OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, March 13, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

NIAGARA GORGE BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. F. WELLINGTON HAY (North Perth) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, the fee and charges made on Bill No. 25, an act to incorporate the Niagara Gorge Bridge Company, be refunded, less cost of printing and translating the bill.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LANDS

FINAL REPORT OF MR. JUSTICE MARTIN TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table a copy of the final report of Mr. Justice Martin, appointed a commissioner to receive and enquire into the arguments of the government of the province of British Columbia in support of its claim for reconveyance to the province by the government of Canada of the land conveyed by the province to the Dominion pursuant to paragraph 2 of the terms of the union. I move that 1,000 copies in English and 500 copies in French of the said report be printed, and that standing order 64 be suspended in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

JOINT HEARINGS OF RAILWAY AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONS

Mr. E. G. ODETTE (East Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, to amend the Railway Act (Joint hearings of Board and Interstate Commerce Commission).

Mr. DUNNING: Explain.

Mr. ODETTE: The object of the bill is to empower the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada to hold joint hearings with the Interstate Commerce Commission, either in the United States or in Canada, regarding matters appertaining to international rates and questions of a like character. A similar bill is now before the House of Representatives in Washington.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Cahan and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Fansher (East Lambton).

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the debate which is about to be concluded, I think I can fairly say, has permitted discussion of a very wide range, which discussion—one can say this without flattery to the house—has been of a very high character and has shown a marked determination on the part of various members to understand the problems with which we have to deal. It has been called a budget debate; just why it has been so described I am at a loss to understand. The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) the other day defined a budget, very properly, as a statement of the expected expenditures of the country, together with its estimated revenues, indicating the sources from which those revenues would be derived and the manner in which the expenditures would be made. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has given us a story about events that will terminate on March 31 this year. He has not given us a single word indicating what his revenues are to be for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, although it is to this year that the estimates relate. Nor has he given us any indication as to where his revenues will come from. This would not be permitted in any other country that I know of under the British flag. To call the statement submitted to the house a budget is to misuse words; the term is a misnomer. The only single reference which, in his statement, the Minister of Finance made to the revenues of the year 1928-29 was that in which he said that there would be a reduction in the revenues of some $19,000,000. He did not indicate what his expenditures were to be, although as a matter of fact he asks this parliament to vote, in the main estimates, something over $373,000,000, which is a larger sum by $7,000,000 than was voted last year in those estimates. The supplementary estimates are to follow, and extraordinary expenditures are also yet to be provided for. These are the facts. The minister, as I say, does not intimate how his revenues are to be made up; he does not tell the house how much he expects from customs, how much from excise, how much from income tax. All these matters he leaves in the cloudland of conjecture and of doubt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in delivering his budget address in the British parliament, is always held to the strictest account to the extent to which he has been able to realize his expectations; and the extent to which his representations agree with the facts of the year under review. In this instance we have been given a review only up to the 31st day of March, 1928; and we are voting supply for 1929 and endeavouring to provide ways and means by which the revenue is to be secured to meet that expenditure. I therefore suggest that this can hardly be called a budget speech for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1929, by any stretch of the imagination, and presumably the hon. gentleman proposes at no distant date to provide us with a budget speech for that year. Until he does so the house is more or less without proper information with respect to the fiscal year with which we are dealing.

The budget has been defended by various members of the administration; the Minister of Health (Mr. King) defended it in a speech which might well be described in the words of Tennyson:

> An infant crying in the night:
> An infant crying for the light:
> And with no language but a cry.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) defended this budget in a speech of great casuistry; it was an admirable defence of unemployment, which he said was seasonable in its character. That is true, and he also dealt with other matters in that broad and comprehensive manner for which he is noted, leaving out, of course, many facts to which I shall presently direct attention, no doubt in an earnest endeavour to support the budget presented by the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) also essayed to make a gentle speech. His observations were directed first of all to the Canadian National Railway situation, and secondly to explaining how much groups are to be deprecated in a house or parliament such as this. With respect to the first I have only to remind him that he is in error in stating that the Canadian National Railways have available for payment a sufficient sum of money to enable them to meet the interest charges to the public. At page 4 of the preliminary report which has been filed we find that the figures are set out at some length, and while it is perfectly true that the Canadian National railway system had a surplus of earnings of about $46,000,000 which could have been used to pay the interest to the public if there were no other requirements to be met, alas, there were other demands upon that fund which made it impossible to pay the interest upon the advances from the public without regard to the assistance received from the government. At page 4 of the report in question it will be found that there was an operating surplus, gross income as it is called, of $46,463,969.30, but before making that available for the payment of interest on the obligations of the company to the public, $3,599,650.52 had to be used to pay for the hire of freight cars; $92,330.79 for rent of locomotives, and for passenger train cars $291,485.13. In addition to that, joint facility rents, which are a charge upon the revenues, had to be paid to the amount of $1,083,207.19; rent for leased roads $1,212,587.52 and miscellaneous rents $82,091.78; so that after the payment of these charges from the gross revenue there was not sufficient money left to pay the interest charges on the debt to the public, which according to the statement on page 4 of the report amounted to $40,448,274.44. The only difficulty is that my friend the Minister of Railways overlooked the fact that it is one thing to say your earnings amount to so much and another thing to say that they are available for payment of fixed charges. If there are other charges against that money which have to be met before it can be made available for the payment of interest, then that sum is not available, and his confusion with respect to those two matters has caused him to fall into the error which I mention.

Neither is it true, Mr. Speaker, that in any year has the Canadian National Railways earned sufficient money with which to pay the interest on their obligations to the public. The year this government came into power, the year ending March 31, 1923, the Canadian National Railways obtained $77,863,938.23 from the public treasury; in 1924 they obtained $23,710,616.70; in 1924-25 they obtained $9,934,452.64, and I am happy to say that in the next year they only required $10,000,000. In the following year they required another $10,000,000, and for the year ending March 31, 1928 the figures are not available beyond this, that we advanced them $15,000,000 with which to pay bank overdrafts of which, according to the figures brought down and laid before this house, nearly $6,000,000 was used to pay instalments due for equipment trust obligations which normally would be paid out of income. So that, as far as the railways are concerned, they have not had in any one year during these years sufficient money available with which to pay the interest on the obligations now in the hands of the public. However, the railways have improved their condition very materially during the years recently passed, and we can only hope that if this country prospers as it should, under just and proper policies, they may be able to obtain sufficient traffic to enable them to provide revenue to meet interest charges on obligations held by the public.

Then my hon. friend the Minister of Railways dealt with another feature of the present political situation; he attacked the group system. Of all hon. gentlemen in this house who might attack that system, my hon. friend should be the last. When I recall the circumstances under which this government remained in power only a few short months ago; when I remember the hurried call which brought my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) off a steamship in Montreal, I am surprised that for a single moment my hon. friend should attack groups in this country. I will venture to read to him a few words written by his immortal countryman:

> Blow, blow, thou winter wind,
> Thou art not so unkind
> As man's ingratitude:
> Thy tooth is not so keen,
> Because thou art not seen,
> Although thy breath be rude.

But I remember somewhat more clearly the observation of a great Frenchman:

> We seldom find people ungrateful as long as we are in a condition to render them services.

That, it seems to me, must have been the thought in the minds of those who sit to my left.

Then my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) essayed the gentle arts of advocacy. His speech also divided itself into two parts, in the first of which he contented himself with reading from Hansard the speeches made by various hon. members, contrasting one with the other. It was a very delightful performance for those of us who had not been privileged to be present to hear the speeches delivered by their authors, because he did it most admirably. Then, in a moment of fine frenzy, he indicated how soon he was about to amend the constitution of Canada and pass legislation dealing with navigation laws, the merchant shipping acts and the Admiralty Act. Just why he should have chosen that moment to make that statement it is difficult to understand, but one admired the fine indignation and scorn which he poured upon the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), when he explained that at no distant date this Canadian parliament would pass statutes to deal with the merchant marine and navigation laws. Well, Mr. Speaker, as long as the flag of Mother Britain hangs over the taffrails of our ships, so long shall we rely upon the navigation laws of that country to protect our commerce on the high seas.

Then my delightful friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) made a defence of his department, and he explained with all the learning of a profound lawyer that section 18 of the Immigration Act governed, and that he had not those high prerogative powers which he has been so fond of exercising. It might be a little more to the point if he would venture to explain to us why he could not exercise the right in the one case, while in other cases he could exercise it so freely. According to the report that was brought down by the deputy minister, we find certain cases of those who would be charges upon the public revenue, or those who were feeble-minded or criminals, all within the prohibited class and I would remind the Minister of Immigration that the permits for a number of these cases to come into Canada were signed by the hon. gentleman himself. At least that is what the deputy of the department says in the report which has been laid upon the table of this house. Why the Minister of Immigration and Colonization should have decided that in a certain class of cases he had authority, but that in a case which arose a few days later he had no authority is somewhat difficult to understand. I feel that the lady and gentlemen who sit to my left when they looked at their former leader, and saw him no longer with them, and heard the terms of his observations, must have thought of Browning's "Lost Leader," and perhaps if I quote them a few lines from that poem they will illumine the dark recesses of my hon. friend's mind:

Blot out his name, then, record one lost soul more,
One task more declined, one more footpath untrod,
One more devil's-triumph and sorrow for angels,
One wrong more to man, one more insult to God!
Life's night begins; let him never come back to us!
There will be doubt, hesitation and pain,
Forced praise on our part—the glimmer of twilight,
Never glad confident morning again!
Best fight on well, for we taught him—strike gallantly,
Menace our heart ere we master his own;
Then let him receive the new knowledge and wait us,
Pardoned in heaven, the first by the throne!

Those were the words which Browning spoke of the "Lost Leader", and I feel that some such thoughts were in the minds of the lady and gentlemen who sit to my left as they gazed at the complacent countenance of my hon. friend enjoying the fruits of office, knowing only too well that he was now ignoring what he had advocated in the days long since forgotten.

There were others who made observations with respect to the budget speech. There was my gallant and learned friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) who spoke of the Duncan report, and of the obligations of this country with respect thereto, as though they were purely matters of political significance. May I venture to direct attention to the fact that when the Duncan report was adopted by this house it was accepted on all sides as a document to which effect should be given. Further, may I remind him that this house unanimously decided that effect should be given to the report. And now what do we find? We find excuse after excuse being given, and action delayed month after month, and year after year, although the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), skilled as he is with respect to economic problems derived principally from his experience in displacing postal labour, promised immediate action. I look at page 37 of the Duncan report and I find the following:

Steel and Customs Tariff

It was submitted that the tendency of the tariff, as affected by successive alterations, has been to lessen the protection upon the primary products of iron and steel and to encourage their importation from other countries as being the raw materials of iron and steel-fabricating and finishing industries in Canada.

In respect of this matter, we do not conceive it to be our duty to express any opinion, since the question is, as we were informed by the chairman of the tariff advisory board, who met us at our request, at the present moment under the consideration of that board.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Remember this is September, 1926. The report goes on to say:

But we do regard it as our duty to record that the significance of this industry to the maritime provinces was forcibly brought home to us, not only in the manufacturing towns we visited in the maritimes but also throughout the agricultural districts of the maritimes.

The report closes:

We record this in order to emphasize the need for prompt action.

Those are the words with which the commission closes its recommendation in that regard, in which it emphasizes the necessity for prompt action. That is equally as emphatic as any recommendation made in the report, if not more so; and yet in the face of that recommendation, for purely political reasons, the rights of the maritime provinces are to be disregarded because the Minister of National Defence is not prepared to do his plain duty in the premises. So this has now become a political matter. The hon. the Postmaster General, who has shown his ability to displace postal labour in various parts of this country, might desire to have this report maintained, but as long as the Minister of National Defence represents a Nova Scotia constituency the government will continue to be guided only by the exigencies of politics, instead of allowing the recommendations of the Duncan report to be carried out.

Now I do not think there is any necessity of making further references in connection with the defence made by the government of this so-called budget. But a controversy has arisen in the country with respect to the debt of Canada. There have been discussions in the newspapers, in magazines, and on the floor of this parliament from time to time as to what the real debt of this country is. May I venture to point out, sir, that it should not be difficult to ascertain what the debt of the country is, and I say further that there is no need to talk about "net" debt or "gross" debt. The proper term to apply is funded debt, and the funded debt of Canada means "the mortgage on the farm." Now if the mortgage on the farm is $5,000, payable the 1st of January, 1929, and you have in your current account at the bank $1,000 which must be used to pay taxes, for seed grain and various other demands, at the end of the year the $1,000 may be partly or wholly exhausted, but the mortgage on the farm still remains $5,000 and must be treated as such.

Now I have taken the trouble to extract from the public accounts of this country, year after year, statements of the funded debt of Canada, and here are the figures. When the war broke out in 1914 the funded debt of Canada was $303,559,938. On March 31, 1922, it was $2,420,791,260. In 1923 it was $2,452,735,750. In 1924, it was $2,407,806,901. In 1925, it was $2,470,433,576. In 1926 it was $2,471,965,018 and in 1927, on the 31st March, it was $2,435,395,197. What is it in 1928? I go to the last Canada Gazette published on Saturday, March 10, I turn to page 2899, and I find that the funded debt of this country on the 29th February was $2,380,937,686. Thus you have a complete statement of the funded debt of Canada from 1914, when war broke out, until to-day. That is the position.

Now, let us see what has been done with respect to this funded debt. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and the government led by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister desire to take great credit for what they have done with respect to the reduction of the debt of Canada. Why, there is only one way to measure it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that when you endeavour to indicate what the debt of your business is, you must always have regard to the accrued interest upon your outstanding obligations. I ventured, during the short time that I was at the Department of Finance, to look into this matter with some degree of care and it will be found that nowhere in that record as a liability is accrued interest even mentioned. When I say that $2,000,000,000 matures between 1933 and 1937 and that a half year's interest upon that sum alone amounts to more than $50,000,000, it will be easy for one to understand why the form and the system that prevail in connection with making out these returns should be altered and we should show what the accrued interest is from month to month in respect to our funded debt. Unless and until that is done, this talk about reduction in debt—and we see from month to month reports of increases in debt or reduction in debt—is only so much wasted breath; it means nothing, because the accrued interest is not included, and the mere difference between assets and liabilities is something that indicates nothing to the intelligent business man. When the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) the other day indicated that it was just such systems of bookkeeping that brought wreck and ruin to the Home bank, he was stating the case exactly. You cannot make financial returns of the country's business and ask the people to believe them if you make no provision for accrued interest from day to day. In six months it amounts to $50,000,000 alone on these $2,000,000,000 of obligations, to say nothing of other amounts as well, that means a total of over $10,000,000 a month. Accrued interest must be taken care of in those returns if they are to be at all accurate.

But when the Minister of Finance and his government rejoice in what they have done with respect to reduction in funded debt, I too rejoice with them. I rejoice in the fact that the funded debt of Canada during the last six years, that is during the six years ended on the 29th day of February last, has been reduced by $39,853,574. That is an average of $6,735,436 per annum or, to put it in another way, it amounts roughly to $18,500 per day. That is what has been done with respect to our funded debt; it has been reduced by that amount. But we have a right to ask ourselves what sums of money the government received with which to effect that reduction. What money was taken from the taxpayers of this country during the same period? I find that in the six years, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921 and to the 31st day of March, 1922, there was extracted from the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada the sum of $1,587,439,352. What was done during the next six years? How much was taken from them during the years 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927 and up to 1928? This amounts to the enormous sum of $2,002,380,697. What does that mean? It means that the government led by my right hon. friend opposite took from the taxpayers of Canada in those last six years $414,941,345 more than was taken in the preceding six years. There is a smile on the face of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). He is probably now sounding the death knell of the national debt, as he did of protection—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: —because his knowledge of the one is about as great as of the other. Let us proceed a step further because he would not laugh for a single moment if he realized what that means to the taxpayers of this country. How much does that mean per annum? It means that $69,156,891 more was taken out of the taxpayers of Canada during each of the last six years than during each of the preceding six years. But let us go a step further. How much does that mean per day? It means that for every day of the last six years $189,471 more was taken from the Canadian taxpayers than during the preceding six years. Let us go another step further. I have pointed out that the government during the last six years have reduced the funded debt of this country by more than $39,000,000; I have pointed out that that amounted to $18,453 per day, and I have pointed out that they received in taxation—and I will, if necessary, give the pages from which the figures are taken—$189,471 more than their predecessors during every day for the last six years, leaving $171,018 per day more, with which hon. gentlemen opposite have played, than during the preceding six years. Do you mean to tell me, sir, that any government should rejoice for a single moment in the reduction of the national debt by $39,000,000 when they had $171,018 every day more than their predecessors that should have been used to retire our national debt? The extravagance of this administration is something to which I shall presently refer, but I venture to say that the language used by the immortal leader of this party in days when he was in opposition indicates something of the condition which now prevails. These words uttered by Sir John A. Macdonald in Montreal during his opposition days were heard and are recalled by my friend the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White):

> As bees in flowers alighting cease to hum.
> So settling into place Grits grow dumb.

Those were the observations that he made with respect to the attitude of the Liberal party of that day. I put this to any business man in this house—and there are business men opposite; there are some vitally interested in manufacturing, as I shall presently discuss, but let us face this matter frankly. Here we have a government that extracts from the people over $400,000,000 more in six years than their predecessors did in the preceeding six years and all they are able to show is that they have reduced the funded debt of this country by $39,000,000. They have had all these vast sums at their disposal, and with reckless extravagance, with a wilfulness that almost makes the Canadian taxpayer despair, they have wasted those moneys upon matters that presently this house will hear discussed. Now they claim credit because they have made the trifling reduction of $39,000,000 during that period in the funded obligations of this country.

It is worthy of note that during that period they greatly increased our funded obligations by short-date financing which has since been paid off. Just last year the Minister of Finance refunded $20,000,000 of 4 per cent obligations with $20,000,000 of 4½ per cent obligations. He had outstanding 4 per cents and he renewed them with 4½ per cents as he said in his budget speech, thus paying one-half per cent higher rate than he paid before and these were long-term, thirty-year engagements as against his previous three-year obligations. Last year I ventured certain suggestions to the house in connection with the national debt which did not commend themselves very highly to my hon. friends opposite. It may well be that on analysis it is found that the application of the principle that I mentioned to a long-term obligation might not be satisfactory, but I will say this. The Minister of Finance adopted and utilized the suggestion I made in order to secure $45,000,000 from the banks at 4 per cent at par. That is all. I do not claim undue credit to myself when I say that it was in consequence of the suggestion made in this house last year that my hon. friend was able to do that. He got $45,000,000—and the Minister of Finance would not be the man to deny the fact—at 4 per cent at par as against the $20,000,000 he borrowed in the open market at 4½ per cent at slightly better than 97. So you see, though vague and indifferent it may seem to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and others, the suggestion was ample to meet the necessities of the particular case which I had in mind.

What further do I say about the national debt of this country? I say that we should make a determined effort to deal with our national debt on the basis of paying it off. In that regard let me read a single observation from President Coolidge which I think has more application to this country than it has to the United States of America. Speaking in November last, at the union league, the president said:

> At the end of this fiscal year almost one-third of the entire debt will have been paid. The saving in interest alone is about $1,000,000 each day. But well over $18,000,000,000 (eighteen billions) of debt still remain. It is a menace to our credit. It is the greatest weakness in our line of national defence. It is the largest obstacle on the path of our economic development. It should be retired as soon as possible under a system of reasonable taxation. This can only be done by continuing the policy of rigid government economy.
> The results have not been easy to accomplish. They have been extremely hard. They have been anything but commonplace. They mark a new epoch and set a new record in successful government financing. The great burden of the work will be indicated when it is remembered that the congress was called in extra session in the spring of 1921 and remained in session for nearly two years. The task is not yet completed, but we have reached the point where we can see the end. We are turning toward a new era.
> Because of the past insistence on economy in national expenditures we are in a position to have further moderate tax reduction. But let it be remembered that tax reduction is possible solely on account of economy. Anybody can spend the money somebody else has saved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The cheers of the hon gentlemen who sit opposite indicate that they are perfectly willing at an early date to spend what other people have saved, because the fact is that this country has not increased perceptibly in population, and yet there has been taken from the taxpayers increasing sums of money every year, amounting this year to the largest sum that has ever been taken from the taxpayers of this country; and further, there is no effort on the part of the government to practise the complement of large taxation, namely, economy. Where is it? Will any gentleman name the economies which this government have made? Perhaps the right hon. the Prime Minister may be able to give the house a vivid story of the economies he has effected, but all I can say is that they are not reflected in the Auditor General's report nor yet in the estimates that have been laid on the table of the house.

Let me go a step further. What do I suggest should be done with respect to the national debt? I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize that ever since the days of that great financier Pitt, who in 1798 laid the income tax upon the British people as a war measure, the British people have always maintained a sinking fund. They have suspended the operation of that sinking fund at times when it was essential that they should do so, but look, if you will, at the operations of British finance to-day, and you will see that no matter how hard they may be driven, no matter how difficult may be their path, no matter how onerous their burden of taxation, they have always imposed upon themselves the providing of a sinking fund with which to discharge their national debt. Have we done any such thing? The Minister of Finance read a few lines out of McCulloch, who nearly one hundred years ago made an observation which was placed in the hands of the Finance minister by one of his officials, and the minister thought it might have some effect upon this house, but the hon. member for Ontario Mr. Kaiser) completely demolished that. The Finance minister said that the only way to pay off the debt was out of surplus. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is another way in which we can pay off our national debt, and that is to pass a statute by which we provide that a given sum per annum shall be set aside to pay off the national debt of Canada. What will that do? That will impose upon the people economy. Why? Because when they come clamouring to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) for a wharf here or a post office in Guysborough, or a public work in some other community, the Finance minister will be able to say: It cannot be done because the sinking fund must be provided for.

An hon. MEMBER: Mahone Bay.

Mr. BENNETT: Ah yes, the post office that was taken away from Mahone Bay.

Mr. DUFF: Was not that economy?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it was a reckless expenditure of public moneys in another way, with respect to the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. MANION: Political economy.

Mr. BENNETT: It was what my friend calls political economy. Let me go a step further, Mr. Speaker. I say that we should place upon the statute books of this country at the earliest possible moment a provision by which a sinking fund will be set up such as they have in Great Britain and in other countries, so that we shall be enabled, within a period to be mentioned, absolutely to wipe out and eliminate the national debt of Canada. What is the province of Ontario doing? Do hon. gentlemen opposite realize that in Ontario they have provided for the setting aside of $3,000,000 every year so that at the end of forty years their debt will be entirely wiped out, half being provided by public utilities, and the other half from the taxpayers of the province itself. Do hon. gentlemen realize that?

What sum would have to be set aside to enable us to wipe out our national debt? Assuming only a four per cent rate upon money, if we desire to retire the entire $2,400,000,000 of the national debt of Canada at the end of forty-five years, all we would have to set aside each year would be $19,829,904, and at the end of forty-five years the entire debt would be paid off. If you want to go a step further and make it fifty years, you would have to set aside only $15,720,480 a year. Assume that you do it half-yearly, then if you wish to discharge the entire national debt in forty-five years, you would have to set aside $9,710,448 each half year, or to retire it in fifty years, the sum of $7,686,576 half yearly.

But suppose we do it upon a less ambitious plan. Suppose we seek to retire only $1,500,000,000 of this debt by a statutory sinking fund, by means of a provision placed upon the statute books of this country, so that the demands and pressure by political supporters would not induce the Finance minister to part with public moneys because he would have to meet these sinking fund payments. It would ensure economy in the public service, and what is more, it would make the people of this country increasingly proud as they saw what President Coolidge has described as this greatest menace to our economic development, this great load of debt hanging over our necks, being gradually retired. What sum would be required by way of sinking fund if we provided for the retirement of only $1,500,000,000 at the end of forty-five years? We would have to set aside each half year $6,069,030. Pass a statute and make a charge upon the revenues of this country prior to every other charge except the service of the debt and pensions, and all you would have to put aside to retire $1,500,000,000 at the end of forty-five years would be $6,069,030 half yearly, or on a yearly basis it would require only $12,518,700.

Is this country to continue to be menaced by this economic evil, by this debt hanging over our heads? Are we to continue, of all countries in the world, to make no provision for the future? Are we to be content to expend our patrimony day by day without putting anything aside to take care of the long days of the future that are before us? I say it is unfair to posterity, and still more, it is unfair to ourselves, it is unfair to the taxpayers of this country to extract from them each year these increasingly large sums of money and make no provision for the retirement of our national obligations. The sum to be set aside is not large. I can only say this, that if we on this side of the house were intrusted with power, we would not hesitate a single moment to make provision for the retirement of the national debt of this country.

It has been said that no government is ever defeated because it is extravagant. That well may be. It well may be that the people may be debauched with their own revenues, and be taught that all you have to do is to spend their taxes freely among them and then you have succeeded, but what is the effect upon the life of the nation as a nation? It is like the observations made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) yesterday. In vague and indefinite terms he endeavoured to cast aspersions on men now dead with respect to Port Nelson, not having the courage to make an open charge in this house. The Right Hon. George P. Graham himself selected Port Nelson, as he told the House of Commons when the matter had to be dealt with. He said that it was settled before the government of which he was a member was defeated. I read it in the debates that I had in my hands only yesterday. He said the mind of the government had been made up in respect of Port Nelson on the report of the engineers. It is true Mr. Cochrane is dead and Mr. Bowden the engineer, is dead, but the fact remains that it was on the report of this engineer and others that Port Nelson was selected as the terminal. To talk of extravagance and the loss of public moneys in this instance when Mr. Cochrane and others were relying on the reports given to them by those best able to advise the government of the day is ridiculous, and it ill becomes the hon. minister thus to asperse the memory of men whom it was our privilege and honour to call our friends. To suggest that they were parties to such transactions as will not bear the light of day is unworthy of the minister himself and of the traditions of our parliamentary life.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with the question of the national debt in the manner in which I have indicated, I now ask myself the question, on the proposals of the Minister of Finance, how he will make good the necessary supply to meet the requirements of the public service. That, of course, involves taxation; he must tax the people. What form of taxation shall he rely upon? He has told us that he proposes to rely upon the income tax, the sales tax, and the other taxes of that nature, and also upon the customs or tariff tax. Those are the methods by which he proposes to make good the supply required for transacting the public business.

Before I deal with the tariff branch of his proposals, let me say a word or two with respect to the income tax. This tax has been either a colossal failure, or else the situation is very different from what it was when the tax was first imposed; one or the other. Only 116,629 individual taxpayers paid income tax for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927; they paid $18,000,000. The Canada Gazette says that the income tax this year has thus far brought in $55,000,000 as against $46,000,000 last year, the larger part of which, of course, is paid by corporations, the total last year being $29,000,000, and judging from the observation made by the Minister of Finance the other day about the same amount will be recovered from the individual taxpayers this year as last year, namely, something over $18,000,000. In this regard may I point out that when Pitt inaugurated the income tax in Great Britain he definitely and positively stated that it was a war measure. Mr. Gladstone, in one of the greatest speeches by which he will be remembered as Chancellor of the Exchequer, pointed out that he hoped the day would come when war would be ended and peace restored, as then the income tax would be removed entirely, because he felt it was an unfair tax, having regard to the conditions that then prevailed.

Now, the income tax was increased by the Minister of Finance two years ago by removing the freedom from normal tax of dividends paid by Canadian corporations. Having increased the burden of taxation by this form of double taxation, last year he reduced the burden of income tax by 10 per cent, and this year he proposes to reduce it by another 10 per cent, making the reduction 20 per cent in all. But that 20 per cent barely makes up what he took from the taxpayers by the added burden placed upon them. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) the other evening said he was not greatly interested in this form of double taxation. He is a fair-minded gentleman. Let me put this case to him. He has a farm, and when he sells his wheat he makes a thousand dollars net profit. The tax gatherer deducts therefrom $50, or 5 per cent. The hon. gentleman then takes the $950 and deposits it in the savings bank, but the tax gatherer, having found his name among the depositors, takes off $47.50 from the $950. Would my hon. friend regard that as fair?

Mr. BROWN: The analogy is by no means a correct one.

Mr. BENNETT: The position is this, Mr. Speaker. Double taxation has been denounced by Mr. Gladstone, by Mr. Goschen, and by every other great chancellor of the exchequer in Great Britain, and they have always endeavoured to avoid such taxation. When the earnings of corporations have been taxed, then to the extent that the money available for distribution has paid its toll to the exchequer, it should be free from income tax when it comes into the hands of the individual shareholders whose money it is. That is but a fair proposition, and one that I am sure will commend itself to fair-minded gentlemen in every part of this house. That is the first proposition.

But my hon. friend, true to the traditions of his party, desiring to obtain some kudos where none was due, first of all increases the tax, and then says: Look at what I did in reducing it! That sort of thing injures the country as a whole. Why should he not be perfectly frank about it and say, "I will reduce the income tax." Is it because he is afraid of the hon. gentlemen who sit to his right? I would not be under similar circumstances, for I believe they are sufficiently fair-minded that they do not want to tax money twice if they understand what the real position is. I have never discovered among my fellow-Canadians any desire to be unfair to anyone when they have a real appreciation of the facts. That I can say with great certainty, and I am perfectly confident that if they understood that what is sought to be done is to take the same dollar and tax it twice, they would say: This is not a fair or proper thing to do. I do not think there is anything at all in the suggestion that those hon. gentlemen are supporting the income tax because they have none to pay themselves, for from what I know of them they would be only too glad to pay income tax if their incomes were sufficiently large.

But may I go a step further in dealing with the income tax, because, I repeat, Mr. Goulburn, the great Chancellor of the Exchequer in Sir Robert Peel's administration, and Mr. Goschen, both dealt with it in connection with the conversion of the national debt of Great Britain. In England securities are usually issued so they may be called for payment at a certain date before maturity, and I do suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he does any further financing he should consider whether or not it is not desirable to do what all corporations now do, provide that all securities may be callable at fixed prices after notice. That was the case that Mr. Goulburn had to deal with in the great debt conversion of 1844. I commend to every hon. gentleman the great speech in which he moved the resolution for the conversion of the national debt at that time. Forty-four years later Mr. Goschen made one of the most memorable speeches on finance that has been heard in modern times when he converted the British debt and saved the taxpayers of Great Britain annually half a million sterling or more. We have two billion dollars drawing 5½ per cent interest, redeemable roughly in 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937. That means an annual interest charge of 110 million dollars. If the interest could be reduced to 4½ per cent we would save 20 million dollars a year, which is more money than was taken out of the pockets of individual taxpayers by income tax last year.

Then why does not the Minister of Finance devote his energies to converting our national debt upon a large scale, instead of reading us some piffling remarks written by an economist a hundred years ago? Let me go further. The saving of 20 million dollars a year on the refunding of the debt might be possible if you would say to the holders of the 5½ per cent tax-exempt securities maturing within the next nine or ten years that there would be freedom from or great reduction of income tax during the next decade. Does it ever occur to hon. members that in addition to the 110 million dollars free money, the exemption from income tax for the next five or ten years might bring about a great expansion of public revenue? I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize the implications with respect to debt conversion. When I saw on the order paper the other day the resolution of the Minister of Finance to enable him to borrow half a billion dollars for conversion purposes, I sent to the library for the speech of Mr. Goschen on debt conversion. I saw his resolutions and compared them with those of the Minister of Finance, and then I looked at Goulburn's speech. I said to myself. "Is it possible that my hon. friend thinks that this by-play is dealing with the conversion of the debt of the country?" Why, it is an insult to the intelligence of the house to introduce a resolution of that description and to talk about conversion, when these securities are selling to-day so as to yield more than 4 per cent on the market. Moreover, as the day of maturity approaches, these securities, after they have reached the peak, will decline in value, notwithstanding that they are tax-exempt. Surely my hon. friend must realize that; every thoughtful financial man does. If we are to deal with this problem why not let us deal with it as men charged with a solemn responsibility? We have some $2,000,000,000 maturing in the next nine or ten years, and with the possibility of the interest rate going down there is a problem for us to face. The money market is open to us, and we are told by financial men that now is the appointed time; now is the time when money is cheaper than ever before or is likely to be, and that the demand for high class securities is considerable. Yet my hon. friend's method of dealing with the subject is to put a resolution on the order paper asking parliament to allow him to borrow half a billion dollars. That is his method of conversion. No wonder my hon. friend looks at me; he had not thought it was quite so bad until he heard it stated in this way.

Now let us go a step further. Whether or not the income tax shall be retained in this country depends entirely upon the skill and financial ability shown in the conversion of the debt. With two billions of securities maturing in nine or ten years, and with money at 4 per cent, there is the greatest opportunity that was ever offered to any Minister of Finance in this country. To seize that opportunity requires courage, skill, ability, knowledge; it requires willingness to devote some time to a study of the problem. It requires more thought about economies and less inclination to extravagance; it requires more consideration of the question as to how the money is to be secured rather than how it may be spent. It requires the consideration of world factors that determine the price at which money can be obtained. Is this government giving the problem that degree of attention? Is there any evidence of such consideration of the question on their part? Let hon. gentlemen opposite ask themselves that question.

The gradual reduction of the income tax is something that is quite offensive to some hon. members of this house; they consider it an endeavour on the part of rich men to escape the payment of their just deserts. That is the light in which some hon. gentlemen view any attempt to reduce the income tax. I can quite understand their point of view. May I remind the house that last year I argued that, in my judgment, the fairest method of taxation in the world was to be found in the turnover tax. I have not changed my mind in that regard; I think there should be a turnover tax collected every month. Consider what is taking place in this Dominion to-day. How many people escape taxation in this country for the simple reason that they are insolvent when the time comes for the payment of the tax. How many men had an income which was taxable in 1925 but from which no taxation could be derived in 1926. How many men in 1926 with an income could not pay the tax in 1927. And how many more who had an income in 1927 will be unable to discharge their obligation in 1928? A turnover tax, I say, is the most equitable means of securing revenue in this regard. With such a tax one is always in a position to know what he has to pay, inasmuch as the tax is a part of the charge on the business and is payable monthly, as any other tax should be. I pointed out when discussing this question last year that the idea was not original with myself. I do not claim originality for it; it has been submitted to the house before and is endorsed by sound economists and financiers. I urge the Minister of Finance, therefore, to take it into his serious consideration.

Now, it is contended that the income tax is a tax which the rich man pays. But see what is happening in Canada to-day. Men are devising ways and means whereby they may escape the payment of income tax, and they are doing so under the law. It is well to bear in mind, as the House of Lords very properly pointed out, that there can be no evasion of the law so long as it is permitted by the very nature of the law which it is sought to enforce. That is the fact, as every lawyer knows; and so long as men keep within the law that is all they are required to do. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the government that much more money would be available for commercial enterprises if the burden of the income tax—the supertax at least—were considerably less than it is at the present time. I shall presently refer to the situation as it exists in the United States. As the Prime Minister said, we are faced with ever-decreasing income tax in the United States, and this fact is having its influence upon our national life. We cannot, therefore, much longer maintain in this country a higher rate of income taxation than is levied in the country to the south of us. The government of the United States is looking forward to the ultimate removal of the income tax; they anticipate its abolition ultimately. We, on the other hand, are apparently endeavouring to make it an absolute fixture. Many of my hon. friends in the far corner of the house oppose any remission of the income tax because, as they fancy, other taxes will be imposed upon the people. May I assure those hon. gentlemen that the buoyancy of business which would attend any substantial reduction of this tax, the release of large sums of money which would not otherwise be available for industrial development, would compensate, as it has done in England and elsewhere, for the increase in taxation—if any—that might be necessary in any other direction. By this means we should broaden the whole foundation, the whole base of our structure of taxation. If we could assure the people of the country that there would be a flat rate of income tax, say, 10 per cent, or any figure you choose, without a supertax, we would be surprised at the effect this would have on the business of the Dominion. I emphasize that statement because the experience of Great Britain proves it beyond question. Formerly they levied a tax of 2 pence on the pound, or 4 cents on five dollars; then it was increased to sixpence on the pound, or 12 cents on five dollars; and gradually the rate went up to 20 cents on every five dollars until finally it reached the point where the government took $2.50, or 10 shillings out of the pound to maintain the national life of the country and to provide for the demands of the sinking fund. Probably, Mr. Speaker, I have said enough on this point. There is not much to be gained by an opposition suggesting anything with respect to the income tax nor indeed, for that matter, respecting taxation generally. Taxes must be imposed by the government and under our institutions proposals in this regard must originate with the administration of the day. The government only can take the necessary action in this respect.

And now I should like to discuss for a moment the sales tax which the Minister of Finance tells us he is reducing 25 per cent this year. It is suggested that next year he intends reducing it still further by 33⅓ per cent and the next year 50 per cent. Stated thus, the reduction has a more imposing sound than if the minister had said that he was reducing the tax by one per cent, or whatever rate he proposes. The sales tax has always been regarded as objectionable, but when my hon. friends opposite came into power they increased it to 6 per cent. The result was so alarming that they decided to reduce it at the same session, so that finally they restored it to the rate that was in force at the time they took office. There are, of course, many exceptions allowed for by order in council, as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) would say, whereby the executive may determine who shall be exempt from the payment of the tax. I suggest that it should not be left to the executive to decide this question; this is a matter that should be determined by parliament.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows that under the constitution this power has been in our act since confederation. The government has power to reduce taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend realizes that I am perfectly well aware of what is in the constitution in this regard. The point I desire to make is that in imposing this form of taxation you subject the executive to unfair pressure by asking them to put certain commodities and classes of people upon the free list, exempt from taxation. That is the point I want to make. In my opinion it would be better for the government itself if this question were left to parliament entirely. It seems to me to be one of the essentials which we are overlooking. We contend that the sales tax should be abolished. Why? The Minister of Finance asks, where shall we get the revenue from? If economy were practised in this country, if an annual sinking fund were put away, money being earmarked for this purpose when derived from the sales tax, then I could understand my hon. friends desiring to continue the tax. But so long as no part of the money is earmarked for some special purpose, so long as there is no statutory sinking fund, so long as reckless expenditure of public money continues, then I say the time has come when this form of taxation should be removed.

Now let me give you an illustration. The other day a lawyer friend of mine had to have an appeal book printed for the Supreme Court of Canada. He had to pay the printer the sales tax on the cost of that book, and the printer himself had already paid a tax on the paper. There is double taxation, and for all I know some other person may have paid a tax as well, which would make triple taxation. In addition to that, you are now imposing customs duty on the sales tax itself. I received an invoice for some books which came to me from England the other day; I found the sales tax added and the duty computed upon the invoice plus the sales tax. That is taxing a tax. If there is any necessity for revising the customs laws it seems to me it would be a very sound thing to do in that regard, because it is an inferential form of protection, as one of the hon. members from Manitoba would say, and therefore I suppose it is to be condemned.

Then let me proceed to the next form of taxation upon which my hon. friend proposes to rely for the purpose of raising his revenue, namely, changes in the tariff. First of all I desire to make a few observations with respect to these tariff proposals in the light of statements which were made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance not so very long ago. This summer he had the privilege of visiting western Canada. While doing so I am sure he found a fine, growing country, and I am satisfied that he was greatly pleased with what he saw. In the course of his journey he appeared before the board of trade at Winnipeg and similar organizations at other places as well, and on each occasion delivered addresses with respect to tariff and other matters. The important matter to which he directed his attention in Winnipeg was connected with the tariff, and on that occasion he said, as reported in the newspapers, that the tariff board was a body that had been set up for a very useful purpose. Now, sir, I would venture to read some words which my hon. friend is reported to have used on that occasion; they were never denied, and they formed the subject matter of editorials in leading newspapers. I think if my friends the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Agriculture and all those gentlemen who come from western Canada will take notice of these observations they will perhaps refrain from their campaign of misrepresentation with respect to the fiscal policy of the party which sits to the left of the Speaker. These are the words:

> In each of the general elections since 1878 the tariff has been one of the predominant planks of the political parties, with the natural result that many platform exaggerations by frequent repetition are now accepted as actual facts and a great many, without reasoning and without analyzing the statistical records of growth of Canadian business, the possibilities for international expansion or the practical business problems which must be faced at home take extreme positions on one side or the other of this question. Good government comes when the electorate have actual facts before them; they can then judge what is best for Canada, and it was to get the tariff and trade facts properly before the people that the advisory board on tariff and taxation was founded.

Now, sir, my friend the Minister of Finance in that instance correctly stated the facts. Does not my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) realize that for the last forty years in western Canada there has been carried on a campaign of slanderous vilification with respect to the tariff policy of the Conservative party? Does he not realize that the Minister of Railways the other day spoke of high and ever higher tariffs? Does he realize that from one end of that great western country to the other they have spread the gospel that the Conservative party stood for high tariffs, while they themselves preached low tariffs and free trade as it was in England? Does he remember the banners which hung across the streets of Brandon when the election of 1896 was being conducted, and which read:

> Free trade as they have it in England.

From one end of western Canada to the other they have spread the doctrine that the Liberal party stood for free trade or a low tariff or some other kind of tariff, while the Conservative party always stood for a high and still higher tariff. Those are not exaggerated statements. I will give the house an illustration of the campaign which has been carried on by responsible Liberals with respect to tariff matters in western Canada. I recall a Liberal senator and the speech he made with respect to the tariff. He said, "These Tories! They exploit the tariff for their own personal advantage."

Mr. FORKE: Read Hansard for 1925.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration remembers 1925, but in remembering it he must blush with shame when he thinks what he is now doing, because in those days he was attacking the government of which he is now a member. In those days he was very properly pointing out that the electorate had been deceived. Have they yet been undeceived? He was then very properly pointing out that the Liberal party sought support from one end of this country to the other by alleging what they would do with respect to the tariff when they came into power, but when they assumed office they did not do it. What are they doing to-day with respect to this budget? They are raising the tariff; they are now doing the things for which the hon. member for Brandon condemned them in 1925. They are asking this house to give protection to industries on a higher basis than before, which the hon. member formerly condemned. I am glad to know that he is seeing some semblance of light and is coming to realize the plight in which he has been placed by forgetting the principles which he espoused in 1925. He must never forget the words:

While the lamp holds out to burn,

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is going to supply the second line:

The vilest sinner may return.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us go a step further. I heard this going on from one end of western Canada to the other. It is now over thirty years since I went to western Canada, and I need offer no apology now, in the words of Macaulay, for having maintained consistently the faith which I then had with respect to this country and the fiscal policy which should be followed to bring success and prosperity. I heard these statements, and I was about to refer to the remarks made by one of the Liberal senators in which, in order to arouse public prejudice and the passions of the people, he stated that these Tory manufacturers, rich at the expense of the people, had sent their families south to Bar Harbour and the summering places nearby, then to Newport among the new rich of the United States. Then he said, "Grown greater still, wrapped around with the mantle of wealth taken by exploitation from the taxpayers of the country, they sent their wives and daughters over to the great watering places of Europe, to marry their children to the effete and worn out aristocracy of Europe?" Those are the arguments which were made; I am sure my hon. friend has heard them, but I am happy to say that he has never used them. This campaign was carried far and wide, and people believed it. The hon. member for Brandon believed it; the hon. members before me believed it and the men and women to my left believed that the Liberal party of that day were honest in what they said, as the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) pointed out the other night, and that they would do what they promised. When they did not do it Liberal partisans, to make their position secure, went around and denounced this party as the party of high and ever higher protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. members say, "hear, hear". I defy them now to point to anything which the Conservative party have endeavoured to place on the statute books of this country during the last fifteen years to justify the position they have taken. I will go further. I recall that when the reciprocity agreement was introduced it contained provision for a duty on Portland cement, and I wonder if the hon. Minister of National Defence, realized when he spoke about the reciprocity agreement the other day that the alteration of a single item terminated the entire agreement; not one single item could be changed without terminating the entire agreement. It was not a treaty; there was no written agreement or treaty. It could be destroyed at the caprice of either party. Canadian cement was protected by a high duty, but one of the first things Sir Thomas White did as Minister of Finance was to reduce the duty on cement. That is the answer to my hon. friend.

I might perhaps digress a moment here to ask the Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), who spoke on the reciprocity agreement, if they realize that that was not an agreement at all; that each country passed a statute and placed it on its own statute books, so that either party, by changing a single item, would terminate the whole arrangement. In 1920 we had in this country all the benefits of the reciprocity agreement; we had free admission of cattle, potatoes, wheat and other grains into the markets of the United States. Then what happened? There was a change in the government of the United States, and the farmers voted for a high protective tariff against Canada; they had no thought of what would happen to Canadians. I saw Canadian cattlemen ruined by that tariff, which was put into effect without a single thought as to what would happen to the farmers and cattlemen of this country. In the United States they did not care what happened to the Canadians, they were legislating for the people of their own country. Our cattle and our wheat were shut out of the United States market. Do hon. gentlemen not recall the circumstances under which the tariff on wheat was increased up to 42 cents per bushel? I saw that change take place. I saw them raise the duty from 25 to 42 cents. I saw our cattle shut out. Now many of them would like to have our cattle, but the farmers of the United States have a great voting power, and they want the tariff maintained against Canadian cattle and Canadian wheat and they are as much farmers as my hon. friends yonder. Now, sir, digressing for a moment with respect to that, I say to the Minister of National Defence, and to my young friend from Hants-Kings, that the reason the Conservative party opposed reciprocity was because it meant the establishment of a channel of trade that could be destroyed at the caprice of our neighbour. That is the reason. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce realizes better than most men in this house how dangerous it is to establish a channel of trade and then have your competitor destroy it without a word of warning. That was the reason we voted against the reciprocity agreement, and that is the reason we destroyed it. The reason many farmers and cattlemen in Canada were ruined was because the channel of trade thus established by them was cut off without a word of warning.

But, sir, there is something more. The other evening the Minister of Justice quoted from the report of the Economic conference, and he pointed out that at Geneva it was suggested that high tariffs were very bad and that low tariffs were much to be desired. What do I find? That one of the things stressed most strongly was that we should have long term agreements rather than short term agreements. Now the reciprocity agreement was not a treaty at all. It could be terminated by either party without a single moment's notice.

Mr. RALSTON: Was not the disloyalty cry raised by my hon. friends in regard to it?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the hon. gentleman is just the type of citizen who should make that observation. The person who said the agreement would make us an adjunct to the United States is the gentleman who is now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. He made the observation that if this agreement passed Canada would become commercially an adjunct to the United States.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friends said at that time that reciprocity meant annexation and that it was a disloyal policy.

Mr. BENNETT: I say now that the gentleman who was formerly President of the United States, Mr. Champ Clark, and Mr. Underwood said that. We told the Canadian electors that if once a channel of trade were established for our cattle, our wheat, and our natural products to the United States that channel might be destroyed at somebody's whim or caprice with great resulting injury to Canadians. That is what we said and if my hon. friends opposite can get any comfort from it they are welcome.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. minister must have in mind what Edward Blake said.

Mr. BENNETT: It is true that the late Edward Blake had that view, and one might, I fancy, compare his intellectual attainments and his services to the Liberal party not without disadvantage to some hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, sir, let us proceed to study further what the hon. Minister of Finance said in his speech when the tariff advisory board was set up. I have in my hand a copy of P.C. No. 530, dated 7th April, 1926, appointing the tariff advisory board and defining their duties. The board was duly set up and in the course of time began to function. I find that it has cost this country quite a considerable sum of money to maintain that board. Here is the story. First of all you have the following employees: A. M. Baird, L. H. Byles, K. Byrnes, F. M. Chapman, J. Easton, K. Easton, T. King, F. Lavoie, J. C. Leslie, D. McEvoy, H. B. McKinnon, Theo. Monty, A. Quayle, M. Northcott. These all draw salaries ranging from $4,120 per annum down to $4 a day; among those who are drawing $10 a day is Mr. F. M. Chapman, who was political organizer and henchman for the chairman of the board when he was a candidate for the Liberal party in South Ontario last fall. Here is the board set up, and who comprise it? It consists of Mr. Moore, as chairman, and two other gentlemen with respect to whom nothing can be said. Who is Mr. Moore? He is a defeated Liberal candidate in Ontario. That is fact number one. A few years ago I had occasion to say in the chamber which preceded the present one something regarding the activities of Mackenzie and Mann in every legislature in this country and as to the effect upon the public life of Canada. I can only say this, that Mr. Moore was one of their chief instruments in effecting their purposes. Now let us go a step further. To-day Mr. Moore is exercising the patronage of Ontario and the government accepts his recommendations. More than that, during the last month he has been discussing with his friends what his chances of success are in Ontario at the next election. There are men in this house with whom he talked the matter over. Now let us ask ourselves whether any man in whose constituency there are industries affected by the tariff and upon which he must depend for support should be made chairman of the tariff board. Why Sir, only the other day I read in an Ontario paper, with a picture of the chairman of the board, the statement that he was about to take the flying camp from Borden down to Whitby in his own constituency. Is that man fit to be chairman of the tariff board? I am not talking about his intellectual fitness at all. Is he fit by reason of his record and of his present endeavours to secure a seat in this parliament for the position which he now holds? There used to be a law which provided that one who occupied a position that touched in any way the right of a citizen to vote, should not be permitted to be a candidate for parliament for a period of years after he left office. That was a sound provision. Now we have the tariff board in the hands of a gentleman who is aiming to be a candidate at the next election, in whose constituency there are a large number of industries that have been touched by these tariff changes, whose political friends—and I wish to say the changes in this tariff are surely political—are benefited, by those changes and whose political opponents are injured by them. I say that is not good for Canada; I say it is not a proper thing for this country.

Now let us see what happens. I have the report made by that gentleman. It was tabled in the house as sessional paper 132A, and it is what? It is a statement that they were unable to function with respect to some of these matters, and they sent them up to the minister without a recommendation or without even the finding of a fact with respect to them. The list starts on page 1 of the annex and there are five pages of the various applications, but there is no fact finding, nothing of that sort within the order in council that I have just read. No effort at all is made to comply with the order in council. One of the features of the report will be found on page 2, where the commissioner says:

> Unfortunately the civil service, as at present constituted, is not fully equipped to meet the board's technical requirements, and it follows that it would be unfortunate if, in its initial, years, the board should be subjected to greater strain than its capacity will bear.

That is the serious and solemn report placed before the minister. It consists of some nine pages and it includes an expression of approval of the assistance that has been given by this person and the other; but there are no findings of fact, nothing upon which a minister could act. I say here and now to the minister that the evidence which was given at those sittings has never been read by him. I know how long it would take him to read it because I took it myself and made an endeavour to read it. These volumes of evidence are calmly transmitted to the minister together with this report and the minister brings in his tariff. Whose tariff is it? This country has a right to know whose tariff it is. I know one man who did not know anything about it and that is the Minister of Finance himself. But he is learning; since this budget was brought down he is beginning to understand something about it. Let us see how the report complies with the terms and provisions of the order in council. An advisory tariff board is not a new thing, as we shall find. Bill 88 introduced by Sir Thomas White in the parliament of 1911-12 was a bill to create a tariff commission, and under the provisions of section 4 of that act the powers of the commission were defined. They consisted in the right to deal with every phase of our economic life and to determine those factors which should be considered in deciding what tariffs should be allowed. But what have we here? Do you realize, sir, that for the first time in the history of Canada, people outside of this country have assisted in determining what our tariff shall be? I have under my hand the briefs that were filed with the tariff board. By whom are they filled? The first brief on the woollen tariff schedule was filed by representatives of the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers and there were also filed observations on the brief presented by the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers, by the wool textile delegation of England on behalf of the federations and associations who are its constituent members.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Does the hon. member object to that?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly do. I object to any man who is not a Canadian having anything to do with fixing our tariff. Let us go a step further. Who also had a hand in it?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member knows they will give us a hearing in England.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the hon. member tried it?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, on many occasions.

Mr. BENNETT: They have never had a public hearing at which a Canadian has been asked to appear or give evidence in regard to the Safeguarding of Industries Act. Of course they would give a hearing to the hon. gentleman in England in their offices. They would be glad to welcome him and to talk over anything with him, and a highly intelligent conversation would ensue; but when in the history of this country did you ever see the representative of a competing industry come into Canada and file a brief as has been done in this case?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I thought the hon. member spoke of observations.

Mr. BENNETT: These are in the form of observations on the brief. If my hon. friend would rather call it "observations", we will call it "observations." Let us go a step further. This is a statement filed by the West Riding Chamber of Commerce, representing whom? Representatives of the chambers of commerce of Batley and Birstall, Bradford, Cleckheaton and Heckmondwike, Dewsbury, Halifax, Huddersfield, Leeds, Ossett and Wakefield. Then comes the Axminster. Jacquard and Chenile Carpet Manufacturers' Association with whom the Tapestry Carpet Manufacturers' Association and practically all British carpet manufacturers not belonging to any associations are co-operating. Then we have the British Agents Association of Canada, who filed observations for the purpose of affecting the tariff of this country. But this was not the end of it. The French also filed a memorandum or observations in respect to this matter. They represented not one or two or three but some thirty-six great French manufacturers. They filed memoranda with our tariff board as to how we should deal with our tariff. Is that what my hon. friend wishes to suggest should be done? In that regard it may be very interesting to ask ourselves just how they treated us. Do you suppose, sir, for a single moment that the great republic of France, in fixing its tariff, would have Canadians tell them how they should deal with it? Do you suppose, under the Safeguarding of Industries Act, the government of Great Britain would rely upon the attitude taken by Canadians as to how they should shape and form their tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, all I can say to my hon. friend is:

I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel.

Mr. DUNNING: Canada was considered and its representations were considered.

Mr. BENNETT: They never had a Canadian representative in connection with the Safeguarding of Industries Act. I am glad the minister has spoken, because I find he also had an idea as to how this should be dealt with. In the fall of 1927 at a banquet given to the Empire Marketing Board, the minister said:

He was not impressed with the fact that it had got far enough away, from the old idea—a relic of colonial days—that it was the business of the colonies and dominions to raise the raw materials to be shipped to the central market to be manufactured and that it was the duties of the colonies and dominions to buy the manufactured article. Mr. Dunning held that the idea was good in the old days, but no longer held in the days of the self-governing dominions. He asked the visitors how many of them would be content to raise the raw materials and develop the natural resources, unless they manufactured the finished product at home, and said that he had pleaded with the British manufacturers—

That is the observation he made.

—to transfer to the dominions plants and portions of plants and their artisan genius, rather than to allow others, sometimes outside of the empire, to gain a control of manufacturing in the dominions which might possibly become permanent.

That is his story, but now he approves of these men not bringing factories to Canada but endeavouring to influence the members of the tariff advisory board as to what protection our industries should have.

Mr. CANNON: How can we have inter-imperial trade if we are not to receive observations from the others sections of the empire?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that the Solicitor General was not serious in that observation. This country, as his senior minister has told him, is an autonomous country and we must be a self-governing dominion. When we have to be told by the manufacturers of other communities how we shall transact our business, what happens?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Information.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is information that was wanted, it was not necessary for these gentlemen to come to Canada. They might have sent their information by mail. Why should they examine witnesses?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To get the facts.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask my hon. friend from Manitoba what he thinks with respect to that? There was once a Canadian statesman who made the observation, and it was a very proper one, that he believed a woollen factory in Canada was as great an asset to the British Empire as a woollen factory in Yorkshire. That is the principle upon which we stand. So much for your advisory tariff board and the way it transacts its business.

Then we have the tariff schedules introduced in this budget by the minister, without having read the evidence, without having met the delegations, acting upon a verbal report, I presume, of people who would not put in writing what the order in council said they should do. Has not this house the right to know about it? When these resolutions are in committee, we want to know why these tariffs have been framed in a way in which heretofore they have never been framed. Do hon. gentlemen opposite realize that in days gone by when my friend (Sir Henry Drayton) was Minister of Finance, he went from one end of the country to the other holding public hearings in order that people might make representations as to how they felt the tariff should be framed?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing came out of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman never got the opportunity, because an election ensued.

Mr. CANNON: Pass on to another point.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry that hon. gentlemen are so vociferous in their applause. I had not expected to meet with their approval to that extent.

May I make this observation—and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will agree with me—that a tariff thus prepared is not a tariff to which the Canadian people can give their assent without the closest scrutiny of every item. I do not propose to discuss these items at length, but this I will say, that when these tariff resolutions are in committee, as no opportunity has been afforded to those vitally affected as should have been done, this house will require the widest possible explanation to justify the action that has been taken. Why? Let me give an illustration. Why should the cotton industry at one point have the duties greatly increased? Why put a duty on cotton yarn and leave woollen yarn free? Why these inconsistencies? Why should you, when there is but one mill in all Canada making a given product, increase its protection, and deny protection to another industry? Why put a drawback on coal that was not asked for?

Mr. MALCOLM: It was asked for.

Mr. BENNETT: The records of the tariff board do not show it.

Mr. MALCOLM: No. I have asked for it a good many sessions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it has been worth all this just to get that admission. There is one thing we know now that we did not know before. This is not a tariff with which the board had anything to do at all. It is what might be called a log-rolling tariff; that is the kind of tariff it is. If my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had his wishes met and is satisfied, peradventure others with similar desires had their wishes met. That will make good reading, Mr. Speaker, as to how a tariff is framed.

There is another matter that might be mentioned. I am not going into details, but with regard to the general trend of these tariff schedules I would point out that steadily we have been increasing our imports from the United States, and steadily our exports have been declining. We made implements practically free, and what has been happening? We find our imports of agricultural implements increasing. Let me read what the United States says about Canadian trade. Let me read what came out in the February 13, 1928, issue of Commerce Reports issued by the United States Department of Commerce.

Mr. POWER: Is this an observation?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it may convince even my hon. friend. This is not an observation; it is a written document. At page 437 the report says:

> The outstanding feature of the shipments of agricultural implements during the year 1927 was the large total that went to Canada, amounting to $29,791,472 which was 33 per cent of the total shipped to all countries, and which exceeded the shipments to all of Europe by more than $8,000,000. Canadian purchases in 1927 were the largest ever reported and were greater than the average shipments to all countries in the years prior to 1918.

This is the United States, remember, upon this subject:

> These large Canadian purchases resulted from the material betterment of conditions in Ontario and the prairie provinces, especially Saskatchewan and Alberta, where American tractors, threshing machines, and harvesters were sold much more extensively than in 1926. Purchases of wheel tractors were exceptionally large, amounting to 15,749 valued at $12,421,105 as compared with 8,173 valued at $6,823,648 in 1926. Sales of American implements in Canada have been showing consistent and rapid increases during the past three years and, since each of these years has been a good crop year, the buying power of the farming population has been materially enhanced. It is also worthy of note that exports of implements to Canada comprised 90 per cent of shipments to all of North America, including Central America and the West Indies, and exceeded those to all of South America by $10,000,000.

There is one question I would put both to my hon. friends to my left and to hon. gentlemen before me. Reading that document I ask them, in view of the fact that the price of agricultural implements is a little higher now than it was when the duty was taken off, because of economic and other conditions, whether or not they believe now that the removal of that duty effected any useful purpose to Canada. I go further. I put in front of them that statement which shows that at least 10,000 workmen were engaged on this work day by day in order that Canada might be supplied with agricultural implements. There was placed upon Hansard yesterday a statement of what that means in consuming capacity, in answer to a question by my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). Think what that means in terms of food and food products. Weigh it carefully, make the computation in the light of the figures given yesterday and what I have given you from the American Commerce Reports, and I ask hon. gentlemen whether they believe that their hopes and expectations in this regard have been justified. I think, if they are the gentlemen I believe them to be, studying these matters as I know they do, that they will say no.

There is another matter. What is, after all, the attitude of any party towards tariffs? It is merely to utilize, if possible, this particular machinery of the government to accomplish a particular result. And what is that result? The result we hope for is to advance the interests of our country. I hold in my hand the February number of the National Review, in which at page 866 appears an article on the plight of British industry, giving figures from the International labour bureau, respecting the comparative real wages in different countries, as follows:

London	100
Amsterdam	87
Berlin	67
Brussels	42
Copenhagen	120
Dublin	102
Lisbon	32
Lodz	45
Madrid	55
Milan	48
Ottawa	153
Paris	57
Philadelphia	175
Prague	49
Riga	50
Rome	49
Stockholm	92
Sydney	136
Tallinn	46
Warsaw	41

It is against such competition that the Canadian workman is pitted. I ask you, sir, whether or not the Canadian workman has the right to maintain his high standard of living and education for himself and his family? Have we not the right, by the equalization of conditions through any form of legislation that may be devised, to protect our people in the development of our resources from the low wages of these different countries I have mentioned. That is the reason an effort is being made to equalize these conditions. There are the figures; they speak for themselves. I shall not at this hour do more than merely refer to them, but the whole article is illuminating as indicating the conditions under which British industry is maintained.

There is another matter to which I wish to direct attention, in connection with the report of the Economic conference. If my learned friend the Minister of Justice had only turned back a little he would have found in that very report a statement relating to a country that desired to become self-contained. I quote from page 28 of the final report of the World Economic conference:

> The desire to deal with the problem of excessive industrial capacity has usually led to an attempt to reserve the home market for home production by means of tariff barriers erected with a view to creating an independent national economy capable of producing, under the protection of the tariff wall, an increase of invested wealth and a more satisfactory return for the work of the nation. This effort to attain self-sufficiency cannot hope to succeed unless it is justified by the size, natural resources, economic advantages and geographical situation of a country. There are very few countries in the world which can hope to attain it.

And, sir, Canada is one of them. If my hon. friend had read that the other day, as he should have, he would have ascertained that there is the principle upon which we to the left of the Speaker have been endeavouring to work out this country's economic salvation. It is all right to say that you have reduced the tariff year by year. Ever since 1923 there has been a steady effort to reduce tariffs, so they say, and now they have reached the point where, under the guise of reducing the tariff, they are really increasing it. Let me read these words as to the necessity of tariff stability in the Dominion. Do you recall, sir, that in 1923 to your right sat the right hon. Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding? These are Mr. Fielding's words:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff. There is no finality in legislation whether as respects that tariff or as respects anything else. That which parliament can do to-day it can undo to-morrow. Everybody knows that. Everybody must conduct his business in the light of that fact. Nevertheless it is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Exceptions will occur. Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes.

The right hon. Prime Minister on May 23 of the same year, dealing with the same matter, said:

What my hon. friend sought to convey to the house in his remarks was that the government, after having carefully studied the situation from all angles, had come to the conclusion that having regard to the situation of Canada to-day in relation to other countries, it should tell the Canadian people that as respects the tariff, unless there were obvious reasons why there should be changes occasioned by necessity, they might be reasonably assured that there would be a steadiness in the tariff for some little time to come. That is what my hon. friend sought to make clear to this house, and he did so for the reason that what we in Canada can do with justice in the matter of tariff revision is necessarily dependent in large part upon what is done by our neighbours to the south and upon what occurs in Europe.

I find to-day—that France, one of the leading members of the League of Nations, is raising her tariff against Canada, while the Minister of Justice talks vaguely of following the mandates of the league. I find further that the right hon. Prime Minister in those days was saying that what we did was largely dependent on what was being done by our neighbours to the south. They have increased their tariffs against this country year in and year out, so as to shut out practically anything that is Canadian—unless they want our raw materials to fabricate in their own factories. The Prime Minister continued:

What is the position with regard to the United States? Since the Liberal convention was held there has been enacted by the United States a much higher tariff than ever before existed between Canada and the United States. The Fordney-McCumber tariff, socalled, to-day is operating to the disadvantage of Canada.

Here is the question he then propounded, and I put it to my friends yonder:

Is there any member of this house who will stand up in his place and say: Notwithstanding that obvious fact we think we should throw down our bars against the United States and give them an opportunity to come in here and affect our industries in a manner even more seriously than they have already been affected?

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. Prime Minister of this country on May 23, 1923. But that was intended for consumption by the manufacturers, and when he found he had before him hon. gentlemen led by my friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), who did not think that way, he commenced to tinker with the tariff, and ever since he has been revising it in the manner that I have indicated. You, sir, will recall that happy expression of the Minister of the Interior who sounded "the death knell of protection" in that famous speech of his, and he now finds himself confronted with the observation I have just read by his leader. That is the position. It is the old story illustrated by the remarks of the Minister of Railways, who endeavours to make the Canadian people believe that we are the party of high tariff because we have dared to say just what the Prime Minister himself said in 1923, that there is no one in this house or in the country who dare say—what? "Notwithstanding that obvious fact we think we should throw down our bars against the United States." Have you done it? Let the statistical record in regard to imports of iron, steel, agricultural implements, tractors, copper, brass, in fact almost everything that might be mentioned, answer—look at those imports steadily increasing. Just as the minister said, the trend is to increase what we buy from the people of the United States and to sell less and less to them, except raw materials. That is what the right hon. Prime Minister then protested against. But power was more important than adherence to the policy he then laid down, and, as the Minister of Immigration and Colonization said in 1925, his thunderbolts launched against the government secured the abrogation of those expressions of opinion, with the result that we have the tariff as it is to-day. That is the position with respect to it.

One step further, Mr. Speaker. We have been dealing with the problem of immigration, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house have ventured to say that because we on this side have pointed out the actual conditions in this country we were boosting the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Boosting the United States? Then I ask if that is what the Prime Minister was doing in 1923. May I go further, may I ask my friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) who referred to Sir Richard Cartwright's speeches when the Liberal party was in opposition, was Sir Richard then boosting the United States? That great financial critic pointed out the conditions prevailing in the two countries, and stated what he believed was necessary to be done for the benefit of Canada. It will be a poor day for the Canadian parliament when it becomes a rubber stamp to enforce the will of the Prime Minister; it will be a poor day for this country when the parliament of Canada is to be a rubber stamp to record the will of the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Agriculture; it will be a poor day, sir,—

Mr. DUNNING: Or to rubber stamp your will.

Mr. BENNETT: That might be. What, sir, is the duty of this party? The duty of every man in this house is to think in terms of his country, and when he finds in 1923 the Prime Minister declaiming against a possible attitude of mind towards the great republic to the south in dealing with fiscal matters, and then changing his mind and calling upon his friend from Brandon and that gentleman's associates to support reductions in the tariff from year to year,—I say the duty of every hon. member is clear. We who criticize know that the right hon. gentleman does not change his mind so lightly, we know there is a purpose behind the change, and we have a right to seek the purpose. And if we have a right to point out the effect we have also a right to point out the purpose. The purpose is power; the effect is injury to Canada. It means loss of population to this country. And it means more than that. The American commercial reports indicating the movement of farm machinery to this country mean that just so many Canadians as might have been engaged in the manufacture of that machinery here are without jobs. Is it treason to point that out? Did the right hon. gentleman hesitate to do it when he talked of usurpation of power and abuse of the institutions of this country? When he spoke of those matters in days gone by was it treason on his part? Do hon. gentlemen opposite fancy that they can becloud the minds of the Canadian people by making such observations? Let me assure them that so long as we are here, so long as we occupy the seats to which we have been elected, we propose fearlessly to criticize the acts of the government notwithstanding what they may say. It ill becomes ministers of the crown, responsible ministers, to foster such a delusion as that and to charge us with engaging in immigration propaganda in the interests of the United States. My hon. friends opposite know perfectly well that people are shut out of that country under the laws that prevail there. Aware of these things, we propose to criticize the government so long as no effort is made to provide work for our people; because work is what is very urgently needed in Canada. Every effort, therefore, which this party makes is an effort to secure work for Canadians and not for others.

I would remind my hon. friends of one other fact. When they were in opposition what did they do? They were not content to make speeches on subjects such as my hon. friend from Hants-Kings has discussed; they moved resolutions. And what was the purport of the resolutions they moved in 1889, in 1890 and again in 1891? It was to secure unrestricted freedom in the trade relations between the United States and Canada. The reform which was suggested, to quote the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was the absolute reciprocal freedom of trade between the two countries. This briefly sums up the history of my hon. friends in this regard; this is the record of those who now attack us because we venture to assert the rights of Canada and to urge those rights as being of greater moment to us than the interests of the United States. When we turn to the record of the party opposite when in opposition, we find that, making a strong appeal for support in 1891, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> The reform suggested by the Liberal party is absolute reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States.

How long would there have been a Dominion of Canada had that policy been carried into effect? Is that my hon. friends' policy to-day? Is that the goal towards which they are striving? Is that the reason for the tariff being reduced? Is that the reason that they are pursuing the course proposed in days gone by? Let my hon. friends answer these questions before they attack those who sit to the left of the Speaker.

I will not venture to trespass further on the time of the house, but I merely point out that, according to the Commercial Intelligence Journal which we received last week, I find at page 354 that whereas the imports of automobile parts for assembly amounted in 1927 to $29,582,000, in 1926 they were only $25,000,000, an increase of over $4,000,000; while automobile parts for replacement are given respectively as $4,919,000 and $3,600,000. The same condition of things exists in regard to rods. That is the effect of the government's legislation: with decreasing exports we are assembling parts to a greater extent than before. This means less work for Canadians—less manufacturing and an increasing tendency towards the assembling of parts. Now, what is the aim of the Conservative party? It is to endeavour to make this country economically independent. Our objective is to render the Dominion of Canada no longer dependent upon foreigners for our economic existence. I put this to the government: If we are obliged always to go abroad for all our machinery, what will happen supposing, in a moment of caprice, that foreign supply is shut off? What did Adam Smith say on this point?

Mr. DUNNING: Surely you will not quote him.

Mr. BENNETT: I admit that one should be reluctant to quote Adam Smith after the Prime Minister, but I do not think it is at all amiss to point out the ground on which Adam Smith justified the taking care of industry at home. I ask this house quite seriously this question: is this country to become economically a dependent or an independent community? Are we to find ourselves in such a situation that, at the caprice of a powerful neighbour, for purposes solely selfish and entirely in its own interests, we shall be excluded from our sources of supply? Yet this has happened before. Do my hon. friends realize that in Europe one country has established, and to-day maintains at an annual loss, a factory for the purpose of ensuring that its people shall not be dependent upon foreign supplies as they were during the war? Do hon. gentlemen realize that this particular industry now operates in the Netherlands? Well, is Canada going to find itself in a similar predicament? All we endeavour to do, Mr. Speaker, is by every legislative means within our power, to use the words of a great Englishman, and with the tools that are in our hands, whether they be tariffs, regulations, bonuses, drawbacks, or bounties, to bend our efforts to one purpose and one purpose only, namely, to make the Canadian people a strong and virile nation, developing their own resources to the limit of their ability, and thus become entirely economically independent of foreigners, whoever they may be or wherever they may be found

I have not the time this afternoon to dwell upon the trade treaties which have been entered into by this government; I cannot indicate the extent to which the government has failed in respect of these agreements. Suffice it to say that every trade treaty which the government has entered into has operated against the Dominion of Canada. There is, perhaps, one exception respecting which there may be some doubt; I refer to the treaty with the Netherlands. But so far as the others are concerned I think the statement I have just made can be accepted without any qualification. We have made treaties with Australia, New Zealand, Japan, Italy and France.

Mr. ROBB: And South Africa.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and South Africa. And all these treaties have been equally disastrous to Canada. See what happened but yesterday: France raised its duties but we were powerless. We cannot touch ours unless we abrogate the treaty; so the minister told me yesterday. In Australia they increased their tariff; we are powerless. Why? Simply because we were not skilful enough as bargainers; they outreached us; they outgeneraled us. The bargain, so far as they are concerned, leaves them free to raise their tariff against us while, without abrogating the treaty, we are powerless to touch our tariff as it affects them. Did my hon. friends know that? Do they know that we cannot touch these items without cancelling the treaties we have with these countries? The Minister of Finance was waited upon the other day by a certain delegation—this will reveal his state of mind concerning these treaties—and when he heard a complaint regarding certain items in the schedules affected he remarked, "You did not support me properly with respect to the Australian treaty". It appears, then, that industry is to be punished if it fails to support the Minister of Finance. Is that the law of this country? Is that the way in which Canada is to be governed? If so, clearly our tariff is but a political tariff. Legislation has been introduced, retroactive in its character, for one purpose and one purpose only, and I say that such a thing is improper. It is improper for the Minister of Finance to tell certain people that inasmuch as they did not support his Australian treaty to his satisfaction he will do nothing for them. This, I submit, is anything but a proper frame of mind for the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be; it is not the right attitude for any Canadian minister to take towards the industrial life of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have moved an amendment the affirmative of which we say clearly expresses the attitude of the party to which we belong. Our position is stated in simple, clearcut language. In order that there may no misunderstanding, let me once more read that amendment:

> This house regrets that the measures proposed by the government do not tend to provide increased employment in Canada nor to induce the return of Canadians to their native land, nor to prevent the continued emigration of our people to the United States; and that they make no provisions for the preservation of our domestic markets for Canadian farm and dairy products, nor for the effective development of the natural resources of the country, nor for the abolition of the sales tax by the first of January 1929.

The policy of the Conservative party is to increase employment in Canada, to keep our people here and to induce the return of Canadians to their native land. The evidence given before this high court of parliament by the hon. members who have taken part in this debate proves conclusively that the policies in force at present are not having this effect, and neither are they preventing the continued emigration of our people to the United States.

The amendment also expresses regret that no provision has been made for the preservation of our domestic markets for Canadian farm and dairy products. I have under my hand a letter dealing with the butter and egg situation; the last commercial report deals with the competition of Russia in the egg markets of Great Britain. Look at our imports of butter and eggs and dairy products and see our position with respect to these matters. No attempt is made in the budget to improve that condition. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) tried to give some of the dairy interests of Canada a little comfort by quietly suggesting that the Australian treaty was not inviolable, but that there was provision by which it might be abrogated. Did he consult the Minister of Finance as to whether or not he would abrogate it? Not yet. That is the way in which the government is conducted, to try and induce hon. members yonder to believe the treaty will be abrogated in order that they may vote properly, while the Minister of Finance sits quietly in his seat knowing very well that he has no intention of abrogating that treaty in any way. In other words, if I might be permitted to use a colloquialism, it is his own baby and he proposes to nourish it. The amendment also regrets that no provision is made for the effective development of the natural resources of the country. You only have to consider the American commerce reports and the other publications to which I have alluded, to make the position perfectly clear.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the affirmative of that amendment expresses our settled convictions.

Mr. DUNNING: But not your policy.

Mr. BENNETT: It also expresses our policy, as outlined at Winnipeg. There is high authority for saying the policy is a chart, and there is still higher authority for saying it was never a compass, as far as the hon. gentleman is concerned. He feels very much hurt that he will no longer be able to make his diatribes against the Conservative party because of their alleged position with respect to tariff policies. Now he and the Minister of Agriculture must face the electors of Saskatchewan and explain why the butter markets of this country are being destroyed and why the farmers of Saskatchewan are going out of the dairying business. They will also have to explain why 3,000 head of dairy cattle were sold in Colchester county alone in the last six months.

These things will have to be explained, and the policy to which I have alluded is the policy of the party with which I have the honour to be associated for the present. We have no apologies to offer; we stand four-square by that policy, and repeat that Canada can only be built up by a proper appreciation of all those principles which political economists say are essential to the development of the resources of a new land. We must practise economy; we must practise thrift; we must reduce our national debt as rapidly as possible, to maintain the great heritage which Providence has given to us. In the words of the Prime Minister himself, this can only be done by taking full cognizance of the fact that there is a great republic to the south clamouring for our markets, invading them at every point and securing them wherever possible. Every bit of legislative machinery in our power and every tool we can pick up must be taken in hand and used to effect the purpose we have in mind, and when that purpose is effected they may be laid down again. If the country is being exploited by industry then this country and this parliament can deal with it.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In what way?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is far too intelligent to require any reply. Excise duties and reduced tariffs, when industries are able to stand such measures, can make it impossible for this country to be exploited in that way. Everyone knows that; everyone who has studied this question at all is aware of that fact.

Now, sir, I have trespassed upon the time and attention of this house very much longer than I had intended, but there were many matters which came to my mind and which I thought should be dealt with. I am conscious of not having dealt with as many of them as I should have liked, but I do commend to this house and to this country the thought that in so far as we are endeavouring to criticize fearlessly, boldly and courageously the proposals of the government, we are within our rights. Every effort we can make to secure the health, happiness and prosperity of the people of this country will be made, and we will continue to urge that economy be practised in the conduct of our national affairs in order that we may no longer be threatened with the economic menace to which the president of the United States so fittingly referred.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in opening his remarks my friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) expressed his appreciation of the high character and tone of the debate which has now lasted for almost four weeks. I am happy to join with him in his appreciation of the speeches which have been delivered. May I also venture to congratulate him on having the front rows of the opposition benches filled for the first time since this parliament has been in session. He has succeeded in bringing his wanderers back from different parts of the world. I see my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who has just returned to us from the West Indies; my friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who has just returned from Great Britain, and my friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), who has also come back from across the ocean. I say to these hon. members that we are pleased to see them here and glad to see them looking so hale and hearty. I might also say that I imagine not one of them has read the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). I doubt if they have read the amendments which have been moved by the Conservative party and the Progressive group; on the other hand I venture the assurance that they will all vote for the amendment proposed by the opposition, that they will vote against the amendment of the Progressive group and against the budget.

May I say to my hon. friend that I appreciate the manner of his presentation of the point of view of the opposition in its criticism of the budget. I shall endeavour to follow him as well as I can in the order in which he proceeded, and try to touch upon the various subjects with which he dealt. He opened his remarks by a number of references to hon. gentlemen on this side of the house who have spoken during the course of the debate. Most of those references were in the nature of poetic effusions—I do not know that I can follow my hon. friend there. One little quotation, however, did come to my mind, as I listened while he lectured us, and told of what had been done elsewhere as well as what should be done here. As I watched the expression on the faces of those who surround him, I thought of those lines:

> And still they gazed and still the wonder grew,
> That one small head should carry all he knew.

As far as I was able to follow my hon. friend, he began with references to the public debt. From that he proceeded to a discussion of railway finance, then he dealt with the taxation which is proposed for the coming year. He came next to the tariff and spoke at some length in that connection. Finally he concluded by a reference to the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), which he said he was going to read to the house. Unfortunately, however, my hon. friend did not read the amendment, and for the sake of those members of his party who have just returned perhaps I could not do better than read it in order that they may know exactly what it is they are expected to support.

First of all, what is the present position? The Minister of Finance made a motion to the effect that the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means to consider certain resolutions which he was anxious to present. These resolutions are in accord with similar resolutions which have been moved by the Minister of Finance in previous years. They agree with those resolutions in following lines of fiscal policy which have been consistently maintained by the government from the very day that we took office, and which have brought surpluses instead of deficits, reductions instead of increases in public debt, and reductions instead of increases in taxation. My hon. friend in presenting his motion gave to the house a statement of the finances of the country during the past year. But my hon. friend the leader of the opposition seems to think that the Finance minister should not have touched upon the past year, and rather chided him with having failed to say a little more about the year to come. The Minister of Finance was erring on the safe side when, in giving a statement of the government's policies with respect to taxation and tariff and how they had worked out in the past year, he indicated that in following similar lines for the coming year, he was safe in predicting that the statement he would present at the end of the next financial year would be similar to that which he was then presenting. What was that statement? It was a statement to the effect that the balance sheet of the country showed a surplus, a very large surplus, a surplus running into very many millions of dollars; that it showed reductions in the public debt of many millions, and reductions in taxation as well. Those were the three outstanding features of the budget. The Minister of Finance pointed out wherein, by following along lines he indicated, the government had been able to achieve these results, and he predicted that in the next statement which he would present, following lines parallel to those which had been followed in the past year, there would be another surplus, further reduction of the pubic debt, and possibly further reductions of taxation. One would have thought that the presentation of a statement of that character would have met with some measure of general appreciation. Instead of that, however, it has brought forth two amendments, each of which is similar to the other in one particular only, namely, that each is in the nature of an expression of regret that the Minister of Finance has not gone far enough. But the interesting feature of the two amendments is this—that while hon. gentlemen immediately opposite regret that the Minister of Finance has not gone far enough in one direction, the Progressive group are supporting an amendment which regrets that the government has not gone further in an opposite direction. That is the real significance of the two amendments which are before us. Let me read the amendments in the words in which they have been presented to the house.

On February 16 the Minister of Finance moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

On February 20, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George moved the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets that the measures proposed by the government do not tend to provide increased employment in Canada, nor to induce the return of Canadians to their native land, nor to prevent the continued emigration of our people to the United States; and that they make no provisions for the preservation of our domestic markets for Canadian farm and dairy products, nor for the effective development of the natural resources of the country, nor for the abolition of the sales tax by the 1st of January, 1929.

Then on February 22nd, the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), of the Progressive group, moved:

That all the words after the word "regrets" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"That the government proposes further reductions in the income tax, thus making a serious departure from the principle of direct taxation; that the proposed revision of the customs tariff is inadequate to bring effective relief to the consuming public; and that the sales tax on the necessaries of life has not been eliminated."

As I said, Mr. Speaker, these amendments are similar in one particular only, namely, that each expresses a certain regret. It is true that each takes cognizance of the sales tax. Hon. gentlemen immediately opposite regret that the sales tax was not completely removed. Hon. gentlemen supporting the sub-amendment regret that the tax is not wholly removed on the necessaries of life. But when it comes to the rest of the amendments, hon. gentlemen of both parties regret that we have not followed policies based on fiscal principles diametrically opposed to one another. That is the line of criticism that the government has to meet. The public, I think, will be quick to appreciate that those who are opposing the government are greatly divided and not united. The public will be able to make a comparison between the weakness of the disunited criticism of the opposition and the merit of the united support which the budget will receive from this side of the house.

Let me come immediately to the question of the public debt. In order that the policy of the present administration may be appreciated in its true perspective, it is necessary to consider the situation as the government encountered it when we came into office. My hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, gave certain figures of taxation during the six or eight years prior to that time. He pointed out that during that period the governments then in office had taken from the taxpayers of Canada only a certain amount of taxation. He then quoted the amounts which had been taken from the taxpayers since we came into office and said: "Behold the much greater amount of taxation which the present government has taken from the people of this Dominion." Rightly understood, my hon. friend's comparison is a condemnation of hon. gentlemen opposite. What took place during the eight or ten years which preceded our coming into office? When the country was at war did hon. gentlemen opposite tax the people of Canada as was done in England, in France, anl elsewhere in order to carry on the war? They did not tax them to the extent of a single dollar for the purpose of carrying on the war, but left to their successors the payment of every dollar of the capital cost of the war. They did worse than that. They left to their successors the payment as well of every dollar of the cost of demobilization. My hon. friend talked about the mortgage on the farm. His friends left the country with a mortgage to the extent of one billion and several hundreds of millions of dollars, not one dollar of which did they seek to meet while in office. When we came into power we were at once confronted with the debts left by hon. gentlemen opposite. We found that the country had been going deeper and deeper into debt, and we took the first step necessary to save it, namely, that of seeking to "make ends meet," or in other words, to balance the budget. May I go further. Hon. gentlemen may say with respect to the war that the expenditure was abnormal, and that they did not expect to be able to meet that expenditure by taxation at the time. But what about the normal, ordinary expenditures at the time they were in office? If my memory serves me aright, hon. gentlemen opposite, when they say they were taxing the people so lightly, added in the period of the war and demobilization on ordinary account an expenditure of something over $13,773,000. To this was added another $173,000,000 of deficits for the fiscal years 1920-21, 1921-22. That is the situation with which we were confronted. What did the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, point out? He informed parliament that if the policy continued of not balancing the budget, of not even seeking to have revenues equal expenditures, this country would go further and further into bankruptcy and from bankruptcy into utter ruin. It was to overcome that situation and to reach a point where our finances would be on an even basis that this government undertook to levy a little more in the way of additional taxation, sufficient to help to reach a point where expenditures and revenues would be more or less equal. We came into office on December 29, 1921. That was the fiscal year for which hon. gentlemen opposite had provided. Their own Minister of Finance prepared the budget, and I claim, and I think hon. gentlemen will admit, that the figures relating to that year belong appropriately to their administration. I will say for my hon. friend's predecessor that he had courage enough to add something in the way of taxation during the time that he was in office. He had greater courage in that regard than the Union government which preceded him, but he did not add anything like enough to meet even the expenditures which he incurred, as I will show in a few moments. But if you compare the two years of his administration with the three following years of our administration, which three years were taken to bring about an adjustment of the finances of Canada, a readjustment so that we would reach a point at which the budget would balance, and then the three years following, you will see the successful working out of a consistent line of policy on the part of the Liberal administration. Those years disclose what? They disclose, as the Minister of Finance showed in the budget statement which he made the other day, surpluses instead of deficits, reduction of debt instead of increase of debt, reduction of taxation instead of increase of taxation. Let me give the statement to the house as briefly as I can.

According to the public accounts for the fiscal year 1920-21—I am giving the figures in millions of dollars—the total revenue amounted to $436,000,000 and the expenditure to $528,000,000, or a deficit of $92,000,000. That deficit of $92,000,000 was due to what?

Mr. BENNETT: Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was due to the fact that my hon. friends did not levy the taxation which they are accusing us of levying. It is easy for my hon. friend to take credit to himself and to his party and say that they were saving the people taxation in those days. They were adding and did add $92,000,000 of taxation that had to be met at some time and had to be met rather quickly if this country was not to go into bankruptcy. What about the following year? In 1921-22 the revenues amounted to $382,000,000 and the expenditures to $463,000,000, or another addition to the debt of this country of $81,000,000, not on war account, but on account of the ordinary business of government. Then we came into office and we were confronted, as I have said, with the obligations which hon. gentlemen opposite left to us. Our first effort was to readjust finances so as to bring about a balancing of expenditures and revenues. In the first year it was impossible completely to avoid a further deficit; but let me give the house the figures for that year. In 1922-23 revenues amounted to $403,000,000 and expenditures to $435,000,000 with a consequent deficit, not of $92,000,000 or $81,000,000, but of $32,000,000. In the following year, 1923-24, revenues were $407,000,000 and expenditures $371,000,000, bringing for the first time a surplus, and that a surplus of $36,000,000, and from that moment on to the present we have had surpluses every year. If, instead of surpluses, we had brought in deficits, hon. gentlemen opposite might well have started their amendment with regrets; but when the showing is what it is from that time on, the government I submit deserves something in the way of real appreciation from the house and from them in particular. The figures for the later years are as follows:

Fiscal year	Revenues	Expenditures	Surplus About
1924-25 ..	$352,000,000	$351,000,000	$ 300,000
1925-26 ..	383,000,000	355,000,000	28,000,000
1926-27 ..	401,000,000	359,000,000	42,000,000
1927-28 ..	419,000,000	365,000,000	54,000,000

The Minister of Finance gave as his surplus not $54,000,000, but that amount less $16,000,000. What was that $16,000,000? Of it, $14,000,000 was in the nature of loans made by hon. gentlemen opposite on soldier land settlement, loans which no future government would be able to collect and which, in order that the slate might be cleared of a bad debt, was wiped off entirely by the Minister of Finance. Then there were further moneys amounting to $2,000,000 given as loans in the way of relief for seed grain.

The Minister of Finance might have left those on the books if he had wished to do so, and if he had done so the surplus this year, instead of being $38,000,000, would have been $54,000,000. That is the real showing which has been made on the accounts for the last fiscal year. What my hon. friend did this year with regard to those bad debts was what in a much larger way the government has been doing right along with the deficits which were left to us by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Having been confronted with the obvious inferences of this statement, various speakers on the other side have insinuated that in some way the accounts have not been kept as they formerly were. The first criticism was that we should include in the general expenditures of the government expenditures made on account of the Canadian National Railways, and hon. gentlemen have repeated that over and over again. With respect to expenditures on the Canadian National Railways, may I say that there is no reason why those expenditures should be included in the public accounts as part of the ordinary expenditures of the government, and this for the following reasons: First, they never have been; from the days of confederation down to the present time the railway accounts have been kept separate. In the second place, the Canadian National Railways is in the nature of an industrial enterprise which is being operated not at cost but for purposes of profit and gain. It is in competition with a great private enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if a just policy is to be exercised towards all the railways in this country, we must permit the Canadian National Railways to seek to make their profits just as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company seek to make theirs. In the third place the whole control of the government railways has been taken out of the hands of the administration; the railways have been placed under the control of a president and board of directors who, by authority of parliament, are completely removed from any control on the part of the administration. I ask whether in those circumstances it would be fair and proper that the accounts of the Canadian National railways should be made part of the ordinary government expenditures.

But more than that. As has been very properly said in this debate, the Canadian National Railways are on all fours with a large industrial enterprise, such as the Hydro-Electric in the province of Ontario—an industrial enterprise which is in the nature of a great business corporation giving service to the public at large, but being conducted along lines similar to those followed by any large industrial enterprise. Every industrial corporation looking to the future will make outlays in the present with the expectation that returns will come in the course of a period of years. That has been the case with the Canadian National Railways. When one looks at the advances that have been made to the Canadian National Railways, one will discover that while money has been advanced from parliament to the Canadian National Railways, it has gone into improvements of a character which, though it may take years to bring results, we nevertheless expect in the course of time, will more and more justify the advances which have been made. May I point out this difference between the advances made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the Canadian National Railways and the advances made by the present administration? For the most part the advances which hon. gentlemen opposite made went to meet deficits in operation. The advances which have been made by the present administration have for the most part gone into improvements and extensions of a character likely vastly to increase the revenues of the railway in the course of time.

With respect to the statement that a different method in accounting has been followed by the present administration than was formerly the case, may I say that I am glad my hon. friend from West York is present, because I think he will bear me out when I mention that when he was Minister of Finance he called in a firm of auditors in the city of Toronto, the firm of Edwards, Morgan and Company, chartered accountants, to audit the books of the Finance department. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), speaking in this house the other day, said that it was a new idea to have an outside auditor come in and audit the books of the government, but my hon. friend from West York agrees that when he was in office as Finance Minister he engaged this firm of chartered accountants to audit the boks. They did so, and having audited the books, my hon. friend from West York published in the public accounts of that year the following certificate which was given:

> We have examined the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada (shown herewith) as of March 31, 1920, also the expenditure and revenue account for the fiscal year ended on the said date, and have verified the same by reference to the Dominion ledgers. We certify that the above-mentioned statements accurately set forth the matters therein referred to, and are as shown by the said books.
> (Signed) Edwards, Morgan and Company.
> Chartered Accountants

In the course of the next year or two criticism came from hon. gentlemen opposite that, in keeping the railway accounts separate from the ordinary accounts, we were adopting a different method from that followed by my hon. friend. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) then called in the same firm that my hon. friend from West York had retained when he was Minister of Finance, and asked them to examine the books and to give a certificate. This the government published in the public accounts, as follows:

> We have examined the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada as at March 31, 1924, and we certify that the balance sheet conforms to the balance sheets of previous years in not including in the net debt of the Dominion, issues of the Canadian National Railway Company and companies included in its system, which carry the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada. Such guaranteed issues are shown year by year as indirect liabilities.
> (Signed) Geo. Edwards,
> Of the firm of Edwards, Morgan & Co.
> W. Garth Thomson.
> Of the firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co

This year, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, seeing that hon. gentlemen opposite were still criticising the administration on the score of having altered the method of keeping the accounts, asked another firm of auditors, Messrs. P. S. Ross and Sons, chartered accountants, of Montreal, to audit the books, and they presented the following certificate which appears in the public accounts of last year:

> We certify that the published balance sheets examined by us have been compiled in a manner similar to the corresponding statements of previous years, and do not include in the net debt of the Dominion, issues of the Canadian National Railway Company and the companies included in its system which carry the guarantee of the Dominion. The details of such guarantees have been shown separately each year in the public accounts.

I think we can take it as now definitely settled that so far as accounting is concerned the government is justified in saying and the country in believing that comparisons will be on lines parallel to those which were followed by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office, and that any figures which we give to the country through the public accounts are correct in all particulars.

Let me deal for a moment more particularly with the railways financing. What is the record as it appears? I have not time to go at great length into a volume of figures, but I have taken some trouble to gather together figures that are significant with respect to the operation of the railways, and here again I would ask hon. members to note the difference in the three periods which I have mentioned—the period during which hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, the three years when we were seeking to readjust the finances of the country, and the last three years in which there has been more in the way of substantial success achieved. Take, first of all, the cash advances to the Canadian National Railways. There are two classes of figures which record these cash advances; there are the figures in the books of the Finance department, and there are the figures in the books of the Department of Railways. The books of the Department of Railways record as such all the cash advances that are made. The Finance department gives as its figures of cash advances the total advances less any refunds made by the railways to that department. I am going to give both columns so that hon. members will see that I am not seeking to give one set of figures rather than the other:

Fiscal Year	Actual net advance as per books of Railway department
1921-22	111,940,957 42

Then coming to the years of the present administration, the cash advances are not in terms of hundreds of millions, not $110,000,000 or $111,000,000, but in 1922-23 the net advance was $80,678,179.29. That dropped in 1923-24 to $24,550,000, and dropped again in 1924-25 to $10,000,000; $10,000,000 again in 1925-26, and $10,000,000 in 1926-27.

Now, taking the figures of the Finance department, we find as follows:

Fiscal Year	Net Cash advanced as disclosed by books of Department of Finance
1920-21	$109,662,655 36
1921-22	97,950,645 36

Those were the years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. Coming to the years of the present administration, the figures are as follows:

1922-23	$77,863,938 23
1923-24	23,710,616 70
1924-25	9,934,452 64
1925-26	10,000,000 00
1926-27	10,000,000 00

That is a showing vastly to the credit of the present administration.

I have here a statement of the operating deficits or surpluses on the Canadian National Railways under the two administrations. During the period hon. gentlemen opposite were in office there were deficits each year—these are calendar years—but from the moment the present administration came into office there was a surplus which has grown more or less every year. The figures are as follows:

Canadian National Railways
Operating Deficits or Surpluses
(Calendar years)

	Deficits	Surpluses
1920	$34,532,703 00
1921	11,543,378 00
1922		$ 2,886,711 55
1923		20,430,649 08
1924		17,244,251 48
1925		32,264,414 79
1926		46,483,192 55
1927		42,113,976 45

Now take the total deficits after fixed charges, and note how they figure out:

Canadian National Railways
Total Deficit after Fixed Charges
(Calendar Years)

1920	$80,478,828 00
1921	69,866,589 00
1922	57,960,097 78
1923	51,697,674 94
1924	54,860,419 22
1925	41,444,764 42
1926	29,701,444 91
1927	34,373,027 22

A steady improvement all along the line from the time the present administration took charge of national affairs.

Take the bond issues of the Canadian National Railways guaranteed by the government, and the same improvement appears:

	Canadian National Railways Guaranteed Bond Issues
1919-20	$ 17,109,027 00
1920-21	50,000,000 00
1921-22	61,000,000 00
1922-23	Nil
1923-24	72,500,000 00
1924-25	81,000,000 00
1925-26	Nil
1926-27	34,879,252 86

Let me say a word about the guarantee of $34,879,252.86 in 1926-27. That was the statutory guarantee required by the Grand Trunk Pacific 4 per cent debenture settlement. The dispute had been outstanding since the Grand Trunk Pacific went into receivership in 1919. It ought not, therefore, to be held against the present management which arranged the settlement, or the government which recommended ratification by parliament last year. So the record with respect to railway financing would go to show that during the period that this administration has been in office there has been a steady improvement—a steady decline in deficits, a steady lessening of advances, a steady lessening also of guarantees.

Let me come to the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, that in presenting the public accounts for purpose of comparison we should take account of all expenditures no matter whence they may arise. There are three comparable sets of figures which can be used for purposes of comparison. You can take the ordinary expenditure of the government as it appears in the public accounts; or the ordinary, plus the special and capital expenditure, but not including the Canadian National Railways and the government merchant marine; or, the first two sets I have mentioned, plus what is advanced for the Canadian National Ralways and for the merchant marine. Let me place on Hansard a statement of all three. It goes to show that no matter which of these three sets of comparable figures you take, the same improvement all along the line is apparent:

Expenditures
(In millions of dollars)

Fiscal Year	Ordinary (Chargeable to consolidated fund)	Ordinary plus capital and special (Not including C.N.R. and M.M.)	Total (Inc. C.N.R. and M.M.)	Per capita expenditures
1920-21	361	418	528	$60 11
1921-22	347	365	463	52 03
1922-23	332	350	434	$48 15
1923-24	324	344	370	40 50
1924-25	318	339	351	37 89
1925-26	320	343	355	$37 83
1926-27	319	346	359	37 67
1927-28 (est.)	333	361	365 *	37 80

* Exclusive of $16,000,000 written off soldiers' land settlement loans and seed grain loans.

This statement shows that total expenditures for 1927-28 were about one million less than in 1921-22 and about 164 million less than in 1920-21.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house rose at six o'clock I was about to take up the representations of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with respect to the public debt of the Dominion. I notice that in his presentation this afternoon my hon. friend took an attitude somewhat different from that which he assumed when speaking on the address. On that occasion he intimated that the government had increased the public debt. He alleged that the government was responsible for the increase of the debt in the fiscal year 1921-22 and in the fiscal year 1922-23. He did not repeat that comparison this afternoon, but I should like nevertheless to point out to him at this juncture how unfair it was. The fiscal year 1921-22 was the year in which his friends were in office during nine months out of the twelve. The present administration came into office in December 1921, and, as I said this afternoon, the budget of that year had been prepared by a Minister of Finance who was a member of the Conservative government of the time. Therefore the responsibility for the relation of the revenues to expenditures was entirely attributable to the budget as then brought down; and that budget occasioned an increase in the public debt of $81,000,000. It is not argument but a species of legerdemain to charge this government with that increase in the debt; it must be ascribed to hon. gentlemen opposite. And the increase in the following year, the increase of some $31,000,000 odd, was inevitable in view of the large amount of obligations which were left on the doorstep of the present administration, which had to be met before we could begin to deal in any adequate measure with the necessities of the public service. The correct comparison, as I have already stated, is between the two years for the most part of office of hon. gentlemen opposite prior to the time at which the present government took office, the years 1920-21, and 1921-22 and the three years succeeding, which was a period of financial readjustment leading to surpluses instead of deficits, as well as the three years following that, of which this is the third, and which is a period of tax and debt reduction.

I shall now place before the house in tabular form the additions to net national debt as shown by the figures from the public accounts for these years:

Additions and Reductions in Net National Debt
(In Millions of dollars)

Net consolidated debt, Mar. 31.
1920			= 2,248
					Addition
2 years Cons.—					to debt
1920-21,	Mar.	31,	1921	= 2,340 +	92
1921-22,	Mar.	31,	1922	= 2,422 +	81 = + 173
					Reductions
3 years Lib.—					in Debt
1922-23,	Mar.	31,	1923	= 2,453 +	32
1923-24,	Mar.	31,	1924	= 2,417 —	36
1924-25,	Mar.	31,	1925	= 2,417 —	0.3 = — 5
1925-26,	Mar.	31,	1926	= 2,390 —	28
1926-27,	Mar.	31,	1927	= 2,347 —	42
1927-28,	Mar.	31,	1928	= 2,308 —	38 = — 108

For the two years ending 1921 and 1922 the addition to the debt was $92,000,000 in the one case and $81,000,000 in the other, or a total additional debt in those two years of $173,000,000. Now in the first three years of Liberal administration, which I have called the period of financial readjustment, the increase in the debt, taking the year ending 1923, was $32,000,000; in the following year there was not an increase but a reduction in the debt to the extent of $36,000,000; while in the subsequent year there was a reduction of some $300,000 odd. In other words, it took three years for the present administration to get the affairs of the country so readjusted as to have surpluses replace the deficits of the old administration. From that time on we have had continuously surpluses as follows: In the year ending 1926, $28,000,000; 1927, $42,000,000; and this year we have a surplus of $38,000,000—a surplus which would have amounted to $54,000,000 had the Minister of Finance not written off the bad debts which grew out of loans made by our predecessors for soldier land settlement and for relief in the form of seed grain.

Not only has the present administration reduced the public debt in the manner I have indicated, but we have also considerably reduced the burden which the taxpayers of the country must carry, in meeting interest on the debt, by the system of refunding at a lower rate of interest which the present Minister of Finance has brought about. The present minister found that hon. gentlemen opposite had been making loans at high rates of interest over long periods and he immediately set to work to see whether it was not possible, by refunding, to reduce these loans and to issue new loans at lower rates of interest. He has succeeded to the extent of reducing the current burden of the Canadian taxpayer, on account of interest on the public debt, by a total of some $13,000,000. This he has accomplished through refunding. I will not read the entire statement, but with the permission of the house I will have it embodied in Hansard:

*In 1923–24, the dollar bond loans from the Imperial government of $2,000,000, 3½%, due 1925–28, and $65,207,351, 4½%, due 1925–45, were written off by agreement against advances made by the Dominion to the Imperial government. The annual interest of $3,004,331 on these loans is included in the above figures as a reduction in interest charges.

Now I come to the next subject dealt with by my hon. friend opposite. Throughout this debate an effort has been made on the part of the opposition to have it appear that the reductions in taxation which we have been steadily making are in the last analysis simply the equivalent of the additional taxation which, after we came into office, we found it necessary to impose. As I have already pointed out to hon. gentlemen opposite this additional taxation was necessary to meet their debts; it was necessary to meet the obligations which they had left to us. I take issue with my hon. friends opposite in the allegation that the reduction of taxation which we have effected is merely the corresponding equivalent of the increase. What were the taxes which we found imposed when we came into office? There were, of course, the duties of customs and excise, but there were also the special war taxes such as the income tax, the sales tax and the tax upon cheques, promissory notes and the like. In the year ending 1922 we added a tax on receipts, we slightly increased the tax on cheques and on promissory notes and bills of exchange, and made some changes in the sales tax. But these taxes we have long since reduced to a point lower than they were at the time we came into office.

The sales tax was a tax which as I have said we did increase slightly, but we did away with the system of pyramiding which under hon. gentlemen opposite had existed, and which made the sales tax very much higher in reality than it has ever been since 1923. We have exempted from the operation of the sales tax an increasing number of articles; we have cut the tax in half in some cases, and once we had discharged the special obligations which it was increased to meet, we have steadily reduced its rate.

With respect to the income tax, again the record of this government has been one of reduction, but not reduction of taxation with increase of debt; it has been reduction of taxation accompanied by reduction of the public debt. I wish to stress that point to hon. members of the house, because I would agree with those who say that there is no justification for reducing the income tax so long as we are adding to the general debt of the country, and so long as the public debt of the country is not being paid off at an appreciable rate. I would point out to hon. members, however, that this year for example we have paid off of the public debt, taking the bad loans to which I have referred, the sum of $54,000,000, which is very much in advance of the sum suggested by the leader of the opposition this afternoon as an annual reduction in the public debt under the scheme which he thought should be adopted as a sinking fund. In order that hon. members may have the record in a form which will make possible easy reference and verification I will place on Hansard a few statistical tables which I have prepared in order to make quite clear the exact reductions in taxation which have been effected by the present administration.

Take first the taxes on receipts, on cheques and on postage.

Reductions in Taxation in Budget Years on Receipts, cheques, notes and postage

Taxes imposed when present Administration came into office	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927	1928
	2c. on receipt for $10. or over.		Receipt tax		Receipt tax abolished
	Tax on cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes and similar documents.
2c. on every cheque, bill of exchange, and promissory note.	2c. on every additional $50. Maximum tax, $2.	Maximum tax, $1		Remitted on cheques, etc up to $5.00.		Remitted on cheques up to $10. Reduced to flat rate of 2c. on all cheques above $10.
Postage 3c. since 1915.					Postage reduced to 2c.

As to the receipt tax, that was a tax of two cents on all receipts of $10 or over, which was imposed in 1922. That tax does not exist to-day; it was abolished in 1926; in that regard it cannot be said that we are now taking off a tax which we imposed. Then consider the tax on cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes and other documents. When we came into office we found a tax of two cents on every cheque, bill of exchange and promissory note, and in our first year in office we provided that there should be a tax of two cents on every additional $50, with a maximum tax of $2, which was reduced to $1 in 1923. That was an increase in the amount of the tax on cheques and notes, but in 1925 we took off the tax on cheques up to $5, so at that time we were bringing our taxation on cheques and similar documents to a lower point than was the case with similar taxation under hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office. In 1927 we went still further; we abolished the tax on cheques up to $10 and reduced to a flat rate of two cents the tax on cheques over $10. The tax on cheques is therefore at present much lower than that which existed at the time we came into power.

Again, when we came into office the price of postage stamps, which is a form of taxation, was three cents on all letters sent to any part of the Dominion or to Great Britain, and that tax had been in existence since 1915. In 1926 we reduced the postage to two cents, in other words we restored penny postage, which meant a reduction of 33⅓ per cent if one wishes to figure it out on a percentage basis. I contend that these figures, if the estimates were properly prepared, would show that we have taken off under these heads alone a great deal more than the additional taxation which we imposed in order to make the budgets balance in a satisfactory way.

Let us come now to the sales tax, and let us consider the increases and reductions in the rate of that tax. And here again let me present the figures in the form of a statistical table, so that the facts can be seen at a glance.

Sales Tax by Budget Years

Increases and Reductions in Rates.

Various rates from 1½% to 4% (on goods imported by retailers or consumers). Normal rate from manufacturer or wholesaler to consumer 3%.	Rates increased by one-half from 2¼% to 6% (on goods imported by retailers or consumers). Normal rate from manufacturer or wholesaler to consumer 4½%.	Rates raised to a straight 6%.*	Rates reduced to a straight 5%. Rate reduced to 2½% on boots and shoes and rubber footwear. 50% reduction on biscuits, canned vegetables, fruits, etc., printing paper, creosoted railroad ties.		Sales Tax reduced to 2½% on canned fish.	General rate reduced to 4%. 50% reduction on apples, dried, desiccated, or evaporated; moist mincemeat.	General rate reduced to 3%.

NOTE.—*Prior to January 1, 1924, sales tax pyramided on successive sales and in some cases reached as much as 10%.

In 1921 when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, there were various rates ranging from 1½ per cent to 4 per cent on goods imported by retailers or consumers. The normal rate from the manufacturer or the wholesaler to the consumer was 3 per cent. In 1922 the rates were increased by one-half from 2¼ per cent to 6 per cent, on goods imported by retailers or consumers. The normal rate from the manufacturer or wholesaler to the consumer was 4½ per cent. In 1923 the rates were raised to a straight 6 per cent; that is the rate about which we have heard so much in this discussion. But simultaneously with that increase the system of pyramiding which had been in existence under hon. gentlemen opposite was done away with. Under that system on successive sales the tax in some cases reached as high as 10 per cent. From that time we continued year by year to reduce the tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Pyramiding still goes on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But not in the same form or to anything like the same extent. In 1924 the rates were reduced from 3 per cent to 5 per cent, and the rates on boots and shoes and rubber footwear were reduced to 2½ per cent. There was a 50 per cent reduction in the rate on biscuits, canned vegetables, fruits, printing paper, creosoted railway ties and so on. Then in 1926 the tax on canned fish was reduced to 2½ per cent. In 1927 the general rate, which had been 6 per cent in 1923, and which was reduced to 5 per cent in 1924, became 4 per cent, with a 50 per cent reduction in addition on dried apples and other products. Then in 1928 this policy of a steady reduction of the sales tax was continued and the rate was reduced to 3 per cent; that is in the budget of the present year. So there has been a steady reduction of the rate of tax from the time it stood at 6 per cent, and to-day it stands at a very much lower figure than it did when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. That only covers the reduction in the rate. In addition there was a very large list of exemptions. I will ask permission of the house to place this list on Hansard without reading it, simply stating that the exemptions fall broadly into three groups. First there are the exemptions on implements of production in the basic industries, then exemptions on necessities of life, and a large miscellaneous list in addition.

If hon. members will take the trouble to look carefully through that list I think those who are regretting that the sales tax has not been completely eliminated with respect to the necessities of life will find something which will enable them to revise their judgments

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Now may I say just a word with regard to the clause in the amendment which suggests that the sales tax should be entirely removed. There are two or three outstanding reasons why that is impossible or at all events inadvisable. This afternoon I gave one reason which of course is self evident; that reason was that there are heavy obligations which came down to us from the period of the war, which must be met. Taxes have to be raised somewhere and somehow and the sales tax having been in existence for some time it is perhaps advisable, if it is to be removed, that it should be removed by degrees rather than all at once. The reason why the sales tax should be removed by degrees will be apparent to hon. members who were in the house at the time parliament was asked to vote a large sum of money in order to make a refund to automobile dealers who had stocks of automobiles on hand when the tax on automobiles was abolished. They had paid the tax, and it was held that it was most unfair, when subsequently they were unable to pass it on to the consumers because of the reduced prices owing to the sudden change in taxation, that they should not be recompensed, and parliament decided to give them back these sums in order to reimburse them for the money which had been exacted in the form of taxation. Now in a number of instances where taxes are being reduced the practice has been followed of reducing by stages. By making the reduction at the rate of one per cent at a time the merchants and dealers are able to absorb it. If however, you take the tax off completely, you are liable to create a serious injustice to a large number of persons in the country who have on hand supplies of the articles on which the sales tax is imposed. You are unfair towards a large class of citizens, and apt to create an uncertainty or unrest in business which, in the net result, is bound to be baneful. So I say that if my hon. friends who have in their amendment suggested that the sales tax should be completely removed, will reconsider the matter from the point of view of what is sound business in the commercial community, they will see that the reason I have just advanced is not only a thoroughly good and effective one, but one which has been endorsed by the action of this very parliament in dealing with a situation created heretofore owing in a particular instance to the complete abolition of the tax. So much then, for the sales tax.

Now I come to the income tax. Here again may I stress the point that the present government, in connection with this tax as with all others, has sought to bring such relief as it could to the taxpayers of the country. One form of that relief has been in exemptions from income tax. I venture to say that those who are asking us to retain the tax would not ask us to restore it with respect to any of the exemptions which have been granted under it. But if the income tax is so exceptional in its character that it should be retained at all costs, it seems to me that it does not require one to go very much further to say that there should be no exemptions whatever, or that the exemptions should be exceedingly small. However, this government has sought steadily to exempt from the income tax those persons in the community who are least able to bear it. I venture to say that hon. members will be surprised, as they hear in the order of sequence in which the exemptions have taken place, how considerable they have become as the result of steady reductions year after year. Let me present these exemptions in tabular form:

Reductions in Individual Income Tax in Budget Years.

Exemptions

Taxation when present administration assumed office.	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927	1928
Unmarried Persons $1,000; Married Persons $2,000. Allowance for each dependent child under 18 years of age $200.	Exemption for each child raised from $200 to $300.		Exemption for each child raised to $500. (so that married man with 4 children paid no income tax unless income exceeded $4,000)		Raised from $1,000 to$1,500 for unmarried persons; from $2,000 to $3,000 for married persons and bona fide householders. (Applicable to 1925 income.)		$500 for dependents mentally or physically incapable of self-support.

When hon. gentlemen were in office the exemptions were as follows: married persons were exempted to the extent of $2,000 of their income. In the case of unmarried persons the exemption was $1,000. The allowance for each dependent child under eighteen years of age was fixed at $200. In 1922, the first year that we were in office, we increased the exemption for each child from $200 to $300. In 1924, the exemption for each child was raised to $500, so that married men with four children paid no income tax unless their income exceeded $4,000. In 1926 we raised from $1,000 to $1,500 the exemption for single persons, and from $2,000 to $3,000 for married persons and bone fide householders. That exemption was made applicable to the income of the previous year, as all exemptions since have been. In 1927, the age for a dependent child was increased from eighteen years to twenty-one years; and this year we have provided a further exemption of $500 for each dependent child over twenty-one years of age mentally or physically incapable of self-support. What I wish to make clear to hon. members is that the policy of the government in the matter of tax reduction has been one of consistently endeavouring to relieve of the burden of taxation those persons in the community who are least able to bear it, and what we have done with respect to the income tax has been in that particular the same as in the case of the other taxes which I have mentioned.

Now as to the rate of the income tax. Let me also present the rate reductions in tabular form:

Reductions in Individual Income Tax in Budget Years

Rates

Taxation when present administration assumed office	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927	1928
Normal tax 4% up to and 8% over $6,000—progressive rates up to 65%.					Normal rate reduced from 4% to 2% (married person with income of $4,000 and without dependents paid only $20 instead of $80; if income $5,000 paid $40 instead of $126.	Reduction 10% on all rates.
An additional 5% of the tax and surtax is payable where the income is $5,000 or more.							Reduction 10% on all rates.

The normal tax was 4 per cent up to and 8 per cent over $6,000—progressive rates up to 65 per cent. An additional 5 per cent of the tax and surtax was payable where the income was $5,000 or more. That was the position as we found it. In 1926, the normal rate was reduced from 4 per cent to 2 per cent. Married persons with an income of $4,000 and without dependents, paid only $20 instead of $80. If the income was $5,000 they paid $40 instead of $126. Last year we made a reduction of 10 per cent on the rates of the previous year. This year we have again made a reduction of 10 per cent on the rates of the previous year.

Now I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to this circumstance: while we purpose making this reduction this year, the amount that it is expected will be collected this year will, notwithstanding the reduction in the rate, equal, nay, will exceed, it is estimated, the amount that had been collected in the previous year. Hon. members may ask, how can that be? How can you reduce the tax and at the same time get as much in volume out of it in the succeeding year? Well, the explanation is this: Under the policies which this administration has put into practice conditions have improved throughout this country. There is an increased prosperity. Men are making money to-day when they did not make it before, with the result that notwithstanding the lowering of the rate of taxation it will be possible to collect for the public treasury an equivalent or an even greater amount. These are the facts in regard to the rates. As to what we are collecting from income tax, let me place on Hansard—I will not take the time to read it—a statement of the amount of revenue which has been collected from year to year in income tax from individuals and from corporations, and the total of the two combined:

What do the figures show with respect to the point I have made as to the amount of revenue to be collected from this source of taxation during the present year? Last year, that is the year 1926-27, there was collected from private individuals and corporations from incomes of 1926, the sum of $47,000,000. Now it is estimated by the Department of Finance that notwithstanding the reduction of 10 per cent which we are making this year, the amount that will be collected for 1927-28 from incomes of 1927, will equal not $47,000,000 but $56,000,000. I say to my hon. friends who have taken some exception to the reduction of the 10 per cent that that is a circumstance which I hope they will keep very much in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Mostly corporation tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "mostly corporation tax." I hope it is.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope so too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that is true in regard to not only the corporation tax but the individual tax! These are the figures in regard to the two separately. There was collected in income tax in 1926-27 from individuals $18,000,000 of revenue and it is estimated that, notwithstanding the 10 per cent reduction that is now going into force, there will be collected for 1927-28 not $18,000,000 but $22,000,000 from individuals. In regard to corporations, while there was collected in 1926-27 the sum of $29,000,000, it is anticipated that, notwithstanding the very slight change—and I think it is a change more for the purpose of book-keeping than aught else—there will be collected this year not $29,000,000 but approximately $33,000,000 from the corporation tax. I submit to my hon friends—and I know many of them are thinking seriously as to whether they will not support the budget after we have dealt with the amendment which they have proposed—that these are facts which should be taken into account in deciding whether or not the government has acted wisely in this particular this year.

The reductions in corporation income tax have been as follows:

Reduction in "Corporation" Income Tax in Budget Years.

Rates

Taxation Imposed when present administration assumed office	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927	1928
Corporation Tax 10% on income in excess of $2,000 where the Corporation's income is less than $5,000. Corporation Tax 10½% on income in excess of $2,000, where the Corporation's income is $5,000 or more.					9% on income in excess of $2,000.	8·1% on income in excess of $2,000.	8% on income in excess of $2,000.

May I give to the house quite frankly the reason that actuated the government in reducing the income tax to the extent that this has been done in the present year? As hon. members know, we had in the fall of the year a conference between the provinces and the Dominion where questions of concern to the provinces were discussed very freely with the several members of the government. One question discussed was that of taxation and more particularly the delimitation of the fields of taxation. Representatives of the provinces pointed out that, while the Dominion was entitled under the constitution to raise taxes by indirect methods, such as, the customs and excise, and also by direct methods, the provinces on the other hand were restricted to direct taxation, and being restricted to this field they were finding it more and more difficult to raise the revenues required for the increasing services which they were being called upon to perform. The point was stressed by the provinces that in recent years many obligations have devolved upon them which require a degree of expenditure which they did not believe was wholly contemplated at confederation. There were, for instance, large expenses in connection with social legislation of one kind or another, expenses in connection with road making, expenses in regard to several other matters such as technical education, all of which are under provincial jurisdiction

They further directed our attention to the circumstance that in seeking for new sources of revenue they had imposed certain taxes which had been questioned in the courts; that they had been precluded from continuing one tax after another because of some decision which had been given which made it impossible for them to enter a particular field. So the plea was made to the Dominion that we should if possible leave to the provinces certain fields of taxation, and the field of taxation that was especially mentioned in this connection was the income tax. May I direct the attention of the house to this fact? Many hon. members pay income taxes not only to the Dominion treasury but also to the provincial treasury. Some provinces of this Dominion have income taxes as a source of their revenue. British Columbia, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island impose an income tax as provinces, but in addition to that, throughout the Dominion there are municipalities which also are imposing an income tax for purposes of revenue. Municipalities in Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and possibly one other province are doing this. In some seven provinces out of nine, income taxes are being imposed either by municipalities in those provinces or by the provinces themselves, in addition to the tax imposed by the Dominion. I confess that members of the government felt that there was much to be said for the point of view presented by the provinces that they should be permitted more latitude in regard to income taxation. Let me distinguish at once between income tax derived from the income of individuals and income tax derived from incomes of corporations. I think that incomes of corporations must always be collected by the federal government, for the reason that otherwise one or two provinces, to be concrete Ontario and Quebec, would profit at the expense of other provinces from which much of the income of these corporations is derived. It is for the most part true that in a few centres large business corporations have their headquarters. The great railway companies, insurance companies, trust companies, banks and the like have their headquarters in some of these larger cities of the Dominion and principally in the cities of Montreal and Toronto but the revenues of the corporations are drawn from all parts of the Dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that not equally true of the large private fortunes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not so sure that it is equally true. I do not think it is equally true. I admit my hon. friend is right in assuming that many wealthy men have their places of residence in the two provinces to which I have referred, but as regards wealthy individuals they are to be found pretty much in all parts of the Dominion. There is no province that has not at least a few fairly wealthy men who derive their incomes from corporations, and which very corporations have their headquarters in the provinces which I have mentioned. The point I wish to make clear is this, that as regards income tax derived from corporations, the federal government was not prepared to consider for a minute parting with that tax to the provinces. We maintain that this is a tax which ought to be and which will be retained by the federal treasury so long, at least, as the present government has office. As I have said the government was to some extent impressed by the plea made to it by the premiers of some of the provinces in regard to the tax on the income of individuals. I remember the Premier of Manitoba suggested that not only should we give to Manitoba the tax which comes from the income of individuals but that we should collect it as well and hand over to the province the collected amount. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glenn), who spoke the other evening, made much the same suggestion, that the income tax should be collected by the federal treasury and distributed in part to the provinces. That is a matter, in one sense, of book-keeping; but the point I wish to stress at the moment is this, that if we were to do that very thing, we would not be doing anything different in principle from what we are doing under the present reduction, in reducing the tax on incomes of individuals with a view to allowing the provinces that much more of freedom in the matter of their collection of taxation from individual incomes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there not a fundamental difference of principle involved in that scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see any difference of principle. In what regard?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to interrupt, but my thought was this, that in decreasing the income tax, the principle is to place a heavier burden upon those who pay through indirect taxation. I should say it would be merely a matter of book-keeping if the principle were maintained and the sums collected turned over to the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I want to stress to my hon. friend is this, that the provinces, as the premier of Manitoba and the premier of British Columbia in particular pointed out, are restricted to direct taxation. This Dominion may impose direct taxation, and it may impose also indirect taxation, but the provinces are restricted to direct taxation, and when you restrict them to direct taxation, you must remember that the number of forms in which there can be direct taxation is distinctly limited. From the point of view of the provinces it would appear to be a question as to whether they shall be permitted to have certain fields in which they can raise the revenue necessary, or whether they shall do as was done at the Dominion-provincial conference—complain that their field is so restricted that they cannot get the revenue necessary, and then appeal to the Dominion government to give them in subsidies what they cannot get by means of taxation.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It was suggested at the conference by some of the provinces that the Dominion government should collect the income tax and distribute it among the provinces. Will the government consider distributing among the provinces the ten per cent reduction which has been made in the income tax this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish my hon. friend could have been at the Dominion-provincial conference to hear the number of requests to give them different things that were made of us by the provinces. They wanted the Dominion to give them increased subsidies, increased grants, for one purpose and another, and many other things. I think we had better hold on to what we have in any form of taxation until we reach our final reckoning with the provinces.

