our economy, but it does remedy what we consider to be an injustice suffered by these volunteer firemen. Of course I am a great believer in voluntary service. We are living in an age where there are so many people who before they do anything for the community want to know "What is there in it for me?" When I was a boy, and up until recent years, people served as school trustees and on local community bodies and organizations without any thought of being paid, and I think the tendency to expect payment for performing public service within the community which can be done in a person's spare time is wrong.

I am glad to see the government intends to seek the co-operation of the provinces with regard to a program for portable pensions. I am very interested in this, particularly since the minister on one or two occasions has been telling us that the government had no responsibility in this field. He has expressed this view in response to questions raised by us as grievances.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member would agree that I pointed out that the jurisdiction of the federal government here is very limited, and that the only way in which the federal government could approach the matter was by way of a tax measure.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, I understood the minister's attitude toward this, but portable or transferable pensions cannot become an accomplished fact without leadership from the federal government because of its control over the federal Income Tax Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It should have been done three years ago.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do it?

Mr. Herridge: We in this group have urged the government to give some leadership in this respect for a long time, but we are glad to know that it is now included in the budget proposals.

We are also glad to note that there is to be a more intensive scrutiny by the income tax branch of expense accounts. In my opinion this section of the act has been greatly abused in recent years. I think we should be most puritanical in our application of this section of the legislation.

The cigarette smokers will be pleased to know that they will be able to cough on a larger cigarette without incurring any extra expense. That is not of great consequence, but it has made a certain percentage of our population happy. Since I am a pipe smoker it does not mean a great deal to me.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when we recessed at one o'clock for refreshments, replenishment and reflection, I was dealing with that aspect of the budget relating to cigarette tobacco. I may say that during the luncheon recess I was informed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that recently on the financial pages of one of the daily papers there was a comment from one of the heads of a tobacco company indicating this provision will not mean more tobacco in the cigarettes for the consumer. The legislation will not have the effect that was expected by the minister and to which he referred in the budget debate.

However, there is another aspect of the question with which I should like to deal, and that is this question of class legislation. There is gross discrimination as between cigarette and pipe smokers. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that young people, as a rule, smoke cigarettes, while the people who are older, and particularly our senior citizens, are addicted to the pipe because of their maturity and the lessened cost. I suggest that in my opinion this section of the budget would not stand close scutiny as against the terms of the bill of rights. I bring that to the minister's attention.

There is a mild tonic in the budget to which I should like to refer. The minister proposes an increase in the lending resources of the industrial development bank from $160 million to $400 million. We support this proposal wholeheartedly and believe it should be of some assistance to the economy if handled properly. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I have known of one instance in which a corporation owned and controlled in the United States but located in my constituency was able to obtain quite a large loan, while quite a number of smaller Canadian owned companies were not able to take advantage of this act. As I mentioned before, we believe there is an opportunity here for the granting of loans on the basis that the owners of industries are willing to permit the government to become partners in those industries, or they can agree to full repayment of the loan. I believe this provision is worthy of some consideration in view of what has been done in Scandinavian countries in this respect.

I see the minister proposes a clinical examination of our financial structure and institutions, including the Bank of Canada. I think this is a most interesting proposal and has considerable merit. However, I suggest that the terms of reference of the royal commission should be wide enough to permit an examination of similar institutions in European countries, and I am thinking particularly of the Scandinavian countries and some western European countries in which they have had great success in relating monetary, fiscal and economic policies to the advantage of the country concerned.

Now, I have a few suggestions which I consider would improve the present budget. This budget does not provide for any change in personal income taxes. I am of the opinion that consideration should have been given to increasing the exemptions for persons in lower income groups. I believe provision should be made also for exemption of travelling expenses incurred by workers living at some distance from their employment. These monthly expenses can be quite large. Owing to the difficulty of obtaining housing, as well as other circumstances, you find workers living at increasingly greater distances from their place of employment, sometimes up to 25 or 30 miles in my own constituency. As a result they incur heavy travelling expenses.

I have mentioned this in years past, and I have no hesitation in mentioning it again. I believe these workers should be permitted some exemption in respect of these travelling expenses, particularly when we realize the frivolous expenditures that can be included as travelling expenses by travellers for certain companies. I have been told of an instance in which a man travelled 100 miles to sell bubble gum, at least that was the pretext upon which the journey was made, and his expenses were allowed in respect of income tax because he worked for a wholesale grocer.

In view of the depreciation allowed mining companies and companies developing oil and gas wells, I say the same consideration should be given to farmers who use their capital or borrow money to bring land into production by clearing, by irrigation or by draining. The whole theory behind depreciation allowances with respect to those mining and oil and gas companies is that they are increasing the productivity of the country, they are adding to the total production. Farmers should be treated in exactly the same way. The farmer who brings land into production should have the opportunity to claim an exemption for the cost of that development. Similar consideration should be given to persons engaged in the conservation and protection of forest resources by the construction of roads, telephone lines and the purchase of equipment for fire protection and efforts taken to overcome destruction by insects and disease.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Herridge: I now come to the end of my comments on this patent medicine budget.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): This morning I asked the Minister of Finance when the house might expect the government to deal with the recommendations contained in the royal commission report on the automotive industry. The minister's reply was inconclusive. I am sure I can say his reply will be received in the community from which I come with very much regret. I say this because of the dominion bureau of statistics figures regarding the sales of motor vehicles in this country which were given out on June 27. This report shows that in the month of May the shipment of Canadian made motor vehicles declined 4.8 per cent; that is to say, declined to 41,234 units from 43,334 in the corresponding month last year. The report also revealed that shipments of passenger cars in May fell by 5 per cent. In the same month the shipment of commercial vehicles dropped 3.9 per cent.

I believe these figures reveal the considerable urgency and desirability of the government giving immediate consideration to the recommendations of the Bladen royal commission. The royal commission was appointed over a year ago. The government has had the report for some time now. Requests were made by me on several occasions prior to the budget for an opportunity to peruse the report. However, the government withheld it until the presentation of the budget.

An examination of the royal commission report does not reveal that it contained anything of a character that could not be revealed, unless the government takes the position that the acceptance of the first recommendation, for the elimination of excise tax, was a matter so confidential as to preclude hon. members from seeing the terms of the report. In any event, I suggest that the figures I have just mentioned with regard to the drop in automobile production, together with the decrease in previous months, leave shipments in the January-May period almost 15 per cent below those of a year ago. I believe those figures are such as to warrant a more immediate confrontation by the government of the royal commission report on the automobile industry.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the end of my time I shall be glad to answer questions. I regret to think that the report of the Bladen commission is to suffer the fate of the reports of so many other royal commissions appointed by this government. We have had many commissions, such as the O'Leary commission and the royal commission dealing with medical care services announced last December 18 which is only now receiving its full complement of personnel as the result of a decision made about two weeks ago. Now we have a further suggestion by the Minister of Finance of a royal commission on monetary, fiscal and financial matters.

I do not want to digress from the main theme of what I have to say today, but with regard to the proposed royal commission on monetary matters I would simply say that the Bank of Canada Act in this country is so similar to the corresponding legislative provision in the United Kingdom that we might well have profited from the royal commission headed by Lord Radcliffe in the United Kingdom. In any event, much of the work of the proposed commission might well have been performed by a committee of this house. I hope that the fate of those commissions, including the Bladen commission, will not come within the mischief of the attack on the principle of royal commissions by Mr. Alan Herbert, M.P., who spoke of the futility of royal commissions in the United Kingdom a few years ago. Here is what he said:

> I am sure that the financial secretary will get this vote without any difficulty, but I should like some asurance that this money is not going to be wasted, as the money spent upon royal commissions is, I do not think it is putting it too high, to say nearly always wasted. I am probably the only member of this committee who in his election address boldly asserted that when he became a member of parliament he would set his face against the habit of government departments asking royal commissions to find out things which they ought to know already themselves, and which almost everybody else knows. Therefore, I am bound to make my protest now. A royal commission is generally appointed, not so much for digging up the truth, as for digging it in and a government department appointing a royal commission is like a dog burying a bone, except that the dog does eventually return to the bone. In my short experience of royal commission I find that they spend perhaps years going into a question, that public-spirited ladies and gentlemen give their services free in doing that work, that they produce portentous and expensively-printed reports and that nothing happens.

This is a serious indictment on royal commissions, and what Mr. Herbert has said applies for the most part to royal commissions appointed by this government. In my community of Windsor and in places such as Oshawa, St. Catharines, Oakville and other industrial communities of our country there was great expectation from the setting up of the Bladen royal commission. Now, however, a year after its appointment, we are no further advanced with regard to solutions to meet the conditions which prevail in the automotive industry. Because of the reply we had this morning to my question to the Minister of Finance, and from the way in which the Bladen commission report was so carelesly passed over in the budget, I am afraid that the report of this commission will suffer the same fate as that of other royal commissions appointed by this government.

It should be clearly understood that the initiative for this commission was not taken by this government; it was taken by the communities concerned, namely Windsor and adjoining communities whose economies are so closely tied to the domestic manufacture of motor vehicles and parts, places such as St. Catharines, Oshawa, Oakville and other industrial centres of our country. I may say on this point that a number of individuals might well be mentioned as having taken the lead in impressing on the government the importance of an objective and thorough study of the problems of the automotive industry. But generally speaking the impetus came from those communities themselves, from municipal leaders, from workers, social welfare agencies and business. It is true that the unions and the automotive companies co-operated to the fullest extent, but I want to emphasize that the royal commission hearing finally granted by the government came about as the result of a popular and broadly based demand by the people of these communities whose present and future are so dependent on a healthy motor vehicle industry in Canada.

Among the bodies which made a contribution to the setting up of the commission was the greater Windsor industrial commission, a body that appeared before the Prime Minister in June of 1960. That body pointed out, among other things, that imports of automobile parts in 1959 increased 20 per cent over 1958; that imports of automobile parts in 1959 reached a new high of $319 million; that the United States supplied over 96 per cent of those parts; that imports of completed units in 1959 increased 46 per cent over the previous year; that imports of completed units in 1959 increased 105 per cent over all but one of the preceding years, that the United Kingdom supplied 47.5 per cent of the passenger units in 1959; that West Germany supplied 23.5 per cent of the passenger units in 1959, and imported passenger units from the United Kingdom increased 52 per cent in 1959 over the previous year.

It was as the result of submissions like that from the greater Windsor industrial commission, supported by the mayor of the city of Windsor and the mayors of the adjoining municipalities and the bodies I have mentioned, that the stimulation grew for the establishment of this royal commission. That we should be no further ahead now is a matter of great regret to the community from which I come.

Mr. Best: What about the excise tax?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am going to deal with the excise tax which was promised—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the end of my speech. I only have half an hour and I want to cover this matter. The excise tax was removed only the other day as a result of representations made by opposition members, notwithstanding the promise made by the Prime Minister on at least two occasions, in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958 when he promised that the excise tax on automobiles would be eliminated, not just partially but completely right away, not four years later.