That is all I wish to say in regard to the taxation of incomes, beyond making this clear: that not only was the government moved in this matter by the representations made by the provinces, but we were interested in ascertaining how this House of Commons would view leaving that field of taxation to the provinces. I may say that if we ever entertained an idea of giving up the individual income tax to the provinces or for any other purpose, certainly the discussion that has taken place in the house during this debate will preclude anything of the kind for the future. Hon. members need not be concerned about any policy which may be said to aim at doing away with the revenue derived from income tax. I want to make this clear to my hon. friends, so that there will be no misunderstanding when they come to consider again their attitude towards the government on the budget. I know that some hon. gentlemen have had the impression that the intention of the government was gradually to do away altogether with the income tax upon the incomes of individuals, but as I have said, the government's action from now on will be guided in that matter by the opinions which have been expressed in parliament during the course of this debate.

I come now to the question of indirect taxation. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition this afternoon said that he was not sure just how far we had carried out our policy of lowering customs duties. Well, I venture to say that there are a good many members of the house who along with my hon. friend may be in doubt as to how much reduction there has been in the way of customs duties during the time the present administration has been in office. In order that any doubts in the mind of my hon. friend and of other hon. members of the house may be removed, I have had prepared in tabular form a statement of the reductions that have been made in customs duties since the present administration took office. I would like to read them to the house, but they are of considerable length, and I venture to say that they will be grasped more accurately if they are read in Hansard. I would therefore ask the permission of the house to place these papers on Hansard.

Mr. GOTT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend not wish to have them appear on Hansard?

Mr. BENNETT: Objection has been made to so many hon. members putting extracts on Hansard. It seems to me my hon. friend the Prime Minister is carrying this practice to a very great length because the documents he produces are very, very long. I scrupulously refrained this afternoon from doing that very thing in view of the observations of the Prime Minister the other day. I myself have not offered any observation.

Mr. GOTT: It will require a special edition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am entirely in the hands of the house in this matter. What I wish to make clear is this: His honour the Speaker has indicated at different times that it is expected a certain degree of latitude will be given the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the matter of placing on Hansard certain documents. That has always been done, and why objection should be raised just at the moment the government wishes to place on Hansard a statement with regard to the reductions it has made in customs duties is something I find it difficult to understand. If the hon. gentleman objects, I am prepared to read them, but I do not wish to read them at this stage. I will read them when I have concluded the main part of my speech. I would still ask my hon. friend if he objects to having the statement placed on Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Your honourable friend has not yet objected; that is number one. Number two is that the observations made by the Prime Minister the other evening were so relevant to the action he is proposing to take, that I assume he will not himself entirely depart from them; but if he so desires, I am not offering any objection, and I have not done so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The assent is not very graceful.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think I require to take lessons in gracefulness from the hon. Minister of Justice. What the Prime Minister said the other evening was this:

> Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as mention of myself has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I should like to say that he is quite right. I did take exception to his colleague putting on Hansard last Thursday a lot of material that he had in the form of a statistical table. At the time I think the hon. member mentioned that last session I had taken exception to an hon. gentleman opposite adopting the same course. In both cases I did so simply to uphold your honour in maintaining the rules of the house, and I still think that principle ought to be observed. Either we should alter the rule or have it observed. With respect to the time-honoured custom which you, Mr. Speaker, have mentioned, that of giving to the immediate critic of the Minister of Finance replying to the budget wider latitude than is granted to hon. members generally, I have no exception to take to it. Apart from that, I think it is the duty of every member to uphold the rules, and I believe we shall get further ahead if we make no exceptions.

His case is not a case within the exceptions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take it that my hon. friend would really like to be reassured in the matter of what the government has done, and I will take the liberty of presenting this to Hansard and asking the house to allow it to be printed.

Mr. GOTT: The increases too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I am quite prepared to give increases where there have been any worthy of mention. I think hon. members when they look over what actually has taken place in the way of tax reductions will be surprised at the extent to which the government has carried out every pledge and promise which it has made in that regard.

One reason why I am anxious to place on record what has been done in this regard is that the government with respect to the tariff has been following a consistent policy of downward revision, and, in considering the budget presented this year, it is only right that it should be considered in relation to what has been done in previous years in the matter of tax reductions. I will give in a few moments what we did in respect to cottons and woollens a few years ago. This ought to be taken into account in connection with what is being done this year.* Before I do that however, I should like to come at once to the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in regard to the tariff. May I draw attention to a circumstance which is enlightening when one reflects upon it?

The amendment proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite is on all fours with all amendments which have come from hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to matters of fiscal policy. Notwithstanding what they have said in their speeches on public platforms and what we know to be implied in their utterances in parliament and in the amendments as drawn, they have always carefully avoided ever dividing this house on the subject of protection. At every general election the country is told by my hon. friends of the opposition that what is needed for Canadian industry is more protection. This appeal is made because it is effective as directed to individual localities, one at a time. It is possible, for example, for Conservative candidates to appeal for protection in British Columbia with respect to certain classes of industry, such as fruit-growing, lumbering and the like, then in another province, Ontario, to appeal for protection for the large factories that are scattered up and down this province; and in the maritime provinces to make their appeal for protection to suit certain localities there; but when it comes to taking a consensus of view of the Dominion as a whole, as it expresses itself in this House of Commons, hon. gentlemen run away every time and evade the direct issue—they fail to bring in an amendment advocating protection.

Take the general election of 1921. From one end of the Dominion to the other our Conservative friends informed the electors that what was needed to save the country was more protection, that this alone would prevent men from emigrating to the United States, that this alone would prevent unemployment, that this alone would revive industry. But when the hon. gentlemen came back to this house in 1922 and had an opportunity of moving their first amendment, was it an amendment for increased protection? No, their amendment completely avoided any such profession of faith on their part. It was much like the amendment before the house to-day—an amendment of regrets; it regretted that up to that time the resolutions of the Liberal convention of 1919 had not been carried out in full. In the session of 1923 they failed to bring in any amendment whatsoever. In the session of 1924 they waited until my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) brought in an amendment on the cost of living; then they became very courageous and, knowing that the rules at that time only permitted one amendment, they moved an amendment in favour of a protective policy consistently maintained, and of course it was ruled out of order. Next we come to the session of 1925, just before the general election, and my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) presented an amendment regretting that there had not been more done in the way of tax reduction. Then in 1925 we had another general election and throughout the country the doctrine of protection was again preached by hon. gentlemen opposite, but when they came back to this house in 1926 did they move any amendment along the line of protection? They did bring in an amendment, but what was it? We had undertaken to reduce the duty on automobiles. Their amendment was not in regard to their policy of protection at all, but was directed purely and simply to the procedure which we had followed. They said we had laid down a policy when we appointed the tariff board of investigation before tariff change, and they complained that before introducing in this house any revision of the tariff on automobiles we should have secured the opinion of the tariff board. To-day when we come to the house with a tariff revision based upon investigations made by the tariff board, our friends of the opposition complain of our ever having approached the board. In 1926 was another election and more talk of the need for protection. After the election of 1926, having talked so much of protection throughout the campaign, did they bring in an amendment advocating their fiscal policy? Not at all; they let the session go by without moving an amendment. This year they move an amendment in the old form, an amendment which is full of regrets but does not contain a single statement of the fiscal policy on which they are supposed to be united, and not a word of their real convictions. No, it is simply the sort of thing one sees at hallowe'en, when little boys appear on the streets in false faces. Our Conservative friends come here with an amendment which is nothing other than a false face, something very fair to look upon—just as the words of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition this afternoon were fair to listen to—but back of it all if you take away the false face, as hon. members well know, you get the ugly mien of protection for special interests, which have always been the particular care of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Let me now say a word, Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend's remarks this afternoon respecting the tariff board. I gather that his chief objection to the tariff board is that the chairman, Mr. Moore, was a candidate at the last general election and therefore should not have been appointed to such a position. Well, I may say that there is in his remarks a good deal not only of reflection upon Mr. Moore, but of reflection upon every hon. member of this house when it is suggested that because a gentleman has been a candidate for parliament he is thereby disqualified from holding a responsible position in the gift of the government. Mr. Moore was appointed to the position of chairman of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, which he holds with great ability and impartiality, because of his well-known and exceptional qualifications as an economist. I well remember when a student at the university of Toronto that Mr. Moore was then at the head of his classes, carrying away the scholarships and fellowships that were awarded in the department of political science. Subsequently he was appointed a fellow of political economy in the university, and from that time has given special study to economic questions. Then, as my hon. friend knows, he was for some time one of the editors, if not the editor-in-chief, of the Monetary Times, a paper which is regarded as one of the important financial papers of the Dominion. His business experience—my hon. friend referred to it this afternoon—was of a character to give him an exceptional knowledge of big business, a knowledge not without its advantages in the position he now holds.

Mr. BENNETT: A lobbyist—and a disgraceful one too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say to my hon. friend that I think—

Mr. McGIBBON: What is his court record?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One should be very careful in criticizing in parliament a public servant who is not in a position to answer for himself. I would suggest that if hon. gentlemen opposite have any argument to present in regard to Mr. Moore's capacity for the position he holds, and particularly in regard to any alleged disqualifications, they might be well advised to appear on some public platform and give to Mr. Moore an opportunity to speak for himself.

Mr. BENNETT: They will.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that when a public servant is not in a position to reply to any loose charge that may be directed against him, that kind of charge should not carry any weight in this house. In criticizing Mr. Moore on the score of his appointment I think my hon. friend failed to recollect what took place in the administration with which he or his friends were connected. A few years ago we had an arbitration of some considerable importance dealing with a very large railway transaction. My hon. friend refers to Mr. Moore's association with the Canadian Northern Railway Company. My recollection is that when the Grand Trunk railway was taken over by the administration supported by hon. gentlemen opposite, and an arbitration was arranged to decide what value should be given to the stock of that company, one of the gentlemen chosen was not a candidate for parliament; he was a member of parliament and the Minister of Finance of that date. The Hon. Sir Thomas White was not only chosen as a member of that board of arbitration, but —and I still think the whole procedure was very much open to question—he was paid a sum by this parliament for so acting, although Minister of Finance at the time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg your pardon—not Minister of Finance, but a member of parliament.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He was not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do my hon. friends say that he was not a member of parliament?

An hon. MEMBER: He is not here to defend himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, the record is on Hansard.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He was not a member of parliament.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Prime Minister knows he was not a member of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend who says I know that he was not a member of parliament will listen to what I shall read from Hansard of March 29, 1921. Evidently this is a shot that is driving home.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has struck even more deeply than I expected.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As leader of the opposition I was at the time addressing the Prime Minister, and these are the words I used, as reported in Hansard of March 29, of that year. I said:

I addressed the right hon. gentleman in what I thought was a courteous and proper way—

Evidently there was the same sort of uproar on that occasion as there is to-night.

—when I asked if in the opinion of the government the hon. member for Leeds had not forfeited his right to a seat in this house by virtue of having accepted a position as one of the arbitrators on the board which is to value the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the leader of the opposition wishes to ask a question.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Prime Minister will examine the record he will find that Sir Thomas White did not act as an arbitrator until after the dissolution of parliament. I think he will find it is so, because I recollect the discussion of the case before the privy council and I recall the circumstances surrounding it. The arbitration was to begin, but it did not get well under way until after that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sir Thomas White, member for Leeds, was in that position when I raised this question in the house with the Prime Minister of the day. That is the point I am making.

Mr. McGIBBON: He never acted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But let me come a little nearer to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Prime Minister should—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish to ask a question?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the Prime Minister deny the fact that Sir Thomas White had resigned before he acted in the capacity of arbitrator?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He had not resigned his position as member of parliament, no.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was not Minister of Finance; I have already corrected that statement.

Mr. McGIBBON: As member of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was a member of parliament at the time I refer to.

Mr. McGIBBON: And resigned before he acted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I will not refer to an ex-Minister of Finance who is not in the house; I will take an ex-Minister of Finance who is present, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). That hon. gentleman is in the house.

Mr. McGIBBON: Answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The leader of the opposition quarrels with Mr. Moore's capacity for sifting evidence and investigating matters relating to the tariff with a view to making a report to guide the administration as to what is in the public interest, and he complains on the score that Mr. Moore had been a candidate for parliament.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And was a prospective candidate.

Mr. BENNETT: A prospective candidate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And a prospective candidate, yes. We will consider him in both roles, candidate and prospective candidate. But let us take the case of my hon. friend from West York. At the time to which I have reference he was neither a candidate nor a prospective candidate but actually a member of parliament. Moreover, he was Minister of Finance. And he went from one end of the country to the other, taking evidence, doing the very thing Mr. Moore is doing to-day. No one took exception to that; no one attacked it on the ground that the method was wrong, for as a matter of fact that was the method which had been generally practised in connection with revisions of the tariff until the present advisory board on tariff and taxation was appointed. Until then ministers of the crown travelled from one end of the country to the other summoning interested persons from whatever quarter they might wish to come to appear before them to give evidence. That evidence was sifted and the ministers brought down such recommendations as they deemed advisable in the way of tariff revision. It was found, however, that this method was not as satisfactory as having a detailed investigation made by experts week by week, month by month and year by year—an investigation such as the present tariff board is able to make. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen, however, that the tariff advisory board does not in the exercise of its functions in any way take away from the power of the government and of parliament in dealing with the tariff itself. But let me go a step still further in the direction of the party opposite, and take the case of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion). That hon. gentleman is a member of parliament; he is not only a prospective candidate at another election but he is a prospective minister, if ever a Conservative administration should be returned to power again. And at this very moment, while sitting in this house as a member of parliament, he is a member of a liquor commission appointed by a government which is friendly to my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. MANION: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will anticipate my hon. friend and answer the question for him. Does the leader of the opposition wish to insinuate, in reflecting upon Mr. Moore, that his colleague, who is a member of the liquor commission of Ontario, will be influenced unfairly and unduly by reason of the fact that he is also a member of parliament and a past or prospective candidate?

Mr. BENNETT: Do you want the answer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I for one would not say that the hon. member would be so influenced. Indeed, I believe my hon. friend from Fort William will be perfectly fair, straightforward and honest in his share of the administration of the affairs of that commission.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the difference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But what I say of my hon. friend from Fort William I say with equal emphasis of my friend who is the chairman of the tariff board at the present time.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: I trust the right hon. Prime Minister realizes that one is a provincial and the other a federal matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust, further, that he realizes that the duties of the hon. member for Fort William, in his capacity as a member of parliament, have no relation to the matter before the house, and that it has always been the practice for ministers of the crown to make inquiries inasmuch as they are in the house to deal with such questions. What I said with respect to Mr. Moore stands.

Mr. MANION: May I ask the Prime Minister what relation there is between the liquor commission of Ontario and a commissioner who is framing the tariff of this country? May I also ask him whether there is not some excuse for one acting in a temporary position such as I am filling?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope I have made it perfectly clear to my hon. friend that I am not finding fault with his acceptance of the position he holds, that I regard his motives as honourable in every particular. That is my belief. But that is not the point I am making. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition seems to feel that in some way those who have to do with public affairs, either as candidates or prospective candidates or, going a step further, as members of parliament, should thereby be disqualified from acting on commissions. My point, rather, is this: a man must be judged by the quality of the work he performs, and Mr. Moore can well stand this test.

Before I go any further, I must correct my hon. friend's interpretation of the functions of the commission. The commission is in no way engaged in framing the tariff; this government takes the full responsibility for what is done in that respect. The government has asked the tariff advisory board to investigate, thoroughly and fully, certain industries in this country. We do not intend to stop at one industry; we will continue the process until we have covered them all, and in this work of investigation we have asked the board to go very fully and very carefully into all factors on which the government should be advised in attempting to frame a policy or legislation for submission to this house. The budget which is brought down this year with respect to the tariff on cottons and woollens and in other particulars has been based on facts which have been presented to the government for consideration, but the budget itself has been framed by the government. The government take the responsibility for the amendments to the tariff, and in no way are we sheltering ourselves behind the tariff board. May I say further that here is where I think we differ from hon. gentlemen opposite on the question of a tariff commission. As I have read their past pronouncements, they favour a commission which would have power to say with regard to the tariff what should or should not be done in certain instances. We contend that that is the power of taxation, which power for all time has rested in the House of Commons and will continue so to rest as long as we are in office.

Now I come to the question of the actual tariff changes which are being proposed by this budget. In large part they are related to the great textile industries, the cotton and the woollen industries in particular, and as I said a moment ago I should like hon. members in considering the reductions which have been made in connection with this tariff to recall that in 1922 we began to reduce the duties, in these industries; we then began with woollens and cottons and made a very considerable reduction. The additional changes which are being made in the tariff to-day by way of reduction have to be considered along with those of an earlier date, when taking the record of this administration into account. Various reductions have been made in the tariff on cotton textiles since the present government assumed office, more especially on cotton piece goods, cotton blankets, cotton tape and cotton wearing apparel. The general reductions made in 1922 were 2½ per cent ad valorem in practically all cases, and an additional discount of 10 per cent of the duty, conceded in 1923, where the rates were over 15 per cent, made a total reduction on the more highly taxed commodities running between 4 per cent and 5 per cent ad valorem. Thus the duties on cotton blouses, shirtwaists, cotton shawls, cotton shirts, and cotton clothing are now a net 20¼ per cent as compared with 25 per cent at the time of the change of government. I say now, meaning prior to the introduction of the present budget which brings the rate down still further. Similarly, the duty on cotton undershirts and drawers, which was 22½ per cent, is now a net 18 per cent, and the reductions noted were made in the first instance in 1922. Now let me speak also in reference to woollens. In the case of woollen goods, the chief reductions of duty made under the preferential tariff in 1922 were in wool piece goods, including felt cloth, flannels, lustres, overcoatings, tweeds and worsted and serges, and in wearing apparel, including knitted goods, shawls, shirts, underskirts and drawers, women's and children's outer clothing, ready made woollen clothing and so on. In practically all cases these reductions were 2½ per cent ad valorem, the 22½ per cent duties being reduced to 20 per cent, the 25 per cent duties to 22½ per cent the 27½ per cent duties to 25 per cent and the 30 per cent duties to 27½ per cent. These duties were further reduced in 1923 by the discount of 10 per cent on the duty, so that the total net reduction of duty on British woollens in the two years averaged about 5 per cent ad valorem.

Those were the reductions prior to bringing in the present budget. In the course of his remarks this afternoon my hon. friend said that the proposals of the Minister of Finance involved certain increases in the duties, to which he said he would refer later. I did hear him make a reference to one grade of yarn in which there was some slight increase, but that was the only case he mentioned, and I think hon. members will search in vain to find much evidence of an increase in any further particular with respect to woollens or cottons. But what are the facts with regard to woollens and cottons? If there is any doubt as to whether the present budget is lowering the duties on these articles, let me cite what the budget does. First, in regard to cottons, the maximum duty under the general tariff is reduced from 37½ per cent to 30 per cent, with a single exception. Cotton yarns, 40's and finer, are made dutiable but the rates are reduced on the coarser counts of yarn. Gray unbleached cotton fabrics are reduced by 2½ per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs. Printed and dyed cottons are reduced 2½ per cent in the British preference, 5 per cent in the intermediate and 5 per cent in the general tariff. Yarn-dyed fabrics are reduced 2½ per cent in the British preference, 5 per cent in the intermediate and 2½ per cent in the general tariff. On a large range of household cottons, such as tablecloths, counterpanes, sheets, quilts, towels, plain curtains and so on there are reductions of from 5 per cent to 10 per cent in the British preference rate, from 2½ per cent to 5 per cent in the intermediate rate and from 2½ per cent to 5 per cent in the general tariff. Blankets of cotton are reduced 7½ per cent in the British preference rate and the intermediate and general tariffs; cotton embroideries, laces and so on are reduced about 5 per cent on all tariffs. Cotton clothing and manufactures of cotton show reductions ranging from 2½ per cent to 5 per cent on all tariffs, with very few exceptions due to reclassification.

Then we come to woollens. Yarns for weaving are reduced from various duty ranges, chiefly 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent, to free under the British preference rate, 10 per cent under the intermediate rate and 12½ per cent general. Dress goods in the gray for dyeing or finishing in Canada are reduced 5 per cent under the British preference rate. Lustres and linings are reduced from 20 per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent to 10 per cent, 20 per cent and 25 per cent. Woollen fabrics not over five ounces in weight per square yard are reduced 2½ per cent in the British preference rate. Cheaper ranges of woollen stocks and stockings are reduced 5 per cent in all tariffs. Knitted goods of all kinds valued at not more than 90 cents per pound are reduced 5 per cent in the British preference rate. There are reductions in the British preference rate of 2½ per cent on the finer grades of linen as well as on plain and fancy linen handkerchiefs. Manufactures of flax not otherwise provided for, formerly rated at 25 per cent under the British preference tariff, are reduced to 22½ per cent.

Those are the reductions which have been made, and I can supplement those with figures which would show how considerably the previous reductions affected the total rates of duty which have been collected, but I will not take up the time of the house to do so. A good many hon. members have found some difficulty in understanding the schedules, which are very comprehensive. For this reason I have sought to make clear to them exactly the nature of the reductions which are proposed.

Now I would like to make a reference to one other subject which has been the cause of considerable discussion. I refer to the references to the requirement in the British preference of a certain necessary content of British material or labour. The Minister of Finance in presenting his statement drew the attention of the house to the fact, or if he did not do so it was implied in what he said, that under the customs tariff the government has the power to require a certain amount of British content either of labour or material before an article is entitled to the British preference; in other words, the British preference was intended to encourage the importation of British goods. I will read the clause in the customs tariff, which is subsection 6 of section 3:

> Every manufactured article to be admitted under the British preferential tariff must be bona fide the manufacture of a British country entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff, and a substantial portion of the value of the manufactured article must have been produced by labour in one or more of such countries.
> 2. The governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of the several tariffs mentioned in this section.

That section of the tariff act makes it clear that as far as the British preference is concerned there were two objectives in view when it was introduced. One objective was the encouragement of trade within the British empire. The other was to benefit the consumers of this country—an all important purpose of the preference as introduced by a Liberal administration. May I say to hon. members that these two purposes remain the policy of the present administration with respect to the carrying out of what the Minister of Finance announced the other day in regard to the preference. What the Minister of Finance had in mind was serving notice to the trade throughout the world that the governor in council has power to require a certain content of British origin in labour and material in order to entitle the goods to the benefit of the British preference, and that we intended in some cases to require a 50 per cent content. Why was that? The reason is that it has been discovered that countries in Europe which have depreciated currencies and low paid labour have been sending their goods into Canada via Great Britain. These goods were not British goods in the sense it was intended they should be to entitle them to the British preference but goods which had found their way to the Dominion, after using Britain as a sort of assembling or processing place and in that way seeking to gain the right to enter Canada at the lower rate of duty. It was this class of goods we had in mind in notifying the world that we might require a 50 per cent of content in either British labour or British material. May I say this to the house: If we discover, in connection with the enforcement of a regulation of that kind, that the consumers of this country are in any particular losing the benefits which the British preference was intended to give, we shall not hesitate speedily to make such changes as the circumstances may demand. I wish to make this absolutely clear because I think a misunderstanding on this point has influenced the judgment of some hon. members in the matter of the budget. Let me refer specifically to a case that has been cited. Reference has been made to cotton goods of a coarser character, and it has been alleged in this house that, assuming there was a bad year, a regulation of this kind would make it more difficult for people here who were most in need of cheap cotton goods to get the coarser varieties at the low rate. I wish to say that if that situation arises it is not the intention of the government to make the existing 25 per cent British content one per cent higher than it is at the present time. I want to make that clear because in the discussion a great deal seems to have turned on the wrong emphasis placed on the intention of the government with respect to the British preference. We want to encourage trade within the British Empire, but we are going to see to it that in the effort to further that objective we shall keep in mind the still larger objective of the interests of the consuming public of this country.

May I say just one further word in regard to the method by which the government has proceeded in the matter of tariff revision. I doubt if the government's method could be better described than as set forth in the resolution which was passed at the inter-parliamentary conference held in Paris on August 25, last year. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to a resolution adopted by the League of Nations. That resolution laid stress on the importance of nations reducing rather than raising their customs tariff. We are proud of the fact that Canada stands out as the one country in the world that has pursued the course which was there advocated by all of them. In connection with the inter-parliamentary conference—which I understand is an inter-parliamentary conference of all the nations in the world—the following resolution was passed:

> The twenty-fourth inter-parliamentary conference regrets to note a general tendency among the states to raise their customs tariffs. It recommends that the national groups shall endeavour to arrest and to reverse that tendency.

Another of the Paris recommendations completes this one by expressing the wish > "that methods of abolishing, or at least progressively and gradually reducing customs duties, be made an object of study in all countries . . . ."

The report goes on to say that such annual reduction could be sufficiently slight not to cause a crisis and to permit the different national industries to adopt themselves to the new conditions.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that it has been along these lines that the present administration has proceeded in reducing the customs tariff.

My hon. friend made a reference to the farm implement industry, and he quoted figures in support of his contention from an American source. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite always go to an American source when they want to give quotations to this house. In regard to farm implements may I give him a quotation from a source that I think will not be questioned on the score of accuracy, an article written by Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, the general manager of the Massey-Harris Company, which appears in the Financial Times of Montreal of March 9 of this year. I will not read the whole article but there are a few facts in it which I think will answer pretty effectively what my hon. friend alleged this afternoon about the injury that has been done to the implement industry. Mr. Bradshaw says:

> The year 1927 witnessed a conspicious advance on the part of the implement industry in Canada. Sales showed a substantial increase in most fields.

Then a little further on:

> Production in all Canadian implement factories last year was noticeably greater than before and in many of them it was necessary to engage in night shifts to a considerable extent.

Then further on:

> Although the implement industry was able to make a substantial advance in Canada in 1926 its progress in 1927, was even greater. All companies reported increased business both in east and west.

And further:

> In view of the generally good conditions as outlined and the substantial progress made in recent years, the implement manufacturer feels justified in taking an optimistic view.

But there is this statement which appears in the article to which I should like to direct the attention of my hon. friends opposite. It is particularly interesting coming from the source from which it does:

> There are still some formidable obstacles in the form of customs tariffs in the marketing of goods abroad which in certain countries are almost prohibitive. Not only do these regulations place the exporter under a handicap but in addition they place the consumer in the protected country at a decided disadvantage.

I have here the figures of manufacturers in the implement industry. I will only give the first and the last of the years contained in the statement. In January, 1924, there were employed 5,387 persons on the wage rolls of 37 manufacturers. Last January there were 7,855 employees; there is the same evidence of growth all through the years cited.

My hon. friend made one very remarkable statement this afternoon in outlining his policy, and I wish to quote his exact words. He said:

We should no longer be dependent on foreigners for our economic life.

In other words my hon. friend, if I interpreted him aright, would have it that we should have no foreign trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then how are you going to avoid being dependent on foreigners? The whole of my hon. friend's argument this afternoon was along that line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask hon. members who listened to my hon. friend's speech this afternoon if his point in regard to reciprocity was not that we ought not to depend upon another nation because that nation might cut us off at any moment without notice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was that not the argument he made to-day in discussing the reciprocity agreement? Then what is to become of our foreign trade if we are not to depend in any way on foreigners? You cannot have foreign trade on the one hand and not be dependent on foreigners on the other. You cannot have trade at all unless you are prepared to trade with other nations. And so my hon. friend's contribution to the debate on the matter of trade and his economic policy reduces itself to this—that Canada should become a self-sufficing unit without any relation to any other foreign country in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that when hon. gentlemen opposite are hit they begin to roar. Every time an argument strikes home they begin to make a noise imagining that no one will be able to hear it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to leave the matter at that point and I hope echoes of the shouts of hon. gentlemen opposite will be recorded in Hansard along with the rest.

May I speedily conclude by referring very briefly to the particular clauses of the amendment of the opposition? The amendment first of all alleges that:

The measures proposed by the government do not tend to provide increased employment in Canada.

Let me say just a word about increased employment. What are the facts. And here I wish to draw to the attention of the house the fact that the policies enunciated by the government in the present budget are along the lines of those enunciated in previous budgets. In other words, we have been following a consistent line of policy which, year after year for the last few years, has resulted, as I said this afternoon, in surpluses, in reduction of the public debt, in reduction of taxes, and with them has come general increase in prosperity throughout the Dominion. This budget being to all intents and purposes similar to previous budgets, we have a right to believe that similar results will follow, and that among other things increased employment will follow in the wake of the budget that has been brought down this year.

What is the position with regard to employment in Canada? I will give just a few figures that will serve to illustrate what has taken place, and I am using the index numbers as compiled by the Government Bureau of Statistics. These are the figures in regard to manufactures:

Year	Index number of employment
1922	81.6
1923	89.3
1924	85.3
1925	86.0
1926	92.1

This shows a steady increase from 81 when hon. gentlemen were in office to 95 at the present time. In regard to all industries the figures are as follows:

Year	Index number of employment
1922	87.9
1923	94.6
1924	92.3
1925	92.5

Or, taking the total number of the actual average in numbers employed in manufacture as shown by the census—and these are of firms reporting—the figures are as follows:

Year	Number employed
1922	474,000
1923	575,000
1924	508,000
1925	544,000
1926	581,000
1927 (Est.)	611,000

Or a steady increase in employment throughout the years.

In regard to immigration, my hon. friends opposite in their amendment allege:

That the measures proposed by the government do not tend to induce the return of Canadians to their native land.

That statement is not true, for the fact is that the records of the Department of Immigration show conclusively that Canadians are returning from the United States to this country. For many years no record of this kind was kept in Canada, and that is where hon. gentlemen opposite got their chance. Just because the Department of Immigration in the United States was keeping a record of virtually every man who was entering the country for any purpose and putting him down as an immigrant when he so declared himself and our department was keeping no corresponding record, the figures became entirely misleading and hon. gentlemen opposite began to quote them to the disadvantage of this country. In 1924 this government began to keep a record of Canadians who were returning to Canada after having been in the United States for a period of six months or under three years. This record relates to men or women who have gone to the United States as declared immigrants and who have come back to Canada stating that they had gone over as declared immigrants and had come back intending to reside again permanently in Canada. This is the record:

Year	Returning Canadians from United States
1926-27	56,957

That is the record of how the policies of the government have been operating in bringing back Canadians who had formerly taken up residence on the other side. The Canadians who returned from the United States are classified as follows:

Canadian born	49,255
British subjects who had acquired Canadian domicile	5,326
Naturalized Canadian citizens	2,376
Total	56,957

Now I come to statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think the one made by the hon. member for Fort William was perhaps the most concrete, and most of the discussion centred around what he said. His statement related to the third part of the amendment of hon. gentlemen opposite, which is to this effect:

> That the measures proposed by the government do not tend to prevent the continued emigration of our people to the United States.

The hon. member for Fort William made this assertion:

> Last year, according to the American figures, we lost to the United States over 84,000 Canadians.

That, I think, is a correct statement of what my hon. friend said.

Mr. MANION: Correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wish to draw his attention to—and I think he already knows it—is that he again persists in consulting American sources and not taking his data from Canadian sources.

Mr. MANION: May I give my hon. friend my source? It was the Minister of Immigration of the United States, absolutely the most official United States source.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish my hon. friend would take as his source the Minister of Immigration of Canada.

Mr. MANION: He will not give us the figures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My objection with reference to hon. gentlemen opposite is that, whenever occasion offers, they invariably take what will best suit them in the matter of quoting figures in favour of the United States and against Canada.

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend should not criticize us for that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read the figures to the house to show them exactly how the figures are made up. First of all my hon. friend says that we lost to the United States over 84,000 Canadians. In that he is not wholly correct because even the figures he quoted—and I think he will admit I am correct in this—relate not only to Canadians but to emigrants from Canada and Newfoundland.

Mr. CLARK: Two thousand from Newfoundland.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all the report in this respect for June, 1927, of the United States Commissioner of Immigration gives immigration from Canada and Newfoundland as 84,580.

Mr. CLARK: How many from Newfoundland?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not given.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, they are given.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: Two thousand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us come along a little further and take Canadian residents who were crossing the line. I will give the figures correctly.

Mr. CLARK: The right hon. member will get those figures from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will wait, I will give him something better than his hon. friend gave. Canadian residents crossing numbered 81,506, classified as follows:

Canadian born..	68,366
Those not born in Canada..	13,140

These figures moreover include classes of people that we know go back and forth at different seasons to work in the mills of New England and lumber woods of Michigan and Maine. They are all put down as immigrants into the United States although they return to Canada. My hon. friend gives the number of Canadians who are going from Canada to the United States and he says that we lose these to Canada, but he makes no reference to those Canadians who are coming back, to whom I made reference a moment ago. What are the facts for the same period?

Mr. CLARK: Did the right hon. gentleman ever meet one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Evidently the immigration officials have.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope hon. gentlemen will not continue these interruptions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There again may I note the significance of my hon. friend's remarks? Hon. gentlemen opposite have been complaining that we are finding fault with them for perpetually praising conditions in the United States and running down their own country, and here is my hon. friend by his interruptions verifying the very statement against which he is protesting. He asks, did we ever see a returning Canadian?

Mr. CLARK: I asked if you had ever met one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my hon. friend the figures. According to the statistical records, the movement back of Canadians from the United States in the period to which I have referred was 56,957, but in addition to Canadians returning, there are many American citizens who came over here and took up their residence in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite made no mention of that in their figures. The immigration from the United States to Canada in the period I am referring to was 21,025. In other words, my hon. friend says that we lost over 84,000 Canadians, while, as a matter of fact, in that same period from the United States there came to Canada as returning Canadians, and United States citizens coming to reside in Canada, the number of 77,982.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I did state those figures, but I showed also that according to the figures of the Immigration department most of these people were central Europeans coming over from the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figures I am giving are the actual returns compiled by the Immigration department.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Too bad Canada is prospering!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite wish to be strictly accurate in their figures, they will say that the maximum net loss suffered by Canada last year was at most something like 3,524 Canadians, a pretty small figure, and that figure would be wiped out completely if a proper record had been kept of those going across the border just for seasonal employment. May I add this, that if only Canadian-born are considered, Canada has a record of 9,600 over the United States.

The inference which hon. gentlemen opposite seek to draw from their remarks is that the administration is unable to check the exodus; in other words, that there is something in regard to our policies which occasions it. As I have already said, hon. gentlemen opposite have taken all their figures from the United States immigration records, but there is another record kept in the United States which is equally important, and that is the United States census. If you take the United States census you will find that the number of Canadians resident in the United States is very much less than one would be inclined to gather from the figures which are kept by their immigration agents from day to day. According to the United States census, there were the following numbers of Canadian and Newfoundland-born resident in the United States on the dates here indicated:

1870..	493,464
1880..	717,157
1890..	980,938
1900..	1,179,922
1910..	1,209,717

In other words, according to the census statistics of the United States, there were over 70,000 fewer Canadians in the United States in 1920 than there were in 1910, although the United States immigration figures for that same period show a very large immigration of Canadians to the United States, namely, 742,000. That throws a great flood of light on the matter of this immigration back and forth across the American frontier. During the period in which hon. gentlemen opposite for the most part were in office, and quoting from the sources which they have quoted against us, there were no less than 742,000 Canadians who left Canada for the United States, according to the immigration figures in that ten-year period, yet the census which keeps a record of those who actually settled and remained in the country shows that there were 70,000 fewer Canadians in the United States in 1920 than there were in 1910. If that was the case then, I submit that the same is the case to-day. As a matter of fact, as everyone knows, immigration has been going on back and forth across the frontier ever since the beginnings of the two countries. Lord Durham in his report in 1839 refers to the emigration from Canada to the United States at that time and deplores it, and so you find it all along. But the statistics at present go to show conclusively that the numbers leaving this country are fewer and fewer, and on the other hand that the total number of immigrants entering Canada from other countries has been increasing year by year during the last few years.

I should like to have said a few words in regard to the question of trade, but I shall pass over that with a single reference to our trade with Australia and New Zealand. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in speaking this afternoon about our trade with Australia and New Zealand, said that every treaty we had made had been against the interests of Canada. What are the facts?

The facts regarding the trade between Australia and Canada—and I would like my hon. friend to remember this in his advocacy of empire trade—are that on an average over a period of years for every dollar's worth of goods we have bought and buy from Australia and New Zealand they have bought and buy three dollars' worth from us. In addition, the goods that we have been sending to Australia and New Zealand have been for the most part the very class of goods which hon. gentlemen opposite, in accordance with their theories, say that we should export, namely, manufactured goods. Our exports for the most part have been automobiles, implements, rubber, paper, lumber, canned fish, and other classes of products which are manufactured. I think something like ninety per cent of the commodities we have sold to Australia and New Zealand have been raw materials manufactured into the finished articles in this country. The port of Vancouver has grown to be one of the great ports of the world, and if that port is going to continue to grow, it will be through the growth of our Pacific trade, yet hon. gentlemen opposite, when we have a trade with another part of the empire in the proportion of three to one in favour of this country, say that we ought to cease that trade, notwithstanding that it is the very class of trade they are advocating, namely the export of manufactured products. To show how our Australian trade is growing, may I read from a copy received to-night of the St. John, New Brunswick, Telegraph-Journal of March 12 (yesterday), which says:

> Australian orders to the amount of 25,000 cases have been received for New Brunswick sardines, it was announced here Saturday by A. Neil McLean, of the firm of Connors Brothers.

This firm, I understand, are the largest sardine manufacturers in the world.

May I now say a word in regard to the development of our natural resources, because in regard to that hon. gentlemen opposite have an amendment. They say that—> —the measures proposed by the government make no provision for the effective development of the natural resources of the country.

There again if we are to be guided by what has taken place in the last few years, the figures are absolutely to the contrary. Let us look at the field crops of Canada, and see how the natural resources of the soil have been developed between the years 1921 to 1927. Here are the total values of our field crops:

1922	962,293,200
1923	899,226,200
1924	995,235,900
1925	1,098,303,938
1926	1,104,983,100
1927	1,134,192,600

That looks like a development of the natural resources of this country in that particular branch of Canadian industry.

Take the pulp and paper industry. What is the quantity and value of our production? The figures are as follows:

	Tons	Value
1921	1,018,947	$106,553,935
1922	1,366,815	106,260,078
1923	1,589,303	127,984,370
1924	1,718,741	133,395,673
1925	1,884,705	140,680,177
1926	2,266,143	158,277,078

The figures show a steady increase.

The mineral production of Canada from 1921 to 1927 was as follows:

1921	$171,923,342
1922	184,297,242
1923	214,079,331
1924	209,583,406
1925	226,583,333
1926	240,437,123
1927	244,520,098

Then in regard to our fisheries: From 1921 to 1926 these are the figures in millions of dollars:

Fisheries Production of Canada 1921-26

1921	$ 34,931,935
1922	41,800,210
1923	42,565,545
1924	44,534,235
1925	47,942,131
1926	56,360,633

These figures indicate an increase between 1921 and 1926 of over $21,000,000 or 61 per cent.

For the same period the manufacturing production of Canada reached the following totals, again in millions of dollars:

Manufacturing Production of Canada 1921-26

1922	2,482,209,130
1923	2,781,165,514
1924	2,695,053,582
1925	2,948,545,315
1926	3,250,000,000*

*Partly estimated and subject to revision.

These figures show an increase in five years of $674,000,000, or 26 per cent.

So I say hon. gentlemen opposite are again wrong in their contention that the policies of this government are not meeting the situation.

My hon. friend has been making a great many speeches in various parts of the Dominion, in all of which he has stressed the point that our development in trade means "parting with our estate"—our natural resources. He says we are selling our estate. Well, let us get first of all a true perspective of what constitutes the estate of Canada. Take agriculture. What is the position of this portion of Canada's estate? It is estimated that the total arable land of Canada amounts to three hundred million acres. Now, not more than a fifth of that total is under cultivation at the present time. Can it be said that when we grow wheat and sell it from the land under cultivation we are parting with our agricultural estate? We send the raw products abroad in order to get money back wherewith to create a demand for our manufactures and other commodities. That is the position in regard to agriculture.

Now let me take timber. The estimated total forest area of Canada is in the neighbourhood of 1,200,000 square miles. Forty per cent of this is covered with merchantable timber. There is not another timber area of equal extent in the world outside Siberia. As a matter of fact, we have not begun to appreciate even the extent of these resources. But is not the preservation of this part of our estate very largely a question of conservation, and are not a large proportion of our timber resources under the control of the provincial governments? It is to those governments that my hon. friend should address his remarks rather than to the federal government. We are co-operating with the provinces in conserving the forests. Much more harm is done to our forests through loss by insects and fire than by lumbering operations. Some of the provinces have a statutory requirement that before the timber is exported it must to a certain degree be manufactured. Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and one or two of the other provinces have enacted such regulations. It can be shown that a very large quantity of our forest wealth is leaving Canada to-day only in the form of the manufactured product.

Another part of our estate is our minerals. Is there any hon. member who will attempt even to estimate the extent of the mineral wealth of Canada? How can it be said that we are parting with that estate when we sell some raw material from a portion of the earth that has been little more than scratched? Every year we are discovering new areas of mineral wealth, and what there may be ultimately available in the way of production no one can yet foresee.

Another portion of our estate is represented by our fisheries—ocean, river and lake. So far as our ocean fisheries are concerned we know nothing of depletion; as to the fisheries of our lakes and rivers, the governments of the provinces and the Dominion authorities are co-operating by means of hatcheries and in other ways to conserve and increase this important natural resource. So there again any reference to losing our estate seems to me to be wide of the mark.

Then take our water-powers; a few years ago we did not even regard them as an asset; to-day they are one of our greatest assets. This government has laid down the policy that the export of hydro-electric power shall be prohibited so that these great reserves of energy may be utilized in building up the Dominion. We have available forty-one million horse-power, of which at present only four and three-quarter million has been developed.

But in speaking of our natural resources, emphasis must be laid upon the word "resource" as well as upon the word "natural". A resource is something to be used in case of need, when it is required. That is what these resources were given to us for by nature—not to be left dormant, but to be used. The extent to which they can be used and what they will produce depends upon the application of science and human energy. Science is continually finding new means of developing our natural resources. Take, as an example, low grade ores that a few years ago were regarded as worthless; to-day, through scientific processes, those ores are becoming increasingly valuable. So in regard to wheat and grain, frost-resisting qualities have been discovered in the course of evolving new varieties, and the effect will be to roll back the map of this Dominion further and further north. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are not to export any of these raw materials, that they must be made into manufactured goods to supply the home market. May I draw their attention to this fact?—We could not more effectively destroy the home market than by following their suggestion. If we put aside the proportion of wheat that is exported, we find that we are importing more in the way of raw materials than we are exporting. Do hon. gentlemen mean to say that we can lay down to the world the doctrine that we will not export any of our raw materials, and at the same time expect other nations to supply us with their raw materials for our cotton mills, our woollen mills and our rubber factories? If we want to trade with the world we have to be prepared to sell them what they are prepared to buy from us. If you take the total of our exports—I will not trouble the house to go through the list, but any hon. member can look up the year book—you will find that for the most part the various commodities are as far advanced in the manufactured state as they can be. Not all of them, it is true. For instance, wheat might be manufactured into flour. What would be the effect if we were to follow the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite? If we refused to sell our wheat unless manufactured into flour, the nations that to-day are buying our wheat would turn to some other countries for their supply and we would lose our market altogether. The reason that wheat is exported rather than flour is that it can be handled in bulk cargo, whereas flour is handled in package cargo. Besides, the countries that import wheat do not want it in the form of flour. More than that, the great flour-milling industries in the United States grind our wheat in bond, exporting the flour and retaining the by-products. Under the circumstances, it is doubtful whether any effective action could be taken which would secure the grinding of our wheat for our own flour mills. It is far more likely any such action would jeopardize our exports of wheat which must be sold in competition with the wheat of other countries on the markets of the importing nations. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the more one considers the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite the more untenable it appears to be.

I will conclude with a brief reference to one or two matters of a different nature which have been referred to in this debate. The first was a reference by my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), to what transpired in a previous session of parliament. He mentioned that, shortly before it left office in 1926, on three occasions the Liberal administration was defeated. May I read his statement:

> It is likewise true that on June 25, 1926, the King government was defeated three times in one day.

My only reason for raising this question at the moment is that in my opinion it is just as well to be accurate in any matter touching the records of parliament. Let me say that the government which I had the honour to lead prior to my resignation in June, 1926, was never once defeated. Had the government been defeated the fact would appear in the records of parliament. I have in my hand the votes and proceedings of the 25th day of June, containing the proceedings of parliament on that date. What were the various resolutions submitted to the judgment of the house on that occasion? There was one resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), defeated by a vote of 115 to 117. That motion was defeated. Will anyone say that the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a government motion, and that because that resolution failed to receive the support of the house the government was thereby defeated? Then there was an appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to which exception was taken by the leader of the opposition. Appeal was taken by the then leader of the opposition from your ruling to the house, the house being asked whether the ruling of the Chair should be sustained. The house on a vote of 117 to 115 failed to sustain that ruling, but that, Mr. Speaker, I regard as a reflection upon the opposition and its leader rather than upon either the government or the Chair. And what was the next motion? The next motion was one moved by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) and seconded by the late Mr. King of North Huron, a member of the Progressive party, "that the debate be now adjourned". By a majority of one that motion was defeated; the vote was 114 to 115. Will anyone contend that that was a government motion and that in consequence of its failure to carry the government was defeated? There was one further motion, it was moved by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lavigueur). It was the only motion which came from this side of the house, it was "that the debate be now adjourned". The record in the votes and proceedings of that day shows this motion as having been agreed to; and this was the last motion put in that parliament, for it was a day or two following that I tendered my resignation to His Excellency the Governor General. The house adjourned on Friday and being denied a dissolution, I tendered my resignation before the house reassembled on Monday. It is, I say, just as well that the public be correctly informed in respect of the records on this question.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Has the government, of which my right hon. friend has the honour to be the head, ever been sustained by the popular vote of the country since 1921?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to my hon. friend I will say that the government of which I have been the head since 1921 assumed office by virtue of the will of the people of this country, and has retained office in virtue of the support it has received from this House of Commons. The government, let me add, is in office to-day by reason of the votes of the people of Canada and in virtue of the confidence reposed in it by the House of Commons. But let me remind my hon. friend that there was another so-called government formed in the short interval between my resignation and the time the government resumed power. Of that short-lived phantom administration my hon. friend was not a member, and I imagine he is proud of the fact; no doubt he is happy to have been left out of it. However, there is one fact to be observed in relation to that government, and that is, that it never had the confidence either of the House of Commons or of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It had the confidence of the people to the extent of over 100,000 votes more than my hon. friend's government received.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, all I can say to my hon. friend is, there is a perfectly obvious answer to his remarks and it is that we are over here and he is over there.

Now, speaking of the confidence of the electorate in governments, my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), addressing the house the other evening on the budget, touched upon one or two matters which I consider subjects of reasonable and proper debate; I refer particularly to what she had to say in regard to the constitution of parliament and to certain matters of procedure in the House of Commons. One question she brought up was the right of dissolution, and this comes up in connection with what I have just been saying. My hon. friend expressed the view that the power of dissolution should not rest with the Prime Minister but that—if I understand her correctly—there should be a fixed parliamentary term. It seems to me that many of these matters of form appear differently when we come to the reality. When one comes to examine the so-called right of the prime minister to request dissolution it is obvious that no one individual has the power at his will and caprice, to dissolve parliament at any particular moment. The fact is that the Prime Minister gives expression to the view of his cabinet, and the cabinet gives expression to the view of what it considers to be the will of the majority in parliament at the time that decision is reached which leads the Prime Minister to ask for a dissolution. So that the expression of opinion of the Prime Minister, in asking for dissolution, is the expression not of an individual but of parliament as constituted at the time. I would direct the attention of the house to this important fact. Comparisons are frequently made between our system of government and the system in the United States where there is a fixed legislative term. When these comparisons are made this essential fact seems to be ignored: Where there is a fixed term of office, a period of four years as in the United States, the executive is completely independent of the legislature. The executive in the United States, the president and his cabinet, take office under oath to devote their whole time to the administration of government. They have nothing to do with legislation; they are not responsible to the legislature. They are bound only by their oath of office and are assured of office for the period of time designated under the constitution. The British system is entirely different. Under the British system ministers of the crown have not only responsible executive duties to perform; they must come into parliament, as the ministers of the government of this Dominion do, and assume the responsibility for such legislation as is enacted. They must take the responsibility for the administration of the affairs of the country as well as for the proceedings of parliament. Under the latter system of government you have a condition which makes it imperative, in circumstances in which the executive finds, it impossible, being manacled or thwarted, to continue the conduct of public business, that the administration, through the Prime Minister, should have the right to appeal to the judgment of the people. I know that my hon. friend from Southeast Grey feels equally strongly with myself on the rights of the people. After all where is the wrong in giving to the Prime Minister the right to ask for a dissolution of parliament? Is dissolution not an appeal from a comparatively few members of the House of Commons to the great body of public opinion? After all, is it not based on trust in the people? When the Prime Minister asks for a dissolution of parliament, what is it for which he appeals? He simply asks for the right to allow the people themselves to judge in relation to the conduct of those whom they have made their trustees. I hold, therefore, that no finer doctrine of the rights of the people could be propounded than that which ensures, in times of crisis, or when any measure comes up of paramount importance to the public welfare on which the people have not been consulted, that the people shall be given the right to pronounce upon the question. In other words, the Prime Minister asks for the right to go to the people, from whom all power is derived, in order to ascertain whether or not he and his colleagues are right in the particular course which they are pursuing or intend to pursue. That point I wish to make clear because I think there are many instances in which, under the British constitution, the reality is so profoundly different from the appearance of things and that we cannot examine too deeply into what is fundamental in questions of this nature. Our system of government, which has grown up—not over a period of decades, not over a period of twenty or fifty or a hundred years, but through centuries of time—has, I believe, reached the point where it cannot be surpassed by any other form of government to be found anywhere else in the world.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the Prime Minister mean to imply that the British form of government, as we know it and as we have seen it exemplified in Canada, has reached perfection and that it cannot be improved?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I believe that so long as we are human there will always be room for improvement. I do say, however, that the British system has developed to a greater point of improvement and more nearly approximates perfection than any other political system in the world. Let me assure the house that in this regard I am speaking as a minister of the crown who, being responsible for legislation which parliament is asked to consider, feels very keenly the force of what he is saying on this question.

Similarly I believe that under the British system, as demonstrated over a very long period, the most effective way of making principles and policies prevail in legislation, is by great parties composed of individuals who have in common certain principles which they desire to advocate and support. The other evening my hon. friend spoke about the feeling which is held by herself and a number of those surrounding her, that they are in parliament for the purpose of representing a class. I think I am right in placing that construction on her words; if I am wrong I hope she will correct me. May I ask her first of all one question: If we each of us took that view what would become of government in an orderly fashion?

Miss MACPHAIL: We would have honest government; everyone would know whom we represented here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That, I submit, is a matter of opinion. However, I may say to my hon. friend that before you can even take that position in parliament you must get into parliament, and the results over a number of years have demonstrated that the only really effective way for any body of opinion to find expression in legislation through debate on the floor of parliament is to have a party large enough and strong enough to elect enough members to give expression to that opinion in parliament itself.

In speaking the other evening my hon. friend used these words:

> . . . . agriculture said: This kind of thing is no good; we are going to organize ourselves as an industry. They said to themselves: Our politics is our business, and we have been foolish in letting other people look after our business; we will never do well that way; We will send people to Ottawa, we will choose them, finance and elect them; we will control them.

Notice those words:

> . . . . we will send people to Ottawa; we will choose them, finance and elect them; we will control them.

My hon. friend remembers what took place in North Huron, where there was a member of her group who took exactly this view and who was running as a candidate in a recent by-election. I have in my hand the manifesto which he issued during that campaign, which is in words very much like the words my hon. friend uttered. It is signed by Sheldon Bricker the Progressive candidate, and he uses these words in his election manifesto:

Surely agriculture, our basic industry, needs representation in the Dominion house, unfettered by party ties; free to vote on the merits of each question as it arises.

That statement was issued by the Progressive candidate in that election. Now let me return to what my hon. friend said:

...we will send people to Ottawa; we will choose them, finance and elect them;

Is Mr. Bricker here as a member of the Progressive group, sitting where the late Mr. King sat in this house? What was the result of having chosen a representative of a class group as a candidate? The result is that you have sitting in the Tory group opposite a gentleman who is going to cast a vote against the Progressives, against the Liberals and not at all in accord with the principles that my hon. friend has laid down as those which she supports. The point I wish to bring out is that parties are not as some suppose wrong in themselves. They are a means to an end.

Mr. EVANS: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does not the Prime Minister think every party represents a distinct class?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not agree at all with that view; that is exactly where I differ from my hon. friend. I say that as far as the Liberal party is concerned its members represent the people as a whole, and no particular class. In the ranks of our party we have men who come from farming communities and others who come from the business world; we also have those whose lives have been given up to learned professions, but they are all united not by a class tie or bond which separates them from those belonging to the other classes in this house but by a tie which binds them in the advocacy of certain principles and policies which they hope to make prevail in legislation. It is quite true that no one can have his own way; no one can go the full length he might wish to go, but the advantage of a party is that it brings together men and women with like sympathies, like aims and like purposes in the advocacy of measures that they believe to be in the public interest. That is why I am touching on the question at the moment. I feel a great sympathy with many of the objects which my hon. friends of the Progressive group pursue; I would like to see some of the measures in which they are interested enacted as legislation, but I say honestly and frankly from my experience in matters of government that the fact that they hold themselves aloof and do not avowedly co-operate with other groups in this house makes it so much more difficult to get action on some of these matters than would otherwise be the case.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the Prime Minister mean to say that this group have not co-operated with his government every time the government brought down legislation in which we were interested?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want my hon. friend to misunderstand me; if she will look at my words she will see that I spoke comparatively. It makes it more difficult to do many things that otherwise night be done. Let me be concrete: There are a number of members in the Progressive group opposite who come from the province of Alberta. Time and again I have heard the Minister of the Interior urge that certain matters be pressed forward concerning that province, and I have seen him do his utmost to bring about progress in particular measures, but before he can get this House of Commons to support his views he has to have the support of others who have been made to think and feel as he does. Now let me ask this: Does my hon. friend think my task as leader of the government or the task of the Minister of the Interior with respect to Alberta is made any easier by the fact that most of the members from Alberta are sitting in the opposite corner and not one of them where he can most effectively use his persuasive powers with other members on this side of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So I struck home again.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the Prime Minister really want me to answer that question? I think it is very much easier for him and for the Minister of the Interior to bring down legislation in the interests of Alberta, because the Alberta men are outside the government and are therefore in a position to use their individuality and their brains to induce the government to bring in the legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, in that my hon. friend is mistaken. May I direct this argument to her in connection with what I am now saying: She personally has found that in order to get those sitting around her to see her viewpoint it is advisable to have discussed together many matters of policy within a little group which is termed a caucus. What is necessary with the few opposite is equally necessary if agreement is to be reached by the larger numbers here assembled. What

I wish to say is that all government is in the last analysis, a matter of opinion. That opinion is most generally the result of persuasion, not of coercion. In the long run more of service can be done to any particular cause or any particular locality by the sharing with others of responsibility in the fullest possible way in the support of a particular cause or what may be desired for a particular locality. That is my reason and my sole reason for preferring the party system to what my hon. friend refers to as representation by class.

Mr. KENNEDY: Do the Liberal-Progressives attend the Liberal caucuses?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will say a word to my hon. friend with regard to the Liberal-Progressives. They are pretty closely in touch with opinion on this side of the house, and I think we on our part endeavour to give full regard to what the Liberal-Progressives have to say. To my hon. friend who interrupted me, may I point out just where the line of reasoning which he takes is apt to lead, and how serious may be the false position into which it may bring him. He made a statement in this house the other evening to the effect that the most effective way a class group could act might be to see what bargain it could make with a party whose known principles were wholly opposed to its own. What were his words? He said:

. . . . the only thing for us to do is to go and make the very best possible deal with the protectionists and see what they can do for us.

Now those are the words of my hon. friend. How are they viewed in the country? Here is the Montreal Gazette which represents the Conservative party and I think represents in the best way what is in the best interest of that party. What does it say, contrasting the point of view of the Conservative party with the point of view of my hon. friend? It says:

Whether the member for Peace River used the word "deal" or the word "bargain"—reports of his remarks differ in this respect—is not very material, the sense being the same. It is unfortunate that he did not express more clearly his idea of what the protectionist "can do for us".

Then it goes on to say:

But the Conservative party is still founded upon the principle of protection, and there can be no "deal" and no "bargain" which involves a surrender of that principle. The Conservative policy is not in the market.

That is the position which the Montreal Gazette takes.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this budget which has been presented to the house a protectionist budget or not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like my hon. friend to wait a minute. Probably he does not wish to hear what some of the other papers are saying. Here is the Financial Times of Montreal. How does it regard my hon. friend's remarks? I shall not read the whole article, but it says in interpreting the point of view which he is now presenting:

Indeed Mr. Kennedy's offer—the way in which he puts that support up for sale—is hedged about by a most unacceptable condition.

Evidently it regards my hon. friend's attitude as one not of maintaining but of selling principles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to close. My only reason for quoting the remarks of my hon. friend was that he rose and thereby directed my attention to a matter which I had already covered in my notes but which I had for the moment thought of passing over. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman interrupted me for this reason: His attitude has helped to make clear that the moment you attempt to govern on the basis of class representation that moment you begin to cause just the kind of suspicion with regard to motives that is set out in articles I have quoted, namely that, the whole business is a matter of bargaining. I know my hon. friend from Southeast Grey believes in representative government, but I ask her is it possible to have representative government where members sit in parliament as the representatives of a class, and do not sit as representing all classes.

Miss MACPHAIL: No one can represent all classes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those who advocate class government also believe, I think, in democratic government. But government by a majority is the only way in which it is possible to express the voice of democracy. Class representation may be described as an attempt at government not by a majority but by a minority. Hon. members of the Progressive group say we desire power. So do they; the difference between them and ourselves is one of method. The method under the parliamentary representation system is the method of gaining and maintaining power through persuasion and co-operation. As interpreted by my hon. friend from Peace River, the method to be employed is not so much one of co-operation as it is one of coercion.

Mr. SPENCER: The Prime Minister laid stress on the importance of numbers. May

I point out that when Nova Scotia had a full quota in the Liberal ranks that province had less relief by a long way than it has had since most of its members have sat on the other side of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall deal with that point at another time. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have already taken up more time than I intended. I have no desire to enter into any argument. I was simply trying to make clear to some of my hon. friends opposite with whose point of view on many things I have the utmost sympathy, how a government is situated in the matter of making policies prevail, and I do say that hon. members from Manitoba who sit here as Progressive Liberals, associating day by day with the members of the Liberal party, speaking with the different members of the party, and giving the government in an intimate way the benefit of their opinions and advice and their support, are doing much more to ensure the enactment of legislation in this parliament in accordance with the principles they have most at heart than would have been possible had they been sitting on the opposite side and away from the government altogether.

May I say this in conclusion? The leader of the Progressive group in speaking the other day on the death of Lord Oxford and Asquith said he believed that Mr. Asquith would be remembered in history more for what he had done in the way of legislation for the benefit of the masses in the shape of old age pensions and the like, than for anything else he had accomplished. I ask my hon. friends where would Mr. Asquith's legislation on old age pensions have been if he had gone into the House of Commons of Great Britain as a lawyer, determined to sit there as a representative of the legal profession? I ask my hon. friends to take all the leaders in the public life of Great Britain, I ask them to take all that has been achieved in the matter of social reform legislation, and I ask them where that legislation would have come from if men of many callings and professions had not stood up and fought the battles of the people in the matter of the franchise, in the matter of the tariff, in the matter of the factory laws, the mining laws, and other legislation deeply affecting the interests of the masses. Had many of the great men whose names are household words been in parliament only as the representatives of a particular class, where should we have got the legislation which they were responsible for enacting—men like Gladstone, like Bright, like Cobden, like Huskisson, like Shaftesbury, and others of great eminence none of whom ever sat in parliament as the representatives of a particular class? They represented the people as a whole and the liberal doctrines which they professed were implemented into legislation for the benefit of the country as a whole. We as Liberals consider with them that the duty of members of parliament is not to represent a class only or the people in only one section of the country but men and women of all classes in all parts of the country, and that to this end we should work in co-operation and close association with our fellow members of kindred sympathies and views for the greatest good to the greatest number throughout our broad Dominion.

Notes re Agriculture:—

(a) While it is not possible to make any accurate estimate, it is considered the reduction would be at least fifteen to thirty-five per cent.

(b) The change made under these items, apart from the actual increase of drawback, means a great advantage to manufacturers in that it does away with the keeping of accounts and advancing moneys. Another benefit to manufacturers is that materials on hand April 11, 1924, which enter into the cost of implements mentioned will be subject to a drawback of 99 per cent.

(c) These items were subject to various rates of duty, but on the principal items the duties were as indicated.
The agricultural industry was also benefited in 1922 by the exemption from sales tax of fibre used in the manufacture of binder twine.

Notes on Fishing Industry:—

(d) Prior to 1922 manilla rope was restricted to rope used in holding traps in lobster fisheries; in 1922 the budget extended the free list to include rope used in all fisheries.

(e) Prior to 1924 the duty exemption applied only to "barked" marline; the exemption now applies to all marline, which means some additional saving to fishermen and does away with considerable annoyance.

It is to be noted, also, that the fishing industry was benefited in 1922 through the removal of the sales tax on manilla fibre for use in the manufacture of rope for the fisheries; by the removal of the sales tax on boats purchased by individual fishermen for their own use in the fisheries; and on articles and materials used in the manufacture of similar boats in the fisheries; and on articles and materials used in the manufacture of similar boats.

Notes on General Industry:—

(f) Reduction calculated on basis of 60 per cent drawback.

(g) The Government has also by recent amendments made reductions in many articles that enter into the construction, equipment or repair of blast furnaces.

*While the duty on tea is a rate per pound, the ad valorem rate on the basis of value imported and duty paid for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1923, would equal 26·4 p.c.

Textile Changes under Budget of 1928

Cottons

The maximum duty under the General Tariff is reduced from 37½ per cent to 30 per cent, with a single exception.

Cotton yarns, 40's and finer, are made dutiable but the rates are reduced on the coarser counts of yarn.

Gray (unbleached) cotton fabrics are reduced by 2½ per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs.

Printed and dyed cottons are reduced 2½ per cent in the British preference, 5 per cent in the intermediate and 5 per cent in the general tariff.

Yarn-dyed fabrics are reduced 2½ per cent British preference, 5 per cent in the intermediate and 2½ per cent general.

On a large range of household cottons, such as tablecloths, counterpanes, sheets, quilts, towels, plain curtains, etc., there are reductions of from 5 to 10 per cent in the British preference rate, from 2½ to 5 per cent in the intermediate, and from 2½ to 5 per cent in the general.

Blankets of cotton are reduced 7½ per cent in the British preference rate, the intermediate and the general.

Cotton embroideries, laces, etc., are reduced, roughly, 5 per cent on all tariffs.

Cotton clothing and manufactures of cotton show reductions ranging from 2½ to 5 per cent on all tariffs, (with very few exceptions, due to reclassification).

Woollens

Yarns for weaving are reduced from various duty ranges (chiefly 12½, 17½ and 20) to Free under the British preference rate, 10 under the intermediate and 12½ under the general rate.

Dress goods in the gray for dyeing or finishing in Canada are reduced 5 per cent under the British preference rate.

Lustres and linings are reduced from 20, 30 and 35 per cent to 10, 20 and 25 per cent.

Woollen fabrics not over 5 ounces in weight per square yard are reduced 2½ per cent in the British preference rate.

Cheaper ranges of woollen socks and stockings are reduced 5 per cent in all tariffs.

Knitted goods of all kinds valued at not more than 90 cents per pound are reduced 5 per cent in the British preference rate.

Flax, Jute, Hemp, Etc.

There are reductions in the British preference rate, (2½ per cent) on the finer grades of linen, as well as on plain and fancy linen handkerchiefs.

Manufactures of flax, not otherwise provided for, formerly rated at 25 per cent under the British preference tariff are reduced to 22½ per cent.

Oiled clothing of cotton or linen is reduced 5 per cent on British preference and intermediate tariffs.

Silk and Art Silk

There are practically no changes in rates affecting silk and artificial silk but the items are reworded and reclassified to conform with those comprising the wool and cotton schedules.

1065	Bituminous coal.....	When used in melting or evaporating salt produced in Canada: Provided that no drawback under this item shall be payable on coal used in producing salt or brine when such salt or brine is further manufactured than salt enumerated in tariff items 40, 41, 42, and 42a.....	99 p.c.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? Before I put the question, I wish to address myself to hon. members on both sides of the house. Standing order 7, under our new rule, reads as follows:

> At 11 of the clock, p.m., unless the closure rule be then in operation, the proceedings on any business under consideration shall be interrupted and Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put, provided that all business not disposed of at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

I wish to point out that it is not yet 11 o'clock, but that hour will soon be reached, and there are three votes to be taken this evening. It is not only probable but quite certain that by 11 o'clock the three divisions will not have been taken. I should like to know, therefore, the sense of the house as to whether we shall proceed with the three votes notwithstanding the hour. Am I to understand that such is the unanimous wish of the house?

Mr. BOURASSA: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I cannot agree, if any question be not put at 11 o'clock, to giving my consent to the breaking of the rule. I consider that these rules are binding, and that we must suffer the consequences of our absurdity.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a collective "absurdity" voted by the house last year.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that it is now past eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the house is to proceed, consent must be unanimous. Bourinot says:

Each house is bound by every consideration of self-interest and justice to observe strictly its rules and standing orders, and to rebuke every attempt to evade or infringe them. Consequently the Senate and House of Commons never permit their rules and standing orders to be suspended, unless by unanimous consent.

Does the hon. gentleman persist in his opposition?

Mr. BOURASSA: That is the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then consent not being unanimous, it is my duty to declare, it being eleven o'clock, this house stands adjourned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would like to point out to you that last year a similar situation arose when an hon. gentleman called attention to the fact that it was six o'clock, and the Speaker said. "I am in the hands of the house," and put the question whether he should leave the chair or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a positive rule in this case. It is a new rule, standing order 7, which says:

At eleven of the clock, p.m., unless the closure rule standing order No. 39 be then in operation, the proceedings on any business under consideration shall be interrupted and Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put.

I have asked if it be the unanimous wish of the house that we proceed, and I am told that there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is; let us proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) as a rule speaks quite clearly, and I understand that as it is eleven o'clock he does not want the proceedings to continue. Therefore this house stands adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock in the afternoon.

It being after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 14, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

EMPLOYEES OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton):

1. How many employees of the Department of Agriculture were on salary, pay or allowance in each province during 1927?

2. What amount per province was paid to those mentioned in question one, as salaries and also as travelling expenses?

3. What number of officials of the Department of Agriculture were employed in each province during the year 1927 in each of the following classes, (a) sheep promoters; (b) wool graders; (c) egg promoters; (d) egg graders; (e) hay promoters; (f) hay graders?

4. What amount was paid in each province to each class mentioned above under the name of salaries and of travelling expenses?

CAPITAL INCREASES AND PROFITS

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

For a return showing—1. All increases made to capital from profits in the form of stock dividends or in any other form whatsoever.

2. The profits reported by all industrial organizations as to: (a) gross profits (per cent) on nominal capital, (b) gross profits (per cent) on actual cash invested in each case exclusive of bonus stock dividends, (c) net profits (per cent) as to nominal capital, (d) net profits (per cent) on actual cash invested in each case exclusive of bonus stock dividends.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): However much it may be desirable to secure this information in whole or in part, I think I can convince my hon. friend that he is asking for something which it is practically impossible to obtain. I direct his attention to the first part of his motion, which asks for a return showing:

All increases made to capital from profits in the form of stock dividends or in any other form whatsoever.

Take a small business started many years ago; perhaps the owner of the business was unable to borrow money and all his savings from year to year went back into that particular business, which may have grown to a considerable size. Or take a farmer who started out on a homestead or who bought a farm at a low price; perhaps he got a little stock, and the herds and flocks increased from year to year and he put the money back into the farm. After a period of years that farm and stock may have become quite valuable.

Then take the next clause, with regard to industrial organizations; I imagine my hon. friend refers to incorporated companies. Some of these companies are incorporated under provincial charters, and it would be impossible for this government to secure the information with regard to the actual cash invested in such organizations. It may be said that the government could obtain part of this information from the Income Tax branch, but so far parliament has declared that income tax returns are confidential, and we are not allowed to give out that information.

In view of this explanation perhaps my hon. friend may see fit to withdraw his motion. I am not sure just what he wants to get at, but I suggest that he might very properly drop the resolution, and he and I could have a word together to see what he really does require. If the information is within the department we will be very willing to help my hon. friend, but as the resolution stands it is impossible to carry out.

Mr. KENNEDY: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

EVIDENCE IN JAPAN IN CANADIAN LITIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Before the orders of the day are called I wish to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is too late. The order of the day has been called.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the hon. member was on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask if the attention of the Prime Minister has been directed to the press despatches from British Columbia, which indicate that the Japanese government have lately refused to allow a commission appointed by the Supreme Court of British Columbia to take evidence in Japan in a case which was pending in British Columbia involving something over $1,000,000. Much to the embarrassment of the parties, the Japanese government refused to allow evidence to be taken by the commission before the British Consul General at Tokyo. I have press despatches here which I shall be glad to hand to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have not been advised of the despatches to which my hon. friend refers, but judging from his remarks I would say they afford another reason why we should speedily have a minister at Tokyo.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house has disposed of two amendments—first, the subamendment—and second, the amendment. The question now is on the main motion.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the house having disposed of the subamendment presented by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), on which I spoke, and of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I propose now to address the house for a few moments on the main motion presented by the hon. Minister of Finance. In doing this I really perform what is perhaps a duty.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) has already spoken in this debate. The rule seems to be that when a motion is made, such as was made by the hon. Minister of Finance, and amendments are proposed, any member of this house who speaks to the main motion and the amendments after those amendments have been moved may not speak again. Otherwise the debate would never terminate. The members who may speak are those who had not spoken at the time the amendment was moved to the main motion. Otherwise, of course, the rule of the house against speaking twice to a question would be nugatory.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other member desire to speak on the question of order? I have been thirty-two years in the House of Commons and this is not the first time this point has been raised. Every amendment is a question by itself, and when an amendment is disposed of any hon. member who has not spoken before the amendment was moved is entitled to speak. The only member of the house in the present instance who is debarred from speaking is the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who spoke on the main motion. Now the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) spoke, it is true, last night but merely on a question of order for the purpose of asking the house to observe the rule which provides that the house shall not sit after eleven o'clock. Now let me quote what Beauchesne says under standing order 43, paragraph No. 334:

> By moving or seconding an amendment a member, if he utters a few words, actually speaks to the main motion. It is only after the amendment has been put by the Speaker that it is considered a new question.

Each amendment is therefore a new question, and those who have spoken once on the amendment cannot speak twice, but as long as the main motion is not disposed of, if an hon. member has spoken only on the amendment, he can speak on the main motion.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the question of order. It seems to me that the leader of the opposition is certainly right and perfectly logical in his argument. If the rules are wrong in that regard they should be amended. As it is now this debate is liable to be reopened and every hon. member excepting the member for St. Lawrence-St. George may speak again. Now it is very hard to differentiate and to tell whether any hon. member spoke on the subamendment alone, or on the amendment alone, or on the whole issue. As far as I can judge, all members who have spoken while they spoke on the subamendment also spoke on the amendment and the main motion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if an appeal is entered from your ruling with all deference I think I shall be obliged to vote against that ruling.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): My view has always been that the mover of an amendment, as for example my hon. friend, the member for St. Lawrence-St. George who was the mover of the first amendment, would have the right to speak on a subsequent amendment. There was a subsequent amendment. All others who have spoken in this debate have spoken practically upon three questions—the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment. Therefore they are all precluded from speaking again, and the only one entitled to speak on the second amendment would be the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but as the second amendment has been decided by the house he also is now precluded.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I say first that there is no man who would like better to have the vote taken immediately than myself. I do not propose to discuss what the rule should be, but I think all the old members of the house will remember as well as I do that it has happened not only once or twice, but many times, that the debate has been resumed after the vote on an amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: By those who did not speak on the amendment.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I would suggest an opportunity be given to each member to speak before the vote is taken. It will only cause a loss of two or three minutes, and we might sing Alouette.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I have looked into the question that has been raised, and my firm conviction is that every member of this house except myself has a right to speak on the main motion. That was the conclusion I came to after careful consideration of the procedure, and if it comes to a question of a vote I should have to vote that way.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): I do not think that any member except the member for St. Lawrence-St. George has a right to speak. Any member who spoke before the amendment was submitted to the house is debarred, but any member who spoke after the amendment was proposed is free to speak again. Any member who spoke after the subamendment was moved is also free to take part in the debate on the main motion. As you have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, the subamendment, the amendment and the main motion are three different subjects of discussion, and when a member speaks he is supposed to speak on the question which is before the house at that time.

Mr. SPEAKER: On a debate on the budget, members are at liberty to speak on matters generally affecting the affairs of the country, but if it is very clear, very evident that in the present debate the amendment and the subamendment raise an entirely different issue, then every hon. member is entitled to speak on those different issues so raised. The two amendments having been disposed of and the main motion being put to the house, every hon. member except those who have already spoken, has a right to speak to it.

Mr. BENNETT: I appeal from the ruling of the chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

On the main motion being put, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) rose to address the house. Thereupon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) raised a point of order on the ground that the hon. member for Labelle, having already spoken, was debarred from addressing the house. Mr. Speaker ruled that the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment were three different questions and that the hon. member for Labelle, not having already spoken on the main motion, was entitled to speak.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained?

Ruling sustained.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not vote, Mr. Speaker, because I was paired with the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dubuc), who is not in his place. Had I voted, I should have voted against the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MALONEY: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Guérin). Had I voted, I should have voted against the ruling of the chair.

Mr. IRVINE: I was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. McDiarmid). Had I voted I should have voted to sustain the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was paired with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). Had I voted, I should have voted to sustain the ruling of the chair.

Mr. SINCLAIR (North Wellington): I was paired with the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Hall). Under a misunderstanding, and under pressure, I voted thinking that there were no pairs on this division. I voted against the ruling of the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: Once a vote has been recorded and proclaimed, it cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. SINCLAIR (North Wellington): I am not withdrawing my vote, Mr. Speaker; I am simply making an explanation.

Mr. VENIOT: I was paired with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) on government questions only. That being the case, I did not consider that pairs held in this division, and I felt I had a perfect right to vote.

Mr. GERSHAW: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). Had I voted, I should have voted to sustain the ruling of the chair.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to maintain not only the dignity of the house but the freedom of speech.

Mr. BOURASSA: Now that a majority of this house has sustained the freedom of speech and the liberty of individual members under the rules of the house, and voted that those rules shall be respected by all, I intend to devote a few moments not exactly to the consideration of the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance, but to exercise—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the Sergeant at Arms to exercise the rights of the house.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): I propose to exercise the oldest privilege pertaining to a representative of the people, a privilege which, in the wording used yesterday by the Prime Minister, has behind it the sanction of centuries of tradition in the British parliament, and that is, that whenever the Minister of Finance or any adviser of the crown moves to go into supply, or into committee of ways and means, every free elected representative of the people has the right to express his views and the views of the people who have sent him here. In this I am sure the distinguished leader of the opposition, divided as we may be on many questions of public interest, will stand upon his long knowledge of British public affairs and his parliamentary culture, and admit that in so doing I am not only claiming my right, but asserting a right of every member of this house to whatever party he belongs.

May I say—and here I address myself quite sincerely to all the members of this house, no matter to what party they belong—that it was neither to my taste nor to my comfort that I prevented the house from concluding its business last night upon the proposals of the Minister of Finance? I did it for two reasons. One, because I wanted this house to have an opportunity of realizing the consequences of the rules of debate that it has established. Those rules are supposed to be for the common good of the country, of the House of Commons, of every party within the house, and of every freely elected member. When the revision of the rules was under discussion, my excellent and intimate friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) stated most positively, in the name of the government, that he accepted the rule for the adjournment of the house at eleven o'clock every night, provided it was connected with the adoption of the rule debarring any hon. member, with the exception of the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition, from speaking more than forty minutes. Although I did not believe that those rules would work for the benefit of the country, or that they would attain the avowed and sincere object of abridging debate, I did exactly what the Minister of Justice did; I accepted the one rule because the other was accepted and in the belief that both would be enforced.

What I wanted to emphasize before this house and before the country last night is this. If the forty-minute rule is to be enforced rigidly, as it has been since the beginning of the session, the other rule should also be enforced rigidly. It should not be relaxed for the comfort or at the wish of either the government or the opposition. I did not desire last night to embarrass the government or the opposition, neither did I wish to cause discomfort to any hon. member. I took my stand to exemplify the conjunction of those two rules, and to have it laid down in practice that they must be applied, whether they are agreeable or disagreeable to this member or that member, to this party or that party. In doing this, I believe—I may be mistaken—that I have helped the house to vindicate the primary right of every hon. member, and the house itself to observe its own regulations.

This brings me to the other consideration which induced me last night to prevent the final decision of the house upon the budget proposals. Yesterday afternoon we listened to two very interesting speeches from the leaders of the two great "historical" parties. These parties, according to the letter of this book—Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms—are the only acknowledged parties in this house. I want to be absolutely fair and as nice as I can afford to be. Both leaders availed themselves of the privilege accorded them to speak as long as they wished upon a measure which has been treated in detail by some forty members on one side and by some sixty members on the other, all of whom have more or less upheld the same views and propounded the same policy. Under the forty-minute rule, the leader of a small group like our Progressive friends, the leader of a still smaller group such as our three Labour friends, and the unfortunate individual who, if you like, represents an eccentric brand of people, but people who are British subjects just as much as any other class of people in this country of ours, people who have elected me freely to this house under the same constitution and to express their views with the same freedom as may be enjoyed by the Prime Minister of Canada or by the leader of the opposition—under this rule each one of us is limited to forty minutes in which to expound doctrines or opinions with which you, Mr. Speaker, or the members of the government, or the members of the opposition, may not agree, but which I think you and they desire to listen to with the sense of British fair play and patience which we exercised in listening to the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

But that is not the main point. Upon the subamendment presented by the member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher), because of my determination to respect the longstanding traditions of the British parliamentary system, I refrained altogether from dwelling upon a matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and discussed at length by the Prime Minister last night; I mean, the evolution of our system of government and parliamentary representation. I refrained, because I considered that in discussing the subamendment it was not quite proper to dwell upon this question, which relates to the general policy of the country. But now that the amendment and the subamendment have been disposed of, I owe it not to myself—I am but an insignificant individual—but I owe it to the thousands of people in the province of Quebec, and even in Ontario and in the other provinces, who have done me the favour of expressing some degree of confidence in me in the last twenty years, to say what I think of the opinion which the Prime Minister expressed yesterday on the question of party evolution. The Prime Minister knows that I am a personal friend of his. The Prime Minister knows, and no one better, that no party call or allegiance brought me back to public life when, he being loaded from one end of the country to the other with the accusation of being untrue to Canada and to the British Empire, and of harbouring American tendencies, I stood by him, because I felt that he was on the point of resurrecting the old "Canada first" spirit of which his illustrious grandfather was one of the creators, and of which his excellent father was one of the upholders. I sustained him freely in the province of Quebec and elsewhere during the elections of 1925 and 1926. The province of Quebec sent a solid delegation to support the government, and the Prime Minister knows, or ought to know, that that was not due to party allegiance, but to the free and voluntary determination of a growing number of men and women in my province who have ceased to believe in the gospel of party, and who vote for one party or the other according to circumstances and to their own convictions.

Of course, when the trial came in those days that were fought out during the session of 1926—and they have already been referred to in this debate—great respect was paid to every form of independent influence and support that could be given to the government. But since the general election of 1926 returned the government with a clear majority, it seems to me that the thermometer of sympathy and of expressed admiration for independence of thought and action of such people, in the province of Quebec or elsewhere, has somewhat come down. Therefore I simply wanted to choose this occasion to tell the Prime Minister and his friends that those men and women, free of their will, free of their convictions, who voted to support him in the fall of 1925 and the fall of 1926 because they thought that the Liberal party stood for freedom of conviction, for freedom of speech, and for freedom of action, will be just as prepared to vote against that party the moment they find that such appeal to their sense of honour and sense of citizenship was misdirected. I have always believed, in matters of political as well as individual hygiene, that an ounce of prevention is far better than a pound of cure. In the past I was forced, wrongly perhaps, certainly against my taste and personal affiliations, to fight against the Liberal party, thereby assisting the Conservatives—Heaven knows there was no co-operation—in gaining ground in the province of Quebec. Now for my own sake as well as for the sake of my good Liberal friends I do not want those days to return. I had enough of them, as I believe my good Liberal friends had also.

While no doubt there is much in what was said by the Prime Minister and, before him, by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) as to the inconvenience of group representation, at the same time, as I have suggested privately to friends on both sides of the house, I believe that if parliamentary government is to ensure to Canada what it ensured to England in days gone by, and what it still preserves to the people of Great Britain, there must be found some combination between the principle of free representation of all classes and groups, call them what you will, the free representation of all currents of opinion, of all interests, great or small, in every part of the Dominion, and the principle of stability of government for which the Prime Minister rightly stands and for which I stand just as firmly. But is it true, as was suggested yesterday, that the two party system is indispensable to proper parliamentary government?—that it is impossible to have stability of government without the house and the country being divided into two camps? I pay tribute to the Prime Minister's wide knowledge of history, his broad mind, and all the fine marks of scholarship which I have admired in him ever since he came back to this country as a young man; and I have followed his career with considerable interest. I was surprised, therefore, to hear the right hon. gentleman express the opinion that the two party system or, as he put it, the system of government now in vogue in Canada, has stood the test of the centuries in England. It is the very opposite. Study the glorious history of British parliamentary institutions, from the early days of the Witenagemot, transplanted to England from the soil of Saxony, down to the great revolution of 1646 and later to the less bloody though more significant revolution of 1688, and you will discover that in all this time the principle of class representation or, if you prefer the expression, the recognition of the needs of all classes, was vindicated by the free action of a free parliament long before there was any such thing as a two party system or before any cabinet existed. Not a revolutionary, not a jurist, but a conservative-minded man like Lecky pointed out some thirty years ago that in the evolution of representative government in Great Britain, from the days when the armed and privileged leaders of the masses, the noblemen, wrested from a tyrannical king, first, the primary rights of the aristocracy, and then those of society at large, as an annex to the aristocracy, until the time of the triumph—I will not qualify it—of so-called democracy, the distribution of power has been continually maintained in the balancing of political influence among certain classes of the people or among the people as a whole, but that in our days that balance is threatened by the usurpation of all powers by the cabinet.

One of the things by which I have been brought, French as I am by origin, to a sincere though not servile admiration for the British system of government, is precisely the fact that there is no finality in that system. Every nationality within the empire, whether English, Scottish, Irish, French, Dutch, or Italian in origin, which voluntarily acknowledges the king as the emblem, if you will, of the sovereignty of its nationhood, can commune with men of English extraction in the gradual evolution of government, and can bring its contribution to that system. I admire the British system for the very reason that it is at once broad and supple enough to survive all reforms, and to adapt itself to the genius of every race within the British commonwealth, without fear of any of its basic principles being destroyed. As the descendant, either of those Normans who introduced into England some of the features of that form of government, or of four generations of Canadians who have lived under British institutions and helped in moulding the form of government in this country, I cannot endorse the words of the Prime Minister that the present system, under Mr. Baldwin or under any other gentleman who may be at the head of affairs in London or Ottawa, has reached the point of perfection. There is ample room for improvement.

Not only is the two-party system a modern excrescence of British parliamentary institutions, but it is one that cannot last. Indeed, it has ceased to be in England. Under what conditions was it born? Every schoolboy who has studied the history of Britain knows that the two-party system of government had its origin in the transmission of sovereignty from a Scottish royalty to a German dynasty imported from Hanover and enthroned in the seat of the Stuarts. These Hanovers were good fellows enough but they did not speak a word of English; they could not communicate with the British people. A man of genius, though not afflicted with too many scruples, Robert Walpole, created a new system in order to strengthen the Hanoverian dynasty and to discourage effectually the champions of the alleged rights of the Stuarts. Finding that he had to encounter the opposition and ill will of the Tory aristocracy, still firmly entrenched within the precincts of the House of Lords; finding also that he could not depend even upon the Whig lords to assert the rights of the people as against the rights of the lords, Walpole purchased a majority in the House of Commons and thereby brought about the real cleavage between the Lords and the Commons, at the same time laying and strengthening the foundation of the two-party system. The Tories and the Whigs were the successors of the old Jacobites and of the Independents or Covenanters. It is therefore no exaggeration to state that the two-party system was born in iniquity, as the result of a long civil war which had torn asunder the basis of government and social law in England.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And it has remained that way ever since.

Mr. BOURASSA: But thanks to the extraordinary genius of the British race, and to borrow the words of one of their greatest statesmen, a genius which is perhaps the more powerful because it is bound up with some degree of stupidity, the British people gradually adapted themselves to that system of government. They soon found out, however, that the two party system produced those things which were so deprecated two years ago and which have been deprecated ever since by opponents of the group system in this country; it produced corruption and log-rolling—to use modern phraseology—as between the two parties in the house and as between the organizers and vote catchers of the two parties among the people.

I pass over the period of the great crisis which accompanied and followed the French revolution and the Napoleonic wars, and come to the time when affairs came back to their proper level in England. A new power had arisen, which has made itself felt ever since the world over; that is the power of the rising masses, the tillers of the soil and the toilers of the factories, who in their turn asked for a place in the sun and for a share of the liberty wrested by the nobility from the crown and by the high middle classes from the nobility. Ever since that time the two party system has failed to exist in its integrity in England.

Then how can the Prime Minister or any hon. member of this house fail to acknowledge the tremendous services which have been rendered to modern England by the newly arisen parties? If to-day, after centuries of religious and civil intolerance equal to that which existed in France or in any other country, England is held as the classical land of liberty, it is due of course to some extent to the commonsense of the British people, but it must be also acknowledged that it is due to the struggle which was made by the representatives of the Irish nation who, from the time O'Connell broke the doors of the House of Commons and refused to take an oath which meant abjuration of his faith, forced upon the conscience of the British people religious tolerance and respect for all creeds. If to-day the toiling classes of England, after having been deprived of their elementary rights for centuries by the Anglo-Norman nobility, can have a pride in their British citizenship, it is due to a certain extent to the commonsense of the Liberal party of England, but where would the Liberal inheritors of the old Whiggish party be to-day if it had not been for the struggle which was made by the representatives of the working classes? If to-day English labour has the right to share in English citizenship, in English nobility and in English monarchy, is it not because of the fact that such men as John Burns, Kier Hardie, and Ramsay MacDonald, he the most illustrious of all living statesmen in England, supported by the growing strength of those who once and for so long were the subdued classes, have proven to the world that a labourer or a farmer may at times produce a political thought and a political strength which the time-serving politicians and classical parties have been unable to do.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the house at greater length; one reason why I have spoken, and the minor reason, was to show the house the result of those rules which were adopted in a somewhat hasty manner. I have asserted myself, not for my own sake, as I have already said, but rather to my extreme discomfort. I do not like to be disagreeable to my fellow members when I can avoid it, even to my good friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) who, by the way, is my best friend in this house, because every time he vituperates against me he brings more votes to me in my constituency. I like to be as nice as possible to all,—but I claim that every time even the humblest member of this house,—and I am one of the humblest individuals,—calls for the application of the rules indiscriminately as between parties and leaders, that man is working for the good of the house at large and for the good of every party in the house.

My second reason for speaking to-day is because, with the ideas, the principles and the ideals to which I have devoted my life at the expense of all political honours and comforts, and with all the friendship I have for the Prime Minister, I could not let pass that assertion of the tumbling-down party system of government, the complete failure of which both parties may delay for a certain time, but which they cannot stop. Something else will take its place. I do not find fault with the arguments brought forward by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways; although perhaps out of place and time, I believe they were valuable contributions, to what should be one of the chief concerns of all people in different parts of this country. Last summer, from Halifax to Vancouver, I expressed the hope that every individual in every community in this federation of ours would devote more time and study to these great problems, because if there is one feature of our social and political state in which we have fallen far below the great traditions of the British nation, it is in the disinterestedness of many of our people. I might even call it the social aloofness with which all too many of our professional and business men, our farmers and our labourers look upon the great problems of the nation; it is the facility with which all classes and groups, if you wish to so call them, disassociate themselves from the general interests and the future of this country, relying upon this man or that man, this group or that group, this leader or that leader, to settle the affairs of state for them. Sir, if we want to preserve in Canada the essential characteristics of a nation, with the great moral and political inheritance we have received from the two great countries which have contributed the most of our population, and if at the same time we want to look to the future with optimism, strength of will and the determination of purpose which is characteristic of a young and growing nation, we must be at once Liberal and Conservative, but we must have also an eye to the aspirations of all groups; racial groups if you like, provincial groups, or class groups, who find rightly or wrongly that the Liberal gospel or the Conservative doctrine is not sufficient to meet their desires.

I venture to predict that the first of the leaders of these great parties who understands the situation and leaves the narrow trail of party shibboleths, party traditions, party slavery and party narrowness of mind, to associate himself and his party with the growing aspirations of all Canadians, east and west, of old French or English stock, or those newcomers to whom we owe a duty to welcome as brothers in this great family, will become in very truth the leader of the nation. The party and leader, I repeat, that will not go counter to these groups or classes, but will be prepared to receive the expressions of opinion of all and give them a sympathetic hearing without asking them to pass under the yoke of party allegiance or so-called party co-operation, will be the party and the leader of to-morrow. That leader will be the man of to-morrow and the leader of Canada, because he will have shown himself capable of understanding the hopes of this young giant nation that refuses to be shackled by the shibboleths and traditions of old countries, respectable though they may be, which do not fit our present state of mind, and which will not harmonize with it in the future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend takes his seat I wish to correct what appears from his remarks to be a false impression he has gathered as to the purport of what I said last evening. I was not attacking group government in what I said, and I was not seeking to emphasize the importance of the old political parties. What I was taking exception to was a theory of representation put forward by the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) to the effect that a member is elected to parliament as a representative of a class. To make my meaning perfectly clear, my hon. friend in order to take the same position would have to stand in this house to-day and declare that he is here to represent the journalists of Canada because he is a journalist and belongs to that class. His whole speech this afternoon has been an assertion of the position I was taking last night, namely, that an hon. member is not here to represent a particular class whether it be agricultural, professional, labour or other, but is here to represent all of the people regardless of the particular class to which he may belong.

Mr. BOURASSA: I take advantage of the five minutes left to me to tell the Prime Minister that I could not read over his speech of last night, because owing to the incorporation of so much printed matter in it, Hansard was not distributed until five minutes before the house convened. I agree largely with what the Prime Minister has just stated, but I claim that he has not put the question fully and completely. Every member of this house is bound, of course, to do justice to all classes; but the representative of a rural community is naturally obliged, because of the character of his constituency, to give more attention to rural interests. The representative of a labour community too, such as my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père), is bound to pay more attention to the interests of the people who send him here. As a matter of fact, we have, as representatives of constituencies, to take into account the desire of the particular classes who make up the majority of these constituencies. As to what the Prime Minister has said with respect to representation of a class, I have always opposed, for example, the idea of calling one of the members of the government, Minister of Labour.

Mr. KAISER: Mr. Speaker, when is it considered that a member's speech is concluded? My understanding is that when a man resumes his seat his speech is over.

Mr. SPEAKER: My hon. friend's theory is correct. In the present instance, however, when the hon. member for Labelle sat down the Prime Minister explained to the hon. member that the latter had probably misunderstood the speech he had made the previous night. According to my understanding the hon. member for Labelle made an explanation upon this point. In any event the hon. member's time has expired.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Robb) which was agreed to on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

SETTLEMENT OF WESTERN LANDS

PROPOSED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE AND FAVOURABLE TREATMENT OF CANADIANS

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechase) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, citizens of Canada desirous of settling on western lands should receive from the government of Canada the same assistance and favourable treatment as the citizens of Europe.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Immediately following the motion you have just read there is one standing in my name. This motion of mine was discussed on the 16th day of February, the discussion starting in the evening about 10.35 and continuing until about eleven o'clock. Discussion of that motion having already commenced, I claim that it should take precedence over the motion you have just read to the house. In the discussion that took place that evening the right hon. the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

As the rule now stands, this resolution becomes the first order the next time these motions are taken up.

Whatever the interpretation of the rules may be, I think that a motion that has once been called and discussed should have precedence over any other motion on the order paper. That is what occurred in the case of my motion. If the rules are such that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) has the right to proceed now with his motion, I think there is something wrong with the rules. Under the circumstances I think that my motion should have precedence over that of the hon. member.

Mr. BOULANGER: I would not have any objection to allowing the motion of the hon. member to take precedence over mine.

Mr. HEAPS: I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. gentleman, but this is a question of the interpretation of the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 27 says:

If at the hour of six o'clock p.m. on a Wednesday, or at the time of the adjournment of the house, a motion on the notice paper be under consideration, that question shall stand first on the order paper of the following day, next after orders to which a special precedence has been assigned by standing order or order of the house.

Under the rules, the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse stood ahead of the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg. When by the effluxion of time the hon. member was interrupted by the operation of the eleven o'clock rule, his motion was kept where it was when it was introduced. The motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse did not lose its rank on the order paper. The hon. member for Bellechasse was entitled to have his motion called, and if not proceeded with on that day, to have it called in its place upon another occasion. That occasion has arisen to-day, and if the hon. gentleman does not proceed with his motion now it will go to the foot of the order paper. It stands now where it ought to stand.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I was a member of the committee that revised the rules, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think the committee had any such intention. If there are thirteen or fourteen orders called, as has often been the case in this house, should all these orders take precedence over an adjourned order when six o'clock comes on Wednesday? That is the question. I do not think so. Here is a case where one order was ahead of the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg, the debate on which was adjourned according to the rules of the house at eleven o'clock, and if the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse has precedence over it, then all orders called previous to it on that day would have the same precedence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 52 says:

When a private member's notice of motion shall have been twice called from the chair—

The motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse has been called only once. To-day is the second time of its calling. It is where it should be, at the head of the motions on the order paper. Because the hon. member for Bellechasse was not ready to proceed when the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg was called, his motion did not lose precedence, but if he does not proceed with his motion to-day, it goes to the bottom of the list.

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) that citizens of Canada desirous of settling on western lands should receive from the government of Canada the same assistance and favourable treatment as the citizens of Europe, I assure the house that my remarks will be as brief as possible, because, in the first place, the subject matter of this resolution has been mentioned by many speakers during the course of the debate which has just closed. Secondly, I should like to hear expressions of opinion from other hon. members representing the views of their respective portions of the country; and thirdly, the resolution explains itself, and it would be a waste of time to attempt to prove the obvious; for I sincerely believe that all true Canadians will see at once the desirability, the reasonableness and the necessity of the policy advocated in this resolution.

The question of immigration and colonization is at present, and has been for some time, very much in the public eye. The press of the country and public men in every party are giving it serious consideration from every possible angle. The cry is for more immigrants to increase the population of Canada, in order that our natural resources may be more extensively exploited, that our virgin lands may be made productive, and that our heavy burden of taxes and debts—due to our participation in the great war and to ten years of Tory maladministration—may be distributed upon a greater number of shoulders. It has occurred to me, and to many other people also, that upon the highly important problem of increasing our population there is grafted another, also of paramount importance—the problem of keeping Canadian citizens in Canada. The resolution which I have the honour to propose to the house for adoption has no other purpose than that of offering a solution to that very problem.

But before I go any further I should perhaps make it clear that in moving this resolution I have no intention to add to the miseries of our friend the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) and of his department; nor do I desire that the resolution should not be construed as a criticism of the policy of the government in regard to immigration and land settlement.

My intention is merely to afford the house an opportunity of discussing a question that all Canadians who love their country have very much at heart, hoping that the exchange of opinions will produce light and suggestions helpful to the hon. minister. A living example of what valuable assets immigrants can be to Canada—and there are many other illustrious examples in this house and in other branches of our national life—the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization, conscientiously and painstakingly, is devoting all his talent, experience and energy to a task which is very far from easy. Buffeted by different currents of opinion, he must say, as the fabulist, that it is impossible to please everybody and his own father. There are people in this country who are in favour of unrestricted immigration; they want the bars let down and a call sent to the four corners of the earth for new settlers. Others would favour only immigration from Great Britain, in order to preserve the British character of this country. In passing, may I express the view that it is about time for us to cease speaking of British characteristics in respect of Canada, and that we should try rather to give this country a Canadian character, a Canadian spirit and a Canadian soul. There are some who advocate the superiority of the Nordic races; whereas others think that with our hard climate and our difficult conditions of settlement the man in the sheepskin coat from Central Europe is the most suitable settler. Immigrants should be helped financially by the government to come here and to settle on the land, in the opinion of some people, but, on the other hand, we have men like the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote)—as he expressed himself last summer at a convention of Native Sons of Canada clubs—who are against assisted immigration of any kind, thinking that coddling and pampering of immigrants, principally boy immigrants, will not prepare them to be successful farmers. And finally, we come with this resolution saying: Before we bring immigrants here we must keep in the country the people who have been born here; before trying to fill up the barrel we must stop the leaks; that if we are going to have assisted and subsidized colonization we must first start at home with our own people, who should be more precious to us and more desirable settlers than strangers. Truly the position of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, confronted with all these conflicting opinions and advised and criticized by every organization, convention or synod in the land, must be a very trying one indeed. We should therefore assure him of our sympathy, and of our sincere desire to co-operate with him and give him credit for discharging his onerous duties with great ability and the ever present intention of doing his utmost for the good of the country.

I also might be permitted to say that in moving the resolution under discussion I am actuated by nothing but a very earnest desire to do a little good to my fellow citizens. I am one of those who think that getting immigrants, no matter how well selected—and I wish to commend the government for its declaration that proper precautions are taken to ensure the fitness of those who come here—is not half so important as to make sure that our still unoccupied land is properly settled and developed. Colonization carefully managed is what Canada needs rather than the immigration of large numbers. And colonization, especially colonization assisted with the funds of the people of this country, should, like charity, begin at home, with home material and with our own people, who for centuries have abundantly proved their worth as settlers.

For some time past the government has been spending large sums of money in accordance with what is known as the Empire Settlement Scheme to place immigrants from Great Britain and northern Ireland on Canadian farms. In virtue of that scheme, boys between fourteen and seventeen years of age are brought here at the joint expense of the imperial and Canadian governments; on their arrival, they are trained on farms or in agricultural colleges at the expense of this government, and when they are ready to go on the land they receive a loan which they may repay without interest over a long period. We saw in the press last summer that it is intended to spend $25,000,000—half of this being supplied by Canada—during the next ten years in furtherance of such plan. As to adult immigrants coming here with the declared intention of going on the land as the result of an agreement between the imperial government, the Canadian government and the transportation companies, they can come here for almost nothing, for they pay £2 to Halifax, St. John and Quebec; £3 to Montreal; £3.10 to Toronto; £4.10 to Winnipeg; £5 to Regina, Moose Jaw and Saskatoon; £5.10 to Calgary and Edmonton; £8 to Vancouver. Their children under seventeen years of age are transported free, that is, at the expense of both governments. The regular passage rates are reduced by £4. by the steamship companies, and the difference between the reduced rates and what is paid by the immigrants is furnished by the imperial and Canadian governments. The small proportion of the passage cost which the immigrant has to pay is even loaned to him in some cases when he cannot afford to pay it. After they land, immigrants are given after-care assistance by the Canadian government, estimated at £6 per head; and they are loaned money to buy land and start farming, the Canadian government being charged with the administration and collection of the loans.

What is this costing the Canadian taxpayers? The last report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, at page 47, states that for the year ending March 31, 1927, a sum of £304,714.19, roughly $1,500,000, was expended in bringing from Great Britain and northern Ireland prospective farmers, domestic servants who receive the same assistance as prospective farmers, and boys intending to become farmers. The report, however, does not state what is the share of this amount paid by the Canadian government, but it can safely be said that it is more than half of the total. I was officially informed last year that up to January 31, 1927, the empire settlement scheme had cost this government from its inception the sum of $1,146,887.59. I have under my hand a statement of the Right Hon. W. Ormsby-Gore, Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, who in the British House of Commons on July 11, 1927 said, in answer to a question, that during the year ending March 31, 1927, 19,573 persons had been sent to Canada under the British empire settlement scheme at a cost of £214,904, or $1,405,866, to Great Britain and £102,833, or $500,452.93, to Canada. I must point out that there is a remarkable discrepancy between the figures of the Right Hon. Mr. Ormsby-Gore and the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, as the latter states that 21,586 persons came to Canada under the scheme during the year ending March 31, 1927, instead of 19,573; and there is also a difference in the cost figures. If we add the amount paid by this government for selecting and transporting those immigrants here, together with what it has to spend to train them to become farmers and look after them when they have arrived, as well as place them we can safely say that each such immigrant costs more than $50 to Canada.

Some time ago, in answer to a question put in this house, the statement was made, according to press reports, that from the year 1921 down to the year 1927 there were brought to Canada 787,408 immigrants from Great Britain, the continent of Europe and the United States, at a cost of $7,204,986. We would not begrudge this expense were it not for the fact that in eastern Canada a great number of young men, born and brought up on the farm, are forced to abandon the cultivation of the soil and go to the cities or to the United States. We claim that these young farmers, with a little government assistance, could be restored to the land and would be ideal settlers.

In the section of the country in which I live, and which is the oldest in Canada we have a surplus of farmers and they are real farmers, not semi-ready farmers who have to be trained and afterwards cared for and accustomed to our climate, methods and conditions before being safely placed on a farm. Our old rural parishes and counties in the east, where all available good land has been long since occupied, are too small for our ever growing population and we are continually sending out emigrants; farms have already been subdivided to the extreme limit and we continue to raise large families. The result of this is that only one boy of the family can remain on the ancestral farm; the other boys have to move out. This is the case in my own family in which there are eight boys; one has taken the place of my father on the farm and the others had to follow less useful vocations than that of the farmer.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is there not plenty of available agricultural land in both Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. BOULANGER: I would not say that; I think most of the good farming land in the old provinces is already occupied. Fortunately, in the case of my own family, we all remained in Canada; but this is not always the case with eastern Canadian farmer families. There remain very few colonizable areas in eastern Canada and the surplus farmers' sons go to the cities, sometimes on this side of the border but very often on the American side, where they are lost to Canada. This attraction of the sons of our farmers by the industrial cities of New England, which are closer to us than western Canada, is a subject of much anxiety to every Canadian who loves his country, and it is quite natural to think of means to prevent the desertion of their traditional calling by such valuable citizens. Case after case has come under my observation, in my own and in the neighbouring counties—and I presume the situation is about the same in the maritime provinces—of young farmers, born tillers of the soil, brought up in the best traditions of our unsurpassed rural population, becoming lost in the great American cities near us. They have heard of the vast fertile plains of the west where hard work, of which they have no fear, and intelligent effort, are always sure of their reward; but, alas it costs a small fortune for eastern Canadians to go west and settle there and no benevolent government or colonization organization has been willing to offer them assistance of any kind. This emigration of our young farmers took quite an alarming turn a few years ago, but I must say that, due to the good administration which this government has given the country, and thanks also to the praiseworthy policy of a great Canadian, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Prime Minister of Quebec, in attracting capital to our province, in prohibiting the exportation of hydro-electric power, in encouraging the exploitation of our natural resources, and in creating industrial centres and new markets for our farmers, the situation is not so grave as it was, although still too great a number of young farmers, who cannot find land in the east, are obliged to expatriate. It is with a very great sense of satisfaction that I note, in the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, that during the last year 56,957 Canadians who had gone to the United States came back to the country they had abandoned. And at this juncture might I be permitted to thank the government for having place a sum of $50,000 at the disposal of the province of Quebec to repatriate its citizens.

But however satisfactory might be the repatriation and return of Canadians who found out that, after all, their own was the best country to live in, it seems to me that it would still be more satisfactory to prevent our own people from leaving us; and I am convinced that this very desirable end would be attained by giving young Canadian farmers, unable to find land in their own vicinity, the same assistance as is given others to go and settle on vacant land in western Canada. I repeat that we in the east are not against bringing in immigrants to colonize our undeveloped areas; we are not even against assisted and subsidized colonization, if we must have it. But we demand that Canadians should be given the first chance, that before we spend our money to place strangers on our land we must first try to place native Canadians there. It appears to me that such an enterprise particularly commends itself in these days, when we talk so much of the necessity of achieving Canadian unity and of creating a distinctive Canadian spirit and character. Prominent people like Colonel R. H. Webb, mayor of Winnipeg, and others, fear foreign domination in the Canadian west; they deplore the spread of communism, which certainly did not originate with our native population; they claim that 40 per cent of the criminals and 60 per cent of the people in asylums and sanatoria, are foreign born; they even pretend that immigrants, placed at great cost on land, desert and drift to the cities, where they displace our native workingmen, or to the United States, which was their secret destination from the start. But, sir, let us give our idle land to till and to cultivate, even if we have to assist them with public moneys to do so, to the descendants of those who came on the Hector, to the descendants of the British Empire Loyalists, to the descendants of those who came back to their ravaged homes after the "Grand Dérangement" and to the descendants of those who from the provinces of France, three hundred years ago, came without assisted passage or hopes of after-care, to settle on the shores of the St. Lawrence, and to roam this continent from the gulf of Mexico to Hudson bay and from Labrador to the Rockies. Let us place them on the land and they will remain; they have been doing so for centuries. They have inherited traditions of courage, self-reliance, perseverance and tenacity, and they need no training to become accustomed to Canadian life. You can trust them to work for Canadian unity and to help build a strong and vigorous nation, endowed with the qualities and characteristics of the two great races which have written their fame on the pages of our history and which are destined by Providence to achieve together the destinies of Canada. And if the time should ever come when it is necessary for them to defend the soil in which they have been rooted for generations, their past will be a guarantee that the heritage entrusted to their care shall not be wrested from them.

The idea embodied in the resolution which I have the honour to propose is not a new one, but I sincerely believe it is sound and one which it would be in the interests of the country to put into execution. It seems a fundamental necessity to do everything possible to conserve our rural population, that quiet, honest, sane, hard-working and clear-thinking rural population which according to Mr. Stanley Baldwin is the core and the source of the strength of the nation. Assisting farmers' sons, who cannot find land in the east, to take up land in the west is, in my humble opinion, one of the best ways of keeping our rural population and of maintaining the balance which must exist between city and country dwellers. It may be objected that provincial governments would look with disfavour upon the emigration of their citizens to another province, and that the federal government would not see the advantage of assisting the transportation companies or the colonization societies in moving these people from one place to another within the country. I do not need to point out, however, that the object of this resolution is to devise a means of preventing the surplus farming population from leaving not only their native provinces but Canada as well, and that provincial authorities would rather see young farmers go to western Canada than to the United States. As to the reluctance of the federal government to spend money in assisting Canadians to settle in their own country, I think we need have no fear on that score because last year the Minister of Immigration and Colonization told us he was working on a plan to help young Canadians who desired to become settlers. If the discusison of this resolution does no more than hasten the maturity of that plan, it will not have been in vain.

I have therefore the honour, Mr. Speaker, to move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I have no desire to take up the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, but it happens that there is a resolution on the order paper in my name, one part of which covers essentially the same points brought up by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), so it seems imperative for me to say something along this line.

The hon. member has made a fairly good case from his point of view and probably from every point of view in connection with equal treatment as between Canadians and foreigners. He has told us that there is no more land available for the increasing families of his own county, and that in consequence they are forced to go to the United States if they do not receive some preferential treatment in Canada. He also said, and I believe it to be true, that the members of his own family did not go to the United States, and for that he is to be congratulated. I doubt, however, if his neighbours could give the same testimonial as far as conditions in Quebec exist at present.

The hon. member also told us that the government of Quebec under Mr. Taschereau are endeavouring to place on the land of that province as many citizens as possible, and that they are succeeding to a great degree. The members of my hon. friend's family apparently did not take advantage of that opportunity, and no matter what similar opportunities may be offered by the province of Ontario or any other province having control of its own land, these will not effect the present situation at all. The fact remains that under the present system followed by this government there is preferential treatment for those coming to Canada from foreign countries as against the man born in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick or any other province of this Dominion. For instance, a Canadian going to Winnipeg from Toronto or any point adjacent to Toronto requires a much larger sum of money than is required by a settler coming from Great Britain to travel between the same two points. The Department of Immigration have established a rate for immigrants of £1 or $5 as between Toronto and Winnipeg. I wonder if the minister has any idea of the ordinary fare between those two points? Has he any idea of the difference between the ordinary rate for a farmer from Ontario or any young man going to the west to locate on the land and the rate for a man brought from Great Britain going to the same place? That is the essential point, and in addition there are various other advantages given to immigrants.

For a number of years we had a department called the Soldier Settlement Board, which was inaugurated for the purpose of placing soldier settlers upon the land. We will grant that the experiment was not altogether successful, but as time went on and the necessity for this branch of government practically ceased, that department was taken over by the Department of Immigration and Colonization. That is the situation today, and under the guise of soldier settlement various lands in the west have been improved, houses have been erected, land taken from soldier settlers has been improved and British settlers or other citizens satisfactory to the minister have been placed upon that land. The sons of our Canadian farmers have not had the same opportunity afforded them. That is one of the accusations I make, and I believe it to be true.

I do not desire to detain the house; if my motion should come up I am prepared to speak on it. The hon. member for Bellechasse has said that the government are spending $50,000 to bring back Canadians from the United States—presumably the government of Quebec. I should like to ask the hon. member for Bellechasse, or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or any other hon. member of this house, how successful that campaign has been. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave us figures with reference to the number of returning Canadians. Who has seen these returning Canadians? I come from an average progressive Canadian town, and we have lost many of our young men and young women to the United States. If I go into my own town to-morrow I cannot recall any returned Canadian who has resided for any considerable period of time in the United States, nor can the hon. member for Bellechasse either. Canadians, unfortunately, are not coming back from the United States, they are still going; and I believe that one of the principal losses from which we suffer, altogether outside our industrial activities, is the loss of farmers who are going to the country to the south just as other classes of the community are. Now as the hon. member for Bellechasse has very properly said we want to provide some means of keeping these farmers in Canada, and we should at least give them the same terms as we are offering to newcomers from other countries.

Mr. P. E. BOIVIN (Shefford): I wish to say only a very few words on the matter under discussion. First of all I congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) upon the case which he has presented in support of this motion, and the manner in which he has dealt with the problems which have to be faced not only in the province of Quebec but elsewhere in this country. I wish the house would take this question into very serious consideration, because it is a problem for which we have to find a solution, and one that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) should study very carefully.

I had not anticipated that this question would be brought up at this particular time and therefore I am not as well prepared to discuss it as I should otherwise have been. But I want to suggest a plan to which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization might give consideration and which he might find worthy of adoption in due course. To make it a success, however, this plan will involve the co-operation not only of all the members of this house but also of every business man and every newspaper in the country. I realize that it will be a big undertaking, but it is one which is worth studying. That plan is this: that the government establish training farms in every province of Canada, organized to train young men in farming in the same way that the Militia department train our boys in military affairs in camp. The men to be trained on those farms should be recruited just as we recruit our soldiers. Enlist the men for three years, bring them to these model farms, keep them there and train them in practical farming. After a certain period, when they have been thoroughly trained, settle each man on say 100 acres of land, in groups, and give them all the encouragement necessary to make that settlement a success. We should endeavour to keep in this country those of our boys who have been trained to a certain extent in farming and like the occupation, but who cannot stay at home because the homestead is not large enough. If young men of this type were brought to model farms where they could be trained and made practical farmers, Canada would gain to a tremendous extent.

Then again at periods when the country, perhaps, was not as prosperous as it is to-day and a certain amount of depression prevailed, you could take from the cities, men who complain that they cannot find work. You could say to them: Go and enlist on one of these farms, and you will at least get your living. If they turn out to be good, practical men, by all means locate them on farms and give them a chance to make a success of farming and become good Canadian citizens. If we pursue the course I have advocated we shall be able to retain many of our own sons in Canada, and they will not be tempted to leave the country and go elsewhere. If the Department of Immigration wishes to study this plan, I shall be only too pleased to co-operate with them in every way and to give them the benefit of any ideas that I have.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I have only one or two observations to make in regard to this motion and to the remarks offered by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). In the first place I want to say that I am in entire agreement with the tribute which he pays to the young farmers of the province of Quebec, a tribute, I presume, which will apply equally to the young men on the farms in Ontario. In intelligence, virility and energy I think I should be safe in saying that these young men are the equals if not the superiors of any settlers we could get from any other country. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is a weakness in this resolution which should be pointed out and I have risen for the purpose of doing so. The resolution says:

> That, in the opinion of this house, citizens of Canada desirous of settling on western lands should receive from the government of Canada the same assistance and favourable treatment as the citizens of Europe.

Why specify western lands? I venture the statement that we have hundreds of thousands of acres of just as good lands in Ontario and Quebec as the sun ever shone on, which have not yet been brought under cultivation. It seems to me, also, that there are advantages to the intending settler that can be offered in inducing him to go on unoccupied lands in Ontario and Quebec that cannot be offered to any settler going to the west. For instance, assuming if you like—and I make the assertion in the confident belief that I am correct—that we have hundreds of thousands of acres of just as fertile soil in Ontario and Quebec as there is in any province in the west, then a man who settles on a farm in either of the two former provinces has this advantage over a man who settles in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta: When he brings his farm under cultivation and has his products ready for the market, he is within twenty-four hours of large centres of population like Toronto and Montreal where he can sell those products to advantage. I do not admit for one moment, nor do I believe that any person else who has travelled over this country to any extent will admit, that the soil in western Canada is one whit more fertile or better adapted to agriculture than is the soil in Ontario and Quebec. I repeat there are advantages in Ontario which I believe the men in the western provinces will come to realize in the very near future, and I would ask my hon. friend therefore if he is prepared to extend the scope of his resolution and ask this government, or any government that may be in power, to give assistance to those in western Canada who might desire to come east and settle on vacant lands in Ontario and Quebec. Because I assume that the time will come when the western people will become aware of the advantages I have indicated, and will be anxious to take advantage of them. Why should not people leave cities like Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, and even Saskatoon and come down and settle on some more splendid lands in New Ontario, or on some of the vacant lands in the province of Quebec? Why ask the government to adopt a scheme giving special help to those who want to settle in the west? I am not depreciating the advantages of the west but I rather think that a little too much attention has been directed to the west in our immigration efforts to the detriment of the older provinces of Canada. These provinces, I think, have been overlooked to a large extent in our immigration and colonization campaigns in this country.

The resolution, no matter what may be said in favour of it is defective and weak in that it specifies that as regards Canadians who desire to settle on the land, assistance will be given only to those who are going to the west. I see no reason for specifying that and I do not think such a scheme will work out in practice. Very soon other provinces would be asking the government to give the same assistance in bringing people from the west or the extreme east for settlement in the central provinces.

There is just one other thought that I should like to add to this for the benefit of my hon. friend who introduced the resolution and who, in introducing it, very naturally, though very incorrectly, paid a tribute to the government of the day. Might I point out to my hon. friend that there are very definite reasons, other than the ones that he mentioned, why the boys are leaving the farms of Quebec and Ontario. This government has adopted a policy to discourage our boys in Ontario and Quebec from going on the land. What particular branch of agriculture will a boy take up? Will he go into dairying in the face of the attitude and action of this government in adopting the Australian treaty? Has he any encouragement along that line to go into dairying in this country? Will he take up gardening, raising fruits and vegetables in the face of the attitude and action of the government in placing every possible obstacle in his way to make a success of it? Will he be encouraged to go into the sheep industry in this country? Not under the policy followed by this government. So I would appeal to my hon. friend who introduced this resolution, I am sure, honestly, conscientiously and believing in what he is advocating, to direct some of his logic and eloquence towards the members of the government and to endeavour, if possible, to induce them to see a little reason and to adopt a policy which will offer encouragement and not discouragement to those on the land in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) must have been inspired to bring forward this resolution and he is to be congratulated upon the splendid speech that he delivered to this house in support of it. I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). He commenced by saying that he concurred in the argument brought forward by the hon. member for Bellechasse and he admitted that our young men in Quebec and Ontario were certainly as worthy individuals as the foreigners who are brought to this country.

The problem of immigration has been discussed in this house for many years and all governments of late years have paid a great deal of attention to it. But it has been found and admitted that, although enormous sums of money have been spent in order to promote immigration, the results that were expected did not ensue. A great improvement in immigration has been noticeable, especially since the present government has been in power, and the great efforts made by the former Minister of Immigration and the present minister have been fruitful. I want to say to the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington that he should not send forth the whispers of death as he did a few minutes ago when he took advantage of the discussion of the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse to state that our young men, whom we wish to establish on our farms in the west or in Ontario and Quebec, would have no reason to stay in this country or, if they had gone away to the United States, to return, because they could not make a living in Canada on account of the policy of this government. I wish to protest against the attitude of the hon. member as revealed in that statement. Instead of making such a statement he should join hand in hand with the hon. member for Bellechasse and support this resolution in the same spirit as it has been introduced in the house.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house at length upon this question, but it seems to me that in a small way it will supply something that this country needs very materially at the present time, and that is work. One thing that to my mind is wanted in Canada to-day is work. It has been my unpleasant duty now for many years, almost weekly, sometimes almost daily, to write medical certificates for people in my riding, boys off the farm and from other places, who are going to the United States largely because there is not work for them in this country. We might just as well admit this fact and we deplore it as much as anybody. They are going there and during the last three or four years I have not run across a single one that has returned. My sister's family consists of five children and four of them are in the United States making a living, although they would much prefer to live in Canada if they had equal opportunities. It is the duty of this country and, of course, of the present government, to supply every means possible to give our people work. I have not been able to understand why the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) will give greater facilities, greater encouragement, to people from Europe, than he will to our own people when they are almost daily leaving this country in search of work.

I regret also that the government have discontinued giving assistance to our soldiers. That scheme, launched as it was under great stress and difficulties, was a success, everything being taken into consideration, and I think it points the way for helping to keep our boys at home. I agree with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) that there are still great opportunities in Ontario and Quebec and I am going to throw out to the government the suggestion that they can keep people on the land profitably in other ways than by having them grow grain or raise stock. I have spent some time in the last few years investigating fur farming in the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec. In that country there are admirable locations for that business, and in my belief a man who goes upon a fur farm where the conditions are suitable can get a greater revenue from it than he could from any farm in the west or in the older parts of Ontario on purely agricultural land. The possibilities are greater, and more than that, it is something new, comparatively speaking. In northern Ontario and Quebec there are timbered lands and lakes and rivers and swamps that are admirably suited for this purpose. I wonder how many members of this house are aware of the rapidity with which rats, for example, multiply. They will have four or five young ones at a litter, and four or five litters a year, and those rat skins are worth from $2 to $2.50 each. The rats feed themselves, and all you have to do it to see that the conditions are favourable, and weed out their enemies. That offers a possibility for the government and the people of this country to develop a new industry that would be very profitable indeed to Canada. It has this further advantage, that the character of the country best suited for the purpose is the least valuable as a rule for agriculture, and once the timber is taken off, the land has practically no value at all. Anyone who has travelled over northern Ontario and Quebec must have seen large areas of land which to-day are practically worthless for agriculture, but which could be utilized in a scheme of this kind, giving employment to tens of thousands of people, who would make a better living from it than they could from agriculture simply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the house adjourns, I should like to advise my hon. friends as to the procedure for tomorrow. It was understood that when the Finance Minister introduced the budget and spoke on a Thursday, private members would not be deprived of their right to an equivalent amount of time on some subsequent Thursday.

Mr. ROBB: They do not want it to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government's intention was to give to-morrow afternoon to hon. members as private members' day, and then to go on with the regular Thursday proceedings in the evening.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be convenient to-morrow, and I gathered from what the Minister of Finance said that he desired to-morrow afternoon to proceed with his resolutions. We are quite agreed that he should do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then if that is agreeable to all parties in the house, we will go on with his resolutions to-morrow.

Mr. SPENCER: Providing, of course, that the arrangement as to giving private members an equivalent amount of time is adhered to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is understood.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 15. 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication from His Excellency the Governor General:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

WILLINGDON.

Government House,
Ottawa.
10th March, 1928.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SULPHATE OF AMMONIA FOR EXPERIMENTAL FARMS

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South):

1. Has any order been given by the Department of Agriculture for the purchase of a quantity of sulphate of ammonia for the experimental farm at Kentville, N.S?
2. If so, to whom was such order given?
3. By whom were such goods supplied?

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. 2. and 3. No. The Barrett Company of Toronto through the Dominion Iron & Steel Company of Sydney, N.S., have forwarded 2,250 pounds of sulphate of ammonia, free of charge, for trial on the illustration stations in Nova Scotia.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. WHITE (London):

Upon his superannuation a civil servant is paid a superannuation allowance of a certain percentage of his salary based on the last three years of his service. Is it possible under the present act, in the event of a lower salary having been paid for one or more of the final years, for a civil servant to choose any three consecutive years of his service to form the basis of his superannuation?

Mr. ROBB: The Civil Service Superannuation Act (chapter 24, revised statutes, 1927) provides that superannuation allowance shall be based on the average salary of the contributor during the last five years or ten years of his service, depending upon which part of the act applies. The act further provides that in the case of a contributor to whom part III applies, that is, one who on July 19, 1924, was subject to the provisions of part I of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, his allowance shall not be less than that to which he would have been entitled if he had continued to be subject to said part I of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. Under the provisions of that act, the basis is the average yearly salary during the last three years of service. In no case is provision made for a civil servant to choose particular years for the purpose of determining the average salary to be used as a basis of superannuation allowance.

*INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

Does the government propose to reorganize the International Joint Waterways Commission in harmony with Canada's present status?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With permission of the house I should like to answer this question orally. The appointment and procedure of the International Joint Commission is at present in substantial harmony with Canada's national status. Article 7 of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909, under which the commission was constituted, provides for the appointment of the Canadian members by "His Majesty on the recommendation of the Governor in Council of the Dominion of Canada." The governmental references to the commission are made by the Canadian government. I have used the words "in substantial harmony" for the reason that as a matter of fact there is the use in several places in the treaty itself of the terms "the United Kingdom" and "His Majesty's government" where if the treaty were now being drafted the term "His Majesty" would be used instead. In many articles of the treaty reference is made direct to the government of the Dominion of Canada, but there are three instances in which it is ambiguous. When I give my hon. friend those instances he will see in a moment that any ambiguity has been removed by the understanding reached at the last Imperial conference. Article V of the treaty reads:

> The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the province of Ontario, may authorize and permit, etc.—

The words "United Kingdom" would be out of place in any drafting of a treaty to-day between the United States and Canada, and it may be taken as now being the fact that the words "His Majesty" are the words that are signified in that particular.

Article VII reads as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree to establish and maintain an International Joint Commission of the United States and Canada composed of six commissioners, three on the part of the United States appointed by the President thereof, and three on the part of the United Kingdom appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Governor in Council of the Dominion of Canada.

In this section as will be seen the words "United Kingdom" occur again. If the treaty were being drafted to-day the words "United Kingdom" would not appear, but the words "His Majesty" would appear instead.

Article X reads as follows:

> Any questions or matters of differences . . . may be referred for decision to the International Joint Commission by the consent of the two parties, it being understood that on the part of the United States any such action will be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and on the part of His Majesty's government with the consent of the Governor General in Council.

The words "on the part of His Majesty's government" would read to-day in a redrafting of the treaty "on the part of His Majesty." I submit, however, that in view of the following statement which appears in the report of the Imperial conference of 1926, it is scarcely necessary to redraft the treaty in order to have it conform to the status of Canada as laid down at the last Imperial conference, although in some particulars this might be desirable:

> We propose that it should be placed on record that, apart from provisions embodied in constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs. Consequently, it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's government in Great Britain in any matter appertaining to the affairs of a dominion against the views of the government of that dominion.

So with respect to the International Joint Commission having regard to the procedure set forth at the last Imperial conference and the practice to be adopted in accordance with that procedure, any matter relating to the commission would be dealt with by His Majesty on the advice of his Canadian ministers. Wherever the treaty makes a reference to His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, it would be understood, in accordance with the practice as now laid down, that this would mean His Majesty's advisers in Canada in so far as the matters have to do with Canadian domestic or external affairs.

There is one point I should like to clear up because I have seen some mention in the press of an intention on the part of the government to make some alteration because of the change in Canada's status. There is no intention to make any changes. Some time before the last Imperial conference, a communication was sent to the British government asking their opinion as to whether, in the event of an appointment being recommended by His Majesty in council in Canada, the wording of the treaty which nominally places the appointment in the hands of His Majesty's government in Great Britain, would be construed as in any sense giving that apointment to His Majesty's government in Great Britain rather than to His Majesty's government in Canada. The reply which was received was to the effect that most certainly the King would be advised in these matters by his Canadian ministers and not by his ministers in Great Britain. Since the Imperial conference with respect, for example, to exequaturs issued to consuls, the practice has been adopted of having them bear the signatures of His Majesty the King and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada where formerly they bore the signatures of His Majesty the King and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Great Britain. If to-morrow a commission were being issued to a new member of the International Joint Commission, it would be signed by His Majesty the King and would bear the signature as well of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada and not the signature of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Great Britain as was formerly the case.

RIDEAU CANAL

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Who owns the Rideau canal?
2. By what department is it administered?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The Dominion of Canada.
2. The Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Under whose authority is the Royal Mint operated?
2. Who makes the appointments?
3. Who pays the cost of operation?
4. What was the cost of operation last year?

Mr. ROBB:

1. Authority was given for the establishment of the Ottawa branch of the Royal Mint by royal proclamation dated 2nd November, 1907, and the operations of the Ottawa mint are conducted in accordance with the provisions of the proclamation referred to.
2. The Lords Commisisoners of His Majesty's Treasury.
3. Government of Canada.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CAHAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Làwrence-St. George): As a private member, and acting in that capacity only, I wish to call the attention of the house to what I regard as a matter of privilege, because it seems to me, subject to your opinion, Mr. Speaker, to be a breach of or infringement upon the established rules and practices of this house. I refer to pages 1301 to 1320 of the Commons' Hansard for March 13, 1928, containing tabulated statements presented to the house by the Prime Minister during the course of the debate on the amendments to the motion to go into committee of ways and means. I do not wish to deal at length with the previous decision of the house, in which decision the Prime Minister concurred, as reported on pages 619 and 620 of Hansard of February 20, in regard to the matter which was brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not wish to object to the nature of the information which is very useful and serviceable to hon. members, but which I think could be brought to the attention of the house only by being laid upon the table as a financial statement emanating from either the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue. I am drawing this matter to the attention of the house because I think it is a breach of our rules and practices, and if it is to be persisted in, members on both sides, who have in the same circumstances exactly the same rights and privileges as the Prime Minister himself, will exercise that privilege, if it is to be established and recognized, in a way that will preclude the proper course of debate in this house, especially when such statements are presented in the closing part of the debate. I think it is a breach of privilege and I call it to Your Honour's attention.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to assure my hon. friend that the last offence of which I would wish to be guilty is a breach of the privileges of this house. I thought I was guarding against anything of that character when I asked the permission of the house to place on Hansard a somewhat lengthy statement with regard to which there was some discussion before the assent of the house was given to the request. Having received what I took to be the assent of the house I did hand the statement to Hansard.

Mr. CAHAN: The assent was not unanimous.

Mr. BENNETT: The house did not give its consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says: "The house did not give its consent." The house gave its consent at any rate by acquiescing. May I say however to my hon. friend, as I intimated in the course of the discussion, that I was quite prepared, if the house wished me to do so, to read the statement rather than to have it presented in tabulated form. It contains very useful and accurate information and as such was given to the house for the purpose of enabling hon. members to read for themselves something which they could perhaps appreciate more readily by reading than by hearing it read. I hope I have not offended, but I will say to my hon. friend that I will keep his counsel in mind and endeavour not to offend in the future.

Mr. GOTT: Is this a privilege that we can all enjoy?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) very kindly informed me of his intention to raise this question. Strictly speaking, according to the rules of the house, no one is allowed to place on Hansard a printed document which is not read to the house. An exception is made for the Minister of Finance and this year I have allowed the chief financial critic of the Minister of Finance to do likewise. When the question came up on Tuesday evening about this long document, the Prime Minister asked leave of the house and at first there was strong opposition to it. Then as will be seen on page 1282 of Hansard he said:

If the hon. gentleman objects, I am prepared to read them—

Speaking of the statistics.

—but I do not wish to read them at this stage. I will read them when I have concluded the main part of my speech. I would still ask my hon. friend if he objects to having the statement placed on Hansard.

Mr. Bennett: Your honourable friend has not yet objected; that is number one. Number two is that the observations made by the Prime Minister the other evening were so relevant to the action he is proposing to take, that I assume he will not himself entirely depart from them; but if he so desires, I am not offering any objection, and I have not done so.

The hon. leader of the opposition then went on to quote what the right hon. the Prime Minister had said on another evening upon the same subject, and concluded with these words:

His case is not a case within the exceptions.

Then the Prime Minister said:

I take it that my hon. friend would really like to be reassured in the matter of what the government has done, and I will take the liberty of presenting this to Hansard and asking the house to allow it to be printed.

Mr. Gott: The increases too.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, I am quite prepared to give increases where there have been any worthy of mention.

I took that as a qualified assent to the request made by the right hon. the Prime Minister. Of course, I was not present when the document was sent to Hansard. I think it is rather bulky, and such a thing must not be repeated because it would violate the traditions of the house, which really forbid the printing of any such document in Hansard unless it is read.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Item 87b agreed to.

Customs tariff—192a. Pulp board in rolls not less than nine one-thousandths of an inch in thickness for use in wrapping rolls of paper: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What was the amount imported under this item last year, and who will benefit by this reduction?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Hitherto there has been no separate classification for this article. The United States rate is 10 per cent, and the reason for the change is that provision is made under their statute for a duty equal to that imposed by any other country against the United States product; for example, under the old rates, their tariff on the Canadian product would be 25 per cent. We are reducing our rate, and the United States rate will be reduced correspondingly upon our product going into their market.

Mr. KENNEDY: Who will get the chief benefit of this reduction?

Mr. ROBB: The Canadians who are employed in this industry will benefit very largely by the reduction, we hope.

Mr. CAHAN: Prior to the date of this new tariff, had there been importations of pulp board in rolls, coming under item 192a, from the United States or from Great Britain? Is there competition from the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear the previous explanation. There is no separate classification whereby we can determine the imports of this particular product, but perhaps my hon. friend will be interested to hear that we are making this change at the request of the gentlemen who are engaged in this business in Canada. They say it will enable them to get into the United States market, where they will have a corresponding reduction in the tariff rate.

Mr. HANSON: What is the minimum duty in the United States at the present time?

Mr. ROBB: Ten per cent, but their rate will be made whatever ours is.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that clear that their rate will be whatever ours is?

Mr. ROBB: My information comes from the gentlemen who are in the business, who have requested this change. Our officers have checked up the information they have given us and find that it is quite correct.

Mr. HANSON: Is this provision in the United States for making their rate conform with ours a regulation under their tariff board, or is it in a statute, and is it a permanent provision?

Mr. ROBB: It is under their statute. Automatically under their tariff, their rate is made to correspond with that imposed by any other country. If we put a rate of 25 per cent against the United States, they put a similar rate against us.

Mr. HANSON: They have power to raise their rate of their own free will without reference to congress, I suppose?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure of that.

Mr. HANSON: I am.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to this item?

Mr. HANSON: No, I do not; I welcome it

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the way to put it. The position is this: Should there not be added to this item a provision such as the United States has in its tariff, that if they take action to increase the duty, we by order in council may effect the same purpose? That is the only observation I have to make in respect of this item.

Mr. ROBB: That is a question of policy.

Mr. BENNETT: It is for you to say, not us.

Mr. KENNEDY: Are there not records in the department showing the amount of imports under this item last year?

Mr. ROBB: I have already told my hon. friend twice that there is no separate classification whereby we can determine the importation of this particular product. It comes in under various other classifications.

Mr. KENNEDY: None whatever?

Mr. HANSON: Supporting what my hon. leader has said, I would point out that if we lower the duty to 10 per cent—with which I am in perfect accord, for I think it will help Canadian industry—and the United States put their tariff up, automatically ours should be raised too. I have no idea in the world that we should keep our tariff at 10 per cent, and they raise theirs next week, say, to 20 or 25 per cent, as they may do. The minister will remember that there are some very large companies in the United States making this very product, and they will naturally want their home market for themselves. I happen to know that the International Paper Company are large manufacturers of this very product in their United States mills. It may be that they will transfer that business to Canada—I hope they will; they are getting over here as fast as they can—but at the same time I do not think we ought to be caught in a position where our tariff would be reduced to 10 per cent and they raise theirs back to 25 per cent. That is very likely to happen. The danger is now being pointed out to the minister, and I hope he will act accordingly. I am not opposing the item in any sense, but I am directing the minister's attention to the danger of what may happen if we do not safeguard our position.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. ROBB: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: No, let it stand.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): What companies are making this product in Canada, and what is their output per year?

Mr. ROBB: I will get the information for my friend later on.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Has the minister ascertained that our Canadian industries will not be injured by this reduction?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend was not following me. Twice I have said that this change has been made at the request of Canadian industries.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest it is not clear that the change is made in the way that will best promote the interests of Canadian industry. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether making it in this form has met with approval, because I understand that there is nothing in the tariff statute of the United States which limits their discretion: they may, if this is reduced to 10 per cent, reduce theirs to 10 per cent, or they may increase it; but when there is a duty outstanding they can exercise their discretion and make their duty exactly equivalent to the Canadian or other foreign duty. All we are suggesting is that this item should take the form of permitting the Minister of Finance, and the government which he represents, in the exercise of their discretion, to reduce the tariff on this item if there is any satisfactory guarantee or understanding that the United States will reduce their tariff to a corresponding level.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has put the matter very succinctly, and I think the minister should give heed to what he has said. We ought not to place the ad valorem duty at so much, no higher and no lower, unless we have an absolute assurance that the United States are going to do the same thing. My information is that it is discretionary in the United States depending on the advice of the tariff. In other words, it is an executive matter, it does not come before congress at all. If they do it, well and good, I would welcome it; but I should not like us to put down our duty to 10 per cent, and the United States do nothing. That would be another sacrifice on our part to the United States. And there would be a good deal of opposition in the United States to any reduction in their tariff. I can warn the minister of that right now. The large interests over there will not welcome any reduction of the United States tariff. At the same time, if we can obtain that action by the United States I think we ought to do so. In my opinion the suggestion by the leader of the opposition is one that the minister ought to take into consideration and say now what he will do, rather than call the item "carried." There are members on this side of the house, I would remind him, who know quite as much about the pulp and paper and millboard business as he does.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the last observation of my hon. friend, I admit at once that there are gentlemen opposite to me who know very much more about the pulp and paper business of Canada than I do. I make no pretence whatever to being an expert in that particular field. The United States have already provided for an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent under their Tariff Act of 1922, paragraph 1302. I will read it into the record so hon. gentlemen will know just what position we will be in when this item carries:

> Paper board, wallboard, and pulpboard, including cardboard and leather board or compress leather, not laminated, glazed, coated, lined, embossed, printed, decorated or ornamented in any manner, nor cut into shapes for boxes or other articles and not specially provided for, 10 per centum ad valorem; pulpboard in rolls for use in the manufacture of wallboard, 5 per centum ad valorem:

My hon. friend will observe this:

> Provided, that for the purposes of this act any of the foregoing less than nine one-thousandths of an inch in thickness shall be deemed to be paper; sheathing paper, roofing paper, deadening felt, sheathing felt, roofing felt or felt roofing, whether or not saturated or coated, 10 per centum ad valorem. If any country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government imposes a duty on any article specified in this paragraph, when imported from the United States, in excess of the duty herein provided, there shall be imposed upon such article, when imported either directly or indirectly from such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, a duty equal to that imposed by such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government on such article imported from the United States.

Mr. HANSON: Let us have the same clause.

Mr. ROBB: That would be very nice for the government, and my hon. friend might like to see the affairs of this country run in that way; but I am not sure that the 245 members of this house are prepared to give the government—even this good government that we have now—power to make tariff changes in order to adjust conditions arising from day to day.

Mr. HANSON: The minister is very modest on that point. Since I have been a member of this house I can recall legislation that asked for a great deal more power than this proposal would confer on the government; I refer to the dumping provisions that were enacted at the request of the late Minister of Customs. No doubt my hon. friend remembers them very well. I think we ought to be safeguarded in some way, and I put it to the minister that it is his duty to see to it now. Furthermore, I would ask him why this item is limited to pulpboard in rolls. I know that is the common practice but I do suggest that there be no limitation and that paper cut in sheets be in the same category as pulpboard in rolls.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend may be right; I am not contradicting him. But this item was prepared by the men who asked for it and they are satisfied.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Who asked for the reduction?

Mr. ROBB: The secretary of the Canadian Pulp & Paper Association.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): What companies constitute that association?

Mr. ROBB: Probably there is a record in the department; I do not carry all these facts in my head. There are a good many companies and the association is growing day by day.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What amount of money will this item involve? Surely the minister must have some estimate in this regard or he could not prepare his budget at all. He may not know much about the tariff, as he says, but somebody must have given him an idea as to the probable loss in revenue; otherwise he could not have prepared these financial statements. How much does he estimate this item will represent to the pulp and paper makers? The pulp and paper makers of Canada are, I understand, very efficient gentlemen; why are they not making their own rolls?

Mr. ROBB: As regards the probable loss in revenue, I assure my hon. friend it will be very small. I may not be able to add very much to the subsidies of any of the provinces, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that we shall not lose much revenue.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad that the minister is coming a little closer to the point. A moment ago he was not able to tell us anything about the matter, but now he can go so far as to say that the loss will not amount to very much. What is his estimate?

Mr. ROBB: I have no record in dollars and cents but it will be very small.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is most unsatisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: If the committee would not consider it impertinent, I could give them a little knowledge of a personal character with respect to this item. Although I am not associated with the industry to any great extent, I have had occasion to study the subject somewhat closely. The truth is that this item does not affect in any way whatever imports into this country. The mills that sell newsprint manufacture their own paper with which to roll up their product. They desire, however, to send their rolls to the United States and there is a duty there of about 25 per cent. In order that they may be able to sell more of this paper in the United States it is necessary that this item should be reduced to 10 per cent if we are to take advantage of the American tariff according to the terms read by the minister. Unless this is done the American duty of 25 per cent will continue on exports to the United States. The question is not what we buy from them; it is a matter of enabling us to send our product to the United States. And to do this we must make the change in our tariff. We must conform to the conditions laid down if we are to secure the benefit of a lower duty on the part of the United States. That is the real situation. I would suggest to the minister, however,—because I still think it worthy of consideration—that he add to his item a provision which would ensure our right to maintain the higher duty should the United States not make it perfectly clear that we were entitled to the advantage suggested. I think the minister can provide this safeguard without difficulty. The point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) is, I think, sound, that the item should not be limited to rolls only, because a large part of the product is now cut in squares so as to be readily available for the purpose of rolling. I make the suggestion from knowledge that came to me under the circumstances I have indicated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am very much obliged to the leader of the opposition, as I am sure the committee is. We now begin to realize that this much heralded reduction in the tariff is really of benefit to the manufacturers of pulp and paper in Canada, on the one hand, and to the consumers of the United States, on the other.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Finance said so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Canadian manufacturer and the foreign consumer get the advantage. I hope we shall find some items in the tariff whereby the consumer in Canada is benefited.

Mr. CAHAN: I want to make clear to the minister just what we have in view. He has read to us one clause of the tariff. There are other clauses which enable the United States executive in its discretion to increase their tariff, and my sole suggestion is that if the object is to be attained, which the Minister of Finance has in view, there should be a provision that this 10 per cent of our general tariff which applies to the United States shall be maintained only so long as a corresponding tariff obtains in the United States, so that we may not be put at a disadvantage should the executive of the United States in its discretion withhold the same advantage from us.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend and I may not agree on questions of policy but I think we concur in the hope that both of us will be back at another session, and if we find that we are being discriminated against it will be within the power of parliament to make such changes as the government may recommend. But the fact is that there are practically no imports coming into the country.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that.

Mr. ROBB: The item now before the committee has been approved by the executive of the men who are actually in the business and who are looking for further trade in other countries. The reduction does not apply only to the United States; the item is reduced against the world. The reduction places us in the position where our goods will not be discriminated against in the United States, as they are at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest to the minister that by an adroit and slight amendment he could provide that our goods would not hereafter be discriminated against in the United States. That is the only suggestion I make. As to whether we shall both be back in another parliament, that is a matter of conjecture; we can only deal with the question the Minister of Finance submits to us to-day. For my part, I trust the hon. gentleman will long occupy a position in the public life of the country.

Mr. HANSON: I think the minister should accept the suggestion, which has been offered in a reasonable spirit. It is not in any sense a criticism of his action in putting the reduction into effect. I fully appreciate that it will be a good thing for the paper companies. I believe that within the past two years I have mentioned to the minister this very matter, suggesting that if he would reduce his item to a level of 10 per cent with the United States it would be a distinct advantage to the Canadian paper manufacturers and to Canadian workmen. The minister says that in the event of our being discriminated against the government can come back to parliament to rectify things. I would point out that there is a difficulty in having such remedies provided; if I know anything about it, it is very difficult to convince a government that it has made errors in matters of this sort. Without wishing to take up more time, I would ask the minister to let the matter stand so that we might give it further consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON: Who says no?

Some hon. MEMBERS: We do.

Mr. HANSON: I want to tell hon. gentlemen that they will not railroad any tariff changes without due consideration. I am not going to look for information on this subject from people who never saw a paper mill. I would suggest that a volume of trade might be built up to the exclusion of other volumes of trade and then, at the behest of the United States manufacturers, that government might act very quickly with the result that this trade would be lost to Canadian manufacturers and serious injury would be done them. Let us try to fortify our position in every reasonable way. I am not asking the minister to do anything unreasonable, but I do think the suggestions which have been made are worthy of more consideration than the minister has given them to date.

Mr. ROBB: May I recall to my hon. friend, who is possibly as well posted on the paper business as any person in this house, that in 1923 we made a change which will be found under item 768 of the customs tariff. This affected pulpboard and rolls for use in the manufacture of wall board; it has been in existence ever since and was put through for exactly the same purpose. No fault has been found with that change since that time. With regard to the policy of hitting him on the other cheek, as we may call it, if we are going to adopt a policy of that kind it should not be limited to paper products. It is a broad general principle which might be considered by parliament; it is debatable, but it is not now before the house at all. It is a theory proposed by my hon. friends, and our idea is that parliament should determine what should be done.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not a theory of your hon. friends' at all; it is practised by our biggest competitor.

Mr. BROWN: There is one point in connection with which I cannot grasp the argument of the hon. gentleman opposite. It is maintained that at present there are no importations under this item. What then would be the effect of that particular suggestion, if it were put into force? It could have no effect unless a trade were developed coming this way, but as long as the trade is all the other way, and we hope it will be all the other way, I cannot see how the change proposed by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) can have any effect at all. With reference to his other point, I imagine the United States would have the power to cut off the trade at any time, no matter what we put in our tariff. I cannot quite understand the practical effect of the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON: I would not like to undertake to make the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) understand anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: I resent that implication. The hon. member for Lisgar is endeavouring to understand this item.

Mr. KENNEDY: As I see it, the purpose of reducing this duty is to secure a reduction in the tariff on this paper going into the United States. If there is practically no loss in revenue, why not make it free all the way through?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends in that corner who oppose the budget do not agree with my hon. friends across the way, because hon. gentlemen opposite wish to put in a clause which will enable us to raise the tariff later on if necessary.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was thinking of the sensible thing to do from the explanation given by the minister.

Mr. BROWN: I might ask the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) what difference it will make if there are no goods coming this way. Has the hon. member the intellectual ability to answer that question? I was under the impression that it might be considered unparliamentary to say these things across the floor of the house, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has intimated on two occasions that certain members on this side of the house were wanting in the intellectual ability to appreciate certain points. Perhaps I might ask the hon. member if he has the intellectual ability to appreciate the point which I am bringing up. If there are no goods coming this way and if it is not likely any goods will be coming this way in the near future, what difference will it make what our tariff may be? I can understand the reason for the reduction mentioned in the budget, that it will afford our manufacturers freer access to the United States, but I would like the hon. member to explain a point which does not seem clear to me, as to the difference it would make either with regard to present trade or trade which may be developed if this particular clause were included in the tariff?

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member has given me a large order, but it is the trade which is "likely to be" with which I am concerned. That is a complete answer to his question. I know he will not understand that.

Mr. YOUNG (Northeast Toronto): Before the item carries I would like to ask the minister a question which might be applicable to this and to any of the succeeding items. Can he refer us to the report of the tariff advisory board, or to that part of their proceedings, which advises this measure? If so, we can then refer to the persons who applied for it or who gave evidence before the board in connection with this item.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. ROBB: No, I have taken the responsibility and the government are taking the responsibility for this change.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): Then this is a matter with which they have not dealt?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208d. Flake calcium chloride for road-treating purposes only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: This material is used largely for road-treating purposes. There is no separate classification of imports, but it is estimated that about 5,000 tons of this material are imported into Canada yearly. On that basis the reduction in taxation would amount to about $15,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is it made in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: As far as can be ascertained there is no flake calcium chloride being manufactured in Canada. In connection with this item I desire to move a slight amendment, which is required for shipping purposes. The word "flake" will be taken out, and the item as amended will read:

Calcium chloride not in solution, for road-treating purposes only.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then I would like to ask the minister two questions: Who are using this material in Canada, and if it is not made here from where is it imported?

Mr. ROBB: It comes largely from the United States and is used in all the different provinces for road-treating purposes, particularly to keep down the dust on gravel roads.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Was this item before the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): And is this a suggestion or recommendation from the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it is approved by the tariff board.

Mr. HANSON: How is the minister going to restrict the use of this material to roadways only? Is it capable of being used for any other purpose? I am quite sure it is, so how is he going to differentiate when it is being imported? He should limit it to importations by municipalities or others who are going to use it on roads; if that is not done it will be brought into the country free and used for other purposes. What safeguard have we in this case?

Mr. ROBB: Who is going to be hurt even if it is brought in for other purposes? It is not made in Canada.

Mr. HANSON: It might hurt someone who wanted to manufacture it. I suggest that the proper way to safeguard the public revenue in a case like that is to put your duty on, and then to give the municipalities a drawback. If you want to help them, and they are the only people you seem to want to help, that is the proper method to adopt.

Mr. ROBB: That is a matter of opinion. I have had representations made to me, I think, for three years now. It was finally submitted to the tariff board that there was very little of this commodity made in Canada; the change is asked for by all provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: By the contractors of the province.

Mr. ROBB: They may be contractors.

Mr. HANSON: I asked the Minister of Finance how he was going to protect the public revenue in the case of importations by those who are not using this material on the streets of municipalities.

Mr. BENNETT: The contractors are the people who want it.

Mr. ROBB: We are assured that this material is not used for any other purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Yes it is used for other purposes, it is used for medical purposes.

Mr. ROBB: Then the medical profession and the road people together will benefit from this $15,000 loss to the treasury.

Mr. HANSON: They cannot under this item.

Mr. CLARK: I suggest that the medical profession cannot benefit under this item because the material can only be imported for the purpose of roadways.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will have to reconcile his opinion with that of his deskmate.

Mr. VENIOT: During my experience of public works administration in the province of New Brunswick, we imported a considerable quantity of this material for road purposes. We did not allow the contractors in road construction to use this chloride; it was used by the government, under rigid engineering supervision, for the purpose of laying the dust on gravelled roads and no other purpose. It was not used until after the road was finished and handed back to the province by the contractor. Then the patrol crews used the chloride on the road, and I understand it is being used in every other province of the Dominion. At any rate that is the way we used it, and I know it is the way it is being used to-day in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it used in solution?

Mr. VENIOT: No, it is used in powder form. It is contained in tin or metal barrels containing about 300 pounds to the barrel. A barrel will cover a road 40 feet wide for a distance of about 200 feet. In some cases it is is distributed just as sand is distributed on icy streets in winter time, in other cases by machinery. The former plan is followed in New Brunswick. It is quite a help in preserving the road. May I say for the sake of information that when chloride is placed on the roads in the month of June no further application will be needed that year, and the following spring you can see the good effects of the material not only in keeping down the dust but in consolidating the gravel surface of the road.

Mr. TOLMIE: May I ask the minister if the change will permit the importation of lime required for disinfectants free of duty, and whether it will interfere with the manufacture of disinfectants in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Is there any calcium chloride manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I am told there is a very small quantity manufactured but not in sufficient quantity to be available for road purposes. It is a by-product of salt.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, it is a by-product of salt.

Mr. MALCOLM: I can inform the committee that there will be calcium chloride manufactured in Canada. One of the largest salt companies in this country intends to install a plant for the manufacture of this particular material, and they are not at all worried about it being admitted free of duty because the the cost of manufacturing it in Canada is just about the same as the cost of manufacture in the United States. In connection with the drawback of the duty on coal, we have been pressing for some years that the salt manufacturers in this country should be put on a parity with the salt manufacturers on the opposite side of lake Huron. This particular firm claims that it can manufacture calcium chloride in direct competition with the manufacturers elsewhere and I can assure hon. gentlemen that there need be no fear of American competition.

This firm is aware that calcium chloride will be admitted free of duty and they are perfectly satisfied that it should be.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Do the manufacturers intend to make calcium chloride?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is a by-product of the salt industry. They can manufacture it out of the common salt produced in the lake Huron district.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—208c. Xanthates, cresylic acid and compounds of cresylic acid, used in the process of concentrating ores, metals or minerals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 208c has been changed to 208e.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—219a. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 219a has been stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.; materials, n.o.p. for use only in the producing or manufacturing of preparations specified in this item under regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: Why the change?

Mr. CAHAN: I was going to protest against this item as it formerly stood because on the island of Montreal there is a very considerable amount of capital employed in the industry covered by the original item 219a, and I know that in the case of one establishment employing a very considerable number of people, those people would be thrown out of employment as the item originally stood. If I understood the reading of the amended clause aright, the regulations are subject to a department of government, which will obviate the danger to a certain extent. I am very glad because in my own city something like two hundred people would have been thrown out of employment.

Mr. KAISER: Are there any industries manufacturing these preparations?

Mr. ILSLEY: Unfortunately I was unable to catch the effect of the amended regulation when it was read by the chairman and it does not appear in the printed proceedings. I wonder if the minister is prepared to give some explanation. First of all may I state the cause of my interest in this particular item? I should like to know whether it includes solids which are used in the preparation of spraying material. Solids such as calcium arsenate and arsenate of lead are used by fruit growers who mix them with water, and with other ingredients and apply them in the form of sprays. I should like to be assured that this item as it now reads includes those solids. Possibly it is confined to liquid sprays only, but it would be well to have an explanation in regard to it.

Mr. ROBB: Under the original tariff it was for use only in manufacturing preparations specified in the item. The change has been made to enable the farmer, whether it be for his orchards or for his stock or for treating grain for smut, to import it and mix it himself into his own preparation.

Mr. BROWN: Will formaldehyde be included in this?

Mr. ROBB: Formaldehyde is a separate item.

Mr. KAISER: Are there any industries in Ontario that are concerned in the manufacture of these articles?

Mr. ROBB: I think there are a number throughout Canada, but the number of people who use the product is greatly in excess of those who manufacture it.

Mr. KAISER: That argument is something that I protest against, and I wish to protest strongly against this policy of destroying established industries. Let me read this extract from the Journal of Commerce of Canada:

The government have, therefore, decided to make free under all tariffs non-alcoholic preparations and chemicals for disinfecting, dipping and spraying.

As a result, the fruit growers will be better able to import their insecticides for spraying and dusting instead of buying them as heretofore from such institutions as the Deloro Smelting and Refining Company of Deloro, Ontario, which uses the arsenic ores of Cobalt and other Canadian deposits and employs Canadian labour.

This company has spent much on research and made heavy investments in plant which undoubtedly would not have been made had they felt that their protection against imports would be any less than that enjoyed by the producer of these imports. In fact, it was the excellent work which this company did in research, working in conjunction with the mining school at Queen's University, in an effort to find new uses for cobalt and arsenic, that started the Canadian people to consider favourably the expenditure of public money in order to encourage such research.

As the representative of an industrial centre I again lodge my protest against the action of governments who will not for one moment consider the efforts that these men have put forth in order to establish their business, in order to employ men, men who come to a centre, buy homes, establish themselves and then wake up some morning after this parliament assembles to find that their industry is injured and possibly their work brushed aside. We should at every opportunity, protest against this attitude of the government. As I understand the matter, the firuit growers appeared before the tariff board and asked for a seasonal protection against fruit being imported into Canada. The government of the day did not care to launch into a seasonal tariff, and probably with some justification, but something has to be done for these men. When a government is without a policy, just dealing with individuals, each individual must be fixed up in some way or another. These gentlemen were sent home and told: You cannot get any protection on your fruit but we will tell you what we will do; we will allow you to have brought free into this country some of these non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying. I consider that is a wonderful gift to hand out to people who are endeavouring to have their industry protected. Regardless of the fact that there were in Canada industries employing men, the government was to penalize them in order to protect a few men by some such means. As long as an industry is affected and as long as these industries are being disturbed by the action of government, as a representative of an industrial centre I intend to protest against this kind of thing. In this country we need work and we need homes. We must protect in some way or another these people who have launched into an enterprise after years of research and they should not be disturbed in this way. I desire to protest against this proposed change in the tariff.

Mr. ILSLEY: As representing a fruit-growing constituency where the people desire and appreciate these changes very much, I should at least express the other side of the question. I do not know how many are employed in the industry about which my hon. friend has been speaking, and I do not know whether that industry will be injured or not. I rather fancy not, but I know that reductions of costs such as this to the fruit growers of eastern Canada are very important and will be greatly appreciated. They affect not a few people but many thousands of fruit growers, and as representing the other side in this controversy, I want to say to the Minister of Finance that I appreciate very much what has been done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I heard the answer which the Minister of Finance gave to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), but I am not quite clear as to all it means. The clause that we are discussing states that the tariff will be administered simply under regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister give us some idea of what these regulations will be? I understand the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is very much alarmed about some plant in his constituency or city manufacturing non-alcoholic or alcoholic spraying chemicals, and so on. Does the minister propose not to levy that duty against imports of this manufacturing concern, or what is all this about?

Mr. ROBB: It is quite a common practice, as my hon. friend will see if he will go through the tariff, to prescribe regulations of the Customs department, regulations of the Minister of National Revenue. That is quite necessary in the administration of the act so that the officers will be able to follow the business and see that goods are admitted under a certain tariff for a specific purpose. For instance, certain products are made of which alcohol is a component part. We have an excise tax of ten dollars on alcohol, but if they are admitted for certain purposes, there is a different rate. I just offer that as an example. I am not sure what the regulations are. The Customs department have asked for this provision for the purpose of administration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are we to understand that under this item a manufacturer may import formaldehyde free?

Mr. ROBB: No. I said a moment ago that formaldehyde comes under another item.

Mr. BENNETT: What revenue will be affected?

Mr. ROBB: The imports for the year ended 31st March, 1927, are as follows:

Under the British preference rates..	$68,525
Under the treaty rates..	1,840
Under the general rates..	98,472

Or about $170,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the production in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I have no information on that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That last answer will perhaps explain a great deal. There is no information simply because this is going to affect a great many people. My hon. friend from Nova Scotia (Mr. Ilsley) pleads for the apple growers, but let me tell him and every other member present who is near a mining section, that this change affects them. It will also affect the great principle of research, towards the development of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is proposing to make a large contribution. The smelting people connected with the mining industry have been endeavouring to find some use for their arsenic and other by-products, and research work carried on by the Deloro Smelting Company has proven that arsenic, which is a product of many ores in this country, can be used in this way. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent by this company in research work in connection with this very product, and if the minister persists along this line he is going to interfere very seriously with research work in this country. Arsenic is contained in a great many ores, and it is a problem to ascertain the best use that can be made of it, a problem upon which the mining industry has spent a great deal of money in research, and at their own expense. Further, the research work carried on in the universities by this company will now be carried on in their own laboratories in the Welland district, and if this product is to be made free they might just as well discontinue any further research work along this line. So it is not simply a few men engaged in the mining industry who will be affected, but the whole mining industry of this country.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend starts from a wrong principle. He believes, I imagine, that because we reduce the duty, somebody else is going to come in. That is not the intention at all. It may mean, I admit, that there will be such competition as will compel the manufacturers to reduce the price to the consumers, but I do not believe that this is going to destroy the industry, or I would not do it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister has admitted that he knows nothing as to the amount that is produced in Canada, so obviously he cannot say very much as to the matter of competition. My point is that if you continue to reduce the duty, you will discourage the work of research. This change is very important and affects not only the few men engaged in this particular industry, but the whole mining industry in this country.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mine owners in northern Ontario are perfectly satisfied with this change, I would judge, after reading several mining papers in my section of the country. Anything that will reduce the cost of production will be greatly welcomed by the mining industry of Ontario.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Mr. EMBURY: As this change is going to affect the whole mining and smelting industry, as mentioned by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross) I suggest that the item be allowed to stand so that we may have an opportunity to study its probable effects.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is a reasonable suggestion to the minister.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): As this discussion has resolved itself into each member saying a word for his own constituency, I might be permitted to say that I have a lot of manufacturers in the constituency I represent who are making spraying materials. They import their own raw material. Every farmer who grows potatoes is a manufacturer of spraying material. He puts up the ingredients and manufactures the spraying material on his own farm. Particularly in the spraying of potatoes a lot of bichlorid of mercury is used, which they have to import largely from Great Britain, and the relief given by this item will be of real benefit in decreasing the cost of production of potatoes in Canada. Its benefit will be felt not only in eastern Canada but all over the country. Any farmer who is engaged in growing potatoes in a large way, if he is to be successful, must use spraying materials almost continuously. This is a very valuable crop in eastern Canada, and the relief given by the minister in this one item of bichlorid of mercury alone means a great deal to our farmers in eastern Canada.

I did not catch the changes that were read by the minister, and I would ask if they include materials coming in to be manufactured, as well as manufactured preparations.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In reply to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the minister said that in making this reduction on spraying materials he was thinking more of the large number of people who used these materials, than of the comparatively small number who are engaged in their manufacture. I would ask if the minister is prepared to lay that down as a policy and carry it out.

Mr. ROBB: We have gone this far at all events in carrying out that policy, and I observe that my hon. friend has not supported us. I would like to know where he stands.

Mr. EVANS: I understood the minister to say that he was arrogating to himself the power to bring these materials in free—

Mr. ROBB: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the object in splitting this item into 219a and 219b? The original item 219a reads:

Non-alcoholic liquid preparations for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Since this budget was brought down, we find that this item is apparently split into two, and the new item provides:

Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.; materials, n.o.p. for use only in producing or manufacturing preparations specified in this item, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Does this mean that the materials will have free entry only if they are to be used by manufacturers?

Mr. ROBB: No. I said distinctly when I was first asked what the change was, that this was for the benefit of the farmers who might import these materials and mix them on their own farms, as well as the producers.

Mr. KENNEDY: Then why is formaldehyde kept at the old rate? It has been withdrawn from item 219a and put in under an amended item at the old rates, 10, 15 and 17½ per cent; there is a reduction of 2½ per cent in the general rate. But why is not formaldehyde given the same treatment as these other materials and who asked for this change?

Mr. ROBB: Because representations were made to us. This is a non-alcoholic product; formaldehyde contains alcohol.

Mr. KENNEDY: No one drinks it. It is used for the same purpose treating seed grain against smut. If the minister cannot see his way to make this free, perhaps he will explain why the change was made and at whose request.

Mr. TUMMON: In view of the fact that a change has been made, and that we will not be able to peruse the item carefully until we get Hansard to-morow, I think the request of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. Embury) that it be laid over for a while is reasonable.

Mr. ROBB: I do not object to it standing if hon. gentlemen wish to consider it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the item is finally left over until to-morrow, let me reinforce the statement of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). If there is any class of farmer entitled to relief of this kind it is the man growing grain; he has to contend with frost, drouth, smut and other troubles. Now, formaldehyde, carbonate of potash and one or two other preparations we use, but formaldehyde is most commonly used in the west to keep grain from becoming smutty in the growing season. All I am asking for, in common with the hon. member for Peace River, is that the wheat farmer be not discriminated against. We are very glad that my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) got something for the fruit farmers, potato growers, and so on; but we say: Extend that all the way through; let us see the great generosity of the Liberal government this year; spread the benefit over to the man growing grain.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend making this request after consultation with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) who opposes it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not interested in the attitude of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. And it is not fair, Mr. Chairman, for the minister to attempt to evade a direct answer to a very fair question.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister state if the Mining Institute has expressed any opinion on this item? It has been said that the mining people from the north are in favour of it. I should like to verify the statement.

Mr. ROBB: Is it the non-alcoholic item?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Yes. The salts are made in solution for spraying potatoes, and so on, and are obtained from the products of certain ores, such as copper, arsenic, and so on. It is very important to mining development in the north.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend has studied the tariff changes he will have observed that they provide fairly well for the mining industry of this country—

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is no answer to my question.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend permit me? He will have observed that the tariff changes provide fairly well for the mining industry of this country. My hon. friend who represents, and represents well, the city of Kingston, offers some objection to the item; but my hon. friend down yonder who represents a mining district says the people are satisfied.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am perfectly satisfied that he has not gone into this item. If you will allow it to stand over until tomorrow some information can be submitted.

Mr. BENNETT: He says that it will stand.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, the Porcupine district is producing more mineral wealth than any other mining district in the Dominion. I have in my room newspaper clippings giving particulars of the developments there, and I shall be glad to afford my hon. friend an opportunity to read them. Then he will readily realize that all the mining producers of northern Ontario are perfectly satisfied with the reduction of tariff under this budget, for the simple reason that those reductions will lower the cost of production. I am speaking from personal knowledge, I know well the mining districts of northern Ontario, and I am in a position to say that that is the opinion of that section of the country.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item stand?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—219b. Formaldehyde containing not more than 15 per cent alcohol: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Mr. McMILLAN: When was that put in?

The CHAIRMAN: It is an addition.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the minister explain why this item should be kept dutiable when the other part of the old item is placed on the free list? I cannot see any reason why spraying or treating liquid of this kind should be discriminated against because there is a little alcohol in it. It is not for drinking purposes anyway.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right, it is not for drinking purposes. The house will observe my difficulty. We have just allowed the item which is free to stand at the combined request of both groups; now we come along to another item where the reduction in duty is 2½ per cent, and there is objection. The total imports, I admit, are not large, but a moment ago I gave the reason now asked for by my hon. friend: it is an alcoholic preparation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I beg to correct a misstatement on the part of the minister. The group in this corner never asked that the original item he submitted stand; hon. members there did.

Mr. ROBB: I am very glad to have that assurance.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We have a situation where non-alcoholic preparations for spraying, fertilizing, and so on, are allowed in free. But you have a commodity that was included in the original item now taken out of its setting and placed in a new item, 219b, described as "formaldehyde containing not more than 15 per cent alcohol." Why will not the minister allow that to remain in the original classification so that it may continue to come in free? We are certainly entitled to as much consideration in this regard as the fruit-growers, potato-growers, or any other people. We are up against a terrible problem in the west. The minister travelled through there last year when he did not see any smut; but I wish I could have him out there during threshing and put his nose near the machine. Then he would know what smut means, and, believe me, he would come down and put formaldehyde on the free list if he thought it would stop that smell. I want this new item to stand if he is not prepared to restore it to its old classification.

Mr. ROBB: I do not object to allowing the item to stand for consideration if my hon. friend wants to study it further. The next time I go west, and he gives me an invitation to meet his constituents when they are threshing, I shall be delighted to accept it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The invitation is given right now for next fall, and I hope there is lots of smut around at that time for his sake.

Mr. ROBB: No, no, you do not hope it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I say, for his sake—not ours.

The CHAIRMAN: Item stands.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, I look upon this item as direct discrimination. The preceding item is made free in favour of certain classes of primary producers who in their products are absolutely protected and their profit guaranteed under the acts of the government during the last two seasons; that is, by discriminatingly applying the dumping clause. But the wheat farmer pays a tariff duty on everything that he uses in his production, and he has to sell his product in the markets of the world. This is most unfair. If it was an oversight on the part of the minister, he cannot plead that excuse any more. We want to be put on the same plane as the other primary producers. It is only fair to the agriculturists of western Canada that they receive free of duty all the commodities they need in the production of wheat. But here is a case of direct discrimination.

Mr. ROBB: The item stands for further consideration. I may say frankly to the house that I considered this item rather carefully. I sympathize with the views presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, but they would have been in a very much better position to advocate their proposal to-day had they supported these measures as presented to the house yesterday when they thought the items were free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about hon. members opposite who also come from the province of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning)? Are they not interested? Are members of the Liberal-Progressive group not to be listened to? Are they dumb?

Mr. DUNNING: They can speak for themselves.

Mr. ROBB: They have already made representations to me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope the minister will take those recommendations into consideration.

Mr. ROBB: If I make such changes it will be more out of consideration of the support I had than of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: It was asked that the item stand—

Mr. ROBB: That was the previous item.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because it is a new item; in essence it is an addition to the item submitted by the minister in presenting his budget. That is the first observation I have to make. The minister is wrong when he asserts that the request to have the item stand was made on this side for any reason other than the fact that the item is a new one. The item has been presented to-day for the first time; we have not had an opportunity to study it; nor is there any printed copy of it. Strictly and technically speaking, therefore, he has no right to propose it to the committee. Let us have no misunderstanding about that. In the second place, let me say that I resent, as a member of this house, the covert threats of the Minister of Finance. I know that government has sunk to a low level in the country; I know that. I know that men cannot get a job who do not pay a dollar and join the Liberal association.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not so in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: We have answers on the records of the house with respect to an expenditure of $175,000 on that canal—answers in black and white. The statement is that if they had been in good health and had had a recommendation from one of the members of the constituency—

Mr. DUNNING: Which is different from what my hon. friend says.

Mr. BENNETT: In practice they were told that they must join the association. There are men within the sound of my voice to whom they came to borrow a dollar to join. And it is not confined to this city or province, for I received yesterday a letter from Gaspe on behalf of a poor returned soldier who could not get a job on the wharf this summer because he could not get a letter from Mr. Marcil—

Mr. POWER: Mr. Marcil is not the member for Gaspe.

Mr. BENNETT: Bonaventure.

Sir EUGENE FISET: There are no wharves in Bonaventure.

Mr. BENNETT: The last man to make any observation is the ex-Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. POWER: Did he say he needed the dollar?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member made the broad statement that no man could get a job from this Liberal government unless he paid a dollar and joined the Liberal association. On behalf of the members of Quebec I absolutely deny that statement.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I deny it too. It is absolutely untrue; it is most unfair to say that.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I know it was done during the Conservative regime.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under the Tory regime but not under the Liberal regime.

Mr. ROBB: We are getting away from the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall deal with the question. I say, as a member of a free parliament I resent the covert threat of the Minister of Finance. If men cannot exercise their judgment and vote as conscience directs, without being threatened that the wheat seed they desire to put into the ground shall not be free from smut, then this is a poor kind of parliament. I say further—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is the implication.

Mr. BENNETT: The implication was absolute, and I say further that if the minister will study the question he will remove that discrimination against formaldehyde. If he is right in making free the sprays that remove an evil from fruit trees, then he must make this smut destroyer free. I know exactly what it is; I am only a lawyer but I have studied some of these problems. It has been my business to do so. And when members of this House of Commons get up and assert the right of their constituents to have this smut destroyer placed on the free list, and are told that had they supported the minister's budget they might have got it—to be told so by implication—it is an insult to the institution of parliament. I must say there is nothing more offensive to parliamentary life than that gentlemen who represent rural constituencies, as these gentlemen do, should be told in this parliament, when they assert that this formaldehyde should be placed on the free list in order that they might use it for the purpose of destroying smut, their request might have been considered as was the request of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), who voted for the budget. I say, this is not the way in which parliamentary institutions should be maintained; and I, as a member of this house, resent that sort of thing. It is subversive of parliamentary life and is injurious to the whole body politic. I resent it now and will continue to resent it. Gentlemen who loudly cheer observations of that kind are striking a fatal blow at the institutions of the country in which they live.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is attempting to put words into my mouth and to place upon my observations a construction not intended.

Mr. BENNETT: It is what is said.

Mr. ROBB: I said I would have—and naturally my hon. friend would have—a greater regard for the gentlemen who supported my budget—for the representations they made to me before to-day regarding formaldehyde —than for hon. gentlemen who opposed the budget when they thought it was free. I am glad to have the apparently unanimous assurance of gentlemen that they are prepared for a reduction. My hon. friend, speaking for the great Conservative party, indicates that he will have no objection if I reduce the item.

Mr. BENNETT: He says that if you are right in placing the other items on the free list, much more should you place these.

Mr. ROBB: Fine.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. DUNNING: There are some other things in relation to the dignity and liberties of the house which require to be mentioned. My hon. friend a moment ago stated in the plainest terms that on the records of this house would be found the statement that men could get employment on the Rideau canal in this city only if they paid a dollar to join the Liberal association.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: It is within the memory of the members of the house. If that was not what my hon. friend said, certainly that was the meaning to be drawn from it, I am not a lawyer; I cannot put words into my hon. friend's mouth as he did into the mouth of the Minister of Finance. But I can state that that is absolutely and completely outside the fact. I would use a stronger term if it were parliamentary so to do. The practice with respect to daily labour on the Rideau canal this year, and in every other work of a similar character this year, has been just exactly what it has been in every year since confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPENCE: Since you came into power.

Mr. DUNNING: Do my hon. friends require to have placed on the table of the house proof of what I am stating, that the system has not been changed? Not only my own department but the Department of Public Works has done the same thing in the same manner in every year since confederation. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Garland) can confirm it; he knows the practice followed. And it has not been departed from this winter, to my knowledge. If proof can be given that it has been departed from, I shall be glad to look into it. This has always been the practice with respect to casual labour required for such purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: This is $175,000; so the return says.

Mr. DUNNING: In wages?

Mr. BENNETT: Spent on the Rideau canal.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, in wages and material.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly; it does not matter what the amount is. As my hon. friend knows, the labour involved is the kind of labour engaged in building concrete walls and digging trenches for the erection of them; and every year in connection with that work—

An hon. MEMBER: You are getting away from the item.

Mr. DUNNING: I am following the example of my hon. friend's leader, and a minister who is attacked in this manner surely has the right to reply. If I have not on this item I shall be glad to raise it as a matter of privilege, and we might consider a little what is called the freedom of parliament, about which we hear in some moving accents in this house. I will be very glad to bring down in this house the records of the work done on the Rideau and other canals by my predecessor in office and by my predecessors of the party to which my hon. friend belongs, and I can assure him that I have cleaned up a good many of these situations which they started at that time. I will be glad to advance proof of that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Another covert insinuation.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I do not make covert insinuations, nor do I put threats into the mouths of other people, but I do endeavour to sit quietly while other people are speaking. There are always hundreds of applications for casual labour of this character. Those who apply are required by the superintendent to be able-bodied and fit for the work in question, returned soldiers receiving the preference. They are supposed to be recommended by the sitting members for Ottawa. That has always been the case, and in that regard we have followed the practice which formerly existed. It does not do my hon. friend credit to make those statements; he knows very well that this has always been the practice. I would be very happy to have the whole situation left to the Civil Service Commission, and I am sure the members for Ottawa feel the same way about it. We would then be rid of that nuisance.

Mr. MANION: It is common talk around this city, and if it is not true it is doing a great injustice to the members who sit for Ottawa, that no man has an opportunity of getting work on that canal without going to those members. Not only that, but it is also common talk that every time a man or woman looks for work of that kind they are asked first as to their political affiliations, for whom they worked during the election and to what Liberal association they belong. I am not stating anything which is not common talk in Ottawa at this moment.

Mr. DUNNING: No officials of my department ask any such questions.

Mr. MANION: I am not saying anything about the officials.

Mr. DUNNING: The practice is that which has always been followed; work is given on recommendation of the members representing the city of Ottawa.

Mr. MANION: And the members representing this city look into their political affiliations. But I also wish to put myself on record as opposed to the attitude taken by any Minister of Finance who tells any party or group in this house that if they would support him they might get what they ask for, and if they do not support him they will not get what they ask for.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that.

Mr. MANION: The minister made this statement, that if hon. gentlemen in that corner had supported his party, he would be much more inclined to listen to them. In other words, the budgets of this country are not drawn up for the purpose of doing good to the country as a whole, but are drawn up for the purpose of doing good to the political party in power.

Mr. ROBB: Do you think these budgets are good for us?

Mr. MANION: They seem to be hoodwinking the people rather successfully, and by the last vote or two I must confess that the people seem to be carried away a little by them. Personally, however, I do not think they are good for the country, although they have helped or something has helped to keep this party in power for another short time. I wish to protest against that situation, because I do not think it is for the good of this country or for the good of any political party in this country in the long run to make changes in the tariff designed only to benefit a particular party. I believe the minister will agree with me, if he cares to express an opinion, when I say that changes in the tariff should be made for the benefit of the country as a whole rather than for the benefit of any political party, and they should not be determined by the support or non-support given the government by any political party or group in this house.

Mr. EVANS: I want to say another word regarding this matter, and it is something I do not like to say. The minister has thrown down the gauntlet to us; to-day he has passed an insult on this little group and the great class we represent as having no voice here and no right to a voice because we did not support the budget. The minister made that plain statement. The Minister of Finance not only confirmed what the Prime Minister said in the west during the last election campaign, but he has directly insulted this group of members. The Prime Minister said on the platform at Saskatoon during the last election that we could get anything if we would only join with the Liberal party. In his speech this year the Minister of Railways said we might have been co-operating with the Liberal party this year, and that we had thrown insults at those members who had seen fit to co-operate with that party. That is right, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. EVANS: The minister said we could only secure what we wanted and could only make our plans effective by log-rolling and dealing.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. EVANS: The words of the minister are in Hansard, and he can look them up.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not use those words in the connection they are now being used by my hon. friend, and he knows that very well.

Mr. EVANS: In connection with group government, the minister said it could only be accomplished by log-rolling and dealing. The minister himself came into public life through the very organization which sent us here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I should draw the attention of hon. members to the rule which states that discussion in committee must be directly relevant to the item or clause under discussion at that particular time. Hon. members know very well that for a considerable time the discussion has not been relevant to the matter before the committee. I would therefore ask hon. members to bring their remarks more closely to bear on the item now before us.

Mr. EVANS: This is a direct discrimination between two classes of primary producers, and that is why I protest against it. I also protest against the words of the minister as an insult to us and to our whole class.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the item before the committee?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I rise to a question of privilege. It has pleased the distinguished leader of the opposition to make statements in which he has mentioned the members for the city of Ottawa. I want to say to the hon. gentleman in the most courteous manner possible, but at the same time in the most vehement and effective way, that the statement he has made with reference to the securing of work on the Rideau canal is not at all warranted by the facts. The appointments have been made not only on the recommendations of the hon. members for the city of Ottawa; but they have been made on the recommendations of the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fontaine); of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Perras); of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Goulet), and on the recommendations of other hon. members for adjoining constituencies.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member for Carleton?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Garland), I am happy to say. For those appointments I take the responsibility. No man was asked at any time to pay a dollar to join any Liberal association in order to secure work.

Mr. GOTT: It is more than it is worth.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When my hon. friend gets into power he can ask $5. Now I say again it is not true that those appointments were made in that way; they were made as the Minister of Railways has said. If I were to produce a list of those who have been appointed to work on the Rideau canal you would find a large percentage of returned soldiers who were unable to do that hard, arduous work under those difficult conditions, and in addition you would find that both myself and my colleague sitting for this city had received recommendations from the Salvation Army, from the ministers of different churches, from priests, from the welfare bureau and from other charitable institutions, and that those were given the preference. In conclusion may I ask my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) if he has ever given any position within his power to a Grit since he has been in charge of any operations of the Ontario Liquor Commission?

Mr. MANION: I can assure my hon. friend any way that we have never demanded any fee from applicants or asked them to produce a certificate from the Conservative association before they got the positions.

Mr. HEAPS: I was just wondering what this question of privilege has to do with the matter before the committee. Any question of privilege should have some relation to the matter under discussion.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) said that I could approve of the way they were appointing men to work on the Rideau canal in the city.

Mr. DUNNING: No. If that is my hon. friend's point of order I can assure him it is not well taken. I would not expect him to approve of that. What I said—and he can rise to a point of order afterwards if he likes—was that he could confirm the statement that this system has been in operation ever since confederation.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): All I have to say is that I cannot confirm it.

Mr. DUNNING: I see.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): When this Rideau canal retaining wall was built during the Conservative régime, the money was apportioned to three parties, the federal, government, the provincial government, and the corporation of the city of Ottawa. It was done as an unemployment measure, and no letters were required from one party any more than the other. At that time the Conservative party was in power and my county got its share. All I have to say with regard to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is that he is really beside the mark in the assertions he has made here to-day, and I hope that if he has any respect for himself he will apologize for some of the statements he has made. However, I do not expect an apology, but I know that neither the member for Ottawa nor the member for Hull (Mr. Fontaine) can produce to anybody a list of the workers of the past two years which will bear any comparison with the list employed since this work started. Not only must applicants have these letters but they must go to the secretary and president of the Liberal association of Ottawa and get cards before they can get work.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is not so.

Mr. KENNEDY: In regard to what the minister stated a few minutes ago—

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The leader of the opposition made a statement a few minutes ago—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KENNEDY: I think the minister was replying to me when he stated that if we had supported the budget we would have been in a better position to ask for these changes, or to call attention to these items.

Mr. ROBB: What my hon. friend has said is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY: That may be so, but the minister should know that neither threats nor anything else are going to divert me from doing what I believe to be right.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The leader of the opposition made the statement a few minutes ago that the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) had refused to give work on the wharf to a returned soldier.

Mr. BENNETT: I said I had a letter saying so.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I think we would be interested in knowing the name of this man—

Mr. BENNETT: I will give it.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: —who was refused work.

Mr. BENNETT: His name is Mr. Watt.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Mr. Watt? I think the hon. gentleman should produce this letter.

Mr. BENNETT: I will get it from my room.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: In justice to the hon. member for Bonaventure this information should be produced. We are interested in knowing the name of this man and his address.

Mr. BENNETT: I have given the man's name. The letter is in my room, and when the Public Works estimates are under consideration I will read it to the committee. The man is an ex-soldier.

Mr. KENNEDY: In acting as we are, we are not influenced by threats, promises or anything else. We are working for what we believe to be in the interest of the country, and we have taken our oaths to promote that interest.

Mr. ROBB: I have no objection to the interpretation placed upon my remarks by the hon. member for Peace River. He is quite right in the statement he has made. What I said was that hon. gentlemen would be in a better position if they had supported the budget as brought down. Let there be no disagreement among us. I have no quarrel with my hon. friends but they seem to be under the impression that they can attack the government or individual members of it without evoking any retaliation. They think they can attack any members on this side or any members in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite without our striking back. But we are merely human and when we are attacked we strike back.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 219b which has to do with formaldehyde stands.

Customs tariff—236. Surgical dressings, antiseptic or aseptic, including absorbent cotton, lint, lamb's wool, tow, jute, oakum, woven fabric of cotton weighing not more than seven and one-half pounds per one hundred square yards, whether imported singly or in combination one with another, but not stitched or otherwise manufactured; surgical trusses and suspensory bandages of all kinds; sanitary napkins, spinal braces and abdominal supports: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The only change is the inclusion of the words "sanitary napkins", and the word "or aseptic", also "woven fabrics of cotton weighing not more than 17½ pounds per hundred square yards."

Amendments agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—267b. Crude petroleum not in its natural state .725 specific gravity or heavier at 60 degrees temperature, when imported by oil refiners to be refined in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free; on and after the 1st July, 1931, per gallon: British preferential tariff, 3/10c., intermediate tariff 4/10c., general tariff, ½c.

Mr. ROBB: I am told that as this item is framed it does not accomplish what the government intended. I therefore wish the item to stand until I can look a little further into the matter.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—277. Palm and palm kernel oil, unbleached or bleached, not edible; shea butter: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "unbleached" is added to the item.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the principle here? Is this Lever Brothers' application?

Mr. ROBB: The change in wording makes the item read "unbleached palm and palm kernel oil".

Mr. BENNETT: There seems to be a consolidation of these items.

Mr. ROBB: Formerly it was bleached only.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—356b. Nickel chromium rods for making electric resistance wire: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to have said a word upon the item before it was passed. Is it not desirable to encourage the manufacture of nickel products as far as possible in the country, and is it not one of the points urged by the minister himself some time ago that in connection with matters of this kind we should not ship out the raw material in matte form and then bring back the manufactured goods, but rather by the utilization of our tariff permit the goods to be manufactured in Canada. And it will be observed that this nickel chromium in bar rods of not more than ¾ of an inch in diameter was previously dutiable to the extent of 15 per cent, 17½ per cent, and 17½ per cent. The effect of this clearly will be that there will be no opportunity to develop what you might call the fabricated nickel in this country. The matte will continue to go out and the manufactured article will come back. Perhaps the minister will tell us what is involved in dollars and cents, and at whose instance the change was made.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that the rates will stand when these materials are made in Canada. The item reads:

Of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada.

It has been asked for by some people up above Walkerville. The loss in revenue would be about $10,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What manufacturing industry asked for this free importation?

Mr. ROBB: It was the Hiram Walker Products Company. This is:

When imported by manufacturers of electric resistance wire or electrical resistance strip or ribbon for use only in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Was this considered by the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: No, this has been before the department for, I think, two or three years.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one point I desire to make clear about that. It will certainly prevent the development of the industry in this country, and there is just this to be said with respect to all these matters: The Minister of Finance has had to meet this difficulty and I suggest to him it is desirable to overcome it. When you say that goods shall be free only if utilized in a certain way and at a particular point, the great difficulty has been in knowing that they are used for that purpose and at that point, and usually what has happened is that advantage has been taken of that particular provision of the tariff item to enable the goods that are thus free from tariff to be used for purposes not intended. Therefore I suggest to the minister that as far as possible he should not use those words, that is, fix the application of the exemption by specifying the use of the article imported and the place at which it may be utilized.

Mr. ROBB: It is not very easy to do that. This language is inserted by the Department of National Revenue administering the customs. They say that under this they will be able properly to watch it. What my hon. friend has said is quite true, but sometimes there are evasions of duty and it is when we discover those evasions that occasionally changes are made in the tariff.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438. Locomotives and motor cars for railways and tramways, and chassis, tops, wheels and bodies for same, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. NEILL: I should like on this item to draw the attention of the minister to what I consider an injustice in the way of carrying out, probably by regulations which have been referred to, a previous item on this subject. While I am on my feet I should like to express my appreciation of item 438e, which provides for a reduction of duty on cars for mining. This will help the coal mining industry, and I wish to draw the minister's attention to a somewhat similar case. In 1924 a reduction was made in the duty on machinery for sawing lumber and so on. The item concludes something like this:

Machinery, logging cars, block and tackle and complete parts thereof for logging purposes exclusively.

It was the government's policy at that time to reduce the cost of production in the basic industries, and it appears to have been worked out by regulations in a way that in some degree more or less prevented the advantage being obtained. Apparently by regulations it was held that, as regards locomotives, the line on which these locomotives ran must be exclusively on land belonging to a logging company. I have in mind a logging company which has forty miles of well ballasted railway nearly all on its own land, but because there is half a mile of other property between it and the shore to which the logs go, these locomotives were held not to come within the scope of this clause. Another objection that was made is this. It was held that if a logging car was used for ballasting this railroad—and this is a road on which nothing would ever travel except logs—therefore the cars could not be held to come under this item. I would suggest that if a logging car is used for hauling logs three hundred days in the year and used for only a couple of weeks to ballast the line, it should be allowed to come under the item. Another objection made presumably by regulation was that the locomotive must be only on the side line—what is called yarding, I believe—hauling logs out of the bush on to the branch line. If the locomotive went on the main line, they would not allow any reduction on it. I object to this because nothing is carried over this line except logs and perhaps the stores going up for the various camps. I would ask if the minister's attention could not be attracted to a better definition of that item which is or used to be, 453e. It would carry out the absolute purpose for which it was passed and be of considerable help to the lumbering industry generally.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I notice that item 438 of the old tariff has been repealed and item 438 of the new tariff covers locomotives and motor cars used on railways, but there is no provision for automobiles or vehicles of all kinds which stood in the old item. Where do they come in now?

Mr. ROBB: The only change in this item is the addition of the letters "n.o.p.".

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The old item 438 read:

Locomotives and motor cars for railways and tramways and automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must have an old tariff. That is not the last one.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438e. Locomotives and motor cars for railways and tramways, of a class or kind adapted for underground haulage for use only in mining operations: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I approve of this change; it is a good measure of improvement for conditions in the mining industry, but I am a little at a loss to know why automatic carloaders were not included. I think an application was made to the board for the inclusion of automatic carloaders in any reduction. None of these is made in Canada; no industry in this country would be harmed in the least, and it is very unlikely that any of these will ever be made in Canada as the consumption is very small.

Mr. BENNETT: They are being included in the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN: What was the old rate on them?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think it was 22½ per cent, 30 per cent, 35 per cent, or something like that. I suggest that they should come in under the new rate.

Mr. BENNETT: They are going to make them free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If they make them free, I shall be highly delighted.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will be pleased to know that upon representations made to me by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, he will find an item covering that a little further on. I have an amendment to provide for that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am delighted to know that representations from that side of the house have been influential for once. They do not seem to have been so before. I made representations to that effect twelve months ago and I presume they have had some weight with the minister. I thank him very heartily.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The hon. gentleman flatters himself too much.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I cannot let this item pass without taking an opposite view to that held by a good many members in this house, because at the present time the manufacture of locomotives and other equipment used for mining is now being started in Canada. If hon. members who are speaking for the coal industry will kindly remember that their coal will be used in Ontario only in manufacturing plants, they will realize that this item and the reductions made in this way will not encourage the use of western coal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member is quite wrong. Alberta coal is domestic coal, that will be used for domestic and not manufacturing purposes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I know the difficulty in persuading housewives to use western coal for domestic purposes, but there is no question about the use of soft coal in manufacturing plants. If the industry beginning the manufacture of this equipment for mining is to be discouraged in this way by a reduction in the tariff, then less western and maritime coal will be used in these plants, and this item is no encouragement to industries starting up the manufacture of this equipment.

Mr. FRASER: Is it not a fact that mining machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada has been on the free list for many years?

[Mr. McMillan.]

Mr. ROBB: Certain kinds, yes.

Mr. FRASER: Only certain kinds?

Mr. COOTE: I would like to remark that it is very difficult for miners who are mining coal on which there is no duty to carry on if they have to use machinery that bears a duty of 35 per cent. That should be evident to the whole house without any argument. This afternoon I have been more impressed than ever with something that has often struck me before, and that is the difficulty of making a tariff that is going to suit everybody.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: You give a certain manufacturer concessions, give him free importation of something he wants to use, and immediately you incur the opposition of some other manufacturer who is making the very article which you propose to put on the free list. I am coming very much to the opinion that was expressed about two years ago by Mr. Jones, of the Canada Cement Company, that perhaps the best thing we could do in Canada would be to introduce a uniform ad valorem tariff; then those who can take advantage of it to manufacture in Canada, may do so. Those who could not get along with that amount of protection would have to put up with it. It would certainly save a lot of unfair discrimination. The minister rather intimated this afternoon that if we belonged to his party we might possibly be able to get the tariff adjusted in a certain way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COOTE: I hope not. May I change that and say that the tariff as it stands to-day is not a scientific tariff in any respect; it has not been built up upon any scientific principle, but stands as it is to-day just because of the pressure which certain interests have been able to exert on the Finance department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COOTE: That statement has often been made before, and I will go to this extent at least, that generally speaking it is true. There are gross inequalities existing in our tariff; surely no one will deny that, and in spite of the fact that we have an advisory tariff board, many of these inequalities are still going to continue. Not only must the findings of the tariff board be taken into consideration, but there is also the political aspect to be considered in making tariff changes, and in spite of all the protestations of hon. gentlemen opposite I still maintain that the tariff as it exists to-day is largely the result of the pressure and influence that has been brought to bear upon the Finance department by industries and individuals who have a personal interest in the matter.

I sympathize very much with the Minister of Finance. I am sure that from the time he starts to make up his budget until the resolutions are finally passed by this house he must have a great time dodging those people who are in Ottawa trying to get a little more tariff protection for their pet industry, or trying to have the duties taken off some of the materials they use. I would like to see the minister ask the tariff board to inquire carefully into the proposal that was made two years ago by Mr. Jones, that we should have a uniform ad valorem tariff on all imports coming into Canada, and let us do away with the system which now exists of giving tariff favours to certain people because of the influence they are able to bring to bear by reason of their financial position or political affiliations.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask if the hon. gentleman would have a uniform tax on every import?

Mr. COOTE: I am not saying I would have it, but I would like the Finance minister to ask the tariff board to inquire very carefully into that proposal to see whether it would not be more in the interests of Canada than a tariff built up, as the present one has been, through the influence that certain interested parties have been able to bring to bear upon the government or the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BRADETTE: This item has something to do with the mining industry, one of the primary industries of this country, and in this connection I should like to quote from an editorial in the Northern Miner of Cobalt, which is absolutely a non-political paper; it is a mining paper pure and simple. It says:

> Tax and tariff reductions announced by the Minister of Finance indicate savings to the Canadian mining industry of a million dollars a year. And the changes made will be particularly encouraging to a branch of the mining industry in which Canada may be expected to take a leading part, that of treating complex ores, such as copper-zinc-lead-gold-silver ores, now shown so abundant in northern Manitoba, in Sudbury and in Rouyn.
> Among the interesting items in the tariff changes are those that admit free certain acids used in the treating of complex ores and which lower the duty on machinery and equipment used in concentrating and smelting. With several new plants going up these items are particularly interesting. Another reduction is in the duty on hoists of a type not made in Canada.
> The tariff changes were so framed as not to hurt the growing manufacture of mining machinery in Canada. This is becoming quite an industry, and one which is proving helpful to mining by reason of the ability of Canadian factories to quickly supply machines and parts of a kind suitable to Canadian needs. The government feels that in cutting the tariff on these items it will aid mining and not yet injure manufacturing.
> The Ontario Mining Association must have felt gratified to learn that five out of its six tariff recommendations were adopted. The sixth was not of great importance and because it was found to impose on manufacturing was not pressed.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the situation as it exists in northern Ontario.

Mr. FRASER: What amount of machinery came in under this classification last year?

Mr. ROBB: There was no separate classification, so I could not tell my hon. friend, but apparently, in the judgment of the miners as expressed in the article that has just been read, this item is considered of great value.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the loss in revenue involved in this change?

Mr. ROBB: The estimated loss in taxation is $5,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did this item come before the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would ask the minister if a reduction in duty always involves a loss in revenue.

Mr. ROBB: I am estimating on the basis of last year's importations. I gather from the observations of my hon. friend that he does not believe a reduction in the rate necessarily means a loss in revenue, and I think I have proved the truth of that to the satisfaction of the house and the country by the reduction that was made in the income tax, which did not mean a loss in revenue.

Mr. STEVENS: Then put them all on the free list and we would have a bigger revenue.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—442. Printing presses, lithographic presses, and type-making accessories therefor, also machines specially designed for ruling, folding, binding, embossing, creasing or cutting paper or cardboard, sheet feeding machines, when for use exclusively by printers, bookbinders and by manufacturers of articles made from paper or cardboard—including parts thereof composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, brass or wood; machinery and complete parts thereof for printing by photographic methods on plates for use on lithographic and offset presses; stereotypers' and typecasters' blankets, and press blankets used in covering cylinders on rotary printing presses, of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this change a result of the recommendations of the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The new part is the addition of the words:

—stereotypers' and typecasters' blankets, and press blankets used in covering cylinders on rotary printing presses, of a class or kind not made in Canada.

There is no classification of the imports. There are none made in Canada. The estimated reduction in taxation will be $5,000, based on last year's business.

Mr. BENNETT: I understood the minister to say the item had been recommended by the tariff board.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It must have been a verbal recommendation.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps.

Mr. BENNETT: I looked through the report and could find no record of it. What would be the source from which it would come to the minister? These verbal recommendations are very unsatisfactory when dealing with the tariff. Was the recommendation made by the chairman of the board?

Mr. ROBB: It is an advisory board. I think I might take this opportunity of describing the procedure.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. ROBB: They take evidence in the applications made to them and make their reports thereon. When the minister starts to prepare his budget he sends for the tariff board, who sit around the table with him and go over all the tariff items. We work together for long hours at a stretch, sometimes as late as two o'clock in the morning.

Mr. STEVENS: That is too bad.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend, who has sat around the council table, knows that a minister goes over his proposals with his colleagues.

Mr. BENNETT: My experience was very brief.

Mr. ROBB: Happily my hon. friend has been promoted, and he will not be worried and pass sleepless nights considering two opinions, and trying to do what he thinks is best.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the minister first, if any recommendations from the tariff board have been dealt with; second, have the tariff board found it necessary to advise an increase of protection for any industry; and, third, have they specified the amount of protection and the duration of time during which it should be effective in order that the industry might make its plans accordingly?

Mr. ROBB: It is only fair to the members of the tariff board to say that in some cases they thought we should provide higher rates than the rates that are now before the house in respect of some of these tariff items.

Mr. McGIBBON: Where could we get those recommendations?

Mr. ROBB: I have just told my hon. friend that I called in the members of the tariff board to sit with me around the table and discuss these matters.

Mr. McGIBBON: On behalf of the parliament and the people of Canada, might I suggest to the minister that he adopt the system in operation in Great Britain?

Mr. ROBB: What is that?

Mr. McGIBBON: I placed it on Hansard a year ago. The necessities of certain industries are reviewed by a commission, and some of the requests for tariff protection are refused altogether, while others are favourably considered and the amount of protection specified, as well as the duration of time of such protection. These recommendations are in writing.

Mr. ROBB: Does the government adopt those recommendations?

Mr. McGIBBON: Generally. The commission functions under the Safeguarding of Industries Act. The information will be found in the library in pamphlet form. Under that system the industry would have the advantage of knowing just where it stood for a definite time, and during that time it could shape its business accordingly. Something more than confidential verbal recommendations—which probably are not followed—should be before the people of Canada; there should be something definite and concrete. Otherwise, how are we going to appraise the value of this tariff board? There is no question that today it is looked upon as simply a political football for the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McGIBBON: I say yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We say no.

Mr. McGIBBON: I say the public think so. I am not saying that I think so, although probably I would not disagree with the public.

Mr. CHAPLIN: No appraisal company would value it at all.

Mr. McGIBBON: We should have something definite and specific before us in order to judge the workings of this commission. I commend that to the consideration of the minister.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the minister to say that the tariff board had made recommendations for an increase of tariff?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I understood the tariff board was simply a fact-finding body, and made no recommendations. Which of the two is it?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right, they are a fact-finding body. At the hearings they take evidence, and this evidence has been tabled. Perhaps my hon. friend could not hear me. I said that when we get ready to prepare the budget the tariff board are called over to the office, and they are asked in the light of all the evidence they have heard from both sides what in their judgment would be fair to the consumer and to the producer in regard to certain tariff changes. As I say, it is only just to the tariff board to say that there have been cases where they have suggested that rates of duty higher than those now before the house might be put into effect. But the government of the day must take responsibility for whatever changes are made.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then is it the general practice of the government to accept the advice of the tariff board, or to disregard it?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend, who has had a wide experience, is aware that no minister —not even my hon. friend opposite me (Sir Henry Drayton), who was for a number of years Minister of Finance—sits down, takes his pencil, and declares, "This is what the tariff shall be." He consults the officers of his department. The tariff board are among those officers.

Mr. McGIBBON: Perhaps the minister did not understand my point. Has the tariff board really had any effect in producing this budget, or have its decisions been largely disregarded?

Mr. ROBB: I am prepared to take full responsibility for any blame from those who are opposed to the changes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All the praise and all the blame.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: I quite agree with that, but I want to know what effect, if any, has this tariff board had on the budget.

Mr. ROBB: It has been very helpful.

Mr. KENNEDY: Has the minister discussed with the tariff board the various items that have been introduced in this budget by way of changes, or just some of them?

Mr. ROBB: Not all, but most of them. We discussed them at considerable length, and sometimes sat up until early in the morning going over them.

Mr. STEVENS: Don't tell us that again; we will cry.

Mr. BENNETT: You remember the mountain that laboured and brought forth a mouse.

Item agreed to.

Item 453e agreed to.

Customs tariff—453g. Machinery for the concentration of ores, metals or minerals, viz.: —flotation machines, pumps, vibrating and impact screens, jigs, magnetic separators and filters, when for use in the concentration or separation of ores, metals or minerals, and integral parts of all machinery mentioned in this item: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: In item 453g, after the first word, "machinery," the letters n.o.p. are inserted.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this the only change, the insertion of n.o.p.?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item 453h agreed to.

Customs tariff—453i. Machine car loaders, and complete parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use only in mining operations for loading coal into box cars: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a new item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462. Blowers of iron or steel of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in the smelting of ores, or in reduction, separation or refining of metals, ores or minerals; rotary kilns, revolving roasters and furnaces of metal of a class or kind not made in Canada, designed for roasting ore, mineral, rock or clay; furnace slag trucks and slag pots of a class or kind not made in Canada, and integral parts of all machinery mentioned in this item: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: How much is imported?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of imports.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the revenue involved?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the information on that. The reduction will be small.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—465. The following articles and materials when imported by manufacturers of automatic gas buoys and automatic gas beacons, for use in the manufacture of such buoys and beacons for the government of Canada, for marine signal purposes or for export, under regulations prescribed by the minister, viz:—iron or steel tubes over sixteen inches in diameter; flanged and dished steel heads made from boiler plate, over five feet in diameter; hardened steel balls, not less than three inches in diameter; acetylene gas lanterns and parts thereof; and tobin bronze in bars or rods: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in this item but there are certain places where there are large companies, and the Marine department were not disposed to provide the lighting leading into the harbour. This will enable the companies to have the same advantage as the department.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—468. Machinery and apparatus, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and parts thereof, especially constructed for preparing, manufacturing, testing or finishing yarns, cordage and fabrics made from textile fibres, or for use in factory operations incidental thereto, imported for the exclusive use of manufacturers and scholastic or charitable institutions in such processes only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment has been proposed. The words "or for use in factory operations incidental thereto" have been struck out.

Mr. KENNEDY: There are two items consolidated here, 467 and 468. Machinery for cordage and so forth is free under the three tariffs; that is 467. Item 468 is 10 per cent under the general tariff I understand that machinery for cordage, which was free under all three tariffs, is used largely in the production of binder twine.

Mr. ROBB: There is a separate item for binder twine.

Mr. KENNEDY: Under item 467 all three tariff schedules were free; now the product becomes dutiable under the intermediate and general. In one case the duty is higher than in the other.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has not observed, perhaps, that 544a remains. Articles which enter into the cost of manufacture of binder twine or twine for harvest binders, when imported for such use exclusively, by manufacturers who may produce such twine only, are free. That remains; there is no change.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is it new?

Mr. ROBB: It will be a new item; it is contained in 544a at present.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one matter which I think the minister should consider. This, I take it, is textile machinery?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Textile machinery ordered some time ago and put in place by some of the factories in Canada has paid a large duty —$50,000 in one case and $37,000 in another. Machinery which is under order but not yet delivered will come in free. Is it quite fair to industries thus to place them in competition one with another? Should not something have been done with respect to this situation so as to put them all on the same basis? I make the suggestion to the minister. There is another point I would submit to my hon. friends yonder: we are steadily providing for the free admission of certain forms of machinery. Does it occur to my hon. friends that there might come in this country again, as there did once before, a moment when we might no longer be able to get that machinery, without which, and in the absence of any machinery producing factories in the Dominion, our whole industrial fabric would be destroyed? This is no fanciful suggestion on my part; such a situation has actually taken place in Europe. And nothing could be done so easily to cripple the whole industrial life of Canada as for a foreign group of very powerful financial men to get control of factories producing essential machinery and then take steps to see that such machinery should no longer be available for export to Canada. I urge the gravity of this upon hon. gentlemen; it is by no means imaginary. Within the last few months I have had occasion to observe that when certain classes of machinery were put on the free list in this country the factories producing them in Canada discontinued operations, and it took so long to have filled orders which were sent to the United States that we lost weeks and in one instance months in consequence. In other words, they filled our orders just when it was convenient for them to do so, provided they had a domestic demand of such a character as to keep their plant in operation.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What machinery?

Mr. BENNETT: Some of it was machinery used in connection with oil fields in the west; there was also machinery in connection with tractors and things of that description. I fancy my hon. friend from Melfort knows more about it than I do. It occurred to me at that time—and I mentioned the fact to the minister the other day—that it might be wise for this parliament very carefully to consider, having regard to the economic conditions prevailing on this continent and the competition to which we are subject, as well as in view of the enormous power in the hands of some of the great machinery producers in the neighbouring republic, whether we should not take steps to be at all times independent of foreign sources of supply. Should we not make sure that we can rely upon the domestic factories for the production of certain kinds of machinery indispensable to our industrial life? This is a matter which I think might very well engage the attention of some of my hon. friends during the recess. They might consider the principle laid down by Adam Smith in the early part of his great work, as to the desirability of a country being always in a position to protect itself in matters such as this—using the word protection in a sense different from that implied in relation to tariff questions. Should we not put ourselves in a position where we could be independent of the outside world in this regard? I submit that the minister should study this question from every angle to determine whether or not, in a new country with a limited population and vast undeveloped resources, it is wise for us to leave ourselves dependent upon producers outside Canada, sometimes three thousand miles away. These outside producers might have it in their power at any time to exclude us from the sources of materials or machinery, as the case might be, with the result that we might find ourselves unable to carry on operations in regard to either agriculture or manufacturing. It struck me in the course of my reading not long since how important it was that we in this country should give some consideration to this question. I leave this suggestion with the minister and with my fellow members, not with the idea of having the item changed but in order that we might take steps to safeguard ourselves. One country at least has had occasion to consider this matter carefully and we Canadians would do well not to overlook it entirely.

Mr. ROBB: On general principles there is much to be said for the point raised by my hon. friend, but he will observe that in these changes we are taking care to enlarge the sphere of the British preference.

Mr. BENNETT: A great deal of this machinery comes from the United States.

Mr. ROBB: We propose to give a preference of 10 per cent; this machinery is free under the British preference as against 10 per cent under the general tariff. If we buy this machinery from the mother country, which I hope will be the case, surely no one would argue that they would prevent this machinery from coming to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No. My hon. friend has been kind enough to say that there is something in the point. A condition might arise under which it would become impossible to bring that machinery across the ocean.

Mr. ROBB: If that condition arose we might not be able to ship our wheat either. Now, as to the other point advanced, with regard to the mills where the machinery has been already installed, that is a factor which prevails in all tariff changes. They must take their chance. I will admit that with a new mill going up near a mill which has paid duty on the machinery, the overhead cost will be a little less, but that occurs in all tariff changes and it would break the treasury if we attempted to introduce that principle.

Mr. BENNETT: A couple of years ago I had occasion to deal with this matter specifically, and perhaps the details will interest my hon. friends. The Dominion Engineering Company, to mention a particular company, has grown into a very considerable enterprise, and a large part of its work consists of the manufacture of paper mill machinery. The hon. gentleman will remember that until recent years, this machinery was made entirely in the United States and Great Britain, largely in the United States as far as we were concerned; but recently by reason of the operation of this statute this machinery has been made in Canada, largely by the Dominion Engineering Company. A very large paper machine being required, tenders were called for, and it may surprise hon. gentlemen opposite to learn that in order to keep their plants going the American concerns were willing to deliver that machine in Canada, duty paid, at a slightly lower cost than that given by one of the two firms producing the machinery in Canada. Needless to say they did not get the order, but that indicates how we may be dependent for machinery upon another country, and how desirable it is at this time in our development to assist those plants which will keep us supplied with this machinery. I know of no better illustration than what has been done by the Dominion Engineering Company, which is a subsidiary of the Dominion Bridge Company, in Montreal. Anyone going through that plant and seeing some of the machines built there or at Walmsley's or Vickers will realize how desirable it is to produce in Canada that machinery on which our industrial life may depend.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would like to ask the minister the principle underlying this revision, whereby you take an item previously free and make it dutiable, while lowering the duty on another item.

Mr. ROBB: To be frank with my hon. friend, in this instance it was to give a British preference.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Customs tariff—494a. Cork slabs, boards, planks and tiles produced from cork waste or granulated or ground cork: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What is involved in that?

Mr. ROBB: These materials are used for insulating purposes in houses or in cold storage. They are not made in Canada. The total estimated reduction in taxation on the basis of last year's importations is $28,639.

Mr. McMILLAN: Is that reduction in duty?

Mr. ROBB: No, reduction in revenue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The present intermediate tariff is 30 per cent and the general tariff 30 per cent, whereas the new intermediate tariff is 17½ per cent and the general tariff 25 per cent. What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has asked a very proper question. We have discovered from time to time in making treaties that sometimes we did not have anything to trade. We are getting ourselves into a position where we can utilize the intermediate column.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad the Minister of Finance has made that statement. I am only sorry the Minister of Justice is not present because the other evening he referred to the fact that in the economic conference of the League of Nations condemnation was expressed of tariff increases made for the purpose of bargaining. I assume that this economic conference is a splendid thing to refer to when it suits the convenience of the Minister of Justice, but it is quite the opposite in a case such as this.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that this is a decrease.

Mr. BENNETT: For the purpose of bargaining. My hon. friend alluded to any changes at all for the purpose of bargaining.

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to this item I wonder if the minister is aware that it is expected that in the near future we will be manufacturing in Canada these slabs for insulating purposes out of peat. That is being done successfully in some parts of Europe, and it is expected that such a product will be manufactured in Canada very shortly. It will, I understand, take the place of cork slabs, and it is claimed that it is equal to cork for the purposes of cold storage, as silencers in partitions and buildings, and so forth. I understand that some of the peat beds in the province of Quebec are about to be exploited not only for this purpose but for fuel purposes as well. Some thought should be given to the possibility of utilizing this at present wholly useless or apparently useless resource, and stimulating the manufacture of these articles. I am afraid that the placing of them on the free list—

Mr. ROBB: They are not on the free list.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not on the free list, but the reduction in duty may have some effect in not stimulating developments in this line of manufacture. It is an entirely new venture which perhaps merits support, I was going to say, above any other, and one which will take of course some time to bring to a state of real success.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that there is still a very substantial tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: What I would call a very moderate tariff.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—520. Raw cotton and cotton linters not further manufactured than ginned; rags and waste wholly of cotton unfit for use without further manufacture, not to include used garments nor waste portions of unused fabrics: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: This starts the cotton schedule.

Mr. MANION: I notice that in the case of three or four items there does not seem to be any change at all except in the number.

Mr. ROBB: No, it is a reclassification.

Mr. MANION: There is no change in the duty at all.

Mr. KENNEDY: With respect to three items in this schedule, there is something in the definition that I cannot quite grasp, and it is hard to differentiate between material that is dutiable and material that comes in free. The old items referred to in these three items are 532, 533 and 681. The old 681 reads as follows:

Junk old; rags of cotton, jute, hemp and wool; paper waste clippings, and waste of all kinds, n.o.p., except metallic; broken glass or glass cutlet: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Now the old item 532 reads in this way:

Coir and coir yarn, raw cotton or cotton wool not dyed; cotton yarns, number forty and finer: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The old item 533 is thus worded:

Waste or shoddy from cotton, woollen or other fabrics or from yarn or thread machined, garnetted or prepared for use.

If you take the three items here, 520, 520a, and 535d, they read in this way:

520. Raw cotton and cotton linters not further manufactured than ginned; rags and waste wholly of cotton unfit for use without further manufacture, not to include used garments nor waste portions of unused fabrics: Free; free; free.

520a reads:

Waste portions of unused fabrics or used garments, wholly of cotton, imported by manufacturers to be used exclusively for disintegrating, or for manufacture into wiping rags in their own factories: Free; free; free.

Then we come to 535d, which reads in this way:

Garnetted material obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use, n.o.p.; wiping rags and wiping waste, n.o.p.; waste portions of unused fabrics, rags and waste, sold by weight, not to include remnants nor mill ends, n.o.p.: 7½ per cent; 10 per cent; 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Unused fabrics.

Mr. KENNEDY: How are you going to distinguish between waste portions of used fabrics and waste portions of unused fabrics wholly of cotton in 520b which is dutiable?

Mr. ROBB: That is unused fabrics.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, and rags and wiping waste. We have "waste portions of unused fabrics" in 520a, and "waste portions of unused fabrics" in 520b. Thus we have three items dealing with wiping rags coming into the country. Both the royal commission and the committee on customs found great difficulty in connection with the administration of the act on account of its not providing for proper appraisal systems that would take care of imports and properly classify them. I venture to say if the minister lives to be as old as Methuselah he will never have in Canada an appraisal system that will really distinguish between those various classes of linters and rags and waste that are classified in this list under three different tariff items. If the manufacturers are asking us to maintain an appraisal staff and to administer an act on that basis, this is protection run riot. The same phrase occurs in all three items.

Mr. ROBB: This has been administered for some years in this way and there is practically no change except the change in the classification.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is a big change in the classification.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the real reason for this being done?

Mr. ROBB: It is to simplify the administrative work of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: All these materials are free. Why should they not be under one item? Why this separation? There is always a reason behind all this, as we have all learned. The little customs inquiry taught us that. Both items are free under the three tariffs.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that some of them are for manufacture and some of them are general items.

Mr. KENNEDY: In 520a there is mentioned "waste portions of unused fabrics" and in 520b there is mentioned "waste portions of unused fabrics and rags and waste wholly of cotton," dutiable at 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The item 520b covers garnetted material.

Mr. KENNEDY: The description is exactly the same under the item 520a. It says:

Or for manufacture into wiping rags in their own factories.

It appears as though the manufacturer is going to get the stuff in free, but if a ragman imports any he is going to be soaked.

Mr. DUNNING: It is garnetted.

Mr. BENNETT: What is garnetted ?

Mr. ROBB: Item 520a is the raw material for the garnetted material. The raw material comes in free. Then it is handled by the garnetting industry in Canada.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is the same language describing it in each case:

Waste portions of unused fabrics and rags and waste.

Mr. DUNNING: One is garnetted and the other is not.

Mr. BROWN: We are willing to confess to a certain amount of ignorance on this side. What is garnetting?

Mr. ROBB: "Garnetted" means shredded or torn up. Instead of being brought in garnetted, it can be brought in under 520a and the industry in Canada will do the shredding or garnetting. This is a small protection for that industry.

Item agreed to.

Item 520a agreed to.

Customs tariff—520b. Garnetted material wholly of cotton, obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use; cotton wiping rags and wiping waste; waste portions of unused fabrics and rags and waste wholly of cotton, sold by weight, not to include remnants nor mill ends, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 520b:

Garnetted material wholly of cotton, obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use; cotton wiping rags and wiping waste, waste portions of unused fabrics, machine-cleaned waste, wholly of cotton, n.o.p., not to include remnants or mill end: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Peace River directed attention to the similarity in the two items. The Minister of Finance suggested that there was a slight protection to the Canadian manufacturer, but observe the language:

Garnetted material wholly of cotton—

And here the hon. member for Lisgar will see just what the word "garnetted" in this means.

—obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics prepared for use.

My hon. friend will see that the very suggestion he makes is negatived by the language used: "prepared for use", to come in and pay 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 12½ per cent. I confess I could not follow this, and the observations of the hon. member for Peace River are wholly pertinent. Is there any mistake in the wording?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROBB: No. My hon. friend will observe there is a duty on this material.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The raw material coming in from which this is made comes in free. If it is prepared in another country a duty is imposed. There is a slight protection.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is there such a difference in the waste portions of unused fabrics in each case that an appraiser can readily tell which is which?

Mr. ROBB: They have been doing that for some time.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—520c. Linters of short fibres of cotton, bleached, when imported by manufacturers of paper to be used only in their own factories for the manufacture of blotting paper or other grade of paper: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change. This is a change in number only.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—521. Batts, batting and carded sliver wholly of cotton, not bleached, coloured nor impregnated, cotton fibres, bleached or coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I move that the first three words be struck out so that the item will read:

Carded sliver wholly of cotton, not bleached, coloured nor impregnated; cotton fibres, bleached or coloured, n.o.p.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this change for?

Mr. ROBB: The reason for the proposed change is the difficulty of distinguishing unbleached from bleached batts. All batts will enter under item 521a.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a reduction in the tariff there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give us any idea of the size of imports and the estimated loss of duty?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of these imports. I cannot give the information.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—521a. Batts, batting, sheet wadding and carded sliver wholly of cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who asked for this and just what will it mean?

Mr. ROBB: All these changes came out of the general hearing carried on by the tariff board into the textile industry and there is a reduction in the tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Only on some items. There is an increase on others.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps on some items. The total imports were $61,765 and the estimated reduction in taxation is $4,631.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does that cover all the cotton items?

Mr. ROBB: Just this item alone.

Mr. MANION: This is an increase, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: A decrease.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of cotton not exceeding number twenty, not more advanced than singles: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. EVANS: Does this cover items 520, 534, 734 and 750? Are these yarns for the use of manufacturers, or what?

Mr. ROBB: It embraces some of these items. It is a new method of description in the trade. The imports for the year ended March 31, 1927, were, cotton warp and yarns, $149,627; yarns for shoe laces, $141,212. The reduction in taxation on yarns and warps is $10,046, and the increase in taxation on yarns for shoe laces is $28,242. The change with respect to yarns for shoe laces is on account of difficulties in administration and alleged evasion of the act.

Mr. EVANS: This is another case where the manufacturer is benefited without any benefit accruing to the consumer or to the revenues of the country.

Mr. ROBB: I would not admit that.

Mr. EVANS: Has the minister any promise that the reduction will be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. ROBB: I have had a lot of complaints from the manufacturers, and some of them, in fact, have caused me some sleepless nights. They have intimated that by some of these changes they are going to be ruined. I do not admit that, but that is their side of the story.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will look further down he will see that there is passed on to the consumer the reduction in cotton yarns for boot and shoe laces, which corresponds to the only item on which there is an increase in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: Item 520 in the old tariff was "cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single," carrying duties of 15, 22½ and 25 per cent. Cotton yarns for shoe laces and yarn for mantles were free. Now what has happened? The Finance minister has put a duty of 10, 15 and 20 per cent on the whole of these, including what was formerly free.

Mr. DUNNING: In part.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the duty now goes up to 10, 15 and 20 per cent, and what was free now pays 10, 15 and 20 per cent. Others that paid a lower rate are also increased. Who asked for the increase apart from yarn for shoe laces?

Mr. ROBB: This comes out of the general reclassification of the items and the representations that were made before the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that is not good enough. There was an application to increase the duty in the case of one cotton mill, and there was another hearing. Perhaps the clerk assistant will send for the evidence in the textile hearing and have it laid on the table. That evidence was given in two separate cases. One case was that of Wabasso Cottons for an increase in the tariff, and there was also a general inquiry, at which, as I pointed out the other day, a large number of interests were represented. We will come to woollens after a while. Leaving that for a moment, what we are trying to ascertain is, what is the cause for the increase in this cotton schedule. We have nothing from the board. They dump the evidence on to the minister and say, "This is a complicated matter." We know now from the minister that they sit around the table and get the benefit of the advice of these gentlemen, and unfortunately keep the Minister of Finance awake at night, which is very much to be deprecated. But what we are trying to ascertain is the cause for the increase in this cotton schedule, and what mills are affected.

Mr. ROBB: In addition to the inquiry which my hon. friend has just mentioned, the Customs department in administering the act discovered that there was evasion, and that importations ostensibly for shoe laces were coming in and the yarn being used for other purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: That, I suppose, has been going on a long time.

Mr. ROBB: I imagine it has been going on since they got on to what might be done.

Mr. MANION: Before we carry any of these items, I think there are a few points of information that should be given on each item. We have appointed a tariff board, and most of us agree that an advisory tariff board is probably a good thing because it can study the questions more thoroughly than we have time to do as members of this house. In view of that it seems to me that on each of these items we should be told (1) if the item has been before the board; (2) what is the report of the board on that item, and what is their recommendation in the matter; (3) what were the imports and the revenues associated therewith in the previous year; (4) what change will it make in the revenues of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: That information has been given on this item.

Mr. MANION: I am not speaking of this item in particular, but I say that we should have all these points of information regarding practically every item, and then we shall be in a position to appreciate the value or lack of value of this tariff board which we have acting in association with the minister and the house. I should like the minister to give us the points of information I have mentioned in regard to all these items. It would facilitate the business of the house and add to the information that can be gleaned from the discussion.

Mr. ROBB: The old item 534 covered:

> Cotton yarn, polished or glazed, when imported by manufacturers of shoe laces for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories.

Now we know that none of this fabric was used in the manufacture of shoe laces, but notwithstanding that, there were $141,000 of imports, and the Customs department have said that therefore there must be evasion of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: But cotton yarns were free under the old act. May I direct my hon. friend's attention to the old tariff? The following items were free: First, cotton yarns, whether dyed or not, for boot and shoe laces; second, yarn for mantles. Then we have cotton yarn for tape lines, at duties of 5, 7½ and 10 per cent. Now we come to cotton yarns not manufactured in this country. Under the old items 534 and 532 all these yarns come in free. Now let us turn to the new tariff. Item 522 provides "cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single," 10, 15 and 20 per cent; item 522a "cotton yarns exceeding 20's but not exceeding 40's, single," 12½, 15 and 22½ per cent; item 522b, "cotton yarns exceeding 40's, single," 7½, 10 and 15 per cent; item 522c, "plied yarns and threads, (n.o.p.)," 15, 22½ and 25 per cent. What I should like to ask the minister is who is responsible for the increase in the tariff on cottons in this country at this moment. We have a right to know that.

Mr. ROBB: On cotton yarns?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, on cotton yarns.

Mr. BOIVIN: The old item 520 provided a duty on cotton yarns of 15, 22½ and 25 per cent. The new duty is 10, 15 and 20 per cent, so there is really a reduction.

Mr. DUNNING: In the printed document the same old tariff items by number appear in various places. That, of course, indicates that articles formerly grouped together are now separated. Therefore the whole inference my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) draws is not correct as related to one individual matter.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason why I read them all.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has not yet got my point. Item 534 is quoted in a number of places in the cotton schedule because apparently it was a sort of omnibus item to include the many different commodities which have been separated under the new arrangement on the basis of counts. This, according to the information supplied to the tariff board, is the trade way of separating various items for tariff purposes. As to whether on the whole there is really a reduction in duty or an increase, that can be gathered from the statement of the Minister of Finance given in support of the individual items. In the case of shoe laces, mentioned by my hon friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans), there is lower down, I notice, a reduction in the duty on shoelaces, as such. As the minister pointed out, material which came under the shoelace raw material classification was not in practice, according to the evidence of the customs department, used for that purpose at all. So that really the effort has been to arrive at a classification easily understood and easily applied. I am informed that the Dominion appraisers were consulted and did play a part in defining just exactly what the different classifications should be, in order to get groupings which were reasonably uniform, and so prevent evasion of the law. In reality, as far as I understand this particular part of the cotton schedule, it is a reclassification for administrative purposes rather than anything else.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, that is a very excellent explanation from the minister's standpoint, but it really evades the point at issue, which is this. Under item 522 in the revised tariff, cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single, are now rated at 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent. My submission to the minister is that, as far as we are able to learn from the documents before us, these yarns were free in the previous classification.

Mr. ROBB: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. If the number was not free, will the minister give us precise information as to what the tariff was previously on cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single.

Mr. ROBB: Items 520, 534, 734 and 750. They were 15, 22½ 25; for boot and shoe laces they were free, free, free; yarns for mantles, free, free, free. But as I pointed out a moment ago, they are not used for shoelaces. Now, it is reasonable to suppose that this product was imported and used to manufacture a fabric that had protection; and it is also reasonable to suppose that whoever produces the yarn should share in that protection.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry the minister fails to grasp my very simple point. Cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single, is a specific item and can be found in the schedule, whether grouped with others or not. My submission is that under the heading in the old tariff it is free.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Railways says no. Very good. Will he kindly indicate in the old tariff precisely what was the rate on cotton yarns not exceeding 20's single. Never mind the rest of them; let us get this one.

Mr. ROBB: The record I have shows the rate was 15, 22½, 25.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the item? Will the minister read 520 in the group in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB:

520: Batts, batting and sheet wadding of wool, cotton or other fibre, cotton warps and cotton yarns, dyed or not, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not say anything about cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single.

Mr. ROBB: That is where it is alleged it came in. We are so advised by the department.

Mr. STEVENS: A moment ago the minister gave us three other items, 534, 734 and 750. The reason I am pressing this is that the other day I ran across a case which illustrates how dangerous it is for the house to pass an item that is supposedly just moderately changed. For instance, a few years ago, I think in 1923, the house passed an item in which words were introduced something to this effect, "for the use of manufacturers." It was stated at the time that these words were added simply to clarify the item, and certainly they sounded very innocent. The item applied to parts of machinery used in the cotton industry. The British manufacturer of cotton machinery naturally was forced to keep in Canada a depot of parts that might be required to promptly supply to machines that he had set up in Canada. On the other hand the American manufacturer in Boston—that was the chief centre—could ship in his parts overnight. Previously the tariff item had been 10 per cent in both cases. The amendment to which I refer had this effect, that the British manufacturer had to pay 15 per cent on the parts he sent to his depot here, while the American manufacturer paid only 10 per cent on the parts he sent in. As a matter of fact, the amendment was inserted at the instance of the American manufacturer, and he laughed at his British competitor and pointed out how he had put it over him. As I say, the words looked very innocent.

Mr. ROBB: Are they in the tariff yet?

Mr. STEVENS: Unless a change has been made in this schedule. I have not yet had time to make a check.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend can give me the item I will look it up.

Mr. STEVENS: I intend to bring it to the minister's attention as soon as I have had an opportunity of checking this schedule. It may be included in this item where you make the whole thing free. By reason of what happened in the case I have referred to, we are curious to know just what is the effect of the dividing up and the reclassification of these items. While I think the minister desires to be courteous, I am not yet satisfied that this item, cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single, was included in 520 that he read a moment ago, because it is not specified there.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has just pointed out the trouble that occurred in administration. Considerable evidence was taken upon this very point of precisely how cotton of this kind should be classified for customs purposes. If my memory of the evidence is correct, it was generally agreed that, regardless of the question of percentages, the proper basis on which to levy customs duties would be on a simple classification based on counts, the trade term by which those dealing in the commodity distinguish between one class of goods and another. There were no counts in the old tariff; it was just, Yarns, n.o.p., and so on—a very general, vague description. In yarns we have counts of one to twenty, twenty to forty, and from forty up. It is, of course, quite difficult to extract, from the dozen items involved, exactly which would have fallen into the ranges of one to twenty, twenty to forty and forty and up respectively. It would be impossible to tell exactly. But the minister gave the revenue effect, grouping them all together, and the effect in relation to that one item touching the shoe lace business is apparently that there will be an increase. That also, however, is qualified by what the administrative branch of the Department of Revenue tells us, namely, that while none of this material, which was formerly admitted free for shoe lace purposes, was so used, nevertheless a considerable difficulty arose in connection with it.

Mr. GEARY: The matter is as clear as mud now. Can the minister tell me this: Is there any cotton yarn free under the proposed new schedule? And do the old schedules mean anything when they say that cotton is free? There are cotton yarns free under the present rates while the proposed rates contain no item regarding free cotton yarn. What is to become of the old one?

Mr. DUNNING: Mercerized cotton yarns are free in 522d under the British preference only.

Mr. BENNETT: Is nothing else free under the new tariff?

Mr. ROBB: 522d is free under all classifications.

An hon. MEMBER: It isn't here.

Mr. ROBB: No, the leader of the opposition has a copy.

Mr. BENNETT: This refers to yarns and warps, wholly of cotton, imported by manufacturers to be further manufactured in their own factories. This is a limitation; is it another joker?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MANION: Was this put in free so that the minister might be able to say that there was something free? I notice that none of the rest of them are. Is that the real purpose for making this free?

Mr. ROBB: I shall be glad to give an explanation when we come to it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have under my hand the evidence taken before the tariff board in connection with this matter. I will not, of course, read the whole of the evidence, but I may quote from the report:

> In the matter of an application by the Consumers' League of Canada for reduction of duties on all cotton goods, and application of the Wabasso Cotton Company, Limited, for the elimination from item 530 of the tariff of "cotton yarns, No. 40 and finer," and the placing of these upon the dutiable list.

There follows a list of those who appeared before the board, by counsel or otherwise. I take it that hon. members, like myself, have been interested to ascertain the meaning of the words "forty" and "twenty" used in this particular context, and perhaps it might be instructive to see what is said in this regard:

> First of all, by way of explanation as to what constitutes 40's yarn, we may say that for the purposes of trade and manufacturing, 840 yards of cotton thread spun from one pound of raw cotton is called one hank or one count, and is known as No. 1 count of yarn.
> If 8,400 yards are spun from one pound of raw cotton it then becomes 10's count of yarn; similiarly 33,600 yards, or 40 times 840 yards, are spun from one pound, it is then 40's count of yarn and so on.

No doubt other hon. gentlemen have heretofore been just as ignorant as I was regarding the matter. Now let us proceed. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has indicated the situation in a single question. What items were free before the tariff was revised by the minister? That is one question; another is this: is there a single item which is left free on the tariff the minister has brought down except the one under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: Mercerized is free altogether.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not until my hon. friend had further light on the subject. Under the British preference it was free. To-day my hon. friend for the first time proposes a new paragraph in relation to the cotton schedules. Whether or not, in view of his speech this afternoon, it bears any relation to the vote yesterday on the budget, I will not say. This, however, I will say, that it meets the views advanced by certain gentlemen opposite in opposing certain features of the tariff as it stood. The new item I shall read presently, but I may remark in passing that technically we ought not to proceed with the consideration of it without having it printed for distribution; it is impossible for hon. members to follow these items unless they are printed. My hon. friend to my left and I are indebted to the courtesy of the minister for copies, but other hon. gentlemen will find it difficult to follow the discussion. The item reads:

Yarns and warps—

This will interest the committee.

—wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers to be further manufactured in their own factories: free, free, free.

This is a new item in the minister's tariff proposals: so far as this House is concerned, it first saw the light of day this afternoon. It is not yet before the committee as a whole, and it would not be difficult to guess, judging by the faces I see before me, to what we are indebted for this particular change in the tariff. It is rather interesting to know that the influence of those hon. gentlemen weighed to the extent it did. Is it quite right, however, to proceed with the consideration of this matter without having it so presented to the committee as to make an understanding of it possible? My hon. friends on this side are of the opinion that it should have been printed before they were asked to proceed with it, because this is a matter of great importance to some of the constituencies represented on this side as well as to others represented by some gentlemen opposite. However, as I have pointed out, the situation could not have been better and more succinctly stated than it has been in the inquiry directed to the minister by my hon. friend from South Toronto. He says—and is not this the crux of the matter—that the government must determine whether or not it is increasing or lowering the duties in the cotton schedules. The first question is: Were there free items in the tariff as it stood before the minister introduced his budget? The answer is found in these sheets that have been circulated to-day, and if hon. gentlemen will look at them they will see the matter clearly stated. Take page 4 and follow the items right down:

Waste, etc., free, free, free.
Raw cotton, etc., free, free, free.
Rags, etc., free, free, free.

I am reading the present rates.

Cotton yarns, etc., n.o.p., dyed or not, for boot and shoe laces, free, free, free.
Yarn for mantles, free, free, free.
Cotton yarns, free, free, free.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a repetition of the same item.

Mr. BENNETT: They are separated under the new items; under the old they were all free. I am reading, as I say, from page 4 of the document. Then you go further:

Cotton yarns, number forty and finer, free, free, free.
Buckram, etc., free, free, free.
Cotton duck for hose pipe, free, free, free.
Certain candlewick—no change, free, free, free.

There you have a statement, in the document printed and circulated by the government, regarding a number of items which in the old tariff were free. I am exposing this because it is clear just what is sought to be done.

Mr. ROBB: Most of them are free yet.

Mr. BENNETT: Will my hon. friend point to a single one that is free under the new general tariff? It is true there is one under the British preference.

Mr. DUNNING: Item 520.

Mr. BENNETT: That is under the new tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change; those are all free. I am talking of the items other than raw material; my hon. friend is right.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Item 524.

Mr. BENNETT: That is cotton duck for use in the manufacture of hose pipe. I read that, and there is no change in it. I am particularly directing attention to those yarns, and perhaps I should make it clearer. That was the item we were discussing at the moment. Look at the item; look at the old tariff and the new tariff and ask yourselves whether or not this is a protective tariff. That is what you have to do. Do not let us have the government go to the country and tell the people how they have reduced the tariff on cottons, make the welkin ring in the remote sections of western Canada with what the government have done in that direction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) has heard that tale before. Let us look at this thing in the light of the application contained on page 1 of book 1; then I read books 2 and 3, and although I have only had time to look through a part of them I found that this tariff board was set up and its duties defined under order in council P.C. 530. What have they done? Mr. Deachman, acting for the Consumers'

League, himself made a complaint that the duties on cottons were too high; he asked for a reduction all along the line and gave his evidence on behalf of that league. The happy face of the gentleman who so honoured that association with his presidency is now translated to another sphere, but there are those with whom he was associated whom I assume to be still making their contributions to the maintenance of the Consumers' League. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) still laughs; he realizes just what a league it was.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Was? It still is.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I am sure my hon. friend from South Huron is one of the most distinguished apostles of that league. At any rate, here is the evidence given by Mr. Deachman and the evidence called by him to support his case; here is the evidence given by the Wabasso Company asking for an increase of the duty; here is the order appointing the tariff board, and here their duties are defined. I asked the other day if there was a report made, and I read the report. That report did not specify any action to be taken by the government nor did it find any facts upon which the minister could act or upon which this parliament could act. That is the worst part of it; no facts were found upon which this parliament could act, and now we are told that in a meeting in the minister's office, with these gentlemen sitting about a table, certain discussions took place. Hon. gentlemen used to denounce the old star chamber and the red parlours; these are the same gentlemen who used to cry out against the way in which the tariff was formed. What is the difference between that system and having these gentlemen, who took evidence and made no findings of fact, sit around a table and tell the minister what they think should be done?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend does not insinuate that the Wabasso Cotton Company are our friends?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no hesitation in so stating.

Mr. ROBB: Then may the Lord deliver us from our friends.

Mr. BENNETT: Well might the hon. gentleman make that observation; he has reason to make it. No man of whom I know has greater reason to say, "Lord, deliver me from my friends." I think I can say that, without violating my friendship with the minister. But I was going to say, with respect to some of the gentlemen who appeared, that they are noted for their consistent advocacy of the Liberal cause. I will at least say that, without saying whether or not they are friends of the government. It may be that they have ceased to be the friends of the minister, although I would require some further word than the mere observation made by the minister before I could credit that. Here we have the board and the order in council appointing them; their duties are defined. Now I leave it to my friend from South Huron, who has been greatly interested in this matter, whether after reading that order in council which imposed upon this body the finding of facts, he thinks they have fulfilled their duties in taking this evidence which I have under my hand and then meeting together in the office of the minister, making no written report, giving nothing upon which I could have arrived at a conclusion and nothing to assist me, leaving me to proceed in the dark. But the minister, with the glare of the electric lights impairing his health, after long, weary hours of work, listened to the observations made by these gentlemen who constitute this board as to what action should be taken by the government, and now we find that these articles which were free have a duty imposed upon them. That is the story, and I leave it to the people of this country to say whether or not under these circumstances we have a protective tariff or a free trade policy.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was very much interested in the statement made by the Minister of Railways that up to item 522a at least there had been a general balancing up of duties, rather than a general increase or decrease. I think the minister tried to make the point that no attempt had been made up to item 522a, to raise or lower the duties, but that the items had been reclassified.

Mr. DUNNING: No, my hon. friend must have completely misunderstood me.

Mr. KENNEDY: I thought the minister stated that the idea was to reclassify rather than to make a distinct change in the duty in one direction or the other.

Mr. DUNNING: That was with respect to an item which I was then discussing.

Mr. KENNEDY: Was it item 522?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it was the fortieth part of one of the items.

Mr. KENNEDY: Since we have been discussing 522b I wish to point out that this item—

Mr. DUNNING: As yet we have not discussed item 522b at all.

Mr. KENNEDY: We have been discussing everything up to 40's and finer, and that includes item 522b.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not been discussing everything.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is quite right in referring to item 522b, because you cannot discuss the one without the other. The Minister of Railways, as I said a moment ago, endeavoured to make a perfectly clear matter exceedingly difficult to understand. I have before me the customs tariff, from which I am going to quote, and I am also going to quote from the item before us. I asked the minister to give me this information, but he was unable to do so. Under item 532 of the customs tariff as it now stands we have these certain items of raw material and so on which I shall not read, and then it includes cotton yarns, number 40 and finer, which are free under all tariffs. That is carried into the new tariff in this form:

Cotton yarns exceeding number forty, single: 7½ per cent British preference; 10 per cent intermediate; 15 per cent general.

I think that is a fair statement of the situation. In that particular item we have cotton yarns which were previously free protected by a duty of 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent. Then we have cotton yarns, exceeding 20's, to which I referred a moment ago, and as far as I can see in the present tariff there is no specified item of cotton yarns exceeding 20's. For that reason I presume the minister was unable to answer my question a moment ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Item 520 would be closest to it.

Mr. STEVENS: No, item 534 would be the closest. That item reads:

Cotton yarns, polished or glazed, when imported by manufacturers of shoe laces for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles. . . . .

Mr. DUNNING: That is not it.

Mr. STEVENS: No, item 520 is the one:

Batts, batting and sheet wadding of wool, cotton or other fibre, cotton warps and cotton yarns, dyed or not, n.o.p.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. STEVENS:

—15 per cent; 22½ per cent; 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: That corresponds as nearly as may be to 522a.

Mr. STEVENS: We have then an increase.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no, a reduction. The figures are 12½ per cent, 15 per cent, 22½ per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: That is for cotton yarns, 40's.