I say to the minister that he has had an opportunity to examine the Bladen report, and he should have been in a position to tell us on behalf of the government what portions of that report were acceptable to the government. Instead we have this further delay in the face of the situation which now confronts the automobile industry, as indicated by the statistics I have thus far put on the record.

The acceptance of the proposal for the elimination of the excise tax of 7½ per cent was very welcome. I have been urging it in this house for some time, as have other hon. members, as a means of providing some solution for the serious unemployment situation that attends the automobile industry. It is significant that Professor Bladen in making his recommendations, which are to be found on page 58 of his report—prepared, by the way, at a considerable expense and valuable only if it receives from the government the kind of attention it warrants—spoke of these proposals as a package, that one proposal by itself will not meet the purpose behind the commissioner's program. For instance, Professor Bladen says:

> I want to emphasize, however, that these are not discrete items from which a selection is invited; they constitute a unitary plan, a program for the continued development of the automotive industry in Canada.

The government is not in any way implementing the comprehensive program put forward in the Bladen commission report. Thus far the government again gives evidence of procrastination, perhaps until a further crisis in the industry takes place. I say that we welcome, of course, the elimination of the 7½ per cent excise tax, but I say that the government should have recognized this three years ago when it was faced with the large volume of unemployment that confronted the automobile industry. Automobiles are no longer luxuries. The mere recognition of the fact does not do justice to the difficulties being experienced by the industry.

There are a number of factors that must be looked upon in mitigation of the impact of the reduction of this tax provided for at so late a date. I say that I welcome the elimination of this tax, but if this action had been taken three years ago some of the things about which I am now going to speak would not exist.

First of all, the value of used cars is likely to decline in proportion to the reduction in the price of new cars, so that the majority of purchasers who wish to trade in cars will not realize a full 7½ per cent reduction in price. Second, if the government is successful in its policy of devaluing the Canadian dollar, the cost of Canadian produced automobiles is bound to rise because of the large American parts content. The minister argued the converse, of course, last year when, in referring to the high premium on the Canadian dollar, he said as found on page 2673 of Hansard:

> On the other hand, it lowers the cost of imported raw materials and semi-finished goods used by our manufacturers, and it has helped keep down our cost of living and cost of producing.

But that is not the position taken by the minister in the current budget. I further point out that the pending 3 per cent sales tax, which Mr. Frost argues is necessary because of the fiscal arrangements with the federal government, will itself absorb half the benefits accruing from the elimination of the federal excise tax in the province of Ontario, which is the largest market for Canadian produced automobiles. The premier of Ontario was driven to this tax as a result of the failure of the government's fiscal policies—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —as a result of the failure of the government in its fiscal relations with the provinces to live up to the commitments solemnly given the Canadian people by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I point out that the government should have given more than a promise to study the recommendation of the royal commission on the automotive industry, that the basis for the application of sales tax on imported motor vehicles under the Excise Tax Act be changed from the duty paid value to the sales price to the retailer. I refer to the second recommendation of Professor Bladen, which will be found on page 58 of the report and reads as follows:

> That the base for the application of sales tax on imported motor vehicles, under the Excise Tax Act, be changed from the duty paid value to the sale price to the retailer in Canada, and that section 29(1) be amended accordingly.

But no, we do not have any indication whatsoever from the government, notwithstanding these observations of the royal commissioner. Professor Bladen said:

> I know of no other country that places domestic manufacturers at a disadvantage in meeting import competition. The United Kingdom levies its purchase tax on imported goods, as on all goods, on their wholesale value in the United Kingdom. The United States applies its excise tax on all automobiles on the price of the automobile in condition for delivery to the purchaser in the United States.

These words of Professor Bladen, for the benefit of the minister since obviously he has not carefully perused this report, will be found at page 61. I ask the minister why he could not in this budget, a budget that had been revised after another one only a short time previously had apparently been abandoned—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is quite wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —have given effect to the proposal that some relief might be given to the assemblers of motor cars to the degree to which they buy or produce Canadian parts. The fact is that during the first six months of 1961 passenger car output has dropped about 14 per cent behind the 1960 pace. In view of this fact I say to the government, having in mind the economic implications of the automobile industry directly and indirectly it should have acted, should have accepted or rejected the proposals of the Bladen commission, and stated its policy. To have kept this report for all this time, then to have given it only on the night of the budget, and then not to have done more than promise to study the report was, I say, an insult to those who urged the government over a year ago to make this kind of study of the serious situation that confronts the automobile industry.

I say the government has no excuse for the way in which it has said, in a budget speech, "We are going to study the recommendations of this report", without, of course, adding "notwithstanding the fact that we have had it now for six weeks, and notwithstanding the fact that the royal commission was appointed over a year ago". I say that the recommendations of the commission should not have been held in reserve. I suspect that one of the reasons they were held in reserve was as a bargaining point to bring pressure to bear on the United Kingdom in her attitude toward the common market. If the minister thinks this is a far-fetched suggestion I ask him to look at the Times of Thursday, June 22, 1961.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Everything the hon. gentleman is saying is far-fetched.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that everything I say is far-fetched.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Wild conjecture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want my hon. friend to know that what I am saying now will be concurred in by the royal commissioner, by the thousands of unemployed in my city and elsewhere and by the automobile manufacturers who had hoped that this government in this budget would have done something substantial to meet the conditions that confront the automobile industry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They have written to me congratulating me on the budget.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Here is what the Times said:

> Some observers are wondering how far these recommendations for a tariff on British cars and parts are being kept up the minister's sleeve as a bargaining factor which the Canadian government might use in any negotiations with Britain on the common market issue.

Mr. Chambers: What would be the effect on car sales?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the hon. member ask that question at the end of my speech and I shall be very glad to deal with it.

The commission dealt with another matter, namely the possibility of reciprocal free trade with the United States in automobiles and parts. Do we have from this government any indication of what it thinks about the royal commission's commentary and recommendations in this regard? We have not a word in spite of the fact that the three main automobile companies in this country presented briefs recommending exploration of proposals for closer integration of the Canadian and United States automobile industries. The united automobile workers suggested integration of production facilities. Professor Bladen refers to part of the submission made by the united automobile workers in this regard. Their recommendations in part read as follows:

> In essence, we suggest that the commission examine the feasibility of an international agreement which would permit free trade in the products of any motor vehicle manufacturing company provided that the company produced in Canada or had produced for it in Canada a quantity of motor vehicles and parts, sufficient to assure maintenance of current levels of employment at current production volume and future increases in employment parallel with the growth of the company's Canadian market.

This is, of course, a proposal that must be carefully examined. It represents the majority view of the united automobile workers. A minority report was put in by one of the locals of the united automobile workers. What does this government say? It says not a word about any of these matters. It proposes to study the royal commission report. When does it propose to give us an answer? I asked the minister this morning whether, if parliament comes back in September and if there is another budget, as we have rumours that there may be, he is going to provide for the situation.

Mr. Benidickson: One is not good enough.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If there is not a budget, or if that is not his intention now, what justification can the minister offer for not having given evidence of a greater interest in this document, the report of the royal commission on the automotive industry? It will not satisfy the people whom I represent in this house and others in places like St. Catharines, Toronto, Oakville and Oshawa to be told by the minister—

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the report is one which the government is going to consider seriously in the long future. This government has established a precedent in the study of reports that is not too encouraging. For instance, we know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been studying for three years a report which the Prime Minister of this country told us in January of 1958 had to be prepared in four months—

Mr. Benidickson: In four months, for the election.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —so the government could take action with regard to adopting a system of old age security such as that in operation in the United States. I say this to the Minister of Finance. He may not agree with all the proposals of the Bladen commission—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the hon. gentleman agree with all of them?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I do not agree with them all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Which ones?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the minister ask me at the end of my speech. My hon. friend is in the government. I would say this. If I were in the government and if I had the responsibility of my hon. friend with regard to a commission which had been appointed a year ago and whose report I had in my hands for weeks, I would have been in a position as minister of finance to say what I would do about that report instead of shelving it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has had it for nine days and he will not tell us which recommendations he favours.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are many aspects of this budget about which one would like to have a great deal to say. Certainly it is a budget that has been received all over this country with great disfavour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With great favour.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suspect that there has never been presented to the Canadian people a budget that was received so widely and so universally with such disfavour as this particular budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What has the hon. member been reading?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and particularly because it was introduced at a time when the minister had created one of the most regrettable incidents in the framework of government in this country, by the situation which he allowed to develop over a dispute with the head of the most important institution dealing with the financial matters in our country, the central bank. That story, about which we shall have more to say later, however, is part of the background causing this budget to be viewed with disfavour, causing the minister's prestige to fall, and causing a diminution in the appreciation of himself and his competence in this particular ministerial capacity of which he at this time, I am sure, has no appreciation.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member does not believe that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend will only go to Toronto and spend a few days there he will find that nothing has hurt his government and nothing has hurt him more in the esteem of the people of that city than have this budget and the circumstances attending it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not the impression that I have gained.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The most important feature of the budget, of course, is the minister's proposal to engage in what he called, up until a few months ago, a huge speculation with public funds which was bound to fail. With the objective of having the Canadian dollar at a level that will enable us to meet foreign competition without imposing an undue burden on the Canadian public I fully agree. There can be no doubt about that objective, but the way in which that objective is attained is the important thing. Quotations from the speeches made by the minister have already been put on the record over and over again, and yesterday by the hon. member for Laurier. The minister has been converted, apparently, to the view that this huge speculation, and that is all it is—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —which he said was bound to fail, is the only economic salvation for the country. He now contends—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If Mr. Barkway was right—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Barkway is usually wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If Mr. Barkway was right in the press conference held the other day with the minister and other press correspondents, the minister ought to explain the statement made by Mr. Barkway that from December to the end of May, according to official figures, it had cost $120 million to move the dollar down by half a point, and the United States dollar was still at a discount of 1½ points.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement gave a most misleading impression.

Mr. Benidickson: Look at page 320 of the Bank of Canada monthly report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What would it cost to bring it down a significant amount? The minister dodged this question in the press conference the other day and made a speech about something else. That is the minister's favourite tactic. Ask him a question about horses and he tells you all about elephants. If it cost $120 million to move the dollar down by one half or 1 per cent between December and May, how much is it going to cost to bring it down to any significant discount and keep it there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): His was a very misleading statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a question the minister has not dealt with. He has dodged it at every opportunity. Indeed, the hon. member for Canary-Rainy River—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "Canary" is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed to a statement made by the assistant general manager of the Royal bank, that for every one point it would probably cost $200 million. Is that right? To bring it down by five points would involve another $1 billion. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No wonder the minister, before his conversion, described this as a "huge financial speculation which was bound to fail".