Mr. DUNNING: No, 20's and not exceeding 40's.

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to these varieties we have in this item the rates 7½ per cent; 10 per cent, and 15 per cent. Will the minister state whether that is right?

Mr. ROBB: Some explanation will be made of the items when we come to them. First with respect to the item the leader of the opposition mentioned:

Yarn of linen or of cotton for use only in the manufacture of measuring tape lines, when imported by the manufacturers of such tape lines: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

The total importations were $936. Now as to item 734:

Cotton thread, nitrate of thorium and nitrate of cerium for use in the manufacture of incandescent gas mantles, when imported by manufacturers of such mantles or of stocking for such mantles: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The total importations amounted to $53,851.

Mr. STEVENS: What becomes of these two items?

Mr. ROBB: They come into the item we are considering now.

Mr. BENNETT: Which one is that?

Mr. ROBB: Part comes into the new item 522. The present rates are 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, 25 per cent. The proposed rates are: 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent. My hon. friends will admit there is a reduction there.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said a moment ago that an item which was formerly free is now included in this item which is dutiable.

Mr. ROBB: I mentioned two items and gave the importations with respect to them. Now as to 522a, the present rates are: 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. The proposed rates—and this is an amendement which I have—will be: 12½ per cent, 15 per cent, 22½ per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What item are you dealing with? There are three items here.

Mr. ROBB: It is 522a I am dealing with now. Now as to 522b, that is the item to which my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre referred. That item at present is free in all classes. The proposed rates are: 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What mills are affected?

Mr. ROBB: I think many of the mills are affected. The Wabasso were making a specialty of this line. They were selling this product to industries that had protection. We thought it was reasonable that they should enjoy a proportion of the benefits. There is no increase in the manufactured product anywhere. This is raw material for some of the industries that are enjoying protection. There has been a reduction in the case of some of them. Why should the other industries enjoy all the protection?

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): In these cotton yarns of 40 and finer the industries using that tape are paying a duty of 10 per cent on the raw material on that particular item.

Mr. ROBB: I have a new item that I shall be coming to in a moment. The item 522d is just changing the wording. There is no change in the rate; it is free in the three classes.

Mr. STEVENS: What was 522d in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: The item we are dealing with is:

522d. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Has the duty been reduced on this particular item?

Mr. ROBB: No, it is just the same. My hon. friend asked a question about the tape that goes into 522a. There is a new item which reads:

522f. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton imported by manufacturers of tapes, braids, webbings and woven labels for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: Provided that yarns and warps which are entitled to free entry or to lower rates than are mentioned in this item shall not be entered at the rates specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. MANION: I think the discussion we have been having for the last hour and ten minutes is an illustration of the difficulty of that group government which my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) denounced so vociferously to the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) the other evening. We have had given us to-night an exhibition of government reclassification, but which is in reality an increase in the tariff on a number of items. No matter how much the attempt is made to hide it, that is what this amounts to. We find in the majority of these items that where there has been any change at all it has been a change to a higher tariff. That, without a doubt, is what has occurred. The Minister of Railways shakes his head, but in this group of items only one item in that group was free and that was after the minister came into the house to-night. The difficulty the government is in is very obvious. They have ministers like the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who are free traders, or say they are, and they have ministers like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of Finance himself, who are fairly good protectionists. And then they have the difficulty that when they travel out to the prairie provinces they tell those provinces that they are free traders; but when they travel through Quebec and Ontario they tell the people of those provinces that they are good protectionists, and they have to keep the balance in regard to their varying professions. Their action to-night reminded me a little of a Jewish friend of mine who is not a very good orthodox Jew. Of course he does not want to eat pork in public and whenever he does do so, he calls it chicken. Well, the ministers opposite me are in the same difficulty. They do not wish to call these changes in duty increased protection, so they call them a reclassification. That is what they are going to say when they are out in the prairie provinces. I bespeak sympathy on their behalf from the members from the prairie provinces, because they have great difficulties to overcome; but I rather think that from the standpoint of the country it would be far better for the Miinster of Finance to come right out and say that he is increasing protection, for that is what he is doing in some of these items. I venture to say that in the majority of cases he is hoodwinking the people; he is even trying to hoodwink parliament. I appeal to him to stop once in a while and give us a little chance. The Minister of Finance has this advantage, that he has had this matter before him for weeks while these items have only come before us quite recently, and it is only by chance in going through these items that we find out the real facts. I wish to congratulate the minister that in regard to many of these items he has pursued the course he has. I am very glad to see him do it because I believe it will be productive of good to the whole country. I wish he would base his own budgets on the same principle, and I think if he did that he would do more for the country than he has been doing with his budgets for the last few years.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends opposite seem to be very much concerned about one or two increases in the items which have so far been under discussion. They know just as well as I do that all of the items that have been under discussion so far are manufacturers' items, and my hon. friend knows as well as I do that when we come, as we shall in a few moments, to the consumers' items, to those parts of the cotton schedules which affect the consumer, which are the articles which the consumer purchases, there are substantial reductions. I may inform my hon. friends that I shall certainly go out and tell the people of the prairie provinces and the people of Canada generally regarding the reductions of duties in the consumers' items. My hon. friends opposite are accusing us of ruining the manufacturers. If we are doing what we are just now accused of doing, namely, raising the tariff, why all this three weeks of talk about ruining the industry? Surely the industry cannot be ruined if we have raised the consumers' items in the tariff. My hon. friend knows quite well what the fact is. In the manufacturers' items there are adjustments, some upward and some downward, as a result of the examination which has been made; but when we come to the items which apply to the consuming public, it will be found that the adjustments are all downward.

Mr. MANION: Does the Minister of Railways try to suggest that when the items affecting the manufacturers are raised and those affecting the consumers are lowered, the manufacturers consume their own articles? Who purchases from the manufacturers, I should like to know? After listening to the remarks of the Minister of Railways, of all the yarns that exist in these tariff schedules I am sure there are none like those he tells the people when he is trying to get away with these changes.

Mr. EVANS: I wish the minister had gone a little further and explained item 522b, why the duty is raised on those 40's, single and finer. As far as I can see, and according to the word of the Minister of Finance, some of the big cotton companies are manufacturing their own yarn. Some of them of course cannot do that. They are charged 5 per cent, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent now, whereas they used to get this in free. I do not think that is right. That means that the fabric manufactured from that class of yarn will be that much dearer, otherwise the small companies will very soon have to go out of business and then the big companies will have less competition than they have at present. Evidently those small companies are somewhat short on the influence end and the consumer in any event will be charged 5 per cent, 7½ per cent or 10 per cent more for the cotton fabric manufactured out of those yarns.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am very much interested in this item 522b, 40's and finer. I have in my hand the application to the tariff board by the Wabasso Cotton Company, Limited, Three Rivers, Quebec, requesting that 40's and finer be placed on the protected list instead of on the free list as at present. They refer to clause No. 530, under which 40's and finer come in under the old tariff. They state:

I think this should be 532.

—of the tariff reads: "Coir and coir yarn: raw cotton or cotton wool not dyed; cotton yarns, No. 40 and finer," on the free list.

We respectfully request that the words: "Cotton yarns, No. 40 and finer" be struck from this clause, and that these yarns be given protection.

That is the application. When I was making my speech on the budget I think I stated that in a general way I believed the tariff was increased on these cotton yarns. Yarn 40's and finer is a yarn that consumers use as well as manufacturers. It is the big item of import according to the trade of Canada. I have under my hand the trade of Canada up to 1926 and under this item there are more imports than in all the rest of the list of cotton yarns. The decreases in the other yarns amount to 5 per cent or 3 per cent or 4 per cent, as the case may be; but when we come to increasing the tariff on this item, which is by far the largest item, larger than all the rest put together, if my figures are correct—

Mr. DUNNING: For what purposes does the ordinary consumer use 40's and finer?

Mr. KENNEDY: I have seen the spools in houses.

Mr. DUNNING: Thread. My hon. friend had better look again. This is used to make thread.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is not any question about the fact that if a manufacturer pays more—and that is what he is going to do under this application of the Wabasso Cotton Company—for his yarns, he is going to charge that up to the Canadian consumer, because on the second page of the application I find this statement:

> As Wabasso are spinners of fine counts of yarns, and have quietly carried on and worked up a considerable business for these yarns, we ask that, having demonstrated that these fine yarns can be made in Canada, and by producing them at a loss, we be now given protection.

If they ask that they be given protection because they have been producing yarns at a loss, why do they want protection? To raise the price, of course. I am interested at this moment not so much in whether free trade or protection is right, as in the question of what is the basis of the revision of this tariff and how it compares with what the Liberal party has always claimed it stands for. It has been argued over there: We want increases; we want reductions. That is not any excuse for a party that went to the country on a low tariff platform. If the Minister of Finance has information that can convince me I am wrong, I am willing to listen to it, but as regards these items I should like to have information regarding the imports and the general effect of the change in duties, reductions or increases. So far I have been convinced by my own examination and what I have heard that the general trend is an increase in duty, if we take into account the size of the items on which increases are granted in the nature of protection for the manufacturers. On the item 522b, we have discussed that. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) said that there was a joker in the tariff. This is a change whereby the manufacturers were going to be asked to pay some duty. The rates were free under the British preference, 10 per cent under the intermediate, and 15 per cent under the general tariff. The old rates were free, free, free. Now under this revision we are back again to: free, free, free, for manufacturers who are using that type of stuff. That is the joker again. I have claimed—and I think I am right although I am open to convicition—that this one item is more important than any other group on which the government have given reductions in the whole cotton schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: Which item?

Mr. KENNEDY: Item 522b. Imports of 40's and finer amounted in the year ended 31st March, 1926, to 2,732,069 pounds of a value of $2,580,014.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend believes that to be a consumers' item?

Mr. KENNEDY: I did not say that. I said that some consumers use this material.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just where is the Minister of Railways going to draw the line as between the consumer and the non-consumer?

Mr. DUNNING: I will try to answer that. The case just mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River gives an excellent opportunity. He spoke of 522b as a consumers' item, because he thought it included thread. As a matter of fact it includes merely the fine yarns used by thread manufacturers, the raw material. If my hon. friend would go to the next item, 522c, he would find there the thread which is used by the consumer, and in connection with which there is a reduction in the duty. That is the answer.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would ask the Minister of Finance if we could not have a copy of the amendments as speedily as possible. Now that a working agreement has been entered into between our friends of the opposition and the hon. member for Peace River and other hon. gentlemen, it is important to us who are interested in the real significance of things—unlike the hon. member for Peace River, who is not much interested whether this thing is right or not—that we should know just what the house is considering. I would therefore urge upon the finance minister that he let us have a copy of these amendments as speedily as possible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is all right for hon. gentlemen opposite who have been keeping away from protection since the Winnipeg convention to laugh at an appeal made by myself to the minister for information in this matter. At the same time I do not think it is any laughing matter if they think they are going to put over their platform with that kind of thing.

Mr. MANION: It is not half as bad for us to laugh at the hon. gentleman as it is for him to laugh at his own principles, as he is now doing in connection with these items where there is an increase of protection. The hon. member for Peace River has the courage to fight for his principles, while the hon. member for Melfort defends the government that brings down these increases.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I was not defending anyone; I was asking for information, especially in view of the agreement threatened a few days ago that the members from Alberta would get together with the protectionists to make a saw-off.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that statement was not funny, I would answer it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Then there would be two funny statements together.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the hon. gentlemen who sit to the right of the ministers, and who come so largely from Saskatchewan and some from Manitoba, have heard the clear distinction the Minister of Railways has drawn as between the manufacturers and the consumers, because I have before me the record of the proceedings in connection with this hearing before the tariff board, and now my friend from South Huron will hear the language of his great proponent and advocate, Mr. Deachman, as to the relation between the manufacturers and the consumers. Like my hon. friend from Melfort, he has no doubt who the consumers are. Mr. Deachman, who represented the Consumers' League and was voluntarily upholding the case of my hon. friend from South Huron, filed his application with the Minister of Finance, and at page 327 of reference No. 64 before the tariff board, he starts out in this way:

A report of the Bureau of Statistics covering Canadian industry in 1924 gives the total value of cotton, yarn and cloth made in Canada as $69,984,875. The wages paid amounted to $10,993,045, or approximately 16 per cent of the total value of the product. In other lines of cotton products, the wage ratio to total value of the production was even less. This is an application for a reduction of the general tariff rate on all cotton goods to a maximum of 16 per cent. We desire to state this position as simply and clearly as possible.

Then follow statistics with reference to the industry, and then he says:

Where such a duty is imposed and the manufacturer raises his price to the foreign level—

How familiar this must sound to my friend the minister! I have heard him use these words himself:

Where such a duty is imposed and the manufacturer raises his price to the foreign level plus the duty, we as consumers are compelled to pay—

Note that:

—we as consumers are compelled to pay, in an indirect bonus to this industry, a sum equal to double the entire wage cost in the production of the commodity.

These are the words of the advocate for the Consumers' League, presenting his case for reduction of the tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: To the consumer.

Mr RENNETT: Certainly; I am talking about the consumer.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a new thing for my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I have been a considerable consumer—of time in this house, for instance. Mr. Deachman continues:

Our contention is that we as consumers can not afford to pay to an industry in Canada a bonus so far out of proportion to the service rendered to the community.

How that does sound like a western speech from my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. He goes on:

We desire to be fair to an established industry.

So like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

We desire to encourage it by every legitimate means.

Like my hon. friend from Melfort.

We realize that the cotton textile industry, operating in a country where the people are suffering from limitation of purchasing power caused by high tariffs—

High tariffs after this government has been six years in power?

An hon. MEMBER: And the tariff is now being raised.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Deachman says:

We realize that the cotton textile industry, operating in a country where the people are suffering from limitation of purchasing power caused by high tariffs, is entitled to a measure of protection sufficient to compensate for the limitations forced upon it by high protection.

Then he says.

We emphasize again that the measure suggested by us for the protection of this industry should be understood as being purely temporary in character.

And then later he says:

The object, as we see it, is to encourage industries by subventions which, while borne directly by the consuming classes, are not excessively burdensome for the moment and in regard to which there may exist a reasonable hope that time may remove the burden.

That is what they are after. He says that they are borne directly by the consuming classes, and he is dealing with the very item which the Minister of Railways says is a manufacturing item.

Mr. DUNNING: No. My hon. friend is at his old tricks again, quoting something which does not deal with what the Minister of Railways said at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Railways was dealing with item 522, and this and others are the items Mr. Deachman was dealing with in the application I hold in my hand.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend quote Mr. Deachman's reference to what the Minister of Railways was discussing, please?

Mr. BENNETT: I have just read the application, which is an application to lower all of the cotton duties, including item 522 which is the item now under consideration. That item is now being increased not lowered, and the minister offers as an explanation this beautiful argument: "This is a manufacturer's item". Yet Mr. Deachman, appearing for my hon. friend from South Huron, says, "I am representing the consumers, and they have to pay this increase if it is granted, they and no one else." Now as between Mr. Deachman, representing the Consumers' League, and the Minister of Railways, representing the government that so greatly loves power, will the hon. member for South Huron have any difficulty as to whom to choose?

Mr. MacMILLAN: We are going to have some of these duties reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the way to talk.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the leader of the opposition say with his usual dexterity what the Minister of Railways said, may I now repeat what the Minister of Railways actually did say? He was answering the question addressed to him by the hon. member for Peace River, who had stated that the item 40's and finer included thread as used by the consumer, and I explained that the item 40's and finer did not include thread as used by the consumer, but that it included the materials from which such threads are made. Then I referred him to the next item in the tariff, which does include the thread as used by the consumer, and in connection with that item there is a reduction in the tariff. That was my statement, and by that statement I will stand. My hon. friend, of course, with his great ability and dexterity, can make it appear that I said something entirely different, but that is what I said. When the manufacturer's item is increased in duty, and the item which the consumer purchases from that manufacturer is reduced in duty, then the effect is a reduction so far as the consumer is concerned. My hon. friend well knows that. If it were not so, why all the complaint about ruining the manufacturers? We are not ruining them by that process.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. KENNEDY: I am quite willing to admit, Mr. Chairman, that I made a slip there. But it does not affect my point that the other manufacturers are the consumers of that article, and they are so described in the Wabasso company's application. But it has the effect of increasing the price to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it does not.

Mr. ROBB: Following the argument of my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), first, let me say that any changes which I have brought down to-night by way of amendments are either only a change in wording or a reduction in the rate.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, on the cotton schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely no.

Mr. ROBB: As to this cotton yarn item under consideration, we had in the old tariff the anomaly of the 40's and coarser being protected, while the 40's and finer—the more expensive to produce—were free. Forties and finer are the raw material for the finished products that enjoy duty. A good part of it goes into thread, and the proof that it will not increase the cost to the user of thread is that we are reducing the thread item under the British preference. This item under consideration, of which my hon. friends have taken advantage, is practically the only instance of a material increase in the cotton schedule. It is a bit of a rest for me this evening to hear my hon. friends on both sides of the house saying that the manufacturers are going to profit by these tariff changes. Since the budget was brought down last February I have listened to nothing but tales of woe from manufacturers who claimed that they were ruined, and particularly the cotton manufacturers. I know where the complaint comes from over here and down there; it comes from the lobbying manufacturers of the cotton mills.

Mr. BENNETT: They certainly have not seen me.

Mr. ROBB: I admit that only one mill will be materially benefited by this change. All the other mills are against that mill; they are just as much free-traders as anybody else when it is an advantage to themselves. They have asked: Why should you make this change? We have looked this over very carefully and we think it is a very fair adjustment.

Mr. BENNETT: For this one company.

Mr. ROBB: That one company has not been enjoying whatever protection there was. Whether protection is right or wrong, let us use the barnyard phrase and say, the other fellows were "hogging" it.

Mr. BENNETT: Thirty-nine per cent of the product of the Wabasso Company consisted of counts 40 and over.

Mr. ROBB: Let me put this proposition to my hon. friends and ask if they will suport me. Suppose we refer this whole thing back to the tariff board—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB: Wait a moment. Suppose we refer this whole thing back to the tariff board, and get a recommendation for a straight reduction all along the cotton schedule, will they support that?

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have not any confidence in that bunch.

Mr. ROBB: I do not claim that these readjustments are perfect, by any means. But I do claim they are a great improvement on the old customs tariff as we find it for administrative purposes, and that the general trend is a reduction in the items that go to the consumer. I am supported in that view by the manufacturers of cotton, and they should know something about their business.

Mr. SIMPSON: The minister states that one of the chief reasons for this increase in duty is that the yarn is being sold to manufacturers who enjoy a substantial degree of protection. Will he apply that principle to the iron and steel industry with respect to spring and axle steel used by the automobile manufacturers?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think we will have the iron and steel schedule before us this year; it is not completed yet. But when I do bring it before the house I wonder if I will receive unanimous support from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. STEVENS: We will look it over first.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister apply the same principle with regard to worsted yarns? That item appears a little lower down. I understand the minister to say that he believes the manufacturers of these cotton yarns should have a certain degree of protection because other manufacturers of cotton goods have protection on their output. I want him to bear that statement in mind—I do not object to it—

Mr. ROBB: I know what my hon. friend is coming to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —when he comes to worsted yarns. I emphasize it now so that he will not forget it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the minister should give us a little more information as to why he is protecting this one manufacturer. It does strike me that there are a number of things in this budget pretty hard to explain. Looking over the woollen schedule, for example, I am informed there is one manufacturer who has two mills, one working on domestic material, the other on imported; and that there is protection added to the one and taken off the other. That is he gets protection twice. Then in the lumber schedule we find there is $1.50 protection on fir doors, but there is no protection on pine, hemlock or any other kind of doors. I am informed that there are only two firms in the Dominion making that particular class of door. Of course, I have been informed what are their political affiliations. Then we come to the drawback of duty on coal for the manufacture of salt. I wonder how many members know the number of manufacturers that are engaged in that industry, and their political affiliations. I say, Mr. Chairman, this budget has all the earmarks of a political budget for the friends of the government.

Mr. POWER: Let us hope so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, that is frank. But, after all, are we not here to legislate for the good of the Dominion?

Mr. POWER: To a limited degree.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am very thankful for the information, so frankly given; we are learning. I think we should have a little more definite information as to why the Wabasso plant is to be protected and protection taken away from the other plants. Of course, the Minister of Railways argued very glibly to-night—and he can argue just as well on one side as the other—that when you increase the cost of the raw material you do not increase the cost of the finished product. That is something new from the Minister of Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I did not argue that at all.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is the effect of his argument.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely, the whole burden of it.

Mr. McGIBBON: The effect of the whole argument from the ministerial side is to blind the country to the fact that this is a budget to give protection to the friends of the government; all the rest of the people are to suffer. That has been acknowledged very frankly from the other side, and I am glad.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When the duty on a manufactured article is reduced, is it possible for the manufacturer to increase the price of the article, beyond the duty price, no matter what his raw material costs?

Mr. ROBB: That is answered by the law of supply and demand.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister made some statement about members being lobbied. I have not been lobbied by anybody—neither by manufacturers nor by anyone else.

Mr. ROBB: I wish I could say the same.

Mr. KENNEDY: In the next item, 522c, we have some information regarding the consumers. There are five items in regard to which a reduction is asked for to protect the consumer against the increase which would otherwise accrue to the finished product as a result of the increase in forties and finer. Item 534, cotton yarns, which was free under the three classifications, has become dutiable to the extent of 15 per cent, 22 per cent, and 25 per cent. Item 520 cotton yarns, was 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent under the old item; there is no change. Item 536, cotton thread, was 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent, and there is a reduction of 2½ per cent under the British preference, the others being the same as before. Item 721, tinsel thread, was 5 per cent, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent; it is now 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. Item 734, yarn for mantles, was free under the three classifications and is now 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. So that on the average there is no reduction, unless the imports are greatly out of proportion taking the different items affected. There is only one case in which there is a reduction, that of cotton thread, 2½ per cent under the British preference, while in three of the items there is a jump from 3 or 5 per cent to 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 25 per cent. I fail to see that the consumer is protected against an increase in forties and finer.

Mr. SPOTTON: We on this side have been charged with having met some peculiar type of human being called a lobbyist. When I left my constituency to come here my friends told me to be careful of lobbyists. Now I have met a lot of fine people in this Washington of the north and I have been keeping a lookout around the corner for those hideous monsters called lobbyists. The Minister of Finance says that we on this side have been lobbying. I have not; at least, if I have done so I have not known it. I would ask the Minister of Finance to be good enough to describe to me in words if he can, and if not by means of a picture, just what a lobbyist is. In the meantime, I deny the charge. One objection I have to make is that the tariff is being used, in my opinion, as a club for political purposes. It was so used in North Huron in the town of Goderich. Every industry was visited by various members of the cabinet, who intimidated, or coaxed, or cajoled, or promised. The bludgeon was held over the heads of those engaged in industry, so much so that the Liberal paper, a copy of which I have in my desk, came out with the statement that all the captains of industry in the town of Goderich were supporting the Liberal candidate. The farmers of North Huron resented this and rallied to my support. You cannot kid the people all the time; you cannot run with the hare and hunt with the hounds any longer, Mr. Chairman. I wish to advise your minister accordingly. Why, sir, on one platform the Liberal candidate, who holds the same doctrine as the member for South Huron, gave a free trade speech in Goderich in the presence of the Prime Minister and all the cabinet with the exception of one of two—I see only one or two new faces. He gave a right royal, old time free trade speech, going back to Cobden and all the others. But when the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose—and many hon. members opposite will bear me out—the first thing he did was to declare himself thus: "I am not a free trader; I am not a high protectionist. I believe in a moderate protection which will keep the industries of Canada running and give employment". That is where we stand, Mr. Chairman. But hon. gentlemen like the member for South Huron and the member for South Perth will stand up and address this little group here, giving them free trade speeches, and only occasionally a cabinet minister from the west will accord them a little applause. Once again I would ask the Minister of Finance to tell me, as a new member, what this Consumers' League is about which I hear so much. I went to school with Mr. Deachman, who is at the head of the league.

An hon. MEMBER: He is it.

Mr. SPOTTON: Furthermore, I went to school to his father, one of the old pioneer school teachers. I met Mr. Deachman in the corridor the other night and I said to him, "Bob, what is the Consumers' League? Are there three or four in it besides the government?" He replied, "Oh, there are perhaps one or two hundred". But before Bob could tell me anything more about it a couple of gentlemen close to the front benches put their arms about him and remarked, "Come on, you are positively a good Liberal". And he is a good Liberal. He writes letters to the Liberal papers in my riding every week contributing propaganda. I should like to know, therefore, what his real connection is with this government, and who brought him to this beautiful Washington of the north to live. You cannot kid Huron county so far as the Consumers' League is concerned. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other cabinet ministers kidded them once, but these gentlemen cannot kid them again. As an infant, so to speak, who is just groping about in the dark, fearful of various hidden dangers, I beseech the minister to tell me what a lobbyist is. If he cannot give a verbal description of one I would ask him in all kindness to draw me a picture of the chairman of his tariff board, who has been the most expert lobbyist and who brought the railway situation into the mess it was once in. At least, the minister might give me his picture. At any rate, I deny the charge that I have been met by lobbyists, so far as I know what the word means.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BENNETT: Before the item is carried I want to add that I have not been lobbied by anyone in respect of these matters. One gentleman who met me did say, "I cannot talk these matters over with you because they are entirely in the hands of the government and I am apprehensive that if it became known that I had anything to say to you on the subject I might be punished for so doing." That is the attitude of industry in this country towards the government in this regard, as in relation to the Rideau retaining wall and everything else that is conducted in that way. And I shall have occasion to refer to this before the session is over. I want it clearly understood that no one lobbies me in my present position; no one lobbies me or anyone else connected with this party. We are going to do our duty fearlessly.

Mr. HANSON: For the benefit of the Minister of Finance I want to say that the cotton industry has not lobbied me. I will tell you what the attitude of the cotton industry is. The cotton industry are so afraid of the club the Minister of Finance is holding over them to-day that they will not come to my office about these matters. They are afraid they will either have to put up money for this government or be clubbed again. I have a very strong suspicion that some of them have already come across and that we see some of the effects of it in these very schedules to-night. I cannot prove that statement, but I believe it.

Mr. DUNNING: You bet you cannot. Take it back.

Mr. HANSON: I have every reason to believe that my suspicions are true.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has just made the charge that certain men have paid this government money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: I will leave it to the record of Hansard, and I hope it will not be changed. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman; my hon. friend should either make a charge and give those men a chance to defend themselves or withdraw the statement. He says he cannot prove it.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the hon. member to make that statement. However, if my hon. friend did have that understanding, the hon. member now says he did not say so.

Mr. DUNNING: Do I understand my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) to say that this government have been paid money?

Mr. HANSON: I said I had every reason to believe that a club was being held over the manufacturers by this government, by the Liberal party.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend distinctly mentioned money and the receipt of money by this government.

Mr. HANSON: If I said the government themselves were receiving money I did not mean anything of the sort; I meant the Liberal party.

Mr. DUNNING: That is so vague that no one can make my hon. friend prove his statement; it is sufficiently vague to be safe.

Mr. HANSON: The Minister of Railways need not be so touchy about campaign funds. Any man who was at the head of the Liberal machine in the province of Saskatchewan as long as he was should know something about campaign funds.

Mr. DUNNING: I am proud of coming from the province of Saskatchewan. No charge was ever made reflecting upon my honour as a public man in relation to campaign funds or money of any sort, and it ill becomes a New Brunswick Tory like my hon. friend, with his public record and with the public disgrace which was visited on him by the courts of his province, to say what he has said. Now I come back to this other question. There is some liberty in this parliament and it is not confined to one side of this house. I have not made a charge or a reflection of the kind the hon. member for York-Sunbury has just made regarding myself, in or out of this house, and I would not now reflect upon him if he had not been guilty of the ungentlemanly action which he has just performed. I think I have the right to say, however, that he is the last man in this house to cast a reflection on the honour of any man.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, I would not have risen had it not been for a personal reference to myself which was made by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: I made no such reference.

Mr. HANSON: My answer is this, that as far as my personal honour is concerned, it was vindicated before a jury of my peers, and as far as my public honour is concerned it has been twice vindicated by the electors of York-Sunbury by majorities which have never been exceeded in that constituency. The people of my city and of my riding, who know me far better than I am known by any man in this house, have recorded their confidence in me in such a marked degree as to give every man the answer to any calumnies which may be hurled against me.

Mr. MALONEY: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is so much bad in the best of us and so much good in the worst of us that it hardly behooves any of us to talk about the rest of us.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 522 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Railways has made some observations touching on a member of this house, and he has endeavoured to show that his hands and the hands of the government are clear with respect to campaign funds, about which some discussion took place. It was said that this legislation is being held as a club over the manufacturers. I leave this for the moment with the Minister of Finance: Is it a new thing in this house to have legislation introduced by the government of which he was a member, retroactive in its character, that was used as a club with which to extract money from people?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend has either said too much or not enough. If he has anything more to say I am willing to have him say it now.

Mr. BENNETT: Answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 522 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. ROBB: I have answered it.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has not answered it, as he knows very well. I might as well say to the minister that colleagues of his are not going to be permitted to indulge in any such talk as that uttered by the Minister of Railways to-night, while we keep eternally silent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: —while we keep eternally silent on matters which he himself knows are no credit to any party or any group of business men or to the public and political record of this country. Now, I believe, we are on item 522.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I do not think any member of this house can be allowed to make the remarks which my hon. friend has just uttered. They are a reflection on the honour of the house. If my hon. friend wishes to lay a charge let him do so, but I do not think any member can get up and speak in such an indeterminate and indefinite way in order to leave a general accusation against the whole of this side of the house, and in fact against both sides of the house. I may only add that if my hon. friend will reflect I think he will come to the conclusion that not much good will come from any such statements. We had them two years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the point of order?

Mr. CANNON: My point of order is that my hon. friend should not be allowed to make statements such as those he has made. He has no right to make them.

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to the point of order—

Mr. CANNON: The rule is well known; if he wishes to lay a charge let him do so, but if he does not wish to lay a charge he has no right to make such statements.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the Solicitor General should wait until he knows just what preceded my statement before raising his point of order. A good deal has been said in this committee in the last fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON: I was here, and I do not think much good will come out of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly not, but I have nothing to withdraw and nothing to change in what I said. The item which we have been discussing, and from which we have digressed rather considerably, is item 522, and the point at issue between the Minister of Finance and ourselves is this: The cotton schedule has been divided up and changed. With the general change of the cotton schedule we are not so much concerned, but we do complain that the government, on their responsibility as the government of this country, have broadcast throughout the country the statement that they have lowered the tariff generally, and particularly on the cotton schedule.

Mr. ROBB: May I inform my hon. friend that the amendment of the opposition practically said so, as well as all the speeches that we have listened to from February 16th up to to-night.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good; never mind that. That is one of the minister's peculiarly specious methods of dealing with this question, suggesting that because we happen to be protectionists we should not raise any question when the duties are raised. We are not complaining about the raising of the duties. What we do complain about is that the government holding office is seeking support throughout the country among what they call the consumers, if you like, on the ground that they are lowering taxation, lowering the cost of goods to the consumer. On the other hand, and I do not say this is any offensive sense but as a statement of fact, they are making arrangements with manufacturers to raise the tariff, which will have the effect of keeping them in a position of status quo at least, if not in a better position than they were before. We are not saying it is wrong to protect the manufacturers, but we do say it is wrong to do that and then go out and tell the public that they are lowering the duty in the interest, they say, of the consumer. That is what we complain about. Now in regard to these items, we have discussed them and there has been every conceivable effort made, particularly by the Minister of Railways, to becloud and evade the issue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no "oh, oh" about it; it is a fact. We know it and the house knows it. I say it is to the credit of the minister as a tactician that he does it with considerable skill, and I have not any doubt that he will repeat the performance when he gets out west, with a fair degree of political success. But that does not prevent us from exposing it as far as we are able to do so. The fact remains that in the case of the largest item of cotton imports, from being free the tariff has been raised to rates of 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, and 25 per cent. That is a fact. Now, a moment ago, just because my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) happened to make one little slip, which did not affect his argument to any degree at all, regarding thread used in stitching, which was confused for the moment with cotton yarns, both the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance said: Oh, we will deal with that when we come to threads; then we will show you what a great reduction we have made. I ask the minister if he will be good enough to give me the rates in the old item on threads used for stitching and the rates in the new item.

Mr. ROBB: Well, the rates have been reduced. They come in under 522c, on which the rates have been reduced from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent under the British preference. The other rates remain the same.

Mr. STEVENS: Now then we have—

Mr. ROBB: It may help my hon. friend with his argument if I make a statement. If he is right in what he has said, then the representations made by the textile people are all wrong, because I have a very clear recollection that the Dominion Textiles, for instance, say that these reductions mean a a loss to them of $600,000. I think I have their letters on the subject, but at any rate that is my recollection.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly.

Mr. ROBB: And Canadian Cottons say the reductions to them will mean pretty nearly a million dollars. I do not say they are right, but these are the representations that have been made to me.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be; but what we are complaining about is the presentation of these things to the house, not the fact that there is a reduction or an increase. We believe that industries should be adequately and fully protected as far as is necessary for their welfare in the community, but we are not going to allow the government to make changes and shiftings in the tariff and then come before the public and claim certain virtues. As a matter of fact, on this boasted item of reduction to the consumer here is what has happened: Under item No. 536 in the old schedule, cotton or linen thread was dutiable at 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent, and in the new schedule the rates that are so much boasted about are 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, and 25 per cent, a reduction of 2½ per cent in the British preferential rate. The reduction is so infinitesimal as not to warrant any claim to credit on the part of the government that under this item they are reducing the taxation to the consumers.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Finance a moment ago said that to a certain cotton company—he named the company, but I have forgotten the name; I was not lobbied so I do not remember it—this change meant a million dollars. In the case of another company I think he said $750,000.

Mr. ROBB: No, $600,000.

Mr. MANION: In view of these statements, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance says he is making this change to relieve the cotton manufacturers, why does the Minister of Railways argue that the government are trying to relieve the consumer?

Mr. DUNNING: Representations were made to the Minister of Finance that there was a loss of $1,000,000 in one case and of $600,000 in the other. Then the consumer gains because these losses are on the sales to the consumer.

Mr. MANION: That is not the way the minister explained it when he got up.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says the consumers have been saved in one case $600,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh no, they say that.

Mr. STEVENS: They say it? The minister cannot get up as a responsible minister and quote certain business men as his authority for placing certain figures on Hansard, letting them go out to the public as figures from this house, and then assert, "Oh, well, I am not saying it." The minister made the statement as though there had been a saving to the consumer in one case of $600,000. I ask the Minister of Finance what were the importations?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ROBB: I did not say anything of the kind. I said that representations had been made that the changes in the tariff had caused a loss to two different companies, but I added that I was not prepared to admit that their statement was correct.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the suggestion of the Minister of Railways was wholly beside the mark, absolutely beside the mark. Let us make it clear. Will the minister tell us what were the importations under item 536 of the tariff last year?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I have that information.

Mr. DUNNING: While the minister is looking the information up, may I state in all kindness to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre that when he asserted that this item was the largest one in the cotton schedule, he evidently overlooked the fact that there was another item represented by $9,500,000 of imports.

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to the item upon which a higher duty has been placed, where the importations amounted to two millions and some odd thousands of dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood my hon. friend to say that it represented the largest importation in the cotton schedule. If he did not say that I am mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: The sum of $2,700,000 is a substantial item.

Mr. DUNNING: Substantial, but not equal to $9,500,000 of cotton fabrics.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be.

Mr. DUNNING: I draw attention to it just in the interests of accuracy.

Mr. BENNETT: I venture to direct attention to the fact that in the presentation of the case by the applicants for an increase of duties, it was alleged that this cotton mill was interested favourably in the application to increase the duties on cotton yarns. I find at page 652 of the record, volume 3, 14th December, 1927, the following:

To the Chairman and members of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, Ottawa, Ontario.

Gentlemen:

We, The Canadian Spool Cotton Company, of Montreal, are interested in the application of the Wabasso Cotton Company, Limited, for a duty on cotton yarns 40 and finer, because,—

(a) We are importers of such yarns on a large scale, for use in the manufacture of cotton sewing thread;—

They are a branch of the Coates people.

(b) Special reference is made to our business in the brief of the applicants.

We refer at once to the statement made in the Wabasso Cotton Company's brief, as follows:

"The Canadian Spool Cotton Company, which is a branch of Coates, bring their yarn in under a special clause 535" Thread, cotton, sewing in hanks, 7½ per cent, "so that this class of work will apparently not be affected by our request."

This statement is, in large part, incorrect, and to the important extent in which it is incorrect it is gravely misleading. As a matter of fact, although we import thread in hanks, the bulk of our raw material consists of single yarn 40 and finer, which we entirely import under clause 532, free of duty, and convert into thread at our factory, undergoing the processes of twisting, bleaching, dyeing, polishing and spooling. In addition there are the allied processes of paper box making and spool turning.

The effect of putting a duty on yarns 40 and finer would be to increase the cost of our production of thread, and consequently our selling price without benefit to the Wabasso Company, because we would be obliged to continue to import such yarns to maintain, with regularity and uniformity, the high standard of quality, upon which, more perhaps than upon any other factor, the successful operation of our business depends. It will be seen, therefore, that our business would be seriously affected if the request of the Wabasso Company were acceded to without qualification.

It is our respectful and deferential submission that the manufacture of these fine cotton yarns for thread making purposes, necessitating, as it does, intensive training of operatives, and the highest supervisory skill, can only be done successfully by people who specialize in such manufacture, and it is very questionable, indeed, whether the volume of consumption in Canada at present—having in mind very especially the considerable number of counts called for—would admit of specialization on an economic basis, even with a fair degree of protection, to compete with the enormous specialized production of Great Britain and the United States.

Up to that point this is a letter written by the Coates people saying that the consumers would have to pay increased prices if a duty were placed on the finer yarns. As reported on page 654 they say further:

During the past six years we have on different occasions tried samples of the Wabasso Company's yarns, but these did not come up to the standard deemed necessary for our trade.

The statement made in the Wabasso Company's case that much of the fine yarns we produce forms a very small part of the cost of the material into which they go, obviously does not apply to thread, and was not, we believe, intended to apply. The cost of yarns used in making thread constitutes at least 40 per cent of the cost of the thread.

I read that to the minister because I am certain he had not read it in view of the observations that he has just made. This is the closing paragraph:

For these reasons, we submit that we, in common with the other thread manufacturers in Canada, should be allowed to import free of duty, as we have been for over thirty years, cotton yarns, single stand, in counts 40 and finer, for use exclusivley for the manufacture of thread in our own factories.

I take it that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend is to meet that situation.

Mr. ROBB: It is to help them, but there is still a protection.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not talking about that.

Mr. ROBB: They have a protection on thread of 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, and 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not talking about thread. I am talking about the application, to which I referred in the early part of the evening, to increase the duties on counts 40's and finer, and I referred to the statements made on the record with respect to it. I now turn up the case made by the very people, the thread manufacturers, showing what they said the result would be, and they close by saying:

For these reasons, we submit that we, in common with the other thread manufacturers in Canada, should be allowed to import free of duty, as we have been for over thirty years, cotton yarns, single strand, in counts 40 and finer, for use exclusively for the manufacture of thread in our own factories.

I am pointing out that the effect will be to increase the price of thread to the consumer. I am not talking for the moment about the thread, what the Minister of Railways calls the consumers' side of it. I am talking about the application of this company for a duty and the answer given by the thread company as I find it at pages 652 and 654 of the record. That is the case with which I desire the minister to deal.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not had an answer to my question.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend asked as to the importations under item 536. The figures are as follows:

Imports for 1927, cotton sewing thread, crochet and knitting cotton	$1,321,583
Duty paid on the above	194,978
Home production	3,905,297

So that the Canadian industry has a pretty fair share of the business.

Mr. STEVENS: How much of that came from the old country?

Mr. ROBB: It comes in under different divisions, as follows:

	Total	British preferential	Treaty	General
Sewing thread in hanks	$626,628	$357,093	.....	$269,545
Sewing thread in spools	99,625	14,991	$ 5,528	79,106
All other cotton thread n.o.p.	274,397	171,213	5,382	97,802
Crochet and knitting cottons	320,933	11,445	288,317	21,171

Mr. STEVENS: According to these figures the total reduction in taxation is about $1,250.

Mr. ROBB: I do not know about that.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the minister made any investigation to ascertain whether articles coming in from abroad really pay the tax, or whether the consumer pays it? In other words, has any study been made as to the comparative prices for articles of the same grade in Canada, in Great Britain for export plus transportation and in the United States for export plus transportation? I am instructed that in many of these items the cotton factories of Canada have not within hundreds of thousands of dollars taken advantage of the duty; that the sole advantage they have taken of the duty has been at certain odd seasons of the year to prevent dumping: but that if these tariff reductions, in so far as they are reductions, are made, you simply force them to take as high a price in Canada as they can under the tariff at all seasons of the year, even when dumping is not indulged in by their foreign competitors. It seems to me that in order that the house may have an adequate idea of the situation, a study should be made of the various prices at different times of the year as between the Canadian product sold in Canada and the products of other countries which are imported in competition with it.

Mr. ROBB: I have been in parliament since 1908, and I have heard it argued on both sides as to who pays the customs duty. I admit frankly that I did not read all the evidence because I did not have time, and my hon. friend will not read it all; but I found from having run over the evidence and if my hon. friend reads part of it he also will find, about the same division of opinion before the tariff board as there is in this parliament as to who pays the customs duty.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not dealing with it generally, because no matter how wide the knowledge of the minister and of his assistants may be, I do not think he can say in any general way that the consumer pays or that the foreign manufacturer and exporter pays the duty. But I do say that a careful investigation of any item, noting the sales in Canada of the same grades, and the wholesale price in Canada as compared with the prices at which these same grades are sold for export to Canada, would divulge very, very important and relevant information, namely, whether the Canadian manufacturer is taking advantage of the tariff to exact undue prices in Canada. I do not pretend to be an expert, but I have given some attention to the matter, and I am firmly convinced that the Canadian manufacturer in three cases out of four is not making use of the tariff to exact from the Canadian consumer the prices which he might exact if he took full advantage of the tariff. I think that is the most important investigation that the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance could make. If the Finance minister on any occasion can show to me any item of the tariff which is being unduly taken advantage of to increase the price in Canada, then speaking for myself, I will vote with him either for an excise tax or a reduction of the customs tax which will prevent that abuse. Before these items are presented—the Finance minister himself may not have had time to read the evidence, I admit that; I suppose in the administration of his department his time is taken up with many things other than this—but through the officials of his department the minister should be able to read that evidence and to ascertain its real purport, so that we may know with regard to these items whether, when increases are made, they are really necessary for the encouragement and protection of the Canadian industry concerned, or, when they are reduced, whether the reduction means or is likely to mean any reduction in price to the Canadian consumer. There is not an item on which, with the machinery the hon. gentleman and his colleagues command, they could not ascertain and present a fair analysis of these facts. I believe we on this side of the house are just as serious as the hon. minister himself in our opposition to abuse of the tariff for the purpose of profiteering,and therefore when reductions are made we wish to know whether the tariff as it stands is being made use of for that purpose, or whether it simply stands as an element of protection against foreign competition and against the foreign dumping to which this market is subject.

Mr. ROBB: I may repeat that my hon. friend will find some evidence in the reports tabled indicating the prices in the different countries and the cost of production. I have not very much objection to the statement of my hon. friend. He has convinced me of something that I had in my own mind, and I think he will agree with me, that if the Canadian manufacturers of textiles and cottons have not been taking full advantage of the tariff, the reductions we have made will not do them any harm.

Mr. CAHAN: I submit that they will do them harm, and do the great bulk of the consuming population in Canada no good. In order to ascertain the facts as far as I could, I went to a manufacturer—I am not going into details as to names and all that—and his reply was that he was prepared to show me that his factory or factories had never taken advantage of the tariff in all these years, except on two or three occasions when dumping was attempted against them; or the dumping may have been due to depreciation of foreign currency, which amounts to exactly the same thing. But, he said, if you do not give us protection against the dumping during two or three months of the year by the foreign producer with a surplus on hand in his own market which he will put into the Canadian market as any price, giving a temporary price advantage for a few days or weeks in the Canadian market—if you do not protect us against that, we are bound for our own protection to take full advantage of the reduced tariff in order that we may make up during the nine or ten months of the year the loss which we sustain due to the large dumping which takes place in those two or three months. I am convinced that the person talking to me was absolutely sincere: as a matter of fact, I have reason to believe he is a supporter of the hon. gentleman and of his party. But I was talking to him as a serious man in order that I might get a fair understanding of the case of the manufacturer, and I think it is due to us as members of this house that we should have the data placed before us. If the hon. gentleman has not had time in the weeks and months—

Mr. ROBB: I have placed the evidence on the table.

Mr. CAHAN: I know it is on the table, and I make no reflection on the minister because I know that as head of the Finance department it is absolutely impossible for him to read it. But he has ample assistance; he has eyes to read for him and brains to think for him, and how can I as a private member of this house digest a typewritten document of this extent which is placed on the table only two or three weeks ago? It is absolutely impossible for me to study it. Before this budget was brought down, before it was attempted, a statement ought to have been laid before us with regard to these more important items which would enable us to elucidate the facts and to ascertain whether the manufacturers affected are abusing the tariff for their own profiteering, or whether this action is really necessary to protect them against foreign dumping and foreign currency depreciation at a time when they are not using the tariff for any improper purposes but are giving the consumer during nine to eleven months of the year the full advantage that can be given him in the price of the staple products that are placed on this market.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, the question raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George whether a reduction in duty actually reduces the cost of the article to the consumer, is rather important. One thing, however, that may throw some light upon the subject is the obvious anxiety of many manufacturers to have their imports of raw materials placed upon the free list. It is evident that when they in their turn become importers, they believe, whether rightly or wrongly, that the reduction of the duty does reduce the cost of the article.

Mr. STEVENS: The point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) is, as has been intimated, a very important one indeed. The charge is very commonly made that one reason why we should not have a protective tariff at all is that the Canadian manufacturer takes full advantage of the duty imposed, and therefore the consumer must pay that duty in addition to the normal price of the manufactured article. When this subject was under discussion about three years ago I went to several of our representative industries and asked then to give me the privilege of examining their cost records and other books to ascertain for myself whether or not such a practice was being carried on. They were important firms, and were kind enough to give me free access to the information that I desired. I found on examination of the cost sheets and books of, I think, six or seven firms that the duty never entered into their process of price fixing. The factors entering into it, of course, are overhead, rentals, cost of material, wages, and so on—the usual charges against the manufactured article. Then a certain profit was charged according to the class of goods manufactured, for instance, with a boot and shoe factory it was 7½ per cent, with another concern it was 5 per cent, with another 11 per cent; but in no instance did the manufacturer take into consideration the tariff duty in fixing the price of his commodity. And that is exactly what ought to be done in all these cases. There should be no inclusion of the amount of protection in fixing the price of the commodity manufactured. I am citing this—and I am very glad the hon. member brought the question to the attention of the committee—because I think a very excellent service could be rendered to the public in the first instance, and to the honest manufacturer and dealer in the second, if the tariff advisory board would make it a point to examine the records of companies with this point in view. For instance, if a company appeared before them either to defend a proposed reduction or to ask for an increase of duty, and it was found that such company took full advantage of the tariff schedules, then I say it would deserve very little consideration, if any. As a matter of fact I think the tariff advisory board should make a finding according to the facts. The result would be that such concerns or groups of industries as abuse the privilege of the tariff could be disciplined either by a reduction of the tariff or the imposition of an excise tax. That is the proper way to deal with it. On the other hand the honest Canadian industrialist, carrying on his business according to the sound and well known principles of economics, is entitled from this country to a fair deal and reasonable tariff protection.

Mr. ROBB: Who in the last analysis would pay that excise tax?

Mr. STEVENS: The manufacturer or group of industries offending. After all, our industries are pretty well organized to-day. For instance, we have the automobile industry, the cotton industry, the woollen industry all grouped; in fact all the major industries are grouped. If it were found that, say, the cotton industry was abusing the privileges of the tariff by adding the full amount of the duty to their commodity price, then the imposition of the excise tax would be on the manufacturers in that industry.

Mr. ROBB: Would not they pass it on to the consumer?

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily at all. That when you impose a tax it alone goes to the consumer is the most utter fallacy that can be maintained. Rent goes to the consumer, also insurance, in fact anything that is a charge against the cost of the material in the course of its manufacture goes to the consumer.

Mr. ROBB: I am interested in this, and as my hon. friend has made a study of the subject he may be able to clear up the point. Does he argue that we should place an excise tax upon a domestic manufacturer and allow imports to come in without that excise tax?

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. If a group of industries are found to be abusing the privileges of the tariff, that is, adding the full amount of duty when it is not necessary for their welfare, then I say impose an excise tax, or, if you prefer, lower the duty—either one or the other. I am inclined to think that the best way would be to impose an excise tax, because then the exchequer would be benefited.

Mr. ROBB: But let us clear this up so that it will go out right to the country. Then the policy would be to impose an excise tax only on the domestic manufacturer?

Mr. STEVENS: No, the minister cannot corner me in that way.

Mr. ROBB: I am not trying to.

Mr. STEVENS: It appears to me that he is. The point I am making is this. If a Canadian industry having a protection, we will say, of 15 per cent is able to manufacture its article just as cheaply as it is manufactured abroad, and the industry be healthy, we will say that 10 per cent is a fair profit; but the manufacturer adds 15 per cent, thus abusing the privileges of the tariff. Then I say, either reduce the tariff to 10 per cent, or impose an excise tax of 5 per cent, whichever you think will more effectively cure the abuse. That is where the tariff advisory board would function.

Mr. ROBB: I can follow my hon. friend when he urges for a reduction of the tariff; but when he favours putting an excise tax not only on the domestic but on the imported article, I do not understand how he would change the price.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that. I want to be clear on this; I do not want it to be hurled at me later that I made a statement which as a matter of fact I did not make. Mark you, where an industry is acting fairly with the Canadian public nothing should be done. Let us make that clear.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: But where an industry is abusing its tariff protection, taking full advantage of the duty, although it does not need it, then I say impose upon that industry an excise tax or reduce the tariff.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CAHILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is well understood in this house that an hon. member may discuss almost anything during the budget debate. The budget debate is concluded, and I do not know that we have any rule to permit a member discussing everything under the sun when a tariff item is under consideration by the committee. I did not wish to call my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) to order because he had not an opportunity of speaking on the budget, but I do think that this house has wandered far from the rules both during the budget debate and in committee. Hon. members should stick to the item under discussion or we shall never get through.

The Acting CHAIRMAN (Mr. Power): The point is well taken, and I would ask the committee to confine itself more closely to the subject under discussion, namely, item 522.

Mr. CAHAN: I have been dealing with item 522 right straight along. My point is that before any reduction is made in that item we should have a specific comparison of prices abroad, either in England or in the United States, with the prices which are exacted in Canada. When the Minister of Finance says an excise tax would not prevent abuse and undue profits, I tell him that such a tax placed on Canadian production would take away undue profits. And the excise tax upon the foreign product has no relation to the question in dealing with cotton yarn. It has no relation to it whatsoever, because if the tariff is so high as to enable the domestic manufacturer to take undue advantage of it and to profiteer on his sales, then it is so high that no excise tax imposed upon the foreign exporter into Canada will help the situation at all. If we look into the facts and find a factory or a group of factories unduly profiteering in cotton yarns then there is intelligence enough in the Finance department as well as in the Department of National Revenue to ascertain where a reduction in the duty is necessary, or whether the imposition of a form of excise tax, taking away the undue profits made by that factory or group of factories, would result to the advantage of the Canadian consumer. You cannot convince me that a factory or group of factories manufacturing cotton yarns will indulge unduly in profiteering except to secure a profit to that factory or group of factories. According to my suggestion you take away the excess profit and every incentive to deal unfairly and unjustly with the Canadian consumer.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend a moment ago inquired as to investigating costs in other countries. I find this memorandum from the board to the minister:

> Almost every reference to the board has contained statements regarding conditions in foreign countries, and especially wages and labour costs. In many instances the sources of information thus presented have not been clearly defined, in others the information furnished has not been up to date. Not infrequently both applicants and opponents have contended that the duty of determining conditions at the origin of export fell upon the board. Unfortunately the board has had neither the time nor the financial resources for conducting detailed investigations abroad in all the matters referred to it, and it must be admitted, in several of the applications, has not yet been able to secure satisfying information.

I take it, therefore, that the board has that question under consideration. I do not wish to precipitate a longer debate, but in one particular case—I am not saying that it was sound tactics—one of the textile industries of another country came voluntarily before the board and presented evidence as to costs in that country. My hon. friends opposite have found much fault with that procedure.

Mr. BENNETT: Not with their presentation as to wages, but with their observations respecting the applications themselves and the examination of witnesses, which is an entirely different thing. I have taken the trouble to read carefully what they did say and if the minister will do the same he will see the pertinence of my remarks in this respect.

Mr. ROBB: I admit that it was not the best of manners.

Mr. CAHAN: The tariff board in the United States has a number of experts who make investigations abroad regarding prices, costs of production and so forth, so that they have, in respect of any tariff item, all the material which I am now suggesting should be available to the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that, so far as production in foreign countries is concerned, advantage might be taken to a certain extent of such researches. In competition between us and the United States I consider it the duty of the tariff board to make these investigations by expert assistance. Means should be placed at the disposal of the board for this purpose, so that when these items come down we may have salient facts on which to base our opinion and decision.

Mr. BENNETT: We should bear in mind also the fact that our membership in the League of Nations gives us access to that large body of information, to which I ventured to refer the other day, regarding wages. The International Labour Bureau, maintained in connection with the league, makes available for us all that information with respect to wages and the relation of wages in foreign countries to our own. The trade commissioners are also in a position to furnish the same information. The index figure, according to an article in the National Magazine of last month in connection with British industry, showed that when it was 100 in England it was 153 in Ottawa and 175 in Philadelphia. The various countries in the world were given, and especially low were the figures in some of the Balkan states and in Belgium. I cannot see why the tariff board should not avail itself of information thus secured by the International Labour Bureau.

Mr. ROBB: I think they do use such information to a considerable extent.

Mr. KENNEDY: I understand that the minister has put on record some figures regarding the production of various yarns in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Yes; they will be in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. GEARY: Do these figures enable us to say whether item 522, cotton yarns, not exceeding 20's single, 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent, constitutes an increase or a reduction in the tariff?

Mr. ROBB: A number of the items are obsolete. It is chiefly a reduction.

Mr. GEARY: I am directing my attention to No. 522.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend picks out 522 alone—

Mr. GEARY: That is the one we are discussing, according to the chairman.

Mr. ROBB: We have been discussing the items generally. I do not know whether my hon. friend wants to get on the record at this late hour all the facts bearing on the matter. In this particular item alone there is an increase.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is an increase in item 522?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but taking them altogether there is a very considerable decrease.

Mr. GEARY: I thought we would take them one at a time. The minister has referred to the assistance he received from the tariff board, which it was stated earlier in the evening was a fact-finding body. It is advisory, apparently, in connection with the fixing of the tariff schedules.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: I should be very glad if the minister could recollect those recommendations made by the tariff board, not in writing but at those conferences of which he told us, which extended into the late hours of the night. What was the basis upon which the tariff board made a recommendation for the increase of any duty? Was it on the basis of taking care of or protecting, if you like, the particular industry under discussion? If so, was that communicated to the minister and was it used by him in arriving at the schedule rate?

Mr. ROBB: Not in any particular industry. If my hon. friend will say the industries throughout Canada I will repeat what I said this afternoon, that in the case of some industries, some particular items, the government did not go as far as the tariff board thought they might go. The tariff board, having heard all the evidence both from the manufacturers and from the other side, thought there might be an increase in some cases, but the government determined differently.

Mr. BENNETT: Because that was not the business of the tariff board.

Mr. GEARY: I am afraid I am not quite answered yet. I am anxious to know the principle upon which advice was given by the tariff board. In making their recommendations or reports, whatever you call them, did they indicate that they were proceeding on the principle of protecting industry generally? Did they indicate that some particular industry required for its protection from competition from abroad, or for various reasons, some increase in the tariff schedule, or is the report or advice of the tariff board a hit and miss affair? Do they say, "We think this industry can stand a little and this other industry cannot stand it so well"? If there is no principle at all behind the recommendations of that board, what possible system have the government in arriving at a definite figure?

Mr. ROBB: The system of common sense, as far as we understand it; the same system hon. members opposite would follow if they had the responsibility of office. The idea is to do what we believe is in the best general interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. GEARY: All I can say to that statement is that I am very grateful for the implied compliment that because we did it it is right, but the point I am making in regard to this or any other item is this: If you are going on the advice of the tariff board, that advice to be valid and worth acting upon must be founded on some principle, otherwise it is a hit and miss affair. In the hands of a government which wanted to make use of it the tariff could be very readily used, under these circumstances, as an instrument for imposing upon industries and getting money from them, if you will. I am not suggesting for a moment that that has been done, but the tariff board, constituted with no definite principles upon which to make these recommendations, can be more readily made a toll gate than a tariff board. I am not speaking of the personnel now. So I say that the temptation to any government of having an instrument such as this ready to its hand is too strong, unless the recommendations of that instrument are to be based upon some definite principle. I should like to know if they have been so based.

Mr. ROBB: I do not like these insinuations, which come up from time to time, that the tariff board might be a toll gate. If my hon. friend advances that argument he might as well say that the government he supported when they were in office carried on a toll gate, and I do not believe they did. They used their best judgment at the time.

Mr. GEARY: No, I particularly said that I was not speaking of the personnel of the tariff board or of the government at all. I am only speaking of the uselessness of a tariff board which is constituted with no definite principle. A tariff board was set up in India and another in the United States; I prefer to speak of the one set up in India, which was constituted on the definite principle of protection as the guide to the recommendations they should make. They knew where they were; they knew what facts they wanted to get and the government had a finding based on some policy upon which to act. Now I say that as long as our tariff board is not properly constituted in that regard, there is the danger that it may be made just what I have indicated. I am making no insinuations; at the moment I am just trying to discuss the functions of the tariff board which brought in a report favouring an increase of the duty on this particular item 522.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say they advocated it in this particular item; I do not recall whether or not they did, but I think I have caught my hon. friend's point now. He says that the United States board received instructions and was created as a method of protection. Am I right in that?

Mr. GEARY: The board in India.

Mr. ROBB: Our board is different; it is a fact-finding body. In this large country there is a wide difference of opinion, some people believe in absolute free trade, at least one of whom sits over yonder. Other gentlemen are here, representing different constituencies, who advocate higher tariff. We have had two or three elections in this country on the tariff issue alone.

Mr. BENNETT: All of them, you say.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps all of them. We created the tariff board so that those who advocated a higher tariff and those who advocated a lower tariff could go before that board and submit to it all the facts they could produce in support of their position. The board reports to the government, and the government must take the responsibility for the policy adopted.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance one question. He says the tariff board is a fact finding body. If that is so we should have a report of the facts which have been found.

Mr. ROBB: You have the evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: But not the findings of the board.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The evidence is brought in here perhaps a ton at a time.

Progress reported.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, simply to obtain an interpretation of the new rules. May I ask if it is not competent for the chairman of the committee simply to call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. SPEAKER: The committee must report progress and the Speaker must adjourn the house.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 16, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—522. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of cotton not exceeding number twenty, not more advanced than singles: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When the house adjourned last evening I was endeavouring to address myself to this item and a statement of the Minister of Finance in connection with the tariff advisory board which he described as a fact-finding board. That is exactly what I think every hon. member would like to have. We would like to have the facts in connection with this and the other items that are associated with it. The minister said: "The evidence is on the table." That is quite correct, but it is very bulky and I am sure no hon. member could undertake to read it. When we have a fact-finding commission, surely it ought not to be the duty of hon. members to find the facts from a perusal of the evidence. The commission should discharge that duty, and particularly in connection with these controversial items we should have from the commission a sort of precis or review of the evidence and the proceedings taken before it, and a statement of what has been found, as a result of that investigation, to be the fact. Imagine a commissioner or a judge being asked to investigate and find facts and then coming into court or this parliament and putting the evidence on the table, asking us to assume that he had discharged his duties! For the minister's own protection and for the benefit of hon. members he ought to ask the board to make a short review or precis of the evidence and a statement of facts found in connection with each one of these cases.

We have established this board at great expense; it has set up machinery; it should be well equipped to discharge this duty, and if it does not do so, then we have set up a piece of machinery that is very expensive, that is to a large extent useless, and, worse still, that is dangerous, because these investigations may go on and all the information that the house is to have in connection with them is a statement of the Minister of Finance that he met the tariff board some time about two o'clock in the morning and discussed these items with them. Apparently when these items come before the house we can get very little information in regard to them. This board was not intended to be a smoke-screen behind which the minister could hide, or behind which there could be private discussions and manipulations in connection with the tariff. What we expected was that we were to be furnished with findings of facts as ascertained by the commission, and if the commission fails in that respect, then it fails entirely in the discharge of its duty. I know every hon. member desires to know the fact, and if we had the fact we would be relieved of a great deal of discussion, a great deal of this suspicion would be cleared up and we would be able to discuss these items intelligently. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he allow these items to stand and ask the tariff board, even at this late date, to make a finding of fact for the information of the members of this house, as it was intended they should do in connection with all these items. This resolution covers many items. Some of them are not controversial; some of them, I believe, in no way change the existing tariff, and perhaps therefore we can dispose of them; but I do suggest that as to these important items which are undoubtedly controversial, and upon which the house desires information, the minister should procure a finding of fact and a report on the facts from the tariff board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Following on the suggestion of my hon. friend from Leeds, I confess my inability to appreciate the full significance of the changes in regard to the cotton schedules which the minister proposes in his present budget. I tried diligently last night for over three hours to gather from the discussion in this chamber just what the changes really were and just what they involved. I think I have a fair understanding of the matter now, but I may misapprehend the full significance of some of the changes. It is evident that in his effort to revise these cotton schedules the minister has not followed any principle; he has followed neither the principle of free trade, nor that of tariff for revenue, nor that of protection. He has operated on a happy-go-lucky, hit-or-miss, absolutely haphazard system, and when he stated in this chamber that criticism proceeding from the opposition and from the Progressive sections of the house was not uniform, the answer is that it would be hard to offer any uniform criticism or make any uniform suggestions in regard to proposals which have no uniformity about them, and which are not based on any principle. If I am wrong in the conclusions which I have reached in regard to this matter, the minister will correct me.

The new items 522, 522a and 522b all relate to the importation of cotton yarns into this country, and my conclusion is that on these three items the tariff is increased. There is no doubt whatever that there is an increase in item 522, because the minister so stated in so many words last night. Item 522 covers "cotton yarns not exceeding 20's, single," and the new rates proposed are 10, 15 and 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: What were the old rates?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know.

Mr. ROBB: I will tell my hon. friend so that the country will have the record correct. My hon. friend has just stated that the new rates are 10, 15 and 20 per cent, and he does not know what the old rates were. The old rates were 15, 22½ and 25 per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the answer made last night by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was incorrect.

Mr. ROBB: No, I told my hon. friend that there were some items that were practically obsolete.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister was asked if the duties in regard to item 522 were increased or decreased, and he said there was an increase. I take it that, having regard to the importations, there is an actual increase in the duty on that item.

Now I pass on to item 522a, which covers "cotton yarns exceeding 20's but not exceeding 40's, single," on which the new rates proposed are 12½, 15 and 22½ per cent. Now I ask the minister, does that involve an increase or a decrease as compared with the former rates?

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 15, 22½ and 25 per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What was the number of the old item?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is another item, 534, which came in free.

Mr. ROBB: Answering one at a time, the old item was 520, and that has been split into two or three items.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Apparently there is a reduction of 2½ per cent on that, although my view is, on consulting the former tariff, that cotton yarns exceeding 20's and not exceeding 40's came in free. The minister tells me that the old rates were 15, 22½ and 25 per cent, and the new rates proposed are 12½, 15 and 22½ per cent. Apparently on that item there is a 2½ per cent reduction.

Then item 522b, which is the large item, covers "cotton yarns exceeding 40's, single," on which the new rates proposed are 7½, 10 and 15 per cent, while the former rate was free, free, free. The importations under item 522b are so far beyond the importations under the other items that one must conclude that there has been an increase in the protection afforded under these three items. I do not think there is any doubt about it; you can prove it to a mathematical nicety; you can demonstrate it absolutely. I think we may take it for granted that the object of the minister in granting increased tariff protection under these three items was, as he said last night, to give the manufacturers of cotton yarns some of the protection which the cotton trade enjoys. That, he says, was the government's reason for making these changes. I do not take issue with him on that point. I think it is a proper principle, and I hope he will continue to follow that principle in regard to the other items in the tariff schedules. He has already adopted the protective principle in regard to cotton yarns so that the manufacturers of these yarns in Canada may have some benefit from tariff protection, and he is giving this protection, he says, in order that the other manufacturers of cotton will not hog all the advantage of the tariff. I think we now understand the situation in regard to these three items. It is clear that an actual tariff increase is taking place. I hope my hon. friends from Manitoba and Saskatchewan who sit on the other side of the house, and who are pronounced free-traders in their views, will realize the full meaning of the tariff changes in respect to these three items, and that is increased protection to give the producers of cotton yarns some benefit of the tariff.

I listened with great pleasure to the explanation volunteered last night by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). He realizes full well, perhaps better than any other member of this house, that these three items involve increased protection, and that it becomes necessary for him to offer some explanation to his people in Saskatchewan. Accordingly he enters upon a thoroughly ingenious and artificial argument, endeavouring to show that there is some distinction between manufacturer's items and consumer's items in the present tariff. After labouring considerably with his argument, he announced that the consumer would be benefited because the duty on the thread manufactured from these yarns was reduced in the present proposals of the government. Now, how does that work out? Cotton yarns up to 40 and finer are now subject to a duty, when imported from Great Britain, of 7½ per cent; up to the present time they have come in free. In the manufacture of thread these yarns constitute 40 per cent of the cost. There is an increase in the protection of 7½ per cent on 40 per cent of that thread, which, according to my calculation, is exactly 3 per cent increase on the thread. Then we turn to the subsequent item in the tariff and find that the government has reduced the duty on the thread by 2½ per cent, with the net result that the consumer of thread will have to pay one-half of one per cent more in duty than he did the day before this tariff was brought down to the house. If there is anything wrong in my figures or in my argument or in my presentation of this matter to the attention of the government and the Minister of Finance, let the minister correct me now. Let me repeat. The duty on the raw cotton imported—and it is a large item of $2,500,000—is increased by a stroke of the pen from free to 7½ per cent. From that raw material is manufactured the cotton thread. Seven and a half per cent increased duty on the raw material, and the raw material representing 40 per cent of the finished product, a reduction of 2½ per cent of the duty on the thread, leaves a net increase of duty to the consumers of this country of one-half of one per cent. If I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected now.

I point this out again for the benefit of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) and his colleagues from the province of Manitoba, and for the benefit of hon. gentlemen from the province of Saskatchewan who give to this government a slavish support on trade and fiscal matters. The truth is, this proposal has not been clearly laid before parliament. The government is not making readjustments upon any principle whatever. The criticism levelled against us that in one corner of the house we discuss this as a higher tariff and in the other as a lower tariff has some justification in fact. It is a tariff proposed I believe, simply with the idea of helping a particular industry here, or a particular industry there, upon no fiscal principle whatever, and at the same time intended to hoodwink that large body of supporters of the present government who live in the prairie provinces.

There is no doubt from the discussion last night, in fact we learned it from the lips of the Finance Minister himself, that this change in regard to item 522b was made at the instance of a single cotton company in this country. He says so. The Wabasso Company made the application. He stated last night that that was the only company that he knew—

Mr. ROBB: No, I said that company made application before the tariff board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will read the minister's exact words.

Mr. ROBB: That will be better.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At page 1388 will be found this statement by the minister:

I admit that only one mill will be materially benefited by this change.

Mr. ROBB: Materially.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, dwell on the word if you like. Mine was a correct statement; there will be only one mill in Canada benefited. It is at the instance of a single mill in this country that a duty of 7½ per cent is imposed on $2,500,000 of our imports. That is done for the benefit of a single industrial institution, and at the same time the minister is penalizing every other manufacturing institution in this country in the cotton line—unless he is consistent and raises his tariff on the manufactured products of the other industries. That would be the adoption of a principle in regard to fiscal legislation. But in this case the government picks out a single friendly institution, and for the sake of that one industry it penalizes the whole trade and the whole population of the Dominion to the extent of 7½ per cent on $2,500,000 worth of imports. And then the Minister of Railways says: "Oh, that is only the manufacturer's item; wait till you turn to the consumers' item. Why," he said, "that raw yarn is made into cotton thread which is used all over Canada. For the consumers we have cut the duty on the thread 2½ per cent." In reality they have raised the duty from 2½ to 3 per cent.

Now, this is tariff tinkering with a vengeance. I agree with my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) that the house has not before it information sufficient to deal intelligently with this question. It would be far better if the tariff board had made an intelligent report, stating the facts which they had found. They returned a mass of documents and a mass of evidence, which the minister has candidly stated he has not had time to read, and no one would expect that he would have time to read it unless he did so very, very casually. The information which was derived from these investigations is therefore not before the house. Very few hon. members have digested that evidence, and still we are asked to make a fairly radical change in regard to the cotton schedule without the minister having the facts at his finger ends or having the information which the tariff board gathered. I do not think it is a proper way of legislating. To my mind there is great force in the remarks of my hon. friend from Leeds, and those items should stand until the minister has given them further consideration. I do not think he knew until the last five minutes of my remarks that in the result he was going to increase the duty on thread. I am sure when the Minister of Railways spoke last night he did not realize it. But that is what the Minister of Finance has done. I ask the friends of the Minister of Railways from Saskatchewan, to take him apart and talk to him and see if they cannot straighten this matter out. It is as plain as can be; it can be demonstrated to a conclusion. I have no objection to the increase of 7½ per cent on the raw material; I think that is proper; but I say to the minister and the government, if they adopt that principle of protection they must carry it through as a principle and give the other manufacturers their fair share of the protection in accordance with the increase of duty on the raw materials.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, listening to the observations of my hon. friend from Leeds and my hon. friend from South Wellington, I observe that they have had some of the same advice and from the same sources, maybe not directly, but indirectly, that has been pounded into me since the 16th of February.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, that is an insinuation. It was repudiated in this house last night. I never read the schedule and I never considered the matter before. All I know about it is from what I heard from the minister and his colleague last night.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to state also, Mr. Chairman, that my information has been gained entirely from discussions in this house. All that I know about the matter I have learned in the course of this debate. Nobody has spoken to me on the subject.

Mr. ROBB: I will accept unreservedly the statement of my hon. friends and say that they have presented excellently the representations that have already been made to me by these different industries. Now my hon. friends have told the house what they think of the reclassification. I believe that both hon. gentlemen who have spoken have laid down the principle that the tariff board should present the facts and that upon those facts the tariff should be framed. If that means anything it means that we are taking away from parliament, comprising 245 members—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROBB: —and from the government of the day, responsible to the country, the right to frame the fiscal policy upon the lines submitted to the people in the campaign.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. ROBB: Well, that is my opinion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is far from the case; let us have the facts.

Mr. ROBB: I will place on Hansard a statement from the tariff board in regard to the items under consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: Was this statement submitted to the minister before yesterday or has he received it since? If it was submitted prior to the discussion yesterday we should have had it for our information in return to the motion we made for papers.

Mr. ROBB: In the light of yesterday's debate I asked the officer to go into the records and give me a statement, and this is it. They informed us some days ago that there had been presented to them a report from representatives of the textile industry, but I did not deem it necessary at the time to have that statement; I did not think it was urgent to take up the time of the house reading it. This afternoon, hon. gentlemen having indicated what they think of the reclassification, I propose to disclose to the committee the feeling of the trade in this matter, so that the country may judge as between my hon. friends and the representatives of the trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not an advocate of the trade; I am speaking for the people of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say you were. Now this is the memorandum to which I refer:

> Under the old tariff cotton yarns entered, mainly, under two items (520 and 532), but came in also under some six or eight vagrant items scattered throughout the schedules. There was no scientific structure, and practically no regard for "counts". Under the new tariff, all cotton yarn items, seven in number, are grouped in a series, based entirely upon counts. It is almost impossible to compare any single item of the former tariff with any single item of the new. For instance, yarns entering formerly under the general item 520 may now enter, according to their fineness, under several new items; contrariwise, yarns that entered formerly under several items may now enter under one item. Thus, individual items are not comparable. The new yarn schedule must be treated as an entity, a series.
> There were formerly three free yarn items; in the new tariff there is one. Of the two which have disappeared, one was practically obsolete, and the other was being misused.

Customs appraisal based on "counts" was desired by the entire cotton industry, since all cotton yarns are bought and sold on that basis.

My hon. friends will find that in the evidence.

The "count" system is one thoroughly understood by government appraisers, and every item in the new schedule has been approved by the Department of National Revenue. The new tariff is now in operation, giving remarkably little difficulty, even in outlying ports.

That is the memorandum. What does the textile trade itself think of the reclassification? I quote now from the Textile Journal of February 23, 1928:

This is the first general revision that has taken place since 1907 and in principle the proposed new schedule meets the changed conditions in the textile trade developed through these years. . . . There is no question that the division of the textile schedule according to materials is substantially correct and while we take very strenuous objection to the adjustment made in tariff rates, we believe that the reclassification will assist materially in efficient appraisal and administration of the tariff.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We agree.

Mr. ROBB: This is another item from the same journal, of February 23:

The outstanding feature of the new textile tariff schedule proposed by the Hon. James A. Robb, Minister of Finance, in his budget speech last week is a very thorough reclassification of tariff items to conform with the present day conditions in the textile manufacturing industry in Canada and the textile importing trade. To this extent the minister has succeeded in no small degree. It is unquestionably the result of deliberations of the tariff board in collaboration with the customs appraisal staff in an attempt to facilitate the proper appraisal of textile imports. To this end the proposed schedule should be a decided improvement on the old.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The reclassification is all right.

Mr. ROBB: A duty has been imposed upon fine cotton yarns in order to remove the obvious anomaly in the former tariff whereby the coarse and inexpensive yarns were quite heavily protected, while the very expensive, fine yarns bore no duty whatever. In devising a new scientific structure, it was obviously impossible to perpetuate this anomaly, hence the duty on the fine counts. The whole matter was thoroughly investigated at the public sittings held by the tariff board, with all branches of the cotton industry represented. It will be observed that very low rates are maintained in the new tariff on fine cotton yarns, either single or ply, which enter into the making of particularly specified textile commodities, since such commodities are manufactured from fine yarn of a type which it may be difficult to secure in Canada. The increase that is brought about by the imposition of duty on the very fine yarns is partially offset by the reduction in the duty on the coarser yarns, while all fine mercerized yarns remain free as at present. All the yarns above referred to are manufacturers' yarns, and in the ordinary way are not purchased by the consumer at all.

So much for that. Now what do the men who are really in the business think of the proposition? I have in my hand a letter from the Dominion Textile Company dated February 27:

Dear Mr. ROBB:

Your recent tariff changes in so far as cotton goods are concerned apparently will be considered quite popular. I wonder whether you are aware that few of these changes are in accordance with the facts put before the tariff advisory board.

These gentlemen object to some of the changes.

The net results are that there is little reduction to the general public, but a very serious one to this company, amounting to something in excess of $600,000 annually.

That is what they say about it. The letter is signed by Mr. Daniels, the managing director.

I have another letter, I said yesterday that one company had complained that the result was a million dollar loss to them. I had that in mind, and I confess—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before my hon. friend goes on to a reference to the million dollar loss, I would ask a question regarding the company that complain of the $600,000 reduction. Do the company who write him mean that it will cost them that amount by reason of the imposition of higher duties on raw materials?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine that is what they are driving at.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It looks like a serious rise then, does it not?

Mr. ROBB: I presume they are also referring to the result on the finished product.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are speaking in relation to yarns.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends have been arguing that the public is not benefited. Taking the two together, the company estimate a loss of $600,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They do not say so.

Mr. ROBB: And it is largely on the fabrics. Now I have a letter from another concern and I want to say frankly at once that the letter of transmission is marked "personal", so that I am not in a position to table it nor to disclose the name. However, I shall have no objection to showing the letter to the official leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I prefer not to see it, thank you.

Mr. ROBB: This gentleman points out that the changes in the tariff—

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister is going to read extracts from the letter he should read the whole letter, because as in the previous case the inference may be that there is a loss. The minister is at liberty to place that loss where he thinks it should go, but as a matter of fact, while I do not know what is in the letter, if it is to be read in part it should be read in toto.

Mr. ROBB: I think I will just read it all, then, but I cannot give you the name.

Mr. STEVENS: You are bound to give the name if we ask for it.

Mr. ROBB: It is marked private and confidential.

Mr. BENNETT: Then you should not read it.

Mr. ROBB: From the information contained in the letter it seems that the Dominion Textile Company will lose $650,000, Montreal Cottons $250,000 and Canadian Cottons $245,000. Those losses are made up as follows: Yarns, $14,000; woven fabrics, lumped together, $245,000. Now, having said that much I am bound to go a little further.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister has not completed the statement. He says $650,000 will be lost by one company, $250,000 by another and $245,000 by a third, and in giving the details of that loss he has mentioned $14,000 on yarn and $245,000 on woven fabrics. That is a small fraction of the entire loss.

Mr. ROBB: That is for one company.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Which company was that?

Mr. ROBB: Canadian Cottons, I think. Now I have another letter which is not marked personal and which I will place on record, although it will take some time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will it give us this information?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that as we go along. This letter is from the office of the managing director of the Dominion Textile Company, and is dated February 27:

Dear Mr. ROBB:

Your recent tariff changes, in so far as cotton goods are concerned, apparently will be considered quite popular. I wonder whether you are aware that few of these changes are in accordance with the facts put before the Tariff Advisory Board?

Apparently this gentleman thought he was the only man to place any facts before that board.

The net results are that there is little reduction to the general public, but a very serious one to this company, amounting to something in excess of $600,000 annually, which amount you propose to distribute through the medium of increased protection to seven other cotton companies, five of whom are producing coarse gray cotton goods, previously more fully protected than the lines of gray cottons produced by this company, when considered in the light of labour and cost of production.

Based on this year's production to date, we will, at the end of our year (March 31), have produced approximately 41,500,000 pounds of gray cloth and yarn. Of this quantity, approximately 4,600,000 pounds of yarn, averaging coarser than 20's and sold as single, will receive a reduction of four and a fraction per cent, equivalent to about $64,000. Approximately 750,000 pounds, sold in ply yarns, are unaffected.

The bleachery processed 16,256,000 yards, weighing 4,889,000 pounds, approximately one million pounds of which receive a reduction of 3 per cent under the preferential, from which its competition mainly comes. The balance of the bleachery production is unaffected in this tariff, but it has been seriously affected for many years, as this department has not averaged four days' operation per week owing to the already utterly inadequate protection of 15 per cent under the preferential tariff.

The remaining 31,000,000 pounds of gray cloth production is cut 2½ per cent under the general tariff, and has only 12½ per cent protection under the preferential.

In addition to this some 32,000,000 yards of printed cloths will receive a further reduction of 2½ per cent. As the margin for printing is to-day barely sufficient to cover costs, this reduction will affect the print works to the extent of making it impossible for it to meet its comparatively small proportion (allotted to it) of the common and preferred dividend requirements.

What appears to be, and is most unfair, is the fact that prints receive a protection of 2½ per cent less than yarn and raw stock dyed fabrics, notwithstanding the fact that to produce the above quantity of prints will require buildings and machinery in excess of $2,500,000 more than will be needed to produce a similar yardage and value of yarn and raw stock dyed fabrics, and, at the same time, requires a much larger number of operatives with skill and technical knowledge not needed in the other plant.

We have recently spent rather more than one million dollars, and will not have completed changes and additions to the program, started last summer at the print works, before the end of this year, solely with the view of giving service to the public as, owing to the altered conditions of trade in the method of buying, forward purchasing is almost a thing of the past, and we do not expect, owing to the extremely small runs or yardage processed at any one time, to be able, on the twenty-four printing machines, to produce as great a quantity as we processed on twelve machines five years ago.

The reason for this is that the quantity ordered at one time is so small that a much greater time is occupied in setting up a machine to print a design, than is required in the actual printing.

By comparison with England, in our basic rate for printing we ask a customer to give us an order for 3,600 yards to be coloured in three different sets of colours, or 1,200 yards per colouring, whereas in England the basic rate is for 12,000 yards, or 4,000 yards per colour.

Approximately two hours and fifteen minutes is required to set up a printing machine and make the two changes in the colour boxes, and one hour and thirty minutes running time, or a total of three hours and forty-five minutes to print 3,600 yards. To print 12,000 yards a total of five hours and fifteen minutes is required. We can produce only about 10,000 yards daily against 24,000 yards in an English works. Our labour and overhead cost is more than doubled. A great many of our orders are for 200 yards.

This reduction of 5 per cent in the general and 2½ per cent in the preferential, bringing the British prints to an 18 per cent rate, will have a most serious effect on the print works and the town of Magog with its population of over 5,000 depending entirely upon this company. In addition to this a large farming community finds a very satisfactory home market for its products in this district.

As shirts and clothing are sold at set prices, it is most unlikely that the $1.50 shirts, for instance, will be sold at $1.47, the difference represented by the reduction in duty.

Coming to the companies that have been benefited, the three tire duck companies and the two duck companies, producing more than 20,000,000 pounds, receive a straight increase of 2½ per cent upon their entire production, and no reductions.

The Wabasso Cotton Company, at Three Rivers, which was started after fine yarns were put on the free list, receives 7½ per cent preference and 15 per cent general protection on single fine yarns, and 15 per cent preference and 25 per cent general on fine ply yarns, all of which is an increase. They also receive an increase under the preference of 5 per cent on such cloths as they fabricate in which artificial silk is used, and which, I understand, represents about one-fifth of their looms.

They receive no reductions with the exception of 3 per cent under the preference on the negligible quantity of made-up sheets and slips which they produce.

In their Shawinigan yarn plant at Shawinigan Falls, Quebec, spinning yarns, they will receive the same reduction as we do, but Mr. Whitehead made the statement to Mr. Moore and myself that he had never made a cent in the Shawinigan plant, and that if he got a protection on fine yarns he would convert this plant to spin fine yarns. The Hamilton Cotton Company receive reductions and increases that offset one another.

[Mr. Robb.]

On the face of things, it would appear that the tariff in very unfortunately framed against the company that has been honestly, efficiently, and economically operated, and should receive greater consideration.

Under proposed conditions, there is no question but that this company, and its more than seven thousand operatives will be seriously affected, and the latter, at least, are worth your reconsidering the proposed schedule.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will observe this:

Nearly one hundred million lineal yards of cotton cloths were exported to this country last year, in almost equal quantities, by Great Britain and the United States, plus imports under French and intermediate rates. At least sixty per cent of these imports directly affected this company.

We have also to accept orders for large quantities of cloths, subject to drawback rates, in order to keep occupied.

There are a great many points not touched upon in this letter that I would be glad of an opportunity to discuss with you if you will be good enough to give me an appointment.

Sincerely yours,

F. G. DANIELS,
Managing Director,
Dominion Textile Company.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister just at this point answer a question, if he will be so kind: Taking this as a presentation of one side of the case, what other facts influenced the minister to disregard all this and make these reductions which are complained of?

Mr. ROBB: I will answer my hon. friend in a moment. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) asked for some information. I quoted some changes in the duties on yarns where they are going to experience a loss of $14,000. In woollen and woven fabrics there is a reduction of 2½ per cent, and they say the loss will be $167,500; on woollen blankets, where there is a reduction of 7½ per cent, they say the loss will be $63,750. That is where their total of $245,000 comes in.

Now, answering my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I am going to take the house into my confidence at once. Hon. gentlemen opposite urged that we should accept the recommendations of the tariff board. I brought the recommendations of the tariff board practically to the house and the house has rejected them. Now I am going back to my own judgment in this matter and so keep out of trouble. But before announcing what I propose to submit to the house I wish to say this. Hon. gentlemen have argued that these tariff changes mean increased protection. Now I have here a statement of what is involved by the changes, and the decreases in question amount to $1,119,560. My hon. friends have centred their attack on item 522b and they allege that we are making the change for one company which they contend is a friend of the government. Well, I am going to prove my friendship to this company by announcing that when we come to that item I shall move that we make these articles free under the preferential tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has not given the explanation he promised. He said he was going to take the house into his confidence and tell hon. members what facts induced him to disregard the other set of facts which he has so ably read, but he has not done so. Now he says that we rejected the advice of the tariff board. Why the tariff board has given no advice whatever.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the advice of the tariff board in relation to these particular items is coming to the house through the minister. This is what they suggested as a fair reclassification of these items so that the yarn people would enjoy a share of the protection. I realized at the time just what we were running into and that there would be some opposition, and I am going to keep out of trouble hereafter.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister said a moment ago: I have tendered to the house the findings of the tariff board and my hon. friends opposite—meaning us—have rejected their advice. We are not rejecting it, because there is nothing to reject. Here is what we find in this remarkable report. I shall not read it all but they start with about two pages of a dissertation, upon the tremendous load that has been placed on their shoulders. For instance the report says this:

> It is probably safe to say that a greater mass of work has never fallen, within the same space of time, upon a commission.

They are looking for sympathy. Then the report goes on to say:

> The board may be regarded as still in process of organization.

That statement has been made although the board has been organized for over two years. Then further the report goes on to point out that the board thinks there should be a change in the method of procedure. A change in the method of procedure referred to came about through the dependence of one reference upon another. It has taken them two years to find out that the tariff is an interrelated structure which every schoolboy knows from the time he can write. Everybody knows that the whole tariff structure is interrelated. Then follows about a page intimating that, to the amazement and surprise of the board, they found that when they came to the rubber schedule it affected the cotton schedule, as if it was not known that cotton went into the manufacture of rubber goods. And so it goes on, and the recital takes two or three pages. Then the report says this:

> There is just a question whether the present method of making applications is suited to thorough efficiency in enquiry.

They doubt whether the methods of procedure are suited to a proper kind of enquiry. Then they go on to say further that the board have no power to compel the production of financial statements and documents, but they do not ask for the power because they say they have been accorded all the courtesy that is necessary from the various manufacturing concerns. Then after two or three pages more of just such stuff as that, we come down to the last couple of pages of the report wherein they make their findings. These are their findings. They recite the reference and they go on to say:

> Little difficulty has been experienced as to the duty of enquiry.

That is they do realize that they must make enquiry; that part is clear to them:

> Possibly we might have succeeded better proceeding under a set of questions stated by you—

That is addressed to the Minister of Finance:

> —outlining the scope of the investigation, but we believe that on the whole our duty of enquiry has been discharged with reasonable satisfaction.

They say that although the minister confesses that there is not a single fact found. He says that he has repudiated the whole thing and will depend upon his own judgment. Then the report goes on to say this:

> Difficulty, however, exists as to determining the nature of the advice we are presumed by order in council to tender to the minister.

They do not even know what they should advise the minister upon. They have not the faintest idea of the nature of the advice they should return to the minister after operating for two years and after hearing over one hundred cases. I think there are 98 recited in the report and there are doubtless a good many more. Then the report goes on:

> Reports of the enquiry into the major references, and some of the minor as well, are lengthy, and at times somewhat involved, usually containing valuable statistical matter. To present the evidence in precis form, possesses the advantage of brevity—and the disadvantage of incompleteness.

They do not attempt to prepare a precis of the evidence or even to summarize it. The least they could have done was to summarize the evidence and to submit it to us for judgment. The report goes on to say that there would be a hearing at great length and then someone would appear before them whose evidence would disturb the quasi decisions already made, making it necessary to reopen the case and call back the witnesses again. Yet the minister constantly twits us with negligence on our part in not going through this involved mass of evidence and sifting one part from another, although he admits that he has not done so himself. They say:

> Reports of the inquiry into the major references, and some of the minor as well, are lengthy, and at times somewhat involved.

They say, as I have already stated, that there is a disadvantage in preparing a precis and therefore they prepared no precis. Then we have some further observations:

> The transcripts contain the arguments of the applicants and their opponents, which, in our opinion, cannot be satisfactorily summarized.

Thus we have Mr. Moore and his board, a board that has been organized for two years, telling us that the arguments of the applicants and their opponents cannot be satisfactorily summarized, and yet we members of this house are asked to take this half ton of evidence and understand it fully without the assistance of even a single expert. This is not a haphazard decision on their part. They say:

> After mature deliberation we have concluded that to attempt a summary would be not only unfair to those who have argued before the board, but as well would render to you——and to parliament an incomplete service.

The Minister of Finance.

Therefore they attempt no summary. After reading this report I am inclined to agree with the minister that his decision was perhaps the right one, namely, to kick them out lock, stock and barrel and go on his own.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: That is virtually what he said. I was rather inclined to compliment him on his decision.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that. I cannot accept the compliment.

Mr. STEVENS: He said that he was going to use common sense instead of the advice of the tariff advisory board. This is another statement by the board that is worth considering:

> —but as well would render to you and to parliament an incomplete service. The obvious intent of argument is to influence those who have authority over the matter under discussion.

Therefore they should make no summary, make no finding for fear they would influence those who had to decide the matter, that is parliament or the minister. This board was set up and heralded throughout the country as a solution of the great question of the tariff that had been bothering the government for years. They said: We, the great Liberal government, have now set up an advisory board and the whole question is solved. Yet this board, through the Minister of Finance, tells parliament that because argument which is made before it, is intended to influence those who have authority to judge the matter, therefore they refrain from summarizing, finding on, or even making a precis of the argument.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was the tariff advisory board not inaugurated with the consent of both parties?

Mr. STEVENS: Not this one.

Mr. ROBB: It is the personnel of the board my hon. friend objects to, I imagine.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is what the board does.

Mr. STEVENS: I have always believed a board of experts, acting under the leadership of the government for the purpose of investigating and assembling facts in a properly organized form, would be of inestimable value to the government and to parliament. A business man or any person having to make a decision on any subject can certainly make that decision very much better if all the facts are assembled, properly organized and placed before him in sequence. In the presentation of a case on the tariff there must necessarily be involved arguments and an array of facts brought forward in an unorganized form. Any group of individuals can sit and listen; but what a tariff board is for—and there is not one atom of reason for their existence if they do not do this—is to winnow out of what they hear some of the kernels of wheat of argument and present those to the house, and to disperse the chaff, leaving the chaff for us to winnow through if we want to, and if we suspect the wheat has not all been winnowed out. That is the secret of success in connection with any tribunal. This is the way in which the board think they have discharged their function. They say:

> We have deemed it our duty to pass on to you the transcripts containing the records of our public proceedings with only explanatory comment.

As a matter of fact there is not even explanatory comment. Let us not forget what they said a moment ago, that so involved was the hearing that they did not dare to make a precis. Yet they have the temerity to come to parliament and say:

> We have deemed it our duty to pass on to you the transcripts containing the records of our public proceedings with only explanatory comment.
> We realize that in so doing we may not be rendering all the service you expect from us, but it has seemed to us that the precise way in which we may be most helpful will in course of time be developed by experience.

Can anyone imagine a report of that kind being presented to parliament? It is an insult to the intelligence of this parliament, and I do not blame the minister for casting it aside and using, as he said a moment ago, his common sense in the formation of this tariff. It is perfectly clear from this report why it is that we have before us a tariff revision which the minister finds difficulty in explaining. There is in the realm of economics nothing more complicated than a tariff, nothing that requires more accurate and detailed knowledge, and the minister should not be saddled with the responsibility of presenting this tariff in all its details to the house. What they should have done, for the benefit not only of the minister but of the members, was to make a precis of these revisions with an explanation based upon the facts presented to the board and the reasons for the changes. Let us take, for instance, the letter which the minister has just read, a letter from Mr. Daniels of the Dominion Textiles. I am just recalling the contents of it, having heard the minister read it. In that letter this company, a large company with a very big investment in Canada, makes the statement that as a result of this revision it is going to be penalized in certain respects and there will be a serious loss to its business. The company points out that it is in competition along certain lines with other firms which in some measure are receiving assistance whereas this company is suffering a reduction. It does not matter what we may think of the principle of protection or free trade, the fact remains that the country owes it to our business men and organizations to deal with them equitably. I would appeal to my hon. friends who may stand for a principle of no tariff, or low tariff, or whatever you like; at least let us stand on the principle of equitable treatment to all parties alike. It would be infinitely better to put in a flat reduction than to pick out one firm here for special, favourable treatment and another firm there to be penalized.

As I intimated in my question which the minister has very great difficulty in answering—and I understand the difficulty now that I have read over this report—in view of the facts presented by the Dominion Textiles in that letter, what other set of facts warranted the changes that the minister has made? I am not saying that these changes are wrong. It may be that the case of the Dominion Textiles is not really a case, but we are not in a position to judge. We have one side of it presented by the Minister of Finance, and the other side is in half a ton of evidence which we are invited to go and look over. So I say to the Minister of Finance that the revision presented to us to-day is one that we cannot with confidence support; and not only that, we cannot with confidence pass it through this house without the most careful scrutiny and without a great deal of anxiety for fear that industry will be injured.

I met a gentleman down at the hotel this morning who, while not in the cotton business, is in the textile business and knows a good deal about it, and I asked him this question. Let me say first that it was not a question of lobbying; I am not afraid of this talk about lobbying, because I believe that any respectable and responsible business man has a perfect right to come to a member of parliament and tell him his case, if he so desires. I know nothing about the cotton industry myself; I am not supposed to know anything about it; it is not my business; and how am I going to learn anything about it if I do not get the information from these various sources? I met this gentleman and asked him, "what about the cotton schedule? Is it a satisfactory schedule? How do you view it? What criticism do you make of it?" He replied, "I venture this statement, that there is not a man in Canada, in the business or out of it, who understands that cotton schedule—not one." And, Mr. Chairman, I venture this statement, that there is not a member of the minister's staff who understands it, and we in this parliament are going blind on this question right at this hour. I predict without the slightest hesitancy that within the next three or six months the minister will be faced with incontrovertible evidence calling for some changes in the tariff that he is presenting to us to-day, or else of allowing serious hardship and loss to ensue to business in this country. We are asked to approve of this tariff, which is not a tariff that has been carefully thought out and prepared. It is true the minister may have slaved as he said yesterday, and spent sleepless nights worrying about it until the small hours of the morning. It is utterly absurd to ask the Minister of Finance to sit up night after night revising the tariff of Canada or of any other country. The thing is preposterous; it cannot be done, that is all. There is not a minister of finance either in past history or now living in any country who could do that work. He may, over a period of two or three years, but by the end of that time the whole thing would be obsolete.

The thing I am complaining of, and it is something which the house ought to resent and condemn, is the presentation to the house of a report such as this from the tariff board. There was only one possible alternative for the tariff board, if they were to escape the just condemnation of this house and of public opinion, and that would have been to remain silent, simply saying: We are unable to report.

Mr. RYCKMAN: And send in their resignations.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, send in their resignations. My point is that there is no responsible body of citizens, tariff board or any other group, that has any right after two years service to present a report like that to parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date of the report?

Mr. STEVENS: The letter addressed to the Minister of Finance accompanying this report, which is sessional paper 132A, is signed by Mr. W. H. Moore, chairman of the board, and dated January 5, 1928.

I repeat, this thing is more serious than merely the question of a difference of opinion over the tariff, because when we find this on a few cotton yarns, just one little item in the tariff, what are we likely to find in the rest of it? I gave an illustration last night, a most striking illustration. I do not know whether it is corrected in the schedule or not; I am waiting to see. A couple of years ago a designing individual, looking for the advantage of an American firm that he represented, by subtlety or suggestion or in some way or other secured the introduction into a tariff item of certain words, and the words were simply "when imported by the manufacturer." They sound very harmless, but what was the effect of those words? Their effect was to penalize the British exporter over five per cent as against the American exporter. The item dealt with cotton manufacturing machinery, and it ran into a large amount. The insertion of those words made all the difference between the British firm continuing business or not. It actually drove them out of the market, and in a most unfair way, as I will show. The British manufacturer desired to supply parts in Canada for his machines that had been purchased in this country, and he opened a warehouse in Montreal, where he kept his parts. That was a desirable thing, but because he did that, he was penalized 5 per cent customs duty more than his American competitor who kept his plant in Boston, and shipped his parts into this country one at a time. I mention that only to illustrate how words can be introduced into a tariff item that may not only penalize but jeopardize the very existence of an industry in Canada in favour of a foreign competitor. So we speak with some degree of warmth, and I think we are justified in saying indignation, when we are asked as an opposition, and when the house is asked as a representative body of men, to deal with a revision of the tariff based upon a report such as that presented by Mr. Moore and his colleagues.

Mr. EVANS: Having listened to the discussion yesterday and again to-day, I do not think the house is yet seized of the importance of these new duties in the cotton schedules, particularly items 522a and 522b. The cotton industry has been amply protected in the past. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre said that all tariffs constitute argument. It seems to me that this one constitutes much more; it constitutes bargaining, simply bargaining. Here is a new tax imposed by the Liberal government, which professes to be against tariffs altogether.

Mr. CANNON: The government never claimed that at all.

Mr. EVANS: Many of its supporters were elected on a free trade platform. I would simply remind the hon. gentlemen of the free trade propaganda that was sent out throughout Saskatchewan at the last election. Why does not the minister take us into his confidence and tell us the reason for these changes? I am going to give a reason of my own, and I shall not be blamed whether my inference is right or not. It is certainly bad enough when privilege is given to one class at the expense of others, but under item 522b it divides even the Canadian manufacturers one against the other. Why? A certain company make their own yarns, and the minister said plainly yesterday that this change is made in the interest of that company, because certain other companies were hogging all the protection already given. Now let us see what is the effect on this certain company which will benefit, and which make their own yarns presumably. Those that cannot make their own yarns are penalized up to 15 per cent on their raw material. They will have to pass that on to the consumer; there is nothing else for it. What, then, is the effect on the company that can manufacture their own yarns? It simply means that they are placed in the position where they can add to their profits the whole of the trade penalty which the other companies have got to pay. The Minister of Finance was very much amused yesterday at having, as he thought, set this free trade party against the protectionist party in this house. To-day it has been amusing to me to see the row among the protectionists themselves, and to my mind it has established the fact for once before the people of this country that parliament is one great system of group government. Both the government and the opposition are to-day serving one group. There is no other conclusion to be drawn from the facts we heard yesterday and to-day. I repeat, they simply serve one group, and although they have described it as such an evil, we are in the midst of it. All this free trade party is trying to do is to counterbalance the power and influence of that one group which stands behind the whole protectionist element in this house to-day. I cannot help thinking that this change in the cotton tariff is one of the most barefaced bargains that any one government favorite has ever been able to make.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, when my hon. friend gets through his speech we are going to show our appreciation of that company by reducing the British preference item to free.

Mr. STEVENS: Which item is that?

Mr. ROBB: That is the item my hon. friends complain about.

Mr. EVANS: It will depend then from what country they import this cotton yarn. But this measure is certainly calculated to concentrate the cotton industry of Canada in the hands of a closer combine. The argument to-day has been from the viewpoint of the cotton manufacturers. Let us see what is the effect on the consumers. The public will have to shoulder the burden of this 7½, 10, or 15 per cent; to that the jobber or wholesaler will add his 10 or 15 per cent, and on this extra cost the retailer will pryamid his 40 per cent. What does this duty become before the garment reaches the ultimate consumer? The duty on cotton clothing under 532 probably is lowered, but this reduction is not going to cover the cost of the extra duty under this bargain. If it is the case that only one company makes its own yarns, I say again, it certainly constitutes a bargain. The other companies are placed at the mercy of this one company. I should like the minister for once to take us into his confidence and tell us why this change has been made.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do I understand the minister to say that he proposes to eliminate the tariff under the British preference on this item we are discussing?

Mr. ROBB: No. The complaint of my hon. friends opposite, particularly the official opposition, has been directed against the change in the tariff item 522b, yarns and warps wholly of cotton exceeding No. 40, not more advanced than singles. Under that there were reductions on the coarser. When we come to that item I propose to move that "7½ per cent" be struck out and the word "free" inserted under the British preferential tariff, thus enlarging the policy of the British preference and diverting the business to the mother country. I hope all sides will agree with that announcement, because I understood that that is what all my hon. friends opposite were arguing for yesterday.

Mr. CLARK: How is that enlarging the British preference if there was no duty before?

Mr. ROBB: Because there will be a tariff against other countries of 10 per cent intermediate and 15 per cent general, while formerly it was free in all schedules. Does my hon. friend understand that?

Mr. CLARK: I must confess I cannot understand how, if you apply a tariff where none existed before, and then remove it, it makes any difference or enlarges the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: Let me repeat, formerly it was free under all schedules, now it will be free under the British preference only.

Mr. BENNETT: If they bought their yarn in England before, and buy it there still, there will be no change.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to have my hon. friend's opinion of that when we get to the item.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, in any remarks I made in regard to 522b I did not oppose the imposition of the 7½ per cent. I approved it, provided the principle of protection were adopted all along the line, as it should be. But what concerns me at the moment is item 522. Within a moment of time the minister said that the new item was a reduction from the old item. That is quite different from what he stated in this house last night. Just before the sitting closed the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) was addressing the committee. I am quoting from page 1400 of Hansard. He said:

Do these figures enable us to say whether item 522, cotton yarns, not exceeding 20's single, 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent, constitutes an increase or a reduction in the tariff?

Mr. Robb: A number of the items are obsolete. It is chiefly a reduction.

Mr. Geary: I am directing my attention to No. 522.

Mr. Robb: If my hon. friend picks out 522 alone—

Mr. Geary: That is the one we are discussing, according to the chairman.

Mr. Robb: We have been discussing the items generally. I do not know whether my hon. friend wants to get on the record at this late hour all the facts bearing on the matter. In this particular item alone there is an increase.

Mr. Guthrie: There is an increase in item 522?

Mr. ROBB: In the noise I must have thought it was 522b. That is where it comes in.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I read it there was an increase, whether there was any noise or not.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Formerly all goods under 522 came in under item 534, under which yarns were free, free, free. Now they come in under item 522 subject to a tariff of 10, 15 and 20 per cent. The statement of the minister last night was correct; it is an increase. At the time he made it I marked in the margin of my copy "increase in this item." Last night he was correct; I submit that to-day he is incorrect. Let him take time to consider it, and I think he will come to the conclusion that he should change his statement and say that 522 constitutes an increase over what it has been hitherto.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister on making the slight change in 522b, but I think it would have been better appreciated had he done it before the effect was pointed out from this side of the house. As to whether it is an increase or not, I wish to quote an article from the Financial Times. At page 24 of that journal appears the following:

Some relief has been given the Canadian linen industry under the new Robb budget. The Financial Times is advised prior to February 17th yarns for the manufacture of linens were free of duty no matter what the source. Under the budget effective February 17th yarns imported from countries subject to British preferential rates only, are free, the intermediate tariff now being 10 per cent and the general tariff 15 per cent. Recognition has been given the much larger wage costs incidental to linen manufacturing as compared with cotton and some additional protection given accordingly.

I understand that the yarns covered by 522b are used in the linen industry, so presumably that is the item to which The Financial Times refers.

Mr. ROBB: We are discussing cottons now. We will discuss linens when we come to the item.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister read a few letters, and while I did not catch all they conveyed I understood that the communication from the Dominion Textile Company intimated that the reductions would not mean much to the consumer but did mean a good deal as between the various manufacturers using yarns.

Mr. ROBB: Not yarns, no. They claimed that they would lose $600,000 per annum of which about $64,000 would embrace yarns. The rest represented a loss in protection on their product.

Mr. KENNEDY: We shall see in Hansard just what the letter says. Has the minister received a letter from the Wabasso Company complaining about these changes?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. KENNEDY: My objections yesterday were based largely on the added protection given the Wabasso Company. I also stressed the argument in regard to forties and finer which previously were on the free list and are now made dutiable in the rates the minister proposes. I believe they were to be 10 per cent under the intermediate and 15 per cent under the general.

Mr. ROBB: And free under the preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: The proposal now before us is to have these rates 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent respectively. Now I do not think that Wabasso needs any special protection. These people were doing very well before as things were. Yesterday I read their application in which they claimed that they were losing on the manufacture of yarns of forty and finer and my deduction was that they were bound to take full advantage of the tariff. I have here the Annual Financial Review, Canadian, 1927, and I will quote about ten lines from page 872, giving a brief history of the Wabasso Cotton Company, Limited:

In 1908 the Wabasso Cotton Company was organized for the purpose of securing for Canada part of the trade in fine white cotton, lawns, nainsooks and cambrics, heretofore entirely imported from abroad. In pursuance of this policy buildings were constructed on the lines of the most modern Lancashire mills, and this plant is the only one on the American continent furnished throughout with machinery made by the firm of Messrs. Platt Brothers & Company of Oldham, England, who are recognized as the standard cotton machine builders of the world. The hopes of the promoters of this company have been more than realized. Their goods have steadily gained ground and favour in the market.

I will now refer to the statement of the highest and lowest prices of stocks and bonds over a period of years, taking the month of January in each case. I take January because, while there is a slight variation here and there, the difference is not sufficient to render the quotation unbiased or untrue in a general way.

	High	Low
1923..	74	74
1924..	71	66
1925..	58	56
1926..	65	65
1927..	110½	100½

Now I give the figures in regard to bonds, taking the month January again:

	High	Low
1923..	91½	90¾
1924..	90	90
1925..	92	92
1926..	99	98½
1927..	100⅜	100⅜

Now I want to quote from an article appearing in the Financial Post of January 20, 1928, which has something further to say regarding these stocks and bonds:

Wabasso Cotton Issue Of Stock Shows Progress

Rights on present shares worth $13; management is regarded highly

The able management and steady progress enjoyed by the Wabasso Cotton Company is reflected in a new stock issue of 17,500 shares which are being offered to the present shareholders at $80 per share on the basis of one share of new stock for every three shares outstanding. Shareholders on record as at February 1 next will be entitled to participate in the offering. The subscription price of the new stock will be payable in eight monthly instalments of $10 each commencing March 1.

The recent sales of Wabasso shares have been at about 135. At this level, the offer of new stock at 80 confers rights which are worth over $13 per share. Early in 1927 an offering of 17,500 shares was made at $60 bringing the outstanding capital up to 52,500 shares. The present issue will increase the outstanding stock to 70,000 shares and will leave 35,000 shares in the treasury still to be issued.

Wabasso has done well for its shareholders in recent years. The company's management sticks closely to its business of manufacturing cotton at Three Rivers. Additions have been made to the plants and new lines have been added. It is understood that successful results have been achieved in the new lines and by the expansion of the property.

It seems to me that to give additional protection—and that is what they ask for—to a company enjoying such prosperity as the foregoing figures indicate is unfair to the people of this Dominion who are obliged to get along without protection at all whether times are good or bad. Nor is it fair to give to a large concern like this, as appears to be intimated in the letter to which reference has been made—if I understood it rightly as read by the minister—advantages under the tariff such as constitute disadvantages to others using their product.

Mr. ADSHEAD: As one who was a new member last year and who was under what was perhaps a delusion, that the tariff was going to be taken out of politics and that the tariff advisory board would bring in something concrete and definite whereby we might arrive at some conclusion, I must say that I am disappointed in the work of that body. I have a great deal of sympathy with the minister in his attempt to do all over again the work which the board has done or ought to have done, and I have much more sympathy with myself and others who are trying to wade through the mass of evidence which has been taken and to do over again for ourselves what the tariff board should have done. Last year when the tariff board was under discussion I suggested that we should have a sort of Hansard of the board's proceedings. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) supported that suggestion—and he belongs to the party opposite. The Minister of Finance said that this could not be done, but he did promise that if any hon. member wished to have a copy of the evidence submitted regarding any particular item or application it should be available. A number of us applied for the evidence and we waited patiently in the expectation that between sessions we might study it so as to be able to come to some conclusion as to what should be done in relation to the tariff. One objection to the proposal I made was lack of money, and for that reason we could not get a satisfactory report of the work of the tariff board. It seems to me that the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) is a reasonable one, that at least a precis or synopsis of the proceedings of the board should be given to members of the house, even if we have not a statement of the board's conclusions. This, I think, is due the house, and I trust the minister will take the matter into serious consideration. Such a synopsis would enable us to consider the question intelligently, as we cannot do at present. I am sure I cannot now arrive at a very definite conclusion without wading through all this evidence, even after following the example of the Minister of Finance and sitting up until eleven o'clock at night for weeks as he sat up until two o'clock in the morning for months.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, yesterday the hon. gentleman opposed these items from two different angles. The item as submitted to parliament was what might be termed the fact finding of the board; it was their suggestion that this change should be made in the tariff, on the ground that these finer counts were a good deal more expensive to manufacture and that they should be placed in a position equal to that of the less expensive yarns.

Mr. STEVENS: Where are we to find that recommendation?

Mr. ROBB: I am telling my hon. friend now as a member of parliament, on my responsibility as a member. After having consulted officers of the department, that was the representation made to me. I passed that representation on to my colleagues and have their authority to present it to parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: I am asking the question because there is no record of it. I am not questioning my hon. friend's word at all.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right; there is nothing in print concerning it. There were some three hearings held in connection with this cotton inquiry, covering several weeks; witnesses from all sides came before the board, those who advocated higher protection as well as others. Hon. gentlemen must remember that the mills all asked for more protection; I think I make no mistake in saying that. If you look at the evidence you will see that most of the mills urged that they should have more protection. There were also those who thought they should not have more protection, and indeed representations were made that the protection already existing should be reduced. At the conclusion of that inquiry a statement was made by Mr. Daniels, whose letter I read in which he stated that his company will lose over $600,000 yearly largely through the reduction of the duty on the finished fabric. On November 22, Mr. Daniels made this statement, which may be found at page 964 of the evidence taken before the board at the November hearing:

> I appreciate very much the way in which you have received our application, and the very fair-minded way in which your criticisms have been handed out. . . . we will be very glad to let you have any information of any kind that will help you reach an equitable decision.

[Mr. Adshead.]

On that point we have every confidence in the board, and you can count on our whole-hearted support.

Hon. gentlemen yonder protest against this increased protection, but the rates under consideration are all reductions. The very rate we are now considering, item 522, is a reduction; item 522a is a reduction also. After listening to my hon. friend the leader of the official opposition yesterday I saw the difficulty in connection with item 522b, and he more than any person else protested against this protection. When we reach that item I am going to move that this be made free under the British preference, so why are we delaying?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister tell me where the importation comes from?

Mr. ROBB: I am told that in the past about one-third has come from Great Britain and under the proposed change it is reasonable to assume that most of it will come from the mother country.

Mr. KENNEDY: I have here the figures of the importations of yarns number 40 and finer, up to March 31, 1926, and I find that we imported in that year from the United Kingdom 789,393 pounds of this material, while from the United States in the same period of time we imported 1,942,456 pounds.

Mr. ROBB: That is nearly half.

Mr. BOIVIN: What was the value in dollars and cents?

Mr. KENNEDY: We will take the year 1922. In that year we imported from Great Britain 1,125,451 pounds of this material valued at $1,115,769, and from the United States 1,240,100 pounds valued at $1,266,305. From 1922 to 1926 there is a steady increase in the importation from the United States with a corresponding decrease from the United Kingdom.

Mr. ROBB: While my hon. friend is on his feet I would remind him that during that period they were all on the same basis, and now it is proposed to make it free under the British preference to give the business to the United Kingdom.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does the minister suggest that the importations will not be practically all from the United Kingdom to the exclusion of the United States?

Mr. ROBB: I contend that very naturally that result will follow, because Great Britain will have a preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: I cannot understand why the tendency should be towards a gradual increase in the importation from the United States. There must be something else in addition to the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: There is the question of the proximity of the United States. A small concern using these yarns and receiving a rush order might telegraph to the New England states and have the goods in their shop in twenty-four or forty-eight hours, if they were sent by express.

Mr. KENNEDY: Of course the United States will still have the advantage of proximity.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand the Minister of Finance now says he proposes to withdraw the duty of 7½ per cent on one item and that he is doing so because of certain observations I made yesterday. Am I correctly informed?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend convinced me yesterday that that was a reasonable thing to do.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad the minister is amenable to reason, and particularly to that form of reason which deals with his own argument rather than the log-rolling of interested individuals, because certainly I am not one of those. I merely took the case as I found it on the books and presented it to the minister, and I hope that hereafter neither he nor those who support him in the country will say that there was any merit either on his own behalf or on behalf of those who surround him which induced this change.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The difficulty I still find in determining to whom should be given the credit for the reduction is this: The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) now takes credit to himself—

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —while the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said just a moment ago that he was not in favour of such a reduction and wanted the protection maintained.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agreed with the argument which was advanced by the minister yesterday and which will be found at page 1417 of Hansard. There he stated:

> Now, it is reasonable to suppose that this product was imported and used to manufacture a fabric that had protection; and it is also reasonable to suppose that whoever produces the yarn should share in that protection.

That was the language of the Minister of Finance twenty-four hours ago. He was correct in this attitude yesterday. What has caused him to change? Has he been called down by a supporter from Saskatchewan? Because he certainly has climbed down. It is not a change of principle at all. It is only a change to suit some of his followers who will not stand for the declaration of policy he made in this house twenty-four hours ago.

Mr. FANSHER (East Lambton): Is there not a possibility that the application of the British preferential tariff to goods containing not less than 50 per cent of empire labour and materials will at certain times preclude importations from Great Britain at the preferential rate and that importations will then fall under the general tariff?

Mr. ROBB: We will deal with that provision when we come to it. I am not sure that there is anything in the resolution referred to which will affect the items we are considering. The provision in question was a notice to the world that we intended to proceed on that basis. For some years it has been represented to us by our sister dominions, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, that there should be a change in regard to the material and the labour to qualify for the British preference, and it was suggested that the figure should be 75 per cent instead of 25 per cent. Canada took the position that 50 per cent would be fair. When the change is made it will be made by order in council, and we will make the same reservation that now exists so as to enable these products to come in from the mother country. We had the officers of the department inquire very carefully into the matter and we concluded that if we adopted the larger figure, our own industries using imported yarns might not be able to qualify. I hope my hon. friends will give us credit for possessing sufficient intelligence to be able to look after our own industries.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522a. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton exceeding number twenty, but not exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this an increase or a decrease? Let us get it straight this time.

Mr. ROBB: The rates proposed under the budget are 12½, 15 and 22½. The former rates were 15, 22½ and 25.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am informed that formerly these items all came in under 534 and were free of duty under all tariffs. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ROBB: I am informed not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under what item did they come?

Mr. ROBB: 520.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is something wrong with the printed list of comparative rates if the statement which the minister has now made is correct. In 522a there are really two items, 534 and 520. In the old item 534, cotton yarns were free in every case. Under the old 520, cotton yarns, etc., n.o.p., the rates were 15, 22½ and 25. In coming to a determination as to what the effect of the change is, we should be given the importations under the three previous dutiable items, so as to determine whether there has been a reduction or an increase of duty. I should like the minister to read into Hansard the figures showing what the imports were of cotton yarns under item 534 which previously came in free and are now dutiable, and the imports under 520 where the rates previously were 15, 22½ and 25.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot give my hon. friend the importations under those items. In the item 522 which we have just had there is a reduction. In 522a there is a reduction, and when we come to 522b I will move for a reduction there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister is simply making a statement that there is a reduction and the figures I hold in my hand do not support him in that. If he could give us a statement as to the loss of revenue that would be entailed as a result of the application of the new schedule, we should be able to form an accurate opinion. I cannot agree with the minister that there is a reduction in this item.

Mr. ROBB: These particular items were spread over three items formerly. In the one case the importations amount to $149,627, and in the other to $141,212, or a total of $290,839. But the second item, yarns for shoelaces, was taken advantage of.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The fact still remains that there is an increase in duties.

Mr. ROBB: There is no increase in duty for that business. An item is being included which was 534 under the old schedule and under which these articles came in free under all tariffs. Now there are rates of 12½, 15 and 22½.

An hon. MEMBER: Shoelaces.

Mr. KENNEDY: It is not shoelaces. They come in under item 522.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. STEVENS: The difficulty is this: The minister is in a sort of corner which he naturally finds it not easy to get out of, and it is not one that he voluntarily got into.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Certain importers entered their goods under item 534 of the tariff where yarns were imported for shoelaces, and he has just read to us the statement that there were importations to the amount of $141,000 under that heading when there were no yarns imported for shoe laces.

Mr. ROBB: I made that statement.

Mr. STEVENS: Therefore it must be that the class of yarns we are now talking of here have been coming in under that item improperly.

Mr. ROBB: I made that statement.

Mr. STEVENS: They came in free under item 534 and now they are dutiable.

Mr. VENIOT: Because they are imported for another purpose.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not matter. The long and the short of it is the importers ought to be penalized or the officers of the department ought to be fired, one or the other. That is the situation. They made false entries, if you like to use such a strong expression—that is a term used in the department—these goods coming in under 534 whereas they should have entered under 520. The point is that they have been coming in free and now they are dutiable. What the minister should have done, to accomplish what he is professing to do, was to have carried the items forward in the way in which they appear in the old tariff.

Mr. ROBB: Itemized.

Mr. KENNEDY: I find by the Trade of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1926, page 168, that the imports of "yarn, cotton, polished or glazed when imported by manufacturers of shoe laces for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories," were 66,702 pounds valued at $52,764. I understood the minister to say there were no imports under that item.

Mr. ROBB: That was placed under that item but there was no importation of glazed or polished.

Mr. KENNEDY: In view of this printed list of proposed changes in the tariff there is an increase. You have one item free becoming dutiable at 12½ per cent, 15 per cent and 22½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend add to this item the letters "n.o.p."?

Mr. STEVENS: I am always sceptical about adding these words without an explanation. The addition of "n.o.p." makes an absolute change in the item and I want to know why that change is made. It cannot be put in without its being moved.

Mr. MALCOLM: It distinguishes between 522d which is mercerized and is already provided for.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Trade and Commerce will appreciate this. I know exactly what it means but I do not know what the effect is. It may mean that a dozen other articles are affected.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us know exactly what it means.

Mr. MALCOLM: Item 522d provides for mercerized yarn, but it takes the place of the yarn for the shoe manufacturer who formerly imported a cotton yarn free under item 534. Item 522 is the exception.