Mr. Benidickson: That is what he said a year ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But there is another important aspect of this problem.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You did not agree with me then.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have a floating rate which is supposed to be determined by the market and which, until last December, was determined by the market. Mr. Abbott pointed out when we went on the floating rate that the exchange fund would be used to iron out minor fluctuations; that the government would not go into the market; that it would not interfere with the operations of free enterprise for the purpose of making significant—and I pause to repeat the word "significant"—changes in the rate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I simply say to the minister that this is speculation of the most dangerous sort against which we must protect the Canadian people.

Mr. Fleming (Eginton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The consent of the house would be required. Does the house agree to an exchange of questions and answers?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: A question, yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: A question, but not a speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to say he would answer a question. I wonder if he would indicate to the house, now that he has had the report for nine days and I am sure has studied it carefully, which of the recommendations in the Bladen report he supports. Does he support, for instance, the proposed increase in tariffs, changes of valuation and other things? Would the hon. member indicate just where he stands on the recommendations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be very glad to deal with that if the house will give me an opportunity, but I will have to have the opportunity.

Mr. Benidickson: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Just answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One cannot just say yes or no. I am prepared to speak for another 40 minutes on this subject.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that is the neatest way we have seen yet to dodge a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think what the hon. gentleman ought to do is—

An hon. Member: Your time is up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —give the Leader of the Opposition and the rest of us an opportunity at the earliest possible moment to settle these problems which this government is shelving.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Your footwork is not nearly as good as it was. That was pretty clumsy evasion.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have been very interested in the discussion that has taken place in the last few minutes. In particular I was interested in the final remarks of the hon. member for Essex East in relation to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and the amount of money that will be involved. I, too, would have liked him to have an opportunity of dealing further with that matter, because it is without doubt of great importance to us. The Financial Post has said:

> Most important Ottawa decision this week for all of Canadian business is finance minister Fleming's announcement that the government will use the exchange stabilization fund to lower the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis its U.S. counterpart.

This article mentions, of course, as did the hon. member for Essex East, the fact that this was not the purpose of the stabilization fund. Then it says:

> Fleming's plan to influence downward the exchange rate marks a complete about-face in government policy. As recently as May 16 last year, when speaking to the Vancouver board of trade, he listed five ways in which the government could force down the premium on the dollar, and stated that the disadvantages of the alternatives outweighed the disadvantages of the premium.

I only suggest that the method being used at the present time to stabilize the dollar at any reasonable level may cost the Canadian people a great deal of money. It may be that this fund should be used in the reverse manner to that suggested by the minister; it may be needed to bolster the Canadian dollar rather than to peg it at a relatively low position.

It seems to me that one of the problems we will have to face, and it is certainly not a desirable one, is that if this results in a terrific and variable fluctuation of the dollar so that everyone has to go to the exchange each day to find out what the dollar amounts to, it will not be good for business. It will not allow companies to ascertain what the selling price of their products will be and it will have, in my opinion, a very detrimental effect on stabilizing the exports of this country.

I was very interested the other day to hear the remarks of the Minister of Public Works. Over the years until now he has had some influence in stabilizing the economy of this country through the exceedingly heavy expenditures we have made in the mortgage field through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As I understood the minister's statement, he said that income tax today is lower than it has been for years. It seems to me this is in contradiction of the Financial Post, which on page 8 has a table headed:

> Background to the budget. Where the revenue comes from. Income tax bite getting bigger.

This table shows that personal income tax in 1939 was 11 per cent; in 1950 it was 28 per cent; in 1961, 34 per cent. With regard to corporation income tax, in 1939 it was 19 per cent; in 1950, 27 per cent; in 1961, 26 per cent. This does not indicate to me that it is getting easier on the pocketbook of the workers of this country. I think they have a continuing problem in trying to make ends meet. The problems of income tax are not getting less but are getting more, and will continue to get worse. The only way income tax can be reduced is to increase the allowances for those in the low income group, and this has not been done. As long as those paying income tax have to carry those thousands and thousands of people who are unemployed it will not be very easy to arrive at a situation that will be more advantageous.

It seems surprising to me also that a minister of the crown, and in particular one in as important a position as the Minister of Public Works, should have risen and made the speech he did make the other day. I do not think this is a reflection on the people he mentioned, but it is a reflection on those he did not mention and the fact that many of them have had no interest and are not willing on behalf of the people they represent to express an opinion on this budget and a number of other things about which they could have spoken. I think it is unfair for the government or any member of the cabinet to stand up in this house and say that the opposition takes up too much time; because on a number of occasions we have seen speaker after speaker on the government side talk about things which were only being discussed in order to give the government time to bring in legislation which they were not capable of bringing in earlier. Even in the last few weeks of this session we are still not sure what all the legislation in this session of parliament is going to be. It is interesting to note that the suggestions made by the Prime Minister as to what it is going to be are not necessarily those of the leader of the house, and each one has an opportunity to introduce something of his own.

It has been said that this government is interested in pushing the idea of socialism versus private enterprise. I believe that anyone, including the Prime Minister, who is interested in this argument should read the Ottawa letter which appears in Saturday Night of July 8. It says:

> We have neither socialism nor private enterprise and are not going to go whole hog for either one or the other. Now, it seems clear, Mr. Diefenbaker's "issue" seems to boil down to "private profit versus crown corporations".

It goes on to say:

> The back benches of the government are packed with little men who literally hate the crown corporations and their top executives. These M.P.'s are not big-minded enough to believe in the neutrality of civil servants.

The article goes on:

> Similarly, the little men hate Donald Gordon and his C.N.R. They loathe the C.B.C. They cannot understand why profit-making crown corporation Polymer is not turned over to private pockets. And they want money-saving Eldorado Aviation turned over to private operators.

The article argues that this is in complete contradiction with what the Senate unemployment committee came up with when it issued a report which made the whole socialism versus private enterprise battle completely irrelevant. The article goes on to say:

"The maintenance of an adequate rate of economic growth requires a continuing high level of capital investment, both private and public. Private capital investment must be supplemented and stimulated by an adequate rate of government investment in social capital."

It goes on to mention that this government have considered this and are not in complete agreement with those who believe otherwise, because they are going to add to the capital of the industrial development bank so that government assistance can be given to the little people of this country.

I am particularly interested at the time of this budget in two or three matters which appear to me to be of great interest. One of them is this matter of where the Conservatives stand in relation to labour. This is going to be an important matter this summer. It is going to be discussed without doubt on a number of platforms, and I think we should take a look now at what the program of the government is.

I should like to mention two or three things. This morning I asked a question as to the government's intentions concerning Canadian postal employees. The question was simply this; does the government not believe that those people who are granted statutory holidays should be paid extra in respect of those statutory holidays when they have to work? Is it not the intention of the government to pay those people double time for the work they do on those days which would normally be days off and which are classed as statutory holidays?

If we read the long reply given by the Postmaster General on June 27, as reported at page 7107, we find it boils down to the fact that this government does not believe that employees are entitled to time off or that they should be paid extra for working on statutory holidays. They obviously do not believe in the system of double time for holidays that are worked. I suggest they probably also are in a position where they abuse, and widely abuse, this business of sick leave. In the reply by the minister he referred to the fact that they could take their sick leave and use the sick leave pay as compensation for the day they worked, though the fact that they did come in early every morning could be considered as overtime.

It is generally agreed by everybody who has thought about this matter at all that the interests of this country can only be served by bettering our labour code so that our workers may be in a continually better position to serve the needs of this country. I think it is a step in the wrong direction when the Canadian government itself gives no assistance in the relationship it has with the postal employees in connection with this latest dispute.

This is shown in other ways. The Prime Minister himself said this year that the workers of the country, particularly those employed in the railway industry, would have an opportunity of presenting their case before a committee of this house. But when the matter of the railway workers was referred to that committee it did not concern all the railway workers of this country but only some of them, those employed by the Canadian National Railways. I believe there is a problem, well known to many members of this house, in relation to those C.P.R. workers who were pensioned off many years ago.

I refer to one example. An engineer who retired in 1953 and one who retired recently, both with 48 years' service, are treated in entirely different ways. The first receives a pension of $123.45 per month with no survivor benefit. The other receives a pension of $346.74. Should he predecease his wife she will receive a pension of $173.37. Her pension will be $49.92 higher than that of the first employee with 48 years of actual service as an engineer. Had the first engineer made provision for his wife his pension would have been reduced to less than $93 to provide her with a pension of less than $46. There were nearly 900 pensioners in British Columbia in 1953 receiving pensions of less than $51 per month with no survivor benefit, who were, at that time, given no consideration whatever.

This same condition applies at every terminal on the Canadian Pacific Railway from coast to coast. All pensioned employees for whom we speak, had they been employed by the Canadian National Railways, would have received equal treatment on the basis of service and income with those who were retired after January 1, 1953, including a survivor benefit.

We raise these matters because they indicate that this government is not being honest with the Canadian people when it says it wants to speak for labour and give labour a fair deal. We should look at what this pension plan really amounts to. It could, of course, be argued that the Canadian National is a government owned railway while the Canadian Pacific is not. I do not pretend to discuss now the merits of the Canadian National as against the Canadian Pacific, but it is simply not true that the Canadian Pacific has stood on its own two feet. I think it could be argued over the years we have spent almost as much on the C.P.R. as we have on the C.N.R. I would not even go so far as to say that we owe much more to one than we do to the other. I do suggest, however, that these pensioners have not been given any consideration during all these years. The position of that company was not such as to warrant the statement that they could not afford to pay increases to these people on pension.

In looking at the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1952, we find that the total reserves and unadjusted credits amount to $555,843,167, which is a sizeable sum of money. By 1960, deferred credits, reserves and provision for depreciation totalled $1,057,665,415. This would indicate to me that we have given a great deal of money, through subsidies and other means to this company in return for which we have received very little, especially by way of consideration for employees who have been helpful during all these years in establishing and maintaining that company.

I believe, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister was less than fair when he referred to a committee this matter of Canadian National pensions and did not include the question of Canadian Pacific pensions. It seems to me that all these people who believe in the free enterprise system, the social credit members and the union nationale members, are not willing to refer the question of Canadian Pacific Railway operations to a committee, and thus prove to the members of the house that this company is all that is alleged to be. I am suggesting that these members of the house should be willing to follow this course if they are going to be fair to labour and to the Conservative party.

The unemployment insurance fund has been practically depleted. The government has suggested that they are going to put in $170 million to tide this fund over a difficult period. This step should have been taken a long time ago. The fund should never have been allowed to get into the depleted condition in which it is now. I believe that this amount should have been added to the fund, and more, rather than using it as a subsidy to finance government operations in dealing with the recession, something for which this government was responsible.

In recent days, Mr. Speaker, this government has done something else to which labour will have to give some consideration. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) asked a question the other day concerning lay-offs at the Saskatoon plant of Westeel Products Limited. Evidently the unemployment insurance commission office there had suspended these employees from receiving benefits because of a rumour to the effect the employees had been laid off in anticipation of a strike. Does this action not mean the end of open negotiations? Does it not mean the end of negotiations as we know them? Is it now going to be a fact that every time a union says, we are going to push this situation to a settlement the unemployment insurance commission will say there is a threatened strike and lay-offs are justified? If this is true, it seems to me the procedure will eliminate many of the benefits for which labour has fought for many years and which I am sure the majority of the Canadian people appreciate. Is it not true that one of the advantages we have in this country is wide open negotiation between labour and management in which the public has an interest? The newspapers give wide coverage of these negotiations leading to settlement, as well as the work of conciliation boards.

It seems to me that if this decision of the unemployment insurance commission is allowed to stand, the result will be that labour will have to cover up its negotiations. It will never be able to declare its intentions, and it will have to act behind a wall of secrecy. In my opinion, such a situation would not be in the interests of this country and certainly would not be in the interests of the conciliation service.

I am at a loss to say what we should call this budget. It seems to me that the government faces a grave problem. Although some people forget about the deficit budgeting on former occasions, I feel that the government needs some justification for this request for deficit budgeting now. In my opinion this decision can only be valid if we are willing to believe this budget will help to expand the economy of this country and decrease the unemployment that is now so prevalent; that it will do something to settle the cost-price squeeze that is affecting the farmers of this country and will also produce a more favourable climate for our industries. This budget is not the budget of the Minister of Finance or Mr. Coyne. They are both orthodox, conservative financiers, men for whom I have some respect because they have principles and know what those principles are. They are both well educated and well schooled in the principles of conservative financing. If they were not, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) would stand up in this house and denounce them because he is an expert and student, as well as an honest evaluator of conservative financial policy.

I say that these two gentlemen are orthodox, conservative financiers. The same cannot be said, however, of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). These ministers decided that they were going to solve certain problems for election purposes, that they were going to try to win back some of the appeal their party had lost. I believe they are going to do this at the expense of Mr. Coyne and probably of the Minister of Finance. It is no wonder that not too many government supporters have been able to get up and justify this particular budget.

As I have said, we are going to solve this problem in one way. We are going to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar. We are going to purchase United States funds in order to maintain some degree of balance between the Canadian and United States dollar. The minister used the word "approximate". We do not know whether he means 90, 95 or even 100. I suggest that we are taking a great risk. There will be a momentary advantage for the people of my area, the pulp and paper industry, the gold mining industry, as well as many of the secondary industries. However, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has pointed out, there will not necessarily be any long range advantage. This course may not have any effect on the automobile industry and may cost Canadians a great deal. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative members should not be too happy about this budget until they are much better informed as to how we are going to stabilize the price of the Canadian dollar. In some other countries this measure has only brought temporary relief and has cost a considerable amount of money. But I do want to say that I am perturbed at this government in particular because of its attitude toward the matter of pensions. I have always been interested in pensions. I mentioned this the other night and I should like to use as an authority an outstanding Conservative in my area who had this to say about pensions. He was asked in 1957 what the Progressive Conservative policy was on pensions and this is what he had to say:

> I have not heard of pensions to miners or any other workers being included in the policies of any political party.
> The Progressive Conservative government realizes that manpower is becoming less and less essential as more and better machines are designed to do the job.

This may be true, but it is no solution to the problem. People are still around; we have not eliminated them. While the machines may be doing a better job, the people are still here and something must be done for them.

The Prime Minister appointed Professor Clark to examine the United States system. An article appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, March 31, 1959, which had this to say about the United States system:

> Under the American system, contributions are made by employees, employers and the self employed. Pension payments start at the age of 65 for men and 62 for women and even earlier if ill health forces a person's retirement. Canada's universal pension starts at the age of 70.
> Payments to retired American workers can go as high as $108.50 a month. The average payment is $76 a month for a single person, $128 for married couples without dependents, and $65 for aged widows.
> Professor Clark said that what "attracted" him to the American system was the fact that it was self supporting. The American employee pays a tax of 2¼ per cent of the first $4,200 of annual pay. The employer makes a similar contribution but he can charge this up to business expenses for tax purposes.

Later Professor Clark went on to say that Canada cannot afford the pension scale of the United States. He said:

> 1. A huge pile of money would be needed to turn the existing $55 a month federal pension plan an employee-employer contributory scheme.
> 2. Because average Canadian earnings are about 30 per cent below those in the U.S., Canadians for at least a decade couldn't hope to achieve the maximum U.S. benefits which currently run to about $127 a month.
> 3. At least two years would be required to bring in a new scheme and before plunging into a contributory plan it would be "very important" for the government to consider other methods of boosting pensions.
> 4. Presumably, under a contributory plan, the minimum monthly payment would be the present $55 pension. This would compare with the present $33 minimum in the U.S., a minimum achieved only after 22 years of collecting contributions.

The minister said that this was a matter to which he would give some leadership in relation to bringing the provincial and federal governments together. In my opinion this is not acceptable. I do not think that we in the parliament of Canada should agree to the idea of establishing something that will divide and keep separate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the budget debate as well as the speech of the minister and the budget itself which we are now considering have inevitably prompted the question in our minds: Why has "expansionist" finance become a government slogan after four years of recession and slow-down during which the government rejected proposals for expansionist finance from this side whenever they were put forward? Well, the question perhaps is not too difficult to answer. The answer is that we are approaching an election.

This budget has been described by the minister as an economic budget. Well, it is an economic budget in the sense perhaps that it is not itself an election budget; the glamorous political gifts are to come next time. The good features in this budget—and there are some, we put some of them forward ourselves—are four years late, but the weaknesses and inadequacy of the budget, and I hope to point out some of the weaknesses, will be felt now.

This budget is a confession of the failure of the government to do anything really effective during four years to halt the decline in our development; a decline shown by the fact—and this cannot be disputed in this house or outside of it—that real output per capita has decreased in those four years, while in the previous eight years it had increased by 20 per cent. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this budget is simply further evidence that we have a government which mistakes words for action, which is more concerned with the sensation created than the result achieved. It seems to think that cleverness in politics is a substitute for skill, wisdom and steadiness in government, and that excitement is a substitute for efficiency.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: He says production had increased 20 per cent. Will he indicate how much of that was price increase?

Mr. Pearson: A substantial portion; I could not indicate the figures. I do not know what the price increase was in the eight years; perhaps the hon. member knows more accurately than I do. It would be something like 4 per cent, or 5 per cent, if I had to hazard a guess, but I am not sure.

Mr. Macdonnell: I put on the record this morning, if I remember rightly, that from 1945 to 1952 it was 50 per cent.

Mr. Pearson: Well, even if it was 50 per cent—I am not accepting these figures, I just do not know; my hon. friend has not put them forward as being accurate, but even if that were the case—it would still leave a real increase per capita of 10 per cent against an actual decrease in the four years. However, the attitude of the government, the effectiveness of the government is shown, as I was beginning to point out, by the fact, in our view, that problems are allowed to drag on until they become crises. We have said this many times over here. Then expedients are frantically sought out too late, however, to deal with those crises, while a smokescreen is thrown up to conceal failure to act in time. I could give many examples to support that statement. For instance, unemployment was not even, in the eyes of the government, a really serious problem until the autumn of 1960.

The railway problem was allowed to drag on until it became critical, when a subsidy was thrown in, as usual, as a stopgap. Defence policy is in a state of confused indecision. We are spending millions and millions on we know not what kind of defence.

Mr. Harkness: You don't know but everybody else knows.

Mr. Pearson: We do know one thing, Mr. Speaker, namely that we are buying a second-hand United States interceptor to replace a first class Canadian plane that was scrapped and sunk without a trace except the trace of bitter resentment and national chagrin.

Mr. Harkness: The most impractical effort any government ever made was to start that plane.

Mr. Pearson: Monetary policy is no responsibility of the government. That is the position they took up till February last. When Mr. Coyne exposed the fallacy and, indeed, the danger of that attitude, four years later a royal commission is set up to deal with the problem. We have advocated formally by resolution in this house that monetary policy should be a subject for parliamentary inquiry and investigation, and this should have been done a long time ago. International trade problems can be evaded while the government preaches and lectures and waits for something to happen in Europe. A budget should be balanced, until five failures to do so convert a deficit into a suddenly discovered virtue. And so on and so on and so on—confusion, indecision and delay.

These are the methods that were followed in the production of the budget which we are now considering. It was produced after unprecedented delay and unprecedented excitement, disturbance and crisis for which the government is responsible and which culminated in the unhappy controversy over the governor of the Bank of Canada. The impression was created by all this excitement, and perhaps it was meant to be created, that something really important, something really big, was to be included in the budget, something to lead us out of the valley of recession again, into the uplands of expansion, growth and prosperity, something that would constitute a massive attack on unemployment which remains so distressingly high, higher indeed than the same time last year in spite of all the complacent predictions of ministers.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this budget was to have been such an intoxicating one that the governor of the Bank of Canada was to be forced to resign before he could see it. As it happened, there is not very much in the budget to cause him any surprise or provoke much disagreement with it or to give adequate stimulus to our economy which needs that stimulus so badly. In short, the budget did not live up to its advance billing.

Indeed, so little of expansion is there in the inadequate measures of this budget that the minister himself predicts an increase in our gross national product for the current year of only 3 per cent. That is less than last year when the gross national product was not enough to produce jobs in mid-winter for more than three quarters of a million people. We can perhaps take some comfort from the fact that the minister may be as far off in this prediction as in the others he has made.

This year is to be another deficit year but it is not an expansion deficit. The nature of the budget makes that clear in spite of all the words of the minister in his attempt to prove the contrary. Away back in June, 1958, the Minister of Finance had this to say. I think I have quoted these words already but they bear repetition.

> These huge deficits ... carry serious implications for the ... future health ... of our country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have had four more since then, accidental and unplanned. The minister chided us and me in particular last evening with inconsistency but what did he say just a year ago? I quote from his budget speech of that time:

> The restoration of a balanced budget this year—

That was 1960.

> —constitutes the achievement of an objective to which we have been moving purposefully and deliberately for some time. The position we have now reached, with its solid prospect of a fully balanced budget, represents the fruits of carefully designed policies; it is not something that just happened.

That is quite true. It did not happen. The minister's predictions last year were as wrong as his recent praise of a deficit rings hollow. It is true that the minister as a prophet on economic matters still thunders in the best old testament style but few of his prophecies are being fulfilled. So we have learned from experience to take him with several grains of salt when he starts forecasting. Perhaps he will be as bad a prophet this year as in the others. After all, last year he predicted a $12 million surplus which became a $345 million deficit. The reason he gives for that mistake in the white paper is that unfortunately 1960 was a year not of the solid expansion predicted but of adjustment and of special complexity. Indeed, on page 46 of the white paper he finally breaks down and admits that the economy has slowed down since this government took office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Doom and gloom.