Mr. STEVENS: I am usually inclined to agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in matters of this kind because he knows the business perhaps better than I do, but 522b specifies a certain yarn:

Exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles.

That is a specific article. Therefore "n.o.p." is out of place and should not be added, because "n.o.p." is used when you are describing a general article covering a miscellaneous group of items, and "n.o.p." means simply to eliminate from that others which are already provided for. This is a specific item and should not have "n.o.p." added to it at all.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is adding it to 522a.

Mr. STEVENS: The same thing applies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To which item is it proposed to add "n.o.p."?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 522a.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—522b. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 522b.

Customs tariff—522b. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The old item reads:

Cotton yarns not exceeding forty, singles.

The minister has a number of new words inserted. What does it mean?

Mr. ROBB: Not more advanced than singles. This is for administrative purposes. The present item includes all counts over forty, singles.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The proposed item does not include forties, does it?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MALCOLM: But they used to import two-twenties in evasion.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was good enough to say a moment ago, in connection with the amendment he proposed by which, under the preferential tariff, this item will be free, that he had been convinced by the reasons that had been urged. No reasons were urged why it should be changed. His attention was directed to what the facts were and it is a great compliment to the minister's perspicacity that when he once sees the facts, he makes the change. There are those who recall the words of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) last night who said he was going to see that something was done, and I judge by the complacent look upon his face this morning that he is like the cat that has just returned; he is very happy and he feels he has accomplished his purpose.

May I venture also to point out that on the 13th March last the Daily News Record of New York, which is the authoritative journal in connection with textiles in the United States, carried an article under this heading:

Change in Canadian tariff might make that country better customer.

This possibility stimulates investigation of goods market conditions in United States by importers from Dominion—operations more speedily accomplished here than abroad.

It states that the effect of the tariff changes will be against buying from Great Britain and towards buying in increased quantities from the United States. That is the purport of that article which, I doubt not, the minister has had his attention directed to.

Mr. ROBB: The change will rather check that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that point. He may have in mind that perhaps this will do something towards accomplishing that end, but how far will depend on the extent to which we are now purchasing from Great Britain and the United States. I think the minister was incorrect in his statement as to the relative quantities purchased from Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. ROBB: I was.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the figures as the minister makes them now?

Mr. ROBB: They are as follows for the year ended 31st March, 1927:

Country	Imports
United Kingdom	$ 662,113
Switzerland	71
United States	1,573,735

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the duty paid or the value of the goods?

Mr. ROBB: The value of the goods. There was no duty on them then, but under the change we are switching that business to another item.

Mr. GEARY: I have no idea who Wabasso is, but I was interested in the figures that the hon. member for Peace River put on Hansard a few minutes ago as to the position of that company and was curious enough to look at the book from which he was reading. I do not think a company which is paying four dollars a share on its common stock—

Mr. BENNETT: They are split shares. This means eight per cent.

Mr. GEARY: —and is setting aside, out of net profits after paying dividends, only $36,000 a year, should be a mark for any particular attack. It does not seem to me that the company is doing so well as to be an imposition on the community. You might pick out other cotton companies that would be a good deal more striking in their profits.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree with my hon. friend that the Wabasso Company is a good and well-managed company. In their pioneer days they have had some hard sledding. I have a memorandum before me which indicates that they are not the only company affected, but I think I have already placed that on Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: They said they were the only company materially affected.

Mr. ROBB: They make a specialty of this line of goods.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is the minister going to lay down the principle that any company that has had tough sledding in the past is going to have his most favourable consideration when it appeals for assistance? There are very few individuals or companies who cannot establish a case of that kind, and I do not think it is any justification for this company to say that it must have this assistance just because it has had tough sledding in the past. We have all had that.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think my hon. friend wants to be fair, but he may have left a false impression with regard to the statement he read as to Wabasso. I do not know the company particularly well; I never owned a dollar of stock in it, and I do not know its principals. It is in the province of Quebec; I would know more about it if it were in Ontario. My hon. friend must remember this general condition which may obtain in a company. The common stock of Wabasso went down for several years; there was no rise in Wabasso common stock during 1922, 1923 and 1924. It is a low interest-paying stock, and its price fairly represented its value. When a company is able to pay 4 per cent, its stock will float around 60 or 70; an increase of 1 per cent will raise the price of the stock to between 80 and 90; another 1 per cent will drive it above 100; and if the company can make 7 per cent, its stock is liable to jump to 135 or 140; so an increase of about 75 points in a company's stock may only represent an increase of 3 per cent in its earnings, and it is hardly fair to assume that the company has doubled its total value because its common stock has doubled in value. When a company after years of successful operation retires its bond issue and its senior or junior securities, and stands in a comfortable position, and pays dividends on its common stock, the common stock becomes valuable, but that is not necessarily an indication that the company has made a tremendous profit, which is the impression I think my hon. friend left on the house. I do not think he wants to be unfair.

Mr. KENNEDY: I do not want to be unfair, but I am representing people who do not get this kind of consideration from this government or any other government.

Mr. MALCOLM: They do indeed.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was up against a Liberal candidate who in the last election had this to say:

> Tariff reduction: I can see no advantage whatsoever to anyone in western Canada in having a protective tariff. By it you pay more for everything you or your family wear or consume, yet in everything we sell we meet the world in open competition. Is it fair to us?

That was the statement of Mr. Clarke to the electorate of Peace River in the last election. If the party across the way has come to the conclusion that they must protect this industry, they have men in that party throughout Canada who are capable of defending that position clearly before the electors, and they ought to do it. It should be impossible to go to the country on a platform that practically calls for the annihilation of all tariffs, and then come to the House of Commons and bring down a budget that, so far as I can see, is very largely framed on a protective basis. It is so with this item, and that is the reason I am protesting. I want to revise my opinion if I find that it is wrong on the facts and figures as presented to the house by the Minister of Finance. If I do not revise my opinion, I shall go throughout my constituency next summer and present to my electors the facts, but if the minister can convince me that I am wrong I shall be just as earnest in presenting the facts to my constituency. I have never advocated the complete wiping out of all tariffs; I have never advocated free trade as a practical policy for the Dominion.

Mr. ROBB: There is not much difference, then, between my hon. friend and myself. I am not a high protectionist; I have never advocated the wiping out of all tariffs. But I have been attacked—I am case-hardened now because the attacks have been coming every year since 1924—on the ground that I am ruining industry; I was attacked in the budget debate this session for ruining industry, and the only fault I find with my hon. friend is that he lines up with the men who are attacking me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister's last statement shows that he has the peculiar political point of view that other parties have expressed on a question of this kind. We were not lined up with our friends to the right. We were opposing the principle in the budget this year, the principle of the reduction in the income tax chiefly, and also the principle of protection in the fiscal policy of the country. We were not lined up with hon. gentlemen to our right. It just happened that on that occasion we voted with them against the budget, but we might just as well be voting with hon. gentlemen opposite to-morrow or to-day on another proposition; we do not know yet. But when we do vote with hon. gentlemen opposite, we shall not be voting for the party of my hon. friend the minister; we shall be voting for the particular point of view which the particular case represents.

Mr. EVANS: I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he really meant that the paying of dividends depends upon the amount of tariff protection that a company engaged in the cotton industry receives.

Mr. MALCOLM: Not at all.

Mr. EVANS: The minister left that impression.

Mr. MALCOLM: The impression I was trying to leave was this: The Wabasso Company has been discussed under this item, and my hon. friend from Peace River went on to show that that company was doing rather well, and that they probably did not need an increase in the tariff. The impression he left on the house as to the company's position was in my opinion rather extravagant. I only pointed out in a general way that the Wabasso Company, which I am not interested in at all, has not had such remarkable success as the price of its common stock would indicate. I am not discussing the principle of protection, but this company is the chief manufacturer of this line of goods, and is very much interested in this item. The minister has changed the item, making it free so far as Great Britain is concerned, and dutiable from the United States, which would transfer a lot of the business to England.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): A great many companies in Canada have a lot of water in their stock. Is this one?

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not think so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The statement just read by the hon. member for Peace River shows that the new stock issued by this company this spring was issued on a bonus basis of $13 per share.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not know about that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is all in the Financial Post.

Mr. EVANS: Returning to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he said that they not only needed protection to pay dividends—

Mr. MALCOLM: No, I did not.

Mr. EVANS: —but that they deserved protection because of the hard sledding they had had in the past. We have all had hard sledding, and I would ask if this house exists to give protection to industries by the sweated labour of men, women and children on the farms of Canada and the consuming public in general.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be very unfortunate if the observations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) were allowed to go unchallenged. The fact is that the Wabasso Cotton Company made an application to the tariff board to increase the tariff. That application was heard by the board. The board made no statement of facts at all upon which this house could arrive at a conclusion; but it did make a report to the minister, which has been traversed by my friend from Vancouver, and which was very generally referred to the other day. Now, it is incorrect to say that objection was made in this house to one feature of it or the other. It is true that an application was made to increase the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: Or to create one.

Mr. BENNETT: To create a tariff where there was no tariff. It is true the minister created a tariff of 7½ per cent against Great Britain, and higher against treaty and non-treaty countries. Now he has withdrawn that 7½ per cent duty, and he says he did so because of the facts presented to him in this house by the groups that sit to the left of the Speaker. Surely he does not mean that.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say facts were presented. I said my hon. friends convinced me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister mean that he proceeded without facts?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt? The hon. member for West Calgary is absolutely correct. The minister did say that he was convinced by the arguments of the groups to the left of the chairman.

Mr. ROBB: Particularly my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. minister included the groups on this side of the house.

Mr. ROBB: I wanted to give my hon. friend some credit for it.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, Mr. Chairman, we are getting to what really might be called the Machiavellian hand of the Minister of Finance. He is not a very great diplomat, but, on the other hand, he is not unskilled, and the Machiavellian touches that he sometimes reveals in this house are such as to assure us that he is not quite as innocent as he would sometimes have us believe. Those of us who have watched him in his handling of tariff items in particular are not unaware of that fine touch which would do credit to the great Italian writer's description of his Prince.

Let me go a step further in relation to it, if I may. Last evening the hon. gentleman was very very strong in his position; to-day he has changed that position. Last evening he asserted that these gentlemen affected were not his friends; now he says he is going to change this item—thereby, we assume, to have revenge upon those who are not his friends. Is that the inference?

Mr. ROBB: Oh no.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the fine Italian touch?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only inference that can be justified.

Mr. CANNON: Are they friends of my hon. friend?

Mr. BENNETT: I said that I had not the privilege of knowing them. But they seem to have been great friends of the chairman of the board. At least one of them, a director of the company, seemed to be very well known in political circles and has a splendid reputation as a very generous supporter of the cause of Liberalism—for which he is to be much admired among those who accept that brand of politics.

Mr. ROBB: This is the first I have heard of it. He has managed to keep it a secret from our followers in that part of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Now then we have the reason why the change has been made to-day.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes. I am glad we have it, because last evening the minister desired to evade giving information by asserting that the gentlemen concerned were friends of ours, not his; and he said he was almost provoked to exclaim, Save me from my friends! Those were his friends. I said that I could quite readily understand the minister so exclaiming having regard to his sometime associations. This afternoon he comes in and says: Ah! well, we will drop that altogether and put the item on the free list, because these groups to the left of the speaker have convinced me. But his conviction arises from the fact that after investigation he has discovered that their supporter in the locality finds this gentleman not friendly to him. He tells us that to-day for the first time.

Mr. ROBB: I only heard that after the item was put through. I am told the member for that county is quite satisfied.

Mr. BENNETT: Meaning, that not to have accorded him the protection recently promised satisfies his supporter. That is all. Now the minister has certainly put himself in a rather embarrassing position. I find it rather difficult to believe that one with his sense of equity and fairness, with his desire to use his common sense against the technical knowledge imposed by his tariff board, would adopt such a course. In Winnipeg he spoke so learnedly about that technical knowledge; to-day so slightingly. He is now going to pit his common sense against their technical knowledge; and his common sense tells him this fact—Three Rivers was not favourably disposed towards him politically. Am I to gather then that, if the item had remained as it was, they had assurances that Three Rivers would be favourably disposed towards him politically? Is that the inference?

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, knowing as we do the little pilgrimage into Huron by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), and his interviews with the manufacturers there, and the certain promises made that free coal would take the place of dutiable coal—

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend knows better than that.

Mr. BENNETT: I know promises were given.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, they were not.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we will not say "promises". He did not sign any document. Let me put it this way: He told them that this time his request of the Minister of Finance would not be as fruitless as in all those lean years gone by.

Mr. MALCOLM: It was never even discussed.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps my hon. friend talks in his sleep in view of what took place in Huron, because certainly there must have been some ground for the extensive advertising in the riding that all the industrial leaders were supporting the Liberal candidate. Then we remember with what haste the minister was rushed from the ship's side to the constituency to indicate how much free trade would do for this languishing land. He recalls the circumstance. Now the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that for years he was trying with the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding,—

Mr. MALCOLM: And the present one.

Mr. BENNETT: As well as the present Minister of Finance, but unavailingly. But all of a sudden the other evening new light had come to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MALCOLM: Not all of a sudden; it was pretty hard work. He had a good representative to support him.

Mr. BENNETT: From the way in which the minister looks to his colleague in the Department of Agriculture, apparently he thought there was a necessity for free salt, or the salt had lost its savour.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is free salt for fishermen and farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: I put this to the Minister of Finance: Does he offer his observations this afternoon to this house as to why he dropped the 7½ per cent tariff and substituted the word "free" in the British preferential tariff as a fair and proper statement?

Mr. ROBB: I thought I was meeting the wishes of my hon. friend. Surely he is not going to chastise me now for having done what he advocated yesterday.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What does my hon. friend object to?

Mr. BENNETT: What is this distant rumbling? It is said of the volcanoes on the coast of South America that they are not extinct, but that now and again there may be a sudden outburst and a flowing of lava down the crater sides. I think I hear a little rumbling that makes me believe the Minister of Agriculture still lives.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Two hours and a half to put through a British preference item!

Mr. BENNETT: How delightful! Two hours and a half to put through a British preference item.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And one hour yesterday makes three and a half hours. A real nice story to tell back home. Make it another hour; it will help us.

Mr. BENNETT: Three hours and a half —and the Minister of Agriculture is as innocent of what we have been talking about as when the discussion commenced; even now he is not certain whether we have been speaking of flax, cotton or butter. But I do not think the Minister of Finance is fair to himself or to this house when, having asserted that the industry affected was unfriendly to him politically, thus inducing the house to believe that he was thereby doing a great and generous favour, he now comes back, after his own friends have indicated what their attitude was in respect of the increased duty of 7½ per cent, and says: The responsibility must rest with you for having done this, and these are your friends. That, Mr. Chairman, I think is ungenerous and unkind.

Mr. ROBB: Yesterday my hon. friend in an eloquent speech, not only once but a number of times, stated that this change was made solely in the interests of political friends of mine. I repudiated that statement; I said they were not political friends. My hon. friend insisted that they were and I said, "The Lord deliver us from our friends".

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—522c. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of cotton, including threads, cords and twines generally used for sewing, stitching, packaging and other purposes, n.o.p.; cotton yarns not more advanced than singles, wholly or partially covered with metallic strip, generally known as tinsel thread: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: This item covers ordinary sewing thread, does it not?

Mr. ROBB: Some of it would come in under that classification.

Mr. STEVENS: It is used for sewing, stitching, packaging and other purposes. That would include common sewing thread used in every household. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, a good deal of thread comes in hanks. The present rates are 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. A small proportion of imports comes under a classification with duties of 5 per cent, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent, while some is free. The total importations for the year ended March 31, 1927, were $745,055. Of that amount $20,000 came under 734 which is free, and $30,000 under 721.

Mr. FRASER: What was collected in duty under the old item?

Mr. ROBB: Five thousand dollars.

Mr. FRASER: That was the amount collected?

Mr. ROBB: The estimated reduction; it breaks about even in the reclassification.

Mr. STEVENS: What I want to know is whether this item includes sewing thread used for household purposes.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and sewing thread shows a reduction.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is the item to which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) referred yesterday as the consumers' item.

Mr. ROBB: This is one of them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Minister of Railways spoke of this as the sewing thread item.

Mr. ROBB: Spool thread.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Spool thread, if you will, under which the consumers were to get an advantage. Now I gather that the minister says there is no advantage; the situation is as it was before. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the leader of the opposition now tell me also that the duty is doubled. Will the minister be good enough to make it perfectly clear just what has happened to the consumer of spool thread?

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend tell me how he figures out that the duty is now doubled?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Two hon. gentlemen who have made a study of the question and who have been listening to the minister so informed me. I did not understand it that way. As a matter of fact I do not know what has happened and I should be glad if the minister would tell me.

Mr. ROBB: I did not hear the hon. gentlemen make that statement. If they did they are misinformed. The principal importations came under the rate of 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There has been a reduction of 2½ per cent under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: The proposed rates are 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: In the Wabasso Cotton hearing the Coates company appeared and stated that they got their material free. They gave the item under which their material was brought in and which I read last night.

Mr. ROBB: This is another item. The Coates people manufacture in Scotland.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is the statement; at page 631:

Mr. Bain: Mr. MacKay, our understanding of this paragraph in your brief is that you do not intend your application to interfere or be in conflict with the interests of the thread makers. You produce letters approving the quality of Wabasso yarns. They were from knitters and other users and none was from thread-making concerns. If that understanding is correct, we have no quarrel, but I find it necessary to direct attention to a misapprehension on the part of the Wabasso company making that statement. It is true we import cotton thread in hanks under tariff item No. 535.

The Chairman: At what rate of duty? 7½, 10 and 10?

That is the evidence given—7½, 10 and 10.

Mr. ROBB: That is not under consideration now.

Mr. BENNETT: The report continues:

Mr. Bain: Yes, but we would emphasize the fact that the bulk of our materials consists of single yarns, 40's and finer, which are free of duty. If therefore the provision for the general free entry of these yarns be removed from clause 532, it will be necessary, in the maintenance of our existing tariff position and situation, to make special provision for the free admission of these yarns for thread-making purposes.

The Chairman: What is your protection now?

Mr. Bain: We have 7½ per cent protection.

That is exactly where this tariff is going to be left, and that is what I desire to bring to the attention of the minister:

The Chairman: Under item No. 536?

Mr. Bain: No. 536—17½ per cent less 10 per cent discount.

The Chairman: When you say "less 10 per cent", why did you not remind me that No. 535 was also less 10 per cent?

Mr. Bain: No sir. The 10 per cent discount applies only to items rated over 15 per cent.

The Chairman: It applies on the valuation.

Mr. Bain: That is our position.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That would indicate that most of the material coming in now comes in at 7½ per cent, and the minister is putting it up to 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: Item 535 remains as it was.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Item 522c is raised to 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I refer to page 631. Mr. Mackay was speaking for the Wabasso Company, together with Mr. Aird:

The Chairman: You have no competition from the southern states?

Mr. MacKay: Just on the coarse.

Mr. Aird: The 40's, 50's and 60's mentioned a little while ago are coming from the southern states also.

The Chairman: But mainly from the northern states?

Mr. Aird: They are going into the spinning of the finer counts. . . .

The Chairman: Yes, that is true.

Mr. MacKay: The Canadian Spool Cotton Company, which is a branch of Coates, bring their yarn in under a special clause, 535 "Thread, cotton, sewing in hanks", 7½ per cent, so that this class of work will apparently not be affected by our request.

Mr. Bain: May I speak at this stage? I just want to put a question to Mr. MacKay.

The Chairman: Speaking for the board, I would like to have Mr. Bain's statement at this point if you have no objection.

Then I turn to page 652, to which I referred last night, where the Canadian Spool Cotton Company made their answer to the application of the Wabasso Company. I do not want to read that at any great length, but they submitted that there should be no change.

Mr. ROBB: The position of the Canadian Spool Cotton Company is that they will still get their finer than 40's in free under item 522d, and they will still have their hanks come in at 7½ per cent under item 522e.

Mr. BENNETT: But that was 7½ per cent before.

Mr. ROBB: Why should we change it?

Mr. BENNETT: There has been no change in it.

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend advocate?

Mr. BENNETT: Here is what Mr. Bain says on that point, at page 658:

Mr. Bain: Our position to-day is this: We have free yarn in respect of probably over two-thirds of our business. We pay 7½ per cent duty on the rest of our raw material. There is a duty under the preferential tariff of 15 per cent on cotton yarns coarser than 40's. We have protection under the preferential tariff from Great Britain of 15¾ per cent on our total output—17½ less 10 per cent.

What is that 10 per cent? Does that prevail here?

Mr. ROBB: Only over 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I continue reading:

We also have a protection as against the United States of 25 per cent under the general tariff. May I say that when the preferential tariff was introduced I happened to be in the government service and had something to do with it officially, and the argument of the government of the day was, as I recollect it, that the preferential rate dominated the price. That was the argument of the Minister of Finance of the day, and my former and very much respected chief, Hon. William Paterson, Minister of Customs. This was the argument: Two manufacturers come into Canada, the one an American and the other a Britisher. The American, realizing that the Englishman had a preference in the rate of duty, felt he was handicapped and had to reduce his price to the extent of the difference between the preferential and the general tariff. . . . .

That was the position, and if that be so there has been no change in the duty with respect to one of these items. Assuming the thread comes in unmanufactured to some extent, the duty is still 7½ per cent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: If manufactured, what change is there?

Mr. ROBB: In spools; it will be 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent, where formerly it was 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Item 522c reads:

Plied yarns and threads, n.o.p., 15 per cent, 22½ per cent, 25 per cent.

Is there not an item with respect to spool cotton?

Mr. ROBB: No, this is the item.

Mr. BENNETT: Is my hon. friend sure of that?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the officers of my department assure me of that. This has been very carefully checked by the officers of the department, working with the Customs department.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If there is any change at all it is a change of 2½ per cent in the British preference on item 536. There is an increase in everything else which comes in under item 522c now, and which formerly came in under items 534, 520, 721 and 734. The only place in which there is any reduction at all is in the British preference under item 536; that was formerly 17½ per cent and is now 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The department suggested that for administrative purposes these be made into one item, and I will repeat that the total importation under these five items amounted to $745,055. Of that $695,055 came in under item 536, where there is the reduction in the British preference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Out of that $695,000 which came in, how much will now come under item 522c and how much under items 522d and 522e? There is where we get into a tangle on this whole business. The Minister of Finance says that the total importation amounted to about $745,000, and of that some $600,000 came in under item 536.

Mr. STEVENS: How was that composed?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is exactly what I want to know; how much was mercerized, how much was hanks and how much was spool thread? If we find out how much was spool thread we will find out if there is a reduction or an increase.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROBB: I do not think I can give you that information, but I can tell you that all the spool thread comes in under this item.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend from Bow River was misled, as we were, by the fact that in the original tariff items as submitted there was no item 522e, which is now being added. If my hon. friend will observe what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and myself were looking at, this comparative rate statement on page 5 shows that cotton sewing thread in hanks came in under a duty of 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 10 per cent, while the new rate is 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent, or twice the old rate. I do say, however, that you cannot properly claim a reduction in the tariff on spool cotton unless you have some knowledge of the quantity which came in, how it came in and the effect this new tariff will have upon those importations.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In other words, the minister is unable to tell us whether the householders, my wife and his wife and the women of this country generally, will obtain a reduction in the duty or an increase. He cannot tell us that until he can tell us how much spool thread came in last year under item 536.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522d. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a new item, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: I intend to move an amendment to the item. I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 522d:

Customs tariff—522d. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers to be further manufactured in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the change here?

Mr. ROBB: The rates as brought down in the budget were: Free, 10 per cent, 5 per cent. Now they are to be free under all three tariffs.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a change in the British preferential rate.

Mr. ROBB: As compared with the budget resolution.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister propose to make all three tariffs free?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, when these materials are imported to be further manufactured.

Mr. STEVENS: As I understand it, the majority of that material comes in from the United States. That will mean that the United States will get an advantage over the British preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the difference between item 522d, reading:

Yarns and warps wholly of cotton, mercerized, number forty and finer, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories.

And item 522b, which reads:

Yarns and warps wholly of cotton exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles.

Mr. ROBB: These are mercerized goods.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): I would suggest, with the unanimous consent of the house, in order to expedite business, that before considering the private bills in committee we might take up the bills starting from order No. 34 to the end of the list and have them read a second time so as to provide work for the private bills committee next week.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think that would be highly desirable in the public interest.

Mr. CANNON: I beg to move:

That the house do now proceed with order No. 34 and following.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

ST. JOHN RIVER STORAGE COMPANY

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski) moved the second reading of Bill No. 17, respecting the St. John River Storage Company.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The object of this bill is to secure the approval of parliament to two enactments passed by the Quebec legislature and known as chapter 117 of the provincial statutes assented to on April 3, 1925, and chapter 100, assented to on April 1, 1927. These two enactments are contained in schedules A and B, which form part and parcel of this bill. Chapter 117 authorizes the government of New Brunswick to purchase or construct certain dams or other works in the counties of Kamouraska, Temiscouata and Rimouski in order to regulate the flow of the St. Francis and Madawaska rivers and their tributaries. Chapter 100 authorizes the government of New Brunswick to transfer to the St. John River Power Company all the right vested in the government of New Brunswick in accordance with chapter 117 of the provincial statutes. The St. Francis and Madawaska rivers fall into the St. John river, which is an international stream, and the only purpose of this bill is to eliminate any doubt that may exist as to the validity of these two acts. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has agreed to postpone any remarks he has to make on the bill until it comes before the private bills committee.

Mr. BENNETT: It was for that purpose that I desired the hon. member to make the explanation. I assume that the attorneys general of Quebec and New Brunswick are satisfied that this legislation should be enacted, because primarily it concerns New Brunswick.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I was the one who asked the government of Quebec to pass the legislation in 1925, and I know that the present attorney general of New Brunswick is in full accord with this enactment because it is for the hydro development in that province.

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): There is a point in connection with this—I am sorry I have not the documents with me—that might be considered when the bill is before whatever committee it goes to. I understand that certain expropriation powers are contained in it, and some question was raised by the railways as to whether in such a bill power should be given to expropriate railway property.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I understand this question is to be debated when the bill is before the private bills committee.

Mr. DUNNING: All right.

Mr. POULIOT: Then we shall be able to discuss the matter when the bill comes up for third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

BRITISH EMPIRE ASSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (for Mr. Edwards, Ottawa), moved the second reading of Bill No. 40, respecting the British Empire Assurance Company.

Mr. SPENCER: May we have some explanation of this?

Mr. GOODISON: The applicants in this matter are officials of the British America and Western Assurance companies. These two companies have their head offices in Toronto and are two of the oldest companies in Canada. The purpose of the bill is to incorporate a new and subsidiary insurance company. It contains all the provisions of, and is subject to, the Insurance Act. It has been approved in its entirety by the insurance department.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 48, respecting the Calgary and Fernie Railway Company.—Mr. Gershaw.

Bill No. 50, to incorporate the United Theological College, Montreal.—Mr. Cahan.

Bill No. 57, respecting the Edmonton Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company.—Mr. Kennedy.

Bill No. 58, to incorporate the London and Port Burwell Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 59, to incorporate the Federal Loan Company.—Mr. Lang.

Bill No. 60, respecting the Canadian Surety Company.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 65, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Jelliff.

IMPERIAL GUARANTEE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (for Mr. Edwards, Ottawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, respecting the Imperial Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

On the motion of Mr. Goodison to refer the said bill to the committee on banking and commerce:

Mr. CANNON: With all deference, I think these insurance bills are generally referred to the private bills committee.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. CANNON: They were last year. I remember the Sun Life Insurance bill was considered by the private bills committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It went to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BENNETT: They sometimes go to both committees, but it seems to me the banking and commerce committee would be the proper place for this bill.

[Mr. Goodison.]

Mr. CANNON: It does not make any difference.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that the Chair was advised by that old and experienced officer, Mr. Todd, who has been fifty years looking after these bills, that primarily they must go to the banking and commerce committee, and if necessary they may later be referred to the committee on private bills.

Motion agreed to, and bill referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

CANADIAN CREDIT INSTITUTE

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (for Mr. Thorson) moved the second reading of Bill No. 49, to incorporate the Canadian Credit Institute.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member would give us an explanation.

Mr. GERSHAW: In the absence of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson), I might explain that this is a bill to enable the Canadian Credit men to carry on their work in regard to standards of skill and competency, and to put them in about the same position as chartered accountants.

Mr. BENNETT: This raises a question of some importance, as doubtless the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has observed. The question of the parliament of Canada exercising this jurisdiction as distinguished from the provincial legislatures is a matter of very considerable importance. The provinces have exercised this jurisdiction in most instances, especially the western provinces, to create various organizations, that of accountants, for instance, and one other which does not occur to me at the moment; and I think the effect of this bill would be very greatly to limit, if not entirely to destroy, the usefulness of these associations. The bill should be looked into very carefully before it is passed by the house, and if the Solicitor General or the law officers of the crown have not had an opportunity of doing so, I should like them to do it before we give the bill its second reading.

Mr. CANNON: I suggest to my hon. friend that we allow the bill to go before the committee, where I can assure him that that point will be looked into carefully. When the bill is considered in committee we shall endeavour to safeguard the rights of the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer) moved the second reading of Bill No. 52, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The object of this bill is to empower the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to construct two lines in Alberta. With regard to the line mentioned in paragraph (a), this is to construct a branch of the Canadian Pacific railway from a point at or near Acme, and running thence in a northerly and northwesterly direction towards the town of Red Deer. The territory to be traversed lies between the Calgary and Edmonton, a branch of the Canadian Pacific railway, and a branch of the Canadian National. The distance between these two lines is about thirty-five miles, and from an examination of the map I find that the proposed line will fairly divide that territory without encroaching upon the territory already occupied. The construction of this line has been urged for a great many years by the settlers. The district is very closely settled, and will produce a good deal of freight.. The line will provide a very much needed service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MANITOBA AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, may we have an explanation in reference to this bill?

Mr. PARENT: Generally questions are asked on the first reading; we are now on the second reading of this bill. I have no particular objection, of course, but an explanation should have been asked for before.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that the bill seeks an extension of time; otherwise the charter would lapse.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski) moved the second reading of Bill No. 56, respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Mr. SPENCER: I was not in the house when this bill was read the first time. Will the hon. gentleman explain its purpose?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Mr. Speaker, there are three objects sought by this bill: One, to amend the present act respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada so as to bring it more into conformity with the Consolidated Insurance Act, 1917; second, to increase the capitalization from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000; third, to reduce the par value of the stock to $10. May I say that since a similar bill to this was introduced last session there have been numerous conferences, and a great deal of correspondence has been exchanged, between the officials of the company and the Department of Insurance with a view to adjusting the differences existing between the two parties. They have succeeded to such an extent that at present there are only two points at issue: one the amount of increased capitalization, and the other, the proportion of subscribed value to be paid per share of the new restricted class B shares to be issued. The whole of the correspondence exchanged between the company and the Department of Insurance, as well as further evidence sufficient to prove the case, will be submitted to the committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

PEACE RIVER AND MACKENZIE DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (for Mr. Hay) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, to incorporate the Peace River and Mackenzie District Railway Company.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway operates through a considerable territory in northern Alberta, I think something should be said with respect to this bill. An additional railway charter might add to the railway difficulties already existing there and might not be in the interests of the Canadian National Railways or the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway. I do not know whether the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has looked into this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: I have looked into the bill, but I was reserving my comments—which are similar to those my hon. friend has just made—until the bill is before the railway committee. I did not understand that we were accepting the bill by allowing it to go to the committee. Other bills have been similarly referred without our being committed to their adoption.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 68, to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this bill printed, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the clerk that it was printed this afternoon.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have not had a chance to look at it.

Mr. SPENCER: Explain.

Mr. BROWN: This is an ordinary church bill sought by a company of people who desire to secure legal sanction for carrying on the business that is incidental to every church.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it is only a question of order. Is it not a rule of this house that unless a bill has been marked "E. F." it is not proper to read it a second time? This bill was only circulated relatively a few hours ago, and my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has not his copy of it. I only mention that, not for the purpose of interposing any difficulty, but on the question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly; the objection is well taken. No bill should be read to the house a second time unless it is printed in both languages.

Mr. CANNON: In this particular case I understand that my hon. friend is not pressing his point. It is quite true that on the order paper it does not appear as if the bill were printed in both languages, but we have it on our file.

Mr. SPEAKER: In both languages?

Mr. CANNON: It is printed; it is here. In order to expedite matters, and seeing that it is printed, I think it might be sent to the committee. There would be no harm in doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not rising to interpose any difficulty.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is well taken.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: What I say is that the bill should not be called at all, not having been marked "E.F." on the order paper. Some day some important bill not so marked may be called and the same situation may arise. My point is that the clerk should not call the bill unless it is so marked.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am responsible; I called it myself. The matter stands.

Motion stands.

INTERPROVINCIAL AND JAMES BAY RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69, respecting the Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the hon. member explain the bill?

Mr. PARENT: The bill merely seeks an extension of time for the construction of a certain line. It is familiar to hon. members, having had its first reading, and the only explanation I could give would be to read the bill itself. I do not think it necessary to do so unless it is the pleasure of the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: This bill affects a part of my constituency and I believe a similar measure was before the railway committee last year.

Mr. PARENT: I have no objection to the hon. member reading the bill himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not on the file.

Mr. PARENT: It is on the file; I have the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There are at least twenty members who have not the bill on their file. There is no objection to offer for the simple reason that there is no bill before us to object to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Motion stands.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the consideration of other bills I would ask, by leave of the house, to revert to Order No. 38 for the purpose of moving the second reading of Bill No. 43, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. When this order was called I should have moved it, as I intended to do in the absence of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Morin), but my attention was withdrawn to other matters and the order escaped my notice. The hon. member who has charge of the bill is away at present, and on his behalf I may explain it. It is very simple. The purpose is to authorize the company to increase its capital, provided:

That the total capital of the said company, including the present authorized stock, shall not exceed one hundred and fifty million dollars ($150,000,000).

Another section of the bill repeals certain legislation. In order that the matter may be given proper consideration I move that it be referred immediately to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

PATENT OF WILLIAM H. MILLSPAUGH

The house in committee on Bill No. 15, respecting a certain patent application of William H. Millspaugh—Mr. Jacobs— Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: Were any changes made in the private bills committee?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I may explain that the hon. member in charge of this bill, my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), has been ill for some time and as he has been obliged to go away he has asked me to take charge of it for him. A change was made at the suggestion of the commissioner of patents, amending section 1, as originally printed, to read:

The commissioner of patents may, upon payment of the fees prescribed by section forty-three of the Patent Act within three months from the date of the passing of this act, restore the said forfeited application of William H. Millspaugh, and provided the provisions of the said act are otherwise complied with, grant a patent upon the said application, the said patent to date from the nineteenth day of November, 1925.

The commissioner's idea was to bring the bill into conformity with the act so that the rights of present applicant persons should not be greater than they would otherwise have been at the time to first application was made.

Mr. BENNETT: I have had occasion to deal with matters of this kind and I submit that it is highly improper to date a patent back three years ago, for under our system applications of other persons may have been filed with the commissioner of patents, and they will not be dealt with except in the order in which they are received. If there be any application similar to this that should be dealt with it follows that that applicant should secure his rights without reference to a party who has neglected his and forfeited his claim. In other words, the statute should read, in my judgment, when renewing an application of this character, "Subject to any rights that may have accrued to other persons in the meantime". The patent should be dated as of present and not of the previous date, because by so doing you may work great injustice to those who have filed claims for patents in the meantime. In some instances they may have received their patents and now find a patent dated back over-riding their own. That is improper, and I submit we should not lightly place the imprimatur of approval of this parliament upon an application which was made three years ago, thereby granting a patent so antedated. We should make it subject to such rights as may have accrued to other persons in the meantime with respect to the same subject matter.

Mr. PARENT: This matter was very fully discussed before the private bills committee and the views just now advanced by the leader of the opposition then prevailed. Such rights as he has mentioned should be protected and I for one would support any amendment to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not protected.

Mr. PARENT: I believe that was the idea.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is clear that they are not protected, because the bill says:

. . . . restore the said forfeited application. . .

Subject to further explanation by my hon. friend who is chairman of the committee, the bill as it now stands would by an act of parliament restore the full rights of this patentee.

Mr. RINFRET: I should like to explain that the Department of State, which now has control over patents, is not over-anxious to allow any of these bills to pass; they are imposed upon us first by a private member introducing them and then by the committee on private bills which considers them, so we are in the hands of parliament. In this case the patent was granted in 1925, but the patentee failed to pay the fee. He is now offering to pay that fee, and that is why it is proposed to restore his patent. I may say that the commissioner of patents appeared before the committee, and I understand he makes it a practice to ascertain whether, in the intervening period during which the patent was suspended, other similar applications have been received. The reason for dating the restoration of the patent back to May 19, 1925, is because the duration of a patent is eighteen years. If we grant the patent dating this year the patentee would then have had the patent for a greater number of years than the act allowed.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with what the minister has said, but it should be subject to the rights, if any, which have been established by other persons in the meantime.

Mr. RINFRET: If we reach the other bill my hon. friend will find that we have inserted a clause covering that point, but in this bill that danger would not arise.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me to say so, this bill does not restore the patent. When the bill came before the committee the objections taken by my hon. friends also arose in our minds, so the only right we granted was permission to renew the application before the commissioner, and the commissioner is at liberty either to grant or to refuse the application.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is no doubt about that, it is all right.

Mr. CANNON: Should the application be granted when the commissioner has looked into the particulars of the case, then my colleague the Secretary of State has given the reason why the patent will be dated from 1925, to expire in eighteen years. The bill itself does not grant the patent, but simply restores to the interested people the right to go before the commissioner and explain their case.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Will the Solicitor General or the Secretary of State tell us the excuse offered for the failure to pay?

Mr. PARENT: The fact of not having paid the fee in time. That was all we had in view when the committee considered the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If that is the situation I believe that under the former practice of the patent office, if it still obtains, the applicant would not be entitled to very much consideration. Mere neglect to pay is not an excuse for not paying. I can quite understand that if an applicant for a patent has not received advice, or if he has received incorrect advice; if he has been advised that he need not pay or that he has a longer time in which to pay, there has been interference, but where there has been mere neglect to pay I do not see that this parliament should concern itself very much.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did he have to pay only $20, and could he not pay that amount in three years?

Mr. CANNON: That is a mere technicality. I understand the applicant followed the provisions of the patent act, but for some reason or other did not pay the fee. The only thing we did in committee was to grant permission for him to go before the commissioner to have his case examined, and the commissioner could give whatever decision he deemed fit provided the man paid the usual fee.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps I might explain that the patentee has represented to the department that he omitted making this payment not because of his own fault but through the neglect of his attorney. I should like to emphasize the fact that we are not espousing these bills; they are thrust upon us and we are in the hands of parliament. So far as the department is concerned, we are not particularly anxious that the bills should pass.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I thought the situation was probably due to the failure of the solicitor to look after his client, and in that case I think the patentee should receive consideration by this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Presumably this application would not be renewed unless someone else had made an application in the meantime. Is that the position? That makes a very serious situation.

Mr. ADSHEAD: We cannot hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I say presumably an application must have been made by another party or this application would not have been renewed, and the Solicitor General said that was so.

Mr. CANNON: No, I did not; I did not so understand my hon. friend.

Mr. RINFRET: I am informed otherwise by the commissioner.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difficulty I have is this: Why is this patentee here unless someone is interfering with what he conceives to be his rights?

Mr. RINFRET: He has represented that this situation arose through an oversight on the part of his attorney.

Mr. BENNETT: Why has he not made a new application?

Mr. RINFRET: Because the other one has not been disposed of.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill will cost a lot of money. The patentee should have paid $20, but he has not done that. Why should we restore the application by an act of parliament unless someone is being hurt? Because otherwise he could pay $20 and make a new application instead of paying hundreds of dollars to get this bill through.

Mr. CANNON: I appreciate the point raised by my hon. friend. I can quite understand that the applicant in this case probably thought his patent would be restored as from this year, but the only thing he secured from the committee was his right to renew the application.

Mr. BENNETT: As from 1925?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And he could have made a new application?

Mr. PARENT: The only trouble with this bill is that it does not seem to include a clause which we did intend to include, providing that if anyone started to manufacture or use this patent during the time this man was in default or this company was in default, the rights of such persons would be protected.

Mr. CANNON: But if my hon. friend will allow me, that point does not arise at all, because the moment the commissioner finds that such is the fact the patent will not be granted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The legal gentlemen present may be able to keep cool during this debate but might I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to suggest to whomever is in charge of the ventilation of the chamber that the temperature is around 75 degrees and we cannot stand that very much longer. We would like a little air.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to know why this bill is here at all. Why does not the gentleman who failed to pay the fee make a new application for his patent? There must be some reason why he has not done so, and I should like to know what it is.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If I may be allowed to answer the inquiry of my fellow member, an inventor must within a specified time after he has invented any new and useful improvement, which I think is twelve months, make his application for a patent, and if that time has expired he cannot apply. He is out of court, and it is too late for anyone to apply for a patent in 1928 for an invention which he made in 1925.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend has the answer.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BRITISH STEEL PILING COMPANY, LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 16, respecting certain patent applications owned by the British Steel Piling Company, Limited —Mr. Jacobs—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Authority to issue patents notwithstanding delay in filing applications.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us have some explanation with respect to this.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The bill is similar to the one just passed, and it stands in the name of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). It was referred to committee, and after explanations had been given certain amendments were made. On page 2 of the bill, line 6, after the word "shall," the following words were inserted in the first section:

. . . . notwithstanding anything contained in the Patent Act, date from the seventeenth day of May, 1923, and the seventeenth day of May, 1924, respectively, and shall—

The second section in the bill has been struck out. In the third section an amendment has been made, omitting after the word "has" the words—

—in the period between the seventeenth day of February, 1924—

These amendments were approved by the committee and the bill was ordered to be reported to the house.

Mr. PARENT: I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said. Did he say these amendments had been before the committee?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think they were.

Mr. RINFRET: I might explain that the same reservation is made as in the previous bill. In this case the patents concerned were obtained in Great Britain by the holders but they had failed to register in Canada within the period of one year as required by the act. They are now coming to us to file their patents in Canada. We could not, however, grant the patents under the act; a special bill is required to enable them to obtain registration in Canada. The amendments that my hon. friend has mentioned are in the same class as those in the previous bill, the effect being to take the patents from the date on which application should have been made rather than this year. If any person has in the intervening period manufactured, used or sold in Canada the inventions described, then such person may continue to manufacture, use or sell such inventions in Canada. This is the customary clause, but our information in the department is that nothing of the kind has happened. Again I say that we are in the hands of the committee. The department as such does not recommend any bill of the kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But the private bills committee did make these amendments?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, the amendments which I read.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because it is asserted they did, and the chairman apparently says they did not.

Mr. CANNON: I may say to my hon. friend that we made two amendments.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The amendments which I read.

Mr. CANNON: The first as to the date of the issue of the patent, and the second for the protection of the vested rights.

Mr. BENNETT: The amendment is being made to the section in the terms mentioned by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon)?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Exactly.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the house rose at six o'clock, we were considering item 522d.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the adding of this item in any way change the existing conditions? I understand it does not.

Mr. ROBB: It is just adding the word "mercerized".

Mr. BENNETT: Provided that the manufacturers manufacture it in their own factories.

Mr. KENNEDY: Are the rates under this item the same as the rates under the original 522d?

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. ROBB: No, they are free in all three columns. We have added the word "mercerised".

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the effect of this?

Mr. KENNEDY: Does a different class of manufacturer use the goods or what is the reason for the difference in the duty? Is it a question of protection to one manufacturer as opposed to another? My point is that manufacturers use both. Why then should one manufacturer be able to import 40's and finer, mercerized, free, and the other have to pay a duty if he imports?

Mr. ROBB: These mercerized yarns are not widely made in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522e. Yarns wholly of cotton, exceeding number twenty, and not exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles; cotton sewing thread yarn and crochet, knitting, darning and embroidery yarn, in hanks, composed of three strands or more, not bleached, coloured nor mercerized; imported by manufacturers who manufacture cotton sewing thread and crochet, knitting, darning and embroidery cottons only for use exclusively in their own factories in the manufacture of those materials: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for tariff item 522e:

522e. Yarns wholly of cotton, exceeding number twenty, and not exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles; cotton sewing thread yarn and crochet, knitting, darning and embroidery yarn, in hanks, composed of two strands or more; all yarns specified in this item when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories in the manufacturing or spooling of cotton sewing thread and crochet, knitting, darning and embroidery cottons: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: This item is a grouping of a number of items?

Mr. ROBB: It is a grouping of items 520, 525 and 536.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister will pardon me if I am not quite clear, but I will read the first part of item 522e:

Yarns wholly of cotton, exceeding number twenty, and not exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles.

Item number 522a reads:

Yarns . . . . wholly of cotton, exceeding number twenty, but not exceeding number forty, not more advanced than singles.

Why repeat this in the composite item when it is provided for in item 522a? The reason

I draw attention to that is this: In the old tariff it was pointed out by the minister that certain articles were entered under one item when perhaps they should have been under another; that this caused considerable confusion and that the change was supposed to clear it up. Now we have a repetition of two items with a difference in the rate of duty. If I am wrong I wish the minister would point out where I am wrong or make an explanation.

Mr. ROBB: This is a manufacturers' item. The other was a consumers' item.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the consumers' item bears a duty of 12½ per cent, 15 per cent and 22½ per cent, and the manufacturers' item bears a duty of 7½ per cent, 15 per cent and 20 per cent. Is that right?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there no method of overcoming the difficulty that has been experienced in the customs department with repect to articles that are imported for use of manufacturers only in their own mills and that are very often sold out of stock and used elsewhere? As the minister knows, there has been a good deal of discussion as to how the public can be safeguarded in connection with matters of that kind where you specify, as I said yesterday, the place at which the article is to be used and the conditions under which the usage takes place.

Mr. ROBB: That is effected by the different changes. The customs officials have approved this and they believe they will be able to work it out.

Mr. FRASER: I notice the original draft reads, " three strands or more," and the present one reads, "Two strands or more." What is the object of the amendment?

Mr. ROBB: This is to broaden out the administration of the act.

Mr. FRASER: I am asking why the minister is decreasing the number of strands.

Mr. ROBB: This allows them to get two strands or more. It was felt that to make it three strands was a little strict. The manufacturers have asked for this change.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the effect of it?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine the effect of it is to make it a little easier for the manufacturers to get the raw product they require. It was found that some of them were using two-ply and doubling them.

Mr. KENNEDY: I understand we are discussing item 522e. The conversation across the floor has been in such a low tone that I could not hear it. I notice cotton yarns were dutiable at 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. This is about the sixth or seventh reference to item 522, and it looks as though we are getting a cut of about 7½ per cent in the duty, but I wonder if the minister can give us any idea of the amount of imports that will be affected, that came in under the two rates last year. How much of a reduction is it—one per cent or a fraction of one per cent? What will be the possible loss of revenue?

Mr. ROBB: There is a portion under several of the other items, and I cannot tell; but under item 535 the importations amounted to $636,628.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—522f. Yarns and warps wholly of cotton imported by manufacturers of tapes, braids, webbings and woven labels for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: Provided that yarns and warps which are entitled to free entry or to lower rates than are mentioned in this item shall not be entered at the rate specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is this in order? We have before us the votes and proceedings of February 16, and in my copy there is no item 522f. Can we go on with it under those conditions?

Mr. ROBB: These are goods that are procurable in Canada and that are used by manufacturers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The point is that the committee has had no notice of this.

Mr. ROBB: I do not object to having it go on the record and letting it stand so that my hon. friends can examine it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand the minister to say that the item will stand?

Mr. ROBB: I have no objection, if the committee insists upon it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps the minister could explain something in the meantime. The item states:

Provided that yarns and warps which are entitled to free entry or to lower rates than are mentioned in this item shall not be entered at the rates specified in this item.

Does that mean that yarns and warps now entering free, if they come under the terms of this item, shall not be subject to this duty?

Mr. ROBB: If they are entitled to free entry under another item, they will still be free.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I see, and it is only in case of a higher duty under some other item that this change takes place.

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: There arises here a difficulty which I trust the Minister of National Revenue will consider. I have received communications of late with respect to the administration of the Customs Act and with respect to changes made by orders in council of which the public is not aware. A man buys goods, pays his duty, sells them, and then an order in council is passed by which the classification is in some sense altered, and he is called upon to pay additional duties sometimes exceeding the profit he made with respect to the transaction. Then the old difficulty arises; he gets his friends in parliament or at Ottawa to work for him, while somebody else who is not so fortunate is left out in the cold. That actually happened in connection with a rather important transaction at one of the ports recently. The point made by the hon. member for Argenteuil is very important here. If these amendments are to be made, from what date are they to apply? These are absolutely new items, as the minister was good enough to say. Will the importers who brought in their goods under the old items as they stood prior to the date of to-day or to-morrow, or whatever day the minister fixes, be called upon to pay under the new or the old item, and will they be entitled to a refund if they paid at a higher rate than is mentioned here? As it stands, of course, they all go back to the date of the budget speech, but these new items were not brought down until yesterday.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that it is governed by this provision:

> This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolution imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: How, then, can the minister justify bringing in these alterations without notice, proposing to pass new items and have them take effect as if they had been brought in on the 16th day of February when he made his budget speech? How can he justify that without giving notice to anybody?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. ROBB: That has always been the procedure, and under all governments, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: In the case of slight amendments, but not new items.

Mr. ROBB: This is a reduction. As to the point raised by my hon. friend a moment ago regarding increased duties, I do not see how that could possibly arise because, as he knows, the government cannot increase the duty by order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: I was speaking of classification, determining in what class a given article shall come. I will give my hon. friend a concrete case if he so desires. Only to-day while I was in the chamber a telephone message was left at the office saying that the Journals were not as full as they have been heretofore with respect to these items. I do not know what was meant by that because I was not there, but evidently it was these items that were in mind. My hon. friend should give notice so that the public will know exactly where they stand. As far as I personally am concerned, it is not a matter of importance, and as far as my friend from South Wellington is concerned it is not a matter of importance to him, but, after all, the public have rights, and I think we had better consider them according to the rules of parliament.

Mr. ROBB: In the administration of the act the board of customs from time to time do reclassify goods.

Mr. BENNETT: And make the classification retroactive; that is the trouble.

Mr. ROBB: This is not a new procedure at all. I observe, for instance, that in 1920 there were 25 changes made after the resolutions were brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them merely typographical changes.

Mr. ROBB: I have not gone through them, but that has been the procedure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister inform the committee what the practice is to be? The act comes into force and the new rates of duty are applied from the 17th of February. So far as the public are concerned, they have no notice of any changes or of any new items. New items can only be considered in the ordinary way, and notice should be given of them in the Votes and Proceedings. When will these new items take effect? Do they date back to the 17th of February or become effective from the day they are introduced?

Mr. ROBB: Under the procedure that has always been followed in the past, from the day the budget is brought down the customs officers take all entries under the new items, subject to any amendments.

Mr. BENNETT: And subject, of course, to rebate in case the duty is lowered, or a further charge if it is increased.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. ROBB: I do not object to its standing if hon. gentlemen insist upon it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is a decrease. I do not ask that it stand.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, not bleached, mercerized nor coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 22½ per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Any changes here?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change. This is the resolution as brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any change from the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The rates proposed under this classification are 12½, 20 and 22½ per cent. The former rates were, under item 521, 12½, 22½ and 25 per cent; item 524, 15, 17½ and 20 per cent; item 524b, 15, 17½ and 20 per cent. The imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, were, under item 521, $617,537 British preference; $6,557 treaty rates; $1,199,223 general tariff; item 524, $60,486 British preference; none under treaty rates; $501,894 general tariff; item 524b, $454 British preference; $446,987 general tariff. Hon. gentlemen will observe that there is considerable spread in the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: And an increase in the general rate.

Mr. ROBB: There is an increase in the general rate on two items, but the importations were largely under item 521.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would like to point out to the minister something that might help us in studying these matters. I have here the volume, Trade of Canada, and in a general way one can tell where a certain item comes in this volume but if it contained a column alongside the description of the various classes giving the number of the tariff item concerned, you could tell exactly under which item the imports were entering. As it is at present, the descriptions contained in this volume do not correspond with the descriptions in the tariff schedules, and no item numbers are given. If the number of the item were included opposite the description of the goods, we could get from this volume a proper check of the imports.

Mr. ROBB: That is a very important point, and I believe under the new classification they might be able to follow it more closely. I shall direct it to the attention of the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said a few minutes ago that there was a decrease from 15 to 12½ per cent on these items under the general tariff. The amount of importations was about $6,500. There is an increase there—

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend proceeds further I will give him the correct figures. The amounts under item 521?

Mr. FRASER: No, items 524 and 524b.

Mr. ROBB: Item 524, $60,486, and item 524b, $4,054, under the British preference.

Mr. FRASER: About $65,000.

Mr. ROBB: About that.

Mr. FRASER: And under the general tariff, which is increased 2½ per cent, you have importations of $950,000. That certainly is decreasing the tariff!

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has not observed that the policy is to divert as much as possible of that business to the United Kingdom. This will be sufficient to divert it to the British industries.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend is not serious in that.

Mr. ROBB: What more does my hon. friend want?

Mr. BENNETT: Great Britain does not produce raw cotton; the United States does. Great Britain is separated from Canada by 3,000 miles of ocean; the United States adjoins us. Yet he wants the committee to believe that a change of but 2½ per cent is going to divert the traffic to Great Britain from the United States, whence at the present moment we are getting $950,000 worth, as against only $65,000 worth from Great Britain.

Mr. FRASER: All the afternoon I have heard the argument about changing the British preference 2½ per cent to increase imports from Great Britain. Now, my experience in mercantile business leads me to believe that it will do nothing of the kind. What controls the buying of goods more than anything else is quick turnover and proximity of market.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister admitted that this afternoon.

Mr. FRASER: I say this change will not divert the business to Great Britain because the American market is close to us. The object of all general mercantile business today is to increase its turnover. Naturally the closer your market the quicker you get your goods and the greater your turnover. When you come to the practical effect of this change, I say in my opinion it will increase business with the United States instead of with Great Britain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think there is the least doubt in the world that the statement of the last speaker can be supported by the figures given by the minister, as well as by a general consideration of the items. Let me put it to him in this way, and I am going to be even more severe than the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser): Not only will the trade not be diverted to England, but I think the minister's explanation is most insincere; I do not think he is under any delusion in the matter at all. If he is really interested in diverting the trade to British manufacturers, let him put this on the free list with Britain. Then we will believe the minister. But when he says there is a reduction of duty because of the 2½ per cent increase in the British preference, well, he is asking the committee to believe a whole lot more than we are capable of. Will the minister consider putting it on the free list?

Mr. ROBB: No. It is thought that this is a fair reclassification. It is also believed that the 2½ per cent additional advantage is worth while to the British manufacturers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister, I suppose, realizes that the whole effect of the change is an increase in customs duty? That is the result that we will have.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Absolutely.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On our large importations from the United States the rate is increased. On a comparatively negligible part of our imports, $65,000 worth, the rate is lowered 2½ per cent, but on the aggregate under this item more will be collected by the department. The rate of duty is higher. That is the result of these tariff changes on this particular item.

Mr. ROBB: No. Had my hon. friend figured it out he would not have made that statement. I have the figures here of the estimated changes in taxation based on the imports of last year. Under tariff item 521 there will be a decrease of $30,146; under tariff item 524, an increase of $11,035; under tariff item 524b, an increase of $11,163—or a net decrease of $7,948.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on the facts stated.

Mr. KENNEDY: One of the previous items, I think 522b, was given free entry under the British preference. I remember last night asking the minister about an increase in the intermediate and general tariffs on one of the other items, and he explained that the increase was due to the fact that they wanted to increase the rate proportionately under the intermediate and general tariff and still maintain the item free under the British preference. Under this item 521, cotton fabrics unbleached, according to the Trade of Canada, page 170, we imported from the United Kingdom 7,000,000 yards, and from the United States 13,000,000 yards. In this item there is a reduction of 2½ per cent in the general tariff applying to the United States; there is no reduction in the preferential tariff applying to the United Kingdom. There is a change in principle in that arrangement. Would the minister explain why there is no reduction in the British preference in this instance? I understood last night that he was anxious to maintain the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: The British preference has already a pretty low rate of 12½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Good Lord! For a preferential rate 12½ per cent is not a low, it is a high rate. The minister, I think, has not yet got the point of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). The minister cannot really be serious. The United Kingdom exported to us 7,000,000 yards, according to the last trade figures; the United States, 13,000,000 yards. But under this item the preference remains the same, that is, the United Kingdom traders get no particular advantage; but there is a decrease to the American manufacturer of 2½ per cent under the intermediate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523a. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, bleached or mercerized, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the duty on that item?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not leave it alone?

Mr. ROBB: The word "mercerized" is added.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523b. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: In the old tariff corresponding with 523a there are included tailors' hollands of linen and towelling of linen or cotton in the web, coloured or not. What becomes of that?

Mr. ROBB: Linen goes into the linen item.

Mr. STEVENS: And "cotton in the web, coloured or not"?

Mr. ROBB: In the next item.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not see it.

Mr. ROBB: We shall come to it; this is a reclassification.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to see where the different items are placed in the reclassification.

Mr. BENNETT: In some of the items that were formerly included in 523 there has been a slight increase and some decrease?

Mr. ROBB: The present rates are 22½, 30 and 32½ and they are reduced to 20, 25 and 27½. The imports for the year ended March 31, 1927, of printed cotton fabrics, amounted to $1,896,147. There is no separate classification for piece dyed fabrics. The reduction in taxation is estimated at $69,273.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister must realize how misleading these figures are; they have no relevancy at all. We have a new item in this tariff. We have fabrics wholly of cotton, n.o.p. That corresponds to the old item, which read "cotton fabrics n.o.p." As a result of this proposed tariff it will be impossible to institute any comparison at all inasmuch as the goods that will be affected by this item are entirely different from those affected by the old item. You may be providing for items that were not provided for in the old tariff and the real result is a substantial increase. Let me put it this way: You have cotton fabrics of all kinds and you specify the rates of duty at which, say, 90 out of 100 parcels shall be dealt with. The remaining 10 not having been specifically mentioned are dealt with under the n.o.p. provisions. Before this tariff was introduced you dealt with, say, fifty or sixty of the hundred articles specifically, while the n.o.p. clause applied to the other forty. I contend that you cannot institute any comparison between those forty and the ten to which I have referred. As I say, this item really amounts to a substantial increase in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right when he says that there is a general reclassification, but we must consider these items all together. To-day, taking the total changes in the schedules, there will be an aggregate decrease of $1,119,560.

Mr. BENNETT: But you are comparing different things.

Mr. ROBB: I agree with my hon. friend that you cannot pick out individual items, but I have given the total decrease in taxation.

Mr. STEVENS: That is excellent publicity, but it is not very convincing. I have before me two items. Item 523b of the new tariff gives the rates as 20, 25 and 27½; under item 522 of the old tariff they are 15, 22½ and 25.

Mr. ROBB: The former rates were 22½, 30 and 32½; they are now 20, 25 and 27½.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister might be still more convincing if he would give us the total importations under item 638, buckram, and the possible difference in revenue. He might also give us this information in regard to 523. These are the two items that make up the present one.

Mr. ROBB: I have given printed cotton fabrics, the total importations of which are 1,896,147, the reduction in taxation being estimated at $69,273.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Those are general figures. Can the minister give us the importations and the reduction in revenue under that one item, 638, buckram, which is now free of duty?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I have it handy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If it is free of duty how do you get revenue out of it at all? Can the minister give us 523, cotton fabrics, dyed?

Mr. ROBB: That is the one I have been quoting. I gave the importations as $1,896,147.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What would be the estimated loss in revenue as a result of the decrease under the joint item now called 523b.

Mr. ROBB: Buckram is one of the items subject to the 99 per cent drawback.

Mr. BENNETT: That material is used only for bookbinding.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and hats also.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there or is there not an increase in the item?

Mr. ROBB: No, a decrease; I have repeated that several times.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the decrease in connection with buckram?

Mr. ROBB: There are two items that come under this one. One shows a decrease of $69,273, and the other a decrease of $184,695.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Which is which? I cannot understand that at all. The minister says there are two items, but certainly there cannot be reductions in both of them. How can that be when one is free?

Mr. ROBB: The buckram about which my hon. friend is speaking goes into another classification; it will be entitled to a drawback of 99 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: There seems to be a mistake in this somewhere. If you look at item 523b and go right across the page you come to buckram; under item 523c, if you go right across the page you come to cotton fabrics, and there is a bracket which includes buckram and cotton fabrics, which is very confusing. If the minister will look at that he will possibly see the difficulty. Under the old schedules buckram and cotton fabrics did not seem to belong to the one item at all. That seems to be where we are all confused.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I think if the hon. member for Peace River will look at item 1061 he will accentuate that point. The minister said buckram was being given a drawback, although heretofore it has been free. Item 1061 includes:

Woven fabrics for book binding.

On this item there is a drawback of 99 per cent, so there is an increase of at least one per cent, whatever else may be said of it.

Mr. ROBB: There is a drawback.

Mr. BENNETT: A drawback of 99 per cent.

Mr. FRASER: How do you get a drawback on an article coming in free?

Mr. ROBB: The old item was:

Buckram, adapted for the manufacture of hat and bonnet shapes.

Under that classification it was free, but under the new item it is placed as a drawback item.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not quite right. The drawback is granted where this is brought in as bookbinding material only, unless you have another item.

Mr. ROBB: Also for hats and bonnets.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. STEVENS: What item is that?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Item 1012.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is buckram a cotton product?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I think it is in that classification.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not cotton at all; as a matter of fact it is linen.

Mr. ROBB: In answer to my hon. friend for Vanceuver Centre, (Mr. Stevens), when we come to it the new item will read:

When used in the manufacture of linings for hats and caps or in the manufacture of hat shapes and bonnet shapes from buckram.

Mr. STEVENS: There is an amendment to be made?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But what is the duty which will be imposed in order that the drawback way be made?

Mr. ROBB: If it comes in as an n.o.p. article it may come as coloured linings or as coloured cottons.

Mr. BENNETT: And if so, there is a drawback of 99 per cent? Then an item which was free before you tinkered with the tariff is now subject to a drawback of 99 per cent; in other words the duty is increased by one per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the advantage of making a free article dutiable and then handing back 99 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: For administrative purposes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister will tell us how that is going to simplify matters I shall be tickled to death. It is now free; there is no administrative work in connection with it, but we are going to place a duty on it which will necessitate custom houses, inspections and appraisals, and then we are giving a drawback of 99 per cent which will require a staff to look after it. And the minister says it will simplify the work.

Mr. ROBB: The customs department asked for this change originally. I will be frank with my hon. friends; this is one of the items which, as we have been taught by experience, have been abused.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Will you not have the same difficulty whether it comes in free or whether it is taxed?

Mr. ROBB: No, it will be watched more closely.

Mr. BENNETT: One does not wish to worry the minister unnecessarily, but I put this to him fairly: He is going to increase the work of the people in the customs department, which means more employees and a greater cost to the people. The article must go through the customs; duty must be paid, and 99 per cent of the money must be returned. The unfortunate taxpayer is out his money; he has to pay the duty and then wait until he gets a cheque back for the drawback to which he is entitled. Then, in the item as it formerly stood, buckram came in free and simply had to be passed through the customs. Now it will be charged a duty of only one per cent, and considerable machinery will be required to do the additional work. That is the sum total of this change, and we are told that someone wants the change for administrative purposes. I never saw a chance to make another job, where the public service is affected, in which some person did not want to make the necessary change. I am sorry to say that is so.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit that that condition prevails more or less.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend knows that; he has had more experience than I have had. I do not see why we should make this change, which will be an expense to the country, and which will only mean the collection of a duty of one per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think this item could be very well compared to that item which referred to shoe laces; there may be abuses of this item also. Buckram may be used for purposes for which it should not be admitted free. Now, hat manufacturers and bookbinders will receive a refund on the buckram they use while everyone else will have to pay a duty.

Mr. KENNEDY: Then this is an increase in the duty.

Mr BOIVIN: No. These other people have been getting it under false pretences.

Mr. KENNEDY: How could they be getting it under false pretences when it is free? How could there be any evasion of duty there? You are now specifying that only certain people will receive a drawback, and you reduce the principle of favoritism as between the manufacturers of different articles. That must be the purpose.

Mr. BOIVIN: You will find a great difference if you ask for a drawback; you will deal with an expert who looks after these things. When you are simply clearing an article through customs you often deal with men who have not a great deal of experience, who consider the invoice more than the quality of the goods.

Mr. KENNEDY: Where could the abuse arise in connection with a free article coming into the country for commercial purposes?

Mr. FRASER: My understanding of this matter is that buckram for the manufacture of hats and for use in bookbinding comes in free, but we must remember that buckram is also used in the manufacture of clothing. The effect of this tariff change, as I see it, is to put a duty on buckram used for the purpose of stiffening for clothing, so that people who buy clothes wil have to pay the duty, while those buying hats will not have to pay it.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has just proved the case; if he is right there has been an abuse. Under the old item it was not intended that the buckram should be used for anything except what was stated. Manufacturers of clothing have a certain protection, and they are entitled to pay for that particular protection. My hon. friends are wrong in saying that this comes in for bookbinding. Bookbinding is under another item.

Mr. FRASER: If the material is for the manufacture of a suit of clothes it is probably dutiable.

Mr. ROBB: The manufacturer of clothes never had the privilege which my hon. friend says he has been using or abusing.

Mr. FRASER: I did not say anything about it. I say that under the old act it is absolutely free.

Mr. ROBB: No. Let me read the old tariff and my hon. friend can place his own interpretation upon it. It is:

Buckram, adapted for the manufacture of hat and bonnet shapes.

The manufacturers may have brought it in and used it for other purposes but it never was intended that they should.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523d. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton, imported by manufacturers of corsetry, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in that item, is there?

Mr. ROBB: The word "corsetry" is changed to "corsets".

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—523e. Woven fabrics wholly of cotton with cut pile, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Has there not been much discussion with respect to this? I should judge so from a trade paper that was sent me the other day. The minister might explain how many factories in Canada are affected by it.

Mr. ROBB: These are cotton plushes. My hon. friend was referring to mohair plush, which we will come to later on. The rates were formerly 17½, 32½ and 35. The proposed rates are 17½, 25 and 30. The imports for the year ending 31st March, 1927 were $812,988. The estimated reduction in revenue is $16,519.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently the imports come mostly from the United States.

Mr. ROBB: I have no memorandum showing where they come from.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is another illustration of how nicely balanced this reduction is. Here is another case where there is no reduction in the British preference but there is a reduction of 7½ per cent in the intermediate tariff and 5 in the general tariff. Now the imports of these velveteens from the United Kingdom amount to $747,398, and from the United States to which the general tariff applies the imports total $106,391. Here is another case where you are refraining from any reduction of the British preference but you are making a reduction in the general tariff, although the bulk of the imports come in under the preference. It is another case where the schedules being revised are so nicely balanced as to make an appearance of reduction and at the same time protect the manufacturers to the limit.

Mr. ROBB: We started out with the cotton schedule with the idea that 30 per cent would be the higher rate, and we have followed that, I think, with one exception. But the 17½ per cent British preference rate is subject to a 10 per cent discount.

Mr. KENNEDY: When coming in through Canadian ports.

Mr. ROBB: I think 90 per cent of the business comes in through Canadian ports.

Mr. KENNEDY: That may be all very well, but in this case the bulk of the imports come under the preference and there is no reduction of duty.

Mr. FRASER: Is there any production of this class of goods in Canada?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: Quite a considerable amount, I think.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in Schedule A:

Customs tariff—523f. Woven fabric of cotton, not coloured, when imported by manufacturers of typewriter ribbon for use exclusively in the manufacture of such ribbon in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: No notice was given of this.

Mr. ROBB: This came in after the budget was brought down. It is represented to us that had there been no change this item would have gone into another classification—

Mr. BENNETT: —N.o.p.

Mr. ROBB: —which would have made it practically prohibitive for the manufacture of typewriter ribbons in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: They are the same rates as before?

Mr. ROBB: The same rates as before.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister ought to give a reduction here because there has been a very strong propaganda carried on by the banks and other institutions for farmers to keep books. It has been represented that they should make themselves familiar with the typewriter so as to make the collection of the income tax much easier. It is worth while giving a reduction in the duty on typewriter ribbons so that we can encourage the farmers along that line.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is springing a Scotch joke upon us.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—524. Seamless cotton duck in circular form, of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in the manufacture of hose pipe: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in this item, is there?

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Are the materials used in grain sacks imported under this item?

Mr. ROBB: The item specifies what it is for. There is no change in duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—525. Sheets, pillow cases, diapers, tray cloths, quilts, counterpanes, towels, bath mats, wash cloths, table-cloths, napkins, dresser scarves, curtains, consisting of woven fabrics wholly of cotton, not further manufactured than hemmed or hem-stitched, not coloured, not embroidered nor otherwise ornamented: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This item was formerly under 525 and 537. The rates under 525 were, 20 per cent, 27½ per cent, 30 per cent. The rates under 537 were, 25 per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. The proposed new rates are 15, 25 and 27½ per cent. The total imports for the year ending 31st March, 1927, of materials that will come under the new item, are not traceable. Available statistics show the importations of bed quilts to be $552,850, and of cotton towels $824,150. In the case of another portion of the item "manufactures of cotton "n.o.p." the importations amount to $1,765,611. A portion of this only is affected. The reduction in taxation will be $216,752.

Mr. EVANS: May I ask if this material is finished or unfinished, and does it need any processing after it is imported?

Mr. ROBB: It is finished material.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—526. Household blankets wholly of cotton, not to include horse blankets, automobile or steamer rugs, nor similar articles: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The former rates were 22½ per cent, 30 per cent and 35 per cent. The imports for the year ended 31st March, 1927, were $252,154 and the estimated reduction in taxation is $19,061.

Mr. EVANS: This is an item which directly concerns every family in the land. Under another item we have made a kind of cotton duck entirely free. I do not see why the government should discriminate between one class and another all the way through this schedule. They say that the cotton industry languishes because there is not work. It languishes simply because the buying power of our working people throughout the country is being everlastingly curtailed by these measures Not only is the amount of duty added to the value of the goods, but at the same time about two dollars goes into the pockets of the manufacturer for every dollar that goes into the Dominion treasury. As I say, this is a commodity that is used by every family in the land and yet we maintain almost the highest rate of duty on it. It is a commodity that everyone that is working and producing for a living has to buy. This is a most unfair and discriminatory principle from beginning to end and I wish to make that protest on this item.

Mr. KENNEDY: Could the minister tell us why horse bankets are excluded? I have a vivid picture in my mind of something I saw about two months ago, of a farmer, when it was fifty degrees below zero, leaving for a twenty-mile trip with six horses and two hundred bushels of wheat. Anybody who has lived in western Canada and knows anything about pioneering, realizes how important a horse blanket is. It seems to me that some consideration might be given to the people who want to use horse blankets and who have to do the difficult pioneering work in which this commodity is used to such a large extent. If we are going to do anything about settling up the new districts, there will always be a big demand for horse blankets, and most of those who are dealing in horse blankets are doing pretty well.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows that horse blankets are not generally made of cotton. They are largely made of jute and they come under another item.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why are they excluded from this item?

Mr. ROBB: Because this is household blankets.

Mr. KENNEDY: But cotton horse blankets would come under this item, or otherwise you would not have this specific reference excluding them. That is my point. There is just about as good a case in this item for the consumer in regard to horse blankets as there is in regard to the other blankets.

Mr. EVANS: All waterproof horse blankets are made of cotton duck and they should be included in this item. We are dealing with cotton. Horse blankets of jute are made for cold, dry weather.

Mr. ROBB: For administrative purposes this is a household blanket and there is a corresponding item in the woollen schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: But the item specifically excludes horse blankets.

Mr. KENNEDY: Cotton horse blankets still come in at the high rate. The minister may not realize this; but when a homesteader or somebody away out on the frontier is doing a lot of camping out or travelling, he very often uses a fine horse blanket as a sleeping blanket, and I think the minister is really making a discrimination there.

Mr. ROBB: But he uses jute.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I do not know what they use in the Peace River country, but in the district I come from the cotton blanket is preferable to the jute blanket. The jute blanket is not close enough; it allows the freezing wind to penetrate. The cotton blanket is the one we need and the one we use. We also use jute blankets but they are not so serviceable in cold weather. The Minister of Agriculture, I think, is quite conversant with those conditions.

Mr. STEVENS: We would overcome all this if the minister would indicate under what items horse blankets now come, cotton, woollen or jute.

Mr. ROBB: We will come to that when we reach the jute items.

Mr. STEVENS: Under what item will the cotton horse blankets come?

Mr. ROBB: Under item 532.

Mr. EVANS: In the preceding item we have placed a class of cotton duck for hose pipe on the free list. That is not a household article at all, so the minister's explanation is no excuse for not dealing with cotton duck for different kinds of blankets that require to be made of that material. We should insert an item at this point so that at least one class of consumers will not be so much discriminated against.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to consider that. Let the item stand.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—527. Boot, shoe, shirt and stay laces of cotton: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent. The importations are not large, amounting to $20,080, and the estimated reduction in taxation is $1,615.

Item agreed to.

Item 528 agreed to.

Customs tariff—529. Embroideries, lace, braids, bobinet, n.o.p., fringes and tassels; manufactures of lace; handkerchiefs and pillow shams; curtains, n.o.p.; all articles specified in this item to be wholly of cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 529:

Customs tariff—529. Embroideries, lace, braids, nets, nettings, bobinet, n.o.p.; fringes and tassels; manufactures of lace, nets, nettings and embroideries; handkerchiefs and pillow shams; curtains, n.o.p.; all articles specified in this item to be wholly of cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

There is a change in the rates. The old rates were 25, 32½ and 35 per cent, and the proposed rates are 20, 27½ and 30 per cent. The imports under the former item were $3,899,425. There is no separate classification of cotton products thereunder except cotton handkerchiefs, amounting to $1,392,295.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the estimated reduction in taxation?

Mr. ROBB: $97,248.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more the minister gives figures, but there is no specification in the old tariff similar in terms to this, and when he speaks of the decrease in taxation he is applying these figures to an aggregate importation which comprises, necessarily, goods that come within items other than this.

Mr. ROBB: The officers have worked that out.

Mr. BENNETT: If they have, well and good.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—529a. Lace and embroideries wholly of cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of underwear in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the difference between the two sections of item 529?

Mr. ROBB: This is a manufacturers' item only, covering lace and embroideries imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories.

Mr. BENNETT: You will have to change the word "underwear," then.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I move to substitute the word "clothing" for the word "underwear."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this the same rate as before?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The only change is changing the word "underwear" to "clothing"?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—530. Socks and stockings wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, but not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: The words "n.o.p." have been struck out.

Mr. KENNEDY: How do vegetable fibres come in the cotton schedules?

Mr. ROBB: This item is to cover anything other than wool or silk.

Mr. STEVENS: Or artificial silk.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: What were the importations under this item?

Mr. ROBB: The imports were $1,004,727. The estimated reduction in taxation is $50,236.

Mr. BENNETT: What would the stockings be made of?

Mr. ROBB: They are made of cotton and other fibres. They might be made out of wood pulp, I suppose, but it is mostly cotton.

Mr. EVANS: This item covers socks and stockings. This again is a workingman's article. The wage earner uses this very class of socks and stockings. It is a mistaken policy to try to build up industry in this country by bleeding the workingman. It is a fallacy in economics to tax the workingman for the sake of providing dividends for big cotton companies such as were mentioned this afternoon, which are already in a prosperous condition. If Canada is ever going to be anything, it will depend on keeping down the cost of living, and I submit to the government that it would be much better to lower the cost of living than to have our workingmen striking for higher wages all the time. This article is a necessity, one of the very necessities of life, and why not begin here? Why tax the workingman for the benefit of the millionaire?—for that is what we are doing by this item. The working classes have to use this kind of socks and stockings, and there is no reason why we should put a 27½ per cent duty on this article.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will go this far with me, that we are at least moving in the right direction. We have made a reduction of 5 per cent all round, and we are losing in revenue over $50,000, estimated on last year's business.

Mr. EVANS: It is only getting back to about the pre-war rates.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the home production in this article?

Mr. ROBB: I have not those figures.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—531. Knitted fabric wholly of cotton, in the web, imported by manufacturers of rubber boots and shoes for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the old rate?

Mr. ROBB: This is a manufacturers' item. The imports were $138,428. It is estimated this will mean an increase of revenue of $13,846 on the basis of last year's business.

Mr. KENNEDY: I thought we were going the other way with the manufacturers most of the evening. Can the minister give us the particular reason why the general and intermediate tariffs should be raised in this manufacturers' item? The old rates were 10, 12½ and 15 per cent, and the new rates are 10, 20 and 25 per cent. This will no doubt lead to dearer rubber boots and shoes, which most of our people wear in the fall and spring. What was the particular reason for the increase?

Mr. ROBB: The real reason was that it was following our policy of widening the British preference. There is no increase in the British preferential rate, but the other two rates are increased. My hon. friend will notice that there is more of a spread between the treaty rate and the general.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Would the minister give the imports that came in under these three tariff rates?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the separate classification, but the total importation was only $138,428.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the domestic manufacture, and what mills are affected?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—532. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly of cotton, n.o.p.; fabrics wholly of cotton, coated or impregnated, n.o.p: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This particular item is a reclassification, and comprises what were formerly seven items. The old rates were: 25, 30, 35: free, free, free; 10, 12½, 15; 22½, 32½, 35; 20, 27½, 30; 20, 27½, 30; 20, 30, 35. The imports for consumption for the year ending 31st March, last were—British preference, $344,194; treaty rates, $245,942; general, $940,872. It is not possible to trace separately the cotton portions of the imports. The estimated reduction in taxation is $57,-999.

Mr. EVANS: Overalls are a class of clothing which the wage earner, the homesteader, in fact all farmers, wear. Why keep this up to 25 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: The British preference is 22½.

Mr. EVANS: The rates are 22½, 25 and 30. Here is an article again that should be one of the lowest in the whole schedule. Every workingman needs to buy overalls. Rainproof clothing, hats, and so on, all come under this item. I think this should be reconsidered.

Mr. ROBB: This has been pretty carefully looked into. These are the items on which the textile people claim they are going to suffer a considerable loss.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): It looks like an increase. Does the minister figure an increase or a decrease?

Mr. ROBB: I said the estimated reduction in taxation is $57,999.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister's figures are not very convincing because under the British preference the new item is 22½. We had seven old items in the British preference, three of them are 20, one is 10, one is 22½, one is 25—you have about the same distribution all the way through. It may be that according to the imports there is that reduction of taxation, but I do not think if you took the various items and struck an average you would find the old duties as high.

Mr. ROBB: The large importations are under 575a, which is 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister indicate just what brand of science leads to the grouping of such items as apparently are brought together here? For instance, hammocks, tennis nets, sportsmen's fishing nets, oiled silk, oiled cloth, oiled tape and other textiles, India rubber coats, corsets of all kinds, linen and cotton clothing, window shade cloth, window shades cut to size, hemmed and mounted on rollers, and so on. Here are groups of items entirely dissimilar; they are now brought together under one item and the rates of duty fixed. Under all these other items there was a variety of rates ranging from free up to 35 per cent. The minister must realise the great difficulty we have of appreciating the effect of this tariff. To my mind, in the short time at our disposal it is an utterly impossible task. Some reason must have been furnished to the minister by his officers that will justify this grouping. He must acknowledge it is not sufficient to say that this is a reclassification. We know that without his saying so. There must be some reason for it. I think the committee is entitled to a very full statement.

Mr. ROBB: The officers who administer the Customs Act in co-operation with members of the tariff board and the tariff commissioners in the Finance Department, worked out these rates, and I admit they are largely on their recommendation. I can give my hon. friend an item—he has just referred to it—window shade cloth. It is very hard to define, and they have represented to us that this reclassification will make the Customs Act easier to administer. On the basis of the importations of last year there will be a reduction in taxation, as I have already stated.

Mr. STEVENS: There may be a reduction, I cannot dispute the minister's figures. But I am not in a position to say whether these rates are fair or unfair. The fact remains that hammocks, lawn tennis nets, and so on, under the old tariff were 20, 27½ and 30; here the British preference is 22½—that is an increase—and the other rates are 25 and 30. On oiled silk and oiled cloth, oiled tape and other textiles, India rubber coats, and so on the old rate was 20 under the British preference and 22½ under the intermediate: the new are 27½ and 30 respectively. On corsets of all kinds, and so on, the rates were 22½, 32 and 35: there is a reduction there, although the British preference stands exactly the same. As far as I can see that is the only reduction in the British preference. On window shade cloth, window shades, cut to size, hemmed and mounted on rollers, the British preference is 20 per cent under the old tariff, it is 22½ per cent under this tariff. Then fillets of cotton and rubber, not exceeding 7 inches wide, and so on, free, free, free, under the old tariff; under the new, 22½, 25 and 30.

Mr. ROBB: That will be a very small item.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite likely; but I do not like to see the minister get away with the broad general statement that he is making generous concessions to the consumers of this country. I repeat, with the exception of one item out of these seven, there is, I think, in every case an increase in the British preference, which is not extending its scope as the minister so frequently remarks.

Mr. ROBB: It is true there may be some changes, but the big item is 537. That is down.

Mr. STEVENS: 537 in the old?

Mr. ROBB: 575a.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the same exactly under the British preferential.

Mr. ROBB: 537 is the large item.

Mr. STEVENS: It is exactly the same.

Mr. DUNNING: 537 is down 2½ per cent under the British preferential.

Mr. STEVENS: There are several items put into one and I have indicated that in every instance except one there is an increase. In one instance it is the same under the British preferential. The minister said that the largest item was 575a in which there was a reduction, but it is the same under the British preferential.

Mr. ROBB: The largest item is 537, but 575a is also considerable. While in 575a there is no change under the British preferential there is a reduction in the treaty rates from 32½ to 25, and also a reduction in the general. In 537 there is a reduction of 2½ per cent under the British preferential and a reduction of 5 per cent in the treaty rate as well as in the general. These are the two large items. The others are small and are mostly sporting goods.

Mr. STEVENS: What were the imports under 537?

Mr. ROBB: They amounted to $1,765,611.

Mr. STEVENS: How much of that would be under the British preferential?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the figures.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): This item, which includes clothing, carries about the most uniformly high rate in the whole cotton schedule, the British preferential being 22½ per cent. There have been reductions in the others, some being free, some 7½ and others 12½ and 15. But there is no other as high as 22½ per cent. Following out his line of reasoning, one would think that the minister would increase the preference here.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) asked for the total involved. it is $1,765,611.

Mr. STEVENS: Under 537?

Mr. ROBB: $360,452.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the importations under 532?

Mr. ROBB: The old or the new tariff?

Mr. HEAPS: The old.

Mr. ROBB: That is on record; I have already given it. What relation has that to this item?

Mr. HEAPS: Are we not considering 532?

Mr. ROBB: I have just given the information.

Mr. KENNEDY: I notice there is an increase under the preference in oiled textiles. All through the revision, except in one or two instances, there is a sharp increase in the duties in oiled goods. I am anxious to have some information in this regard and perhaps it would be better to take the matter up on Monday.

Mr. ROBB: I will keep it in mind.

Mr. KENNEDY: There appears to be a general increase.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Why does the minister keep the rates so uniformly high on clothing, the preference being the highest of any in the list?

Mr. ROBB: I have several times stated that the reduction estimated is $57,999.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): My point is that these particular rates are abnormally high in contrast with the other schedules. One would not think that there would be these high rates on articles of clothing. Even if there were a loss of revenue there might have been a greater reduction in the rate than there is.

Mr. KENNEDY: Would this explain the situation? At page 176 of the Trade of Canada I find that the total imports of cotton products from the United Kingdom have been fairly steady from 1922 to 1926, amounting to over $300,000 annually. From the United States, which is the other large country of exports to Canada, our importations have dwindled from 1922 on, having fallen from $1,366,257 to a little over $500,000. It seems that where the imports are steady and competition keeps up, the rate is maintained under the British preference and lowered under the general, where the country from which we have been importing largely has been losing in business. There is a general tendency to balance things in that way.

Mr. STEVENS: Item 732 under the old schedule is of considerable interest. It concerns coated and sized cloth, when imported by manufacturers for use only in their own factories in manufacturing sensitized blue or black print cloth. The old rate was 10, 12½ and 15 per cent. The new rates will be 22½, 25 and 30.

Mr. ROBB: Imports, 10,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What factories are making that in Canada now? What is the production in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has presented a figure given him by his assistant.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will admit that the rates are low enough.

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably this item is used by the wholesale manufacturers of clothing; it is a class of clothing very commonly made and considerably used, and there must be a large production of it. It is rather interesting to know what is produced in Canada if there is such a small amount imported.

Mr. ROBB: I will read the item, and then my hon. friend will understand. That kind of clothing would not be very good with the weather twenty below zero:

Coated and sized cloth when imported by manufacturers for use only in their own factories in manufacturing sensitized blue or black print cloth.

That is for drafting purposes, I think,—the making of plans. I would not be surprised but that the importations represented by the $10,000 were used in making some of the plans for the new buildings we are putting up.

Mr. EVANS: Before we pass from this particular item I am going to make another appeal to the government to separate from it item 575a under the old schedule, covering cotton clothing. As I said before, this is a necessity to the working man, because khaki and blue duck all come under this heading. I do not see why we should place certain other kinds of cotton duck on the free list while the very kind used by the working man is under such a high duty. I would ask the minister to take item 575a out of that group and reduce it to say 5 per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: That is the large item of importation; under that item we imported goods to the value of $1,531,008. The reduction is from 32½ per cent to 25 per cent under the treaty rate and from 35 per cent to 30 per cent under the general rate.

Mr. EVANS: And an increase of 2½ per cent under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: No, my hon. friend cannot get away with that; there is no increase.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): According to the figures given by the hon. member for Peace River, most of the goods imported come under the British preference, and in that there is no reduction. This seems to go to show that the tariff revision is made on a protective basis, or there would have been a reduction in the British preference, under which there is the largest importation.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. gentleman misquoted the figures; the large importation comes under the general tariff, and that is where we made the reduction.

Mr. KENNEDY: The point is that the importation from Great Britain is steady, while the importation from the United States has been decreasing for the last five years, although it is still large.

Mr. ROBB: This will give them a better chance to come in, then; is that the idea?

Mr. FRASER: In the last two items why do you increase the tariff on hammocks and window shades? Under the British preference the increase is from 20 per cent to 22½ per cent, while the rate under the intermediate and general tariff is decreased. Is not that in direct contradiction to the statement made this afternoon that you were increasing the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. FRASER: That statement has been made repeatedly.

Mr. ROBB: Our policy is to increase the British preference on the large items, but this is a small and practically obsolete item.

Mr. FRASER: What are the imports of window shades?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information, but I am told it is very small.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—532a. Shirts, not knitted, collars and cuffs, all of cotton: 20 per cent; 30 per cent; 32½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The former rates were 20 and 22½ per cent British preferential, 32½ per cent and 35 per cent intermediate and 35 per cent and 37½ per cent general. The estimated total reduction in taxation is $46,298.

Mr. KENNEDY: Would any small percentage of silk in an otherwise cotton shirt place it outside this class?

Mr. ROBB: I think it would.

Mr. KENNEDY: So many cotton shirts contain just a small percentage of silk.

Mr. ROBB: They would not come in this class.

Mr. SPENCER: How does that effect a reduction in taxation? A reduction in the tariff does not necessarily mean a loss of revenue.

Mr. ROBB: I gave my hon. friends an example yesterday. The result is shown in the reduction of the income tax; we took in more money.

Mr. KENNEDY: When you consider the revision of the tariff, is it not largely done on the basis that there will be no increase of imports?

Mr. FRASER: Why retain the duty on shirts at 32½ per cent? That is the highest rate in the whole schedule. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. ROBB: The explanation is that the shirt men think they should have that protection.

Mr. FRASER: It is protection for the shirt men? That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if the minister would not be good enough to satisfy our Conservative friends by lowering that item? He would thus satisfy the members in this corner of the house, and as the Liberal party stands for a lower tariff he would satisfy everybody.

Mr. ROBB: I would like to satisfy everyone, but I have not had much success in doing so.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—533. Sails for boats and ships: 15 per cent; 22½ per cent; 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—534. Certain candlewick.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 70, to incorporate 1,000 Islands International Bridge Corporation.—Mr. Hay.

Bill No. 71, to incorporate The St. Lawrence River Bridge Company.—Mr. Smith (Stormont).

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

REPORT OF MR. ALEXANDER SMITH, K.C., TABLED

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I beg to lay on the table the report of Alexander Smith, K.C., on the charges of R. A. McClymont.

LIVE STOCK SHIPMENTS ON RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) if it is the intention of the government to take any action concerning the application made by the railways before the Board of Railway Commissioners to deprive shippers of the right to have attendants on the train to look after the stock in transit.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The whole matter has been before the Board of Railway Commissioners for some months now, and I believe that it now stands for hearing and determination. The government has no knowledge of the matter outside of the ordinary routine of an application before the board.

CABLE MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to cable despatches from London, dated March 15, there has been a virtual merger of the Eastern and Associated Cable companies with the Marconi Company. The holding company for the merger is described in the announcement as subject to the consent of the British, Dominion and Indian governments. The merger, it says, is apparently connected with the deliberations of an Imperial conference set up by Premier Baldwin after the new beam wireless service to Australia had taken forty-five per cent of the Pacific cable business in six months. Can the government give us any information with regard to this matter or inform us how the Dominion government is connected with it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is a very large one. My impression is that it has not arisen as is intimated in the despatch to which my hon. friend has referred, out of any discussion at the Imperial conference, but rather out of financial difficulties in connection with the Pacific cable. Perhaps my hon. friend would be willing to wait until we take up the estimates of the Post Office department in order to get a full explanation of the matter. It comes under the direction of the Postmaster General. Negotiations have been proceeding, and the government has been kept informed. We have been represented on the board in England that has had to do with the matter, and at the appropriate moment all the papers will be laid on the table of the house. Without refreshing my memory, I could not answer a specific question at the moment.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REPORT OF ADVISORY BOARD COMMITTEE AND CORRESPONDENCE WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether, in view of what was said in his closing observations on the address in reply to the speech from the throne regarding the desirability of giving as little publicity as possible to the report of the advisory board in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway until certain matters had been dealt with, the time has not arrived when we might reasonably hope to have those papers laid before parliament, especially in view of the fact that a fairly well authenticated report prevails in Washington and also in Ottawa that a communication was sent by this government to Washington, to which a reply had been received. In view of that I suggest that perhaps the representatives of the people in parliament should have the opportunity to see these papers, and if the Prime Minister thinks the public interest would not be prejudiced, he might make some arrangement by which the members of this house would have some idea as to just what the situation is.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend will recall, I mentioned in my remarks on the address that a communication had been sent by the government to Washington with reference to the St. Lawrence waterway project. That communication was not replied to until the end of last week. The reply, as a matter of fact, came into my hands only on Friday or Saturday last, and has not yet been communicated to my colleagues in the government. I would say, however, having read the reply, that I am very much of the view that it would scarcely be advisable to make public immediately either the communication which was sent to Washington or the reply which has been received.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

It may seem that the government is seeking in some way not to inform the house fully. As to whether we are exercising wise judgment in that matter must be left, I think, until later when the communications themselves are brought down. A transaction of the character in contemplation, if it is ever to come to anything, cannot be surrounded with too many safeguards. While the government has exchanged communications wholly of a preliminary character, which in no particular bind the country in any way, but which have been exchanged for the purpose of clearing the ground, so to speak, and in order that parliament may be fully informed of any possible basis of negotiations of a final character, should such ever be reached, it is inadvisable I think, and might possibly prejudice the outcome, too soon to present to parliament any of the documents in the matter. The government must take responsibility for withholding for the time being correspondence which it deems inadvisable to have given to the public. We must be judged later on as to whether or not we have acted wisely. I have no doubt that when hon. members see the correspondence they will feel that the government was justified in not at present making public the two communications that have been exchanged.

Mr. BENNETT: I wholly appreciate the position taken by the Prime Minister, and he will observe that I asked whether or not in his opinion the time had arrived when we might receive the correspondence, because I realize that in the conduct of government those who direct it must exercise their best judgment and discretion as to whether the interests of the country would be best served by publicity or the retention of the documents in the hands of the government until the time is opportune. I only desired to ask if in the opinion of the Prime Minister that time had not yet arrived.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

ORDER IN COUNCIL FIXING RATE FROM ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I desire to ask a question, and to make it intelligible I shall read a single sentence of a resolution passed unanimously by the British Columbia legislature on the 29th of February last. Divested of whereases, it reads:

Be it resolved that this legislative assembly of the province of British Columbia, now in session, believes it would be in the interest of the Dominion of Canada to grant and pay a subsidy to the railroad for the carrying of coal from each province, on a graduated scale to be regulated by the railroad commission, as per the distance of each province from the markets of Ontario and Quebec.

That was passed unanimously. Saturday's press contained an announcement that the Minister of the Interior had issued an order in council to the effect that a rate of $6.75 per ton for carrying coal from Alberta to Ontario has been established, with the understanding that any difference between that and a fair profit rate to the railways would be paid by the Dominion government. In view of that statement I would ask him a question, or more properly two questions; or as that is not allowed, I will divide my question into two sections. The first section is: in the order in council has the minister made provision for extending the arrangement to the coal fields of British Columbia, with of course a pro rata increase according to the extra distance; secondly, as a number of the most important coal fields of British Columbia are located on Vancouver island, where there are no ready means of shipping in trainloads, but very conveniently situated wharves, will the minister undertake to see that the same arrangement is made as regards ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, so that we can ship our coal at a proportionately low rate and possibly—I say possibly—compete in the central provinces, markets on the same basis and the like terms, and be accorded the same measure of assistance as that claimed by Alberta?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is fairly long and I think the Minister of the Interior ought to be given until to-morrow to submit an answer.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the easiest way to answer the question will be to file the order in council.

MOVEMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA COAL

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior a question based on an article that appeared in Saturady's Citizen with respect to an order in council authorizing a special rate for the transportation of Alberta coal to Ontario. My question is this: Presuming that article to be correct, will the province of Nova Scotia be accorded like treatment for the transportation of coal to the province of Quebec during the winter months—not the summer months.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior: The movement of Nova Scotia coal is now under consideration, chiefly by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), as it is a railway matter.

Mr. HANSON: How about New Brunswick coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should have said coal from the maritime provinces.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he has yet received a report from the Exchequer Court regarding the claims of Home Bank depositors?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No.

TRANS-ATLANTIC FLIGHTS

CO-OPERATION WITH THE IMPERIAL AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Department of National Defence has sent an aeroplane to Maine to help in the search for Captain Hinchcliffe. In view of the unsuccessful but heroic attempts at aerial flights westward from Europe, may I ask if the government has considered the advisability of co-operating in such attempts? I know the fliers may be regarded as foolhardy, but I think Canada would benefit by a successful flight from Great Britain, and I should like to see governmental co-operation with the British authorities.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, where co-operation is asked for or suggested it is readily given, and we have repeatedly co-operated where there may have been failure or prospective failure to complete these trans-atlantic flights. We have made no special arrangements with the Imperial authorities, nor has our co-operation been sought.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. GEORGE H. PETTIT (Welland) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 14 to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company (as amended).

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before you declare the motion carried, I crave the indulgence of the house to place on record the opposition of the government of the province of Ontario to this bill, and also the opposition of the Niagara Falls Park Commission. The commission controls the 2,000 acres of park system from one end of the river to the other. It also controls the river bank and the land under the river up to the international boundary.

To me, Mr. Speaker, it is strange that the government should allow a bill of this kind to pass in face of the opposition of the provincial authorities. Of course, I shall be told that this is a private bill, but when it first appeared on the order paper it contained no declaration that the proposed bridge was a work for the general advantage of Canada, and the government having been instrumental in amending the bill in this respect, must take responsibility for it as a government measure. I say again, it is very strange to me that the government should fly in the face of the provincial government, which controls all the highways up to the bridges on the Niagara river, and, in effect, tell the government of Ontario that a charter is to be granted to this private company to erect a bridge over the river and on the park commission's land.

The opposition of the province of Ontario is not a factious opposition, but is based on sound grounds. The main reason for opposing the charter is that the bridge is not needed, and, further, that it will mar the scenic beauties of both the gorge and the falls. At the present time within a distance of six miles there are four bridges, one for railway traffic and the other three for vehicular and pedestrian traffic. In addition, there is a vehicular and pedestrian bridge at Buffalo, as well as a second railway bridge.

The engineer of the Niagara Falls Park Commission appeared before the private bills committee and gave evidence that the present bridges are capable of carrying 100 per cent more traffic; but the promoters did not call an engineer in support of their project.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are the present bridges privately owned?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, they were built under federal charters. Those charters provide that the tolls to be charged are to come before the governor in council for approval. A new bridge was built last year, and the charter authorizing its construction contained a similar provision. I have inquired both of the Clerk of the Privy Council and of the Public Works department and have ascertained that nothing has been passed approving of the tolls that are being charged. Last year one these bridges under the purview of the federal parliament raised its tolls 100 per cent, without any redress whatever; and the only thing that can be done is to take drastic measures against this tendency. The people appealed to the parks commission who, by threatening those in charge with the possibility of some day having action taken to force their hands, got them to restore the tolls to the former figure. They were told that some day they might be wanting something and that they would not get it unless they put the tolls back where they were, and in that way they were forced to restore them.

Mr. EULER: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the governor in council in this particular instance, when the tolls were raised, forced them to make the reduction?

Mr. CHAPLIN: They were not observing the charter. There was in the charter one of those weak kneed clauses providing that the governor in council should approve of their tolls. They never got them approved. They had been charging tolls for twenty years without getting them approved and they were therefore collecting these tolls illegally. But that is aside from the question. The province of Ontario does not want to be afflicted with another such institution. When it is time to have a bridge erected there the province may want to build it. Or this parliament might want to undertake the work. I can say that there is no better investment which anyone can make, and I do not want to see this matter left in private hands. I have seen too much of that sort of thing along the Niagara river. That is one of the reasons for our objection.

As regards concessions on the river, as I said a moment ago, the parks commission, acting for the province of Ontario, have the whole river in their charge. They even have the power contracts in their charge. To show the value of the parks commission in the last forty years, I may say that the province of Ontario once gave the rights to a power concern for all the power in the Niagara river for $25,000 a year. Fortunately, the commission had a reasonable opportunity to cancel that agreement so that to-day the province of Ontario is receiving a rental from the commission of over $500,000 a year for a concession which originally was given away at $25,000. The province of Ontario has spent $7,000,000 on that front. I may give another illustration of what has been done in this regard. When I first went on the board fifteen years ago we were renting the Table Rock house concession to private individuals. At that time we were getting $4,000 a year and we raised it to $12,000 in a year or two. Those who were enjoying the concession complained and we replied: "Very well; you will not have it at all for we will run it ourselves." The result was that the first year we made a profit to the province of $60,000, and last year on the same concession, with the fare reduced 50 per cent, we made a net profit of $125,000.

I object to this bridge on the public ground that, first of all, this parliament has no right to override the province. I am speaking now merely of its moral right. Parliament has no right to go over the heads of the commission; it has no right to give a private concession for money-making purposes over the property of the parks commission. We object further on this ground: The improvements which have already made over the present bridges will accommodate 100 per cent more traffic than before without any congestion. As a matter of fact, we know that the congestion last year was less than it was the year before and the year previous to that, and with heavier traffic. All that may be said to the contrary is that in a few instances, on a few days, there has been congestion. No one will dispute that. But we were met with that same objection when the bill was defeated in this parliament last year, and at that time we made a very close analysis of the situation. We put our engineers on the job and we took actual photographs of the scene every day last summer. We have those photographs arranged in order, some ten a day, covering the whole season, and we know just what days were crowded and on what days the traffic was light. There appeared before the committee a gentleman who gave us a couple of photographs—perhaps there were half a dozen of them—and he had the nerve to inform the committee that these photographs were evidences of what happens every day at the bridge. That, of course, is idle talk; it is sheer nonsense. All I can say is that the people who came forward looking for the charter would say anything on earth in order to secure it. They even produced before the committee a sheaf of telegrams, together with a petition bearing 12,000 names. It will be intereseting to the house to know that these names obtained through the services of paid canvassers—ten cents a name. Oh yes; they did a good job. They even went to the schools and got the pupils from six to ten to sign the petition. No wonder they secured the number of names they did. That charge I made in the committee and it was not denied; nor can it be denied. I had a gentleman in the committee who gave evidence to the effect that his own boy had signed it. The school children ran home to their parents telling them, "We are going to have a new bridge; we have all signed the petition." Now, we in this house appreciate the value of a petition: we also appreciate the value of telegrams sent in batches. The statement was made in the committee that, 4,000 persons from my constituency had signed the petition. I can say truthfully that not one person ever took the trouble to write to me even a note nor to send me a telegram, nor did anyone ever speak to me about the matter. They believed that I knew better than any of them did, what was needed there.

I am close to the Niagara bridge; my county takes in one of these bridges I have been discussing; and the next county is that of Welland. The parks commission, I may explain, comprises seven members, one from Lincoln, which is my county, three from Welland, one from Brant and two from Toronto, one of the commissioners from Toronto being the Minister of Highways in the provincial government. He is the seventh member. For the county in which Niagara Falls is situated, two of the members of the commission come from that city, and one comes from the same county, the same city, as the promoter of the bill, the member for the county of Welland. The commission, therefore, is unanimous; it was unanimous last year. They have presented a resolution which I want to put on record.

Mr. EULER: Is this bridge above or below the one which is closest to the falls?

Mr. CHAPLIN: This bridge, according to the plan submitted, is several hundred feet north of the bridge which is closest to the falls, the steel arch bridge.

Mr. EULER: Further down the river.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes. Now I will not say that this bridge may not be necessary in time, but what we claim is that it is not necessary now, and from what we can see it will not be necessary for a number of years. But when it does become necessary to build a bridge, surely the parties to determine where it should be located are either the parks commission or the province of Ontario. I make that statement for this reason: the bridge should co-ordinate with the main highways, which are under the control of the province of Ontario. That is only reasonable. At present the government of Ontario are opposed to it because they feel the bridge is not needed.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me a question? Would he state to the house what authority he has for saying that the government of Ontario are opposed to the bill?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, I read to the committee a letter from the Prime Minister, and I believe that should be conclusive evidence that the government are opposed to it.

Mr. CANNON: He did not say he was opposed to it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Most decidedly he did.

Mr. CANNON: Oh, no.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I can also produce correspondence from the Minister of Highways in which he says he is strenuously opposed to it, and in which he asks me to oppose the bill.

Mr. CANNON: Where is it?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Unfortunately I did not bring either of these letters with me, but before I sit down I will have them, even if I have to detain the house a little longer.

My contention is that the position of this bridge should be determined by the province of Ontario, and while the Solicitor General has been good enough to make some changes in the bill, in my opinion it does not give the province nearly enough authority in the matter. The Solicitor General does not seem to realize that we are just as much interested in the bridge as anyone, and I doubt very much whether any other government on this continent would dare pass legislation of this kind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend if there is an objection to the location as well as to the bridge itself?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Absolutely.

Mr. EULER: Does the park extend down that far? Does it extend below the bridge which is already there?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, that the park referred to by the hon. gentleman is 150 acres in extent. The park commission own 2,000 acres along the river; they own the whole bank of the river from one end to the other; they control for the province every foot of land from the source of the river to its mouth, and that is why we resent being told by this parliament where we shall have a bridge placed, when it shall be placed and that it shall be constructed by a private enterprise, which will collect money from the people of this country without paying a rental or anything of that kind. It is true that the companies owning the old bridges pay no rentals, but if the government were doing it all over again a thing of that kind would never be permitted; the government would collect money from them, as they should have had a right to do, for the granting of such a privilege. Why should you give anyone the right to build a bridge for which traffic has already been created, in order to permit people to make a big profit out of that sort of proposition? From everything along the river the park commission are collecting a revenue for the province of Ontario, and we are giving service at half the former cost. Last year, after carrying on all the work we had to do, we paid to the province $200,000, and in the last three years we have paid in $1,000,000.

Now I say to the government that after these circumstances were brought to their notice they had no business to grant a charter to a private company for this bridge. It is true that the charter contains a clause under which in time this bridge will come back to the province or to the Dominion. That is one of the things I tried to get the Solicitor General to tighten up in order to make it mean something, because as it is now all its teeth have been taken out. It might mean that when the Dominion took it over we would have to pay $400 a share or more for their stock. I suggested to the Solicitor General that a change be made to make sure that the bridge would be taken over at a reasonable price, as any stock would be retired, at say $100 or $105 or $110 per share, but in that regard he has not followed my advice.

As I have already said, the province has spent $7,000,000 on that frontier for the benefit of the people of the entire world, and we believe there are enough bridges in existence to take care of the present requirements. We object to another bridge being placed there first of all because it is not needed, and we brought evidence to that effect before the committee. Just at this point I wish to place on record a resolution which was passed by the park commission on February 28, of this year, to show their attitude in this connection:

Whereas the legislature of the province of Ontario by an act dated March 30, 1885, appointed commissioners for the purpose of selecting such lands in the vicinity of the falls of Niagara within Ontario as were in their opinion proper to be set apart for the purpose of restoring scenic features to their natural condition and for the purpose of preserving the same from further deterioration.

And whereas the commissioners reported on September 18, and December 7, 1885, recommending that an area of about 154 acres of land be acquired by the province of Ontario along the Niagara river in the vicinity of the horseshoe or Canadian falls of Niagara for a public park with its management under provincial control.

And whereas the legislature passed an act on April 23, 1887, providing the means to establish, maintain, improve and develop the lands selected as and for a public park.

And whereas the park lands so selected, have, during forty years of effort and at an expenditure by the commissioners of over $7,000,000 to improve and beautify the same, been extended to include property bordering on the Niagara river from lake Erie to lake Ontario, all of which are declared by the park act to be public works of Ontario.

And whereas certain applications to the parliament of Canada are pending for acts to incorporate companies with power to construct, maintain, and operate bridges across the Niagara river within a distance of 800 feet from the upper steel arch bridge.

And whereas the upper steel arch bridge has been and is being greatly improved and extended as to its terminal facilities increasing its capacity on the American side four times and on the Canadian side 100 per cent.

And whereas the lower steel arch bridge has greatly extended its terminal facilities.

And whereas the increased means of access and exit appear to be ample not only for present requirements but for some distance into the future.

Now therefore be it resolved:

1. That the Niagara Parks Commission is opposed to the construction of a new bridge in the vicinity of the upper steel arch bridge, because,

(1) it will mar the scenic beauty of the falls and park, and (2) it is not necessary to accommodate public travel.

2. That the location of a new bridge, when required, should be midway between the two present traffic bridges below the falls, where it would not have so injurious an effect upon the scenic beauty of the falls and park, and also, in order that the traffic from the bridge terminals, may not, by their proximity create congestion.

Mr. PETTIT: When was that resolution passed?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was passed on February 28 of this year.

Mr. PETTIT: How many members were present at that meeting?

Mr. CHAPLIN: There was a quorum of the board; four of the seven members were present.

Mr. PETTIT: Was the member of the commission for Welland city present?

Mr. CHAPLIN: He was in Bermuda, but he left a letter to the effect that he was opposed to the bridge. Now I want to refer to a letter written by the Prime Minister of Ontario. I have here a letter written by him to the secretary of our commission under date of January 16, 1928. I might say that at this time we were fighting the bridge company for a reduction of tolls, and that will explain why the Prime Minister of the province made a reference to the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend why, if the governor in council have authority to regulate the tolls, the matter was not referred to them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: First of all it was not the park commissioners' business; we had nothing to do with the bridge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But I am speaking of the existing provision.

Mr. CHAPLIN: My answer to the hon. gentleman is that we were out of our province in considering the matter at all. At that time I did not know that these clauses were in the charter, or that we had no control over these bridges. I only found that out when we got down here. When we got that information we took the means at hand of correcting the situation. Here is the Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Jackson, the engineer and general manager of the park.

I have before me yours of the 14th.

I am just as strongly opposed to the building of the additional bridge across the Niagara, as proposed, as I was last year, and for the same reasons.

The minister says the premier did not say so.

I think that the commission should use all its efforts to defeat any such project.

There is only one reason that would induce me to alter this view, that is, the necessity for relieving the public from being held up in the matter of fares by those who already hold franchises.

At the time the Prime Minister wrote that letter, the matter was in confusion. We had not succeeded in getting those tolls put back, but by the time we got here we had that matter rectified, without any reference here. It was only, as I explained before, when I came down here and had a chance to view the charters, that I found the clauses in question. The Solicitor General was good enough to tell me of them, because he had the charters in front of him. He told us how well he would look after these bridge companies in the future. Well, his predecessors had had the charters in their possession for twenty years, or more, and had not done so. I had confidence that we were better able to look after those matters than were such a dead bunch.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is taking a great deal of credit to himself. He knew the proper court to come to for redress and yet he did not come.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When the minister makes that statement he ought to remember that we had nothing to do with these bridges.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think you had to do with them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We had nothing to do with them at all. If we had it is obvious we should have taken action long ago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You might easily have found out where to get redress.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The people who were making complaint so strongly were the ones who should have come here to get redress. The people of Niagara Falls were the people that might reasonably be looked to to obtain redress. We butted in when it became our business to do so, when a new charter was being sought.

Now I will read a letter from the provincial Minister of Highways, which reads as follows:

Toronto, March 3, 1928.

Dear Mr. CHAPLIN:

I am sorry to learn by the press and from your letter of the 29th ult., that you are not successful in stopping the progress of the bill dealing with the charter of the Memorial Bridge Company, Niagara Falls.

I have discussed the matter with the Prime Minister and he has suggested that the government ask Mr. Henderson to state our position and to strengthen your position in every way you think advisable.

I do not know what stronger evidence the government want of the attitude of the provincial government. The Solicitor General said a while ago that the provincial government had not declared themselves very positively. I do not know that you could get any stronger or more positive declaration than that.

Mr. CANNON: What is the date of the letter?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is dated March 3, 1928.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Henderson appeared before the committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Henderson appeared before the committee and made representations from the province strenuously opposing the bridge.

Mr. CANNON: He did not.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Well if the Solicitor General—

Mr. CANNON: I will withdraw that remark. I will deal with it when I speak.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The statement of the Solicitor General in regard to that is just about as correct as his statement about the attitude of the Prime Minister of Ontario and the Minister of Highways whose letters I have read.

I now wish to place on record a communication from the State Reservation Commission, a body on the other side of the river. This commission was appointed many years ago in order to do the same work in the state of New York that we were doing in Ontario. Here is a letter dated March 12, 1928, from the president of the State Reservation Commission at Niagara.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the state of New York.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The state of New York. The letter is as follows:

Supplementing my letter to you of the 27th of March—

That is when this bill was up last year—1927—

—of which I enclose a copy, I beg to say that the attitude of the State Reservation Commission at Niagara as expressed in that letter, is unchanged; that all of the considerations in it outlined militating against the construction of a new bridge apply with even greater force than then expressed.

Permit me to summarize for your consideration the underlying reasons moving our commission to oppose similar legislation when presented to the New York state legislature at Albany:

1st. The construction of a new structure such as proposed inevitably would be disastrous to the scenic grandeur of the great cataract, and the impressive gorge below. In this conviction we strongly are sustained by the well considered and strongly expressed opinion of the Hon. Frederick Law Olmstead, admittedly one of the most distinguished landscape artists now living, who was consulted by us upon this subject.

2nd. Such a structure seriously would interfere with the plans now under consideration by us for the expenditure of large sums of money, especially devoted by the people of our state to the further enhancement of the scenic grandeur and beauty of the cataract.

3rd. An important factor of our expenditure will be the elimination of conditions tending to impair and seriously to detract from the majesty of the cataract.

4th. There is not any need for an additional bridge. Whatever delays and congestion in traffic have arisen, has been infrequent, sporadic and entirely due to the rigorous inspection by the officials of the customs and immigration departments of both the Canadian government and our own.

As you are aware, there has been provided at the respective bridge heads additional lanes of traffic, which now are available for such inspection, more indeed, than those departments reasonably can be expected to utilize for many years in the future.

You are entirely at liberty to use this letter in any manner you see fit. Particularly shall I be pleased if you will present it to the Canadian parliament, or to any of its committees which may have this matter under consideration.

This is from the commission on the other side of the river.

Mr. PETTIT: May I point out that the New York side of the bridge does not touch the New York state reservation and will not touch any part of it. It is private property that will be affected, and not the New York state reservation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The last bridge that the hon. member for Welland supported in this house had its head on the other side of the river on a piece of property belonging to the state reservation.

Mr. PETTIT: The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot be interrupted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I find that my time is nearly up. I speak as one of the park commissioners for a period of more than fifteen years, during which time the commissioners have always applied themselves closely to the work of conserving the beauties of the great natural wonder of America. This work has been carried on for forty years by commissioners without any remuneration whatever, simply to preserve the scenic beauties of the Niagara river for the people of this country and for visitors who may come, and we, knowing the conditions there better than any other person or any other body of persons, declare that, in our judgment, this parliament has no moral right to give any charter against the opinion of the park commissioners and against the wishes and opinions of the premier of Ontario.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that last year a request was made for this bridge by the same company and that the bill was killed by the committee. I should like to know why this year the committee are reporting favourably on this bridge.

Mr. PETTIT: Last year the location asked for this bridge was in between the upper steel arch bridge and the falls and it interfered with the scenic beauty at that time. I opposed the location of that bridge at that point last year. The bridge, the incorporation of which is now sought, is from eight hundred to one thousand feet further away from the falls than the present cantilever bridge.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The facts of the case are these.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The records will bear me out. Last year a number of gentlemen came from Niagara Falls and proposed the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river in front of the present bridge and coming out right at the gates of our park. That bill was thrown out of the committee, but they were very persistent and they came back the same year with another one. This is a sort of movable bridge on wheels. If it is beaten in one place they can move it along a little further. The second proposition that came before the house and was again defeated was to place a bridge within two hundred feet of the upper steel arch bridge. This was a most foolish proposition and the hon. gentleman does not say that he did not support it. It was about as foolish as this one, but he supported it just the same. The present proposal is for a bridge from three to eight hundred feet away and our contention is this. Assuming a bridge is required, we say this is not the place to put it. Our engineers say that if a bridge is needed there is a good location halfway between the two bridges where there is a street that, without any great expense, can be connected with a highway. But what they want is to get as close as possible to the other bridge so as to ensure that it will pay as well as the other one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the location the hon. member suggests?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Between the two bridges there is a space of about two miles, and we suggest that if ever the time comes to construct another bridge, the logical place for it to go is halfway between those two bridges.

Mr. STEVENS: A very large number of amendments have been made to this bill and we do not have them before us. I happen, through the courtesy of the clerk, to have had an opportunity of looking at the amended bill, but certainly hon. members cannot follow the bill in its present form.

Mr. CANNON: It has been reprinted.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no reprint of it. I have in hand a table copy.

Mr. CANNON: The bill must have been distributed because I hold in my hand a copy reprinted as amended and reported by the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am asking is that we should have a reprint of this bill. The Solicitor General says there is a reprint.

Mr. CANNON: It is on the members' files. The hon. member for Lincoln, in the course of his remarks, was kind enough to mention the name of the Solicitor General once or twice in connection with certain amendments made to this bill, so I intend briefly to explain the amendments which were brought into the committee and the reason why I supported them. I may preface my remarks by saying that this is not in any way a government bill. It is a private bill introduced by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Pettit), and so far the division of opinion which we have seen in the committee seems to be more of a family than of a partisan nature. But in view of the great importance of this legislation, as a member of the government entrusted with the supervision, may I say, of legislation in order to see that the rights of different parties and even of different governments are safeguarded, I gave very carefully consideration to the matter and I will now offer a few words of explanation to the committee regarding the bill itself.

The hon. member for Lincoln has stated that this bill is sponsored and supported by the government as such in direct opposition to the views held by the government of Ontario in connection with the matter. Let us understand the real situation, in order that the impression may not be spread abroad that such a conflict between the two governments does exist in connection with this bill.

The province of Ontario was represented before the committee when the bill was under consideration, not by my hon. friend from Lincoln, but by Mr. Henderson, K.C., of the city of Ottawa, who held a brief for the Attorney General of Cntario, and so stated before the committee. Mr. Henderson said that he wanted the legislation to be drafted in such a fashion that what he considered the rights of the province of Ontario would be safeguarded. I submitted to Mr. Henderson an amendment to clause 19, an amendment which was afterwards adopted and inserted in the bill, with the understanding that Mr. Henderson was to consider it, and should he have any further representations to make on behalf of his client the Attorney General for Ontario, I would be glad to consider those representations with a view to further amending the bill, if necessary, when it came before the committee of the whole house. Two weeks have elapsed since then. The representative of the Attorney General of Ontario has had that amendment in his hands ever since, and he has made no representations as to any further amendment. And why? Because, contrary to what the hon. member for Lincoln has asserted before this committee, the property neighbouring the Niagara river where the bridge if built is to lie, is to be dealt with in such a fashion that the rights of the province of Ontario will be safeguarded.

My hon. friend from Lincoln has said that we were doing away with all the rights of the parks commission of which he is a member. With all deference to my hon. friend, and with all due respect to the splendid work which he has done as a member of that commission in the embellishment of that part of the Niagara district, I must say that his statement to the house exceeds a true picture of the facts.

The bill simply says this: The company may not build that bridge, may not locate the site of the bridge, and may not commence the work in order to complete the bridge, without first getting into touch with the commission of which my hon. friend is a member and agreeing as to the conditions on which the work is to be undertaken. This is the bill as we passed it.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. CANNON: Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Read the section, please.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, I will read the section. I know whereof I speak because I prepared the amendment myself.

Mr. BENNETT: Just read it, please.

Mr. CANNON: I will read section 19, and I would ask the hon. leader of the opposition to follow me as I read, because I am quite sure that when I am through reading it he will not contradict me further. Clause 19 of the bill as amended and reprinted—not the original bill—provides:

The company shall not locate, construct or operate—

Shall not locate; my first contention is right. Shall not construct; my second contention is right. Shall not operate; my third contention is right.

The company shall not locate, construct or operate any of the works mentioned in section 7 of this act upon or over the boulevard of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park Commission, without first obtaining the consent in writing of the commissioners of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on.