Mr. Pearson: So his record of predictions is not a very respectable one. In his budget speech in 1960 the minister made other predictions which in the light of experience have been shown to be away out. We all remember that he said that the gross national product would go up 6 per cent. In fact, we got an increase of 3.2 per cent and only 2 per cent in constant dollars. Yet when I commented in the house on the minister's predictions in my budget speech last year and said that this and certain other predictions were too optimistic, when I said that in my view the increase in the gross national product would more likely be 3.5 per cent—I was a little optimistic—and that there would be serious difficulties in 1960 with regard to unemployment, and when I asked the minister at that time what plans the government had to meet these economic difficulties which we felt were looming up the minister again wrapped the flag around himself and accused us of impugning the honour and reputation of Canada and of selling our country short. Unhappily, Mr. Speaker, we were right and he was wrong.

An hon. Member: Again.

Mr. Pearson: The minister and his colleagues are no scoundrels but patriotism is often their last refuge against argument that cannot be met in any other way. Look at unemployment. The minister said last year that the situation would improve. In fact we know now that the average during 1960 was 7 per cent compared with 6 per cent in 1959. Capital expenditures in 1960 were $8,200 million or 2.6 per cent below 1959. Capital expenditures in this country as a percentage of gross national production were 22.8 per cent, which is the lowest since 1951.

An increase in private investment was forecast by the minister's colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), in one of his predictions. He said it would increase 4 per cent whereas in fact it decreased 2.6 per cent. So, Mr. Speaker, how can we have confidence in this government's fiscal policies and in their administration of them when the Minister of Finance can be so wrong in his assessment of economic conditions in this country and of the government's financial accounts?

Even the minister himself no longer has that same buoyant confidence in his predictions of things to come.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you sure?

Mr. Pearson: This year he refused to give us a straightforward and clear-cut forecast for the increase in the gross national product in 1961. He is becoming a little more careful as he goes on because this is what he said as found on page 6640 of Hansard:

But this improvement—

He is talking about the expected improvement which we all hope will take place:

—which could be expected in the ordinary course of events and without further stimulus, would, I believe, be modest, an increase of about 3 per cent in the G.N.P.

This is less than last year. So the minister has become, in my opinion, overcautious and that is quite a change. In 1960 which was a recession year, the increase was 3.2 per cent. In 1961, a year in which the Prime Minister and the other ministers tell us that the recession is over, the Minister of Finance predicts a rise of only 3 per cent, less than last year. The minister has become a prophet of doom and gloom.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Benidickson: We need at least 6 per cent.

Mr. Pearson: In a year in which he says the recession is over, he only has the confidence to predict an increase in the G.N.P. which is less than last year, a year of recession. How is he going to explain that? He has been telling us that the recession is lifting. If it is lifting we shall surely have in our production next year a greater increase than 3 per cent, which was not enough last year to prevent massive unemployment and slow down.

Why has the minister become so pessimistic and so cautious in his forecasting? I can see one reason and I have a feeling that it is the right reason. The minister wants to be in a position to tell us next year that the actual increase has exceeded his expectations. I can picture him in the house, if he is here then, saying that his expectations were exceeded and that the outcome could be due only to his budget and government policies. The modesty of the minister this year is merely intended to serve as a background for his glorification next year.

Mr. Benidickson: Having been struck out four times.

Mr. Pearson: Next year he may feel will be the year before the election. I am prepared to say this, and although he does not need it I should be glad to give the minister permission now to quote these words a year hence if we are both here. I am prepared to say that the minister will be wrong again this year, but for once and for the only time since he has been minister he will be wrong on the conservative side.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is hedging now.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: In spite of the government's lack of effective policies and because of the hard work of our people, because of price increases—and I shall have something to say about their probability later—because of the resilience of our economy and because of business improvement across the line, I believe that the gross national product in current dollars will be higher than that estimated by the minister.

Mr. Benidickson: There is statesmanship for you; not politics.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I am also prepared to say that the average level of unemployment in 1961, in spite of the minister's claim will be at least as high as that in 1960 and in spite of the minister's claim that there is nothing structurally wrong with our economy. The minister has been converted in another respect.

Mr. Benidickson: Somersaults.

Mr. Pearson: He is making a good many trips to the penitent's bench these days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He should do so.

Mr. Pearson: We all remember how he used to lecture us in this house and how Mr. Coyne used to lecture us also in the country in sombre terms about the dangers of uncontrolled expansion and inflation, and this at a time when we were in the midst of a recession with massive unemployment. Now that we are told that we are out of the recession and that we are on the road to full recovery and expansion again, as the Prime Minister keeps on assuring us, in this situation, which should result in an increase of inflationary pressure, the minister now tells us that any serious danger of inflation has disappeared. I had better quote him. I think these words have already been put on the record. As found at page 6649 of Hansard he said this:

I do not think that we are in any serious danger of inflation under present circumstances, with so much unused capacity in our economy. A decline in the exchange rate will mean modest price advances for some of the goods we obtain from abroad as well as some of our export commodities. I am confident, however, that if under present conditions of unused economic capacity there is any effect on consumer prices and the cost of living—

And he used these words again last night.

—these will be minimal.

I suppose that means practically not noticeable. I believe that when the minister presents his next annual budget, he will have to admit that he has been wrong here, that prices will start to rise again—indeed they are starting already—and that inflation will be, in the present circumstances, a real danger, as it was in the booming mid fifties. But the great difference with that earlier period will be that the rise in prices now will be largely due to government policies and will be accompanied by unused capacity and abnormal unemployment, whereas in that earlier period it was caused by shortages and bottlenecks in the private sector of our economy. Last year the minister overestimated the rise in the G.N.P. and the danger of inflation. This year I think he has underestimated both.

There is an even more spectacular conversion of the minister. This is his conversion to the virtues of deficit financing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A planned deficit.

Mr. Pearson: The threat of yesterday has become the opportunity of today. The economic threat of yesterday has become the political opportunity of today. Listen to this excerpt from his budget speech, from this always flexible but now expanding minister. As found at page 6642 of Hansard he said this:

> When there is a substantial degree of slackness in the economy... budget deficits can provide an important stimulus... If appropriately planned and timed—

Then he says: in present circumstances a sizeable deficit will help to stimulate the economy.

Mr. Benidickson: A year too late.

Mr. Pearson: Why did the minister not talk like this and act on this talk in those earlier years when a deficit in an emergency situation for stimulating the economy and planned for that purpose would have been of such great value.

Mr. Benidickson: He did not see it.

Mr. Pearson: The minister now says that if we quarrel with his conversion to deficit financing we are contradicting ourselves. He went to some lengths to prove this or in attempting to prove this last evening. Our position on this matter has not changed. No one likes going into debt, or he should not like going into debt either personally or nationally. However, when you are in trouble, borrowing can be essential to get you out of trouble but only for that purpose. If it achieves that purpose, then you stop borrowing and begin to put something by, if you are wise, for the next rainy day. But the minister now says we are out of trouble or soon will be out of trouble but we are going to borrow more than ever. The minister in this respect is not contradicting others as he accused me of doing last night. He is contradicting himself, something which is worse.

May I now say a few words about the budget itself, and about the policies that are put forward in the budget. The budget contains several policy announcements but, of course, it is also remarkable for its omissions. There is nothing in the budget for agriculture. Does that mean that the wheat producers will not even get this year the $1 per acre payment they received last year, the virtues of which the Prime Minister was preaching yesterday on the prairies? Does this mean, also, that the government claims that eastern farmers have no problems and do not have to face serious difficulties, at a time when their income continues to decline?

There is nothing in the budget to assist the long range development and short range unemployment difficulties of the Atlantic provinces. Surely the government must now realize that its provision for double depreciation is completely inadequate and in its application much too restrictive, if I may use that word, to do the job. If we want to remove the hardship of unemployment and stagnation; if we want our economy to get moving again, we must begin by effective means of assistance—if I may use the expression without being misunderstood—for our economically depressed areas. So far as the opposition are concerned, we have insisted since 1958 on the urgent necessity of remedying this situation of regional chronic unemployment.

In March, 1961, for instance, I put forward in this house a six point program of regional recovery. We had a two day debate on this important matter at that time. But the government, in spite of the most solemn promises which it made in 1958, has refused to do anything adequate for the development of the Atlantic provinces or other underdeveloped areas in this country.

What about trade policy? The Minister of Finance told us a few days before the budget —and somewhat surprisingly because of his record—that he was in favour of an expansionist trade policy. He devoted quite a long section of his budget speech to trade matters, but it was the old lecture. Canada, he said, would continue to adhere to GATT and to respect her international obligations. He suggested at least, if he did not say so in precise terms, that those of us on this side who were advocating proposals looking for an Atlantic free trade area which would be open to any country in the world to enter on the terms which were applicable to the others, were advocating a kind of restrictionist bilateral approach to trade problems. Not at all. This is the way to approach multilateral trade in the present circumstances.

The minister then said this. This is the only indication of his understanding this particular problem:

We shall, of course, have to adapt to changes in the world around us and be alert and flexible in meeting new challenges and opportunities as they arise. For the present at least the situation is much too unsettled to consider seriously a sharp reorientation in our policies along these lines.

In other words, let us wait and see. Let us change our policy, if necessary, only after other countries change theirs and when it may be too late to safeguard, let alone promote, our own interests. What a revealing Conservative attitude: We will not promote necessary change but we will adapt to the changes which are being made by others which are forced upon us. In this connection I would draw attention to Europe. Where is the positive, dynamic and imaginative trade policy that our country so urgently and so badly needs at this time?

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the budget proposals which will, according to the minister, transform our recent toils and trials to new triumphs. They can be divided into four main categories. I shall say only a few words about each. There is the exchange rate policy, debt management and interest rates policies, fiscal policy including tax changes, and the deficit.

First the exchange rate policy, about which there has been a good deal said by hon. members on this side of the house. I do not think we need apologize for that because this is certainly one of the most important features of the budget. The minister has at last come to the conclusion that the high premium on the Canadian dollar was hurting our economy. He is now prepared, with all the risks involved—some of which were pointed out by my hon. friend from Essex East this afternoon—to see the exchange fund used to bring down the exchange rate of our dollar. The words he used—and these are the words which cause us so much uneasiness—were to bring the dollar down "to a significant discount".

On this side of the house we have been deploring the high premium on the Canadian dollar since the recession of 1957-58 and we have been steadily advocating appropriate remedial government policies. Notwithstanding what the minister tried to say last evening in accusing us of contradicting ourselves, we still support that view. But the minister has certainly drastically changed his view. Last year—and I think these words were quoted this afternoon—he deplored the high premium, but he claimed that it resulted from "the free play of forces of supply and demand", and he strongly opposed an arbitrary and artificial attempt by the government to work against basic economic forces.

Well, what is he doing now? He had this to say, as reported at page 2673 of Hansard:

[Mr. Pearson.]

An attempt by the government artificially to lower the external price of the Canadian dollar would involve borrowing or raising by taxes very large sums of money with which to buy up foreign exchange.

Then a little later:

In other words we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what the minister is doing now. He is proposing to do just that, to use the exchange fund in "an arbitrary and artificial attempt by the government" to bring about a "significant discount". This was a late conversion by the minister, but we are always glad to see him make progress in understanding and wisdom. But we disagree with the uncertainty of his goal and the danger of speculation which will be created by that uncertainty. We disagree, as has already been pointed out on this side of the house, with the methods he proposes to use in order to reach that goal, if indeed it is a goal at all.

By refusing to define what he means by a "significant discount", the minister will certainly create uncertainty and confusion, if he has not already done so, which surely can only adversely affect our external financial transactions. What is a significant discount—3 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, or more? Nobody knows. What a wonderful opportunity for gambling.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The worst kind of speculation.

Mr. Pearson: The minister wants to control the price of our dollar arbitrarily but he does not know where he wants it to be. He will not disclose the discount he wishes to achieve. What could be more arbitrary and artificial than that approach? The significant discount could be 3 per cent one week and I suppose it could be 5 per cent the following week, these figures to be maintained not by market action but presumably by governmental action. How can our exporters and importers carry on their business on that basis, with the constant threat of governmental interference with market forces but with no fixed objective to be attained by that intervention? Surely that is another example of wrong and arbitrary use of ministerial authority.

The elimination of the premium on the Canadian dollar is certainly a worth-while objective. We have been saying that on this side of the house for a long time. It should have been sought long ago. Our trading partners and competitors would then have undoubtedly understood our position and accepted such a move. But to seek to achieve a significant but undetermined discount now through arbitrary governmental action of the nature proposed by the minister, when we have no currency difficulties, is something very different indeed.

The government is trying to secure through exchange fund operations advantages and benefits which it was not able to secure through tariff and trade negotiations. We are also, presumably, going to try through this kind of action to give greater protection to our domestic industries because we are unable directly to increase tariffs generally due to our international obligations under GATT. The minister has pointed out that we must remain true to them, and I agree. What would happen to international trade and ordinary financial transactions in the world if all other nations were doing what our government is now proposing to do? In so doing, the minister certainly violates the spirit of GATT although in another part of his speech he proclaimed that Canada—and I have quoted this already—must remain a law abiding member of the international financial and commercial community.

What about our position in relation to the international monetary fund? Surely this must be giving the minister some cause for worry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: Well, the hon. gentleman should be worrying about it. While other nations have a fixed exchange rate which they cannot change without the approval of the fund, Canada has been able to avoid this rigidity because we have been willing to let market forces determine our floating exchange rate. What will happen now? Can we be the only member of the fund which can devalue its currency through government action without having an obligation to seek the approval of the other members of the fund? Why should Canada be placed in this preferred position? Perhaps the minister would explain that. It must also be pointed out that this significant devaluation of the Canadian dollar will have certain adverse effects. It will have certain advantageous effects, too, of course, in so far as it will benefit our exporters. If it does that, and the benefits are maintained, that is all to the good. But it will impose—and the minister will surely not deny this—an additional financial burden on the provinces and municipalities which in recent years have been forced to borrow on the American market because of tight money conditions and the high interest rates prevailing in our own economy. Moreover, producers and consumers will also suffer to the extent that they rely on imported goods the prices of which, if they are imported from the United States, will go up.

When the minister last year referred to the high premium on the Canadian dollar he had this to say, and I think these words were quoted by my hon. friend from Essex East:

> On the other hand it—

That is, lowering the premium on the dollar.

> —lowers the cost of imported raw materials and semi-finished goods used by manufacturers. It has helped to keep down our cost of living and the cost of producing.

It has helped, he said, to keep down our cost of living. The minister now reverses that policy. Does he deny, then, that one effect of this reversal might be to help to increase the cost of living?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Conditions are different now.

Mr. Pearson: That is true. I have just said that. Conditions are different in the sense that we are told—and I hope it is right—that we are getting out of the recession. If we are getting out of the recession then our productive capacity is being more and more used and in these circumstances inflationary pressures will be stronger and this kind of exchange action should have a greater effect on the cost of living than it would have had if it had been taken earlier.

The minister has deplored the high level of capital inflow in recent years. He deplored —and I can understand his anxiety because it is one we all share—foreign control and particularly United States control over our industries. He referred to this in his budget speech as reported at page 6645 of Hansard. But that process of foreign capital moving into this country and investing in and taking over our industries will be easier by reason of this exchange action. A significant devaluation of the Canadian dollar will inevitably depreciate the value of Canadian assets in terms of the American dollar and it will give an additional inducement and an additional advantage to American investors as opposed to Canadian investors to purchase existing Canadian firms and do the very thing the minister says he is trying to prevent.

Now we come to debt management and interest rates. The minister, who is the very model of inconsistency, had this to say about interest rates on February 21, 1961. That is not very long ago. He said:

> Lest the impression be created in the minds of some hon. members that the government has brought about high interest rates let me point out that interest rates in this country, while they are higher than the government would like to see on borrowings it has to make are lower than the interest rates in the United Kingdom and have been close to the 1960 rates of interest in the United States, the country which is the largest reservoir of capital in the world and whose rates traditionally are lower than interest rates in Canada.

That statement appears at page 2267 of Hansard. What does the minister say now? What did he say the other evening in this house as reported at page 6645?

—interest rates in Canada are out of line with those in the United States and some of the European capital exporting countries. We should like to see these spreads narrowed.

Well, I am not aware and I doubt if the minister is aware that those spreads have widened since February.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, they have.

Mr. Pearson: At that time, according to the minister, they did not exist or they were normal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They have widened since.

Mr. Pearson: In any case, the minister is telling us that he is now in favour of lowering interest rates, another conversion that comes a little late. The lowering of interest rates and easier credit should have been initiated long before now. But the minister in those days said he was fighting inflation. That, according to him, was the primary danger and his sermon was based on the theme of work and save, down with the demon of inflation. He wanted expansion, of course. We all wanted expansion. But he was worried about the kind of expansion we might get and its effect on inflation. Well, the minister in his budget now is giving to the government a set of conflicting policy objectives. I think it is easy to demonstrate this.

What about the demand for funds? This, in the months, ahead, would certainly have an effect on interest rates. If, as we are continually being told, the Canadian economy is on the road to recovery, private demands for loans will inevitably increase. Moreover, all the provinces and a great number of municipalities have already announced that they are planning for cash deficits in 1961 and 1962 and their demands for funds or their borrowing requirements will undoubtedly be heavy. Finally, according to the minister's own estimates, the new borrowing requirements of the federal government are likely to exceed $1 billion, a fact which now gives the hon. gentleman more comfort than the concern it used to give him if we can interpret his remarks last night. This means, surely, that the demand for funds is likely to increase rapidly in this country during the latter part of the current fiscal year. The decision announced by the minister with respect to debt management—and he put forward these figures as a mitigating force which will neutralize, perhaps, in his mind, this danger—will not do very much to curb this demand, or to reduce the pressures which are likely to be exerted on our financial markets. The intention, and I use the words of the minister, "to confine new federal market issues for at least the next several months to the 'short end' of the market", is supposed to be one of the things that will save us. That, of course, is not new. Since the great conversion loan most of the borrowings of the federal government have been, I believe, of a short term nature. The change to be made in the portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund is not likely to have any material effect at a time when, we are told and we hope, disbursements will now begin to be in better balance with the revenue of the fund. That is the only possible explanation one can give to the government's refusal to do anything about the fund. Finally, there is the establishment of a purchase fund of $100 million—I do not know where that is coming from—for the orderly retirement of government debt. This cannot possibly have any material influence on the market during the current fiscal year.

So much for demands. Now, what about the supply of funds to meet these rapidly increasing demands and the effect this will have on the minister's policy of trying to get interest rates down. The three main sources of supply are the savings of the Canadian people, the net capital inflow from abroad and changes in the money supply. The minister admitted the other night that the rate of Canadian savings is—I have not got his exact words—already high and reasonably satisfactory and this source of supply is not likely to increase very much with a mild recovery. In any event, he did not hold out any exaggerated—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say the latter part of that sentence.

Mr. Pearson: Well, I will adopt the latter part as my own words, that supply from this source is not likely to increase very much with a mild recovery.

The second source is capital inflow. The government wants a lower level of capital inflow and has already taken steps to bring that about. Finally, the minister has ruled out, and rightly so, the possibility of a rapid increase in the money supply. I hope that in the face of all the pressure which will begin to develop he will stick to this. The minister said, as reported at page 6645 of Hansard:

It would be folly, for example, to attempt drastically and artificially to force interest rates down by irresponsible increases in the money supply. Such a device would be not only unsound but before long would prove to be self-defeating.

He is certainly right in that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would you mind reading the next sentence?

Mr. Pearson: I would be delighted to read the next sentence, but I have not got it here. Perhaps if I am unfair to the minister he would give me the next sentence, because I am sure he would remember it.

Under such conditions of supply and demand we would expect higher, not lower, interest rates and tight, not easier, money. Yet the minister says that he wants—and I have no doubt he does want—to reduce interest rates and to bring about improvements in our capital markets which will be of direct benefit to the provinces, municipalities, business and other borrowers. That was, he claims, one of the main reasons why he found it necessary to get rid of the governor of the Bank of Canada. It will be interesting to see how the minister will achieve all these conflicting objectives he has now indicated. I predict that if economic conditions develop as he has indicated, and if he respects all his other commitments, as he will no doubt desire to do, he will not be able to reduce interest rates or to maintain the money supply at a responsible level as he promised.

We come now to fiscal policies.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can give the Leader of the Opposition the page now; the second column of page 6645, beginning with the words, "We attach".

Mr. Pearson: I think I had better read it because I do not believe the minister should be quoted in part.

We attach high importance to a climate of confidence and understanding in our financial markets. What is required is a judicious and well coordinated combination of fiscal, monetary and general economic measures, the elements of which vary in acordance with the needs of the times.

That is an admirable doctrine. I am certainly glad to repeat that because the minister emphasizes the desirability and necessity of co-ordinating fiscal and monetary policy. It was not very long ago that the minister was saying he had no responsibility for monetary policy. He now says that in an effort to reduce interest rates and get easier money it is absolutely vital that there is a co-ordination of fiscal, economic and monetary policies. This co-ordination can now be brought about by a government which refused to take responsibility for monetary policy.

I come to fiscal policy and, in particular, to the tax changes which normally would constitute the proof of the minister's claim that this is indeed an expansionist budget. The tax reductions, as we have so often been told in this debate, in the current year will amount to $65 million. Of this $65 million, $55 million will come from the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles. I am not going to deal with that because the hon. member for Essex East, who is primarily responsible for the removal of this excise tax, has dealt with it in some detail and pointed out that the benefits which it is hoped will come from the removal of the tax will be modified by certain circumstances which have arisen, including the sales tax in Ontario, the reduction of the exchange rate which will increase the value of imports and the reduction of the allowance for secondhand cars.