Mr. CANNON: This is the amendment, if my hon. friend will allow me—

Mr. BENNETT: I would like to see a man make an argument like that in a court of law.

Mr. CANNON: Well, when I argue in a court of law I am generally listened to with more patience than my hon. friend shows. As I pointed out to the committee, if we leave in the hands of the parks commission the arbitrary power of suspending or obstructing the work altogether, without reason, in view of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Lincoln, who is a member of that commission, it would simply mean that on the one hand, we would give to this company the power to construct a bridge, and on the other hand, we would leave to the decision of the hon. member for Lincoln and his commission the power to stop that work altogether.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. gentleman tell me what is wrong with that?

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will follow me, first of all the company will have to get into touch with the parks commission and try and agree as to the conditions. Should the parks commission and the company fail to agree, then the amendment provides that without prejudice to the rights of the company or of the commission, both parties will have to come before a third party, which will decide whether the bridge shall be constructed, and should the bridge be constructed, the terms upon which its construction shall take place. That is provided in the last part of the clause which reads:

—and failing such consent, within sixty days from the date of the request made in writing by the company for such consent to the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park Commissioners, then upon such terms as are fixed by the board of railway commissioners for Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Supposing the railway commissioners give a judgment adverse to the parks commissioners; would their judgment be binding?

Mr. CANNON: Surely.

Mr. HEAPS: The railway commission would be the final arbiter, and not the parks commission at all?

Mr. CANNON: The amendment covers two alternatives: First, if the parks commission and the company agree, there the matter rests, and my hon. friend from Lincoln and his fellow commissioners can lay down the conditions as to construction. But failing such an agreement between the parks commission and the company, as this parliament always legislates for a practical object, and we have to foresee a possible deadlock, foreseeing that possible deadlock, we had to provide a remedy for it, and as a remedy we have chosen a perfectly impartial third body, the railway commission, which will decide the matter at issue, and either uphold the contention of the parks commissioners, or else prescribe the new conditions upon which the construction of the bridge shall take place.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The railway commission will decide the conditions upon which the bridge is to be built; but they cannot decide that it shall not be built at all.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole story.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, the clauses of the bill deal with the different aspects of the undertaking, but always subject to the basic principle that parliament having adopted the preamble, considers that a second bridge should be built.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Is the ultimate decision of the railway board entirely to govern the location?

Mr. CANNON: Yes. Section 19 provides that the company shall not locate, construct or operate except under certain conditions. This is in answer to my friend's first point, that the wishes of the province of Ontario were disregarded, and, secondly, that provincial rights were not safeguarded. Let me say that Mr. Henderson represented the government of Ontario before the private bills committee and made certain representations, and since the bill has been amended he has made no further representations, from which I think it may be inferred that he is satisfied with the bill in its present form. As to the rights of the province of Ontario, as represented by the park commissioners, not being protected, I submit with all deference that section 19 gives absolute right to the park commissioners, before any work is started, to discuss with the company certain conditions, and if the company is unreasonable, then the railway board will consider the whole situation; and I have enough confidence in the railway board to believe that justice will be done.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think anyone will dispute the Solicitor General's statement that the railway board will endeavour to do justice. But once this bill is passed the company have a statutory right to go ahead and construct the bridge, and when it fixes on a certain point where the bridge should tie up with the land, is not the railway board bound to give a decision that will permit the construction of the undertaking? The railway board is not in a position to say: no, this is not in the interests of the community, and you shall not construct the proposed bridge. It must give a decision permitting the undertaking to proceed.

Mr. CANNON: Not necessarily; otherwise section 19 would be senseless.

Mr. STEVENS: It may be senseless.

Mr. CANNON: I say it would be senseless, because the power of the railway board would be restricted to such an extent that it would simply be illusory. But it is not so restricted. Section 19, if I understand it rightly, provides, in effect, that the company having power to locate, construct and maintain, will not exercise that power without previously obtaining the consent of the park commisisoners, upon conditions to be arranged, and failing such consent, the matter may be referred to the railway board. But the railway board will then have exactly the same power and authority to lay down conditions as to location preliminary to the beginning of the work.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But the railway board will not have power to say that the bridge shall not be built.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly they will not have power to say the bridge shall not be built; but they will have power to say: first, your bridge shall be built on a certain site; second, you shall construct your bridge under certain conditions; third, you shall maintain your undertaking under certain conditions. Then unless the conditions laid down by the railway board are observed the work will not be undertaken.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The railway commission will not have authority to say to the company after this bill passes: you shall not build that bridge at all.

Mr. CANNON: We are only playing with words.

Mr. ADSHEAD: No.

Mr. CANNON: The railway board will have authority to say: You may build that bridge provided you do so and so; or, putting it another way: you shall not build that bridge unless you do so and so.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Solicitor General permit me one further question? Clause 7 is the empowering clause, and it says clearly that the bridge shall be constructed:

> At or near a point between the property of the Canadian National Railways on River road and the north limit of Bender street in the city of Niagara Falls in the county of Welland in the province of Ontario, to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York.

Now then, if the bridge is located at any point within that area, the railway board cannot impose conditions that will prevent the company from constructing the work. The Solicitor General will admit that?

Mr. CANNON: I will admit that the location of the bridge will have to be within the four corners of section 7.

Mr. STEVENS: And that the railway commission cannot withhold their consent if the bridge is between those points?

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: I would not say that. I suppose the hon. gentlemen who represent these localities could furnish the committee better information on these points than I possess, but if I understood rightly the discussion before the committee there is quite a lot of space where a bridge could be built.

Mr. STEVENS: But the location is specified in the bill.

Mr. CANNON: Section 7 says between such point and another point. Let me give the exact words:

> 7. The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, cariages, electric cars or street cars and for any other like purpose, with all necessary approaches, from a point at or near a point between the property of the Canadian National Railways on River road and the north limit of Bender street in the city of Niagara Falls in the county of Welland in the province of Ontario,—

Mr. STEVENS: That is one point.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. members who represent these constituencies are in a much better position than I can possibly be to give information to the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Solicitor General please complete the quotation? He has given only half of the section.

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

> —to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America,—

That is, as far as the bridge is concerned, we have to consider the Canadian side; in other words, we can legislate only in so far as Canada is concerned. As to the American side, it will be for the proper authorities there to deal with the matter. On the Canadian side, we say: we empower you to build the bridge from that point to this other point, but as to the exact location of the bridge, this must be agreed upon between yourselves and the park commissioners before the work is started, and failing such agreement, the location will be decided by the railway board. That is the effect of section 19 as I understand it.

Mr. HEAPS: Who is asking for the bridge?

Mr. CANNON: I will come to that. I pass now to my second point. The hon. member (Mr. Chaplin), with great ability and also with the experience he has derived from many years of service on the commission, has told the committee that this is an attempt on the part of certain private interests to get from parliament the power to build a bridge over the Niagara river and to exact tolls from the public. That is certainly the impression which the hon. member conveyed or at least attempted to convey by his remarks. What is the true situation? The bridge which now exists is not publicly owned; it does not belong to the province of Ontario; it is not controlled by my hon. friend's commission. It is a bridge owned by a private company, whose representatives when they appeared before the committee refused to address them. When I asked the question as to what was the financial standing of the company for the last twelve months and what their revenues had been no answer was given. Then I was informed that there was no authorized representative of the company who could give the information, and we never heard another word about the matter. It is not correct to state—

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. CANNON: When I am through with this point. It is not correct for the hon. member for Lincoln to say that this is a privately owned company trying to secure a monopoly—

Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not say "monopoly"; I never used the word monopoly at all.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend did not use that term I will correct myself. I say, it is not correct that too say that the company is trying to secure authority to build a bridge which would be a gold mine. Now, let us examine the facts.

Mr. HEAPS: Who is asking for the bridge?

Mr. CANNON: I am coming to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If what the hon. gentleman says is true, that the bridge would be a gold mine, is not that a good reason for opposing the construction of more privately owned bridges?

Mr. CANNON: I thought my hon. friend had a question to put; that is an argument, not a question. Now to reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps). The sponsor of the bill would be in a much better position than I to answer his question. However, as a member of the committee, I may say that there appeared before us the mayor of Niagara Falls—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Who is also a promoter of the bill, one of the officers of the bridge company asking for the charter.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is a member of the parks commission and it is his right to state his views. The mayor of Niagara Falls came forward in regard to another bridge—

Mr. BENNETT: One is profit, the other service.

Mr. CANNON: The mayor of Niagara Falls appeared in his official capacity. Before I go any further, let me say that I am not criticizing my hon. friend from Lincoln for being a member of the commission, but I am very much surprised, in view of the high character of the gentleman who fills the office of mayor of Niagara Falls that the hon. member should try to discredit him by saying that he is interested in this bridge. Mr. Stephens appeared before the committee and I do not think that in anything he said he gave occasion for my hon. friend to insinuate that he was interested. He appeared on behalf of the municipality of Niagara Falls; other gentlemen appeared also. They represented, first, that a second bridge was necessary; they pointed out that the necessity arose by reason of considerable congestion of traffic. In the second place, they contended that it was necessary on account of exorbitant tolls which had been charged by one existing bridge. And in the third place, in support of the contention that the construction of the new bridge was urgent, they submitted a petition signed by many thousands of people. I as a member of the committee felt convinced that the people who live in that locality were very anxious that second bridge should be built.

Mr. CHAPLIN: A second one? You mean a fourth.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend knows that only one bridge can be used now for ordinary traffic in automobiles and pedestrians, the arch bridge.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I know no such thing; that statement is not correct. I do not know whether the Solicitor General is aware of the situation or not. He knows nothing about it if he persists in that statement.

Mr. CANNON: I will leave the question to the committee; I do not think it would be much use arguing with my hon. friend considering the tone he has adopted. The committee had evidence before them that the people living in that locality, who after all are the people who should know the real conditions, supported the proposal. I wish now to call the attention of the committee to a third point. If hon. members will read carefully Bill No. 14 as reprinted and amended, they will see that we have surrounded the provisions of the bill with every possible precaution in order to safeguard what we consider to be the public interest. I would ask hon. gentlemen to glance at clauses 7, 8, 10, 14, 16, 17, 18 and 19. In all these clauses we have given authority to the governor in council to supervise and control the operations of the company, should that company be allowed to build a bridge.

Before concluding, let me say that as a member of the government I immediately realized, when I attended that committee, the serious danger which might lie in empowering a private company to build toll bridges, not only at Niagara Falls but at other points on the international frontier. I realized that it was my duty as a member of the government and as a member of the house to make it clear that these powers, if granted to a private company, were to be granted in such a way that the public interests of the citizens of this country should be properly protected. We insterted a clause in the bill, and although the hon. member for Lincoln has stated that the clause has no teeth, I would ask hon. gentlemen to examine it; it is clause 18. Under that clause, when the company constructing the bridge have redeemed their corporate obligations, the bridge then becomes the property of the Dominion government or of any other government or public body designated by the federal government.

Mr. STEVENS: Perfectly meaningless.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend says that is perfectly meaningless.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Show us the teeth in it.

Mr. CANNON: I will do so in just a moment. If my hon. friend would credit me with some interest in the welfare of the citizens of this country he might realize that I would not take it upon myself to insert such a clause without being sure first that that clause had an object and secondly that the object was possible of attainment. My hon. friend from Lincoln rightly stated that in reading the original bill that clause would not be of any use because the financial obligations of the company might be so excessive that the day would never come when they would be properly discharged. Having this in view, and having also examined with care the United States legislation covering the same subject matter, I inserted amendments all through the bill under which the governor general in council has absolute control over the financial operations of the company. When that company undertakes to transact any financial business which might have any bearing on section 18, the previous consent of the governor general in council will have to be secured. Moreover, in order that we might not be met with the suggestion, should this government consider it in the public interest to take over this bridge, that we were infringing upon vested rights, I would refer hon. members to section 21, which I inserted and which provides that the right to alter, amend or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

Mr. STEVENS: To whom?

Mr. CANNON: To the authority which has legislated; when a reservation of any legislative power is made, evidently that reservation is in favour of the authority which has enacted the legislation wherein the reservation is to be found. It is true that parliament is a supreme authority and has the right to repeal, amend or alter any legislation which it passes, but that authority is implied. As members of the committee we went further, and instead of simply having an implied authority under which we could act we made it an express authority by inserting that clause in the act.

In conclusion may I say that when this and another bill concerning a bridge at Sarnia were before the committee, I was impressed with the fact that none of the companies operating the other bridges at Niagara Falls have submitted their tolls to the governor in council, although it is stated in their charters that that must be done. Before the committee I made a statement which I now repeat, that that situation will have to be dealt with in order to protect the public, and the tariff of tolls must be submitted to the governor in council. In this bill which we are now considering I refer the committee to section 10, which reads as follows:

> The company may charge tolls for the use of the said bridge, approaches and facilities, and may regulate the tolls to be charged: Provided that such tolls shall have been previously approved by the governor in council. . . .

I added the word "previously" to the words which were to be found in the former legislation, in order to make sure that the tariff would not be exigible until approved by the governor in council. Not only have we the right to examine the tolls before the company has a right to charge such tolls, but section 10 contains a further item which gives the governor in council power to revise these tolls from time to time, and the section further states that the tolls shall be equal to all persons using the bridge, approaches and facilities.

To sum up, section 10 says first that the company will have to submit their tolls to the governor in council for approval before those tolls can be charged the public, and it also provides that if the governor in council sees that a revision would be useful, the governor in council will have the right to revise those tolls.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. My hon. friend has exhausted his forty minutes.

Mr. PETTIT: I think the Solicitor General has covered the ground rather thoroughly, but for fear there may be some misapprehension as to the location of this bridge I would call attention to section 7 of the bill. Under that section this bridge will be located at a point from 800 to 1,000 feet north of the present upper steel arch bridge, away from the falls. There is a spread of 200 feet there, and of course you cannot put your finger right on the spot where the bridge will be constructed, but it will be within those limits.

Mr. CHAPLIN: While my friend is on that subject, will he tell me how far the Canadian National property is from the upper steel arch bridge?

Mr. PETTIT: I would imagine it is from 400 to 600 feet away.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You know very well it is only 250 feet.

Mr. PETTIT: I did not know that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I know it, and you know it now.

Mr. PETTIT: I want to tell the committee that no one in this house respects provincial rights as strongly as I do, but this bill does not infringe upon provincial rights except in so far as the parks commission, which is a creature of the provincial government, may be concerned. The park commission are only concerned with this 66-feet strip of roadway that passes along the edge of the gorge where this bridge is to touch. Now the bridge simply crosses the gorge, goes up to and against the side of this road and opens on to it. That is all that happens, nothing more or nothing less. So that there is no interference in any way with provincial rights, or any rights in which the park commission are concerned.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Could you not get a charter from the provincial government for this bridge?

Mr. PETTIT: Absolutely no. This is a matter beyond the jurisdiction of the province. The bridge will span the international boundary, and therefore will come within the jurisdiction of the Dominion.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are there any objections to it from the province of Ontario?

Mr. PETTIT: If my hon. friend had been here he would have heard an objection by the Premier of the province of Ontario. I am glad the hon. member asked me that question because it will be noticed that the Premier of Ontario in his letter says: "I am against the building of this bridge for the same reason that I was last year." Now the reason why he was against the building of the bridge last year, and the reason why I opposed it also last year, was because the location of the bridge at that time was between the present bridge and the falls.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In his letter he did not say "reason". He said "reasons".

Mr. PETTIT: I have mentioned one reason. The other reason was that it would mar the beauty of the scenery of the falls I agree that the former location would have had that effect because the bridge would have been between the present structure and the falls. But the contemplated bridge will be 800 or 1,000 feet farther away from the falls, and it will not mar the scenery one iota. The New York state end of the bridge will open out on private property which is an eyesore. But those dilapidated buildings will be expropriated and torn down and a nice entrance made. With this eyesore removed the scenery will be improved rather than marred. Certainly as far as the Canadian end of the bridge is concerned there will be no marring whatever of scenery. The bridge will simply come up to the road and will open out on to it. I have seen the plans of the proposed bridge and it will be a most artistic structure. The bridge will be very wide and will at least provide for six lines of automobiles, three going one way and three going in the other direction. The present situation is such that a new bridge is an absolute necessity. Notwithstanding the remarks of my hon. friend from Lincoln the congestion there is simply terrific. Not only on holidays, but throughout the tourist season of three months, that situation prevails, it being less on some days and on other days greater. The present upper bridge was built some 33 years ago when automobile traffic was unknown. Hon. gentlemen all realize the extent of that traffic to-day, and bearing in mind that this bridge cannot be constructed or completed within two and a half years, they can form some idea of the enormous traffic which will have developed by the end of that period. Niagara Falls at that point is getting a black eye throughout the United States because of the present congestion of traffic. The automobile traffic is held up there for a period of anywhere from two to six, eight or even ten hours. People are ceasing to cross at that point and are crossing at other points. Personally I cannot understand the attitude of my hon. friend and the park commission in allowing that state of affairs to continue. I should have thought they would have welcomed the construction of another bridge, which would draw more people to that particular point, because it would mean thousands of dollars to the park commission in revenue from concessions, and the easier and the quicker the crossing, could be made, the greater number of tourists you would attract, with larger profit to the town, and millions of dollars to the province and the Dominion at large.

I have in my possession some 60 or 70 telegrams from leading business men, councils, boards of trade and other organizations. I produced these before the committee and if I were to read them now hon. gentlemen would realize in what strong language they are couched. The gist of these communications is that the congestion is great, it must be relieved at once, and the present monopoly broken. There are two bridges there.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister said there was only one.

Mr. PETTIT: The upper bridge will be about 800 feet away, and another bridge a mile and a half or a mile and three quarters farther away again. There is another bridge seven miles away from that, and the fourth bridge is twenty miles distant, opposite Buffalo and Fort Erie. The large upper bridge had certain rates in force, and a year ago last October raised those rates 100 per cent. They were maintained at that figure until just about four weeks ago, when they were somewhat reduced but not to the original figures. So that instead of encouraging we are trying to break the existing monopoly. These two bridges have been there for years, they yield good returns, and naturally the owners want to keep the traffic and the revenues derived therefrom. The situation is such that something must be done to relieve the existing congestion, and to fix reasonable rates for the travelling public.

Mr. KENNEDY: Are the other two bridges in the hands of private companies?

[Mr. Pettit.]

Mr. PETTIT: Yes. And as has been pointed out by the Solicitor General, it was agreed by the promoters of the present bill that the proposed structure should become the joint property of both governments at the end of a certain period. In order that that period might not be up in the air, a further amendment was inserted which provided that the period for the redemption of the bonds and the payment of the obligations in the very first instance should be fixed by the Governor in Council, and thereafter from time to time if extension was necessary.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I read here that it shall be prescribed by the by-laws of the company.

Mr. PETTIT: The hon. member has not read far enough. If he will go farther on he will see that it reads:

> Provided always that the period for the payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not mean that the Governor in Council fixes it.

Mr. PETTIT: What does it mean?

Mr. STEVENS: It does not mean anything.

Mr. PETTIT: Certainly it does. Besides the telegrams that I have from various leading men, business men, farmers, councillors and so on, I have letters from both provincial members of that locality to the effect that the bridge is an absolute necessity and should be built.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the provincial member a supporter of the Ontario government?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes. Mr. W. G. Willson, member for Niagara Falls, and Mr. Vaughan, member for Welland, are both supporters of the provincial government. Boards of trade and councils of the surrounding district are in favour of this bridge.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I just want to clear up two or three matters, one of them regarding a statement made by the Solicitor General that he did not wish to discuss the question any more with me; he said I was impossible, because I corrected him in some of his statements. He referred to the second bridge and I said that there are four bridges there. The difference between him and myself is that I know what I am talking about and he does not. There are four passenger bridges, and there are two bridges, just as the hon. member for Welland has stated, within a mile and a half or a short two miles of each other. Let me point out to the minister that some time ago it was not considered that a bridge company which had a charter from parliament was being badly treated when it had to come to us and arrange about going over our property. That company was not stopped because we felt that bridge was needed in the public interest. That is a bridge which we do not believe is in the public interest. When a man comes before parliament asking for a franchise, it makes a difference whether he comes as an individual or as the mayor of a city. That gentleman as mayor of Niagara Falls had no right to appear as a participant in a charter for a company of this kind any more than the gentleman from Toronto whose name appears on the bill. That other gentleman is already a commissioner for Ontario in another part of the province, and Mr. Wright appears on this bill as an advocate for a bridge charter. If we strip off all the camouflage, the purpose of this charter is to make money. Does anyone suppose this is entirely for the purpose of killing a monopoly? Not at all. These people are out to make money themselves. My reason for opposing the bill is that in years past we gave two or three charters and now it is time to stop. We made a mistake in giving the charters we did and I do not want to see another one given. Let us not keep on following in the old footsteps. There is no need to give this charter; either the provincial government or this government should control the bridge and make whatever money there is to be made out of it. The government has no right to throw out a fortune to any body of individuals. My reason for opposing this bridge is, first, that it is not needed and, second, that we do not need to give a charter to private individuals.

As to the distance, clause 7 tells us plainly where the bridge is to be. Last year, as I pointed out, they came asking for a charter for the first bridge which was to be in front of the present one up against the falls. That bill was killed. They came back to the committee for another one, two hundred feet to the north of the present bridge and the end of that bridge was to be against Canadian National property. That was so stated in the bill and by their articles of incorporation. They said that the Canadian National was going to use this bridge, but I applied to the Canadian National and they said: We have nothing to do with it at all; we do not want a bridge in front of our property. Therefore these people were forced to move and they got some property which is only two hundred and fifty feet away. They say in clause 7:

> The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars or street cars and for any other like purpose, with all necessary approaches, from a point at or near a point between the property of the Canadian National Railways on River road and the north limit of Bender street.

The north end of Bender street is eight hundred feet away; the near end is two hundred and fifty feet away, so that this bill gives them authority to construct a bridge somewhere between those two points, the nearest of which is two hundred and fifty feet from the other bridge. We are blandly told that it may be four hundred feet away, but I know how far it will be. Last year the committee killed a charter for a bridge that was to be two hundred feet away from the other, and now they say: Well, we will build this one fifty feet further away. The whole thing is ridiculous when you come to consider it. When a bridge is needed, it should be placed midway, three-quarters of a mile away from the falls, and not within a few hundred feet. With two bridgeheads coming within a few hundred feet on the roadway, they are simply going to clutter up traffic more than ever before.

The minister said a few minutes ago that I made some implied reference to Mr. Stephens of Niagara Falls. I had no idea of doing any such thing. I simply pointed out to the committee that when I was in the committee, gentlemen there asked me if I was interested in any of the bridges. They did not hesitate to ask me, but they did not ask if the mayor of Niagara Falls was the party who was asking for the charter. My answer to the members who asked me that question was that neither I, nor any member of my family, nor any relative, had any interest in the bridges. I have no interest to serve except one and that is, as a park commissioner, to serve the interest of the people whose interest we have been serving there for forty years. The minister helped me quite considerably and I must thank him for putting in that word "previously" to which he refers. I suggested it to him but I did not know the exact word to insert and he was kind enough to see that the committee improved that clause materially, because, as I said before, every bridge that was built there under charter from this government had exactly the same clause that this bill contains and yet not one toll in thirty-five years was approved by order in council. Of course I know the present minister will look after the business better than any of his predecessors. He will need to do it a great deal better and I believe he will. I must publicly say that he has inserted several clauses, but this does not improve the bill at all from our point of view because we are opposed to it on principle.

In regard to clause 18, to which he referred, I said to the solicitor general: This is a bridge company dangling before the people's eyes the prospect of one of these days getting this bridge back again. I said: If you want to make that of some use, insert a provision stating that the stock of that company which is assumed to be worth 100 to-day will not have to be bought back at a higher price than 110 and interest. What will happen is this—if I know anything about corporations, and while I am not a lawyer I know something about them—they will pay off their obligations, and when it comes to selling their stock back to the government, they will want three or four hundred dollars for it. Let us insert a provision—I submit to the minister that two or three words will do it—making it necessary for the company to sell that stock at 110, and I will be satisfied with the clause. But under the bill as it stands, this bridge company can go out into the market and with their capital stock borrow probably twelve or fourteen million dollars. The thing is absurd.

Mr. HEAPS: What will the bridge be worth?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It will cost, according to their own statement, about $4,000,000, but it looks as if they are going to build up such a capital that when they sell it back they will be able to make four or five to one on it. I object to this on principle, first of all, because it is not necessary, and secondly, if a charter is to be granted, it should be under the control of the parks commission, which should have the say as to the location of the bridge. I am not opposed to the bridge if it is needed. Why, we put a railroad bridge there in my time because it was in the public interest, but we had to say where it should be located.

Mr. CANNON: What interpretation does my hon. friend give to the proviso in clause 18?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not profess to be a lawyer, but if the minister will provide in this clause that under no circumstances will more than 110 be paid for the stock I will be satisfied with that, and you will not need to demonstrate any further to me the value of this clause.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. CANNON: The proviso to which I refer in clause 18 reads:

> Provided always that the period for the payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But there is not a word there about the price of the stock.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly. The whole of clause 18, under which the bridge will become the joint property of the Dominion government and either the federal or state government on the other side, is subject to the proviso that the payment of the obligations of the company and the retirement of their capital stock shall be subject to the previous approval of the governor in council.

Mr. IRVINE: Why not make it subject to the approval of parliament? Why the governor in council?

Mr. CANNON: Parliament cannot deal with the matter—

Mr. IRVINE: It can deal with it now.

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt that that could be put in the bill, but does my hon. friend think it would be reasonable to come to parliament and ask it to deal with matters of this kind, which are, after all, matters of detail? One of the great difficulties of the imperial parliament, may I point out to my hon. friend, is that it has too many matters of detail to deal with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We can deal with three hundred divorce cases in a year. Surely we can deal with one bridge.

Mr. CANNON: As my hon. friend knows, my opinion as to divorce bills is very much like his own, and if our opinion prevailed we would have no divorce bills at all before parliament.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the minister's objection to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lincoln?

Mr. CANNON: I wish to repeat, this is not a government bill, but I address the committee at some length in order to explain what the government has thought fit to do in connection with this bill in order properly to safeguard what we consider the interests of the public.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is not the government willing to do a little bit more?

Mr. CANNON: I do not consider that it is necessary to add anything to clause 18. As it is now framed, it gives every protection that my hon. friend from Lincoln indicated he desires.

Mr. IRVINE: Is this clause worth anything more than advertising the company?

Mr. STEVENS: It is eyewash.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like the minister to say in what way this property will ultimately be conveyed back to the government. There is absolutely no control by parliament over this capital stock, how it is to be paid for, or how much shall be paid for it, and it might take five million years to pay up that stock.

Mr. CANNON: A perusal of the bill will show, I think, that this company has to submit to the governor in council practically everything that has any bearing on its financial transactions. Comparing the American legislation with our own, I gathered the idea of most of these amendments. As my hon. friend from Lincoln has pointed out, clause 18 would not be of any practical significance unless the operations of the company were somewhat controlled, and it was with this idea that I suggested the bill should be amended, and the committee has amended it. The financial operations of the company are made subject to the approval of the governor in council, which will see that, while the company may redeem its reasonable obligations, it shall not go into any excessive or exaggerated operations which would delay unduly the taking over of the bridge by the Dominion authorities.

Mr. IRVINE: I object to that for two reasons. In the first place, the governor in council cannot act as an accountant for this company for all time, and secondly, the governor in council might be very much mistaken as to what was in the public interest.

Mr. CANNON: The argument my hon. friend makes now is an answer to the suggestion he made a moment ago. If the governor in council cannot do it, how can parliament do it. Parliament is certainly in no better position than the governor in council, surrounded as council is by all the officials who can give us the information that we seek.

Mr. IRVINE: We are in a better position because at least the question is now before us, but once we embalm this act and put it in the archives, the governor in council does not even know that it exists, to say nothing about carrying it into effect.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend has a wrong idea of how the governor in council understands his duties.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not expect my hon. friend will always be in power. I am looking forward to better times.

Mr. STEVENS: This bill is an illustration of what may result from what has become an unfortunate habit or practice of parliament. One of the habits of parliament, not necessarily a rule, is to allow private bills to get their second reading without very much scrutiny. Very frequently they are put through and sent to a committee on the plea, "Oh, well, the committee will give this bill consideration." But then when the bill comes back to this house we find ourselves confronted with a situation which implies, if it does not assert, that parliament is more or less committed to the principle of the bill, and all we are permitted to do is to consider its individual clauses.

In the first place, I should like to call attention to this fact, that the bill contains the well-known constitutional clause declaring the works and undertaking of the company to be for the general advantage of Canada. This means that the bill must receive the careful consideration of parliament as a whole, and that we should not be influenced by the wishes of a particular community, no matter how deserving or importunate that community may be. Now, the Solicitor General intimated that the bill is strongly supported by the mayor and certain other influential citizens of the town where the bridge is to be located, and this he advanced as a very strong argument why we should pass the bill with apparently very little scrutiny. I submit that we are clothed with a national responsibility, and that this imposes upon us the duty of scrutinizing the bill in detail independently of the wishes of those who may most benefit from it. We should, as a matter of fact, while listening courteously to their request, regard the bill from the standpoint of the general interests of Canada. That, I think, is a principle that we ought to apply in dealing with this measure.

The proposal presents many difficulties to me. I may say to my hon. friend who is sponsor for the bill that nothing would please me better than to get behind him and support his proposal; but when I realize that it involves the construction of a bridge across the international boundary, and, further, that in some measure it infringes on the rights of a public body such as the park commissioners, then I conceive it to be my duty to examine the bill very carefully. The first question that presents itself to me is this: is the bridge a necessity? Personally I am not in a position to express a view; I do not think there are many members of the house who are in a position to do so; but we have heard from an hon. member who is very closely identified with the handling of traffic into Canada from the other side of the international boundary, and he tells us that in the opinion of the parks commission and their technical experts, after a very careful check of traffic throughout the year, the proposed bridge is not necessary. I know the federal government frequently is importuned to put in facilities at border points, for instance, customs facilities, for expeditiously taking care of a peak load, such as may be expected on the 1st and 4th of July—

An hon. MEMBER: And the 12th of July.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and St. Patrick's day, Labour day, and other holidays—days when there is a very heavy traffic, and thus impose on the public treasury the cost of maintaining a force throughout the year to handle abnormal traffic on those infrequent occasions. But very wisely we have decided that the government, while giving the best facilities possible for the handling of normal business, should not be expected to provide facilities to take care of peak loads. The same principle ought to apply in our consideration of this bill. We must ask ourselves: is this bridge necessary to look after the normal business expeditiously? The evidence would indicate that the bridge is not necessary to supplement the existing facilities at this point.

But assuming that we decide in the affirmative, the next point to be considered is: who should build the bridge? At once we come into conflict with certain views. Some hold that these facilities should always be owned by private individuals. I am inclined to the view that in the case of a highway, whether it be a highway through the country or a bridge across a stream, it should be owned and controlled by some public body. Up to two or three years ago we had a toll road from this city to Aylmer, and further back still, half a century or more ago, all our main highways were toll roads, but I am glad to say that Canada, in common with nearly every other country, has abolished this antiquated system and to-day all our highways are under public control. As for bridges, outside of the practice which seems to have obtained at Niagara Falls—and we recently granted a charter for the construction of a toll bridge from Windsor to Detroit—I think all our bridges are now owned and operated by some public body. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hold that if this bridge is to be built, it should be undertaken, if possible, by some public body.

This brings me to my next point: what public body, outside of the Dominion government would be most interested in the construction of this bridge? Naturally the government of the province of Ontario is the most affected and the most interested. It is quite obvious that the town of Niagara Falls is not going to build the bridge; it will not be a civic bridge. It is a work that might be undertaken very profitably and very properly by the provincial government. Its position in regard to the proposed charter is very clearly set forth in the letters read from the Premier of Ontario and his Minister of Highways. These two ministers of the crown say they are opposed to the bridge being constructed by a private company. Therefore it does appeal to me on that ground also that we should reject the bill.

Now let me turn very briefly to some other features of this proposal. For the last seventeen years that I have been a member of this house we have considered the question of town planning in relation to the city of Ottawa, and to preserve the natural beauty of this capital city we appointed a body known as the Ottawa Improvement Commission. Now, one of the transcendent beauty spots of the world is Niagara Falls. The government of Ontario some years ago appointed a commission whose duty primarily is to preserve the natural beauty of the Niagara Falls district. To my mind it is a tragedy that our commercial development of hydro-electric power is minimizing the flow over Niagara Falls. Those who have studied the subject tell us that in the near future the falls will cease to be one of the wonders of the world by reason of the lessened volume of water and the gradual erosion of the rock. Certainly we ought not to do anything to mar the beauty of the falls. My hon. friend, the promoter of the bill, argues that the proposed bridge will be built below one of the existing bridges and therefore will not mar the beauty of the locality. I am not at all sure that by multiplying one bridge by two you are lessening the interference with the view of the falls. The fact that the present bridge is there is no argument why another bridge should be put up. Certainly I cannot for the life of me see the soundness of the argument for congesting traffic at that point, putting one bridge, at the extreme, a thousand feet away from the other, and possibly only two or three hundred feet. I contend, therefore, that there is little ground for the argument in favour of the bill from that angle.

Now let me refer to the bill as amended. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has given us a very exhaustive examination of its terms, and I hope he will take it kindly if I criticize some of his observations; I am not at all reflecting upon him in so doing. But I do not agree with him, and I say with the utmost candour that in putting forward my own view, I do not venture it as a legal opinion. I am not a lawyer, and I therefore offer my views merely as a member of parliament, whatever weight they may carry. But let us take the main operative clause of the bill, section 7, which clothes the company with all its powers. The company are empowered to construct this bridge, and there is imposed upon them a certain duty, namely, that they shall not commence actual construction of the bridge until an act of congress of the United States or of any other competent authority there has been passed approving the bridging of the said river. This of course is a constitutional necessity, but it indicates that after all nothing can be done until such a bill is passed either in congress or in the state of New York. I would direct attention to a few lines of the section which merit very close scrutiny. Having set up this alleged handicap or restriction, the section goes on to provide:

> The company may in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council, and do all other things authorized by this act.

In other words, irrespective of obtaining authority to land on the American side, the company is empowered to ignore that restriction altogether and to apply the powers of the Expropriation Act, as exercised by a railway, expropriating the lands of the commission or of anybody else, and asserting all the rights that they can possibly obtain under this act, so far as the Canadian side is concerned, thus placing themselves in the position of complete control of the situation. And this they can do without ever conforming to the previous restriction of this section, namely, the securing of authority from the United States to land on the other side. This, I contend, should certainly not be granted to any company. No company should have the right to exercise expropriation powers until it is in a position to carry out the work it undertakes to perform. I therefore strongly object on that ground.

Let me ask the Solicitor General a question. If the company is to be required to obtain the consent of the state of New York, why should we not equally impose upon it the necessity of obtaining the consent of the province of Ontario? Why not? This parliament is not called upon to champion the cause of any company; that is not our business. It is our duty to pass legislation of this character because such legislation comes within the constitution. But in exercising this prerogative, parliament ought surely to safeguard the interests of a junior legislative body, if I may use that term in this case. And the junior legislative body here concerned is the legislature of the province of Ontario. Why should we not enact a clause of this character: "The company shall not commence actual construction of the said bridge. nor exercise any of the powers hereunder mentioned, until an act of the congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States, or in the province of Ontario, has been passed." That would completely safeguard the rights of Ontario and of the commission to which reference has been made. I submit for the consideration of the house the principle that if we are to reserve the rights of the state of New York we should equally reserve the rights of the province of Ontario.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is it not necessary to obtain the consent of the federal government of the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not sufficiently versed in international law to answer that question. I am under the impression that this would be a question for congress rather than for the state of New York, although the state of New York may have jurisdiction in the matter. It is immaterial, however, which legislative body in the United States exercises jurisdiction. My point is that if we are going to impose on this company the obligation of securing the consent of a foreign power, we should certainly make it obligatory upon them to secure the consent of the province of Ontario, whose interests are directly affected. I understand that a similar proposal was before the state of New York last year and was rejected, and it is before the same state at the present time. That of course need not influence our action one way or the other. I hope I have not confused the point I am making, which is, that if we are going to make it necessary for the company to obtain the consent of the state of New York we should enact a similar provision to ensure the rights of the province of Ontario in this regard.

I turn now to another section to which some consideration has been given. The Solicitor

General in his remarks referred to section 18, for which he took a great deal of credit to himself. But this section, to use the language of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is obviously "without teeth". It has no real meaning; it does not impose any obligation upon the company. In plain terms, as I read it, this is what it says: that when the company reaches that stage where it can, and when it does, retire its obligations—that is to say, retire its bonds, mortgage charges and so forth—and when it is in a position to pay off its capital stock, then the work must revert to the Dominion of Canada or to some body designated by the governor in council. But what company is going to dispossess itself of work of this character so long as it is paying it well enough to retire its obligations? It might retire its obligations and then "sit tight" and draw its dividends. But, says the Solicitor General, I have forestalled that; I have added this clause:

> Provided always that the period for the payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Let me point out again—and I submit this only as the opinion of a layman and not as that of a lawyer—that this clause is innocuous, without any force or effect. In the first place, the company has not been compelled to pass such by-laws. If it does pass by-laws it submits them to the governor in council, and the governor in council may withhold consent and disapprove of the terms. But the governor in council cannot impose terms. He has nothing by which he can force the company to pass a by-law in conformity with the desires of the governor in council. He can reject the terms; he can say they are not sufficiently brief or sufficiently long. It might be that a number of the shareholders would say, "No, we do not want to retire our capital; we want to retain it." A friendly government might answer, "Very well, we will extend the period; we will let you keep the capital for another ten years." Or they might approve a by-law which would permit the shareholders to retain their capital for another fifty years. The point I am making is just what the hon. member for Lincoln and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin pointed out; if you are going to put teeth in this clause you must fix some period or some price at which this capital stock must be retired, if not both. I am not saying we are prepared to do so, but do not come before parliament and say that you have put in this bill a clause which will recover this work to the Dominion of Canada, when it will do nothing of the kind. After all, perhaps the people of Canada might approve of such a bill if they took in good faith the suggestion made by the Solicitor General, that this work would be recovered to the country in ten or fifteen years, but there is nothing in this clause making any such provision.

Then I pass on to the famous clause 19, dealing with the railway commission, for which the Solicitor General also claimed credit.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, I do not claim any personal credit. I claim credit for the committee which considered this clause; some of the amendments were suggested by the hon. member for Lincoln himself. We all worked together to put the bill in the best possible shape.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I will not repeat the statement that the Solicitor General claims credit; as a matter of fact I rather congratulate him for not claiming credit, because it is a testimony to his ability. However, I would have liked him to be a little more positive in his repudiation.

Let us consider section 19, and the Solicitor General will permit me to say that he did make a very long and very powerful argument in connection with that section. He read half of it and then made his argument, after which he read the closing words and claimed that the interests of all concerned were properly safeguarded by the latter part of the clause. He will correct me if that statement is wrong. Section 19 states that the company shall not locate its works on the Canadian side without first approaching the Niagara Falls park commissioners and obtaining their consent. We have already heard the views of the commissioners, and failing to obtain their consent the company will proceed upon such terms as are fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. I asked the Solicitor General a very plain question when he read that sentence, and it was this: Let us suppose we pass this bill with section 7 as it is at present, empowering this company to construct, maintain and operate the bridge, and furthermore empowering the company to proceed with the acquisition of land forthwith, without waiting for legislation to be passed by the state of New York or any other body. Assuming that we pass this legislation and the company present plans to the Board of Railway Commissioners after failing to obtain the consent of the park commissioners with regard to the location of the bridge. According to the bill the bridge must be located between the Canadian National Railway river road and the north limit of Bender street, which is a very limited one. In case of such an application, can the Board of Railway Commissioners refuse to allow the company to go on with the work at that point? It is obvious that they cannot. My hon. friend knows very well that the railway commissioners will say, "We must assume that parliament knew what it was doing; it authorized this company to build a bridge between two certain points on the Canadian side and to expropriate land without waiting for the acquisition of land on the other side. It is not for us to prevent the company from going on with their work." The only thing the board would have to do would be to determine at what point between those two specific points this bridge should be located. I do not believe the Solicitor General will contradict what I have said.

Mr. CANNON: I may tell my hon. friend that he cannot consider clause 7 without reading it in conjunction with clause 8, and if the two are read together I do not think his argument has much weight.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well, we will consider section 8. A moment ago the Solicitor General said he was the legal adviser of the government under whom came the preparation of legislation coming before parliament.

Mr. CANNON: I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, you did, and I was rather surprised at the time, because I did not think you meant it. As the legal adviser of the government, will the Solicitor General say that my argument in regard to section 7 is faulty? I do not think he will.

Mr. CANNON: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: The only answer I can give him is that it is a faulty argument.

Mr. STEVENS: I will admit that that is a very wise answer if you have supreme confidence in the infallibility of the legal opinions of the Solicitor General, but unfortunately I have not that confidence.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend asked my opinion and I gave it to him. I would ask my hon. friend not to pass the remark that I am talking as though I am infallible, or anything like that. I was asked for an opinion, which I gave, and I do not say my hon. friend has to consider my opinion to be right. Everyone is entitled to his own opinion.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. I merely observed that I would have had a great deal more confidence in the opinion if I thought the Solicitor General were infallible, which I do not.

Mr. CANNON: I am not.

Mr. STEVENS: In addition, of course, the Solicitor General gave no reasons, merely stating that I was wrong. I submit that my argument is not faulty; there may be some technical fault in it, but as an argument of fact it is not faulty. I have watched the railway commission for a great many years; I have appeared before them as a private citizen and as an officer of a municipality, and I know how that court operates. It does not operate strictly as a court of law but rather as a court of equity, and they invariably declare that when parliament clothes a company with certain powers they have no right to prevent that company from operating under those powers or from exercising their rights. My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary) intimates quite rightly that this section does not give the railway commission power to stop the construction of the bridge; they merely fix the terms upon which the company shall proceed. The point I am making is this: When we pass this bill we authorize the construction of that bridge. There is no question of that, and the so-called safeguarding of the public interest which the Solicitor General has indicated is limited as I have stated in regard to both section 18 and section 19.

Then, in regard to section 21, I certainly would like to have an independent legal opinion in that connection. I have been in parliament for seventeen years, and I cannot recall having seen a clause similar to this. It may be new; it may be that the Solicitor General is hewing out a new pathway for parliament to follow in the future, and it may be that he will become immortal because of that clause. I do submit, however, that I would like to have the opinion of a legal authority at least equal to and independent of my hon. friend. The clause reads as follows:

> The right to alter, amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

In the first place, it is a axiom of parliamentary procedure that parliament has the right, although it is not always exercised, to repeal practically any statute which it has passed, of course always reserving the supreme right of the individual to appeal for equity through the granting of a fiat by the government to bring the matter before the courts. That is axiomatic. Parliament has that right. Just what other power is given to parliament by this clause I do not know. The only value of that clause—if it has any value, which I question—is this: To notify any person investing in this company, to notify any prospective bond purchaser or shareholder, that his rights in the company may be ended at any moment without notice. That is the only value. The Solicitor General nodded his head in approval of that statement. I submit that parliament should not pass any such piece of legislation. If they cannot safeguard the interests of the public of Canada without imposing a condition of that kind then the measure should not be passed at all. If the public interests cannot be properly safeguarded within the ambit of this measure then such a clause should not be put in. Furthermore I say that if the clause is effective, which I do do not believe it is, no solicitor for a bond company would ever pass the bonds which would be issued under that act. He would not pass them for a bonding company, my legal friends around me would not pass them. There is no solicitor for a bonding company, or for the trustee of the bondholders, who would ever approve of the issue of bonds with that clause in the bill without anything on the face of the bond to indicate to every bond purchaser that their bonds may be cancelled, or the rights of the company may be cancelled without notice. I say that the bonds would be unsaleable, and the raising of capital under those conditions would be a fruitless task. I believe I know something of what would happen because I have been in the financial end of the business for a good many years, and I know perfectly well the public would not take up bonds of this character.

Mr. CANNON: Why should my hon. friend object to the clause?

Mr. STEVENS: I object to the clause because it is a piece of nonsense to put it into the bill, if what I say is correcct.

Mr. CANNON: Thank you for your judgment.

Mr. STEVENS: I may appear to the Solicitor General to be not very respectful of his views, but I do not know what impelled him to put the clause in.

Mr. CANNON: I gave the reason a moment ago.

Mr. STEVENS: I have argued the question from my standpoint, and I am convinced that what I have said is correct. I repeat that argument briefly: I do not think the clause is operative in the manner in which it is proposed to be enacted. If it is operative then I say the bonds are unsaleable. That is the point I make. I say further to the committee that if we are going to pass this legislation then we ought to safeguard the public interests in some other way than the inclusion of a clause of that character. I say very candidly that if I approved of this bill I would fight tooth and nail for the removal of that clause, because I would conceive it was not in the interest of the project at all, making it an inoperative and innocuous thing.

The discussion has been pretty well distributed over the clauses of the bill. I presume we are on clause 1, but I thought I should give the committee my views on the bill and state my opposition to the incorporation of this company under clause 1 so as to bring myself within the rules of the house.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand the preamble is carried?

Mr. STEVENS: The preamble carries last in the house, but of course in the private bills committee it carries first. We are on clause 1, which seeks to incorporate the company, and I am opposed to the incorporation of that company for the reasons I have outlined.

Mr. PETTIT: If I may venture a remark or two, I would say that the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in this bill are men of high standing in the community of Niagara Falls and the character of every one of them is above reproach.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not question that for a moment. I want hon. gentlemen to understand that clearly.

Mr. PETTIT: These gentlemen have associated themselves together for the purpose of carrying out this enterprise, and have come before the house with this bill. As member for the constituency within which this bridge is to be built I support it very strongly because of the intolerable condition of affairs that exists at Niagara Falls, owing to the congestion of traffic and the high rates now charged. The people of the community are bound to break that monopoly and to get some legislation from parliament that will relieve the existing state of affairs. In this effort they should receive the support of the province of Ontario, and of the federal government representing the country as a whole, because both are interested. I want to assure hon. members that I am as strong a supporter of public ownership as any other hon. gentleman here, but to those who suggest that either the province of Ontario or the Dominion should undertake this work, I reply that neither the province nor the Dominion is going to undertake the building of bridges. Where would these two legislative bodies be if they undertook work of that character? Why, they would be at the beck and call of every constituency in every part of the country. It is simply drawing a red herring across the trail to raise a point of that kind.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I should like to know if there is any difference in principle between the government of this province or the government of Canada building the bridge and the governments of the United States and Canada undertaking to construct jointly the St. Lawrence waterways scheme?

Mr. PETTIT: No, I do not see the difference, and I am not opposing any such plan. But what are we going to do in the meantime while the respective governments are considering the matter?

Mr. IRVINE: Have you asked the government to build a bridge?

Mr. PETTIT: No, we have not asked this government to build a bridge. We are asking for authority to build it. We maintain that its construction is necessary in the public interest, to end an intolerable situation. This company is not acting from philanthropic or charitable motives. It wants to build the bridge and make a reasonable amount on the investment within such a period of time as would enable the cost of construction to be paid off. Then it is willing that this work shall become the joint property of both governments. I tell hon. gentlemen that this bridge is a necessity. The present congestion is simply intolerable, and it occurs not only on holidays but throughout the tourist season. I have been there and have viewed the conditions for myself. The gentlemen who sent these telegrams that I have in my hand —members of municipal councils and boards of trade, including Niagara Falls, the township of Stamford, the township of Willoughby, the township of Bertie, the town of Bridgeburg, the town of Fort Erie, and others— surely are not misrepresenting matters to this parliament. They tell you in no uncertain terms and very strong language, in the resolutions and telegrams they have forwarded, that the congestion cannot be endured any longer. Relief must be provided and the existing monopoly must be broken. That is not only in the interest of the particular locality affected, but in the interests of the Dominion at large.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I should like to ask the Solicitor General a few questions on this matter. Some provision is made in this bill for the stock of the company passing into the hands of the government. How would the United States regard the ownership of the bridge passing into the hands of what it might term a foreign country, and how would that affect the relations existing between the two countries? Would not the United States or the state of New York expect that in the passage of any legislation in which they were interested their rights should be safeguarded?

Mr. CANNON: I may say first that no international bridge has as yet become the property of the Dominion government, and that may be why we would like in the future to have such bridges come under the federal authority so far as Canadian interest in them is concerned. As to the hon. member's second question, I may say that the United States certainly cannot oppose that provision of our law because they have a similar provision in their legislation dealing with international bridges, and, thirdly, I do not see how this could affect our relations because the ownership of these bridges would be a co-ownership between the Canadian government or any Canadian authority which would be designated and the United States government or any other United States authority designated by that government. Instead of lessening friendly relations, I think it should increase them.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Supposing the United States inserted in regard to this bridge exactly the same provisions which we are inserting in this bill, making it subject to orders in council they might pass, how would that affect us? Would that cause an impasse? Why should we be subject to their changes by order in council?

Mr. CANNON: In considering all this legislation, we must not lose sight of the fact that we are dealing with international waters and can legislate only covering the Canadian section, leaving to the United States authorities the duty of legislating in respect to the United States section. The necessity of cooperation in the way of legislation is imposed upon us by the very location of the bridge.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the stock issued under this bill not cover the whole bridge?

Mr. CANNON: No. We are incorporating the Canadian company; but in the act which incorporates the Canadian company there is a provision that the Canadian company may incorporate with a company which will receive its existence from a United States authority, and the two companies being amalgamated or combined, a third company will operate the bridge.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Just before the committee rose I was about to reply to a question in respect to capitalization and profits on the bridge which in my judgment had been more or less imperfectly answered. It is quite true that as far as the Canadian end is concerned, all we can do is to incorporate a company for the purpose of handling one-half the bridge, and the same thing has to be done with respect to the other half in the United States. After that, there can be several ways of handling the matter. In one case it is handled by the two bridge companies meeting together on equal terms; in another case it is handled by a single corporation which gathers together the two bridge companies into a holding company.

As to the question of profits, so that there will be no misunderstanding, if there is one objection I have more than another it is that a bridge of this kind is a very profitable undertaking; there is no doubt about that. The new bridge that was put up at Buffalo has within seven months paid the whole year's expenses of the bridge—its sinking fund, the total interest on its investment, and salaries for the whole year—and shown a profit besides; and the five months left will give them an extra profit. So you can readily understand why a private corporation wants to get a bridge charter. It is for the laudable purpose of making money, and that is largely the ground upon which I am opposed to this bridge. We have made a mistake before, but what has been done cannot be remedied. There are two or three companies now operating and making large profits; I know whereof I speak. One of these companies paid 18 per cent on an enlarged capital, and in addition put aside more money than it paid out. Now I ask the committee if they think that the clause the minister has been discussing is ample in its provisions to protect the people of the country. If these bridge people come here with the idea of giving something away, let us see that what they intend to give reaches us; it is not going to reach us under the clause as it stands. This is the way it will work out under the bill as it is now before us: As the bridge is operated gradually the mortgages and the bonds will be retired. That immediately leaves more money for the stock, more money to be divided amongst the shareholders, who will be scattered all over the country, and they will be paid increasing rates of dividend; no doubt about that. As they get those increasing rates of dividend, because of the bonds and mortgages being retired and there being more money to go to the stock, the price of the stock will rise, and what I am asking the minister to do, if he means what he says, is to put a provision in the bill that at no time will more than 110 be paid for the stock. If he will do that, he will get away from any idea of profiteering on the bridge, and with that proviso I shall be satisfied with that particular clause. But I say frankly I am not satisfied with the bill. The bridge is useless, it is not needed, it is a money-making venture where we have enough bridges on that frontier already.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if those who are favouring this bill can tell me why this bridge is called a memorial bridge.

Mr. PETTIT: It is called a memorial bridge in commemoration of the one hundred years of peace that has existed between the two countries, and also because it was thought the word memorial would be suitable in the jubilee year of confederation. The name is appropriate; that is all.

Mr. IRVINE: Would you consider offering that name to the pons asinorum?

Mr. PETTIT: If that suits you, all right.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We are supposed to be discussing clause 1. The last three speakers have been talking either of clause 19 or of the title. We have been all afternoon on the bill, and have not advanced it at all, and I submit that we never will advance it unless we take it up clause by clause. This policy of discussing in committee of the whole what should have been discussed on the second reading, and discussing the whole bill instead of taking it up clause by clause, has been tried again and again, and invariably in the end the chairman has had to put his foot down and restrict the speakers to the clause under discussion. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point raised by my hon. friend is well taken.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think the point is well taken at all, because the word "memorial" is used in clause 1 which we are now discussing.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that anything will be gained by hurrying. There are several opponents of this bill who wish to speak on the principle, and it is all very well to say that the principle should have been discussed on the second reading, but everybody knows that when a private bill comes up for second reading it is always said, "You have to get the bill before the committee." Well, this bill has been before the committee and has now come back to the house, and this is the only time we have had a chance to discuss it in this house. Do you still declare section 1 carried, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 was declared carried.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the hon. member was on his feet when you called it carried?

The CHAIRMAN: I did not see the hon. member. We have had a pretty general discussion this afternoon, and I think we should proceed with the bill clause by clause.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Powers. Construct bridge across Niagara river, etc.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this is the important section of the bill, for it authorizes the construction of a bridge across the Niagara river. Parliament is exercising its powers to create a company for this purpose because it happens to be an international waterway that is to be spanned; otherwise the matter would be dealt with by the legislature of Ontario. The powers granted to construct the bridge are made subject to legislation to be passed by congress or by the legislature of New York state. It is therefore apparent that this is not an absolute but a conditional power that is being conferred. I observe from the public press that the legislature of the state of New York has recently declined to incorporate this company. I made inquiries and one hon. member told me that this is correct. Therefore we are now placing upon the statute books an act to incorporate a company that is to function conditionally upon the legislature of the state of New York granting similar powers, which, as I say, it has refused to grant.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask if the legislature of New York state gave any reasons for refusing to incorporate the company?

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, they voted the bill down because they considered it to be not in the public interest. My authority for that is what I saw in the public press, and I assume my hon. friend saw it as well. May I direct the attention of the committee to the wording of the section?

—but the company may, in the meantime, acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council, and do all other things authorized by this act.

I ask the committee if it is proper for us to say: although the corporate powers may not be exercised unless and until the legislature of a foreign country passes concurrent legislation with respect to the other end of the bridge, we will empower this company to seek subscriptions from the public and then buy land and do other things. In other words, this company may never be able to build the bridge. To pass such legislation would be to take a course that I have never seen this or any other parliament take.

Let me come to another point. For years the city of Calgary has been trying to induce the Minister of the Interior to grant powers to a local company to operate a power plant at Spray lakes in Banff national park. We were told that this would interfere with the scenic beauties of the national park, which contains several millions of acres of land. Recently regulations were imposed preventing even a prospector from operating any mineral claim within that area—again in order to preserve the scenic beauties. The land that would be affected is far removed from the average traveller who visits the park. Furthermore, an application was recently made by one of the railway companies to acquire a mountain top in the province of British Columbia as a site for bungalow camps. I have a telegram this morning from some friends—the proposal vitally affects the district of Banff, and they are very anxious that these bungalow camps should be permitted—advising me that the deputy minister of the Department of the Interior has been urging the British Columbia authorities not to grant this concession.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is entirely wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear it, because it seems to me that if my information is correct Mr. Cory was exceeding his authority. Shall this parliament, exercising its powers purely as trustees, it being the only authority that can create a company to build this bridge because it is to span an international waterway presumably for the benefit of the people of Canada, but which company cannot come into being unless a foreign power passes concurrent legislation—shall this parliament create such a corporation to traverse public parks and interfere with the scenic beauty of an area that is visible to the whole surrounding community, notwithstanding the opposition of the government of the province of Ontario as well as of the parks commission? It was said this afternoon that the Attorney General of Ontario could not have been very much in earnest because he was given an opportunity to submit another amendment and failed to do so. His answer is obvious, as communicated to me—he could not have anything to do with any such amendment because thereby he would be accepting the principle of this measure to which, on behalf of the province, rightly or wrongly, he is opposed.

It notwithstanding the objection of the province of Ontario we are to create this bridge company, let us at least provide that these powers shall not be exercised in the province without the consent of the provincial government. Is that an unreasonable request to make? My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has for four years refused to grant power rights in the Banff national park because the government of the province of Alberta will not consent. He says, and very properly, that the provincial government in that case must determine the matter, the federal authority exercising its powers simply as trustees. Now, this parliament is enjoying jurisdiction in this matter merely because as I have already said, it happens to be, an international waterway that is to be spanned. That being so, let us exercise our power in such a way at least as will be consistent with the duty that rests upon us with respect to the province in which the bridge is to be built. That duty is to see that since the people of the province do not desire the bridge we should not charter a company to construct it. In other words, the company can derive corporate existence only from this parliament, but the exercise of its corporate powers, conditional as they now are upon concurrent legislation by congress or other competent authority in the United States, should also be subject to the further condition, namely, the consent of the province of Ontario. Does my hon. friend say that this is a precedent to enable him to deal with public lands and parks and grant leave to some to prospect for minerals and to others to exploit water powers in Alberta that he has refused during all these years because the government of that province was not agreeable? Is there anything more than that in this precedent? It does seem to me that we are not dealing merely with the principle of this bill, we are in reality dealing with the principle of any bill from whatever province it may come, as long as the subject matter would be solely within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities were it not for the fact that an international waterway is involved. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should not confer the powers sought by this bill unless and until the provincial authorities give their consent. They are better judges than we of what is in the public interest in this matter with respect to that province; they are better able than we to determine the necessities of the case. Who are we, sitting in Ottawa, dealing with national problems affecting the country as a whole, that we should determine what local interests are involved in that particular province in respect of this question? Not until that province itself has expressed its willingness and give its consent should this act become operative and the powers conferred by it become exercisable. That is the position that should be taken; and any declaration that makes this a work for the general advantage of Canada, made by this parliament under the powers conferred upon it by the British North America Act, is wholly at variance with the general principles which heretofore have governed in matters of this kind. Here we are dealing with a private enterprise which seeks legislative sanction from the parliament of Canada merely because the legislature of the province of Ontario has not the power to grant that sanction. I say therefore that if we give our approval with respect to that incorporation, and confer upon it the right to charge tolls and thereby obtain revenues, we are departing from the established practice; it is not customary for the Dominion government to declare a work such as this to be for the general advantage of Canada. I admit that instances may be found in some of the statutes wherein this is done, but those who have given the subject the most careful consideration are agreed that in these cases the declaration should not have been made. That declaration is made with respect to railways—operated for profit it is true—as well as with respect to other utilities of that sort; but these are under the regulatory power of the railway commission or of some other competent body; and in any case they are enterprises that serve more than one province and touch the borders of more than one section of the Dominion. That is the general situation. There may be exceptional conditions that justify a particular work being declared for the general advantage of Canada, when it is international in character. So far as this matter is concerned, however, it seems to me that the committee should approach the consideration of it with very great care. Apparently the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is of the opinion that this legislation should be enacted; he declared this afternoon that it was not in any sense a government measure. But while that is true it must be borne in mind that no one but the government can take the initative in having it declared that this undertaking is of national significance; without the consent of the federal government no undertaking can be declared for the general advantage of Canada. That is axiomatic with respect to the exercise of the constitutional powers to which I have referred. I need hardly say that I have no interest in the enterprise, but the principle involved is one from which this parliament should not lightly depart. That principle is this: When we are dealing with a matter wholly provincial in its aspects, affecting the people of one province—and the people of Ontario are profoundly affected by this proposed legislation—interfering with the scenic attractions and natural beauties of their park, unless and until that province concurs, these powers should not be exercised. And if it is deemed wise to make the exercise of these powers subject to a condition, namely, that action shall first have been taken by a foreign congress or legislature, much more should we insist that the powers be not exercised unless the people of the province directly affected have given their approval. This is not a political matter, I trust; I trust also that it will not in any sense divide parties, for my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) and my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Pettit) are poles apart in their attitude to the question. Since, however, it has been determined that the power of this parliament shall be exercised—and there is a majority to carry out that determination—let us at least hedge the exercise of that power with such limitations and conditions and such safeguards as will enable us to say that no principle has been departed from and that, to use the language of the United States, the sovereign rights of the people of Ontario have not been sacrificed by this parliament for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. CANNON: In answer to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has said, may I point out that section 7 does not in any way indicate that the legislation enacted by this parliament shall be subject to any legislation that might be introduced either in the American congress or in any state legislature in the United States. That is not the idea. This parliament is supreme within its own competence and can legislate as it sees fit. But not only have we these sovereign powers of legislation; we must exercise them in a practical way. We are now dealing with a proposed international bridge and we can confer powers for the construction only of half of that bridge. We must bear in mind always, therefore, what may be done so far as the other half is concerned; and this being so I think it is only common sense for this parliament to enact a provision that the powers conferred by this legislation shall not be exercised until we know what has been decided by competent authority on the other side, so as to obviate the possible eventuality of a Canada company building one half of a bridge without the other half being constructed by such persons as may receive authority for the purpose from the American congress or from a state legislature.

As regards my hon. friend's argument, that if the state of New York is to be consulted the province of Ontario should also be consulted, I quite agree that, in the first place, this is not a government measure; and secondly, I agree that it is not a political question. But my hon. friend has raised a question of law, and I would point out that the situation on the American side is not the same as that which obtains in Canada, so far as jurisdiction is concerned. The basic principle of our Canadian constitution, as regards the distribution of powers between federal and provincial governments or legislatures, is entirely dissimilar to the principle which governs on the American side. Under the British North America Act, whatever powers have not been expressly given to the provinces belong to the Dominion: on the American side, whatever powers have not been given to the federal government by the states remain in the states. In other words, the residuum of power belongs to this parliament, while in the United States the residuum of power belongs to the states. So that in this matter the state of New York has more extensive powers than has the province of Ontario.

Mr. GEARY: Why?

Mr. CANNON: I explained why. Now, considering the question in the light of this basic principle, can we say that the province of Ontario has any legislative competence in the matter? It seems to me we must come to the conclusion that it has not. If this federal parliament does not legislate to empower the company to build the bridge, the province of Ontario cannot do so. Even if the company applied to the legislature of Ontario, that legislature could take no action. Indeed, even if the province of Ontario itself decided to build the bridge, it would have to come for that purpose to the competent authority, which is this parliament. And this applies not only in international waters; as my hon. friend knows, it applies to interprovincial bridges within Canada. If a company wants to build a bridge between two provinces, neither of those provinces has the power to legislate; the Dominion parliament does so. This principle is not new; it is not unknown in our legislation.

And now as regards the third point raised by my hon. friend, that only this government can declare this work to be in the general interest of Canada. That is an incomplete statement of the law. The government have no such power; as a government they have no legislative power or authority whatever. Under our constitution the government are the executive authority, but the legislative authority is the parliament of Canada, and it is for this house and for the other house to declare if any work is in the public interest of Canada. The government cannot do that.

In conclusion I wish to draw to the attention of my hon. friend the fact that similar acts have been passed already; this is nothing new. My hon. friend stated to the committee that we were establishing a vicious principle, but in very recent years we passed an act for the construction of the Buffalo and Erie bridge, and the province of Ontario was not consulted for the very good reasons which I have just stated. My hon. friend from Toronto has raised one question; he says that what I am saying may be true, but on the other hand have we power as a federal governmet to grant authority for the construction of a bridge on property which belongs to the crown in the right of the province of Ontario?

Mr. GEARY: Who said that?

Mr. BENNETT: The Privy Council decided on that the other day.

Mr. CANNON: The point was raised the other day. The only right of the province of Ontario would be to the extent of the park property on which the bridge would rest on the Canadian side, but with all deference, I submit that that question has been settled by the Privy Council in the Rouyn railway case, and also in the Montreal harbour case, to the effect that the federal parliament has such a power. I cannot see how we are interfering with provincial rights at all.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the Solicitor General if he was referring to me when he spoke of the member for Toronto?

Mr. CANNON: I may be wrong, but I understood my hon. friend to interject a remark about our interfering with provincial property.

Mr. GEARY: Oh, no. If I might, I would explain to the minister the point of my interjection. It was that it carries the matter no further to distinguish between the legislative functions of the provinces and the Dominion on one hand, and of the states and the United States on the other. If the allotment of power in this regard is to the state or to congress, that closes the matter. If it is not alloted to either, the argument of my hon. friend might have some validity, but I do not know that the point arises.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Solicitor General could not have read section 7. This act is not being passed to authorize the construction of a bridge half way over the river. Section 7 says:

> The company may construct. . . a bridge across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars or street cars and for any other like purpose, with all necessary approaches, from a point at or near a point between the property of the Canadian National Railways on River road and the north limit of Bender street in the city of Niagara Falls in the county of Welland in the province of Ontario, to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, north of the present upper steel arch bridge...

Therefore it will be seen that this is not an endeavour to incorporate a company to build a bridge half way across the river, but permission is sought to construct a bridge from a point in Canada to a particular point in the United States. It is also provided as follows:

> ...but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge, nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of Congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving the bridging of the said river, but the company may, in the meantime, acquire the lands, submit their plans to the Governor in Council and do all other things authorized by this act.

Therefore we have seen fit to say that this parliament is not at all concerned with the consent of the province of Ontario, but that the bridge must not be constructed until it is approved by the state of New York or the United States of America. I say that is a wrong principle, the people on the Canadian side have a right to be consulted as to whether or not their land shall be taken for that purpose, just as the people in New York have to determine whether or not land may be used for this purpose on their side of the river.

But let me go a step further. The Solicitor General referred to the fact that this was in no sense a matter in which the government were interested, but we have observed that while in succeeding sections it is provided that the provisions of the Railway Act shall prevail, in section 7 it is provided that the plans shall be submitted to whom? To the railway commission? No, to the governor in council. And who is the governor in council? The governor in council is the government of the day. Clearly, if this act must go into force, these plans should be submitted to the Board of Railway Commissioners, just as the plans of any railway which crosses the boundary are submitted. Why should we make the Railway Act apply in succeeding sections but say here that the governor in council shall approve of the plans, a political body as against the commission? Who would come before a committee of this house and ask for the passing of a bill to create a railway company whose plans were to be approved by the governor in council but whose powers were to be regulated by the Railway Act? What is the reason for this distinction? Why have the governor in council in the one instance and the railway commissioners in the other? It seems reasonably clear to me that if you are going to set up a third power, that power must be the railway commission, which must exercise its authority throughout. You must not make a political body operate in the one instance as against a statutory body in the other. If we are going to pass this statute, at least let us do it as it should be done, making the approval of plans, the determination of routes and matters of that sort, questions to be settled by the railway commission just as though this were a railway.

My main purpose in rising at the moment was to direct attention to the fact that we are authorizing the construction of a bridge going from point to point, from Niagara Falls in one country to Niagara Falls in the other, and that while we have jurisdiction over only half the waterway, we are granting the company power to construct a bridge over the whole distance, although we provide that they can only exercise those powers subject to something else. I submit we should also say that these powers should not be exercised in Ontario unless the people, as represented by the government of this province, are willing and desirous that they should be so exercised. That is the position I desire to make clear.

Mr. CANNON: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that the jurisdiction of this parliament is also territorial.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly is.

Mr. CANNON: And my hon. friend will never contend that we can legislate out of our own territory.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. CANNON: This bill covers the construction of an international bridge. Territorially, our jurisdiction goes to the middle of the river; we must stop there, but we say that that half of the bridge can be built, and that these people cannot exercise their powers until they have received, or until another company has received from the United States authorities, exactly the same powers which we are conferring now upon a Canadian company.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what it says.

Mr. CANNON: When my hon. friend says we are granting power to go on the American side he knows perfectly well that every law passed by this parliament is subject to our territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. GEARY: Perhaps the Solicitor General will tell me if he does not think that under the provisions of the British North America Act this parliament alone has jurisdiction. I understand that to be his contention. If that be the case, why include the subsection which declares that the works of the company are for the general advantage of Canada; is there any doubt at all as to our jurisdiction?

Mr. CANNON: The government did not put that in. Judging from what was said by the sponsor of the bill and those who supported it in committee, this bill has been prepared in accordance with the provisions contained in former bills passed for similar purposes. This bill is practically a copy of the Buffalo and Erie bill which was passed by this house.

Mr. GEARY: I agree that you don't need that clause.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it is clear on looking at the British North America Act, 1867, section 92, subsection 10, that this bill to construct a bridge across an international river must be authorized by act of the parliament of Canada. Section 92 says:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

And then subsection 10:

Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:—
(a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:

Then subclause b. may be omitted because it refers to steamships. Subclause c. says:

Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

It seems to me that c., under which a work is declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada applies only to those works which are not already covered by a. and b., and if this international bridge is covered by a., then c. does not apply, and we should not attempt to exercise the power under c. But referring to a. again, clearly an international bridge comes within its provisions:

Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings. . . extending beyond the limits of the province.

Now this project does extend beyond the limits of the province and it can only be incorporated by the parliament of Canada. Therefore the petitioners have properly applied to this federal parliament for the incorporation of the company. In the second place, the bridge cannot be constructed beyond the centre of the river except by the legislative authority either of the state of New York or of the congress of Uuited States accordingly as it comes within the jurisdiction of one or the other, with which I am not concerned. I know that on the question of navigation the United States congress in recent years contends that it exercises full control. The state of New York on the other hand has propounded a doctrine somewhat different. I do not think it concerns us whether the legislative authority to construct this bridge on the American side of the river comes from the state of New York or from the congress of the United States; but this parliament having been asked to incorporate a company to build a bridge to the centre of the river, the question arises whether the province of Ontario might not well be consulted in the matter. We all know that there were some heartburnings in the province of Quebec in view of the Rouyn railway decision. There is a strong provincial feeling both in Quebec and in Ontario that such matters which intimately concern these provinces should be submitted to their respective legislatures for approval. It does seem to me therefore that the Solicitor General has not quite fairly met the main and pertinent argument of the leader of the opposition, namely, that inasmuch as this bridge and the approaches thereto will affect property owned by the crown in the right of the province of Ontario, passing though its property, destroying the beauty of the approaches, interfering with the design which they have made for a public park, which is well known not only throughout that province but throughout the world, it is a question whether we should not as a matter of comity, as a matter of the consideration which is due to another government and another legislature, insert in the bill a provision that this legislation shall come into force only when approved by the legislature or by the government of the province concerned. The real point made by the leader of the opposition, as I understood it, was whether, as a matter of comity, as a matter of complaisance and good will—as this does affect a property owned by the crown in the right of the province, a public park of great beauty and renown—there should not be consultation between the federal and provincial authorities; and just as I would, coming from Quebec, be disposed to submit that whenever federal legislation affects the rights of that province the legislative or governmental authority of that province should be consulted, so I am disposed to contend that in this case, although we have the power to authorize the promoters to build the bridge right through that park, although we could authorize the construction of approaches to that bridge which would destroy the park—

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend was not here this afternoon and I would refer him to section 19.

Mr. CAHAN: But section 19, when it was under consideration in committee, did not seem to me to be quite broad enough.

Mr. CANNON: Has my hon. friend an amended copy of the bill?

Mr. CAHAN: Does my hon. friend want me to read section 19 of the amended bill? I have it before me.

Mr. CANNON: No.

Mr. CAHAN: It says that the company shall obtain the consent in writing of the commissioners of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls park, but that consent is only for the location, construction or operation of the works mentioned upon or over the boulevard of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park Commission. It is very limited indeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to obtrude my views upon the committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The objection comes from hon. members opposite.

Mr. CAHAN: I was simply trying to obtain a clear view of the situation. I do not think that section 19 is broad enough; and if this parliament were endeavouring to pass such legislation affecting in the same degree the rights and interests of either crown lands or any public lands, especially a public park owned by the crown in the right of the province of Quebec, I should be disposed to demand that the legislature of that province should be asked to sanction the legislation of this parliament. I should be anxious that while we may incorporate this company, while we grant to it all the powers which we can give to it, to build to the centre of the river if you like—I do not object so much to the words "across the river"—nevertheless I would place in the bill a provision that it shall come into force only when approved by the government or by the legislature of the province of Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would my hon. friend not be setting up rather a difficult precedent to overcome?

Mr. CAHAN: It is a precedent that I think we shall eventually have to assert, because, for instance, the Rouyn railway case caused many heartburnings and considerable bitterness in Quebec, and I think it would have been well if the province had been consulted in regard to that matter. It is well that these precedents which the Solicitor General has mentioned, should not be followed in this case.

Mr. CANNON: The province of Ontario was represented before the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. CANNON: We gave their representative this amendment for his consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not come back.

Mr. CANNON: He did not come back and it was understood that, should he have any representations to make on behalf of Ontario he was to make them in order that we could deal with them when the bill would be in committee at this stage. Mr. Henderson never communicated with the chairman or myself or, to my knowledge, with any other member. Not only is that the case, but as to the matter of courtesy that my hon. friend has brought up, the committee realized that they should deal with Ontario as one parliament with another or one government with another. We adjourned the consideration of this bill for a whole week with the understanding that the hon. member for Lincoln was to get in touch with the government of Ontario in order that we might have their representations. I think the committee showed every consideration for the rights of Ontario and the official representative of that province. After he had taken cognizance of section 19 he never made another objection to the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood some objection had been made.

Mr. BENNETT: He was instructed not to go back because he would thereby be recognized aud approving the principle of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood that was the ground, but I trust he was not in any way discourteous to the committee.

Mr. CANNON: Not at all. I do not want to convey that impression. On the contrary he seemed to be quite satisfied.

Mr. CAHAN: But if he did not express his satisfaction; if his ground for not interfering further in regard to an amendment of this kind was that he would thereby be recogniezd as approving the principle of the bill, I could understand that consideration prevailing with him. But I am dealing with the matter now in a broader spirit, as we should deal with it, and I am disposed to think that the province should be consulted.

Mr. PETTIT: I wish to correct a wrong expression that apparently is abroad, namely, that the bill has been killed by the legislature of the state of New York. I have been informed by the Buffalo solicitors who are looking after the bill that that is not the case; that the bill with a number of others has been sent to the rules committee of the legislature. This is their usual method of doing things. The bill is there with those other bills and it will receive consideration in due course. Therefore the rumour that the bill is killed, is, according to my instructions, without foundation.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one fact that has been overlooked in connection with this matter. This is a railway bill under the provisions of the Railway Act, and the word "railway" by subsection 21 of section 2 is defined as follows:

"Railway" means any railway which the company has authority to construct or operate, and includes all branches, extensions, sidings, stations, depots, wharves, rolling stock, equipment, stores, property real or personal and works connected therewith, and also any railway bridge, tunnel or other structure which the company is authorized to construct; and, except where the context is inapplicable, includes street railway and tramway.

It will be observed that the section itself deals with electric cars or street cars, and as the Railway Act provides that the plans must be approved by the board I submit, assuming that you are going to adopt this bill, that the next to the last line of section (1) of section 7, should read:

Submit their plans to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Instead of:

Submit their plans to the governor in council.

The one is a political body, and the body to which the plans should be submitted is clearly the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, if they are to comply with the provisions of the statute in that behalf. The provisions as to how plans and their submission to the board are to be dealt with, will be found in section 167 and following sections of the Railway Act. If we assume that you are going to adopt the principle of leaving out the province of Ontario, clearly the provision with respect to the approval of plans should be by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada and not by the governor in council.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to point out the contradictory nature of the wording of the clause. In one part it says that the company shall do nothing whatever until they receive the consent of the American body, and another part says that they can do everything pending the receipt of that consent. Let me read the language. This is what they shall not do:

The company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge, nor exercise any of the powers hereunder.

"Hereunder" does not mean under the bridge, but under this act. The company could not acquire land under it; nor issue shares—in a word they could do nothing under it at all until they get the consent of the American body. Then the concluding lines read:

But the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and to all other things authorized by this act.

Mr. CAHAN: "Hereunder" may mean under section 7 only.

Mr. NEILL: It applies to the whole act. If that is common sense, I do not know what common sense is.

Mr. BENNETT: I would move that all the words after the word "river" in subsection 1 of section 7, that is the words—

But the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all other things authorized by this act.

—be struck out.

Mr. CANNON: I am not going to raise any point of order as regards the amendment coming from my hon. friend, but it is a well known fact that notice has to be given of any amendment to a private bill. If that rule is not observed, we shall very often be in a difficult position. The committee has studied this bill seriously and we have brought it back in the best possible shape. Unless the rule is observed and we have notice of any amendment before it is presented to the house, members of the committee might not be in as good a position as they would otherwise be to discuss the nature of the amendment and see whether it should be accepted or rejected. I am in no position to-day to express an opinion on it. I examined the bill in conjunction with the members of the committee; we did our very best and brought it back to the house, and if my hon. friend wants to amend it, I think notice should be given.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to know the rule the Solicitor General would cite in support of his contention.

Mr. CANNON: It is a well-known rule.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not so sure of that, because the house frequently amends private bills in committee. We must not raise points of order and establish rules here recklessly on an important matter of this kind. I am quite willing to bow to the rules.

Mr. CANNON: I should like my hon. friend to understand me properly. If the leader of the opposition insists on his amendment, I simply say for the information of the members in general, we should be given notice of these amendments so that we may have time to consider them. We have spent considerable time on this bill in committee.

Mr. NEILL: I would refer to standing order 113, which reads:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole house, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

This could perhaps be called not an important amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It would materially change the subject matter.

Mr. CANNON: That is rule 113, Mr. Chairman, and I think my hon. friend will admit that this amendment, as well as anything coming from him, is a material amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: The sense of the amendment is merely to make this bill consistent. This bill makes the whole exercise of the powers subject to the Railway Act, and it is now proposed to make this particular portion of the bill subject to the governor in council. I say that since we have a bill dependent upon the Railway Act it is an unheard of thing to make part of it subject to the governor in council; it is the first private bill of this character you will find it in that I know of. The old incorporations all referred to the governor in council, but since we passed the new Railway Act that body has been set up for this purpose, and all these powers have been subject to the approval of the board. I do not think this amendment can be regarded as important in the sense in which those words are used in the rule. Certainly if the Solicitor General's point is right, this house becomes a rubber stamp for any private bills that have been considered by the committee unless we give one day's notice of an amendment. In this instance the rule says that one day's notice has to be given in respect of private bills, but this bill was not on the order paper, if my memory serves me, until to-day.

Mr. CANNON: It was on the order paper last Friday.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is correct. I suppose that notice could have been given as to this amendment, but I certainly did not think it was of sufficient importance to necessitate the giving of notice. Its purpose is to make the bill consistent, and I assumed that the law officers would do it when their attention was directed to the matter, as I think they should do.

Mr. CANNON: The reason for the rule is very simple. The house refers a bill to a special committee in order that it may study it and the discussion in the house be shortened when the committee reports back. In order to make sure that only important features of the bill shall be dealt with by amendment, the rule says that notice shall be given, so that we shall know exactly what is coming up. But I do not want to take undue advantage of a rule to prevent my hon. friend from submitting an amendment to the bill if he sees fit. I do not know that his amendment would not be a good one; I am not in a position either to accept or to reject it. It is private legislation, it is true; the government is not responsible for it, but before we amend a clause of this importance I think it would be fair if my hon. friend would agree to the committee reporting progress on the bill, and in the meantime if he wishes to bring in any amendments, we can be given proper notice and have time to study them.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is an exceedingly fair submission, but I did not think the Solicitor General would regard the suggestion I am now making as an important one. I thought he would probably be glad to adopt it. The hon. member for Toronto is probably correct when he suggests to me that the reason why the words "governor in council" are used there is because they were taken from an old bill, the old suspension bridge bill. We all know that the governor in council was the relevant authority before the passing of the Railway Act, but since the passing of that act all these matters are dealt with by the Board of Railway Commissioners and not by the governor in council. Probably that is the explanation. There is no doubt that, according to the rule, as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni has pointed out, notice must be given of an important amendment, but I did not regard this of sufficient importance because I thought that once the Solicitor General's attention had been directed to the fact that there was an inconsistency between the use of the words "Governor in Council" in one section and "Board of Railway Commissioners" in the other, he would be glad to accept the suggestion I made. However, I think the suggestion he now makes as to how to deal with this matter is an eminently reasonable one.

Mr. CANNON: As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to making the change if the sponsor of the bill accepts it. He is the responsible party.

Mr. PETTIT: The words governor in council are used throughout the bill, and if a change is to be made it would have to be made throughout.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite the fact.

Mr. CANNON: I do not see much objection to the plans being submitted to the railway board, if that suits my hon. friend who is sponsoring the bill. On the other hand, I would point out that when an amendment is moved in committee of the whole, the committee does not accept or reject the amendment, but it is moved in such a form that the bill is referred back to the select standing committee for consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: Usually the motion is to refer it back to the select standing committee for the purpose of considering a certain amendment.

Mr. PETTIT: I would suggest that the wording remain as it is, as the words governor in council are used throughout the bill. It would complicate matters if this change were made in just one clause. The construction of the bridge, its location, and the terms, provisions and regulations are all made subject to the approval of the governor in council. As sponsor of the bill I would therefore respectfully suggest that the wording remain as it is. There would be no harm done in leaving it that way.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. leader of the opposition pressing his amendment?

Mr. BENNETT: The position is this. If the Solicitor General thinks this is an important amendment within the meaning of the rule, he is entitled undoubtedly to a day's notice. If this parliament has any powers at all, it must have powers to amend legislation in some form or another. I am serious as to the necessity of this amendment, because it deals with a matter of the utmost importance, having regard to the provisions upon which the Solicitor General has laid so much emphasis. There are other amendments in the same position. I do not conceive it to be inconsistent with my duty in the public interest to point out that this bill refers to the governor in council, a reference which has been antiquated for thirty years; since the passing of the Railway Act the words have always been "Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada." As was suggested the other evening, this bill should probably have gone to the railway committee, as I moved, but it was pressed that it should go to the private bills committee, although Mr. Todd thought probably it should go to both the railway committee and the private bills committee. It seems to me the proper motion now would be to refer the bill back for further consideration by the railway committee, which should have considered it perhaps in the first instance, as the Minister of Railways felt at the moment. Therefore, in order to obviate any further discussion, I would move that the bill be referred back for consideration by the railway committee in order that the point may be considered by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. NEILL: I submit that that motion is out of order. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has referred to the practice that the motion should be to refer the bill back to the committee for the purpose of having them do so-and-so, but that form of words is applicable only on the third reading of the bill. You cannot make such an amendment in committee of the whole. How can you move in committee to refer the bill to another committee? That can only be done on the third reading or on consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: We can ask that the committee rise and report progress, and that the bill be referred back for further consideration by the railway committee, it having not yet been considered by that committee. I quite agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that on the third reading of the bill, if we desired to amend it, we would have to move that the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be "referred back to the committee for the purpose of adding thereto the following words"; but it is also the custom to move amendments to a bill during its progress through committee of the whole. This bill really should have gone to the railway committee. Mr. Todd in his letter to the Speaker referred to the fact that the bill might properly go to both committees. It went to the private bills committee. That committee reported the bill back here, and it is now being considered by a committee of the whole house. During the discussion here a question arises that affects the application of the Railway Act, indicating clearly that the bill should go to the railway committee. It is very important in that sense because the word "railway" is defined in the Railway Act to mean an electrical car or tramway line. Therefore, if my position in respect to the amendment is correct, the bill itself should be considered also by the railway committee. I submit the committee should rise and report progress for the purpose of enabling the Solicitor General to consider other amendments of the same category which certainly will be made during the progress of the bill through committee.

Mr. CANNON: The point of order is well taken. No amendment to this bill can be made unless previous notice has been given.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true, if the amendment is important.

Mr. CANNON: The suggestion I make is that we should report progress. But there will be no question of referring the bill to a committee; and from this day until the bill is considered again it will be the duty of anyone who wishes to amend the bill to give proper notice of any amendments.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite right.

Progress reported.

ST. CLAIR TRANSIT COMPANY

Mr. W. T. GOODISON (West Lambton) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 23 to incorporate the St. Clair Transit Company:

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the same features arise in this bill as in the other measure that we have been discussing, but no doubt the Solicitor General can tell us. If similar features do arise, the two bills should be considered together.

Mr. CANNON: I do not admit for one moment that the bill which we were considering a minute ago should have gone to the railway committee instead of the private bills committee. My learned friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made a rather laboured argument that because electric tramways are mentioned in the Railway Act the bill should go before the railway committee. But to determine the character of a bill we must consider its main features. Electric lines are only incidental; the fundamental element of the two bills, and of this one in particular, is the construction of a bridge. I think the private bills committee had a perfect right to consider this and the preceding bill.

Mr. STEVENS: The Solicitor General will notice that this bill confers the expropriation powers contained in the Railway Act.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: In fact that portion of the Railway Act is incorporated in this bill.

Mr. CANNON: A company or an individual comes before parliament for private legislation; if either wants to be under general legislation a private bill is unnecessary. It is only in cases when exceptional legislation is required that we have a bill of this kind before us. So when, for instance, we confer on a private corporation the right to expropriate, we immediately give a right which belongs really only to a public body. In this particular case expropriation powers are given because we consider that the building of a bridge is in the public interest, and in order to confer those powers we have to refer to the existing law, that is, to the Railway Act; but that reference by no means brings the bill within the Railway Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the Solicitor General presume to say that either or both of these companies could have proceeded with the work under a charter obtained by virtue of the Joint Stock Companies Act?

Mr. CANNON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: His whole argument amounted to that, or it amounted to nothing. He said the promoters desire a special charter, but that they could have had a charter under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

An hon. MEMBER: Under the general law.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend misunderstands. I said that if they could have done what they were seeking under the general law they would not apply for a charter; it is because under the general law they cannot proceed that they apply for private legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: That is precisely my argument, that these companies have to come under the Railway Act to a certain extent.

Mr. CANNON: If they wish to expropriate.

Mr. STEVENS: How are they going to expropriate footings for their bridge? They must have powers of expropriation under the Railway Act.

Mr. CANNON: No, they get their expropriation power under this act, not under the Railway Act. In exercising that particular power of expropriation granted for a special purpose they have to follow the clauses of the general act. That is the law.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the Solicitor General tell me what general law they could have come under without getting a special bill enacted?

Mr. CANNON: I am sorry my hon. friend does not grasp my argument.

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing to grasp.

Mr. CANNON: I am glad to argue with those who are prepared to conduct discussion in a gentlemanly way. Throughout the day I have done my very best to answer arguments intelligently, but if my hon. friend wishes to bully anybody I decline to be bullied.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is himself trying to bully. A moment ago I asked the Solicitor General, as the law adviser of the crown, what general act the promoters of this bill could come under in order to exercise the powers they are now seeking. He pointed out that the company chose to apply for a special bill. I submit that inasmuch as this bill invokes important portions of the Railway Act it should have gone to the railway committee. He has not answered that argument in the slightest degree. I think this bill is in exactly the same position as the preceding bill, and should stand with it until we have had time to examine the various sections and give notice of any amendments which we may consider necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: Without in any way entering into the merits of the question I would point out that this bill, which does not appear to be contentious, has been, rightly or wrongly, before one of the responsible committees of the house. I presume that the interested parties—I know nothing at all about them—have gone to the expense and trouble of appearing before that committee in order to make out their case, and apparently the bill has come back to the committee of the whole house in the usual course. Now inasmuch as the private bills committee is, to say the least, equally as competent as this committee to deal with a matter of this sort, would it not be dealing more fairly with the parties concerned to allow matters to proceed at this stage? I felt, as the leader of the opposition felt when these bills first came before the house, that they might more properly have gone to the railway committee. I understand that the clerk of committees, who is a student of these matters, gives the opinion that the bills in question could properly have gone to either or both of these committees. Why, then, should we put the interested parties to the trouble of appearing again before another committee of the house, no more representative—

Mr. STEVENS: That is not my motion.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood my hon. friend wished to have the bill referred to the railway committee.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. STEVENS: No; I simply wanted to have the same procedure adopted as was followed in connection with the previous bill. We contend that the bill should originally have gone to the other committee, but let that go. I notice in clause 8 of the present bill that there arises the same question we have been debating under clause 7 of the last bill. Provision is made for vehicular traffic, street railways, and so forth. Our contention is that in this clause as well as in some of the others reference should be made to the railway board rather than to the governor in council. It is a rather important principle. I say, therefore, that in order to prepare the necessary amendments and to give due notice of them the committee should rise and report progress. That procedure was followed in regard to the previous bill and it should be done in this instance also. We shall only reach the point where the committee will be arguing on the very same question we have already decided. I move therefore that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. CANNON: I suggest that we consider the various clauses of the bill until we come to one in connection with which some hon. member will indicate his readiness to move an amendment. Suppose we adopted my hon. friend's suggestion and had no notice of any amendment: what would be the position then? Let us proceed until we have a statement from some hon. member that he wishes to move an amendment to a particular clause.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no objection to that course. I simply wanted to be consistent and have the committee follow the same procedure which was adopted in relation to the other bill. We can pass some of these clauses if the committee so desires, although I notice that the very next one or so refers to works and undertakings which are to be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. Under that clause the same question arises.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Capital stock.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a clause that should be very carefully considered. Any man familiar with the corporate structure of these enterprises will realize that for the first time in a bill of this character we have capital stock without nominal or par value, and the question suggests itself—on payment of what sum may the company commence operations?

Both the Companies' Act and the Railway Act are clear on this point. This section as at present drafted declares only that there shall be 100,000 shares of no par value. Each share, however, shall be of the same value, the issue and allotment of the shares to be made from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed by the board of directors, by by-law or resolution duly confirmed, which permits the issue of the whole of the common stock for services rendered in getting this charter. Now that is precisely the one thing which this parliament is endeavouring to stop, and I do think that the law officers of the crown failed to look into the full implications of the section; otherwise they would not have submitted it in its present form. I would certainly prepare an amendment covering this point. Even the Companies' Act itself, when shares are without nominal or par value, provides that the Secretary of State shall insist that a value be given the shares, for the purpose of fees, of not less than so many dollars per share. This section however, permits the whole capital stock to be issued for services rendered in getting the franchise. What we are asked to do in this bill is to create an entity, a transit company; in the second place we are granting it powers; and, thirdly, we are conferring upon the company a franchise which may or may not be valuable, and in regard to which I express no opinion at the moment. But to make the franchise valuable tolls may be imposed, and these tolls are to be approved by the governor in council. I would point out—and the Minister of Railways will bear me out—that nothing is so impossible of realization as the satisfactory exercise of these powers by a body like the governor in council, which has no machinery for the purpose. The proper body for the discharge of such functions is of course the Board of Railway Commissioners, whose business it is to deal with matters of this kind, and who have the necessary machinery as well as experts who may advise them.

It is important, in dealing with this question, that due regard be had to the actual money investment of the enterprise. A few years hence someone may come from Sarnia —if we build this bridge—and complain that tolls are too high. Thereupon people owning 100,000 shares will come forward and say, "These shares cost us an enormous sum of money, and parliament having recognized that fact, you must not interfere with vested interests and deprive us of dividends to which we are entitled in view of the price we paid." Now, I say, is the time to anticipate any difficulties of this nature. Now is the time to declare that these shares without any nominal or par value shall have affixed to them, for purposes of the statute, a value of not less than so much per share. The Solicitor General makes provision whereby, on the retirement of the shares, the works created under the authority of the statute fall into possession of the people—of the United States with respect to the American half of the undertaking, and of Canada so far as the other half is concerned. It becomes, therefore, a matter of transcendent importance that we do not deal with watered stock, lest my hon. friends from the west and from other sections of the country as well, say afterwards that what we have done is to give legislative sanction and authority to something which has created a vested interest that must be protected. I know that the Solicitor General is anxious to serve the public interest in this matter and I suggest to him, therefore, that the clause as it now stands is open to the gravest abuse, namely, the issue of the whole capital stock of the enterprise for the purpose of obtaining the franchise. That is exactly what will happen: it has happened times without number in this country. I could show my hon. friends statutes of that kind. As my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Glenn) knows, the common stock of an enterprise is often issued to the promoters, while the mortgage money builds the enterprise. Let us deal with this matter while we may and not when it is too late. That is my suggestion; and coupled with that I say in all seriousness to the government that it is a very grave matter, especially to the Minister of Railways, to enact that tolls shall be approved by the governor in council, a body which is without the proper machinery and without those who can give expert advice. Suppose the governor in council is suddenly called upon to decide some question of tolls. The government is faced with a political question and under the pressure that comes from political friends, who say, "This is our bill; this is our enterprise, and we want you to give us a square deal in relation to it." Then they suggest the results which will follow from it; "We will be able to assist you and support you; we want your assistance in getting this done." That is but the evidence of human nature as applied to ordinary politics, one party or the other. I am not saying this in particular to my hon. friends yonder; I refer simply to the government of the day. For the moment at least let us leave it at something better than that and say that the Board of Railway Commissioners, whether or not we have confidence in them, shall deal with the question of tolls and all these questions incident to the development of a transportation enterprise, whether it be a bridge across a stream or railway which spans a continent. I submit that is the position this house should take, and for my part I propose to express myself in any way within my power and to offer the house such amendments as may be necessary to achieve that purpose. I ask the Solicitor General now to accept the motion that this committee rise and report progress, in order that he may consider the matters upon which I have just touched and that when the amendments are submitted he will have a clear understanding of the reasons in the back of my mind at least for making these suggestions.

Mr. CANNON: I agree with pleasure to the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with bills of this character which in previous sessions have been submitted to the committee on railways and canals, very frequently the committee have included a provision giving control of the rates or tolls to be charged to the Board of Railway Commissioners, taking cognizance of the fact that that board have the necessary machinery with which to determine such matters. I should like to point out to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that there are other matters in connection with this bill the control of which in the nature of things must be vested in the governor in council and not in the Board of Railway Commissioners. I have reference particularly to those features of the bill which deal with its relation to navigable waters; and there may be other such matters. I have only just read the bill for the first time, but in addition to the matter of tolls there is this other complication which has been many times discussed in the committee. It is that after all, whether it be the governor in council or the Board of Railway Commissioners, the decision as to the tolls to be charged cannot rest entirely with any authority in this country; whatever competent authority may deal with the matter in the United States will have to agree also as to the rates to be charged, because a man does not pay a toll to go half way across the bridge in either direction. He pays a toll to go completely across, and there must be some measure of agreement. In studies of these matters on previous occasions before the railway committee it has appeared that there are a variety of authorities in the United States dealing with them, dependent to some extent upon the state in which the United States part of the enterprise is located.

Mr. BENNETT: Or whether authority is vested in congress or in the state legislature.

Mr. DUNNING: Precisely. It is not an easy matter, and I can hardly approve of loading up the railway commission with matters with which it is not equipped to deal either by its constitution or by its organization. In matters of tolls generally, however, we have taken the view in the past that the railway commission is the most competent authority to decide such matters. I might point out that in all the bills which have been passed heretofore in many previous sessions, and which contained the provision that the governor in council shall decide upon certain matters, it has been the practice of the governor in council under all preceding governments—I do not know that such a case has arisen under the present administration—to refer matters affecting tolls to the body which is at the disposal of the government for determination. That is, although the governor in council has the power, it instructs the Board of Railway Commissioners to make a report as to what is desirable. So I do not know that there is any very important point involved, although conceivably it might be best to place the matter directly in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

There was one argument made in a previous session in favour of retaining the governor in council as the final authority—I submit it to the house for what it is worth—namely, that the Board of Railway Commissioners in making a decision has no authority to take into account considerations other than those dealt with in the Railway Act; it has no power to make an agreement with a foreign body. The governor in council, of course, has authority to take into account considerations having to do with what the competent body in the foreign country may have decided with respect to the same matter.

Mr. CAHAN: Could not the railway board do that also?

Mr. DUNNING: I am at a slight disadvantage as compared with the learned gentlemen on both sides of the house in a matter of this sort, but I am instructed that under the Railway Act the Board of Railway Commissioners cannot agree with another body, but must reach their conclusions based upon the authority which is theirs under that act.

Mr. CAHAN: Probably so, but taking into consideration the findings of any foreign railway commission or other authority. That is certainly a matter which would be presented to the Canadian railway board for its consideration as one of the important factors in the case.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am very glad indeed to hear what the Minister of Railways has had to say; I am glad to know that there is a possibility that the tolls of these other bridge companies may come before the railway commission. In all these charters we have been discussing—not particularly in respect to this bill because it is a new one—there are provisions to which I have formerly called the attention of the Solicitor General, that these tolls are to be reviewed and approved by the governor in council. I have not very much confidence in that part of the government; that is so vague and indefinite. For thirty years tolls have been collected which have never come before the governor in council, and I am very glad indeed, knowing what I do about the matter, to have the chance of getting those tolls before a commission which is alive, rather than before a dead one.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want my hon. friend to misunderstand what I said; I spoke with no heat at all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Neither did I.

Mr. DUNNING: I was simply discussing the practical aspects of the situation. In connection with those old charters, I presume if any party considered himself aggrieved by the tolls which might have been approved thirty years ago and never amended—

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no record that they were ever approved.

Mr. DUNNING: Any person feeling himself aggrieved could find out by reference to the charter what was the controlling body, and it would then be necessary only to apply to any minister of the crown, or to the Prime Minister as president of the council, for consideration of any complaint.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the hon. gentleman had been following the debate he would have known that 12,000 people on one side of the river and 24,000 people on the other side are complaining about these rates. Surely something about it must have leaked through to some of the members of the government.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean to say that in the important position which he occupies on the parks commission he did not know there was an appeal to the governor in council in connection with these rates?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I was asked that question before, and my answer then was that we have tried to mind our own business. It was none of our concern.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend represents those people.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not. I am a park commissioner, and we have nothing to do with that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. The leader of the opposition made a motion some time ago, which is not debatable, that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bill No. 68, to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. BROWN: This is a bill to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church, and its purpose is set forth in the preamble. It is simply to grant to this body the usual powers that are granted to all such bodies, to transact the temporal business that is connected with any of the churches.

Motion agreed to.

HUNTER INQUIRY

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What was the total cost of the Hunter inquiry?
2. What is the total amount of money paid or to be paid to Mr. A. T. Hunter?
3. What is the total amount of money paid or to be paid to Mr. A. McGregor?

Mr. KING (Kootenay):

VANCOUVER ELEVATORS

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Does a physical connection exist between No. 1 government elevator at Vancouver and the Spillers' terminal elevator?
2. If so, was this connection put in with the knowledge and consent of the board of grain commissioners?

Mr. MALCOLM:

1. No physical connection exists between No. 1 government elevator at Vancouver and the Spillers' terminal elevator for the purpose of transferring grain from one elevator to the other.

2. On the advice of the board's chief weighmaster, the board approved of a tunnel being built through Spillers' elevator work-house to enable grain to be shipped from No. 1 elevator to No. 1 jetty at the east side of the Spillers' elevator. While grain can be shipped on the belt through this tunnel, it is impossible to load any of that grain into Spillers' elevator (which is now being operated by the Pacific Terminal Grain Co., Ltd.). Grain can also be shipped through this tunnel on another belt from the Spillers' elevator to boats at No. 1 jetty, and consequently, the board does not consider the facilities provided for these two elevators as being a physical connection for the purpose of allowing one elevator to transfer grain to another. This tunnel was built only for the purpose of facilitating despatch in loading without the necessity of moving vessels from one side of the pier to the other.

SALARIES OF POSTAL CLERKS

Mr. ROBINSON:

1. Has the hon. the Postmaster General recommended that the salaries of postal clerks should be increased to a maximum of $1,800?

2. Has such recommendation been referred to a sub-committee of the cabinet?

3. Has such sub-committee made a report?

4. If not, will report be made in time to enable the matter to be dealt with at the present session of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this question asks first of all whether the Postmaster General has made a recommendation for certain increases in salary. It also asks whether the recommendation has been referred to a subcommittee of the cabinet, if the subcommittee has made a report, and so on. It is not customary for the proceedings of the cabinet to be divulged, and I think a question of the kind is out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the first part of the question is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question will have to be redrafted.

UNCLAIMED BANK BALANCES—DISPOSITION

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What is the amount in the aggregate of unclaimed balances in the chartered banks of the Dominion of Canada as at the 31st December, 1927?
2. What was the disposition of these funds?

Mr. ROBB:

1. Unclaimed amounts, as reported under section 114 of the Bank Act as of 31st December, 1927, were $2,756,745.83.
2. They remain with and a liability of the banks until claimed and paid.

SUPERANNUATION FUNDS—POSITION OF DEPENDANTS

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo-South):

1. Are the dependent sisters of a collector of customs who paid into the superannuation fund for a period of thirty-five years, up to the time of his death, entitled to a pension?
2. If not, can they recover moneys which have been paid into the superannuation fund?

Mr. ROBB:

1. No.
2. With reference to the Civil Service Superannuation Act (Cap. 24, R.S. 1927) such dependants would, on the death of the contributor while in the civil service, be within the class of persons to whom the governor in council may grant an amount not exceeding the amount of the contributions made by the contributor.

There are still contributors to the superannuation fund established under Part I of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, (Cap. 17, R.S. 1906), who did not elect to become contributors under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. There is no provision under the former Act for paying to the dependants of a contributor any portion of his contributions.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

POSITION ON ORDER PAPER OF MOTIONS AFFECTED BY CLOSING RULE

On the order: "Public Bills and Orders."

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It is with reference to the transference of the notice of motion given by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), discussed at last Wednesday's sitting, from Notices of Motion to Public Bills and Orders. I have always felt since I have been in this house that the rule laid down in regard to Wednesdays has not been observed in practice; at least it seems to me that the practice has not been in harmony with the rule. Now standing order No. 27 reads thus:

If at the hour of six o'clock p.m. on a Wednesday, or at the time of the adjournment of the house, a motion on the notice paper be under consideration, that question shall stand first on the order paper of the following day, next after orders to which a special precedence has been assigned by rule or order of the house.

It seems to me perfectly clear that under that rule the motions we were discussing last Wednesday evening when the house adjourned should be first in order of discussion as soon as we reached that particular order of business. I will read further from the rules:

229. It is more favourable to the progress of a motion on the order paper that the debate should not be adjourned on Wednesday at six o'clock, because the motion shall then stand on the order paper for the next day as stated in this rule; if debate is adjourned, the motion goes to the foot of the orders.

Last Wednesday the debate was not formally adjourned. The house simply rose during the discussion. If we read article 230, we see further:

This rule seems to apply to Wednesday only, the words "or at the time of the adjournment of the house" referring to that day, according to the interpretation given by Bourinot, 3rd edition, pp. 336-337. Its purpose is to keep the motion on the order paper though on Wednesday the house may rise without debate being adjourned because at six o'clock on that day the Speaker adjourns the house without question put. On other days, if debate is not adjourned the question is superseded.

It seems to me that under that rule, where the house adjourns without the debate being adjourned, we would naturally take up the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse. There is another reference to the same matter on page 21, section 63, which again deals with the subject as follows:

Bills occupy a more favourable position than motions, which, if the debate is adjourned on Wednesday at six o'clock, go to the foot of the orders. Consequently, it is more favourable to the progress of a motion on the notice paper that the debate should not be adjourned on Wednesday at six o'clock.

The house will notice that at the foot of article 230, it reads:

On other days, if debate is not adjourned the question is superseded.

Therefore it seems that for those who wish to have their motions given full consideration the proper course is that on Wednesday the debate should not be adjourned, while on other days formal adjournment of the debate would appear to be necessary in order that the motion may occupy its proper place on the order paper. That is the only conclusion I can come to from reading these rules. I raise the point of order, therefore, and hold that the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse should now be the subject of consideration by this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. gentleman wish to speak to the point of order? The hon. member for Lisgar claims that under this rule the subject of discussion now should be the motion made last Wednesday by the hon. member for Bellechasse, the debate on which was not adjourned. But standing order 27 reads:

If at the hour of six o'clock p.m. on a Wednesday, or at the time of the adjournment of the house, a motion on the notice paper—

Such as was the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

—be under consideration, that question shall stand first on the order paper of the following day, next after orders to which a special precedence has been assigned by rule or order of the house.

The hon. gentleman will see that on the order paper for to-day the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg is under notices of motions, whilst that of the hon. member for Bellechasse is under public bills and orders. So this is literally the application of the rule, which reads:

—that question shall stand first on the order paper of the following day, next after orders.

That is, public bills and orders, not notices of motion. I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. BROWN: I may be wrong on that point. I must of course yield to the ruling of the Speaker, but I understood that this referred to the programs that were laid down in chapter 2, business of the house:

Monday (Private member's day).
Tuesday (Government day).
Wednesday (Private member's day).

My understanding was that as soon as we came to notices of motion, for instance, we would take up under that order on Wednesday the particular item that we were dealing with when we were at that order before.

Mr. SPEAKER: On Wednesday the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse stood first under notices of motion. It was debated and it was continued at six o'clock without any adjournment. Standing order 27 says that in that case it passes automatically to orders, that is to say, public bills and orders, not to notices of motion; and automatically the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg comes first under notices of motion. His motion was second last Wednesday.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, to complete your explanation would you be kind enough to explain how it is that the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg is under notices of motion at all and not under public bills and orders like that of the hon. member for Bellechasse?

Mr. SPEAKER: It did not come up on a Wednesday.

Mr. HEAPS: I suppose the reason why I continue to-night is because my motion came up on a Thursday?

Mr. SPEAKER: Exactly.

UNEMPLOYMENT, SICKNESS AND INVALIDITY INSURANCE

The house resumed from February 16, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Heaps:

That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, the motion which is before us this evening is one that was before the house last year, and on that occasion I was pleased with the favourable reception the motion received from members on both sides of the house. Most of the members on the Liberal side were favourable to it, and I was also pleased to see that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) spoke in favour of the principles underlying my resolution.

It is rather difficult for any member, or indeed anyone else, to obtain exact data pertaining to the amount of unemployment throughout the Dominion. The Dominion government publish no figures which give anyone a reliable guide as to how much unemployment there really is. In 1926 certain persons endeavoured to make a calculation and they arrived at the conclusion that in the month of December of that year approximately 75,000 people were out of work in the Dominion. This is about the only data that is of value for any one to base an opinion on. The Dominion employment offices throughout Canada have no figures of any value in regard to unemployment.

It has been argued by hon. members as well as by others outside of this house that the question of unemployment is one that should be left entirely to the provinces and the municipalities. I do not agree with that particular viewpoint. I believe unemployment is a problem that ought to be faced by the Dominion government. In this house we deal with and pass legislation that has a direct bearing upon this all-important question. We deal with tariffs, immigration matters, trade treaties, foreign policies, banking laws, and all these I claim affects the volume of employment or unemployment in this country. In our particular legislation that applies to labour, I claim there ought to be some uniformity of action as well as uniformity of legislation. If we allowed the provinces to deal with the problem of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity, I presume we would have the same conditions as we have in regard to workmen's compensations acts, mothers' allowances, and so on. We have the spectacle at the present time of a woman living in the province of Quebec, in the city of Hull, let us say, coming across to Ontario and living in Ottawa in order to benefit by certain legislation passed by the Ontario government which is not in effect in the province of Quebec. That merely goes to show the necessity for having uniform legislation in all parts of Canada.

For about four weeks, during the course of the budget debate, hon. gentlemen were discussing the question of unemployment as well as the volume of employment in the Dominion of Canada, and after that debate I do not think that anyone will claim that there is no large volume of unemployment. While hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party claimed that there was a large unemployment problem in Canada, hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party claimed that Canada was in the most prosperous condition since confederation. On the Liberal side they could see nothing but prosperity; on the Conservative side they could see almost nothing but unemployment. While the two viewpoints may appear to be contradictory, I claim that in both there is an element of truth. I claim that we have a large unemployment problem to deal with, and that at the same time there is a good deal of prosperity in this Dominion. What is the cause of this seeming contradiction?

In the year 1917 we had 120,695 more people employed in industry than we had in the year 1924, yet the volume of production was actually greater in 1924 than in 1917. At the same time, in that same period of eight years from 1917 to 1924 inclusive, we had an increased efficiency in individual production of 28 per cent. Taking the year 1910, as compared with the year 1927, we find this remarkable fact: In 1927, which was a record year so far as employment was concerned, about 20 per cent more people were employed in industry than in 1910, but during that same period production had increased almost three times.

Mr. WHITE (London): Are the hon. gentleman's figures based on the value of production or on units of production?

Mr. HEAPS: The volume of production.

Mr. WHITE (London): Units of production, or the value in dollars and cents?

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: On the volume as given by the Bureau of Statistics. You might call that units, if you wish, but I believe the Bureau of Statistics calls it the volume of production. During that period from 1910 to 1927 the production increased almost three times, whereas the number of people employed in industry increased about 20 per cent. In these figures I think you will find one of the main reasons for the unemployment at present existing in the Dominion. We in the Labour movement have no objection to the employment of improved machinery for productive purposes, but what we do object to is that this improved machinery, which ought to bring greater happiness and contentment to the people, does not have that effect. The more labour-saving devices that are introduced into the factories and the greater the volume of production, the greater ought to be the happiness of the people, but what we find is that labour is being displaced, and a greater amount of poverty prevails in the Dominion. At the same time we find on the other hand a greater amount of prosperity. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) said at the time he introduced his budget, the financiers and industrialists in this country claim that prosperity was never greater in Canada than it is at the present time. That was true so far as the financiers and industrialists were concerned; they were really prosperous, but the reason for their prosperity was quite obvious.

If you take the latest figures published by the Bureau of Statistics as to the amount of wages paid to labour, you will find that the amount paid in the year 1924 was approximately the same as in 1917, or to put it in another way, the whole of the benefit of that increased efficiency of the workers in industry went to the industrialists or financiers and practically none of it to the employee; in fact, he is so much the worse off, because he is receiving to-day less for that which he himself produces.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to standing order 37, which deals with the forty-minute rule, and I would ask you to give a literal interpretation of that rule. I think you will find something in that rule to the effect that a member shall speak "for forty minutes at any time".

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not suppose the hon. gentleman is serious in raising that point.

Mr. HEAPS: I will give you my reasons, Sir, if you will allow me to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I think you ruled upon one occasion in regard to the forty-minute rule that you would allow a speaker the time that was taken up by interruptions. Upon another occasion you stated that you would have to take the rule as it was, and that no time would be allowed for interruptions. I am going to ask you to rule the same way in my case. I claim that under the rule a member is allowed to speak for forty minutes from the time he commences to speak, and I think that a proper interpretation of rule 37 would give an hon. member a full forty minutes without any interruption whatever. I was interrupted for four weeks.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman commenced to speak on his motion several days ago, and spoke for a certain length of time. The time he took upon that occasion added to the time he took this evening has consumed his forty minutes, and I might add that I was very liberal this evening; I did not call time exactly at the hour—I did not exact the pound of flesh from the hon. gentleman. The rule is clear. On any given subject an hon. member has the right to speak for forty minutes and no more, whether he takes his forty minutes at one sitting or divides it into two periods.

Mr. HEAPS: Will you kindly read the rule, Mr. Speaker? I have not it here.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house can read it. It is standing order 37, which says:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "No confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

The last words "in any debate" govern the forty minutes. The hon. gentleman spoke twenty minutes the other day and twenty minutes to-night in this debate. Twenty and twenty make forty.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni). Mr. Speaker, the rules nowadays are a wonderful grab bag into which we reach with no certainty of what awaits us there. I intend to support this motion, as I did last year, to the fullest extent of my ability, more particularly that section of it which deals with unemployment insurance, because I presume it is well known that health insurance is entirely a provincial matter. Indeed, in British Columbia, which is always in the forefront with social legislation of this character, we are already moving in this direction.

It may not appear to be a very auspicious moment for the labour members to ask the government to accept a resolution of this sort, following up the hint dropped by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) the other day as to how a vote on the budget might influence certain actions of the government. But I give the administration credit for bigger vision than to visit on the general labour people of this country any particular action of the labour party in this house which might perhaps be ascribed to a merely temporary idiosyncrasy on their part. Besides, I would remind the government that there are many members on both sides of the house largely elected by labour, although we are not classified as labour members; and those who sent us here, and we ourselves, would be very much disappointed if the government did not give their consent to this resolution. After all, we are only asking that this be referred to a committee for investigation. I would also remind the government that by virtue of the treaty of Versailles and the Washington agreement, we as a nation are bound to initiate legislation of this character, and that when we signed those documents with all the status of a nation we at the same time accepted certain obligations to carry out what we had put our signature to.

The objection which most immediately suggests itself to the average man when the question of unemployment insurance is mentioned, in fact I think the only objection that immediately comes to the forefront, is that of expense. There is a popular idea that the general public of Canada, or of any other nation, do not pay for the cost of unemployment. It is a peculiar trait of human nature that we are willing to pay large sums provided they are camouflaged. We will pay, without much complaint, heavy taxes in the shape of customs duties and excise taxes. For instance, we will pay $30 tax on three gallons of whiskey, yet we object strenuously to paying $30 for income tax. We see the same trait apparent in a ladies aid society. Ladies will work all day in a hot kitchen cooking food, take it to a church social, and then pay for the privilege of eating it, when they would not give the worth of their contribution in a cash subscription. So I submit it is a mere figure of speech to say that we do not pay for unemployment; we pay in a thousand ways. In the first place, in the actual relief paid out. I do not know what the situation to-day is, but quite recently in the city of Vancouver, which is not a very big city as cities go, they were paying out relief at the rate of a thousand dollars a day, much of it at the rate of $1 per day per man. That is when Canada is supposed to be prosperous. Do any of us think that a man getting a dollar a day is a very desirable citizen from the point of view of the manufacturer and the producer of food? His expenses under those conditions will be cut to the very minimum; in other words, his purchasing power is lessened to that extent.

As a fair example take a mechanic earning good wages in the city and supporting a wife and two or three children. He owns a house that he has not yet entirely paid for. Depression strikes the industry in which he is engaged and he is laid off. The first thing he does is to cut his expenditure on luxuries, and thereby he increases unemployment because he lessens the demand for manufactured goods, and to that extent slows down the wheels of industry, thereby causing more unemployment. If he cannot get work at his own particular trade he will break into some other branch of work, which generally means the casual labour market, thereby aggravating the condition because there is no more work in that market than before. Consequently he has to steal or share some other man's work, which generally means lower wages for both of them, and further decreases their purchasing power. Then he begins to form the bad habit of contracting debts and not paying them. I am talking of the good type of working man, not the professional bilk. It is wonderful how the habit of accumulating bad debts grows on one. Who pays the bad debts? Surely it cannot be denied that the general public shoulders the burden. Every man in business knows that an annual amount is set aside for bad debts just the same as for taxes, insurance, or any other expense. So let it be understood that the public pays absolutely for bad debts contracted owing to unemployment. As this man gets down the scale he loses his house because he cannot keep up his payments on it. This forces him into the slum district, and with poor food and inadequate clothing, ill health inevitably follows, particularly as regards his children. I think it has been calculated that over a long period of years there is a greater loss to the industrial wealth and welfare of a nation by preventable ill health, due to poverty in most cases, than to the ravages of war, unless the war is of recent date. Then there is the mental degeneration, all of which we pay for. Two months idleness make a man a potential hobo, six months make him a potential criminal. Now, I talk of what I know because I have been in a somewhat similar situation myself; I have seen the idea develop in other men's minds, and to a certain extent felt it myself. We talk of the idle rich and how disastrous they are to the body politic. Well, they do not hurt many people but themselves, and they make employment. But did you ever think of the danger of the idle poor? Not of what they are, but what they may become. That is a far greater evil than anything that may accrue from the idle rich. I think it was Josh Billings who said that the skids are greased once a man starts downhill. Before he will see his children starve he will steal. I would do the same under similar circumstances, and I think I could justify my action to my conscience and to my God, if I could not to the law of the land. What does that entail? Think of the endless cost of police, jails, law-courts. It may be said that crime has some other origin, that it is not due to poverty; but let me remind this house that during the great war crime in England almost disappeared. That happened under conditions most favourable for crime, the absence of policemen and towns in darkness, and yet crime almost disappeared because men were steadily employed in the army or in industries providing the army. There are men here and there who fortunately, by strength of character, or under favourable circumstances, manage to get their heads above water again, but even then as a rule these men are left with a searing bitterness of soul. They feel that the world has treated them badly. Such a man has a grudge against society; he carries a chip around on his shoulder and is hostile to any form of government. He is, therefore, a long way from being a desirable citizen under such conditions.

Now I will speak for a moment on the dole system. I am sorry to say that I believed a good deal of what I had heard in regard to the dole system in Britain, and I accepted as a fact the statement that it consisted of a great donation of millions by the government to people who had contributed nothing themselves and regardless of whether they had any claims or not. It was alleged that the system was sapping the life-blood of British integrity. And so on. I am ashamed to say that I was of the same opinion. Now I went home last summer and studied the question at first hand and I learned then a lesson about being too dogmatic in one's views unless one is personally acquainted with the facts. To begin with, the unemployment insurance was really a fraternal insurance such as we see in any society in this country—the Eagles, the Oddfellows or the Foresters. I may quote a few of the provisions of the organization. The system began in 1911, when it was limited to comparatively few people, and the payments were quite small—two pence halfpenny per week for the men, two pence halfpenny for the employer and a penny and two-thirds for the government. The benefits were proportionately small, such as are given in any benefit society. The conditions also were pretty much the same as those that obtain in similar institutions. Until a man had been idle six days no benefit was payable, and there were certain restrictions: for example, he had to pay at least ten contributions. There was the one in five rule; that is to say, he could get only one week's unemployment pay for each five contributions he had made, and no man could draw more than fifteen weeks' benefit in any one year. Such provisions you will find in any fraternal society. By 1919 they had accumulated a surplus of £21,000,000, and they then largely increased the benefit. In 1920 they took in a great many more people, increasing the membership to something like eleven and three-quarter millions, all of whom were entitled to the benefits of the fund. Owing to increased unemployment following the war the rate had to be raised, and at one time it was as high as two shillings and two pence. During that time the contribution of the exchequer varied between one-fifth, one-fourth, one-third and one-quarter, the average being between one-third and one-quarter. In the year 1925-26 the exchequer contributed £13,000,000 in round figures, while the employers and employees together contributed £34,000,000. When we contrast £13,000,000 with £34,000,000, we can see what little ground there was for the allegation that vast sums were withdrawn from the taxpayers of the country for the benefit of people who contributed nothing themselves.