However, taking that $55 million out of the $65 million of tax reduction, what have we left? We have $10 million in tax reductions. Surely, we are not going to get a miracle of expansion from this. If that is the measure of the so-called expansionist fiscal policies of the minister, he certainly misled the Canadian people when he made his statement in the house on June 14 about a budget which was meant to be so sensational but which was, in fact, such an anti-climax. We on this side have recommended on more than one occasion during recent years that tax incentives, including specific tax exemptions and reductions, be used to promote a healthy economic development in our country, particularly in a time of recession when the economy has to get a shot in the arm for expansion purposes. The objectives sought by the minister in proposing tax changes in this budget affecting business are sound and sensible, although again they are too late in terms of our economic condition.

However, the methods which he puts forward, as is so often the case when his principles are sound, are completely inadequate and ineffective. Let us consider the technique of accelerated depreciation about which he has made so much. When applied within the limit of capital cost allowances not exceeding 100 per cent, this measure can at best be useful as an anti-recession measure only in persuading business to accelerate its investment program but it cannot induce industry to increase and enlarge such programs. The reason, of course, is that accelerated depreciation, applied within the limited context of 100 per cent capital cost allowance, merely means a deferred tax payment. This is precisely what is wrong with the minister's tax proposal. He wants to use a device which can induce business to re-schedule its investment plan in the short run, and that may be desirable, to promote long term industrial development and to stimulate economic expansion. In spite of the minister's claims for this proposal, the only objective conclusion to be drawn is that the proposed tax changes will have very little effect indeed on the rate of growth of Canada's economy.

We are, therefore, left with a deficit as the real shot in the arm for the economy, a deficit which includes $65 million of tax reduction of which $55 million comes from the removal of the excise tax on automobiles. The minister has told us that he does not know what this deficit is going to be. It might be $600 million, it might be $650 million or it might be $700 million. He sort of hit a medium amount between $600 million and $700 million and suggested it may be $650 million. One thing is sure. According to the minister his deficit was planned. He repeated last night that it is a planned deficit this time, and it is timely. It has come just at the right time.

Mr. Benidickson: Everything at the right time.

Mr. Pearson: Well, the deficit of course was not planned at all. The best evidence of this is that it was forecast months ago by the Canadian tax foundation. Were they planning the deficit for the minister? There is no more planning for expansionist purposes in this deficit than there was for last year's deficit which began as a surplus and ended as a deficit of $345 million. It might not have been quite so high if it had not been for Good Friday.

Surely the minister cannot contend that this was a planned deficit. On top of the deficit, the estimates prepared in the fall of 1960 involved an increase of $383 million as compared with the main estimates of 1960-61. According to the minister when he tabled those estimates on January 26, I think it was, of last year, what accounted for this increase? The minister at that time indicated—and I think he had something to say about this last night—that the two main factors accounting for the increase in the estimates were civil service salaries and conditional payments to the provinces, especially to Quebec for the hospitalization plan. As we see it, Mr. Speaker, such increased expenditures could hardly have been planned to meet the economic conditions. Assuming no increase in revenues in 1961-62, as compared with 1960-61, rising expenditures added to the deficit of $345 million last year would have produced in the current year a deficit of $728 million, which is very close to the estimate given by the minister.

So much for planning. On the revenue side the minister expects an increase in 1961-62 of only $150 million. While he announced tax reductions valued at $65 million it remains true to say that the lack of growth in revenue is mainly due to the recent recession and to the current stagnation. On the basis of this evidence, it is clear that the minister shows no respect for himself or for the facts when he claims that he planned the deficit this year to bring about expansion.

We also claim, contrary to what the minister has said, that this deficit is badly timed as well as being not expansionist. We are told by the minister, we are told by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce ad nauseam, that 1961 will be a year of recovery. We hope it will be. In terms of cyclical pattern, therefore, this year should be compared with 1959 as a year of recovery, while 1958 should be compared with 1960 as a low point in the recession. I think the minister will agree with that. What do we get now in terms of government policies in a year of cyclical recovery but when our structural and long term problems are becoming more evident? In spite of the evidence of recovery we get not an expansion but an antirecession program, with a record, unplanned, peacetime deficit brought about by increased fixed expenditures, which will create inflationary pressures but with no effective measures to deal with the long term structural problems and above all our chronic unemployment. This is why we claim this budget is ineffective and inadequate.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will sum up our criticism of government economic policies as expressed in this budget and in the minister's statement.

First, we believe that those economic policies are ill-timed, confused and inconsistent.

Second, we believe that the measures proposed by the minister to bring about an uncertain but a "significant" depreciation of the Canadian dollar are not likely to achieve the results that are hoped for and are fraught with danger.

Third, in the field of monetary and debt management policy, the government will have to choose between lower interest rates and a sound increase in the money supply. It will not be able to achieve those two objectives at the same time, especially if it succeeds in reducing foreign capital inflow.

Fourth, the tax incentives provided in the budget will not succeed in bringing the balanced long term growth which is now essential.

Fifth, the government's fiscal policy, as outlined, is not suited for a period of recovery on which it is based and it is not designed to meet the structural problems of the Canadian economy.

Sixth, the fiscal deal with the provinces greatly weakens the principle of equalization and will result in growing regional inequalities which are bound to weaken our federal system.

Seventh, the budget provides no special development assistance to the Atlantic provinces and other areas of underdevelopment and over unemployment.

Finally, in the field of trade policy, the government maintains its creeping protectionism but refuses to face the challenge created by the emergence of new and important trading blocs in the world. In other words, this budget contains a few good measures but they are too little and too late, and they are not capable of dealing with the problem in this country as it should be dealt with at this time.

Many people in this country now agree that this government—and how right they are—is drifting, confused and inconsistent; that in four years this Conservative government has created a financial mess without succeeding in solving the serious difficulties experienced by the economy during those four years, the most important evidence of which is the continuance of massive unemployment. All the facts are there and the minister cannot deny them. He cannot deny them through official records.

Since 1957 our gross public debt will have increased by $4.3 billion and our net debt by more than $2 billion; and yet the volume of our gross national product per capita has declined by 5 per cent, and this is an official figure. Unemployment has reached record levels exceeded only during the great depression of the 1930's and agriculture is still facing serious difficulties. These facts are becoming more and more known to the Canadian people in spite of the huge and continuous outflow of Conservative propaganda. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is no easy way out of the mess which has been created over a period of more than four years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If there is a mess it goes back a good deal more than four years.

Mr. Pearson: Whenever we talk about the past four years my hon. friend likes to talk about the years previous to those four years. How many people in Canada would love to go back to those years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do you want to find out?

Mr. Pearson: We do indeed want to find out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How soon?

Mr. Pearson: I ask the minister to do his best to influence the Prime Minister to give us the opportunity as soon as possible. Mr. Speaker, more and more people are looking back to those days of steady and businesslike management of our affairs, days of full employment, days of exciting national development, days of great national progress, days when Canada had a great influence in the councils of the world. Our main criticism of this budget, Mr. Speaker, is that it does nothing to give us any hope that those days will be restored.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in incredulous fascination has the house listened this afternoon in the course of the debate to the speech of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The big guns of Liberalism have been mustered in a final assault on this budget. Really, sir, I should have said the obsolete big guns of Liberalism, and I refer to the Leader of the Opposition and the even more obsolete and train-catching hon. member for Essex East. For the house is well aware, sir, that the present big guns of Liberalism are that trio of tyros, Gordon, Drury and Sharp, all of whose ideas as presented at the Kingston conference and at the January rally have been repudiated this afternoon by their erstwhile leaders.

Indeed, sir, as I listened with fascination to the Leader of the Opposition the only conclusion I could achieve was that the only consistency of the Leader of the Opposition was his total inconsistency with all previous pronouncements which he has made. That which he and the hon. member for Essex East have previously supported they themselves this afternoon repudiated. That which they have previously attacked they now assert as revealed wisdom.

Throughout the whole afternoon the Leader of the Opposition blew hot and cold. He straddled the fence, indeed, to such an extent that I thought the rust from the barbs of wire would eat right into his soul.

Mr. Pearson: Quotation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): First, I must deal with the pontifications of the hon. member for Essex East on the subject of the automobile industry. Seldom has the house been treated to such skilful evasion as when he was asked what, if any, recommendations of the Bladen report he approved.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which ones do you approve?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He squirmed and he wiggled and he evaded.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You always want to know what we would do but you are the government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He did everything but answer. He poses as an expert, but what an expert. Even when he was offered unanimous consent to state his opinions to the house he avoided and evaded the whole issue. This should not surprise the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did ask for leave of the house to make a second speech but this was denied me and among those who denied me this opportunity was the hon. gentleman who now so unfairly attacks a conscientious member.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, never would I attack the hon. gentleman fairly or unfairly. The hon. member indicated that it would take him 40 minutes to answer a straightforward question which he might have answered in two sentences. He posed and he postured today, and he has on each occasion, as the one responsible for the abolition of the 7½ per cent excise tax on motor vehicles.

An hon. Member: What a laugh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What is the record? I want to put that record before the house. According to the Parliamentary Guide, the hon. member for Essex East was sworn in as a cabinet minister on April 18, 1945.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A pretty black day.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): For the following 12 years until the 21st day of June, 1957, he was an integral and very vocal part of the ministry of this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was the whole show.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What happened to the excise tax on automobiles during that time?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was reduced to 15 per cent.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, let my hon. friend possess his soul in patience because I will put the complete record on Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to help you.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On that black day of April 18, 1945, when the hon. gentleman was sworn in as a minister the excise tax on automobiles was 10 per cent, and on that happy day in 1957 when he ceased to be a minister what was the excise tax?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ten per cent.

Mr. Pearson: We were selling motor cars in those days.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, 10 per cent. What happened in the meantime? Here is the situation. On the 17th day of November, 1947, which must have been about the time of taxation by radio, what happened to the excise tax? The tax on the first $1,200 of the value of an automobile was raised to 25 per cent and on the next $800 to 50 per cent. On the value of an automobile in excess of $2,000 it was raised to 75 per cent. During that period of time the hon. member was the minister of national health and welfare and he was the member for Essex East professing to represent the automobile industry. Search the pages of Hansard, search the pages of the newspapers and see if the hon. gentleman ever raised his voice in protest against that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question? I was then a member of the government. Was it possible for me to raise in this house a point involving government policy? Will my hon. friend not say, however, that it is generally known that in cabinet I did fight for that industry and for the workers in the automobile industry.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Now the hon. member tries to violate his oath of secrecy as a cabinet minister and to state in this house what he said around the cabinet table.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame.