While I am on this subject I may consider another argument which has been used to a great extent against the system, and that is that there was a great deal of fraud. It was alleged that children came out of school and took the dole right away. A committee headed by Lord Blanesburgh, on which labour was fully represented, investigated the question. They took 52,000 cases at random and from among those they could discover only 83 in which there was any suspicion of fraud, although they did discover that in nearly 9,000 a strict interpretation of the rules might have rejected benefits. As regards absolute fraud, however, they could find only 83 cases subject to suspicion, and of them all only 7 per cent were open to reasonable doubt. A joint report was submitted disclosing that there had been very few fraudulent payments out of nearly 12,000,000 people who were receiving benefit.

The conditions following the war became so acute as regards unemployment that the system was unduly enlarged. The government then inaugurated a system of uncovenanted benefit; in other words, they enlarged the act when they should not have done so. The result was that in a few years practically all restrictions were abolished, and that of course led to a large increase in payments, so much so that by May, 1923, the deficit had reached £15,000,000. Steps were taken immediately to meet this situation and the result was that within a year this deficit had been reduced to £7,000,000. Then came the unemployment caused by the coal strike, which made things much worse. The result was that there was appointed a committee who decided to put things on a different basis. I have here a copy of the act —which I shall be glad to lend to the Minister of Labour—as introduced in Great Britain a few weeks ago. This new unemployment insurance bill puts the whole system on a sound actuarial basis. The contributions have been reduced to a low rate, five or six pence a week, and the conditions are made more restrictive, so that it is calculated that the system will be able to run for all time, carrying itself, and at a cost considerably less than the cost to this country of the superannuation of civil servants. That is the system in Great Britain as it is to-day or as it will be shortly. Evils did grow up, but I wish to emphasize the point that they were due to the fact that under the pressure of an unprecedented coal strike the government let the fences down and allowed too much laxity. They have now tightened things up and put the system on a sound basis, under which the cost to the employer will be not more than six pence a week and to the employee the same, while the cost to the government will be about a quarter or a third of these two sums together.

In this resolution we simply ask that the government allow a committee to investigate the matter. But if funds were needed, if it came to a question of paying something, I can tell you where we might get money: we might take some of the money we spend on futile schemes of immigration. That is one source I would suggest. At any rate I commend the matter to the government. I would emphasize this point, that it is cheaper than the present state of affairs, taking the most mercenary view conceivable of the question. Even if we have no regard for the poor, the wounded and the sick in our industrial warfare, asking ourselves only would this scheme benefit us financially, I claim that it would pay us in dollars and cents to do something towards the relief of the unemployment situation rather than have a slackening of the wheels of industry and a piling up of a bank of idle people, entailing the loss, by ill health and mental and moral deterioration, of a large number of citizens, and the filling up of our jails—yes, and of our asylums as well. For these are all results of unemployment. How often have we heard men who have made their mark in industry or in public life boasting about how they had been brought up—born in the shepherd's or ploughman's cottage and raised under conditions of hardship and poverty, making their way to the top through a stern will and a strong brain. That is all very well, and it has been done time and again. But did you ever near any great man boast that he was born in a slum? Did you ever hear a great man say, "I was born and brought up in a room where the sun never shone and where two families lived together"? Yet these are the conditions that exist to-day—you can find them in Toronto. Did you ever hear any great man make that boast? Did you ever hear him say that he had been brought up under conditions such as these, ill clad, ill fed, living and gaining his education off the streets? You never heard a prominent man say that, because those who are born in the slums die in the slums, and they die young because of their heritage of broken health. Unfortunately, however, they do not die until they have left offspring behind them with all the inherited taints magnified and increased by the experience of their parents. We talk about the prosperity of Canada; what shall it profit Canada if that prosperity is confined to certain classes? I believe it was Goldsmith who told what happened to a country when "wealth accumulates and men decay". Decay is the right word; men decay when they are subject to long periods of unemployment. I once heard a celebrated divine preach in Scotland on the subject of charity. He impressed the need of giving freely and fully and he closed his remarks with these words: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord; if you like the security, down with your money."

I would like to close somewhat in the same way. We spent lavishly of our men and wealth to maintain our national honour and national life during the great war, and we begrudged it not. Can we not afford to spend a little when the life and honour of our nation are again involved, in the preservation of the morale, mental and physical, of our citizens? Our national honour is also involved in that duty which we owe to people who have been less fortunate in life's battle than we have been. I would like to end my remarks by quoting a paragraph which I heard uttered by a member of the House of Commons in England when I was there, a Labour member speaking on this same subject of unemployment. This is what he said:

> It is brutal in the misery it inflicts, and it is brutalizing in its effects upon its victim. It needs but little imagination for the serious student to picture to himself the incessant shadow which hangs over the man, with wife and children dependent upon him, who may at any time, without fault of his own, find himself out of work. The descent into the pit is easy; and we need not wonder at the searing bitterness of him who has before him haggard wife and hungry children, and who finds himself helpless in the midst of plenty, homeless and starving in a world of luxury and extravagance. The better the man the more dangerous temper this state of things must breed. Not forever will he tolerate this horror; and if in his hopelessness he strikes blindly at a system under which he and his suffer such misery, who can blame them? With the weaker men the gulf between "unemployed" and "unemployable" is narrow, and equally narrow the gulf between "unemployable" and crime.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I desire to propose an amendment to the resolution, and before doing so I may say that I have discussed it with the mover of the resolution. I believe he agrees that it will not in any way affect the matters which he has covered, but will rather add to the powers of the committee in connection with the investigations which he suggested. I submit with all due deference to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that the Dominion has something to do with health insurance, at least to the extent that companies which carry on a health insurance business come within the jurisdiction of the Dominion, and it is with the operations of these companies that I propose to deal for a very few moments.

I might add to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, as to the agitation which exists at present in British Columbia in regard to state health insurance. There has been a very strong demand that something be done in that direction, and meetings of various kinds have been held. I see that the matter was discussed the other day before the Board of Trade Health Bureau in Vancouver by Dr. J. H. MacDermot, whom I believe to be connected with the Vancouver General Hospital. A report of that meeting appears in the Vancouver Daily Province under date of Tuesday, March 8, and from this report it appears that Dr. MacDermot advocated state health insurance and also that, according to his statement, a great many of the medical men of Vancouver favour that plan. He went into details, which I do not propose to do; suffice it to say that Dr.

MacDermott thought there should be state insurance along the lines of the workmen's compensation scheme whereby contributions should be made and medical service provided for the men who made those contributions: there should be medical assistance for their families, not only in case of sickness but also in the prevention of illness, and the head of the family should receive compensation. This plan was unanimously adopted by the meeting to which I have referred. I might also say that Mr. C. J. Wynn, who is the chairman of the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia, has publicly advocated some similar scheme.

One of the reasons for this agitation in favour of state health insurance is the unfair and arbitrary way in which insurance companies carry on health insurance in this country. Mr. Wynn himself was very badly treated, I believe, and I had a similar experience. I am a firm believer in insurance, and for years have carried almost every kind; I have carried life insurance, fire insurance, accident insurance, health insurance, automobile insurance and burglary insurance.

Mr. NEILL: Has the hon. gentleman carried political insurance?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have had almost every kind of insurance, because I believe in it, but I also believe that when I pay my good money for that purpose I should receive protection, and that I should not pay money to any company which is prepared to take that money only so long as it does not suffer a loss. When I find a company which is not prepared to meet a fair loss which it has sustained, then I say it is time something should be done. Now with regard to my own case, as I said, I carried health insurance for years. I had a few small claims, but it was not until last session that I really had a serious illness. I had been carrying a policy in The Employer's Liability Assurance Corporation, supposed to be a very good policy. It is a combination of accident and sickness insurance and covers all diseases or illnesses. It is called a standard disability policy. That policy was taken out by me in July, 1922, and was in renewal of another policy which I had been carrying in the same company for some years. I found that this policy was renewed from year to year as a matter of course.

Mr. STEVENS: As long as you were in health.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As long as I did not make any substantial claim against the company. But last year I had a very serious illness towards the end of the session. It arose to a certain extent in an accidental way, and the original illness that I had was not a serious one at all. I had to submit to a minor nasal operation, but resulting from it I got a very serious infection which laid me up for some time. I had to remain here in Ottawa for quite a long time after the session closed. I had two trained nurses at an expense of $37.50 each per week, and I had to take a nurse with me when I went back to the coast. When I returned to my home I was confined to the house for some time; I was not able to return to my office for several months. Now I thought in the first place that I was covered for one nurse up to the extent of $25 a week because when I took out this insurance policy in the first place I was told that it did provide for a nursing allowance of $25 a week. But the policy itself is misleading in this way: The ordinary individual having been told that much and having received the insurance policy would conclude that he was entitled to a nursing allowance. My claim for nursing allowance was refused. When I first took ill my wife sent a notice to the insurance company advising the agent that I was ill and describing the nature of the illness. The first word I received from the company, before I had put in any claim whatever, was a letter, dated July 22nd, 1927, addressed to myself, and reading as follows:

Dear Mr. McQUARRIE:

I have just been advised by head office that they do not wish to renew your accident and sickness policy which expires to-day.

I am very sorry that the company has decided to do this, but they give me no reason whatever.

With appreciation of past favours.

Yours very truly,

J. J. JOHNSTON.

That was before I put in my claim even. They sent me this letter on the very day the policy expired; and mark this: in the face of their repeated renewals, without any request from me from time to time previously when I had not made any substantial claim against them. What was the result? The infection that I unfortunately suffered from was such that my illness might possibly recur. When this company refused to renew the policy I was in this position, that it was impossible for me to get any other sickness insurance. As hon. gentlemen know, when an application is made for insurance of this kind one question that is asked is: Has any company ever cancelled a policy of yours or refused renewal thereof? Well, of course, in my case I had to say, "Yes, the Employers' Liability has refused to renew." As a matter of fact, I had not made any request for renewal, but the company had, in effect, refused to renew. What did that mean? I tried it out and I found that other sickness insurance companies said: No, under those circumstances we do not think we will give you a policy. I started to enquire into this matter and I found that the same thing had happened to a great many people. There are hon. gentlemen in this house who have had similar experiences, and I suppose there are hundreds, perhaps thousands of people in this country who have been treated the same way that I have been treated. The policy of the sickness insurance companies seems to be that they will take your money if you don't get sick but if you do contract a serious illness they will do one of two things: They will eliminate the disease from which you have suffered or they will refuse to renew your policy. Of course I must admit the policy is one that is issued from year to year, one on which the premiums are paid for one year and the insurance is only for that period. As a matter of law they have a perfect right to refuse to renew your policy, and possibly it would be unfair to require that insurance companies be compelled to issue a policy which would be renewable from year to year up to the time the insured reached a certain age, up to the age of sixty or sixty-five, which I believe is the uninsurable age. But what I say is that no insurance company should be permitted to decline to renew any policy when the insured is at such a stage of health that he is unable to get insurance from any other company. It is true also that before you obtain your money from an insurance company you must give a receipt in full for your claim in respect of this particular disease. What I contend is that every insurance company that is carrying on this business should at least be compelled to carry the insured during the time that he is not in a position, by reason of the disease that he incurred during the existence of the policy, to get insurance from any other company.

I promised you, Mr. Speaker, that I would not take up any time unnecessarily, and I do not intend to do so. I think this is a matter that should be investigated by the same committee which the proposer of this resolution has suggested. I beg to move the following amendment which is seconded by Mr. Dickie:

That the said resolution be amended by adding the following:

"That the said committee be authorized to investigate and report on the operations of companies carrying on sickness and accident insurance business in Canada."

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), for the unceasing interest he takes in the labouring classes and for whom I personally have much sympathy.

This resolution embodies one of the most serious problems which, at the present time, bears the stamp of great importance and actuality; it is perhaps the problem that has been foremost in the minds of people all over the world. Pledges of candidates, at election time, numerous publications on the subject, resolutions, measures introduced in legislatures and continuously changed, amended or cancelled, force us to conclude that this problem which exists everywhere is most complex. Its solution is impossible by academic rules and it can only be solved by each individual's thrift and backed by the good will of each and everyone, conditions without which all practical tests of systems have been failures in the past, and will also be in the future.

In Canada, in every province, the problem of invalidity, if we include old people, exists more or less of necessity, owing to the fact that we took part in the great European conflict. The result was that a great number of old people saw the staff of their old age disappear in the clash of arms on the battlefields. Many saw their sons return disabled, confined to hospitals, adding to the burden of their advanced age; others although unscathed returned home with a different disposition and undesirable habits. A sad state of affairs which spoiled the future of thousands of families. If there is such a thing as a national conscience, is it not held to compensate its victims, in the greatest measure possible?

Numerous other causes are responsible for invalidity. First old age, lack of natural gifts, want of foresight, trials of life, accidents, illness, forced unemployment, misfortunes, ill luck, these are as many explanations of God's word: "There will always be poor people as there will always be wealthy people". All nations are endeavouring to remedy this evil, without so far having quite succeeded. They have tried to provide for the lack of thrift, by insurances against fire, illness, old age, unemployment, labour accidents, maternity, as many things encountered along the path of life and ushering its victims towards poverty, when they have not the means of meeting the payments on their insurance policy or do not avail themselves of the advantages they afford when they are able to do so. Many have benefited by insurances. On the other hand, owing to uncontrollable circumstances, a great number are unable to take out an insurance, thereby creating the urgent and unavoidable problem of invalidity which forces governments to act. The legislation should be rather of a preventive and corrective nature, and not one aiming at remedying the effects as they crop up, but having for its objective the removing of the various causes which create invalidity, and therefore tends to reduce the problem to its very minimum.

All the systems advocated heretofore are alike and only differ from one another by the way they are tested. Workmen's superannuation funds in connection with national banks, associations of employers or mutual assistance, are already in existence. They are maintained by the triple contribution of workmen, employers, and the state, and based on the same principles, proceeding in all cases by compulsory insurance or not—according to the countries where the problem is dealt with—and from birth up to the age of seventy. To-day, notwithstanding numerous trials, numerous theories or systems, the problem always remains unsolved, and we must conclude therefore that the rule of thumb has always presided over mutuality and association.

Thrift was not taught by qualified professors, but by too zealous people more or less shrewd, prophets more or less enlightened, heralds more or less interested, with whom method and precision were entirely wanting.

To obtain that end, it is necessary that chairs be founded to take up the study of this difficult science of providing for one's future—for after all is not thrift the economic hygiene of man? Yet the thing does not exist in any country.

Some countries have tried compulsory insurance, for instance Germany, with indefinite results. Others like France advocate optional insurance and obtain insufficient data. Others like Belgium have tried subsidized insurances which gave rise to abuse and injustice. England and Denmark tried the system of supplementary pensions which perhaps would be the system approaching the nearest to the solution of the problem of invalidity if it were supported by the good will of each.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a number of hon. members have made inquiries as to the government's intention with respect to an Easter adjournment, and it might enable hon. gentlemen to make their arrangements for the Easter vacation if I were immediately to intimate to the house what the government has in mind. It is our intention to ask that when the house adjourns on Friday of next week it stand adjourned until the Tuesday following Easter Monday, which is April 10. This would mean that hon. members would have opportunity for a vacation of ten days, with a loss in that period of time of only two and a half days of the time that otherwise the house would be sitting. Seeing that parliament was called together in January, we feel that for this and other reasons it would be desirable to have such an intermission. Therefore, with the consent of the house, I move:

That when the house adjourns on Friday the 30th March instant it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the tenth of April next.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, most of the members from Ontario and Quebec can go home, but the government should remember that we from the west cannot take advantage of the proposed adjournment unless we spend all our time travelling. I think a vacation, say, from Wednesday preceding Good Friday until the following Tuesday is long enough for Easter holidays. I protest against the length of time suggested.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it carried unanimously?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

THE GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the observations he has just made, the right hon. Prime Minister may think it well to intimate to the house what legislation we may expect to complete the government's program, so that we may have that matter also in mind.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend and the house the information desired in the course of a day or two.

JUDGES' SALARIES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER QUESTION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a special committee consisting of fifteen members to be selected at a later date be appointed to consider the question of the adequacy of the remuneration paid to the judges of the various courts in Canada, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during recent years legal associations and other bodies have passed resolutions asking parliament to consider the remuneration of judges. Those resolutions have been received from time to time and the matter has been referred to incidentally, especially during last session. Since then the Canadian Bar Association has taken formal action and adopted certain resolutions, which have been submitted to the government by a committee of the association. As Minister of Justice I have been receiving resolutions from the law associations of every province with regard to this matter. Moreover, a committee of various county court judges is to meet the government in support of the claim that they have submitted for higher remuneration. We promised at the time that the matter would be called to the attention of parliament for consideration and study. I believe that inasmuch as the judges are servants of the people and therefore more properly servants of parliament rather than of the government the question should be considered by parliament, and I do not see any better way of dealing with it than by the appointment of a special committee for the purpose.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I greatly regret that I am entirely opposed to the appointment of a committee to deal with this matter. As I explained to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on a previous occasion, I am wholly in accord with the idea of increasing the salaries of judges in this country. I have so stated publicly, and I was one of those who constituted a committee to wait upon the government as representing the Canadian Bar Association. I have long taken the view that if we are to command for the public service as judges the best men in the legal profession we must pay them salaries commensurate with the dignity and the responsibility of the position they hold. But I cannot agree with the appointment of a committee to examine witnesses under oath and to send for papers and persons; I do not believe that this would serve the purpose intended. The appointment of a committee would be, in my opinion, fraught with the gravest possibilities of disaster to the whole project. Moreover, it is not the method that should be followed in dealing with a matter of this kind. All that is necessary is to amend the Judges Act. All that is essential to accomplish the object which the government has in view is for the minister to bring in the necessary measure—because obviously the opposition cannot introduce a bill involving the payment of moneys from the public exchequer—and I venture to say that most of those who sit on this side will be glad to give it their support. But to appoint a committee at this time is in my opinion not only wrong; it shifts responsibility and makes it impossible to deal with the question as it should be dealt with. I cannot think that the calling of witnesses, the bringing of papers, and a general discussion in a select committee of this house would be anything but injurious to the very purpose we hope to accomplish; and I can only say on behalf of myself and of those associated with me—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend indicate in what way the consideration of the question by a committee of parliament might be injurious to the object in view?

Mr. BENNETT: The very bringing of papers and the examination of witnesses, as suggested in the motion, would bring about such discussions as would, in my judgment, render it impossible in the end to carry into effect the purpose which the minister desires to achieve. That is my view. I may be altogether wrong, and I am only expressing my own opinion, as I did to my hon. friend the other day. It seems to me that the Minister of Justice should introduce a bill to amend the Judges Act, increasing the present salaries of the judges by such an amount as in his opinion, and in the opinion of the executive of the country, the cabinet, would be a reasonable addition to the stipends they now receive. Certainly most of those associated with me on this side would be glad to support such a measure. That is the only position I can take.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the leader of the opposition whether he implies that this is a matter that will not stand investigation?

Mr. BENNETT: Had that observation come from anyone less educated than my hon. friend I would treat it with contempt. The hon. member is perfectly well aware that the judges of this country are discharging by all odds the gravest, the most serious and the most difficult duties with which men can be charged in a free country, and it is essential that the compensation paid them for the services they render should be at least consistent with the obligations that are imposed upon them, as well as with the dignity of the position they hold. Any investigation that might be held in this house certainly would not disclose any facts other than these, while on the other hand much extraneous matter would be dragged in. The result would be that instead of the committee being able to focus its attention upon the one point that would be considered in this house in committee on a bill for the purpose, a great deal of irrelevant discussion would ensue with respect to whether John Smith might not be able to live cheaper, whether John Jones was receiving enough to cope with the high cost of living, or whether he ought to keep an automobile or a pair of horses. For these reasons I am opposed to the motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On different occasions we have heard in this chamber the suggestion that the government, in respect of measures of this kind, should seek to take parliament more into its confidence before bringing down legislation. We felt that in this particular instance there was strong ground for acting upon that suggestion. If all of us were members of the legal profession, as are my hon. friend and the Minister of Justice, we should have no difficulty in appreciating fully the reasons that make it all-important that the judiciary in this country should be well paid. But we are not all in that position, and there are some hon. members of the house, and many persons throughout the country as well, who find it difficult to appreciate the reasons why members of the judiciary should receive not only increases in their salaries but the salaries which at the present time they are actually being paid. The government believes that if a committee were appointed representative of all groups in the house and occasion afforded to interested parties to appear and submit their views, the probable result will be that an agreement will be reached whereby the house will be saved a controversy which might be unduly protracted and might in some other respects be unfortunate. For these reasons, and following to some extent a parallel method of procedure—I will not call it a precedent—which has been adopted elsewhere, we have thought it advisable to suggest the appointment of a committee. The United States congress last year, I am informed, had under consideration a proposal to increase the salaries of judges. Preceding the discussion of the question in congress a committee was appointed before whom representations were made by interested parties. The result there was apparently satisfactory to the administration in meeting just the kind of difficulties I have indicated may arise. The government considering, as I have said, the frequent expression of the view that some of these matters involving executive action might be proceeded with the better, if in the first instance hon. members were taken more largely into its confidence, deemed it advisable to have a special committee appointed for the purpose.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): With reference to the points mentioned by the Prime Minister, does he not think that the proposed method of procedure is putting the judges in a very undignified position? Why have them come as suppliants before a committee of parliament on a question which parliament, of its own volition, should consider without the unpleasant discussion which would be inevitable if a committee were appointed to investigate the matter? Would it not be better for the government to formulate and submit a measure, and have it discussed in this house? That would be much more dignified and would place our judiciary in a more desirable position.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No one suggests that the members of the high courts of the land should come here as suppliants. No one wants them to do so. The bar may be represented in the committee. In the committee which considered a similar question before congress in the United States former Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, came and addressed its members, the president of the American Federation of Labour, Mr. Green, supported the request, and Mr. Lewis, the president of the United Mine Workers also appeared. Various interests were represented. I do not suggest, and no one does, that the judges themselves should come in the capacity indicated by my hon. friend. But what would be the harm in a committee considering the question and inquiring into salaries paid in the various dominions of the empire as well as in foreign countries, and making comparisons, bearing upon the cost of living, with the salaries paid in other professions? I think this is a proper matter for investigation; there is nothing unworthy or undignified in it, and I believe it is the only way properly to deal with the matter. If everyone would help instead of criticising a point of procedure I think we would more speedily come to a satisfactory conclusion.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I cannot agree with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in the precedent which he has cited for the present procedure, or with the proposal for the appointment of a committee of this house to consider the question of the salaries of our judges. The judicial system in the United States is entirely different from the judicial system of this country; it has little relation to the system which we enjoy in Canada. Futhermore the legislative and administrative system in congress is very different from the system adopted in this parliament. In Canada it has been a usage, and indeed a law, that all measures involving public expenditure shall be initiated by the government of the country; in congress the system is entirely different. There it is done by a committee on appropriations, called by some a committee on the budget. In every instance in this country, however, by the rules of procedure and by the usage of parliament, when a public expenditure is proposed the government of the day must accept the full responsibility.

During the last twenty-five or thirty years the salaries of our judges have been increased on several occasions by this house, and it has always been done by amendments to the Judges Act. That is the constitutional procedure. The government have all the information in their files with regard to the salaries received by judges in other countries; that information has been there for a long time, having been carefully gathered by the bar associations and placed in the hands of the Minister of Justice. He has every facility for knowing what should properly be paid to those high officials in this country. The cabinet should formulate their scheme, if they think the salaries paid to-day are too low; let them take the bold course and announce what they think should be paid. Do not let this question of judicial salaries go before a special committee, where evidence of all kinds will be given and where the discussion will probably degenerate into a consideration of the high cost of living or something of that kind. We have had committees of that sort in this parliament, one of which I remember particularly. A committee on the high cost of living sat for about three months in 1919, I believe, and we all know the utter lack of result in their work. In this case, the parties most interested in the result, the judges themselves, are the very people who should not be called. Why does not the government take the parliamentary course, the bold course, and formulate their plan, decide what they think should properly be paid to the judges of this country, and bring it before parliament? They have all the information before them, and after the second reading of the bill, and when the house goes into committee, the fullest information can be placed at the disposal of parliament. Surely such is the course which should be pursued in this instance. Personally I favour reasonable increases in judicial salaries. I have heard it rumoured that on the government side there is anything but unanimity on this question, and that as a solution of the difficulty in which the government find themselves this committee is proposed. I do not believe we should depart from well-known parliamentary procedure simply on account of some difference of opinion in the government ranks upon this very important question.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just one word in answer to my hon. friend. When he said that in the United States the initiation of legislation which meant the expenditure of public money was in the hands of congress and not in the hands of the executive government, whereas the rule in Canada is different since the executive must take the initiative in all legislation involving the expenditure of public money, he was perfectly correct. In this matter, however, considering its importance, the government think that parliament, through a committee, should inquire into the whole subject, secure the requisite information and report to the house. Then, when that report is made, the government will introduce legislation accordingly, if legislation be necessary. I do not think this is a matter which should be treated in a partisan or political way at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friends opposite wish to help the administration of justice in Canada, do they consider they are doing so by adopting the narrow stand which they now take in the house? If the salaries of our judges are to be increased, let us treat this matter in an open, frank and sincere fashion. When my hon. friends say it would be undignified to have such a parliamentary committee, they seem to forget that after all this parliament of ours is the highest court of justice in Canada, and that whether we sit as a House of Commons or as a committee of the house of our own appointment, we sit as a tribunal where all matters, including those relative to the salaries of our judges, will always be treated in such a way that the dignity of no one will suffer thereby.

Mr. LADNER: Does the Solicitor General suggest that the judges themselves should appear before the committee?

Mr. CANNON: I do not.

Mr. LADNER: They are the chief witnesses.

Mr. CANNON: Not at all. There is no more reason for that than for calling civil servants before us when coming to a decision with regard to increases of their salaries. The basis for our decision in such matters does not come from the evidence of the civil servants themselves, but from considerations which have a bearing on the whole question considered generally.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, by moving that a committee should inquire into this matter I believe the Minister of Justice has taken a safe and sound constitutional procedure. After all, this government is but a committee of parliament—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: —when viewed from a constitutional standpoint, and as a government we are supposed to do the will of parliament. We can do so only when and as long as we retain the confidence of parliament. Therefore, when the minister moves that a committee of this house should inquire into this matter and that the government as such should suspend all action until that committee has sat and reported, he has suggested a sound constitutional theory, which I think should meet with the approval of this House of Commons.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the reprimand administered to me by the right hon. leader of the opposition I venture to say just a word in regard this matter. So far lawyers only have spoken in this discussion. Although they are present in very large numbers in this house, I venture to say that there are a very considerable number of non-legal people in Canada who when it comes to a matter of this kind cannot quite see why lawyers—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend forgets that I apologized for not being a lawyer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I beg the right hon. Prime Minister's pardon but he is very closely associated with lawyers sometimes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are very useful too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The suggestion was made that it was beneath the dignity of the judges to have this matter submitted to a committee. I think that was the point in the objection taken by the leader of the opposition, and I was quite sincere in questioning that position; I do not think that we ought to allow that contention to go unchallenged. I notice that we as private members are, not infrequently, solicited by candidates who want to be appointed to judgeships. I do not know whether that is quite in keeping with the high honour of the bench or not.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I notice further that a memorandum has been sent to private members with regard to this matter of salary increases, and that those who sent it, some of them judges, go into the cost of living; in fact, they make the increased cost of living the basis for the appeal for higher salaries. I do not quite see that there is anything that is beneath the dignity even of judges in having this matter judged on its merit. I know that it is very common to take the word of the bar association in such matters, but I hope that I am not offending the members of the bar when I remind them the bar association is a professional organization akin to a trades union organization, and I do not see why the members of one particular trades union should be permitted to decide just what salaries the graduates from that union should receive.

Mr. McPHERSON: Do not the trades unions fix the salaries of the labour men?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Sometimes they do, but I would suggest they have never had the assurance to come to parliament and lay that down as a principle.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the fair wage scale?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is said the discussion before the committee would degenerate into a discussion of the high cost of living. Personally I should rejoice if some of the discussions in this house did centre upon the high cost of living, and that we got down to business methods in this matter. I would say that a good many of us are not prejudging this matter at all. If the cost of living has gone up I presume that the salaries of the judges should go up, just as the salaries of the civil servants should go up, and the wages of people outside the government service should go up. I was very glad the Minister of Justice drew attention to what has happened in the United States where the officials of the American Federation of Labour were among those who were advocating increased salaries for the judges. That is in keeping with the general policy of labour organizations with regard to wages.

I would, however, add this: It seems to me that when the committee is appointed it should have on it not merely members of the bar who are keenly interested in such matters, a great many of them having a vague idea they may some time be elevated to the bench—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —but should have on it representatives of all groups and of the other professions and callings. Personally I am very glad that the government has seen fit to appoint a committee and to take the house into its confidence to that extent.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. member not acquainted with the fact that most judges are not as well paid as the high officials of labour organizations?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not quite see what that has to do with the matter under consideration. I have not been comparing the salaries paid to high officials of labour organizations with those paid to judges. As far as Canadian officials are concerned the statement is not true. I am not particularly concerned in defending high salaries to officials; I am considering the matter before us on its merits. I would simply urge that this is a subject for the consideration of the public at large, and not one to be decided merely by a special group in the house.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville): I should like to know if I gathered a wrong impression in understanding the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to say a little while ago that all hon. members on this side were in favour of an increase in the salary of judges?

Mr. GUTHRIE: What I meant to say was that there were differences of opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LANCTOT: I will not undertake to speak for other members on this side; I shall only speak for myself. Judging from what I have seen since I have been in the house a great many members seem to be in politics with the hope ultimately of going on the bench. In that respect there is the same feeling prevalent as there was twenty-four years ago when I first entered the house. If we undertake to discuss the cost of living here why not consider how the cost of living affects the poor people of the country? It has been urged in this house that we should increase the salaries of the judges because they are suffering actual hardship by reason of their present salaries. But why not consider the plight of the common people many of whom are confronted with actual starvation? I hope it will not cause any surprise when I say that I am entirely against increasing the salaries of the judges.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I have had the opportunity of hearing this question discussed on many occasions, and I agree with what has been said that no more important question could be considered here than that of the administration of justice. It forms the basis of our institutions, and is all important to the people of Canada. When previous increases were granted to judges they were not always granted unanimously; there were dissenting voices on both sides of the house. I think, however, that in the interests of the judges themselves, above all the interests of the administration of justice, and in the interests of the public at large, this question should be dealt with openly and no suspicion should be aroused that we are doing a favour to any particular class. I agree that no man works harder or more conscientiously than the man occupying the exalted position of a judge.

Mr. GERVAIS: Are we debating the appointment of a committee or the merits of the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is discussing the question raised by the motion itself.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the judges would be free to go before the committee or not, just as they please. I am sure that the committee after investigating the situation—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will pardon me. The motion is:

> That a special committee consisting of fifteen members to be selected at a later date be appointed to consider the question of the adequacy of the remuneration paid to the judges—

And so on.

Mr. GERVAIS: By committee not by the house.

Mr. MARCIL: This question will have to be dealt with ultimately, of course, by the government, but some serious objections have been raised of which we have had evidence to-day. In any event the government will have to assume the responsibility, but in doing what they may be called upon to do they will be backed up by the opinion of a committee appointed by this house representing, I understand, all classes and interests, and all sections of the people. They will be in a position therefore to deal not only with the salaries to be paid the judges, but some of the conditions arising in connection therewith such as we have already been discussing. On the last occasion, some three or four years ago, when this question was under discussion, Sir Lomer Gouin brought up a measure dealing with some matters connected with the judiciary, and the question was raised as to pensions paid to judges and the privileges that were allowed certain judges, after they had retired from the bench, to engage in other avocations. Strong objection was taken at the time.

There are many classes of judges throughout Canada; we all know their importance, and I for one am quite in favour of the proposal made by the government that this matter should be thoroughly investigated. In view of the present position, financial and otherwise, of the country, it is only on a strongly favourable report of such a committee that the government would be justified in bringing about an increase in the salaries of judges and this could be done only by the procedure which is now suggested and which, I believe, is quite a proper one.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the house one feature of this resolution which I do not think has so far been dealt with, and that is the latter part of the resolution which states:

—with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are the usual words.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not complaining of the wording, but I want to point out that what I consider to be a very unfair position, will probably arise. The Minister of Justice intimated that there was no intention of summoning judges to appear before the committee; but on the other hand other persons, persons who may be critical, for instance, of the position of judges and the judicial system of Canada, might come before the committee. There are those who consider that judges' salaries are high enough or too high. For instance, the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) intimated a moment ago—

Mr. LANCTOT: I did not say they were too high; I said they were high enough.

Mr. STEVENS: He said that they were high enough and should not be increased; but all such persons will have the privilege of placing their views before the committee while the judges themselves will not be able to appear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not?

Mr. STEVENS: It would be lamentable if they were called before the committee, and I will give my reason for making that statement. It would be most unfortunate if the committee were to summon judges to appear before it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree that judges of the higher court should not come before the committee, but judges of the county and district courts have themselves asked to be heard before a committee of this house and I do not think there should be the same objection in regard to that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When this committee is appointed, will it not have power to summon judges to appear before it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will be for the committee to decide.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The committee, as I understand the matter, will have the power entirely in their own hands. What my hon. friend says to-day will be of no authority in regard to the power of that committee to summon judges if they see fit to do so.

Mr. STEVENS: That is precisely the thought that is in my mind. The committee has power in the first place to summon before it and to examine witnesses under oath. The intention of the Minister of Justice, who undoubtedly will have considerable influence in the committee, is that judges shall not be called. On the other hand, on a majority vote of the committee they may be summoned to appear, and such a situation would be most unfortunate. I am speaking as a layman and I want to assure hon. members who are afraid of the legal fraternity that I am not one of that group. The reason I take this stand is that my observation of the judiciary of Canada leads me to believe that, on the whole and in the vast majority of cases with very rare exceptions, men appointed to the bench have discharged their functions with honour to themselves and to the country. It has been a matter of great surprise to me to note men of opposite political faith to myself, whom perhaps in their political life I have found it necessary to criticize very bitterly and who I thought were scarcely proper appointees for judgeships, after they have assumed the duties and, indeed, in a remarkably short space of time, seemed to be so influenced by the traditions and ethics of the judiciary that they measured up far beyond what we originally expected of them. I shall not do so of course, but I could name and I have no doubt other members have in mind many gentlemen appointed to the bench who are to-day, as I said a moment ago, gracing that position with honour to themselves and the country, who at the time of their appointment were looked upon rather askance and as probably not fitted for the position.

My point in this somewhat disjointed argument is that the traditions of the judiciary itself seem to have influenced those who have been appointed to it so that they measure up to those traditions. It is very desirable in the interest of the country at large that nothing should be done that will bring the judiciary of Canada into the realm of, what shall I say, a wrangle or discussion or dispute about such a thing as salaries. In other words, in days gone by and up to the present the judiciary have trusted parliament to supply a reasonable and sufficient salary for them, and my opinion is that it would be better to leave this subject to parliament rather than to have an investigation.

The Minister of Justice cited the fact that a committee in the United States had been appointed to consider this question and that was offered as a sound precedent for us to follow. If our following the United States in that respect had any danger of inducing us to follow them in their process or method of appointing judges, that is by the two-year elective system, then heaven save us from following precedents of the United States.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was referring to federal court judges who are not elected but who are appointed by the United States government.

Mr. STEVENS: Thousands of judges in the United States are elected every two years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those were not dealt with by the committee of congress. They are placed by the various states.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not alter my point, if the minister will catch what I am driving at. I do not think a precedent established by the United States congress should govern us in a case of this kind. Our system of appointing judges, the traditions which surround our judiciary, the reputation and the record of our judges generally, with very few if any exceptions, are so much better than they are on the other side of the line that we should do nothing that would interfere with or jeopardize that very high standard. It is unfair to submit one side of a question to a committee when the other side is not supposed to come, and it would be most unfortunate if the judiciary of Canada were called before a committee of parliament on the question of salaries.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I just want to ask the minister a question. The resolution states:

> That a special committee. . . . be appointed to consider the question of the adequacy of the remuneration paid to the judges of the various courts in Canada.

In view of the remark of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) that this is the highest court in Canada, I would ask if it is the intention that the committee shall inquire whether the judges in this particular court are paid high enough salaries or not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose it will be for the committee itself to decide whether the judges of this court should be included in the salary revision.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I have only one or two observations to make as to why I shall vote against this motion if it comes to a vote. I shall vote against it because I do not propose to assist the government in carrying out obligations which should properly fall upon them. If the government is prepared to say that in the appointment of judges they will consider representations made by members on this side of the house, then I am prepared to join with them in the appointment of a committee to fix the salaries, but I am not prepared to assist them in lifting from their shoulders the burden which should fall upon them by appointing a committee without consideration of the views of anybody else.

I do not concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and concurred in by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The hon. member for Vancouver Centre thinks it would be a terrible thing to have judges come before the committee to give evidence or to be questioned. Well, if it is derogatory to the dignity of the judges to come before a committee and give evidence, than it must also be derogatory to their dignity when they make representations in writing to the government and to parliament asking for an increase in their salaries. If it is not lowering to the dignity of judges to make representations in writing to members of parliament for an increase in their salaries, I submit that it is not derogatory to their dignity to appear before a committee and give evidence.

There seems to be an opinion in the mind of the Minister of Justice, concurred in by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, that we can place these judges in different categories. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre made no classification. He said that it would be against the dignity of any judge to appear before a committee and give evidence. Oh no, says the Minister of Justice, I would not go quite that far; I would object to having the higher judges come before the committee to give evidence, but you might bring before the committee the county court judges. Carried to its logical conclusion, that means that in the mind of the Minister of Justice the dignity of a judge is expressed in the salary he draws, and it is not derogatory to the dignity of a judge drawing five or six thousand a year to appear before the committee and give evidence in favour of an increase in his salary, but it is derogatory in the case of a man who is getting a salary of fifteen or sixteen thousand a year, and who will get an even bigger increase than the lower judge. But the higher judge must get his increase without lowering his dignity to the extent of appearing before a committee and telling the reason why he is starving to death on his salary of fifteen thousand a year. I do not exactly see it in that light myself.

There is one other thing in connection with the appointment of this committee. If you are going to appoint a committee to consider this matter, in the first place I say let the government take the full responsibility for appointing the committee. In the second place, I submit that there should not be one single lawyer on that committee—not one. My regard for them is so extremely high and my love for them so great that I would not for the life of me stand here and permit them so to jeopardize their dignity, or the dignity of the position they may ultimately occupy. In the third place, I would warn the government, for very obvious reasons, against appointing to that committee the hon. Minister of Justice, and certainly they should not appoint to that committee the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin), or the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott). None of these gentlemen should be appointed to that committee because it would always leave them open to the reflection that they were getting on that committee for the purpose of seeing that the judges' salaries were made adequate to their own brilliant intellects when the time should come for them to occupy this high and dignified position. So I say, appoint your committee, if you wish, but leave the lawyers off it.

Mr. VENIOT: On both sides.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): On both sides, certainly. I hope that so far as this side is concerned none of them will go on the committee; I do not know but what I would exclude them even from the meetings of the committee, for fear they might be doing a little lobbying with regard to the bright future that lies before them.

Another thought which I have, and which should be considered by the committee is this: are we going simply to sit back and have a committee of fifteen appear before parliament and tell us what we ought to do in this matter? I say at once that the judges should be given a remuneration commensurate with the position they occupy, although I am not so terribly impressed with the dignity of their office to the degree that has been expressed almost entirely by lawyers in this discussion; but we will include the dignity too, if you like. But the matter which should be considered by the committee is this, whether you are going to carry with these salary increases a pension for the judges. Personally I am opposed to that. I do not say that because I have anything against the judges personally. I say, make the salaries of the judges fair and reasonable and just, and let them provide for their own old age out of the salaries they receive. I have maintained that position in this house before, and I assert it again. The majority of the fathers of those who sit in this house, I venture to say, did not get any provision made by parliament for a pension for them in their old age. They had to provide for their own old age out of a great deal smaller salary than the judges are getting, and I say that it is up to the judges and everybody else to provide for their old age out of the salaries they receive, and the country should not hand to them on a silver platter, with all the frills around it, both a very fine salary and the assurance that when they get tired of sitting on the bench they can retire on a pension and go into politics, as has been done sometimes in this house in the past.

Mr. LANCTOT: Like Mr. Doherty.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And D. D. McKenzie also. Do not forget him when you mention Mr. Doherty. When they tire of the bench, when they find their duties too onerous and too hard upon them and they cannot stand the strain any longer, they resign on a pension of five or six thousand a year, and some of them go into politics. That has happened on both sides of this house, and then when they get tired of politics, when political life becomes too strenuous for them, they go back to the bench, possibly to make provision for another pension when they retire a second time. I protest against that. I say, fix the salaries of the judges at a fair and reasonable figure as compared with similar positions elsewhere, and having regard to their responsibilities and duties, and let them provide out of their own salaries for their old age, the same as everybody else has to do in this country.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): I am aware that this is not the proper time to go in detail into the question of increasing the judges' salaries, yet I wish to make a few remarks. We are being asked to increase the salaries of the judges, some of whom I believe are now receiving in the neighbourhood of ten thousand a year, and I am not sure that some of them are not getting twelve thousand or more a year, and when they retire they receive two-thirds of their salary as a pension. I have a very high opinion of the judiciary of Canada. I would like to see them properly paid, and I am very glad to see that the proposal is that this question shall go before a committee where it can be thoroughly investigated. I have noticed in connection with this resolution, as with others of a similar character, that when a request comes before the house to increase the salaries of the rich it meets with very great favour in some quarters, and any member who dares to dissent is treated with more or less contempt. The Minister of Justice gave as a reason for making this motion that he had received a request from the judges themselves for increased remuneration; but let me remind the house that very persistent requests for better pay have been made by the rural mail carriers. Why is it that the poor, being greater in number, do not receive the same consideration as those who are in receipt of big salaries? I do not say that I would not favour increasing the salaries of some of our lower paid judges, but I think the matter should be very carefully considered before any action is taken. I might point out that in dealing with this matter we are not in the same position as we were when we increased the salaries of our deputy ministers. We were in danger of losing their services because of the higher salaries they were offered by private corporations; but I have not heard of any shortage of applicants for appointment to the bench. As a matter of fact, you find them everywhere. What, then, is the reason for this proposal? Is it because judges are not receiving sufficient remuneration in comparison with thousands of other men who have not one-half, one-quarter, yes, in some cases not one-tenth the income enjoyed by the judiciary to maintain and educate their families? I am very much inclined to oppose increasing the remuneration of our higher paid judges until others who are more needy have their requests for increase of salary dealt with.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I doubt, Mr. Speaker, if I should discuss this motion at all, seeing that the right even of my desk mate (Mr. Woodsworth) was questioned by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) when he rose to ask for information; but, you know, "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." If he had been a gentleman of less attainments I suppose he would have been treated with contempt by the leader of the opposition. This matter has come before the country during the past six months in various ways, and I think most of us have been circularized by the judges themselves. I wonder why it should be beneath the dignity of any body of men to appear before parliament, since parliament is the highest court in the land. We should maintain our dignity and not think of ourselves as a "rabble". Certainly the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has no right to even hint that the proceedings of the committee itself will be anything more than a wrangle. After reading a despatch in to-day's paper I doubt very much that the dignity of these judges will be hurt by appearing before a committee of this house. Let me quote a short paragraph:

> Last year there were 38,000 meals served in the restaurant at a cost of $1.00 per meal. There is now a deficit of $27,000 facing the officials, which includes arrears of $300 from four former members of parliament, and a prominent civil servant. One of the former members is now a Nova Scotia judge.

Mr. BANCROFT: What paper is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. EVANS: The Ottawa Journal of to-day.

Mr. BANCROFT: If I may be permitted, I should like to state that there is no such deficit facing the restaurant.

Mr. EVANS: Since the judge referred to allows his name to be used in a daily journal in such circumstances, I wonder if it would hurt his dignity very much to appear before a parliamentary committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is a good argument for higher pay, though.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). I want to say to him and to this house that the late Mr. Justice McKenzie did not draw a pension; he died in office. Neither does his widow draw a pension. I do not think it adds to the dignity of our discussion of a matter of such serious importance as this for an hon. member to suggest that a gentleman, now deceased, who occupied an honourable position in the public life of this country and on the bench, drew a pension, when such is not the case. As a fellow-Nova Scotian I may say that we are proud of the services that the late Mr. Justice McKenzie rendered to his native land. I for one regret that a pension is not payable to his widow.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Might I ask the hon. gentleman, would my observation have been less objectionable if the person to whom I referred was still living?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the question is intended seriously. My hon. friend was endeavouring to find somebody as a horrible example, and there was suggested to him the name of a gentleman who happened to be one of his own political faith. He immediately shifted and suggested the name of the late Mr. Justice McKenzie, but the facts show that Mr. Justice McKenzie was not in the class he endeavoured to describe. The late Mr. Justice McKenzie did not draw a pension either as a county court judge or as a supreme court judge.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): All I have to say is that my hon. friend should direct his attention first of all to the hon. gentlemen on his own side who introduced the question.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (South Vancouver): I wish to say a few words on this question, which I think is of paramount importance to the country. It is of great importance because it is vital to the administration of justice that competent and able men should be on the bench, and that they should be enabled to carry themselves in keeping with the dignity of their position. At first I was favourable to the appointment of a committee; that was my first impression: the idea seemed to be sound. But upon reflection it occurred to me that it was not a dignified position for the judges to be placed in, to have them appear before the committee and advocate their request. And if they are not to appear personally then the chief witnesses, the interested parties, are denied presence in the court which is to determine the matter at issue. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) failed to tell us what witnesses would appear before the committee or what evidence would be given beyond the facts which are now in the possession of the government or available in the departments.

My real object is to point out that there is not a single indication given that any witnesses, apart from the judges or those representing their point of view, could give any evidence that would be of the slightest use beyond such evidence as the parliamentary committee could secure from the Department of Justice or from the formal presentation of the case with respect to applications for increase in salary. I would ask the Minister of Justice this question: Can he conceive of any evidence which might be adduced either equal to or of comparatively the same importance as the evidence of the judges themselves, whose presence before the committee will be denied? Or can he conceive of any witnesses who, if they appeared before the parliamentary committee, could give any information of real and vital importnace to that committee in addition to the facts which are already at his disposal?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have already spoken, but in answer to my hon. friend I will repeat that the judges of the high courts of Canada have made no application. If any application has been made it has been made by representatives of the bar associations in the various provinces and by the Canadian Bar Association, and surely these people can come and lay their case before the committee.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I cannot see that the matter which we have before us would be advanced by referring it to a committee. Who are going to oppose it? Will the government require a recommendation of the whole committee—a unanimous recommendation? Will they act upon the recommendation of a minority or will they act upon the recommendation of the majority? Because a committee of fifteen cannot, I am convinced, be appointed by this house which will represent the general view of the house upon the question. For my part, although I may not be presumed to have much confidence in the committee of fourteen or fifteen who compose the government of Canada at the present time, I have far more confidence in their judgment than in the judgment of any special committee in dealing with a matter of this kind; and if they are prepared in the constitutional way to recommend increases in the salaries of judges who are appointed by them, I stand ready to vote for any reasonable measures proposed to that end. And so far as my personal knowledge goes, as regards the majority on this side, they are prepared to assume a similiar attitude. I have no doubt that although there may be differences of opinion on this side of the house, the majority of the members over here would support the government in any reasonable measures it might take to increase existing salaries so as to give adequate recompense to the judges of the land. I regard this innovation in constitutional practice, which we have before us to-day, not as an effort to deal with the question seriously but really as a method of postponing consideration of it until the Greek Kalends or to some other distant date. I cannot conceive that the government, being anxious to deal with the question in the way of providing adequate recompense for the judges, would have taken the course now proposed. In this matter, as in others, the government must take full responsibility for presenting to the house any measure for the expenditure of public money. There is no reason why they should now prove recreant to the trust which the constitutional practice of the country vests in them. There is no adequate reason why we should have a change in the constitutional procedure in the present instance and not in respect of every other vote that is to come before parliament when the estimates are brought down for consideration. Not a single serious ground can be suggested, it seems to me, why the proposed vote—if there is to be a vote—should come before parliament in any way other than in the estimates which are brought down by the government for the consideration of the house. The present proposal is simply an effort to preclude the serious consideration of the question in the future and to prevent parliament as parliament dealing with it; because we can deal with it pertinently and successfully only when the actual vote is submitted to parliament. I personally believe, despite the differences of opinion which prevail on the other side of the house, despite also some dissent on this side, that if the government would take their courage in their hands and bring down a vote which they might consider sufficient to provide adequately for the judges of the land, a large majority in the house would sustain them. We know that hon. members of the government would deal with such a matter in a perfectly disinterested temper, notwithstanding that some of them may be candidates for judgeships in the future. I will vote against the resolution which proposes to refer this matter to a committee. The result, in my opinion, would be ineffective. This house must decide the question. Every member in this house has now, or would have in the course of the debate here, all the information he would require on which to base a conscientious decision. I therefore regard the remission of this matter to a special committee as an indefinite postponement of its consideration, and for that reason I intend to vote against the motion. At the same time,

I believe that if the government will bring down a measure in the ordinary course, they will find themselves sustained by a large majority in this house, including, as I believe, the large majority of my confreres on this side.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): I agree very largely with the remarks of my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Cahan). So long as the present system obtains, whereby the government controls the preparation of all the estimates, exercising arbitrary powers with respect to every money proposition submitted to the house, the view taken by my hon. friend will be absolutely right. But it does not follow that this or that method should be maintained, or some other practice substituted in its place, simply because it may have been adopted in the United States congress or anywhere else. It seems to me that there is too great a disposition in Canada, in the country at large and in parliament in particular, to say that we should or should not do this or that, merely because it is done in Washington or London or elsewhere. When we have an opportunity to exercise our responsibility for the good of Canada, for heaven's sake let us do so in our own way. Of course, that does not mean that there are not certain things which we should imitate, but too often we invoke a precedent from across the ocean or from south of the 45th parallel to justify us in doing this, that or the other thing, which displays too much of the subservient colonial spirit still prevailing in this country.

When the rules of debate were subjected to our judgment, upon which I do not think we acted with very much judgment, I suggested one real reform in the management of the affairs of the country, one that would, I think, be conducive to public good, and result in abridging the work of the house, while enabling both the government and the individual members to deal with general matters without being clap-trapped for weeks and months in the consideration of small details. My suggestion was that all the details of the estimates should be submitted to a committee of the house, before which the permanent officials of each department should appear to give that information individually which they now give like schoolboys to their masters from two chairs in front of the minister, while the poor minister must repeat to the committee what he is told by his officials.

Therefore I am going to support this resolution, because I consider it to be the beginning of a new system which may prove to us that many matters connected with the management of the country could be dealt with more properly, as to their details, their preparation and their presentation, by a small committee where witnesses could appear, where the facts could be exposed and where reasons for or against any expenditure of public money could be given. That committee would report to the house, and the house would pass final judgment upon its findings. I do not say this especially in view of the object of this resolution; but I believe this is a start which may bring us to the point where we can get away from the absurd system which we have copied from the British House of Commons. There, however, without changing the letter of the law, they have radically changed the manner of dealing with the budget, and in about one-quarter of the time we devote to the voting of our estimates they adopt a budget ten or fifty times as large as ours, with at least equal efficiency.

I do not think this is the proper time to go into the question of the "dignity" of the judges; I do not think that dignity will be preserved by mere platitudes, or by putting the judges in such a position that they will not be reached by public opinion or by the scrutiny of public conscience. The dignity of the bench must be sustained by the manner in which the judges exercise their functions, and I do not think their dignity will be placed on any higher level by the fact that we raise their salaries by a few thousand dollars. I do not think the dignity of the bench will be impaired by the fact that the judges, if they find their remuneration insufficient, will be called upon to state frankly and under their own responsibility before a committee of this house why they desire a larger salary, instead of making use of representatives of the bar, who will demonstrate to the judges before whom they plead that they have been to parliament asking that the salaries of the judges be increased. It has been my experience, during a fairly long life, connected in a rather detached fashion with the bar, that some lawyers find it very helpful to plead cases either before parliament or elsewhere for the benefit of the judges; they find that in carrying on their profession they reap very tangible results by the manner in which they are treated by some of the judges. I think it much less dignified for the judges to have a few lawyers petitioning members of parliament to increase their salaries, than for those judges to appear before a committee of this house and state simply, in a dignified fashion, what they desire and why they desire it. Dignity is in the man, not in the procedure; it is in the soul, in the frankness of language and the rectitude of the mind of every individual, whether he be the King or his representative, a judge, or the humblest servant of this house. Among the papers I have received during the session I have noticed two or three petitions with regard to an increase of salaries, one from the charwomen who clean our rooms and another on behalf of the judges. This latter petition was submitted by proxy, but I do not think the charwomen of this house have sacrificed their dignity as women by petitioning for an increase in their salaries. Neither do I think the judges will sacrifice their dignity, if they really think they need an increase, by appearing before a committee of this house and allowing that committee to consider their case.

Therefore, I see no reason why we should reject the proposal. I agree that if the government are to stick to precedent and continue to walk in the narrow trail in which governments have walked for the last fifty years in presenting estimates to this house, there is no sense in this resolution. The government should take the responsibility for these increases of salaries, as my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has said, just as they take the responsibility for the estimates. We have to take human nature into consideration, of course; I know, as everyone knows, that many members on this side of the house are opposed to increasing the salaries of the judges. On the one hand the government do not want to displease the judges and the laywers, while on the other hand they do not want to displease their friends. All governments have resorted to such expedients, and I am not going to vote against the government because they have taken this way of escaping the direct responsibility connected with this issue. I give my vote in favour of this resolution, because it is a departure from a custom which may have been quite proper in the past but which is not now adequate for the amount of business done in this house or for the various complicated and technical questions with which parliament is called upon to deal. When you and I, Mr. Speaker, were young members of this house, many matters were dealt with directly by the house which are now considered by various special committees, and therefore I consider this a good departure in the right direction.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house for more than just a few moments. I wish to say a word in favour of this resolution, not that I know anything about judges' salaries, as to whether or not they should be increased; I am quite willing to leave that question to the proposed committee, but I do welcome this slight departure from our established custom, as the previous speaker has said. I have protested against cabinet government ever since I came into this house, and I shall continue to protest against it until there is more responsibility placed upon parliament. Of course it is easier for the government of the day to entrust a matter of this kind if it is not a popular one to a committee, so that the committee may assume the responsibility which the government is not willing to do. But even so I am glad that there is this departure, if indeed it can be regarded as such, of entrusting a little more power to a committee of this house and a little less power to the cabinet. I trust that this will only be the beginning of a much larger departure in that regard, for I believe it will mean a much better type of government and will give each member of parliament some real reason for being here. I shall be glad to support the motion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I should like to say a few words on this question. In the first place the discussion has departed from the question under debate which is the appointment of a committee to decide whether the judges should get an increase in salary or not. I object to it on this ground: The whole question is one of responsible government. That is the question before this house. If the government has decided and apparently it has—we have listened to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, and I think one or two others, taking the attitude that they are favourable to the whole proposition —if the government has decided that the judges should get an increase in salary it seems to me it is the responsibility of this government to take the attitude frankly and openly before this parliament. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) very often stands up in this house and talks about responsible government, and about the traditions of responsible government in Great Britain. I think when we appoint committees to decide what the government has already decided upon we are getting far away from responsible government in Canada. Now, sir, if you appoint a committee to decide a question of this sort you are going to shift the responsibility from the government to a committee of the house. That is what is happening. There are times and there are questions, questions which the house cannot decide itself without interminable debate, when committees should be appointed, but here is a question as to which there is no difficulty in coming to a decision. The house is full of lawyers who are in close touch and contact with the judiciary. Any one of them can stand up here and give ample reason why the salaries of the judiciary should be increased, and I am not saying that out of any disrespect to the distinguished gentlemen on the bench. But because of that very fact, because the Minister of Justice already knows to-day the arguments which should be put forward and the reasons which should be advanced in justification of an increase in salary, I do not think there is any reason why this question should be turned over to a committee of the house. Let the government take the responsibility as a government should do in regard to measures upon which it has made up its mind. If this committee is appointed here is what will happen: Should criticism be advanced later the blame would be placed upon the committee, the whole house will be held to be responsible. But we are supposed to have responsible government and under that system this is what happens: If the government brings forward measures and those measures are not supported by the House of Commons then it goes to the people and the people decide whether that government shall continue to handle the affairs of this country or not. If that course be not followed we do not have responsible government at all. I do believe there are certain matters which could well be dealt with by committees. The estimates submitted to parliament could very well be dealt with by a committee; but here is a question which could be decided by the house itself probably in the course of an afternoon sitting, or at most an afternoon and an evening, and the whole question settled without submitting it to a committee which will tinker with it for weeks, taking members out of this house where they should be taking part in or listening to the debates. I repeat it is the duty of the government to submit this question to the house and have it decided here.

I have one other observation to make and it is this: The Minister of Justice in presenting the resolution quoted the United States as having adopted this system of deciding about the salaries of judges. That brought back to my mind the speech of the Prime Minister a few days ago in which he twitted me for having quoted United States statistics regarding immigration. He said, "Surely we can stay at home for our figures". I apply the Prime Minister's remark to the present question. Governments in the past have decided questions of this kind by themselves without the aid of committees. I think the present government should come courageously forward on this question and I think they would be supported by the house. The matter could have been decided in about the same period of time as has been taken up in deciding whether or not we should appoint a committee.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I cannot be accused of being a lover of lawyers; anything I say on this question will not be attributed to that. But we are discussing a very important arm of government. The functions of government are said to be executive, legislative, and judicial, and the resolution deals with the men who are engaged in doing the work of the judicial arm of government. One of the most important factors in connection with that arm of government is that it should be, unlike the other two, completely non-partisan in character, completely above disputations of a party nature. I ask what would be the result as relating to the judicial arm of government if any government came to this house with a proposal relating intimately to judges and their salaries and it were carried on a purely party division, or anything approaching a party division, or if one party—one of the parties in the corner let us say—were, on a question of this sort affecting the judges of the country to be placed in the position of voting against the others? That possibility is to my mind one of the best reasons why a question of this kind should be considered by a committee of the house. That procedure does not relieve the government of responsibility.

Mr. MANION: Nor parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: Nor parliament, but it does involve a method of approach to the subject which enables it to be settled, may I say, on a rather higher plane than has characterized some of the discussion which has taken place here this afternoon. I think that is the chief merit of the proposal of the Minister of Justice. I am sure we all have a very high appreciation of the services of the judiciary in this country in the past and it is rather unfair to say—and I have been guilty of saying it I will admit—that there is no reason to worry about judges because there are plenty of applicants for judgeships. That is not fair because there are many of the most eminent lawyers in this country who for the good of the country should be on the bench who have refused appointment. That is not generally known. There are always plenty of candidates for any public office which carries any sort of a salary, and for some that do not carry a salary at all, but that does not necessarily mean that the interests of the country are not to be considered rather than the interests of the individuals occupying positions or of those who may aspire to occupy them. After all our great object is to have the judicial arm of the government manned with the very best men we can get. But it does strike one as peculiar to know that a man sitting on the bench as a judge frequently has before him two or three lawyers pleading each of whom is in receipt of an income seven or eight times as large as that of the judge before whom the case is being tried. I know that has no fundamental bearing on the question but it furnishes a comment on the situation. I have no fixed opinion as to what should be done with regard to the indivdual salaries of judges, but I do think that calm reflection by a committee of the house upon a question so essentially non-partisan as this one, a question upon which a non-partisan decision is above all things to be desired, is to the advantage of the house and the country.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): It appears to me that the weakness in the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Dunning), is this: If it is so very important for a non-partisan committee of this house to fix the salaries of judges, how much more important would it be for a committee of this house to appoint the judges? I should like to ask the government if it is not a fact that the appointments of all judges in the past have been partisan appointments. There is a story told of a conversation between a Canadian and an American. The Canadian made the remark to the American: In your country the judges have to be elected. The American made the reply: Yes, and I believe that in Canada they first have to be defeated.

What is the basis of this resolution? Is it not simply that the government has trouble in its own ranks regarding the matter and it wants to shift the responsibility on to parliament? If it has not, why are the reasons held back that the government does not assume its responsibility and bring down a measure as it does in connection with every other matter? This is a violation of the regular order of procedure of government. As the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has rightly said, it is the duty of a government to assume responsibility for its actions. This government is prepared to do that only when the road is easy. When there is any difficulty ahead it wants to make parliament share the responsibility. You will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the house and the country will pardon me if I refuse to be one of those who hold the judiciary of this country in the idolatry in which it is generally held. They are human like everybody else. As I said before, they are mostly political appointees, sometimes of one party and sometimes of another, and the difficulty that I see in this matter is that you are not rewarding men according to the services they perform on the bench, but attaching salaries to positions. Nobody in this house, for example, will say that every man on the bench is equal to every other man in any of the different courts. Is that not something that should be taken into consideration? Should we not also consider the fact that men who go on the bench do not necessarily go there for the money? Do men come into parliament for the money? Do men go into the cabinet for money? Is there not in the case of nearly every member of parliament and of the cabinet a financial sacrifice when he takes a position of that kind? Does a man not accept a position in the high courts of Canada for something outside of the monetary consideration? Is it not worth something to him, to his family and to the record that he will leave behind him, to think that he has held a high position in our courts?

I am not opposed to this measure in the least; I think our judges should be paid in proportion to the service they render and to their ability, but there is more to be taken into consideration than simply the monetary award a man receives when he ascends the bench. Many of them are well-off when they accept a position of that kind. Many of them do not need the money. I say this without any disrespect, that there are in this country some minor judges who do not work more than one or two months in the year. Are we going to raise the salaries of them all, or are we simply going to pick out certain courts and raise the salaries there, or how is this matter to be handled? It is the duty of the government to formulate its policy, to bring it before parliament and to ask parliament to sanction it. We got the clue to the difficulty from an hon. member on the other side when he said that he was opposed to this resolution. It is the trouble in the ranks of the people behind the government and not any principle which is at stake, that has forced the government to come to parliament with this resolution. Consequently, I for one say that it is the duty of the government to come to parliament with a bill, if they think fit to bring one in to raise the salaries of judges, and to ask parliament to sanction it.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) said that the cabinet was a committee of parliament. Everyone, including the Solicitor General, knows that is not true. The cabinet is a committee of the Liberal party and nothing else, and because by referring this matter of the salaries of judges to a special committee, we would be referring it to a committee of parliament, I am very much in favour of the resolution brought down by the government.

May I say I was astonished and pained to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that had he been a man of less education, he would have treated his question with the contempt it deserved? I have very much less education and I would have asked the same question. We are in this house as equals—I am not sure that the lawyers will agree with that—we are here to represent the Canadian people, and while I do not mind taking a position which might cause me a loss of dignity personally, because I do not suffer from dignity, I refuse to take a subordinate position for Southeast Grey. The people of my constituency have just as much right to say what they think on any question, and to ask any question they like in the House of Commons, as the people of any other constituency, even though the other constituency be represented by a high light in the legal profession. Therefore I resent what has been said and I think on further consideration the leader of the opposition will be sorry that he made the remark.

I am interested in the question of crime, and I think it would be true to say that if as much consideration was given to the standard of living and to the salaries of people we now know as criminals, or to all the people of Canada, as has been in the past and, I have no doubt, will be in the future given to the salaries of judges, we would need no judges. I am not going to go into the question whether judges need an increase in salary or not, but I can most heartily approve the method the government has taken. They may have done it for reasons of expediency but at least it is a democratic move and I approve the fact that they are sending the question to a committee on which all sections of the house will be represented. I do not think that is asking too much because this is just a class group coming to parliament and asking for an increase in salary, and we have just as much right to pass upon it as members of another group would have supposing we came to them and asked for an increase in salary for our class.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, we will take a vote.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Lapointe) which was agreed to on the following division:

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. STEEDSMAN (Souris): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). In view of the fact that immense quantities of American coal find their way to Manitoba in competition with Alberta coal, on which high rates of freight are charged, I would ask if the same rate per mile will apply on Alberta coal coming into Manitoba as it is proposed to apply on coal coming from that province into Ontario; and if not, why not?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The present order does not provide for a rate on coal from Alberta to Manitoba. That question has not been raised up to date.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS—CONDITION ON ARRIVAL IN GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) a question, which I wish to precede by a brief statement. In an address delivered before the Calgary board of trade, Major Strange, a well-known winner at the international grain show, said, "Canada's reputation in the wheat markets of the world is in danger." An editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press confirms Major Strange's statement, and I would ask the minister if he or any other member of the government has received complaints direct from one or more corn trade associations in Great Britain concerning the condition in which Canadian grain in arriving in that market.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In reply to my hon. friend, I may say that a letter was received from the Liverpool Corn Exchange pointing out that during the last two years there appeared to have been a decided lowering of the grades of Canadian grain. Whether this was due to bad seasons or a lowering of inspection they did not know, but they expressed the opinion that if the grades were not maintained serious injury might be done to Canada's reputation as a wheat-producing country.

NOVA SCOTIA LEGAL FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that on February 20 an order in my name was passed for a return showing the amounts paid to various counsel and solicitors in the province of Nova Scotia in the prosecution of cases arising out of the Customs and Excise Acts. To date no return has been made to that order.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I may inform my hon. friend that every department is paying the fees of counsel who are engaged to look after its cases. We appoint a lawyer to recommend the names of counsel, but fortunately the various departments pay the fees. So I suppose the information will have to come through the Secretary of State when all the departments have reported to him.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—535. Grasses, seaweed, mosses and vegetable fibres other than cotton, not coloured, nor further manufactured than dried, cleaned, cut to size, ground and sifted; oakum of flax, hemp, or jute; coir and coir yarn: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Mr. KENNEDY: What were the imports under this item, and where from?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of the imports. "Practically no change in revenue," is the note I have. My hon. friend will observe that there is a reduction in the British preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: Were there any imports at all under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification from which we could trace returns.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—535b and 535c agreed to.

Customs tariff—535d. Garnetted material obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use, n.o.p.; wiping rags and wiping waste, n.o.p.; waste portions of unused fabrics, machine-cleaned waste, n.o.p., not to include remnants nor mill ends: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a change in this item, is there not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The words "rags and waste, sold by weight" are struck out, and the words, "machine-cleaned waste, n.o.p." are inserted; the letters "n.o.p." at the end are also struck out.

Mr. KENNEDY: How are we going to tell the difference between the waste portions of unused fabrics in the two preceding items which are free and the waste portions of unused fabrics in this case where they are dutiable?

Mr. ROBB: This change has been recommended by the officers of the department as being better for administrative purposes. There is practically no change in the tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Unenumerated waste apparently carried a higher duty heretofore, 15, 17½ and 17½. Is that right?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—536. Batts, batting, sheet wadding and carded sliver of vegetable fibres, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not a change in that?

Mr. ROBB: There is a reduction in the British preference from 15 to 12½ per cent. There is no separate classification of the imports, and practically no change in the taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: But the vegetable fibres now under that item were under another item before, were they not?

Mr. ROBB: They are all here except the cottons.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the reason for the reduction in the British preference if there is no separate classification? Was any business done under the British preference, or is there likely to be as a result of the reduction? Who asked for it?

Mr. ROBB: There will be a separate classification in future. My hon. friend will notice that in these items the linens have been separated from the cottons, and there is a reduction in the British preference.

Mr. BENNETT: Two and a half per cent. But were there any imports of batts and batting to which this alleged decrease will apply, or is it just a little window-dressing?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of imports that I can trace. There are very few imports.

Mr. BENNETT: Just so; it is the old bluff.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—537. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk, nor wool: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: A question arises here which affects several items. Briefly, this is the situation. There is a duty put on fibre yarns, but not a corresponding increase of the duty on the products made from these yarns. I think in the manufacture of carpets these yarns are retained free under the British preference, but in the manufacture of twine and cordage they are not. A question of principle arises there. Speaking for myself, I have no objection to reasonable protection being given articles of this kind, but when such protection is imposed it ought to be carried through to the manufactured article. Previously, under item 558, yarn was imported free and the twine into which this yarn was manufactured carried duties of 20, 22½ and 25. Under item 537 yarn is made dutiable at 12½, 17½ and 25, but the protection on the twine made out of that yarn remains the same—20, 22½ and 25. The spread between the semi-raw material and the finished article, the rates of which were 20, 22½ and 25, is now 5½, 5 and nothing. There is a grave injustice done to this manufactured article unless it is given added protection on account of the increase in raw material. It is unfortunate that the records of the so-called tariff board do not contain any information in regard to this particular case; I understand they did not take verbatim reports at the time this case was considered. So far as I can judge, there is one factory, in Kitchener I believe, which will receive the advantage of this protection. I am not objecting to that; I do not want the minister or others arguing the other side of the question to charge us with any desire to take away protection from any industry. That is not our point at all. If the industry is entitled to protection we want to see it protected. But we do say that protection should be applied intelligently and scientifically through the various processes of manufacture. In this instance, as I have pointed out, several very deserving industries in the country, which have been set up under the existing tariff, have been enjoying a measure of protection on their finished product, importing their raw materials under this free item. Now a duty is imposed on their raw materials but no corresponding increase is given them in connection with their finished product. Perhaps the minister can explain these items.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. ROBB: Every year since I have been presenting the budget, representations have been made to me, on behalf of this firm my hon. friend has mentioned, that they should be given a share of the protection enjoyed by those purchasing their goods. I observe that even now, with this change, they enjoy a considerable spread, the difference between 12½ and 20—or 18 net, because there is a discount. After looking into the matter carefully I am convinced that the recommendations of the board are sound. There is a sufficient spread in respect of that industry.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will be good enough to look at tariff items 542, 543 and 543a under the old tariff, the one in force at the date this budget was introduced, he will find that jute or hemp yarn and linen yarns were free.

Mr. ROBB: Only for certain purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: Under certain conditions, yes; but they were free. Now, if the minister will look at the new tariff, he will observe that there are no free yarns. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: this means, I take it, flax or jute or hemp, being vegetable fibres. What I should like to know is why these items are free for special purposes under the old tariff and are now dutiable at 12½, 17½ and 25 or, taking the next item, 537b, 20, 22½ and 25, or the next item, 537c, free under the British preference, 10 per cent under the intermediate and 15 per cent under the general, for use solely in factories. There would seem to be a combination of items, the effect of which is to remove from the free list, under certain conditions, vegetable fibres such as flax, hemp and jute and to place them now under rates of 12½, 20, and, in one instance, free under the British preference, if used in the factory itself.

Mr. ROBB: I think the spread as between the finished product and the raw material in these industries affords sufficient protection. It is only fair that the protection should be divided. As regards the item which my hon. friend has mentioned, 542, only a very small portion came in and it was used largely for hammocks and twines. In 537a there is practically no change, but in 537b there is a reduction in the British preference, while in 537c my hon. friends will observe that it is free under the British preference. It is true the rates will now be 10 per cent under the treaty and 15 per cent under the general tariff, but the imports are principally from the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact, the total imports for the year were only $659,057.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says that the spread is ample. Let me point out what it is. Under the British preference the spread would be 5½ and under the intermediate 5 per cent, while under the general tariff there is no spread at all. As regards item 537c the minister will find that the article is free to those who use it exclusively in their own factories in weaving fabrics or insulating wire.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not complaining about that, but I suggest that it would be fair to include, in that provision, "for the manufacture of twine."

Mr. ROBB: That would give them a greater spread. The evidence goes to show that in the conversion of the product the estimated value of yarns in Dundee is $13 per 100 pounds, while the cost of conversion is $1.61. My hon. friend will observe that they have quite a protection there.

Mr. KENNEDY: I notice that in this group of items from 537 to 537c there is a general increase. Was this increase made for purposes of protection or for revenue?

Mr. ROBB: There is not a general increase; they remain free under the British preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: They were free before. There is an increase in the other items.

Mr. ROBB: There is an increase in the others which gives us something with which to trade in negotiating treaties. The imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, were principally from the United Kingdom.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is only one item. If you take the whole group you have six items all becoming dutiable at rates ranging from 12½ per cent to 15 per cent under the British preference. Thus we have one item at 5 per cent, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent becoming dutiable at 12½, 17½, and 25. Then we have another item at 15 per cent, 17½ per cent and 17½ per cent becoming dutiable at 20, 22½ and 25. These all show an increase, and I was wondering if the increase was made for protection or for revenue.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will have to place his own interpretation upon that.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am afraid this will not bear out the statement of the minister that there will be a great loss in the revenue as a result of the tariff changes.

Mr. GEARY: I would like to ask the minister one question. I wonder if he has observed, in the item to which my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre referred, that the spread under the British preference has been very drastically reduced. I understand there is a difficulty as between different manufacturers, and that under the present schedule one manufacturer is helped while the other will lose. I suggest to the minister that probably the spread is too low, and that he should have a corresponding duty on the finished article as a means of compensation. This is a brief which has just been placed in my hands; I do not know very much about it, except that the matter came before the tariff board on an application for an increase, instead of which these unfortunates now find themselves faced with a decrease.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but they still receive sufficient protection.

Mr. GEARY: Then the minister thinks this protection is adequate?

Mr. STEVENS: It is only 5 per cent under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: The manufacturer has a protection of 5 per cent in $14.61, and he only puts $1.61 into it.

Mr. STEVENS: That makes no difference. The point is that he pays 12½ per cent duty on the yarns out of which he makes his cordage; previously those yarns were free. Under the British preference he formerly had a protection of 20 per cent less 10 per cent on his twine, but while he still has that protection he is now compelled to pay 12½ per cent on the yarn which enters into the manufacture of that twine, leaving him a protection of only 5½ per cent under the British preference, with no protection under the general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: I will leave it to the judgment of my hon. friend. If he had the responsibility of adjusting this tariff, would he not consider that where an industry has a protection, taking his own figures, of 5 per cent on $14.61, while the manufacturer puts only $1.61 into the venture, the protection is quite sufficient?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot follow the reasoning of my hon. friend. I admit again that these matters are highly technical and rather difficult for us to grasp at once, but I have grasped the fact that whereas these yarns were once free the manufacturer now has to pay 12½ per cent duty on his raw material.

Mr. ROBB: He is dividing up with the other fellow.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister said he was appealing to my judgment, so I would suggest either one of two things: The yarns imported for the manufacture of twine should be included under item 537c, or the protection on twine should be increased to correspond with the increase in duty on the raw material.

Mr. ROBB: I have stood these gentlemen off for three years in their demand for increased protection on twine, and I would not like to concede it at the moment.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the minister would concede the other alternative.

Mr. ROBB: I think they are pretty well protected.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister should be quite sure of the possible effect of this change. My information is that it seriously affects a number of factories, possibly to the extent that they will be unable to carry on this branch of their business, while it benefits only one factory. I am not attacking that one factory: I would not want the minister to come back at us and say we are attacking one factory, but I do point out that this is not in accordance with the Canadian tariff as it always has been. It is not in line with our policy in the past to have an increase in the duty on raw materials without some corresponding protection on the finished article, and so I suggest to the minister, if he is obdurate with regard to the other suggestion, that he insert the words "for the manufacture of twine" at the end of item 537c. That item already provides for the free entry of yarns used for manufacturers in their own factories in weaving fabrics and insulating wires.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ROBB: No, I think I shall have to stand by the information I have before me. This has been a redistribution of the protection enjoyed by that industry in its various stages, and I am bound to say that I believe the protection is sufficient. I have had the same briefs submitted to me; these gentlemen have been here making their representations, but they are well taken care of and I am satisfied that they have a sufficient protection. The other factory, however, was entitled to something.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that there may be no difficulty about it I sent out for the revised statutes of this year, and at page 49 we have the jute, hemp and flax items. A large number of those items are free, as the hon. member for Peace River has observed, but they are made dutiable under the tariff now proposed by the minister. The hon. member was asking whether this duty affords protection to the industries engaged in the manufacture of these various articles. I am not going over what my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has said, but I should like to know what were the operating causes which induced the increase in the tariff on item 537, which covers manufacturers of cotton, hemp or flax, or of which cotton, hemp or flax is the component material of chief value; manufacturers of jute, which is item 538 and item 539, covering fibre, Mexican, natural, and tampico or istle and vegetable fibres and so on. Then follow a number of other items, including linen yarn, down to binder twine, which is item 554. Most of these items are free, but when we turn to the new tariff, we find that the only free items are rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of vegetable fibres, and also cottons, not to include materials for sewing, stitching or tacking purposes, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories in weaving fabrics or insulating wire. That is not the position under the old tariff. Those are free. Then binder twine is free, and that is the only item left on the page that is free. What I am asking, and I think it is a fair inquiry, is this: What are the reasons for making dutiable items that for years have been free? Are the duties protective or are they revenue duties? It seems to me these are relevant questions which we have a right to have answered.

Mr. ROBB: I may point out that 542 which my hon. friend has quoted is still free under the British preference.

Mr. BENNETT: But only under the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: And only for certain purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: And limited purposes.

Mr. ROBB: Item 543 is fully covered under item 537c, and is still free in the case of certain materials.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were free under all the items before.

Mr. ROBB: We have adjusted this so as to meet the British preference.

Mr. BENNETT: But there are no importations under the British preference. This is a simple bluff on the House of Commons to use a plain, common, homely expression.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us get down to rock bottom about this. There is no necessity of standing up here and saying something, and trying to induce us to believe it is so because we can read, and here is the tariff, and here are the items. The minister comes and says: Look at what I have done, look at what I have made dutiable and what I have made free. Look at what I have made free under the British preference. The facts are there were no importations under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: There were importations under the British preference.

Mr. BENNETT: How many of them? The minister says he has done certain things and it does not alter anything at all. It is simply piffle for window-dressing so that they can go out into the country and say, "Look at what we have done." They have not reduced the tariff, they have actually increased it. My hon. friends from Saskatchewan can take that home and tell it to their constituents. The facts are as I have stated.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends are not following the items exactly because some of them are divided. The total importations for one of the items mentioned by my hon. friend amount to $418,716.

Mr. BENNETT: What item was that?

Mr. ROBB: Linen thread.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not touched that yet.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not enter into this at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I deliberately left that alone.

Mr. ROBB: Of that $418,000 a total of $391,000 came in under the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: That has nothing to do with this at all.

Mr. ROBB: In the case of imports of yarn for weaving purposes, insulating and in hammocks the total importations were $513,191.

Mr. STEVENS: Yarns for hammocks?

Mr. ROBB: Yarns for weaving and insulating in hammocks.

Mr. BENNETT: Under 542, which under the old tariff were free.

Mr. ROBB: Of the amount mentioned $338,103 came from the United Kingdom. Then as to yarns for damask the total importations were $155,866 and $91,105 came from the United Kingdom.

Mr. STEVENS: Those were free before.

Mr. ROBB: Of linen traceable the imports amounted to $936. This came from the United States largely.

Mr. BENNETT: That was free before.

Mr. ROBB: Only $936 worth of importations came in.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister apparently has not got the point—or does not want to get it, one or the other.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is satisfied with his own findings. We are trying to point out that there is unquestionably a serious disability to important industries in this country. The minister has read certain figures but I have before me the customs tariff and these items that we have dealt with were all free under the old tariff. Now they remain dutiable.

Mr. ROBB: But they remain free under the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a minute. Under item 537 the duties are 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 25 per cent; under 537a, 20, 22½ and 25; under 537b, 15, 22½, and 25.

Mr. ROBB: That is what they were before.

Mr. STEVENS: They were free before.

Mr. ROBB: Item 537 was dutiable.

Mr. STEVENS: Now let us take 537c. We have a slight difference here. The item reads:

> Rovings, yarns and warps wholly of vegetable fibres, other than cotton, not to include materials for sewing, stitching nor packaging purposes, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories in weaving fabrics or insulating wire.

That was previously free under all tariffs. Now it is free under the British preferential tariff, 10 per cent under the intermediate tariff and 15 per cent under the general tariff. But that is limited to that particular class of yarns. Yarns imported for twine, for instance—and that is what I am speaking of particularly at the moment—which were previously free are now dutiable at the rate of 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 25 per cent. My hon. friend must recognize at once that there is a very serious disability imposed upon the manufacturers ot twine. For instance, just for the sake of consistency, why should the weaving factories and wire insulating factories receive this protection, whereas the twine factories receive no consideration?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from March 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 14, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company—Mr. Pettit—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 7—Powers.—Construct bridge across Niagara river, etc.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I wish to refer to clause 7, which deals with the location of this bridge. The clause reads:

> The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars or street cars and for any other like purpose, with all necessary approaches from a point at or near a point between the property of the Canadian National railways on River road and the north limit of Bender street.

In other words, they may put their bridgehead on the Canadian side from the northern line of the Canadian National Railway property. I have called the attention of the Minister of Railways to this, and it seems to me the government is making a great mistake in proposing to allow a bridge to be built close to that property. The Canadian National Railways have been aided by the park commission to widen out their road for their own convenience; they have brought in their railway tracks there, and to have a bridgehead butting up against their property with the consequent cluttering up and congestion of traffic, is absurd. If the government were to leave this matter of location to the railway board I am quite sure they would never allow a bridge to be placed there; but under this clause, when the matter reaches the railway board, all they can do is to accept the point that we lay out. We say under that clause of the bill that the bridge must be between these two certain points. We do not give the railway board an opportunity to say whether that is the right place or not. We simply tell them the bridge is to go there, although that is no place for a bridge to be. If we were to say instead that this bridge can be placed between a certain point and another a mile away, the railway board would have an opportunity of doing something, but this clause limits them to about eight hundred feet. That is absurd; no government should allow such a thing, and I am surprised that the Minister of Railways or his department has not noticed that clause.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for Lincoln, referring to clause 7, says that the railway board would have no right to say where the bridge is to be located. The first part of clause 8 reads:

> The said bridge shall be constructed and located under, and be subject to, such regulations as the governor in council prescribes.

Perhaps the Solicitor General might answer this question. Does that mean that the governor in council would determine where the bridge would go?

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If that be the case, why does clause 7 not say positively that the bridge shall be between two certain points? In other words the Solicitor General would say that the railway commission can determine at what point between those two points the bridge will be placed. I will agree that they can do that. But the minister will not say that the railway commission could determine the location of the bridge two hundred feet on the other side of Bender street. My complaint is that all that the railway board will be able to do is to determine at what point between the two particular points that are mentioned, the bridge will be located.

Mr. DUNNING: A few moments ago my hon. friend mentioned the Canadian National Railways and their interest in the matter. He was kind enough to speak to me in regard to the matter earlier in the day and since then I have caused inquiries to be made of the Canadian National Railways. I am now in a position to say that the Canadian National Railways are not opposing the bridge. Their attention was called to the matter to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. CANNON: They said so before the committee when my hon. friend from Lincoln was present.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They may not be opposing this bill because the bridge is not situated directly in front of their property, but if they thought for one minute that the bridge was going to sit alongside their property with the bridgehead two hundred feet away from them, and another bridgehead within fifty feet, they would have reason to object, and they would object. I know what I am talking about. There would be objection to it; there could not help being objection to it; there should be objection to it in the public interest. Somebody is proceeding without regard to the public interest; that is all I have to say about it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—tolls.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would ask the Solicitor General to insert the same wording here that he used before, to the effect that their tolls shall previously be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will read the bill as reprinted, he will find that it says:

Provided that such tolls shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is all right, then.

Mr. HEAPS: We have no control over the tolls charged against people coming from the United States, but this is a point that ought to be very carefully considered, because I can see where there might be a low charge to people going from the Canadian side to the American side, and a high charge when they are returning.

Mr. CANNON: On the American side they have in their legislation a provision for controlling the tolls. In any event we cannot go into that matter. All we can do here is to see that the Canadian public is protected.

Mr. HEAPS: But you might compel the company to give our own Canadians a return rate.

Mr. CANNON: It is a possibility, but I think a very remote one.

Mr. HEAPS: In other words, they would still have the chance of soaking our people when they return.

Mr. CANNON: I do not think the American authorities will allow that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section provides that the tolls shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council. I would ask the Solicitor General if he thinks that is the correct procedure. Should it not be subject to the Board of Railway Commissioners.?

Mr. CANNON: I have examined previous legislation covering similar matters, and I find that the tolls are subject to the approval of the governor in council. There was a discussion last night whether it should be the railway board or not, but for the sake of having uniformity in our legislation I think it would be better to leave it the way it is, with the understanding that the governor in council has power to refer these matters to the railway board for adjudication.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—issue bonds and other securities not exceeding $4,000,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This clause was discussed in committee, and I pointed out to the Solicitor General, who had really taken a very active part in advancing the bill through committee, that we were giving authority to this company to issue $4,000,000 in bonds before giving them authority to issue a lot of stock, and later on we give them authority to issue another $6,000,000, making $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 of securities which will be outstanding, if it is all issued, in connection with this proposition. In view of the dangling promise that is held out to us that, after the securities have been retired, the bridge will come back to the Dominion or provincial government, I would like to inquire if the Solicitor General has considered placing in the bill the terms upon which the stock will be retired. I suggested to him yesterday that we insert a clause similar to that used by a private corporation when it issues preferred stock, that the company may call in the stock at a premium, say at 110. That provision is printed on the stock certificate so that everybody who purchases the stock knows the terms on which it may be retired. Unless that is done in this case, this so-called promise to return the bridge to the Canadian people is not worth a snap of the finger, and the minister knows that as well as everybody else.

Mr. CANNON: Clause 11 must be read in conjunction with clause 18, the proviso in which meets the argument of my hon. friend. The proviso in clause 18 says:

Provided always that the period for the payment of the obligations—

That is what my hon. friend is referring to.

—of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That does not amount to anything unless we insert a provision that the stock is to be retired at a certain figure. Otherwise, it might be retired at 400, and that is what will happen in this case. I know the situation; I know that you are giving away a valuable franchise. The stock of this company will be worth a great deal of money, and you are not taking the warning that is being given to you.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—power to issue shares as paid-up stock in payment of acquired properties.

Mr. CAHAN: I simply wish to note that under this clause the entire stock of the company may be watered. The provision is that the capital stock of the company shall be $1,500,000, divided into shares of $100 each. That entire stock of $1,500,000 may be paid up by a fictitious or nominal consideration. It may be entirely watered, under the practice of these corporations at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: The cost of getting the charter.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, issued for the cost of getting the charter, and then, putting the best case for the public, when the company has earned sufficient to pay off its bonds, which may be issued for cash,—there is no limit to the price which will be paid for those bonds—and has retired the capital stock, which is watered, at a price of par at least, the bridge may become the property of the public. I have done it as a lawyer, and I will do it again—arrange for contracts to pay up capital stock by fictitious values—as long as this parliament authorizes it to be done. I have no moral scruples at all if I am engaged as counsel in organizing a company so long as parliament authorizes it; that is, I will draw contracts which will enable my clients to comply with the law. But sitting as a member of parliament, I say that I do not approve of legislation which enables companies exercising public franchises to water their stock to the full limit, and then provide means for the redemption of that stock for cash as if it had been paid up in cash.

Mr. CANNON: I am not as familiar with company operations as my hon. friend, not having had his long experience at the bar. I am quite sure that many abuses could be wiped out, but I do not think his remarks have any relation to clause 12, which authorizes the company to pay for certain things with paid-up shares of their capital stock instead of in cash. The original clause contained the word "services", which we have deleted. We did so to obviate exactly what my hon. friend has mentioned. As the clause reads now the paid-up shares can be given only in payment for any businesses, franchises, undertakings, rights, powers, privileges, and so on.

Mr. CAHAN: My objection is that the deletion of the word "services" leaves it wide open still. No counsel called upon to organize this company need exercise his imagination if he wishes to find either a business, or a franchise, or an undertaking, or a right, or a privilege, or some letters patent, or some invention, or some real estate, or some stock, or an asset, or some other property, which he can place in the contract as the consideration for the issue of the $1,500,000 of capital stock. There is no provision in this section and no provision under the general law which would enable a court to investigate and ascertain whether or not that consideration was of real value to the amount of the stock issued. That is my objection. I am simply calling attention to the present practice, so that the Solicitor General may act with his eyes wide open. I think the time has come when we should be very careful in authorizing these corporations exercising public franchises to issue their stock for a mere nominal value.

Mr. CANNON: The abuse exists in the general practice covering all these companies. This is no exception.

Mr. CAHAN: It is no exception at all.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why make it possible to do so in this case?

Mr. CANNON: The underlying principle of all legislation is that people are supposed to do what is right. People may take hold of a clause passed in entire good faith by this parliament and make a use of it that none of us could foresee; but if we attempt to legislate with that object in view we will never be able to frame clauses to meet all the eventualities which may be brought about by the ingenious brains of modern finance.

Mr. CAHAN: If the promoters of this company exercise the rights which parliament has created and bestowed upon them, I recognize no moral wrong in their so doing. I am simply calling attention to the fact that these companies do it when authorized by law—as this company will be—and they do not regard themselves as abusing the law or as proceeding in any immoral manner whatsoever; nor do I. But we as trustees in this parliament are doing wrong, for we are creating the opportunity for abuse of the public franchises which we bestow upon such companies.

Mr. CANNON: This clause does not give anybody a legal right to do wrong.

Mr. CAHAN: Because it is not wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: How could they do wrong if they act under a legal right?

Mr. CANNON: The clause gives power to the company to pay with paid-up stock, something which is worth while.

Mr. CAHAN: It does not say so.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly. The clause says:

> The directors may issue as paid-up stock shares of the capital stock of the company in payment for any businesses,

And so on. But if those directors meet and decide to give their paid-up stock for something which is not worth anything, we are not conferring such a right upon them.

Mr. CAHAN: You are giving them legal authority to do it.

Mr. CANNON: They would be simply interpreting the clause in a sense altogether foreign to what it means.

Mr. CAHAN: This clause authorizes the transfer of $1,500,000, the entire capital stock of the corporation, for a patent or invention.

Mr. CANNON: Which is worth something.

Mr. CAHAN: For something which may have no actual value above $100 in cash, and we with our eyes open are authorizing the company to do that. When we once give such authority by statute it is no immoral act, so far as my conviction goes, if the promoters should exercise their statutory rights to the full extent.

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure hon. members that the water will run under the bridge and not through it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: By this section, Mr. Chairman, we are authorizing the directors to issue $1,500,000 worth of stock. We have an interest in the value of that stock, because the company hold out to us the prospect of this bridge being returned to us. Therefore we ought to put some value on the stock so as to know what it is going to cost us should we take over the bridge. I mentioned this more than once before the committee, but no notice was taken. Now that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has called the attention of the Solicitor General to the practice to be guarded against, surely he will take some cognizance of the matter.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Amalgamated company may borrow money and mortgage property.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Six millions is given away pretty readily.

Section agreed to.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18—When property, etc., of company to be conveyed to Dominion and to state of New York respectively.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to enforce my point; so long as I am a member I intend to do likewise in respect of any legislation of this kind. I have experience in this sort of thing. If the committee is prepared to approve of what I consider an improper provision, then it will do so with its eyes open. Section 18 provides:

> When the corporate obligations of the company and of any of the companies mentioned in sections 14, 15 and 16 of this act, with which this company shall join or unite in the construction of said bridge, shall have been paid—

So far this provision is reasonable, if these corporate obligations are issued at a proper price. But the section proceeds:

> —and their capital stock shall have been retired in the manner prescribed in their by-laws—

The capital stock of $1,500,000 may be issued for a patent right worth $100, and then the by-laws may provide that that stock, of which $1,500,000 has been issued for a real value of $100, may be retired at any price mentioned therein. That is what the section means. So that if the by-law which is passed by the directors of the company, and approved in due course by the shareholders, so provides, this stock of $100 par value, for which less than 1 cent has been paid in actual cash value, may be retired, not at $100 even, but at $200, $300, $400 or at any price they choose. I suggest that in the incorporation of companies exercising public franchises such as this we should direct attention to provisions of this nature. We should consider them with our eyes open and not approve so readily of a section such as this.

Mr. CANNON: The by-laws have to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CAHAN: It is quite true that there is this provision:

Provided always that the period for the payment of the obligations of the companies and the retirement of their capital stock and any extension thereof and the provision of the companies' by-laws in respect thereof shall have been previously approved by the governor in council.

Mr. CANNON: In respect of their capital stock.

Mr. CAHAN: If the tolls are sufficiently high to pay, say, 12 per cent upon every share of $100 par value issued, the stock will sell in the market at say twice par; and if the stock is selling in the market—its nominal value being $100—at two or three hundred dollars, and the shareholders come to this government or to a Conservative government, these people who have bought and paid for their stock at this heavy premium will be allowed, under the by-laws of the company, to receive reimbursement on that basis. The difficulty is this: The promotor who procures the issue of $1,500,000 of stock for a consideration worth $100 in real value, or even $1,000, does not continue to own the stock; he is a stock speculator. He puts the stock out on the market and there is turnover after turnover until the stock reaches a premium of perhaps two or three hundred per cent. When the stock is finally transferred to the possession of the shareholder who has paid two or three hundred per cent premium, and when that shareholder comes to the government and asks for the approval of a by-law in respect of its redemption, the government will be in fact morally bound not to deprive him of the property for which he has paid full value. The promoter, however, has put one and a half millions or more into his pocket as a result of the transaction. In my judgment, these public utility companies exercising public franchise, whether they be tramway or railway companies, should not be allowed to issue their stock except for actual cash value, because they are exercising a public franchise, and their tolls should be kept in such ratio or proportion as will enable them to earn an income or dividend of a reasonable rate per cent upon the actual cash which has gone into the enterprise. It is different altogether from an ordinary industrial company, which is not speculative in this sense. They should be kept rigidly down within the usual limitations and restrictions imposed upon companies exercising a public franchise.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This is the last word I have to say on the bill—

[Mr. Cannon.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Some of my hon. friends I know, are impatient, but even they sometimes would like to hear the truth. Some of these people, from the west especially, rail about capitalism and about the manufacturers raising their stock. Let them look at this; here is a chance for them to get busy. Here is a company purporting to hand back to Canada a franchise after they have got through with it and exploited it. When they have done with it they are going to hand it back, and I am trying to get the minister to ensure that they will not hand back a mere empty shell. I have asked him to put a few teeth into the bill, but instead of that every tooth is drawn; there is not one in it. I have asked him to fix the price of the stock, as he can very well do. It is done every day. I ask him for the protection of the country to make some provision in this regard, and if he does not like to do so I am through. I have said my last word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Hon. gentlemen from the west say "carried."

Mr. GEARY: I would point out to the Solicitor General that the proviso in section 18 refers only to the period for retirement; it has nothing to do with other by-laws as regards retirement. The intention is not carried out in the proviso.

Mr. McGIBBON: It seems to me that the Solicitor General, who is piloting the bill—

Mr. GEARY: Pardon me; I should like the Solicitor General to reply to the point I have raised.

Mr. CANNON: First of all, this is a private bill, not a government bill. In the second place, I have taken a special interest in this bill because of its importance. If the bill can be improved, so much the better; there are many lawyers in this committee with a wider experience than I possess, but I thought section 18 as drafted met the situation. If other gentlemen of the committee do not think so, the bill can be amended either here or some other place. This is private legislation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the Solicitor General answer the question asked by the hon. member for Lincoln—whether or not he is willing to place a clause in this bill which will provide that the stock shall be retired at a certain price, namely, $110? That will not interfere with the principles of the bill, but it will protect the public.

Mr. CANNON: This is not a matter for me to decide; it is for the committee.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, it is: you are the whole works.

Mr. CANNON: I am very glad my hon. friend has that opinion for once.

Sestion agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Labour and materials.

Mr. HEAPS: This section refers to Canadian labour, and consequently I think I am entitled to say a few words at this point. Anything which can be placed in this bill to give protection to Canadian labour will have my hearty support, but I am wondering who was responsible for the insertion of this clause. Whoever he may be he deserved to have monuments erected in his honour on both sides of the bridge. Yesterday the Solicitor General told us that this parliament has no jurisdiction on the American side of the bridge, and I am just wondering what effect this clause will have on persons employed on the American end of the bridge.

Mr. CANNON: None at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Then I suppose that when this measure comes before the New York state legislature a similar clause will be included providing that American labour will be employed and American material used as far as it may be practicable to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: Half way across.

Mr. HEAPS: This clause goes all the way across; it says Canadian labour and material must be used in connection with the construction of the bridge as far as it is practicable to do so. The people who will have to interpret this clause may not have to use one cent's worth of Canadian material or the labour of one Canadian workman, and I do not see the use of including a clause of this nature if it cannot be carried into effect. I should like to see a section added to this bill which would give some protection to the men employed on the job, and I would suggest that the Solicitor General insert a subsection giving the men employed on the Canadian side of the bridge the benefit of the fair wage schedule prevailing in that particular part of Ontario. That would be some protection to them at least.

Mr. CANNON: Again I may say to my hon. friend that he is absolutely free to introduce any amendment he may wish, subject to the rules governing discussion in committee, but the work in connection with this bridge will have to be carried on under the general laws prevailing in this country, and labour will be protected by those laws.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask what laws we have to protect labour as far as wages are concerned?

Mr. CANNON: There is a general law, I understand, having to do with fair wages.

Mr. HEAPS: A Dominion law?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly, and my hon. friend may rest assured that my colleague the Minister of Labour gives a great deal of attention to that particular law. I may add that if my hon. friend has any suggestions to make to my colleague who is in charge of the Department of Labour, they would be very welcome indeed.

Mr. McGIBBON: I rather think the last remarks of the Solicitor General were meant as a joke. In this bill he is giving a private corporation something which should not be given; that is, he is granting a franchise which will create millionaires. Then he is asked what protection he is going to give labour.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member for Welland is sponsoring the bill; I am not.

Mr. McGIBBON: I agree that the hon. member for Welland is nominally responsible, but the Solicitor General is the main force piloting it through this house.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And through the committee also.

Mr. McGIBBON: Without the support of the Solicitor General it would get nowhere, and I leave it to the consensus of the house if that is not a fact.

Mr. POULIOT: He shows his good judgment there.

Mr. McGIBBON: Perhaps so and perhaps not; I am not disputing the principle of the bill or the good intentions of the Solicitor General; I am merely asking a question. When he is willing to give a franchise which will result in the creation of millionaires, is he willing to protect the public who will have to pay? He has been asked that question before and has refused to answer it.

Mr. CANNON: I take no credit for that clause; it was introduced by the members of the committee, who even went a step further. They received assurances from the people who are behind this bill that Canadian labour would be protected, Canadian material used and Canadian engineers employed.

Mr. McGIBBON: I admire the skill shown by the Solicitor General in evading this question. I am not concerned with anything but this point: The Solicitor General, and the government through him, are willing to grant a franchise which will create millionaires. What is the hon. gentleman going to do to protect the public who will have to pay for all this? That question has been asked a number of times already and he has skilfully evaded an answer. I ask him now whether he is willing to incorporate in this bill a clause providing that these bonds must be retired at a certain price, as suggested by the hon. member for Lincoln.

Mr. CANNON: I am sorry my hon. friend would not take any assurance from me; I will have to ask my hon. friend from Welland to give that assurance.

Mr. McGIBBON: The member for Welland can give us nothing; it is the Solicitor General who can give us everything.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The rather naive way in which the Solicitor General now dissociates himself from the bill is really laughable. I would remind him, however, that more than once he told the committee that he had amendments to offer to different sections of the bill. Now he says, "I could not put in an amendment; such a thing is impossible. Look to the member for Welland for the amendment."

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to move an amendment to section 20 of the bill, to the following effect:

And that the fair wage schedule be paid to the men employed on the Canadian side of the bridge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is the law of the land as a result of a resolution adopted by this house, and incorporated in all government contracts.

An hon. MEMBER: This is not a government contract.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is true. I see the point.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment suggested by the hon. member cannot be accepted at this stage. Standing order No. 113 reads as follows:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole house, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

The hon. gentleman's amendment is certainly an important one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He can give notice of the amendment.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. HEAPS: I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that a few moments ago the Solicitor General informed the house that the fair wage schedule would operate as far as this particular bill was concerned. Now in proposing this amendment I am only proposing something which may be accomplished by some other method, or may be made effective through existing law with which personally I am not very familiar. I cannot understand, Mr. Chairman, how you can call an amendment of this nature an important amendment when it does not change the character of the bill in any way, shape or form.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling was not based on the importance of the amendment at all. According to the rules it cannot be admitted. If we admitted the amendment at this stage we should only be establishing a precedent that would give us trouble at another time.

Mr. HEAPS: A few minutes ago the Solicitor General suggested that we could make amendments to the bill.

Mr. CANNON: Under the rules, I said.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a way by which amendments can be considered. One day's notice must be given to enable the amendment to be printed in the votes and proceedings.

Section agreed to.

Section 21 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the preamble be adopted?

Mr. EVANS: Before the preamble carries I should like to say a word on the principle embodied in this bill. You are giving power in this bill to a private company to construct a public utility. This bridge is to be constructed over the Niagara river, and no doubt in the future it will become very valuable to the company which owns it. To my thinking private ownership of a public utility is always an evil. We have found that out in the west, and sooner or later the government, or parliament, or the public themselves, have to deal with the situation thus created. We in the west have found that it has been necessary to take over practically every public utility with which we have had to do since settlement started in that country. There is some difference in eastern Canada and western Canada regarding public utilities. The idea in connection with a public utility is that all the work shall be done at cost. It seems that in eastern Canada, owing to protective privileges, it is possible to pass on the cost ultimately to a portion of the community that has no means of obtaining relief from the burden. This bill grants to a company a charter which I believe is being secured for the purposes of trading. It is a piece of legislation which gives power to the company to do a great deal of charter mongering. I have more than a suspicion, by the way, that certain clauses of this bill will permit this company to amalgamate with other companies, and that the charter is being secured for no other purpose than to rake in the dollars.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. EVANS: Levity is all very well, gentlemen, but this legislation is too serious to go through without a good deal of thought, and I am surprised to see men representing constituencies in the west sitting down and taking this thing so coolly. Whether this enterprise is to be located in eastern Canada or in the west the matter is one which affects the whole nation. It is in reality a national affair, and I feel that the putting of this great public utility in private hands is an evil that will be felt more and more in the years to come. When this measure came up in the committee on railways and canals last year I opposed it on the ground that it was a public utility which should never be allowed to go into private hands. It is international in its character, and if it is needed the two nations concerned should carry out the work. It should be done as the result of a joint agreement between the two countries, just as is proposed in the case of the St. Lawrence deep waterway. It can only be carried out as the result of a definite plan carefully studied in advance. It is certainly in the interests of the whole of Canada that the granting of charters of this kind to private companies—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. EVANS: —for the sake of gain should be stopped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. EVANS: This may seem odd to some hon. members—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having expired, the house will now revert to the order: House in committee of ways and means.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering item 537:

Customs tariff—537. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Prior to six o'clock there was some inquiry and some uncertainty as to how the change would affect the industry and certain comparative statements were made as between the former yarn items and the proposed yarn items.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has to be absent for an hour and I wonder if the minister would go on with another item. The hon. member would like to speak further to this one.

Mr. ROBB: I will wait until he returns.

Item stands.

Item 538 agreed to.

Customs tariff—538a. Articles which enter into the cost of the manufacture of binder twine, or twine for harvest binders, when imported for such use exclusively by manufacturers who manufacture such twine only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does this include machinery for making binder twine?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—539. Cordage, exceeding one inch in circumference, wholly of vegetable fibres, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What change?

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—540. Woven fabrics, wholly of flax or of flax and cotton, not bleached, mercerized nor coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 540:

Customs tariff—540. Woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not bleached, mercerized nor coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. MANION: Is this another increase? The rates are increased, are they not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—540a. Woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of flax and cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 32½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 540a:

Customs tariff—540a. Woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 32½ per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does this represent an increase or a decrease in the duty generally, the imports being taken into consideration? It looks like an increase.

Mr. ROBB: It is an increase in part. Also, it puts hemp in along with flax.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the purpose of the increase? Is it to protect some particular industry in Canada, and if so, what industry?

Mr. ROBB: It is to encourage the flax industry particularly that has been started out in the western provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct attention to the fact that at the last sitting we dealt with the cotton schedules? Is the repetition of the word "cotton" in items 540 and 540a not unnecessary?

Mr. ROBB: There is "n.o.p." there.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was "n.o.p." in the cotton schedules also. This says:

Woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton.

Mr. ROBB: The cottons are wholly of cotton. These are mixtures.

Mr. BENNETT: As the item is amended it reads:

Woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton.

That is covered in the cotton schedules.

Mr. ROBB: This may be a mixed product. The others are wholly of cotton.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why is there a cotton item in this? I thought we were separating the cotton altogether from the flax, hemp or jute?

Mr. ROBB: This may be a mixed product.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Is this item not passed on by the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Is this increase their recommendation?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do I understand the minister to say that the tariff board had recommended something? I thought they were a fact-finding body.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to point out to the minister that this is a finished article upon which the consumers have to pay about the highest rate of duty. He says that the tariff board have considered this and have given their advice on the matter. We have been placing on the free list certain yarns and other things that go into the manufacture of this article. The government is, under this item, again by legislation discriminatng between the rights of one citizen and another. I am wondering if the minister can say that this is a scientific tariff. That has been the slogan in this house for a number of years. Is it a scientific tariff when the consumer has to pay about the highest rate of duty on an article while everything that enters into its manufacture comes in free? Why cannot this go on the same plan as the binder twine where the material is allowed to come in free and the finished article is free of duty to the consumer? It is rather strange to me that we shall go on year after year—and we have revised the tariff many times during the last twenty-five years—carrying on in this way which is calculated to keep up the cost of living and to put an undue profit into the pockets of the manufacturers. We are told that this is a scientific tariff. Not only have we been carrying on in this way, but this year we have passed items that are calculated to impair the public revenue without any compensation whatever to the consumer. It it time that we called a halt to this kind of thing. Perhaps free trade is not advisable at the present time, but let us have a uniform tariff. Are we a commonwealth or are we not? Is there in this house a ruling class that has a divine right to rule? It looks as though the government has again, without any consideration whatever, coolly set this item down for the benefit of a privileged class. I could not let the item go through without entering this protest.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I did not spring my question with the idea of trapping the Minister of Finance at all. Perhaps the minister just made a slip of the tongue. It is very important that we should know whether the tariff board made recommendations or not. I understood the minister to say yes. I think we are entitled to the information whether the tariff board is simply a fact-finding board or not. If they have made recommendations, I think the committee should know as to what schedules they have made recommendations.

Mr. ROBB: I thought I made that clear last week when we were first discussing these items. The tariff board is called in consultation and sits around a table with the ministers and the officers of the departments, not only the Department of Finance but the Department of National Revenue. Having heard all the inquiry, the tariff board naturally have a round-table talk as to what is fair and best to the producer and the consumer, and this is the result that I now bring to parliament.

Mr. KENNEDY: When the minister says the tariff board, does he mean the three members of the board?

Mr. ROBB: I mean the three members of the tariff board if they are present in the city, and if they are not all present, the members of the board who are here.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): I notice there is quite an increase in some of these rates. Was this item passed on by the tariff board and an increase in the rates recommended?

Mr. ROBB: This is the same item in regard to which I gave an explanation a moment ago.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—540b. Woven or braided fabrics wholly of flax or cotton, or both, generally known as tapes or webbing, not exceeding twelve inches in width, with cut pile or not: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 540b:

Woven or braided fabrics, wholly of flax, hemp or cotton, or of flax, hemp and cotton, generally known as tapes or webbing, not exceeding twelve inches in width, with cut pile or not: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—541. Woven fabrics, wholly of hemp, or jute, or both, not bleached nor coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 541:

Woven fabrics, wholly of jute, not bleached nor coloured, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this an increase or a decrease, or is it simply a balancing of two items?

Mr. ROBB: There is a net reduction in taxation on the basis of last year's importations of $374,032. The importations last year under item 545 were $400,577 from the United Kingdom, $33,122 from India, $65,435 under treaty rates, and $26,513, under the general rates, from the United States. That makes a total of $525,647. The imports under item 546 were, British preference, $5,066,069; general, $1,298,888. The net reduction in taxation is $374,032.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is a manufacturer's item, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but not entirely.

Mr. KENNEDY: In item 541 we have a reduction, and in item 540a, which we have passed, apparently we have an increase in the finished article. So we are giving a little more free trade in what they buy, and a little more protection on what they sell.

Mr. ROBB: No, it does not work out that way.

Mr. KENNEDY: I think I ought to have an answer. The two items are surely related.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot give my hon. friend any more information than I have given him already. I have given the importations and stated that there is a net reduction in taxation of $374,032.

Mr. KENNEDY: But my point is that item 540a covers the same material, except that it is advanced a further step in the finishing process. One fabric is bleached and the other is unbleached. The unbleached gets a reduction and the bleached gets an increase; that is the point.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend probably has not noticed the amendment which has just been read. Item 541 deals with fabrics wholly of jute under the amendment that has been submitted.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister quoted a reduction in taxation of something over $300,000 with respect to item 545. That item was on the free list, so how could there have been any revenue from importations under that item? Where does the reduction come in?

Mr. ROBB: I did not quote a reduction in taxation on that item. I estimated that there was an increase of taxation of $5,000, but that the net reduction in taxation on the two items was $374,032.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will look at the schedules, he will find that commencing with item 540 and going on to 542a, which includes fabrics of jute, hemp, flax and woven or knitted fabrics, under the proposed rates there is but one of these items free under the British preferential tariff, and that is the largest one. Before the minister touched the tariff, there were several of these items free, according to the tariff I have under my hand. Now how can it be that there is a loss in taxation in applying the new rates as compared with the old, when under the new rates there is only one item free under the British preferential, whereas there were several before?

Mr. ROBB: I am giving my hon. friend the net reduction.

Mr. BENNETT: But how can it be so when there is only one item left free, and there were several free before?

Mr. ROBB: The importations were small.

Mr. BENNETT: They must be coming in under the treaty rates or under the general tariff. Item 541 deals with woven fabrics, wholly of jute, not bleached nor coloured, and that is the only item free now under the proposed rates under the British preferential tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: Was that free before?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised the rate was 7½ per cent before.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the trouble. It is now a comprehensive item. Part of the item under the British preferential tariff is free, but prior to the tariff being changed, more than half of these items had the right to free importation either under the British preference or under the general or treaty rates. I cannot for the life of me see how the minister makes out a net reduction, unless he applies the general tariff to items that are now free under the British preference.

Mr. ROBB: The imports are very small. There is an increase of $5,923. The big reduction comes in the other item, where there is an estimated decrease of $379,000.

Mr. GEARY: Has the minister any figures under his hand to show what amount of jute cloth under 546 is manufactured in Canada?

[Mr. Kellner.]

Mr. ROBB: No, I have not those figures.

Mr. GEARY: We were told that item 546 was imported from the United Kingdom to the extent of some five million dollars. Is that article manufactured at all in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Not to any extent.

Mr. GEARY: So that is not a tax on any manufactures here?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I noticed in the regular tariff schedule at page 74 that starting with 539 every item is free all the way down to 546. It looks to me as if somebody, perhaps the tariff board, has just mixed them all up so as to confuse everybody except those in the trade.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is proceeding to argue on items that I have allowed to stand to suit the convenience of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who is absent. When he returns I will explain that the imports under those items do not amount to anything substantial; one was less than a thousand dollars, and there were no imports of any kind under another item.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am saying that from 539 right down to 546 there is not one single item but what is free.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in the old tariff.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes. Now we have a similar list with only one free item in it.

Mr. ROBB: I will explain it when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre returns, or I will take the items up right now. I am willing to do anything to suit my hon. friends.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend the minister does not quite appreciate the point of the hon. member for Lincoln. We are not dealing with 537 or 537a. If the minister will look at the old tariff, commencing at item 539, which deals with fibre from Mexico and other places, and follow down the list to 545, he will find that in an amendment made by Mr. Fielding all the items were placed on the free list for the British preference, for the treaty tariff and for the general tariff. The new tariff now submitted by the minister removes every one of those items from the free list, except one which is left free under the British preference. The net result is that instead of being a reduction in the tariff there is an increase—very trifling, it is true, but still an increase.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is now discussing the very items which he asked might stand until the hon. member for Vancouver Centre returns.

Mr. BENNETT: The items which stood at my request are 537 and 537a, rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre is now here.

Mr. ROBB: But they include now 542, 543 and 543a. We might pass 541 and revert to item 537.

Amendment agreed to.

Item 541 as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—537. Rovings, yarns and warps wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, not more advanced than singles, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Prior to six o'clock we had some inquiry as to these items. The proposed items are 537, 537a, 542, 543, 543a, 750 and 711. For administrative purposes several of the former items are consolidated in one or two of the new, and these lose their identity as wholly free items; but the jute and hemp yarns for weaving which formerly entered free under item 542, and the linen yarns for weaving which formerly entered free under 543 and 543a will continue to enter free for weaving in so far as the British preference rate is concerned, and the British preferential rate is the effective rate. Such portions of these yarns imports as formerly enjoyed free entry for purposes other than weaving, that is, for making twines, will now be subject to 12½, 17½ and 25 per cent. That is, item 537, if single; and at 20, 22½ and 25, under 537a, if plied. The so-called twines will themselves enter under the latter item, thus leaving the spread in the British preference rates of from 12½ to 20 between the yarn for twines and the twines themselves. No single former item is absolutely comparable with any single new item. Portions of imports under various of the old may enter under various of the new items. The imports shown herewith are necessarily under the former items. I will give my hon. friends the importations. Under 542, jute and hemp yarn for weaving twines, and so forth, the total importations were $513,191. Two thirds of these importations, or $338,107, came from the United Kingdom. Item 543, linen yarns for weaving, the total importations were $155,866. About 60 per cent, or $91,105, came from the United Kingdom. Item 543a, linen yarns for hollands. What were the total imports of this item? Nil. There were no imports from any country. Item 750, yarns of all kinds for tape lines. The linen portions are not traceable. The total importations were $936—all from the United States.

It was intimated earlier in the day that the changes would be beneficial only to one mill, but I find that the home production of twines was 2,818,600 pounds. Of this total the Doon mills produced 807,296 pounds, or a little less than 29 per cent. In this connection may I point out that this particular mill spins its own yarns and converts them into twine.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the statement made by the minister; I think it is quite accurate. The only point I desire to make, and which I had hoped we might manage to meet successfully, was the fact that the manufacturer of twine will now be placed at a disadvantage as compared with other manufacturers who come under section 537c. I suggested to the minister two alternatives, one of which was an increase in the general protection to the manufacturer of twine on his finished product, comparable to the increase in the duty on yarns which go into the manufacture of that twine. The other alternative would be to put the manufacturer of twine under item 537c. If, for instance, you are putting under item 537c the factory weaving fabrics or using yarns for insulating wire, it seems reasonable to me to bring the manufacturer of twine under the same head. It is such elementary justice as must appeal to the minister, and I thought that after the dinner adjournment he would be prepared to concede the point.

Mr. ROBB: I was fair before the adjournment.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish at all to irritate the minister; I am not offering these criticisms in any captious spirit. I quite appreciate the fact that these schedules are exceedingly intricate, complex and technical. But the point I have made is so utterly clear to me that it seems to permit scarcely of any argument. Even at the risk of being considered harsh, I would put it this way: it looks to me like penalizing the manufacturer of twine. I wonder whether the minister would consent to let this item 537c stand for a few days in order to give those affected by it an opportunity to discuss it further with him, just as he has been good enough to allow the other item in the cotton schedule to stand for a short time.

Mr. ROBB: If I allowed this item to stand from now until Christmas the various industries concerned would not get together. They all want to get the big end of the stick. I have looked into the matter carefully and the officers of the department have also gone into it very closely and we feel that the division of protection is fair and reasonable. I do not want to repeat figures I have already given, but I would remind my hon. friend that under the division one of the industries thinks it's share of protection should be 13.33 instead of 12.50, as it is now. In another case the figures are 5.50 and 4.66 respectively. I do not think that either my hon. friend or I could make a tariff that would suit everyone in the trade, and I do submit that the division is fair.

Item agreed to.

Items 537a, 537b, 537c and 541a agreed to.

Customs tariff—541b. Woven or braided fabrics, wholly of jute, not exceeding twelve inches in width: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the item as amended?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—542. Woven or knitted fabrics, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, and all such fabrics with cut pile, n.o.p., not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the position of this item?

Mr. ROBB: The present rates, 22½, 30 and 32½, and 17½, 32½ and 35 are included in one classification, the new rates being 20, 27½ and 30 per cent. The estimated reduction in taxation, on the basis of last year's importations, is about $2,000.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister might explain one thing that is common to several of these schedules. Why is it that vegetable fibres are all grouped together? For instance, hemp, manilla, hemp fibre and jute are all grouped under "vegetable fibres." Is it considered by the experts a proper grouping? If so, why?

Mr. ROBB: The object is to separate the cottons, woollens, linens and flax and these other fibres and make a new classification. We are also providing for cases where the product is mixed.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—542a. Woven or braided fabrics not exceeding twelve inches in width, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

[Mr. Robb]

Mr. BENNETT: What change is there?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of imports, but there will be a slight reduction in taxation, which is included in the figures shown under 542. The changes are from 22½ to 20, from 30 to 27½, and from 32½ to 30.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that a fair way of giving information to the committee? My hon. friend tells us what the value of the imports is, and yet he says—

Mr. ROBB: I said there was no separate classification of imports.

Mr. BENNETT: Then how can the minister say what the loss in taxation will be?

Mr. ROBB: I say there is a slight reduction in taxation which is included in the figures shown in item 542.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. Then the figure the minister gave a little while ago included the importations that are now covered by this item?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That bears out the point I was trying to make, that the effect of regrouping these items is to maintain the taxation at a slightly higher scale than it was before. I estimate it anywhere from 2 to 5 per cent; taking the figures given to-day it cannot be less than that. The only point I wish to make is that there has been no reduction in the items but a steady increase, if you take them in the aggregate. It is perfectly clear; it is only a question of mathematics.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to take up the time of the committee repeating the figures I gave last week, but I have already pointed out that the total reduction involves $1,000,000 odd.