Mr. Harkness: You did not do it very effectively.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is the type of belief my hon. friend and his friend, Mr. Coyne, have in the confidentiality of an oath.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us keep our tempers.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the hon. gentleman really believed in this, if he was so sincerely interested in the automobile industry, why did he stay in the government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because it was a good government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The reason the hon. gentleman stayed in the government was for the emoluments of office in which he believed more than he did in what he thought were the interests of the automobile industry.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Then, on the 31st of July—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman may attack me for my views but the hon. gentleman and no other member of this house can, with justification, attack my devotion to the interests of this country.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have not been discussing the hon. gentleman's devotion to his country. I have been discussing his devotion to the automobile industry and may I say that we have heard very little else in the house for the past few days.

Mr. McCleave: Devotion to himself.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member's influence was perhaps a little greater after this. It was in ascendency, because on the 31st of July, 1948, the excise tax was reduced to 10 per cent. However, on the 7th of September, 1950, the hon. gentleman was in a decline again.

Mr. Harkness: After the election.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The tax went up then to 15 per cent. When it was reduced to 10 per cent on the 31st of July, 1948, that was shortly before an election. Soon after the election on the 7th of September, 1950, it was increased to 15 per cent. Then, on the 10th of April, 1951 it was increased to what? Twenty five per cent. Then the hon. gentleman became a little more wonderful in the government for on the 8th of April 1952, it was reduced to 15 per cent. That was in a budget with another election in prospect. Finally, on the 5th of April, 1955—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has been up many times. I am confined to 30 minutes and I should like to deal with two speeches that have been made and have taken at least two hours to make. Finally, on the 5th of April, 1955 the tax was reduced to 10 per cent.

That was the up and down, on again, off again Finnegan attitude that the hon. member for Essex East and his colleagues adopted during the years in which they were in power. How he can have the effrontery in this house now to claim parenthood for the reduction, I do not know. I suggest he stands exposed by his own inconsistency. His failures when in power to represent the interests of the automobile industry are exposed by what I have put on the record for all to see. How different indeed are the attitudes of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Spencer) and the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Thrasher) who from the very time they came into this chamber have fought in the interests of the automobile industry.

I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) speak on the radio and attack the government in sarcastic and scornful tones for not having adopted in full the commercial policy proposals of the Bladen report. How very carefully today his deskmate, the hon. member for Essex East, avoided taking any stand. The hon. member for Ottawa West is the official trade critic for the opposition, and his considered statement was that these proposals of far-reaching importance, vital indeed at this sensitive period in our trading history, should have been implemented without any prior consultations with our trading allies or with industry or with management or with unions. Had the government done so without giving such opportunity for consultation, I think the hon. gentleman would have based his attack upon the allegation that we were recklessly jeopardizing our trading relations. What the government has done in this respect is to act responsibility in these far-reaching proposals. I believe the result of this responsible attitude will be generally beneficial to the automobile industry and to the people of Canada as a whole.

Then, Mr. Speaker, what of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson)? Carefully he avoided most of the significant features of the budget. He talked a great deal of an election. How the very thought of that event must make the hon. gentleman shudder. He was bold in January of 1958 when he challenged this government to an election. Oh, how confident he was on January 20, 1958. What was the result? The result was the decimation of his party. Look at the serried ranks of Liberalism opposite.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Look at the front row.

An hon. Member: Look at the quality.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Then on the eve of the recent four by-elections what did the hon. gentleman and his new organizer predict? They predicted a clean sweep.

Mr. Benidickson: We received a majority vote.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What a prophet and what a son of a prophet he was.

Mr. Pearson: A son of a what?

An hon. Member: A prophet.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The result of that clean sweep was three to one, and three to one it still is.

The whole speech of the Leader of the Opposition I thought was one of the better examples of Lamontagne phrase making but it carefully avoided any stand on any kind of issue, for all issues he evaded and straddled.

Oh, no, there was one thing on which he seemed to get steady. He seemed to get steady on the Arrow. He opposed the new and most satisfactory deal recently made with the United States. This house and this country do not agree with the point of view which the hon. gentleman expressed. I believe that is a most satisfactory arrangement and one which will earn the commendation of the people of this country.

Mr. Hellyer: That is just the hon. member's opinion.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, yes; I took down a phrase, "confusion, indecision and delay". That is what he asserts. He relates that phrase to the most comprehensive, realistic and expansionist budget in our history. That is the test of the hon. gentleman's judgment and of his economic reasoning. He had scorn for the deficit. It is not an expansionist deficit, he said. If it is not an expansionist deficit, what is it? He carefully avoided saying.

On television, as I hear, he very freely admitted that in the unhappy event he had been on the treasury benches this last year, there would have been a deficit and a very large one. Oh, he favours a deficit but not one which is achieved by the far-reaching policies of this government.

As was so carefully pointed out by the Minister of Finance yesterday, there are only two ways in which to avoid a deficit. The first is to reduce expenditures such as expenditures for social justice payments. Does the hon. gentleman wish us to reduce any of these expenditures that this government has increased with respect to the various social justice payments? Does he want us to reduce the payments made to the provinces which this government, in fact, has doubled since 1957? What would he wish us to reduce?

Mr. Hellyer: The interest on the debt.

Mr. Pearson: I will answer the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My hon. friend has had an hour and a half this afternoon. He has had all the time he required and I do not want him to use any of mine.

Mr. Pearson: I was only going to answer the question asked by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I say to the hon. gentleman that at the present time silence for him would not only be golden but unusual.

An hon. Member: You are asking a rhetorical question.

Mr. Pearson: Do not ask me questions.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The second way in which to avoid a deficit is to raise taxes. Does my hon. friend stand with his friend Jim Coyne in favouring a massive increase in taxes? Does he want a 3 per cent increase in income and corporate taxes? Does he stand for this new national development tax to raise $300 million or $400 million as his friend Mr. Coyne, under the urging of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), now advocates? Does he favour increases in taxes on cigarettes and liquor as Coyne does? Does he stand with Coyne in the matter of increases in taxes or is he against Coyne?

I myself thought the most unusual thing the hon. gentleman said was this. He said the minister has become a prophet of gloom and doom. What a laugh that was. The test of the hon. gentleman's judgment is just in that phrase. This government, on the eve of the 94th birthday of Canada, is filled with confidence in Canada's future and the greatest of hopes and expectations under the progressive and realistic policies of this government.

Mr. Benidickson: After being asleep for four years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The predictions of the Minister of Finance, said the Leader of the Opposition, erred on the conservative side. By that I assume he meant that the predictions will be exceeded. What interpretation can the house put on this comment? Surely the only interpretation that it can put on it is that the policies in the budget will have an even more significant and salutary effect or impact upon the economy than that which even the Minister of Finance himself predicted. If that be the case—and what other interpretation can one take from what the Leader of the Opposition said?—then what greater commendation of the budget can there be? I invite the hon. gentleman to support the budget which will be, in his opinion, so satisfactory and as to which the predictions are, as he says, on the conservative side.

Of all the spurious arguments that the hon. gentleman advanced at any time, I thought the most spurious one was that in which he dealt with the Atlantic provinces. Hon. members from the Atlantic provinces will be able to bring the hon. gentleman up to date. They will be able to tell him what this government has done for those provinces in the Atlantic provinces grants and in the increases of $10 million in the latest proposal to the provinces. For 22 years the maritimes were wholly neglected by hon. gentlemen opposite. The advent of this government spelled a new era for the Atlantic provinces. I believe that those provinces will show to my hon. friend just how they have reacted to the sort of treatment they have secured in this new era under this new goverment.

Then the Leader of the Opposition spoke of the exchange on the Canadian dollar. In everything he said I thought he was totally inconsistent, not only with Walter Gordon but really with himself and with everything that he had previously said on the subject. Indeed, I thought his comments were an almost incredible contradiction of the January Liberal rally. Is he for or against the use of the exchange fund? He did not say. He just straddled the fence. Again he tried to get himself into a position in which, whatever happens, he would have on the record some phrases so that he could say "I told you so". That, I submit to the house, is not the course of statesmanship. The house would admire him more if he would make up his mind, take a stand and "stay put". To get on both sides of every issue is not the approach the Canadian people expect of a responsible political leader.

One might go on indefinitely to speak of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and of all its contradictions and extravagant exaggerations. However, all I wish to say is this. His conclusions were based upon false premises and each of the premises was contradictory of most of his previous assertions. He said there were conflicting objectives in the budget. I throw that statement back at him. I say that this budget is an integral part of a responsible, cohesive program of fiscal, monetary and commercial policy. I say that it has already made a massive start towards the achievement of its objectives. When this house tomorrow, I hope, makes it possible for us to get the co-operation of the Bank of Canada and to place a strong figure in the position of governor of the Bank of Canada, I believe there will be an even greater spurt towards the achievement of those objectives.

In his final words the hon. gentleman said something about the growth in per capita debt. I have dealt with this matter on other occasions in the house. The hon. gentleman so carefully avoided saying anything about the net per capita debt and about our ability to pay.

Mr. Benidickson: Every baby born shares the debt.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, Mr. Speaker, from his seat the hon. gentleman, my old friend from Kenora-Rainy River, keeps mumbling. I confess I cannot hear what he is saying, though what he says occasionally succeeds in getting on Hansard.

Mr. Benidickson: I said, every baby born shares the debt.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the hon. gentleman would contain himself in silence for a while, it would be appreciated. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Finance set forth in a table at page 7220 of Hansard the precise position with respect to the net per capita debt; the fact that it is considerably lower today than it was in 1950; that the net debt expressed as a percentage of gross national product has been consistently dropping since this government came into power. Whereas in 1950 the net debt expressed as a percentage of gross national product was 70.7 and in 1956 it was 41.6, today it is 34.6. That, sir, is the real test. It is the test of our capacity to pay. As I mentioned in my earlier speech on the budget, the braintrusters of the hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree in any way with the attitude they have taken.

Obviously this budget cannot be analysed in isolation from other government policies. It does not exist in a vacuum, insulated from the other measures proposed to parliament this session. It is part of a cohesive, integrated, positive program of action designed in a massive way to stimulate production, promote economic recovery, expand employment, develop resources and promote our external trade opportunities. The provisions of the supplementary budget have already had a significant impact on the encouragement of more effective use of Canadian savings in the development of our resources and in the improvement of our balance of payments situation. Decidedly the trends have all been in the right direction, although they have not proceeded far enough.

Our exports in the year 1960 reached the highest point in our history, and what is not too generally known is that our deficit in external commodity trade last year was much less than one quarter of the peak level of 1956, the last full year during which hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the treasury benches.

Mr. Benidickson: And the gross national product took the biggest dive we have had since the war.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I again hear some type of remark from my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River. If the hon. gentleman has anything to say, I wish he would rise and say it.

Mr. Pearson: You won't let us.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In 1956 our commodity deficit was $728 million. In 1960 it was of the order of $150 million, and the hope is that 1961 may see, for the first time in many years, a surplus on external commodity account.

Sir, at this session parliament has enacted legislation to provide new assistance to housing, including urban renewal and slum clearance, loans for university residences, loans and write-off for municipal sewage installations, new and vitally important capital and maintenance aid for vocational training,