Mr. BENNETT: Fortunately some of us have learned how to compute; some of us know a little about mathematics. When the minister expects us to believe that there has been a reduction, after telling us that there is no separate classification, he is putting an undue strain upon our credulity. If you cannot make a computation and are merely guessing, say so; if, on the other hand, you have data on which to make calculations, give them to us. But do not guess and try to mislead the country into believing that you are doing something which as a matter of fact you are not doing. Do not try to make us believe that you are reducing the tariff when as a matter of fact you are taking a number of items, lumping them together, making some free and others dutiable, and presenting a tariff which involves taxation which is higher than existed the day before you touched the schedules. This adroitness and skill in the use of words cannot disguise that single-simple fact. That is the point. I can add two and two together and make four. I do object when the minister tries to take two and two and make five: he must take three and two to make five, and that is the whole objection. I sent for the statutes this afternoon and showed him the items which had been taken from the free list, but now he says that in the aggregate they are losing money. I say that in the aggregate the government will make something like 3 per cent more under these items than was the case before the changes were made.

Mr. ROBB: I am delighted to have that statement from my hon. friend; all I ask is that he try to convince the trade of the country that he is right. I venture to say that before these items are all passed we shall be told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we are reducing the tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Once again we have the old story that hon. gentlemen on this side are standing in the way of this, that, and the other thing, while hon. gentlemen opposite are removing protection and so on. That is all so much piffle. Let us get down to business, and the point is this: Should this government endeavour to induce this house to believe it is doing something which in reality it is not doing? I say to the minister that on the statement he has given to the house in connection with these items we have been discussing, hemp, jute, flax, vegetable products other than silk and the combinations of cotton, there has been a slight increase which is capable of being shown in exact percentages. I am not objecting to the minister raising the tariff where he thinks it is desirable, but I do say he should make it clear to the house that he is not doing what he said he was endeavouring to do. In other words, the western Canadian should not be led to believe that there has been a lowering of the tariff, while the eastern Canadian is led to believe the tariff has been raised. Let us face the matter frankly; the minister is taking the responsibility of doing these things and that is all there is to it, but let us ascertain what the changes are and what the probable results will be. Surely that is not unreasonable. The minister seems to think it is necessary to offer an apology for raising the tariff, but he explained it very clearly when he said that it was considered desirable and reasonable that the protection should be divided in the manner indicated. We do not object to that: we have nothing to say when he states that he finds protection necessary and that he divides it up between these two classes as he thinks desirable. That is perfectly all right: that is what we think should be done, but do not let him say in the next breath that he is removing protection to give free trade as they have it in England.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: I will admit that the hon. gentleman did not use those words, but at least the language he used this afternoon and this evening will prevent one of his distinguished colleagues from telling the people of western Canada how we have higher and higher protection on the one hand and lower and lower protection on the other. That is the position. We desire the minister to be frank with us, and I admired him a moment ago when he said protection had been found necessary and that it had been divided up between the two classes. That is the proper way to maintain a scientific tariff. We do complain, however, that you do not give us the facts upon which we may decide whether the tariff is scientific or otherwise except at odd intervals, and those intervals are so few that we are surprised when they do come along. However, when the Prime Minister gets loose in the hustings and tells us how his party has reduced the tariff, I will refer him to the language of his Minister of Finance, who now says that the government have found protection necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give us the imports of velveteen from Great Britain under these items?

Mr. ROBB: I will come to that later, and will give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: It comes under this item, unfortunately.

Mr. ROBB: I am told it is under three items.

Mr. STEVENS: In the absence of information I can only say that item 542, which covers linen velveteen, carries a duty now of 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent, while the old duty was 17½ per cent, 32½ per cent and 35 per cent, and it is obvious that the major importations are from Great Britain. Thus the British preference shows an increase in duty of 2½ per cent. I am not complaining about the increase, but I am pointing out that in the absence of information for which I have asked we cannot offer any intelligent criticism.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—543. Sail twine and canvas of hemp, or flax, imported for use in the manufacture of boats' and ships' sails: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask the minister whether the largest importations are under the general tariff or under the British preference?

Mr. FRASER: And would the minister give us the details of the importations as well?

Mr. STEVENS: We have not passed item 542a yet.

The CHAIRMAN: I called it.

Mr. STEVENS: We cannot interject an observation if you simply read an item and then declare it carried. We ask that you pause at least long enough to enable hon. gentlemen to speak.

Mr. ROBB: Then let us consider item 542a.

Customs tariff—542a. Woven or braided fabrics not exceeding twelve inches in width, wholly or in part of vegetable fibres, n.o.p., not to contain silk, artificial silk nor wool: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends will not make progress by calling "carried" the moment an item is called and before we have time to look at our documents. We are going to have a look at these items if we do nothing else. Because some hon. gentlemen take no interest at all in the matter is no reason why others who are trying to take a little interest should not have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. FRASER: Is there any reduction in taxation under this item?

Mr. ROBB: A slight reduction, which is included in the figures given for item 542.

Mr. STEVENS: This is all right, as far as I am concerned.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—543. Sail twine and canvas, or flax, imported for use in the manufacture of boats' and ships' sails: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I was asking whether the importations under that item come under the British preferential tariff or the general tariff, because it would appear that there is a reduction of 5 per cent in the British preferential, with an increase of 5 per cent in the general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: That is a very reasonable question. The total imports amounted to $4,400, of which $3,590 came in under the British preferential.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That will now come in free?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it will be free under the British preferential.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—544 agreed to.

Customs tariff—544a. Handkerchiefs consisting of woven fabrics, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not further manufactured than hemmed or hemstitched, not coloured, not embroidered nor otherwise ornamented. British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff 33½ per cent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to suggest that we be given a little more information than is contained in this sheet which is placed in our hands. There is nothing in it at all, and I for one object to proceeding with the consideration of these items when we have practically no information before us. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance and perhaps two or three of the leading men on this side of the house to have more complete information, but I submit that we cannot intelligently discuss these matters with no information before us.

Mr. ROBB: The only change in the amendment I have just read is that the word "hemp" is put in. The total importations will be found under 544b. These classes are separated. The total imports were $412,000. It is estimated that one-half of them come into each class.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the old number?

Mr. ROBB: It was 575.

Mr. STEVENS: This again is an illustration of the conundrum with which the committee is confronted. Here we have an item indicating handkerchiefs — handkerchiefs of linen plain and handkerchiefs of linen fancy, two items. By this measure we have repealed item 575 in the old tariff. Item 575 in the old tariff is a very long one, and includes the following:

Embroideries, n.o.p.; lace, n.o.p.; braids, n.o.p.; tapes of cotton or linen not over one and one-quarter inches in width, not including measuring tape lines; fringes, n.o.p.; cords; elastic, round or flat; garter elastic; tassels; handkerchiefs of all kinds; lace collars and all manufactures of lace; nets and netting of cotton, linen, silk and other material, n.o.p.; shams and curtains, when made up trimmed or untrimmed: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Now I presume, in the absence of any statement to the contrary, that these items appear in some other classification. I point out to the minister the difficulty with which we are confronted in estimating the changes that are made. It is rather amusing—though I am not complaining about the rate—that the minister made a statement the other day that the outside tariff he is going to permit in his rates is 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: On cottons.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, that was limited to cottons? I see.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend suggest that we should reduce this?

Mr. STEVENS: No. That is an old trick of the minister, the minute we criticize an item or ask any question.

Mr. ROBB: I just wanted to know where my hon. friend stood.

Mr. STEVENS: I stand for the protection, I tell my hon. friend very frankly, of Canandian industries, a protection that is fair and reasonable.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister just said that no item was larger than 30 per cent in the case of cotton.

Mr. ROBB: With one exception.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was that exception?

Mr. ROBB: I do not remember, but I made that statement with respect to cotton last week.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Here we have a new item 544b, handkerchiefs composed of flax or of flax and cotton.

Mr. ROBB: Those are mixtures.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Then you do not consider the mixtures although under the general tariff you provide a rate of 35 per cent? Why make the distinction between cotton in the one case and the mixtures in the other?

Mr. ROBB: These are cotton linens.

Mr. STEVENS: When it relates to cotton linens it changes its nature?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I must say I am quite satisfied.

Mr. KENNEDY: I want to ask the minister why he distinguishes between plain and fancy handkerchiefs, and if he thinks it will make it any easier to administer the law, or make it any easier for the customs officials? Under the old item 575 all kinds of handkerchiefs came in at certain rates. Now we have one rate for plain handkerchiefs and another rate for fancy handkerchiefs.

Mr. STEVENS: The rate is a little lower for the plain people.

Mr. ROBB: Both are reductions, my hon. friends will admit that. Is it not reasonable that what might be considered in part a luxury should pay a higher tariff?

Mr. KENNEDY: I do not think a fancy handkerchief is very much of a luxury.

Mr. BANCROFT: One is for show and the other for blow.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—544b. Handkerchiefs composed of flax, or of flax and cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 544b:

Handkerchiefs composed of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—545. Lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of flax and cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of underwear in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 545.

Lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What does the general public have to pay for uncoloured lace when they bring it in?

The CHAIRMAN: Carried ?

Mr. KENNEDY: No, Mr. Chairman, it is not carried, I am asking for information. This relates to lace imported by manufacturers for use in their own factories. What rate of duty do other people have to pay?

Mr. ROBB: We have passed some of these in the cottons, and some in the linens.

Mr. KENNEDY: Under the old item 526 we had white and cream coloured lace and embroideries, of cotton or linen, and the rates were, 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent just the same as is proposed here.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is a new item 545 which deals with lace and embroideries, wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of clothing in their own factories. What happens to the balance of the list that will not come in under this item but came in under the old item? Does it come in to a higher or a lower class?

Mr. ROBB: It has been passed in some of the other items. This is the manufacturers' raw material I take it. There is no change. Part of it is in 529.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is something wrong with that information. Item 529 is exclusively a cotton item. This 545 is a hemp and jute item.

Mr. ROBB: I gave my hon. friend the information some time ago.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does the minister say I have that information?

Mr. ROBB: I gave my hon. friend that information.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is quite right. We are repealing an item which is a general item:

White and cream coloured lace and embroideries, of cotton or linen.

The rates of duty were 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent. We are making a new item which is very similar, but it limits it to importations by manufacturers. Now the hon. member is asking what the general public, not a manufacturer, will pay for white and cream coloured lace and embroideries, of cotton or linen?

Mr. ROBB: Those are all in items 529 and 565.

Mr. KENNEDY: The point is with reference to cotton lace, flax, hemp and jute lace and wool. Flax, hemp and jute lace is brought in by the manufacturers at the old rate. What I am wondering is where is provision made for flax, hemp and jute lace to be brought in by the general public if they want it, because under the new definition they are excluded from importing it at this rate.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. ROBB: I am advised by the officials that most of it comes under the former item at the same rate as now. It was administered as a manufacturer's item before.

Mr. STEVENS: But it cannot come in.

Mr. ROBB: Not now.

Mr. STEVENS: It may have come in before, but where will it come in now?

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that the cotton items will come in under item 529, and the flax, hemp, jute and silk items will come in under item 565.

Mr. STEVENS: Then we have this rather peculiar position. Taking the minister's answer, we find that this item is increased from 12½, 17½ and 20 per cent, to 20, 27½ and 30 per cent in one case, and to 25, 32½, and 35 per cent in another case. So the minister again has made an increase in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: On a very small portion.

Mr. STEVENS: That is what the minister says every time. One would gather that the amounts were very small. What were the importations under item 526 of the old tariff?

Mr. KENNEDY: I am not raising any special objection to this, but I am pointing out to the minister that there is need for another item or another definition. I do not see how you can classify flax, hemp and jute as silk and art silk, and if it is the purpose to divide the cotton from the flax, hemp, jute and wool, another item would be required to deal with importations of that kind. It is not so very important.

Mr. ROBB: If there is no objection we will let the item pass.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—546. Articles made from fabrics, finished or unfinished, and all textile manufactures, wholly of hemp or of jute, or of both, n.o.p.; fabrics, wholly of hemp or jute, or of both, coated or impregnated: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 546:

Articles made from fabrics, finished or unfinished, and all textile manufactures, wholly of jute, n.o.p.; fabrics wholly of jute, coated or impregnated: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. FRASER: What are the importations under this item, which is a rather complicated one?

Mr. ROBB: A number of items are included. Most of the imports come in under item 537. The amount is $197,413.

Mr. FRASER: Is that under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: That is the total. I do not know what comes in under the British preference.

Mr. FRASER: The minister does not have them classified.

Mr. ROBB: No. There is an estimated reduction there of $18,654.

Mr. KENNEDY: I understood the minister to say that the important item was number 537, manufactures of flax. On page 187 of the Trade of Canada I find:

Other manufactures of hemp or flax, or of which hemp or flax is the component material of chief value, n.o.p. (dutiable).

That seems to be the only item. In 1926, the amount that came in under the general rate was $39,959; under the preferential rate, $34,886, and under the treaty rate, $4,434. The largest amount came in under the general rate. Unless there is a big change in the importations, there is practically no change under the two items except in the British preference, where there appears to be a reduction of approximately 7 or 7½ per cent. The general tariff, under which most of the imports come, is held at the old rate. That is the corresponding item.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—547. Bags or sacks of hemp, linen or jute, and cotton seamless bags; bags in which cement or lime mentioned in tariff item 290 is imported: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: There appears to be a little discrimination in favour of the cement people and against the farmers. This is the item under which we get our grain sacks, bags of linen and cotton seamless bags—15, 17½ and 20 per cent. The rates are the same under the new item. Bags for cement come in under a tariff of 15, 20, and 20 per cent, or a difference of 2½ per cent in the intermediate tariff. The minister should have shown more consideration for agriculture. The farmer does not get much benefit from protection as we have it to-day, and as the cement manufacturers do receive some benefit, possibly they should not be considered in this slight reduction.

Mr. ROBB: There is a decrease in one column. This does not cover bags imported by the cement manufacturers in Canada. It is to cover the case where cement or lime is imported. The language is the same as it has always been in the past, but it is brought into this classification.

Mr. KENNEDY: This covers containers for cement?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—548. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven or knitted fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing silk, artificial silk, nor wool, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 548:

Customs tariff—548. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing wool, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool, n.o.p: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this an increase or a decrease? It has all the appearance of a pretty stiff increase.

Mr. ROBB: The imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, were $21,733.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is under the whole item?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. The estimated reduction is $396.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Were the importations mostly under the general tariff or the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Mr. KENNEDY: I called the minister's attention before to a tendency which seems to be fairly general, and that is to increase, with one or two exceptions, the rates on oiled fabrics and oiled goods. Here, for instance, we have an increase from 20, 27½ and 30 per cent to 22½, 30 and 35 per cent. Item 546 is an exception, but the general tendency seems to be to increase the tariff on oiled fabrics. What is the reason?

Mr. ROBB: I have the following memorandum on that: The oiled textile referred to as incorporated under new item 532, at 22½, 25 and 30 per cent, is not a clothing fabric, but coated or impregnated fabrics. In the reclassification, coated or impregnated fabrics are placed in the fabric items and carry identical rates. These coated fabrics are in no way similar to oiled clothing, which is provided for under item 548a, and the rates on which are reduced from 20, 30 and 30 per cent to 15, 25 and 30 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What do these oiled fabrics include which are increased 2½ per cent all along the line?

Mr. ROBB: A typical example would be the satin used in the manufacture of women's shoes.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—548a. Clothing and hats made from oiled fabric of cotton or flax, or both: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What are the importations?

Mr. ROBB: The importations for the year ending March 31, 1927, were $34,829. The estimated reduction in taxation is $1,100.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the principle underlying these reductions? There are no importations of any consequence, and therefore the duty is not of very much importance.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend will admit that nobody will be hurt very much. These people apparently have the whole home market to themselves, and there is no reason why they should not stand a bit of a reduction.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—548b. Collars and cuffs wholly of flax or of flax and cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 548b:

Collars and cuffs wholly of flax, or of hemp, or of flax, hemp and cotton: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is a reduction here of 5 per cent in the intermediate tariff and 2½ per cent in the British preference, while under a previous item wearing apparel of the same type, practically, celluloid articles, the preferential and intermediate rates are reduced from 20 and 37 per cent to 15 and 25 per cent. I wonder why there is such a big spread? Is the minister trying to encourage us to wear celluloid collars?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: I am in the same class with my hon. friend; I do not buy them.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—549. Wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not further prepared than combed: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. KAISER: The time has come in Canada when we should think in a national sense in regard to the question of wool. I know that a year ago, when this matter was spoken of, the Minister of Finance took objection to the placing of a duty on wool, under a misconception, I believe. I am not going to discuss this matter simply from the standpoint of the tariff or the effect the tariff may have upon the woollen industry.

This country to-day is suffering from a lack of sheep, and to a greater extent than probably any of us imagine. From time immemorial the flocks and the herds and the soil have been the three primitive assets of every nation. We stand to-night in the face of certain remarkable facts which I want to mention, and the first is this: Canada has less sheep per head of population than any other country on the face of the earth. There must be some reason for this. In 1911 the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed a gentleman from my constituency, Mr. Dryden, a great breeder of sheep and probably one of the best experts on sheep in this country, to investigate the industry. He went to the United States and England investigating the industry, and came back in 1912 and made his report to parliament. This report has never been acted upon, has never even been seriously considered by parliament. He points out in this report, in the first place, that a country must have sheep, that they are a fundamental necessity. We speak of combating noxious weeds by means of chemical compounds, but it is absurd to expect anyone to go to a laboratory and mix up a concoction of arsenic and calcium, and expect by such means to get rid of noxious weeds. Sheep is the natural scavenger of the soil, and anyone who has been through our section of the country and chased home a flock of sheep knows that he will never find a dirty farm where a flock of sheep is kept. Twenty-five or thirty sheep will keep the farm clean; that is a common observation. Next, that farm will be a fertilized farm. Sometimes we do not realize what is taking place in this country. Take the automobile, for instance, and how it is displacing the horse. I am not going to talk against the automobile, but if the number of horses per head of population in Toronto in 1891 were maintained at the same rate to-day, Toronto would require 60,000 horses to carry on local transportation in that city. As a matter of fact, it has only 3,000 horses, and the same condition applies in all our cities and towns. It is simply beyond figures to estimate the value of the fertilization obtained from a source of that kind. We think we can supply this natural fertilization of our soil by artificial means, but this I claim is only an experiment; nobody knows whether or not artificial fertilization is going to last in our country. We do know, however, that in certain valleys in Asia and China where they have always resorted to natural fertilizers the soil is just as fertile to-day as it was two thousand years ago. Now I find that we have not as many sheep as we had even twenty-five or thirty years ago, simply because we are paying no attention to the development of our flocks and herds. I regard this as an extremely important matter.

Sometimes I have been asked how many sheep we have in Canada. We should have at least ten million; as a matter of fact we have only two million. There is no reason in the world why we should not have at least ten million sheep. Mr. Dryden and other stock men in my riding—and I claim that many of the best authorities on sheep and other live stock reside there—advise me that we can raise as good sheep in Canada as in any other country in the world. Proof of this is to be found in the fact that when we exhibit our sheep at the great stock shows they are awarded all the prizes. I am also advised that the wool is of just as good quality as that grown in Australia and other wool-producing countries. But we pay no attention to this question, although it is fundamental. We allow mohair to be imported free of duty. I am not quarrelling with that, for this reason: We consume $15,000,000 worth of mohair every year. Mohair is the fleece of the little angora goat. I have only seen one of these goats in Canada. I have been endeavouring to get some wealthy men to establish an angora goat farm in order to teach our people that in these little animals there is a source of great wealth. The farmers of South Africa raise immense flocks of angora goats on their waste land, and reap fortunes from the wool crop. The place from which to get those goats is in the Angora valley of Turkey. While making investigations as to where the best quality of angora goats are bred, I ascertained that the Turkish government regard the angora goat industry of such value to their people that they prohibit the sale and export of any of these animals.

Between this city and my home in Oshawa is sufficient waste land to accommodate all the angora goats needed to supply our market with mohair. Seventy million pounds of wool are required by our people every year, yet we grow only fifteen million pounds, and half of that we export to another country for weaving. This should be investigated. The very best market in the world for wool is to be found in Canada, and yet we go to no trouble to develop sheep and goat breeding to supply this market, largely because of defects in our ideas and in our government. I am not speaking of this government particularly. It would take ten years of concerted action to bring about a transformation in this respect. In the first place the government should impose a small tariff on all wool, just to establish the principle, and raise it each year for ten years, and so protect the market of Canada for those of our people who would go into this business.

I wrote to one hundred of our best sheep raisers in Ontario for their opinion as to the best lines on which to develop this industry. I asked them if they thought it would be of service to the country to standardize prices, so that a farmer for the next ten years would know what return he would get for his wool. I believe it would be an excellent policy for the government to take into consideration at this very moment. There are many phases of this question to be attacked, and they should be attacked in an intelligent way. One of our best known farmers said to me within the last two months. "Sheep are the most profitable thing I have on my farm to-day. They give me at least two crops a year, one of wool and the other of lambs. I say it is the business of the government to consider what should be done. We should appoint a board or commission to deal with this question in order that our farmers may be encouraged to go into the raising of sheep and goats to provide wool for the Canadian market. I have estimated that to raise sufficient sheep to provide our own requirements for wool would create a living for 72,000 people. Right at our door we have the market means of developing this industry for our farmers.

I feel very strongly about this thing. I have gone to considerable trouble to investigate the facts, and in my opinion it is our business to proceed to develop our flocks and herds as one of our best assets. Ten million sheep would add to the assets of Canada 200 million dollars. It is not merely a matter of tariff. We should deal with each phase of this question as it comes up, and aim at getting within the next ten or fifteen years at least ten million sheep in Canada.

Mr. KENNEDY: Mr. Chairman, I have heard a good deal about the experts in the department who have been engaged on this reclassification, and I notice that in this item sheep are described as "goats and other like animals". This covers the old items 554, 555 and 556. Item 554 is:

Wool and the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat and other like animals, not further prepared than washed, n.o.p.; noils, being the short wool which falls from the combs in worsted factories, and worsted tops, n.o.p.

Item 555 is:

Wool, namely, combing wools or wools known as lustre wools and other like combing wools, such as are grown in Canada.

Item 556 is:

Worsted tops made from such wools as are mentioned in the next preceding item.

Then we have, under the new item 549, wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat "or other like animal" not further prepared than combed. Who is the scientist in the department that classes sheep with such animals as goats "or other like animal"? I would ask why we have a reduction here and apparently further on, in connection with woollen materials, an increase?

Mr. ROBB: There is a reduction in this item.

Mr. McGIBBON: With all due respect to the Minister of Finance, I do not think he has answered the question. I am subject to correction, but if I understand this item rightly it means that all the protection which the farmers of the country have had on wool is being removed. Am I right?

Mr. ROBB: I will answer the question when my hon. friend has finished his speech.

Mr. McGIBBON: What I am going to say will be based on the answer to that question.

Mr. ROBB: The total importations for the year ended March 31, 1927, under the item to which my hon. friend refers amounted to $93, and under item 556 the total was $5,099.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister has not yet answered the question. What is the policy of this government in relation to protection to the farmers on wool? Is it the policy of the government to remove all protection? In other words, is the government endeavouring to justify its name Liberal by giving away all the markets of this country to our competitors abroad? Canada naturally, by environment and climatic conditions, should be one of the greatest wool producing countries in the world, but we know what the effect has been of the present government's policy from 1923 and 1924 on. I wonder whether this is a further extension of that policy to destroy the sheep and wool producing industry of Canada and to take away from our farmers the last little shred of protection which has been left them. It would be interesting to hear from the farmer members of the house sitting behind the government as well as, to use the expression of my former leader, from those sitting angularly opposite the government.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps I might put on record the wool production of Canada so that we might have it for reference later on. Giving the fiscal years ending March 31, I would point out to my hon. friends opposite that in 1913 the total production was 12,983,300 pounds, and in 1914—under the administration which my hon. friend supported—11,706,920 pounds. For the following years the figures are these:

	Pounds
1915	11,319,247
1924	15,339,416
1925	15,111,719
1926	15,553,045
1927	17,959,896

We are sometimes told that the woollen industry is not growing and that under this government it has suffered materially. In 1922 the imports of wool amounted to 12,661,812 pounds; in 1923, 18,273,344; in 1924, 19,321,730. There was a reduction in 1925 and 1926, and in 1927 the total was 16,425,423 pounds. It is true that we export some of our own wool. For instance, in 1913 we exported 944,606 pounds.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Where did that go?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the records, but most of it goes to the United States. It is a superior wool which is used for felting purposes. It is not regarded by the spinners as the best wool for the manufacture of fine textile cloths, but it is good for felting and for carpets. The exports in 1914 amounted to 2,878,029, increasing until 1927. The exports from 1924 to 1927, in round figures have been:

	Pounds
1924	7,008,000
1925	6,443,000
1926	6,671,000
1927	5,353,000

The important factor by which to measure the progress of the trade is, however, the retention of wool in Canada. In 1914, under the excellent administration of our predecessors, the retention of wool in Canada totalled 16,081,010 pounds, while in 1927 it amounted to 29,030,202 pounds. I submit that for the consideration of my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the minister speaks of the retention of wool is he referring to our imports as well as that portion of our crop which we do not export?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that is what I understand from the statement. I quite agree with my hon. friends that sheep are valuable to our farms; there is no question about that. But we have had some experience in this matter and we do not need to experiment. The United States had a very high tariff for many years and I am informed that there has been practically little if any increase in sheep for the production of wool in that country during the last forty years.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the minister give us the importation of woollen goods for the same period for which he has given us the importations of wool? We cannot properly consider the question as a whole until we get not only the importation of wool but the importations of woollen yarns and woollen cloths.

An hon. MEMBER: They are different items.

Mr. McGIBBON: If they have a bearing upon the same industry it does not matter whether or not they are different items.

Mr. ROBB: I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend that information as we come to each particular item. I have quite a considerable file in connection with these items.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are now on item 549; before the minister passes from it would he tell me the importations last year under item 544?

Mr. ROBB: The imports of wool amounted to 16,423,162 pounds valued at $5,655,667. Then I think perhaps I can give my hon. friend the other information for which he asked. The importation of tops amounted to 7,472,198 pounds valued at $4,381,459; noils, 407,812 pounds valued at $179,513, or a total value of $10,216,639. That is the raw material.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then could I have the imports under the next item, No. 555?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, $93, and under item 556 they amounted to $5,099.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am quite sure of my facts; my point is that the importation of raw wool has been increasing at an enormous rate, and that very fact is responsible for the woollen mills of this country going out of business. To the same extent, it has also destroyed the sheep industry of Canada. You only have to take into consideration the imports and exports of the different articles over a period of time to see how they have been developing. I submit that when our neighbours to the south put on such duties against the wool of this country, we should give our farmers more protection than is given at present. I believe the United States duty at present is 15 per cent for unwashed wool, 30 per cent for washed wool and 45 per cent or 45 cents per pound for washed and scoured wool. This government, however, simply takes down the barriers and leaves the farmers of the country with no protection at all. The Minister of Finance has just said that there is a certain market in the pulp and paper industry in this country for wool, and that market is exclusive to the Canadian wool grower. If it were not for that fact growers of wool in Canada would be much worse off than they really are.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend overlooked the fact that under the only item on which there is a tariff at all the importation only amounted to $93.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Minister of Railways did not get the point at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry.

Mr. McGIBBON: Probably you are; I am sorry for you also. The fact is that the great market for Canadian wool is in Canada, and that is due to the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. DUNNING: To the pulp and paper industry?

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, and that is what the Minister of Railways has never grasped. It is only due to the fact that that market exists that the woollen industry of this country is not worse off than it is.

Mr. FORKE: I can tell my hon. friend that the market for western wool to-day is in the United States.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Minister of Immigration does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. DUNNING: No, he merely grows the wool.

Mr. McGIBBON: He does not grow very much of it. I will leave it to any manufacturer or grower of wool whether or not the great market in this country is created by the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. FORKE: There never was a better market for wool than the market this year, or if there was I never saw it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I feel sorry for the Minister of Immigration; there are none so blind as those who will not see. As a matter of fact, every man who knows anything about the industry knows that Canadian wool is especially adapted for that class of work, and that that is our biggest market.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, but we have to import Australian wool.

Mr. McGIBBON: For what purpose?

Mr. FORKE: To make cloth.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is not for cloth at all, and the Minister of Immigration has never grasped that fact. I will leave it to the Minister of Finance whether I am not right when I say that the great market for Canadian wool is not for making cloth but that the market has been created by the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. ROBB: And it is also used in making carpets.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is because our wool is especially fitted for use in that industry that it commands the present price.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend know that we exported over 5,000,000 pounds of that wool last year?

Mr. McGIBBON: Where to?

Mr. DUNNING: Principally to the United States.

Mr. McGIBBON: For the same purpose, and against a tariff of 15 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: I would like to say a word or two in regard to this question of wool. I am very glad indeed to see the hon. member showing so much solicitude for the farmers and sheep growers, but I would like to remind the house that wool is not the only feature of the sheep industry. The sale of lambs plays a very important part, and many of us have thought that the larger market in the United States which would have been provided by the reciprocity treaty would have greatly helped that feature of the industry.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member know that he had that market, and that the United States barred him from it?

Mr. BROWN: I know that very well, and I also know that we might have had it a great many years sooner if we had entered into that treaty. There is another very important feature to be considered, and if any hon. member is anxious to encourage the sheep industry especially in the western provinces I should like to enlist his sympathies in having woven wire fencing placed on the free list. There is nothing which handicaps us more in the west in the raising of sheep than does the cost of fencing. So you cannot consider this question only from the one angle.

With regard to the market for our wool, as I read the trade figures I believe we are getting the full market price for Canadian wool, or at least that we are able to sell to the Canadian trade all that can be absorbed at the present time. Not only that, but I have here the figures of Canada's trade for the six months ending in September, 1927, which show that in that period we sold to the United States 5,860,301 pounds of raw wool having a value of $1,595,801. That wool sold for 27 cents per pound. We imported wool also; during the same six months period our importation of raw wool, camel wool, alpaca wool and goat wool amounted to 5,450,020 pounds, with a value of $1,900,066, while from Australia we imported 204,278 pounds, having a total value of $91,442. That wool was bought at 45 cents per pound, and the very fact of that difference in the price per pound indicates that there is a reason for that trade. What benefit would it be to Canadian manufacturers of woollen goods if we placed an increased duty on that imported wool and compelled them to pay a higher price for their raw product? What advantage would such a duty be to the Canadian farmer who has not got that particular quality of wool to sell? Now those figures surely have some significance. The very fact that we import that quantity of wool from abroad indicates that wool is needed by our Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will my hon. friend say that wool could not be grown in this country?

Mr. BROWN: Evidently it is not being grown.

Mr. McGIBBON: "Evidently" is no argument.

Mr. BROWN: Very well, it is not being grown—

Mr. McGIBBON: But it could be.

Mr. BROWN: —and the judgment of the men versed in the business is that that particular quality of wool could not be grown—

Mr. McGIBBON: No such thing.

Mr. BROWN: —in Canada. But I am reminded of a conversation that is supposed to have taken place between a Scotch shopkeeper and a customer. You have to understand broad Scotch to appreciate it, but the conversation was in these terms:

Customer: Oo?

Shopkeeper: Ay, oo.

Customer: A'oo?

Shopkeeper: Ay, a'oo.

Customer: A'ae oo?

Shopkeeper: Ay, a'ae oo.

That means that the question was not only was it wool, but it was all the same kind of wool. Now this question of wool cannot be considered by thinking of wool all in one class. There is wool and wool, and there is a particular class of wool that is being imported for the benefit of the manufacturers. We do not want to hurt them in this matter, and the putting of a duty on this wool would not be an atom of protection to the Canadian farmer, because the export market in the United States fixes the price for the wool that is used in our Canadian industry.

Mr. McGIBBON: You cannot convince the Canadian farmer that you are taking proper care of him.

Mr. KAISER: I should like to add one or two words further. First of all, I should not like to have my hon. friend (Mr. Brown) get too badly mixed up in some of his figures. Some five million pounds of Canadian wool are exported, and that wool is exported to the United States. You may ask yourself the question, "Why is that?". Did the hon. member for Lisgar ever go to any of the leading exporters of wool and ask them some questions concerning this?—

Mr. McGIBBON: No, he never did.

Mr. KAISER: Well I have done so, and they told me this—

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member for Lisgar might learn something if he did that.

Mr. KAISER: They told me that one of the great difficulties about the wool business in Canada is that we have scarcely any men in this country trained to grade wool. I have been told by these men that if our large industries—as they will do sometimes—need 100,000 pounds of wool of a certain class and a certain grade, it is convenient for them to buy it in tremendous quantities. Unfortunately for us our people have never been trained to grade wool in the way those manufacturers require. Now these men tell me there are factories in the United States that can use one wool, no matter whether it is graded or not, for the purpose of making large quantities of rough blankets and Indian ware where grading is not required, and that is the reason they export their ungraded wool to the United States. What I want to get at is this: The men who know about sheep—and I claim that I have been associated with men in my county who are regarded as authorities on sheep not only in Canada but in the United States and in every other country—tell me, and I am inclined to believe it, that we can grow any kind of wool in Canada that can be grown anywhere else in the world and of as good quality, and that we have a market right at our door. But we require government assistance and government leadership in order that the fleece should be brought to certain centres in each province and men taught there how to grade and handle the wool. If we had a school of this kind we would be able in a few years in Canada to meet the requirements of this country with our own wool produced from our own sheep, and in that way help the Canadian farmer. I am satisfied that if my hon. friend from Lisgar would get in touch with the men who are authorities on this question he would change his mind in a great many respects. We have the best market for wool in the world. Our people use more wool per head than the people of any country on the face of the earth. We have the soil for raising the sheep, and we have the sheep that can produce the wool, but it will require concerted action and leadership on the part of the government, in co-operation with the stock raisers. When we secure that we shall be able to accomplish results in Canada equal to those achieved in Australia, New Zealand, or any other country that has faced this problem.

Mr. ROBB: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, let me refer to importations of wool from the United States which the hon. member for Lisgar quoted. I think the figures he quoted were 5,473,041 pounds. If those figures are for 1927 they are correct. The hon. member also quoted certain small importations from Australia running to a little over 200,000 pounds. I rose to point out that the importations coming into Canada from the United States are not United States products; it is largely wool that is centred in Boston and is distributed throughout the world. Every person in the wool business knows that the two world markets for wool are London, England, and Boston, Massachusetts. The wool we bring in from the United States is largely Australian, South African and New Zealand wool. We imported last year 6,145,684 pounds from the United Kingdom. The importations from the United States are shown as 5,473,041, but I repeat it is not fair to assume that very much of it was the product of that country. We also imported from New Zealand 3,025,475 pounds.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I move that the preliminary statement of accounts of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1927, laid on the table of the house on Tuesday, March 6, be referred to the select standing committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): It is usual, on the motion of the Minister of Railways to refer these accounts to the committee, to have a presentation by the minister to the house of the financial affairs of the Canadian National Railways. It is impossible for members of the house to have access to the typewritten statement that has been presented, and it seems to me that another occasion should be afforded, after the printed return is brought down and distributed, for hon. members to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with it.

Mr. DUNNING: The preliminary statement of accounts was prepared in order to facilitate consideration, by a special committee of the house, of Canadian National matters as relating to the past year, and in the meantime every effort is being made by the management to get the completed accounts ready, together with the annual statement which accompanies them. Just as soon as that is in my hands I will be glad to table it in the house. I would call attention to the fact, however, that in former years any statement by the Minister of Railways has been made not in connection with the tabling of the accounts but in connection with the motion to refer the estimates to the special committee, and in fact there are several occasions upon which the minister might make such a statement as that mentioned by my hon. friend. In the meantime, we are merely enabling the committee to get along with its work. I am assured by the management that in previous years there has been very little variation in the final audited statement of accounts from the preliminary statement which will be available for the members of the special committee, and I shall make ever effort to supply a complete statement of the accounts to all members of the house as soon as I possibly can.

Motion agreed to.

FERTILIZER ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 72, to amend the Fertilizer Act.

He said: The chief amendment to this act is a provision for increasing the percentage of active ingredients in the fertilizer used in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF HAY AND STRAW

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 73, respecting the inspection and grading of hay and straw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The provisions of this act were almost entirely incorporated in the old Sale and Inspection Act, which was under the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce. This act is now being administered by the Department of Agriculture, and the main provisions of the bill have to do with certain changes in the grades of hay, to meet the requirements of each province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

*BRONFMAN PROSECUTIONS

Mr. EVANS:

1. Have legal proceedings been instituted against the Bronfman liquor interests (who operated in Saskatchewan) in accordance with the advice of the Hon. N. W. Rowell, K.C., counsel for the customs commission?

2. What has been done regarding the evidence and exhibits submitted to the Department of Justice, on the advice of the Hon. N. W. Rowell, showing violations by the Bronfman company of, (a) the Criminal Code; (b) the Excise Act; (c) Food and Drug Act?

3. What has been done regarding the evasions by the above company of, (a) the income tax; (b) the business profits tax?

4. Has legal prosecution been instituted against the above company? If not, why?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, it is practically imposible to make a categorical reply to the questions asked, and perhaps for that reason I might be permited to make a verbal explanation. The hon. member for Rosetown makes inquiry as to whether legal procedings have been taken against the Bronfman liquor interests in acordance with the advice of Hon. Mr. Rowell, who was the counsel for the royal commission investigating the Department of Customs. I might say that the recommendations come from the commission itself and not from Mr. Rowell.

The hon. member also asked for information regarding violations of the Criminal Code, the Excise Act and the Food and Drugs Act by what he calls the Bronfman company. I might say that as far as I know there is no distinctive Bronfman company; as a matter of fact there are no fewer than twenty-eight companies and concerns in which the Bronfmans are interested, in addition to some twelve individuals. All these companies and individuals are now under investigation with regard to the possible collection of taxes which have not been paid. The records of these companies and individuals are more or less incomplete, and I think the house will understand when I say that to cover the records of so many concerns will require a considerable time, but these investigations are being pursued.

With regard to the matter of criminal prosecutions, there is only one recommendation in this connection from the commission itself. That recommendation is that action should be instituted against Harry Bronfman for the alleged bribery of a customs official in the city of Winnipeg. Some time ago counsel was employed through the Department of Justice to carry on this prosecution, but unfortunately considerable delay has been caused by reason of the prolonged illness of the chief witness, who is an officer of the customs department.

With regard to the violations of the Excise Act and the Food and Drugs Act, I may say there was no question of revenue involved in those violations, and as far as prosecutions are concerned, in the words of the commission itself conviction is now impossible by reason of the limitations in connection with such prosecutions.

I might just add in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that all the concerns as to which either investigations or prosecutions were recommended are being so investigated or prosecuted; I think I may say that without making any exceptions, and there are one hundred or more concerns mentioned in the report of the royal commission. They are all under investigation; in some cases prosecutions have actually taken place, and in a good many other instances we have collected the revenues concerned. I might add further that as far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, we are taking action, and I assure the house that we will collect every dollar of revenue which is properly and legally owing to the government by the Bronfmans or by anyone else, for that matter.

7. If not, for what purposes and under what conditions are they allowed out?

8. Are the same regulations in force in all penitentiaries throughout Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. To or from relatives, yes; to or from friends, yes, if special circumstances require it.

2. Inmates are permitted to receive all proper letters. Inmates are permitted to write one social letter to relatives each month; also all necessary letters to transact bona fide business; also should necessity arise, permission is granted to write "special letters."

3. No. They may write as soon as received at the institution.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. Inmates working on farm or at such outside employment are not given exercise. Instructions call for all other inmates employed in buildings, shops, etc. to have fifteen minutes outside exercise each forenoon and afternoon. A total of thirty minutes per day.

6. Instructions issued are that should a holiday and Sunday come together inmates are to work one-half of the holiday. This does not apply, however, should Christmas fall on a Saturday or Monday, as on Christmas day they go to church in the forenoon and are treated to concerts during the afternoon. On Sunday the inmates are out of their cells to their meals and also for the purpose of attending church.

7. Answered by No. 6.

POSTAL DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo South):

1. What population must a town have before it can qualify for a postal delivery service?

[Mr. Forke.]

2. What are the names of towns in Canada under a population of 10,000 that are enjoying this service?

Mr. VENIOT:

1. There is no regulation definitely stipulating what population a city or town must have before inaugurating the delivery service by letter carrier. Population is one of a number of factors which have to be considered in connection with the inauguration of the letter carrier delivery service.

*SALARIES OF POSTAL CLERKS

Mr. ROBINSON:

1. Has the hon. the Postmaster General recommended that the salaries of postal clerks should be increased to a maximum of $1,800?
2. Has such recommendation been acted upon?
3. Has a report been made thereon?
4. If not, will report be made in time to enable the matter to be dealt with at the present session of parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I drew attention to this question, or a question similar to this, and remarked that it related more particularly to the proceedings of the cabinet. The question has been changed, but it is still open to the same objection. The only body to which the Postmaster General could make a recommendation would be the cabinet, and the only body which could act upon such a recommendation in the sense of the question would be the Civil Service Commission. I think any questions relating to the proceedings of the cabinet should not appear on the order paper, and if they do so appear it is impossible to make any reply thereto while preserving the traditional secrecy of the cabinet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

SALARIES OF POSTAL CLERKS

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, may I call your attention to the fact that question No. 23 was answered, although it is a question as to what the government is considering or will consider.

Mr. DUNNING: Question No. 23 stands.

[Mr. Smoke.]

Mr. GEARY: The same objection could surely be taken to that as to question No. 19 asked by the hon. member from Essex (Mr. Robinson).

M. MACKENZIE KING: The only answer to the question could be that the matter is under consideration,—nothing more than that.

UNEMPLOYMENT, SICKNESS AND INVALIDITY INSURANCE

The house resumed, from March 19, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Heaps:

That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

And the proposed amendment of Mr. McQuarrie:

That the said resolution be amended by adding the following:

"That the said committee be authorized to investigate and report on the operations of companies carrying on sickness and accident insurance business in Canada."

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Monday evening, I was stating that in England and Denmark, they had tried to apply the system of supplementary pensions, which perhaps would be the system approaching the nearest to the solution of the problem of invalidity, if it was backed by the good will of each individual and if the tendency to criticize did not impede its work, by making it difficult to consider requests for testing the system—prejudicing the minds of those making the inquiry to the extent of having them commit injustices. It is inadmissible that the state should directly force upon its citizens the art of making their savings thrive; it would be much more to the point to encourage, advise and guide them; however, we must submit to what is unavoidable and judge of the facts as they exist. All these systems, whether optional or not, are not adaptable when they are given a practical test. Some set the age for awards at 70, others at 60 or 65, but every day we see men capable of performing work—which they have for a long time done—with the greatest efficiency, and at a more advanced age than that fixed for pension. Must we declare them unfit and consider them entitled to annuities? Certainly not. Likewise, we sometimes come across a person under 60 years old, one who, although young, has become unfit through disease or he may simply be out of work and without hope of finding any; shall we oblige him to wait until he is 70 years old before coming to his assistance? Shall we content ourselves with blaming his lack of thrift? Which is not always the case, for very often ill luck has something to do with it. If therefore citizens have duties towards the state, on the other hand the state itself has duties towards its citizens, duties which it can fufill through special organizations, where individual thrift will be encouraged. All systems based on optional methods have had results that are not conclusive enough, for instance the subsidized optional insurance, voluntary assistance, charity, co-operation, economy reasonably practised, mutuality and participation in benefits; none of these systems have succeeded. That should lead us to advocate—while still having great regard for the freedom of individuals—thrift as enforced in Germany for a certain class of workers. This system has had good results—although not satisfactory enough, because a whole class, the great majority of which are included in the problem of invalidity and old age was set aside, leaving however to this moral person, the state, duties to fulfil towards it. Moreover, if the state has the right to tax each individual, for the construction and upkeep of highways over which numerous citizens will never pass, why should it not be in order to have a tax for the protection and support of the disabled?

Taking it as granted that it is impossible to find a perfect system owing to the imperfection and inequality of individuals, it is not the less true that we could find a remedy for many needs greatly simplifying the problem.

It is wrong to ascribe to lack of thrift alone the case of an indigent old person or of a disabled one. It may only be partly responsible, while uncontrollable circumstances in the life of individuals are mostly responsible for the problem. To guard against the lack of thrift and the ups and downs of life in all countries, thrift gave birth to insurance. By the same process, personal initiative has benefited many people, either by protecting them in the course of their activities, or by indemnifying them in cases of accidents, sickness, or again by allowing the person carrying an insurance policy, for life or for a limited period, credit of such nature as to inspire consideration and deference for his person on the part of hospitable people, benevolent and charitable societies; moreover of a nature to beget him the necessary cares of old age on the part of his own children. At that age especially, money seems to have great weight with people. But to benefit from an insurance, one condition is necessary: payments on the policy must be regularly made. This may be an easy matter when the person is young, full of health, earns steadily sufficient wages to keep up his policies; but what happens when, even during his period of activities, unemployment, accidents, misfortunes bear down upon him? It is possible that a certain number of individuals may have set aside sufficient savings to meet these contingencies, but the proportion is small among workers. What unfortunately happens with the great majority of them, is that they see their insurance policies cancelled, losing the necessary examination, admittance and regular disbursements, savings gathered through great sacrifices disappear in the vaults of insurance companies. They lose everything at an age when resources are most necessary. This is one of the factors of the problem of old age and invalidity.

The capital invested in all insurance associations or societies, to keep up an insurance policy, should be reimbursed to the insured on the discontinuation of payments on the policy, leaving to the companies the interest on such capital. That is only fair since the banks themselves follow that procedure and can afford to pay themselves dividends of 8 to 10 per cent and more.

In most of the societies of mutual assistance, the proviso in their charter allowing the head office to increase the rates of payments according to the age of the insured, may be a necessary financial measure, but the facts are still there to show that in the period of youth and activity, people in health take out insurance policies easily kept up owing to their low rates of payment, and when unemployment—brought on by old age or sickness—stops the wages, it is then that the rates increase two-fold, three-fold and four-fold for those insured who have no other alternative than to mortgage their insurance policies to carry on their payments—and this means the cancelling of the policies within a few years, leaving the old people in poverty. These charters should be amended, otherwise legislators should refuse the granting of them thus closing the door through which comes part of the problem of invalidity.

If to-day, insurance protects people in various ways, which is admitted by everybody it is nevertheless the truth that at times it is the cause of poverty. This may seem a paradox but it is a fact. This altered relationship is so to speak forced upon it by our legislation on labour in regard to employers' responsibilities of labour accidents.

The insurance companies grant to employers insurance policies for their employees, at rates based upon the age and the kind of risk which the work of the employee entails. Now, insurance companies know that generally, at the age of 45, the eyes of a man begin to show signs of myopy or hyperopia, that in certain work this affection may bring on a slight error in judgment and further render the employee liable to accidents, which may even prove fatal; they are aware that at this age, suppleness begins to disappear, a certain stiffness of the muscles and tendons is felt over the whole body, and involuntarily forces the worker, when he goes down the stairs, to strike each step many times with his heels, owing to a kind of nervous shaking which produces an unsteadiness of the legs; these companies know that the power of steadily gripping objects for the same reason begins to change and decrease, which added to impaired sight become a disadvantage for the employer and employee. It is then that insurance companies demand a high premium, even prohibitive; or they entirely refuse to insure the employee so as to protect the employer and themselves. The man working in the shop is then thanked for his services, at an age when he could still work more efficiently than a younger man not having his experience; once dismissed, it is difficult for him to persuade people to employ him. That is the way a man who can work is declared unfit. The same may be said of a man working on high scaffolds, at 50 years old he is cast aside and no one will employ him, because the employer is not covered by insurance against accidents pertaining to work, and which are liable to happen to a man having reached a certain age. Consequently that workman dismissed as unfit, to whom work will be everywhere refused, first will miss his wages, then his few savings, if he has any, will dwindle down, he will therefore mortgage his insurance policies and their cancellation will soon follow. Although enjoying relatively good health and capable of working, he will see himself classed among the unfit that poverty awaits. This is again a road upon which figures the contingent of old people in poverty and those who are forced to become unfit.

[Mr. Deslauriers.]

Our legislation on labour in relation to the employer's responsibilities towards the employee therefore gives rise precisely to the problem of premature old age and forced invalidity. Now, since we acknowledge such a state of affairs, should we not amend our labour legislation in regard to the employer's responsibilities in such a way, that insurance companies should have no power to cancel policies, and the employer should not be held responsible towards the employee, who has reached a certain age limit and would like to carry on his work?

No doubt we cannot force upon an insurance company rules for its risk rates—that is its business—no more than we can oblige an employer to hire such and such a worker. Labour legislation must be so amended as to allow the workman at any age to earn his living by utilizing his energies such as they are. The state should found a social insurance in which might be admitted any person having reached the age of 40, with special rates or even make up the deficiency existing in various rates. This insurance would be taken care by a tax on successions, by unclaimed balances in banks, by industries which have profited by his toils and by a contribution of the insured. In this way the contingent of disabled and indigent old people would be much decreased. If we include in our legislation what seems to have given the best results in other countries, that is supplementary pension for the unfit whatever be his age or the cause of invalidity, it is most likely that this problem, for so long the object of investigations, would be solved within the limits which are possible to human beings.

There are duties that devolve upon those who have wealth, towards society and the poor. In any stock-taking the manufacturer must make certain allowance for depreciation of his plant, machinery, tools and goods; why should he not make a certain allowance for depreciation of his human stock: his workmen, his clerks? The rich man must not only play in society the part of receiver withholding all he receives, but also that of a charitable channel spreading around him favours under the guise of insurance against unemployment or old age. If it is necessary the state should allow for such acts by remitting to him certain custom and excise dues or other taxes.

I shall quote on the subject the views of a celebrated economist: "Charity, moreover, is, for the person who practises it, a source of joy, wealth—like the intellect, speech, activity—was bestowed on man not for himself but for others as water was given to the mountain not to remain there but to flow and fertilize the plain. Look at this water leaping from rock to rock, cascade to cascade, on the hillside it is joyous, it sings and casts on its shores the pearls of its foam and song. Why? Because it obeys its law and fulfils its mission of bringing joy and fecundity to the countryside. It is the image of the soul that gives, devotes itself and lives for others. On the contrary look at the stagnant and greenish water in the hollow of the rock: it is dull and gloomy, putriscent and nauseous; it puts to flight the birds of heaven. Why? Because it should be a living water and it is dead. It is the image of the selfish soul folding within itself and finding in its own selfishness but a mortal weariness. We must live for others, and be the beautiful river which carries its wealth to towns and countryside, we must be generous according to our means, like the humble stream meandering through the meadows. We must be the drop of water which added to other drops is carried away to swell the river. Pray! let us not be marshes."

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the discussion which has taken place on the motion moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). Nothing more tragic has ever been portrayed on the stage of a theatre than the scenes we meet with every day in the general walks of life throughout the country. No more tragic picture, it seems to me, can be presented for the consideration of anyone who would like to solve these problems than that of a man who has done his best in life, who has played the game fairly with whatever intelligence he has and with the best of objects in view, and who yet has proved, through unfortunate circumstances, a failure or what, generally speaking, would be called a failure. The unfortunate circumstances might have been in the shape of a period of ill health which he could not control; or he might have been laid off or unable to get work when he was anxious to work. There is often a tendency to regard that man, who is in poor circumstances, struggling hard to get along and to make a fair living for his wife and children, as a failure. That is unfair to any man who has utilized his best efforts and shown a willingness to work when work was available. That man deserves some consideration at the hands of the government of the country in which he lives.

I was very much impressed with statements made in the course of his remarks by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He painted a picture which I regard as a true one; it is not overdrawn, so far as I can see, in any particular, and I have read his speech very carefully. He refers to the situation of a man who is on half time or part time or who has no work at all, who finds expenses crowding upon him and who is obliged to cut down the living of his family in order to meet his meagre purse, and to the economic effect of that man's situation on the country at large. The man is unemployed through no fault of his own; his being out of work lessens his power to buy, and this tends to create unemployment in manufacturing industries. That is an argument which struck me as reasonable and sound in every particular. The very fact that the man is out of employment himself and his purchasing power has been thereby decreased makes him a very important factor in producing further unemployment in the country.

Another point which was raised by the hon. member in regard to wages caught my eye. He made the following statement:

> If he cannot get work at his own particular trade he will break into some other branch of work, which generally means the casual labour market, thereby aggravating the condition because there is no more work in that market than before. Consequently he has to steal or share some other man's work, which generally means lower wages for both of them, and further decreases their purchasing power.

That brought to my mind a thought which I want to speak on for just a few moments, and that is the question of wages. If I might venture to refer to the country across the line without irritating some hon. gentlemen to the right of the Speaker, I think I am correct in saying that in the United States of America they claim that they are paying the highest scale of wages of any country in the world. They also claim that as regards their labouring or wage-earning classes, they have the highest standard of living of any people similarly engaged in any country in the world. I believe it is largely if not entirely true that, covering the United States of America, the scale of wages is perhaps higher than in any other country, and largely because of that liberal or high scale of wages the standard of living of the wage-earning classes in the United States is possibly as high if not higher than that of wage-earners in any other country in the world.

As this resolution deals with the question of insurance against unemployment, is it not wise to look this matter in the face and ask ourselves what has brought about this state of affairs in the United States? If the proposition is correct that the standard of living and scale of wages in the United States are high as compared with other countries, then it does seem to me that it is reasonable and logical to assume that that condition in the United States, to which their statesmen refer so frequently and so loudly, in praise of themselves, is largely if not entirely attributable to the fiscal policy adopted in that country. Take any class of people that you like in the United States, and what do you find? Even before the war the United States of America was a country with a very high protective tariff wall, but immediately following the war the United States took this position. They said: "We have within the bounds of our country a population of considerably over one hundred millions, and we do not propose to permit the people of other countries, with their cheap labour, to enter our market when the United States is excluded from their markets largely because of the cheap labour which prevails in these European countries which were engaged in the war, and also because of the fact that those countries which were devastated by the war are not in a position to buy our products. We therefore will protect our producers of every class in the United States against the low wage scale of the countries of Europe which were engaged in the war and devastated by the war, and also from the effects of their depreciated and disturbed currency. We will protect our producers in the United States against that unfair competition." I submit that that was a reasonable and sound position for the United States to take, and they have followed that policy wherever any one of their industries or any class of their people have been exposed to what they consider the unfair competition of the products of Canada or any other country. They have at once, through the power given to their president, put on an embargo or taken other means to keep out of their country the articles which were coming into competition with the products of their own industry. The result has been that in the United States their factories have been running, protected as they are against what they regard as the unfair competition and the low wage scale of Great Britain and the countries of continental Europe, and their people have been employed because their factories have been running. There has also been encouragement for production on the farms in the United States through the tariffs which they have imposed against Canada and other countries in order to protect their own farm products from the cheap production of the Argentine and other countries with a lower wage scale and a lower cost of production. I mention those facts, and I invite to them the attention especially of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house, particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), who, because of the position he occupies, must shed some tears over the unemployment that exists in this country, whether he feels like it or not; he would not be playing the game with labour if he did not show that he was a little concerned about the unemployment question; and I would appeal also to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), to the philosopher from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and others on the other side of the house, to my good friend from Saskatoon (Mr. Young), for instance, whom I see and who might give consideration to this matter—

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The resolution before the house is very definite and specific, and I submit that what the hon. gentleman is discussing has nothing whatever to do with the resolution. The question before us is the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Heaps:

That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity, and of the amendment thereto of Mr. McQuarrie.

Now, what the hon. member is attempting to discuss is the possible causes leading up to unemployment, and that has nothing whatever to do with the motion on the order paper. I would suggest that this house would get along more quickly and do its business better if hon. members were kept more closely to the question immediately before us.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not consider the hon. gentleman's remarks irrelevant at all. He is leading up to the question before the house.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member for Saskatoon just wanted to make a little speech.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am very glad indeed to have the interjection of my genial friend from Saskatoon. I think perhaps now he will be relieved of any obligation to make a speech when his turn comes, because he will have already shown by what he has said and put on the pages of Hansard his very deep interest in this matter. I may say, however, in regard to the point which he raised, and it is a very blunt point, that I felt justified in speaking as I did, Mr. Speaker, because I note that at page 1562 of Hansard the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion said:

> I do not agree with that particular viewpoint. I believe unemployment is a problem that ought to be faced by the Dominion government. In this house we deal with and pass legislation that has a direct bearing upon this all-important question. We deal with facts, immigration matters, trade treaties, foreign policies, banking laws, and all these I claim affect the volume of employment or unemployment in this country.

I am sure the hon. member for Saskatoon would not be so hard hearted as not to give me the same consideration that he gave to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), and I do not find recorded on Hansard that he raised any objection to the hon. member for North Winnipeg introducing the tariff and trade matters as having a bearing on the question before us; and the mover of the resolution having brought up that point, I therefore felt I was perfectly justified, Mr. Speaker, in enlarging upon it. The point that I was endeavouring to impress upon the hon. member for Saskatoon, the hon. member for South Huron, and one or two other hon. gentlemen, including the Minister of Labour, was that in the United States they do to a large extent solve this very problem of unemployment by adopting a fiscal policy which gives employment to their own people. The hon. member for Saskatoon knew perfectly well what I was coming at, but I want to state it in so many words so that there will be no doubt about it. The point I was coming to was this: In this resolution we are dealing with a very important question, the question of unemployment in Canada, and if the hon. member for Saskatoon and the genial philosopher from South Huron will add their eloquence and logic to that of the Minister of Labour, with perhaps a few words of advice thrown in by the Minister of Agriculture, and one or two others, they will perhaps be able to impress on the minds of the government the important bearing which the mistaken fiscal policy they have followed has upon unemployment in this country. As an illustration, if we were to give the encouragement which should be given to the production of wool in this country to meet our own requirements, it would afford employment to over seventy thousand people. Surely that has a direct relation to this question of unemployment. But the mistaken policy followed by this government and supported by these hon. gentlemen, including even the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), has practically put our sheep industry out of business. Yet that is an industry which ought to be encouraged, and which, if encouraged, would solve unemployment to the extent of providing occupation for tens of thousands of Canadians. I submit it is reasonable to point that out to the house.

I might call attention to one or two other things. I sincerely wish I could impress the importance of this upon the government. Take, for instance, our dairy industry. There is absolutely no question that tens of thousands of our farmers could be given a chance to establish themselves in the dairy industry if it were not for the mistaken fiscal policy of this government in allowing the importation of tens of millions of pounds of butter from Australia and New Zealand. These importations have absolutely discouraged tens of thousands of Canadians from establishing dairy herds. That has a very direct application to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), because if you are to authorize the committee on Industrial and International Relations to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity, that committee is bound to consider as many causes of unemployment as they can find; in a word, the committee must investigate all the factors which enter into unemployment. I am presenting some of those factors which I think the committee should investigate and report upon.

It is just as important for that committee to point out to the people of this country how unemployment can be prevented as it is to devise ways and means of dealing with unemployment after we have it. The old saying applies in this case as in others, "A stitch in time saves nine," and I do submit in all seriousness that it is our duty to consider whether or not the fiscal policy pursued by the government has a tendency to create unemployment. If it does have that tendency, then manifestly it is incumbent upon us to get rid of the cause, for by so doing we will be helping to reduce unemployment in the Dominion. I present that argument to the house in all seriousness and in the belief that it is sound. I was induced to present it after reading the speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in regard to lower wages and their meaning. I know there is a mistaken notion abroad in the minds of some political economists that a tariff always increases the price of the article to the consumer. I do not agree with that for a moment. The position is untenable. If you take some article which is not produced in Canada, for instance, tea, and put a tax on it, then perhaps you will make the people pay the full amount of the tax; but if a tax is imposed upon an article which is also produced in this country, then I say he who claims that that tax increases the cost not only of the article imported but also of the article of a similar kind made in Canada, is taking a position that is absolutely untenable. I mention that because again it comes back to the question of a correct fiscal policy for the dominion and its relation to unemployment.

I notice the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is doing me the honour of paying attention to my remarks.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear. I am admiring you.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I feel very much flattered by the hon. minister's admiration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I offer it modestly.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am indeed pleased. I hope he will take advantage of his great influence in this house and his legal training to do me the further honour of pointing out, if he can, wherein my argument is lame or weak, that the mistaken fiscal policy of the government has a direct bearing upon unemployment. I repeat, the whole matter of emigration is intimately related to unemployment. Tens of thousands of our boys and girls have emigrated to the United States. Why? Because they could not get employment at home. I say it is up to this or any other government seriously to consider to what extent the fiscal policy which has been followed is responsible for this exodus. What is the use of devising remedies and applying medicine after the patient is dead? The fact is that since the government came into power we have lost some six hundred thousand Canadians to the United States because of lack of employment in this country. They could not get employment at home because the fiscal policy of the government has given no encouragement to industry or to agriculture, and consequently there have been no opportunities for employment of our people.

I think it is more logical and reasonable all round to give consideration to how best we can prevent unemployment rather than to spend time and effort in an attempt to devise some form of insurance to meet the situation, which, in my opinion, might be very largely met by a decided change in our fiscal policy.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have had occasion to address the house under the forty-minute rule but I wish to assure you that I shall not occupy my full time. I rise to say on behalf of the government that we are favourable to the passage of this resolution so that it may go to a committee to investigate in all its bearings the question of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

But, sir, I have to point out that the amendment offered by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) is not at all in line with this resolution. It introduces practically a different question which should go to another committee, that on banking and commerce, and I would ask my hon. friend or someone on his behalf to withdraw the amendment so that we may vote in favour of the resolution.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No doubt there is some dissatisfaction on the part of the public regarding the cancellation of accident and sickness insurance policies, but there is this to be said for such policies, that they are only yearly, subject to renewal at the option of the insurer. The alternative would be to establish a system of non-cancellable policies. This form of policy has already been tried and the experience of the companies has been that it is not profitable. Many spurious claims, it is intimated, have been put in from time to time so that the companies do not find it profitable to issue non-cancellable accident and sickness insurance. If all the claims were as fair and just as that of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) I fancy there would be little difficulty in establishing that system of insurance; but apparently the claims have not been of that character. If that form of insurance has been found unprofitable by the companies, I ask hon. gentlemen representing various parties in the house whether in their opinion it would prove more profitable if administered by the government. I leave that thought with the house. I would suggest that as my hon. friend's amendment relates more particularly to accident and sickness insurance, he might very well withdraw it and if he desired to make further enquiry into the complaints disclosed in his observations of the other day he might move another resolution to refer the matter to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I did not suggest that the companies should be required to issue any policy which they would be compelled to renew; I made that perfectly plain. My point was that insurance companies carrying on this class of business should not be allowed to cancel policies while the insured was in such a condition, owing to the illness which he sustained during the existence of the original policy, that he could not get insurance from other companies. I will agree with everything the minister has said regarding the impossibility of requiring companies to issue policies which are renewable until the expiration of the time limit, that is to say, the number of years one is insurable. But in the case I refer to—and this is happening every day—where a man becomes ill the companies do one of two things, if his illness is serious: they eliminate the illness or refuse to renew the policy. In my own particular case I found myself in a position where my policy was practically cancelled; the company refused to renew it. On the date it expired I received notice to that effect. Then I found that other companies, for a certain period at least, would not take me at all because of the refusal of the first company to renew the original policy. This, it seems to me, is a risk which these insurance companies might fairly be expected to take. That is my point. I did not suggest at all that the companies be required to issue policies renewable for all time. I have no intention in the world of interfering in any way with the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), and if my amendment is going to have the effect of killing his resolution I will not press it at the moment. There is this difficulty, however, that it may be impossible for me to move and have discussed during the present session a resolution with reference to the point I am now submitting to the house. I suppose I could allow the matter to stand until another session, but it seems to me that the operations of these insurance companies should be controlled in some way. If they are conducting their business in an arbitrary and unfair manner there should be some means of regulating them. Certainly the present condition is nothing short of a scandal, and there are hon. members in this house, a number of them, whose experience has been similar to mine. Surely when you take out health insurance you should get something for your money. I am afraid that these companies are prepared to take people's money so long as the insured remain well, but when they become a risk the companies simply slide out, refusing to renew the policy. I suppose they are privileged to do this under the law as it stands; but the law should be changed. That was what I had in mind when moving the amendment; I did not intend to force any company to give me a sickness policy—I trust I can get along without one. I sincerely hope that this whole matter will be investigated by some committee, and I thought that inasmuch as my hon. friend's resolution referred to sickness insurance it would be proper at the same time to investigate the operations of companies carrying on that class of business to-day. I cannot see any objection to this proposal, but I wish to make it perfectly clear that I do not insist upon my amendment if its effect is to destroy the original motion.

Mr. ROBB: I understand my hon. friend is prepared to withdraw his amendment. I shall be glad to facilitate, so far as I can, the submission of his complaint to the banking and commerce committee. With much of what he has said I agree.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

TEST OF PULVERIZED COAL

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

Whereas the market for the output of British Columbia coal mines is seriously reduced by the competition of fuel oil imported at an enormous cost;

And whereas scientific research in Britain and elsewhere has demonstrated that coal, when used in a highly pulverized form, can successfully compete in price and results, with fuel oil;

And whereas it is very desirable that the output of our mines should be increased and more labour employed;

Therefore be it resolved—that, in the opinion of this house, in order to test and demonstrate the possibilities of pulverized coal, the government should adapt one of their steamers on the Pacific coast, and the furnace of one of the government public buildings in British Columbia, to the use of pulverized coal from Vancouver island mines.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is another of the many coal resolutions we have had this session, but it is unique in two respects: in the first place I do not call it a national coal policy, and in the second place I do not ask other portions of Canada to be saddled with enormous burdens of taxation in order to assist the particular part of the country in which I am interested. In this resolution I merely ask the government by a small expenditure to put us in a position whereby we can help ourselves, which is the very best form of assistance anyone can ask or receive from any government.

In British Columbia during recent years we have been suffering from the competition of fuel oil imported from the United States. Ten or fifteen years ago the exports of coal from the Vancouver island mines to San Francisco were so large that the operators maintained offices there for the disposal of the coal, but that condition has long since passed away. We do not ship any coal to San Francisco now, but we import enormous quantities of fuel oil. During the first half of 1927 we imported 59,000,000 gallons of oil on which duty was paid, in addition to which large quantities were brought in by the steamship companies in bond, which were used by them without that importation being recorded in the customs returns. Making an approximate allowance for the amount so brought in, and taking that into consideration we find that in British Columbia alone we pay something like $5,000,000 a year to the United States for fuel oil. That is equivalent to about 600,000 tons of coal, or nearly one-half the annual output of the Vancouver island coal mines to-day. The production of that quantity of coal would support a town with a population of some 5,000 or 6,000, and since we neither eat nor wear coal this would mean an increased demand for the products of the soil and for the manufactured goods of the east. Therefore this is not a purely local question.

From time to time we have naturally looked about us for something which will offset this importation of fuel oil, and the first thing that was suggested by our Conservative friends was a tariff on that article. On one occasion an election was held mainly on that issue. I well recall that about the year 1922 I went to Hon. Mr. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance, asking him to increase the duty on fuel oil; as I went into his office I saw a large number of gentlemen, and indeed I might say a large number of large gentlemen, coming out. They were of the class described by Shakespeare as fat men, bulky, thick, well-fed, sleek-looking gentlemen, evincing every aspect of prosperity, and as they came out I eyed them with some curiosity. Then I went in to see the minister, and humbly proffered my claim for an increased duty on fuel oil. With that simplicity which characterized me in those days, and indeed does so yet, I said, "Why, Mr. Fielding, the Conservatives will support you in increasing the duty because they pledged themselves to do so in the recent election, and moreover it is a part of their fiscal policy." The kindly old gentleman smiled at me with his eyes tired with half a century's experience of politics and said, "Mr. Neill, did you see those gentlemen who went out just as you came in?" I said, "Yes, what about them?" He said, "They were a deputation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association asking that the duty be removed altogether."

I wondered to myself what hope I, a poor, lean, hungry Cassius, could have to compete with those numerous fat, sleek-looking Falstaffs whom I had seen, but with the courage of despair I said to Mr. Fielding, "If we cannot have protection, then let us have free trade in coal," because that would benefit us to the same extent. Owing to the way the tariff is arranged, on the basis of reciprocity with the United States, free trade would mean that if we reduced our tariff in the east our coal from the west would enter the markets of the United States to a much larger extent. But Mr. Fielding pointed out to me very truly and very correctly that there were sixteen members from Nova Scotia all asking for a higher duty on coal, and he also made clear how disastrous the effect would be on the Nova Scotia coal miners if the duty were to be removed altogether. It was then brought home to me how difficult it is to reconcile the different sections of Canada to any one form of fiscal policy, so it was apparent that we had little to hope for from any tinkering with the tariff in that regard.

The next thing that suggested itself was the possibility of the further manufacture of this coal; that is, that we should not sell the coal in its raw state but should manufacture it into what might be called its ultimate products, such as gasoline, benzine and other coal tar products. I was much attracted by reports appearing in the press which stated that in Germany, by means of what is known as the Bergius process, they had actually obtained gasoline from coal in quantities which were said to be commercially remunerative. I looked into that matter, but with very little success. I have in my hand an extract from the debates of the English House of Commons containing a question asked when I was there last year; a member of the house asked the government what the prospects were of applying in England a process which he called the low-temperture carbonization process, and which he claimed had been successful in Germany. He asked why that process could not be applied in Great Britain, and the member of the government who replied stated that he was not aware of any low temperature process being used successfully on a commercial scale, in connection with the type of coal available in England. So we found that while that process was adaptable in Germany, either because of the class of coal or the cheapness with which it could be produced, it could not be applied profitably to the coal mines of Britain. There was a meeting of the mining and metallurgical association in British Columbia last summer, and those attending that meeting stated that their technical and scientific information was to the effect that with their present knowledge it would be at least many years before it would be commercially possible to extract gasoline from the type of coal we have on Vancouver island. It is also impossible to convert that coal into gas, because the distance to the centres of consumption would be too great to transport the gas in pipes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, when we failed in that regard we continued looking around for a remedy, and it was suggested by this meeting of scientific experts last summer that the solution of the problem was the use of pulverized coal. The use of pulverized coal is not a fad. In the United States something like 50,000,000 tons a year are used in various plants throughout the country. In the state of Washington, adjoining British Columbia, alone, there are seven plants which use 320,000 tons of coal a year in that way. In the United states the navy has been interested in this subject, and they have been carrying on experiments for years. On one occasion quite recently they made a test of a Scotch marine boiler; it was the common type, the best type of boiler used on ships, and they ran it on pulverized coal for 240 hours continuously with very satisfactory results. It produces no smoke and no dust, and you can see the possibilities or advantages from the use of a fuel of that kind in the cities. So much so that the United States authorities made arrangements to equip a steamship called the Mercer, I think it was, on a trip from some port in the United States to Rotterdam; and it is on record that when that boat reached Rotterdam there were representatives of England, Germany, France, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Holland present, representing shipping companies, public utility companies, and government navies, all on the qui vive and highly interested to see the results of the trip, what the effect had been on the boilers, and so forth. The result of the round trip was that they saved three days' time and something like 30 per cent of the cost of the fuel as compared with the cost of the fuel oil with which the same boat had been previously equipped. The United States navy afterwards issued a statement to the effect that the test had been one of the most severe that it was possible to carry out, and they were thoroughly satisfied with the use of pulverized coal on steamships at the present time.

If that is so satisfactory, if that is ascertained, so to speak, it may be asked: why the purpose of this resolution which asks the government to more or less experiment by means of equipping a boat, and one of their public building furnaces, with machinery to use pulverized coal? Well, the answer is this: Each of these factories where coal has been used presents an entirely separate new problem. There are many things about the conditions that we do not know yet. Every individual class of coal has to be tested. The amount of ash, the amount of sulphur, and the moisture that it contains are all factors that go to determine whether that particular coal can be pulverized, and what kind of equipment is necessary to handle it. For instance something hinges on what is called the length of the flame. If a flame of a certain length can be produced that is of great advantage. And then, of course, there is the further question of the particular type of boiler adapted to that particular coal. All these questions need to be decided by actual experiment. And then there is another thing. We know that money is very conservative—and money means business, and business means money. Capitalists are not prone to take up new ideas unless they are sure of the advantages that will result from them. We all know how the internal combustion engine—what is known as the motor car to-day—hung fire for many years. It was well known for many years before it was introduced in a commercial way. The same thing can be said of the telephone and various other inventions. They lay dormant for a long time.

Now much has been said of recent years in connection with research, particularly this session and last session, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and myself are entitled to some little credit, because I can recall that we advocated research years ago and we got very little sympathy and very little attention on the matter. Well, this is a typical instance of very moderately expensive research. To demonstrate its advantages would involve very small expense, and it would be of great benefit even to the government, because if they equipped their boats on the Pacific ocean it would be a great saving to them. Even on the hydrographic boats the use of smokeless fuel would be of great advantage. It would give an impetus to our coal mines and react on other lines of business not only in British Columbia, but throughout the Dominion.

I therefore trust that the government will see their way to give this fuel a fair trial by equipping one of their steamers with the machinery necessary to use pulverized coal, and also permit one of their public buildings, either in the city of Vancouver or the city of Victoria, to use pulverized coal from the mines of Vancouver island.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): There may be some confusion in the minds of certain people in regard to this resolution, as compared with the one that I introduced in the house at an earlier date. I wish to say that these two propositions do not conflict in any way whatever. I am inclined very much to support this particular resolution, and I think the government would do well to give it their attention.

Just by way of showing the particular difference there is between this suggestion and the one that I submitted, and the attitude assumed by different people in regard to it, I should like to read to the house a letter which I have just received from the University of Birmingham, England, in regard to the proposition that has been discussed in this house. I am decidedly in favour of any move in regard to research or experimental work in connection with coal. I believe it to be among the great questions, in fact one of the most important, that will bring wonderful results to our country and to the people of the British Empire if the course which we advocate is followed.

The following letter was addressed to me by Mr. J. Ivon Graham, Experimentalist of the University mentioned. He writes as follows:

DEAR SIR:

I have been much interested in your letter of the 14th February, regarding your lignite coal and the possibility of converting this into oil by the Bergius hydrogenation process. We shall be very pleased to carry out some tests upon representative samples of the lignite. You will understand, of course, that our work is being carried out on a purely laboratory scale, the amount of sample being dealt with in our high pressure bomb being only about ½ pound. Nevertheless, we consider that these tests give a good indication of the results which may be expected by the treatment of the coal on a much larger scale.

We should be very pleased to have one or two of your university graduates in chemistry for the purpose of studying the process here, though I am afraid our limited laboratory accommodation would not permit at the moment more than two additional investigators. I think, however, it would be advisable if, in the first place, preliminary tests were carried out by us to ascertain whether the process appeared to have financial possibilities. We shall be only too glad to carry out these tests without making any charge as the treatment of various types of fuel by the hydrogenation process is of considerable interest to us from the research point of view. Should you be able to arrange for samples of your coal to be forwarded to us we shall be glad to have at least 5 pounds of each.

I have pleasure in enclosing herewith a reprint of a recent paper which summarises the work carried out in this laboratory.

Yours faithfully,

J. IVON GRAHAM.

I merely read this letter to show how sympathetic the laboratory people are in regard to our request. I think this letter will give some useful information to the Minister of the Interior and the government.

In conclusion I simply desire to say that I think we should support the resolution and should move in a direction that will tend towards the processing and the utilization of our coal deposits in a manner other than those which are being used at the present time.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): I am in full accord with the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I am anxious to do anything I can to assist the coal mining industry of Vancouver island. I was fortunate in being a guest at the meeting in the city of Nanaimo of the scientific gentlemen as mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and they discussed at length the question of the liquefaction of coal. We had present a very distinguished gentleman from the United States, a thorough scientist. The consensus of opinion at that meeting was that the liquefaction of coal was still too far in the future to prove of any benefit to the mines of Vancouver island or of Canada generally. The liquefaction of coal has been accomplished as a laboratory experiment, it has even gone beyond that point, but the cost is so great that there would be no advantage in attempting to liquefy the coal of Vancouver island.

There would seem to be some possibilities with respect to the pulverization of coal, but in a conversation I had with the manager of one of the principal mining enterprises on the island—the hon. member for Comox-Alberni doubtless knows him quite well—he seemed to think there were serious difficulties in the way of pulverizing coal and using it on steamers. It is quite well understood that the coal would have to be pulverized just as it would be used, because, as it is gaseous, it would be dangerous to put coal dust on board a steamer or even on board a locomotive. Therefore the suggestion was that it would be pulverized just as it would be used. Coal differs greatly in quality, and in length of the flame and these facts taken in conjunction with the liability of the nozzles to plug up had militated against the general use of pulverized coal but he hoped these difficulties might be overcome. That gentleman, however, was not enthusiastic over it, neither were any of the other gentlemen at the meeting at which I was present. I can see no reason why the difficulties cannot be overcome and pulverized coal be used on our locomotives and our steamboats leaving the Pacific coast. If that pulverized coal can be used, it will be of great benefit to an industry that has been struggling for existence in that part of the country for years. Some of our mines have been closed down for years and others are working only on part time. Owing to difficult structural conditions with respect to the geology of our mining field, it costs a little more to produce that coal than it costs to produce coal in other fields. When it is produced, it is a better quality of coal and the question is just one of dollars and cents whether we can do something that will give relief to the industry. Therefore I have great pleasure in supporting in the strongest manner possible the resolution moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the government have no objection for two reasons, to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The principal one is that this is no longer an experiment, nor is it in the laboratory stage. The second reason is that the greatest competitor of coal at the moment on the west coast, indeed in connection with shipping generally, is fuel oil. That is true not only in Canada but in Great Britain and on the continent as well. Nearly every passenger ship plying on the Atlantic and the Pacific to-day is fueled with oil, with the result that the coal industries of Canada, Britain and elsewhere are all feeling the serious effects of this competition. Their hope was that perhaps the supply of fuel oil would not be of long duration, but it looks, by the fresh discoveries that are being made from day to day, as though this situation will continue for a number of years to come. Not only is that the case, but there is the fact of the introduction of gas into general use in Canada, and the introduction of natural gas in my own province, because notwithstanding the fact that the city of Edmonton is located on top of a coal field and Calgary is adjacent to one, I suppose by far the largest percentage of domestic heating is done there to-day with natural gas. So in all directions the market for coal is being infringed upon by substitutes that are being used generally. In this very city a large percentage of the domestic heating to-day is being done by the use of fuel oil. Then there was the introduction of hydro-electric energy and it is estimated that in Canada alone the use of hydro-electric energy as a substitute for coal for power purposes has made a diminution in the coal market all told of almost 27,000,000 tons. This means a tremendous displacement in the fuel market adversely affecting the coal industry.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has covered the ground pretty well, as did the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) to-day in connection with the hydrogenation of coal for the production of oil. This afternoon the discussion centres around the use of pulverized coal. Last summer when I was in England I was greatly interested in what they had been doing there, and I was assured by marine engineers that on vessels that were then being laid down, particularly the freighters, it was the intention of the engineers who had designed those vessels, to substitute pulverized coal for fuel oil. They stated that on present-day prices there would be a saving by this substitution of almost twenty per cent in fuel costs. Therefore there seems to be rather a bright future for pulverized fuel if it can be succesfully used as they think it can, particularly upon our freighters, and it will bring back a market that is now being denied the coal industry, as I said before, not only in Canada, but in Great Britain and on the continent. The government accordingly rather welcome the suggestion of the hon. member that an experiment be made upon one of their merchant marine vessels as well as an experiment in one of the large public buildings in the city of Vancouver, in order to test out the possibilities of using pulverized coal from the mines of British Columbia. What my hon. friend has said is very true, namely, that not all the products of the mines in any given locality can be successfully pulverized and a test is by no means conclusive when it is done upon a laboratory scale; but when pulverized coal is tried out in this way on a commercial scale, the test will be conclusive as to the utility of the coal from any given mine for use either on board ship or for heating purposes in the furnaces commonly found in our large buildings or our homes. I have spoken both to the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and I have their consent to have this test made as speedily as arrangements can be made in that regard.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL SERVICE

PROPOSED CONSCRIPTION OF NATURAL RESOURCES AND ESSENTIAL SERVICES IN TIME OF WAR

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin) moved:

Whereas, it is the existent policy of this country, that reasonable preparation should be made for self-defence in case of any war involving Canada;

And whereas, such preparation if undertaken, should be both adequate, and of such a character as to make war less likely to occur;

Therefore be it resolved—that, in the opinion of this house, it is advisable that legislation be enacted providing that on the declaration of war involving Canada, all natural resources and essential services, including transportation facilities, industrial plants and commercial and financial agencies, should automatically be conscripted for national service for the duration of the war.

He said: Mr. Speaker, whatever hon. members may think of the merits of the proposal contained in this resolution, or whatever they may think of the practicability of giving effect to it in legislation, I hope they will regard my motives as sincere and grant me the generous thought that my sole purpose in introducing the resolution is for the future protection and happiness of our country.

Since Your Honour has been invested with the authority to enforce observance of the rules of the house, and in doing so must chop me off precisely forty minutes from the moment I commence to address you, I shall first take the precaution to indicate the main grounds upon which I shall urge the adoption of this resolution by parliament, and then if my hour should strike before I have finished, I shall be consoled somewhat with the thought that I have at least mentioned the steps in the argument which lead towards the desired conclusion.

I shall argue that since world conditions are such as to warrant the annual expenditures for war preparations which we now make, we would be illogical and unsafe guardians of the state if we did not recognize the principle that since there is cause for any preparation whatsoever, we are without excuse if we do not make the fullest preparation possible.

I shall then advance the idea that the acceptance of the proposal as set forth in this resolution, namely, that it is advisable that legislation be enacted providing that on the declaration of war involving Canada all natural resources and essential services, including transportation facilities, industrial plants and commercial and financial agencies, should automatically be conscripted for national service for the duration of the war, would ensure adequate preparation for national defence at no additional cost to the state.

Next, I shall endeavour to establish the view that the profit incentive in time of war is a real menace to peace, and if removed by the conscription measure suggested in the resolution, then one of the causes of war would be removed, and to that extent we should have a greater assurance of lasting peace.

Finally, I shall show that a war could be fought under the conditions proposed without leaving behind it a national debt to burden posterity.

The present policy of this government, as of preceding governments in this country, is one of preparation for defence. That preparation, I presume, is justified by certain fears which we legitimately hold, fears which arise out of unsettled international conditions. Now, if there are good grounds for the preparations which we now make, there must be equally good grounds for the most efficient preparation possible. I want to point out in this connection that a well trained, well disciplined, and well generaled force of fighting men is not the only factor in national defence. Indeed, I would go further and say that it is perhaps the least important factor. I know of no modern war which has been lost for lack of soldiers. Service and heroism in the battle line have always been more in evidence than service and heroism in industry, in finance or in commerce, and yet surely to a country that is fighting for its existence these are of equal importance with the army in the front line. A country I think can nearly always rely upon its citizens responding to a call to arms in its defence, but it cannot always rely upon the other agencies which are equally necessary in times of national danger. Past wars have been the soldier's opportunity to die, industry's opportunity to make money, and the country's opportunity to assume eternal debt. Conditions in these respects have grown to such a pitch in modern wars that unless some such proposal as I have made be adopted, a nation in the future will lose even more by winning a war than by being defeated, for when the price of victory has already been paid by the nation in blood, posterity will have to pay the profiteers for all time in a monetary form for the victory which the country has achieved.

How is it that national defence in Canada to-day, as in most other countries, I presume, is confined to the training of that element which requires the least training? A man with a rifle in one hand and his life in the other is thought to need a great deal of training, and so we spend a good deal of money in training him, but a man with the national credit in one hand and the right to charge interest in the other requires no training at all, according to our military program. But, as I have already said, these agencies, financial, industrial and commercial, do not know what to do in time of war for the national defence or in the national interest. These agencies are so important, however, that they may defeat the finest army that was ever led to battle, and so I say that unless conscription is effective in respect to these agencies our preparation is a useless waste of money, and indeed, is an added incentive to getting us into trouble.

We maintain the nucleus of an armed force so that we may be able to build up in time of emergency a force for the defence of the state. We maintain military experts capable of handling men for that purpose, but to whom have we entrusted the handling of the industries of the country in time of war? To whom have we entrusted the handling of the finances of the country in time of war? These are left to whoever may be on the job, and they are left as profit making agencies for private individuals, whereas, on the other hand, we conscript our men to do the fighting.

For efficiency in defence the entire resources of the nation must be mobilized. We now rely upon our ability to lure industry by war time prices to do service to the state. We rely upon our ability to lure finance by offering the nation as a bond slave for all time in order to get financial institutions to perform their function in time of national danger. It is not sufficient to trust to these allurements. Indeed, we can no longer put our faith in them. Patriotic speeches during the last great war pledged with fervour the last man and the last dollar, but if you add up the ledger of the nation after the last war you will find that while we were many thousands of men short, we were, or somebody was, many millions of dollars ahead. The last dollar—nay, even the first one—never was given, but the last man was ready to go.

I submit that a democratic country must rise to its own defence with every citizen on a democratic footing. Let us think for a moment of the injustice of the present practice. We conscript men to die, or worse, we conscript them to be crippled in conflict in the national interests, but we leave others free to grow rich on what has been well termed blood money. Now I contend before this parliament to-day that bankers, captains of industry, merchants, railway companies, and so forth, should be put on the same footing as soldiers in the matter of national service during war. Let their pay be the same, let them be under the same discipline, let them be subject to the same restrictions and to the same punishments as the soldier. Let the banker who fails to do his duty during war time be put against a wall and shot at dawn, just as the soldier is who refuses to do his duty.

The effect of this arrangement on the morale of the nation would contribute more to efficiency than do large expenditures on military preparations. Morale has become a very essential factor in war success. During the great war it was found that the morale of the belligerent nations had to be maintained at any cost, and at times in order to maintain that morale appeals were made to the lowest elements of human nature. At times, even lies were used freely in all countries to preserve that thing called morale. Now, could anything be more disrupting than the thought that while many are dying for their country, others are becoming rich by profiteering in the things that are essential to the national life. Could there be anything more calculated to unify a people, raise their morale, and bring them into one strong, fighting force than for everyone to know that no one was making blood money out of the conflict? More serious to contemplate is the possibility that the time is not far distant when young men will rather be shot at home than be shot in the front line as a protest against their country being so unjust and unthinking as to conscript its youth to fight while it leaves the privileged few to profit out of the calamity of the nation.

But there is a graver aspect to this question than even its injustice and its detrimental effect on the morale of the people. While a man will fight to the death against considerable odds for his country, finance in the hands of private bankers on an interest-bearing basis will quit at the first sight of danger to itself. There is a well-defined point beyond which finance will not go, but will turn like a traitor and run for cover. Finance will quit, no matter what position the nation may be in, just so soon as the national debt reaches the highest amount at which it will be considered by bankers possible to extract the interest in the form of taxation from generations to come. At that point, no matter how the nation may be situated finance will take cover. The nation may be in a struggle for its very existence, and a few more weeks or months may carry it to victory, but even under such dire circumstances if those in control of finance discover that finance is in danger, the victory of the nation will be sacrificed. That is the position we are in at the present time. If under the present system national safety in war should clash with financial safety, the latter will win.

Conscription in war time of the various agencies referred to in the resolution would of course increase production by preventing duplication and overlapping, which are inevitable under the competitive system. It would also eliminate all the waste of labour and material so common in times of peace, and would conserve the resources of the state to the utmost during the conflict.

Let me submit also, Mr. Speaker, that this is the right time to make provision for the proper conduct of the next war, because if war ever comes upon us again we want to be ready. We do not wish to have to make all these regulations when the country is in the midst of the struggle. We ought to make them now. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) should be acquainted with the entire industrial organization of the state. He should know exactly where to put his finger, and when, and he should have it so organized that at a moment's notice he could bring every agency in the state to its defence. That cannot be done while we go on in the haphazard way in which we have been going in the past. He has no authority to do that. He himself has not had the training which he should have in the overlooking of these industries while such supervision is not considered to be part of our protective program. But not only so, it will not be easy for the minister of national defence, whoever he may be when the next war comes—of course, we are always hoping that another war will never come—but it will not be easy, I say, for the minister of national defence at that time to make the alteration which I seek now, because when the music of the shekels as they jingle into the coffers of profiteers, accelerated as they will be by war demands, begins to fall upon the ears of the privileged, he will find it very difficult to alter the regulations. He will be met then with the excuse: Let things alone as they are; don't disrupt industry while war is going on; and so forth and so on. This, then, is the time for us to act. Let every industrial magnate and every financier in this country be told that if war ever comes to Canada again everything will be conscripted for national defence, no profit will be permitted. Let us do that now by legislation.

I come to the elaboration of my next point, and that is, to conscript the agencies required for war purposes described in the resolution would be the best and the most effective assurance of lasting peace that we could have. If what my resolution proposes, namely, automatic conscription in war time of every agency employed in national defence, were put into effect, then we would be absolutely certain of two things of great importance. First, that we were fully prepared, or at least that we were prepared to the utmost extent of the nation's resources. If justified in making any preparation at all, it is, as I have pointed out, our patriotic duty to be fully prepared. There can be no adequate excuse for a partial preparation if there be any reason for preparation at all. Underlying our present policy is the fear, well founded, of a possible war in which we may be called upon to defend ourselves. That well-founded fear compels us to make certain preparations for our defence, and no one can say, if the fear is well founded, that we should be content with anything short of the utmost preparation. I say, let us prepare adequately or stop spending public money in what would be little short of a farce were we really launched into a conflict. The conscription of all natural resources and essential services, including transportation facilities, industrial plants, and commercial and financial agencies, would be adequate preparation at no additional cost, and it would mean, as I say, that we would know for a certainly that if war did come we would have all the resources of the country behind us in the struggle, and that we would all be on a democratic footing.

But the second thing which would be made certain were the course followed which I have proposed is that if war did come under these circumstances, everyone would know that the war was inevitable. That is to say, that it had not been fostered by some private interests for private gain. The war lords then would not be tempted to plunge the country into a death struggle for the sake of profit. Thus this sort of preparation which I suggest would be of real assistance to lasting peace. It has long been the claim of militarists that preparation is the best guarantee of peace. That has proven to be false in the past because preparation was confined to the manufacture of munitions and the training of armies. That sort of preparation has proven to be an added incentive to conflict. But if our preparation extend to all the profit-making agencies essential to the winning of a war, then indeed it would be true that such preparation would be our best safeguard against war. I do not doubt for a moment the general belief that past wars have been urged and promoted by individuals and corporations having great influence on international policy and standing to profit by war.

Of all the dark and despicable suspicions that could becloud the consciousness of a nation this is the worst. To what low levels of bestial materialism has the desire for profit brought mankind!—if it be true that there are men in every nation who will not hesitate to plunge their fellows into the shambles of war for the sake of trade and profit for themselves. Some hon. members may have doubts about the truth of this charge. I will not stop to bring the proofs, first, because it is not essential to my argument, and secondly because it were better not to demonstrate this repulsive deformity of the human imagination. Whether it be true or not that men have promoted wars for profit, no one will deny that individuals do profit greatly by wars. That being so, it is very unwise to trust frail human nature to such great temptation. The government is asked now to pass the resolution before the house in order that the nation may be freed from the danger of war at the instigation of profiteers, and that the minds of the people may be freed from the dark fears and suspicions they entertain in this regard.

I emphasize the second step in my argument: that to make provision for the conscription of the agencies mentioned in the resolution would afford adequate preparation for defence at no additional cost; that, since the preparations that are now made are made because of our fear of possible attack, it is illogical to stop short of adequate preparation—and the proposal I make would be adequate; and that this sort of preparation would be the best assurance of peace, in that it would do away with the profit incentive which is alleged to be a dangerous cause of war. This profit incentive, being a danger, should be removed especially since such action would bring tranquility to the public mind, now disturbed by the suspicion which falls on our money kings and captains of industry.

I turn now to another step in the argument, namely, that under the proposed conscription measure war would be possible without war debt, or at the worst the nation would owe the amount of war debt to itself. The last war was financed largely through the treasury board. The national treasury or national credit was the source, the Finance Act the means, and the banks were the agents in the transaction. But when the war was over the nation owed the banks the entire amount expended in the war. The only reason why this entire transaction did not result in dire calamity through the revolt of the people was, I think, that the people generally did not understand what had actually been done. Under the resolution the next war—if by any misfortune it should come—would be financed from the same source as the last—only, when it is all over, we shall not owe the amount a second time, with interest, to a few privileged financiers.

For clarity on this point I shall use a simple illustration. Let us suppose a war between two tribes in the days of tribal society. To make it simple we will suppose that these tribes fought with rocks. When they went to war with each other they naturally organized themselves for the struggle. The young men went to the front line to throw the rocks, a number of others were selected to gather rocks and carry them to the front, and a third group were selected to do the hunting and to prepare the food for the entire tribe during the period of the war. But when the war was over it was found that nobody owed anybody else; everyone in the tribe had done his part: all the rocks had been gathered and did not have to be paid for and the tribe was as free of debt as it was the day it began fighting. That is not so to-day, however. We have, of course, complications arising from different methods of warfare, but the principle is precisely the same. In the last war there were in Canada men who neither gathered rocks nor threw them, but when the war was over we had to pay them for every rock that was gathered and thrown. And generations to come will be unable to pay that debt. It is indeed questionable whether, when we add the accumulating interest to the national debt growing out of the last war, the debt will ever be paid off. We should prepare now so that in the next war we might be able to finance it without paying interest to anyone. The nation in that case would owe its debt to itself.

I want to leave this thought with the Minister of National Defence, and so that he may be able to express his opinion on it before six o'clock I will now close, contenting myself with pointing out that, if carried into effect, this resolution will make war very unlikely in the future for the reason that the profit incentive will have been removed. But if war should occur notwithstanding, then we shall be prepared to put to our defence the entire resources of the nation, and no one will make any profit at the expense of the rest of the people. No war debt will ensue to burden generations to come.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I will not take more than a few minutes to discuss the motion. As a matter of fact, I did not know that the resolution would be reached this afternoon and therefore I shall be unable to deal as exhaustively as I might with the arguments my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) has put forward. I want the hon. gentleman to feel, however, that if my observations are brief it is not because I do not realize the full importance of the subject he has discussed, or the very able and temperate manner in which he has advanced his arguments. I think the house and the country are indebted to the hon. gentleman for the way in which he has stated his case.

In countries where recruiting is voluntary, the suggestion which the hon. member has made regarding national mobilization is perhaps more ideal than practical; and I note that he has recognized that fact inasmuch as, in the very teeth of his resolution, is the proviso that conscription be effective in relation to man power. The policy he advocates, with the proviso which is added, is one which, in my opinion at least, will find acceptance in a general way; that is to say, that men should not be conscripted to give their lives in war while the industrial resources of the country are allowed to go free without making their just contribution. I believe we all accept that principle. Perhaps my hon. friend does not know that it is a part of the responsibility of a minister occupying the position which I hold—much as he may deprecate, as I do, the idea of any possible conflict in the future—to consider plans for industrial mobilization in the event of such a conflict arising. That is the principle adopted in Great Britain; the Imperial defence committee has been engaged in a consideration of it. We in this country are in touch with the proceedings of that committee and the principle is not by any means new to a proper administration of the defence department. I feel that the principles which the hon. member has enunciated can best be carried out by an endeavour, in time of peace, to work out a policy of industrial mobilization which will take into proper account the utilization of all the forces of the nation and not simply of man power alone. We will see to it that every part of the nation, industry, finance, labour and transportation, all make their just contributions towards carrying on the conflict if such turns out to be inevitable. I hope what I say now may perhaps lead my hon. friend to not press this resolution for acceptance by this house, since he has had the opportunity of discussing this matter; I want to say to him that I do feel as Minister of National Defence, and also as a minister who has something to do with the peace of the country, that it would be a mistake for us at this time to pass a resolution which seems to me to indicate to the world at large that we are thinking about war. My hon. friend's resolution provides that in the opinion of this house it is advisable that legislation be enacted providing that upon the declaration of war involving Canada, all natural resources and so on shall become conscripted automatically. I do feel that this will be misunderstood by the countries of the world, if we now make a legislative declaration that we are preparing for war even in this way.

We have on the order paper to-day no less than two resolutions advocating peace and looking to the eventual consummation of world peace. One resolution is proposed by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who suggests that this matter is so important that a special department should be created having to do with peace and international understanding. There is another resolution proposed by an hon. member of this house which suggests that Canada should become a party to the optional clause respecting the world court. Both these resolutions are absolutely opposed to the resolution now before the house, and while in general terms I believe the principle of the resolution will be accepted if the proviso concerning conscription is also accepted, I do suggest to my hon. friend that having had the benefit of this discussion, it would be a mistake at this time to pass this resolution. I believe sincerely that we would be regarded as advertising that this country is preparing for war, just at the very time when all endeavours are being made in the direction of peace. We had the Washington conference last September; we have the Preparatory commission meeting again with regard to disarmament, and perhaps more machinery than ever is being set up in an endeavour to solve this age-old question of whether the peoples of the world cannot live together in peace.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister's statement sounds very sweetly in my ears, but is it completely consistent with the rapid increase in the militia estimates generally?

Mr. RALSTON: Absolutely. I have endeavoured to state to my hon. friend that I consider myself the minister for peace rather than the minister for war. I would also say that if there is no more trouble with other countries with regard to disarmament than there is with Canada, we will have a speedy solution of the whole question. My hon. friend knows, and I will be glad to discuss it with him and with the house when the estimates come up, the extremely limited armaments or preparations for war supported by this country. We are maintaining nothing more than a decent police force, and I feel entirely consistent when I suggest that this resolution should not pass and that we should not make this declaration, notwithstanding the fact that there is some increase in the militia estimates which have been laid before the house.

I do not believe I can add anything more; I hope hon. members will feel that I am consistent and sincere when I suggest that it is not advisable to pass this resolution at the present time.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Some of us find ourselves in rather an awkward predicament with regard to this resolution. It seems odd that those who have stood very firmly for peace find themselves rather inclined to sympathize with the resolution, while the Minister of National Defence has placed himself in very strong opposition to it, on the ground that it may be misunderstood abroad and may not accomplish anything in the direction of peace. I think none of us will doubt the sincerity of the minister when he advocates peace, but I am not so sure of his consistency; I have no doubt he believes himself consistent, but I am not quite so sure that his position is in reality consistent. He says that the industrial resources of the country should make their "just contribution" in the event of war. That is all very well as a general statement, but I should like to ask whether, after having passed through a great war, the industrial forces and equipment of this country can be said to have made their just contribution.

What is a just contribution? I know that to-day a committee is sitting to consider soldiers' pensions; I know that many pitiable cases have come before that committee. Men are living on the very verge of poverty, some of them precluded from government assistance, and it would seem to me, in view of the finances of the country, that the government is prepared to assist these men only in the most grudging fashion. That is true, but on the other hand surely we know that the great part of the load of taxation we are bearing at present, and which perhaps more than anything else prevents the expansion of industry and the entry of new people into this country, is very largely the result of the last war. Do we not all recognize the fact, as the Minister of Finance recently informed us, that 50 per cent of the total expenditures of this country are to pay for the last war or are in connection with the present military expenditures? As I pointed out on another occasion, if we add to that the increased expenditure involved in securing our greatly increased income and the increased expenditure in connection with additional financing, altogether expenditure due to war amounts to about two-thirds of our total national expenditure. That is the situation we must face to-day.

The other day an appeal was made to this house by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) suggesting that we in this generation should bear the burden of the past war and not pass it on to future generations. What was the response to that suggestion? There was none whatever. We are finding that although a great many people made fortunes during the war, even at this early stage the government are repudiating the income tax, which was levied to pay for the war, and so those who made fortunes either directly out of the war or indirectly because of the war, those who are the wealthy people of to-day, are going free to a very large extent. On the other hand, the people who are asked to pay for the war are the ordinary people who paid over and over again even during the progress of that war.

Is it fair to say that in any future war we should insist that industry and finance should make their just contributions unless we at this time insist that industry and finance do that today with regard to the last war? I think I would say that the minister would be consistent if he would introduce, or have the government introduce, a measure at this session asking that the last war should be paid for by a levy on industry and finance to-day. The people engaged in industry and finance are the only people in this country who benefited because of the war.

The minister says that he is quite sincere in urging that it would be a mistake for this house to pass the resolution, that it might be misunderstood. I recognize that possibly there is a danger along that line, but I would suggest that the nations of the world are not ignorant of the situation in Canada. They know perfectly well that we are spending to-day some—what is it?—$18,000,000 upon military defence, and that within the past few years we have gone up almost 50 per cent in our military expenditures. I would say that if the minister is as consistent as I sincerely believe he thinks himself, he would reduce even the present comparatively small expenditure on armaments. That would be the very best declaration to the world that Canada is pacific in her intentions.

I should like to examine for a moment the terms of the resolution:

Whereas, it is the existent policy of this country that reasonable preparation should be made for self-defence in case of any war involving Canada.

Is that true? I think we must admit that it is. If any of us come here and suggest that we have national disarmament—a policy of which I personally am in favour, one of the policies on which I was elected to this house, a policy that I find is endorsed by a large number of labour organizations, farm organizations and church organizations across this country, and which is backed up by a very large number of returned men who know what war really is—I say that if we suggest that we should have a policy of national disarmament we are told immediately that that is impracticable, in fact, at least in some quarters, we are told that we are unpatriotic to suggest that. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the time is coming before so very long when hon. gentlemen in this house will get credit for absolute sincerity in this matter, and it will be admitted that those of us who advocate disarmament may be just as sincere in our position, and just as patriotic, as, on the other hand, I believe those are who advocate armaments. I do not think that the people who want armies, and navies, and air forces are consciously unpatriotic. But from my standpoint I believe that they are doing everything they can to ruin my country; and believing that from the bottom of my heart, and having taken that stand in the past, I, as a member of this house, who is trying to represent the people of the country, am bound to say so. I do not believe that expenditure on armament is the way to increase the prosperity of Canada, I do not believe that it is the way to effect the security of Canada or the security of the world. There are better ways, and it seems to me that we ought not to be labelled unpatriotic when we sincerely believe that, state that position, and try to impress our views upon the country.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the hon. member permit me to ask a question? I am asking it sincerely because I happen to have something to do with defence. How then is my hon. friend going to carry out the spirit of the first "whereas" he has just read? The resolution reads:

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Whereas, it is the existent policy of this country, that reasonable preparation should be made for self-defence in case of any war involving Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not that first "whereas" in accordance with the facts?

Mr. RALSTON: I agree.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You agree? Then that is all I want to say for the moment. I am not overlooking the minister's question, but I think we are agreed that statement is true. Some of us do not agree with that policy, but I think we have to admit that is the policy to-day, and of course the minister is charged with the responsibility of carrying that out.

I would suggest however that there are alternative ways of ensuring peace. I would suggest that if we had closer trade relationships between this country and other countries it would be another and more effective way of securing peace. For example, to spend one-tenth part of the revenues that we spend on our soldiers and on our navies in promoting international understanding in a way that is indicated by another motion placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail)—a question into which I do not wish to enter to-day—would be an alternative policy. I am not quite sure whether the organisation of the Department of National Defence is the one that could be entrusted with that task. As far as I am concerned I am inclined to think that the Minister of National Defence might very well be entrusted with the carrying out of a peace policy for the country. Undoubtedly there are alternatives to the present policy of guns, forts, navies and so on. But I think that we may say the statement in the first "whereas" is a true statement.

Now I will go on to the second:

And whereas, such preparation if undertaken—

I do not think it should be; I have an alternative way—but under the existing policy such preparation —should be both adequate, and of such a character as to make war less likely to occur.

Will anyone doubt that?

Mr. FORKE: I do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization doubts it. Well, let us take it up clause by clause.

Mr. FORKE: I think the whole system is wrong.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The first statement is:

And whereas, such preparation if undertaken, should be . . . . adequate.

Surely if we go on the principle that national defence—I mean defence by means of military forces—is a good thing, we are bound in logic to say that it should be adequate; I think we cannot do anything less. I, as an advocate of peace, have to admit, as the next logical step, that it should be adequate; there is no half way. I think the Minister of National Defence must realize that it must be adequate. Such preparation must be effective; it must be adequate to accomplish its purpose. Surely we cannot get away from that. My brain at least makes me accept that as a logical outcome of the first statement.

Now let us go on to the second part of that "whereas". It should be:

—of such a character as to make war less likely to occur.

I am not quite sure whether the mover of this resolution has not introduced something into the clause that has a double meaning. Taking either the meaning that we should go on with military preparation to such an extent that we will be able to carry out fully our purpose, or the meaning that we should make such arrangements that we would be deterred from going into war, it seems to me we cannot very well take exception to that statement as it stands. If we are going into war—and I do not wish to think we must accept the statement in that way—but if we determine this is the best way to defend the country—even though some of us as individuals do not believe in it and are trying to find another way—if we are determined to so prepare then we surely should take such steps as would make war less likely to occur. In any case we should take such steps as would make war less likely to occur.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend not think that the second "whereas" is absolutely following the line of the old doctrine that preparations for war lessen the danger of war. Personally I cannot subscribe to that doctrine and I am surprised that my hon. friend seems to subscribe to it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand the position of the Minister of Justice and I frankly admit that there is something in his contention, namely, that the very existence of armies and navies, the very existence of a Department of National Defence, is provocative of war. I realize that, but I should like to ask the Minister of Justice to go back to the previous statement. If we believe that military armaments are the means by which we can secure peace, let us use those means. Surely that is reasonable. I take exception to the first clause and I say that those are not the means to be used, but the minister is holding on to the old with one hand and reaching out to the other means with the other.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it not be true to say that the government is on the horns of the dilemma of its own policy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is another figure.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it not so that the things which would provoke war, as referred to by the Minister of Justice, are already part of our policy? Does he means to say that it will provoke war to conscript the industries of Canada? If so, I want to know what the authority is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member does not want me to make a speech now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some students of old customs tell us that the habit of greeting friends by the extension of the right hand goes back to the day when all men were armed and carried a sword in their right hand. When they put aside the sword and extended the open hand, this was a symbol that force was rejected and that they were willing to talk peace. The criticism I make of the position of the Minister of Justice is that, while he wants to extend the right hand, he also is anxious to keep the sword handy in case the other fellow is not quite ready to talk peace.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister should speak to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am doing my best.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no doubt the Minister of Justice is doing his best, but our policy is inconsistent. If we retain the sword close by our hand ready for the least emergency we shall not go far in the direction of peace.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member think that had Great Britain been prepared in the last war, there would have been a war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question of the last war is one that I have studiously avoided. I have only a few minutes more and I do not intend to go into that question.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member will not answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it is another matter. I do not want to be diverted from this argument. I wish to go on with the latter part of the resolution which states:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is advisable that legislation be enacted providing that on the declaration of war involving Canada, all natural resources and essential services, including transportation facilities, industrial plants and commercial and financial agencies, should automatically be conscripted for national service for the duration of the war.

Can we imagine that if that proposal were actually in force in Canada, we would be liable to go into another war? I take it that such legislation would be one of the greatest deterrents against war that it would be possible to have. Just fancy if all the capital in all the banks were immediately conscripted and if the banks, instead of being able to make money out of the war as they did before, knew that it would annihilate them, do you think there is a banker in this country or in Europe who would consent to war? If it means that all our railway systems would immediately be conscripted, do you think that the leaders of the great transportation systems in this country would submit? If it means that all the industrial plants would immediately be conscripted and every man rendered penniless, reduced to the position of the conscripted soldier at $1.10 a day, would any man in Canada be likely under those circumstances to be in favour of war? I would urge that, if that were the situation, immediately any suggestion of war arose from one end of the country to the other the leaders of all the great newspapers, the men on the boards of all our great universities, the men who to a certain extent influence the policies of all our institutions, would set in operation such a campaign of education, such a protest against war, that the very appearance of war would be swept away and we would immediately resort to some pacific method of settling our disputes.

Mr. SPOTTON: I should like to ask the peaceful member for Winnipeg North Centre how he would handle a peaceful strike such as they had in Winnipeg a few years ago, and how he would be able to procure milk for the babies if we did not have some troops in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think hon. members will quite agree that when anyone is driven to such desperate means to try to sidetrack one in an argument, his case is pretty nearly hopeless. During the big strike my policy, for which I have no reason to feel ashamed, was that of peace. It was then and it is to-day.

Mr. COTNAM: A peaceful strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, if men want to stop work, unless they are to be degraded to the position of veritable slaves they have a right to do so—at least until we are able to arrange other means which, I hope, may be forthcoming so that these difficulties which now arise in the industrial world will not precipitate us into the unfortunate strikes which sometimes we have. But force, brute force, may I call it?—and I know all my comrades in the industrial world do not agree with this, but I take this position and more among the labour people believe in it than among the captains of industry—is absolutely no solution of our industrial problems. I do not believe it is any solution of our economic problems or of our international problems. This method of war is an outgrown method. In the old days our ancestors got down into the slime and fought with their teeth and fists; we think that we have reached another stage than that. In our ordinary business and social life we have reached the stage when, if we have a dispute, we refer it to the courts, to arbitration; we settle it in some other way than by force. Surely we might hope that in our international questions we may advance along similar lines. Progress is everywhere to be found. The League of Nations Society is now urging the establishment of those institutions and policies which will prevent international complications. We from our corner have introduced some resolutions along that line, and I trust that the hon. gentlemen who have done me the honour to interrupt to-day will vote in favour of the resolution of my colleague, and that we shall make representations to Great Britain along the line of signing the optional clause of the Peace treaty. If we do that as a country we shall have advanced a long way, but in the meantime, believing as I do, that war is an obsolete and inefficient instrument for the maintenance of peace—

Mr. FORKE: Everybody agrees with that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very good but so long as Canada is committed, as the minister of National Defence states, to armaments in order to attain her ends, I cannot see how any of us can fail, in carrying out that policy of armament and militarism, to say that if we go to the point where we conscript men, we ought to go the whole way. Surely men are worth more than property; if we conscript men, I urge in the name of all the returned men who have served at the front and of all of those who have sacrificed, let us go the whole way and insist that when the next war comes we shall all suffer equally.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I should just like to say as a returned man that I refuse to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to speak for me.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 22, 1928

EXCLUSIVE PROSPECTING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Minister of the Interior whether or not there is any truth in the rumour that is prevalent that he or his department contemplate the granting of exclusive prospecting rights to large areas in the Northwest Territories. I would not ask this question at the present time were it not for the fact that I have received some very urgent messages with respect to it. I hardly believe it is possible, but I think it would reassure the public mind if the minister would make a statement.

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Two applications have been filed for exploratory privileges in the Northwest Territories covering fairly large areas. Both have been considered but neither has been granted.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the papers be laid on the table?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are no papers except the applications.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the applications?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister says they have not yet been granted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not what he said.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the Minister of Justice will be patient I should like to complete my question: Is there any intention on the part of the government to issue such rights to any individual prospector or corporation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There have been exploratory rights granted in the past, but as indicated by the leader of the opposition there seems to be very strong opposition to granting rights of this character to anyone. The government is always willing to pay attention to objections of that kind. Personally, I see no very serious objection to the policy but one does not want to raise a row about a matter of this kind. May I say for the information of my hon. friend that an exploratory right was granted on the Indian reserve close to Calgary. We had to cancel that right, and it has not been asked for since.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that for natural gas?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And oil.

REPARATIONS COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): May I ask when the report of the reparations commission will be tabled? I have received some communications with respect to it and that is my reason for asking the question.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The matter is still under consideration.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Will the Secretary of State amplify a little his answer to the question of my hon. friend from London? Is it the tabling of the report of the commission, or the report itself that is under consideration?

Mr. RINFRET: The report itself is under consideration. It is not considered advisable to table it before we have considered it fully.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

CORRESPONDENCE WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice a report in the Toronto Globe to the effect that the government has sent a communication to Washington on the subject of the St. Lawrence waterway development, and coupled with the report is the statement that the government here has applied for certain privileges in the United States market. Is that correct?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When the papers are tabled my hon. friend will see that the report is not correct.

CONDITION OF FARMERS IN THE INTERLAKE DISTRICT, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior a question. I have here a report of a meeting held at Okno, Man., March 11, at which there were 125 farmers. At this meeting the serious condition of the farmers in the district was discussed, and a number of recommendations were made. I should like to ask the minister if he will have his officials in Winnipeg investigate thoroughly the conditions of settlement in the district referred to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend mean as to drainage?

Mr. BANCROFT: Yes, the causes, and the conditions which prevail.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, we will ask the departmental officials there to make an examination and report.

RADIO—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF LICENSE

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE STUDENTS ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if there is any truth in the report that the radio license granted to the International Bible Students' Association has been cancelled.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I may state that no final decision has been reached in the matter.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I would ask the Minister of the Interior when we may expect the return ordered on the 19th of last month of copies of documents relating to the diversion of water at Chicago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will make inquiry and answer my hon. friend to-morrow.

AMHERSTBURG PUBLIC BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on the following extract from the Amherstburg Echo of March 16th last:

> It is understood that Victor Renaud has been recommended by Thomas Rowley for appointment to the position of caretaker of the Dominion government building, in place of Ted Tunnicliff, who has resigned.

In view of the fact that this position—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This question will stand as a notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC BILLS AND ORDERS

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood, Mr. Speaker, that we would proceed to-day to public bills and orders so that members who gave up Thursday afternoon some weeks ago to the Minister of Finance to enable him to introduce his budget, would have the opportunity to proceed at the point at which they would have proceeded had we gone on with the regular order that day. I move:

That the house do now proceed to order No. 23 being the second reading of Bill No. 3, an act respecting the civil service (restoration of excluded positions).

It is understood that after six o'clock we will return to the regular order of business.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

RESTORATION OF EXCLUDED POSITIONS

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, respecting the civil service (restoration of excluded positions).

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am frankly astonished at the number of refusals on the other side of the house to grant a second reading to this bill. In answer to your question "Shall the second reading of the bill be carried?" there was quite a volume of "no" and that before the members who spoke had heard the argument thereon. I would take it, therefore, that they have pretty well made up their minds that in so far as patronage is now permitted they are going to cling to it with the tenacity of the party system of the older days. I hope, however, that after I have presented what few facts I have at my disposal on this matter, many of these same gentlemen will join with me in doing what they can to enforce and strengthen the principle as applied to our administrative service.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I sympathize with Your Honour. Although my voice is by no means a loud one it can usually be heard.

After all there is one question the answer to which should determine our attitude towards this whole problem and that is: Does Canada's public service need efficient business supervision instead of political control as in the past? The answer to that will answer the whole problem in my opinion. This question has already been answered effectively and well in successive parliamentary reports on the civil service since 1877. From 1877 to 1924 successive commissions and committees have sat and discussed the whole problem, and in every case they have come to one definite conclusion, namely, that the merit system should be not only brought into effect but maintained properly in all its strength.

There is at the present time no provision for appeal and personal boards of welfare as in other democratic countries. That is another question and it is now being dealt with by a committee in another way; but there is another reason why the bill that I have before the house at the moment should carry and that is that, owing to a lack of proper supervision of the entire service, it is estimated that there is an annual loss to the country of more than $25,000,000 which could readily be saved if business management were permitted to apply.

Mr. CAHILL: Who estimates that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will give that in just a moment. In support of this latter statement several considerations may be mentioned. An annual saving of $746,000 alone has been effected by the government printing bureau under the readjustment by the Civil Service Commission. An annual saving of $850,000 has been achieved in the Post Office Department, partly by departmental economies, it is true, but partly also by adjustments made in the personnel by the Civil Service Commission. In the evidence adduced before the Spinney committee of 1921, Dr. Roche, a former minister of the interior, declared that an investigation of that department would reveal conditions similar to those in the printing bureau where a saving of thirty-seven per cent had been effected. If this is so, then more than a million dollars are being wasted in that department alone. The cost of the staff of the Interior department increased $1,500,000 from 1915 to 1922; it increased $1,000,000 from 1919 to 1922, which fact caused a protest by the way from Senator Bradbury in the Senate.

Similar references might be made concerning other departments. In one department there are several hundred men with expensive equipment lying idle, incurring an expenditure of nearly a million dollars. It is on record that the late John Fraser, when Auditor General, claimed more than once that the Ottawa service was bearing an excessive overhead of 66 per cent. In the cost of maintaining the personnel at about $60,000,000, he estimated that a saving of 25 per cent or $15,000,000, at least, could be made. In public purchasing by open competition an estimated saving of thirty per cent on say $30,000,000, or $9,000,000 in all, could be effected and no mention is made of the losses on political contracts such as the Timiskaming dam, railways, merchant marine, and other matters.

What I have said might be extended almost without limit. For example, in ten parliamentary commissions on the civil service only once did the same person sit on two commissions and the same lack of continuity applies generally in the case of the history of civil service legislation introduced in this house since confederation. Then there is the extraordinary fact that though annually there is distributed in unnecessary expenditure more than $25,000,000, 19,000 civil servants receive on an average from $1,100 to $1,400, or slightly less in salaries.

One clause of my bill asks that the powers of the commission be extended. At the present time under the act the Civil Service Commission, although nominally having the power to go into and reorganize departments, in effect has not the power unless the deputy and other officials of the department consent, or invite the reorganization. That condition of affairs is wrong. It should be compulsory upon the commission as part of its duties to enter into and reorganize the various departments of government consecutively, starting, if you like, with the largest and continuing through to the smallest. I say, as the result of what examination I have made of conditions, that if such a reorganization took place, if the commission undertook its duties properly and well, there would be a saving of even more than $20,000,000 a year in the administration of our civil service.

I am asking for the reinstatement under the commission of those positions that have been exempted by several orders in council, all but one of which were introduced by the present administration. When the present administration came into office practically the entire service was under the merit principle, but in the intervening years an enormous number of orders in council have been passed from time to time exempting various positions. In addition I am asking that departments that were regarded on their inauguration as temporary in nature, be now placed under the commission and given the rank of permanent. There is no reason I can see why they should not be so placed. The Prime Minister in his recent speech on the budget stated that, having listened to the arguments of hon. members, there was no intention now of doing away with the income tax, and therefore we may assume that the income tax branch of the department will continue to exist. If it is going to continue to exist, then I ask, in fairness to the system and the staff of that branch, that they be placed under the commission and receive the advantages of the permanency of the staff and all the other recognitions that they would acquire under it.

The same thing is true with regard to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Soldier Settlement Board. Hon. members will remember that the argument at the outset for placing those departments outside of the operations of the act was that they were temporary, but ten years after the war we find they are still being maintained and in many cases the votes have been increased for those departments. There is therefore no indication at the present time of any temporary nature in those two departments. In fact recent speeches by hon. members would indicate clearly that we may regard the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment as being, at least in our lifetime, of a permanent nature. Then why should we not make it permanent and place it under the act? Hon. members will at once rise in opposition to this proposal of mine and say: How are you going to establish an effective test for the minor positions—the labourer, the postmaster of a small post office with a salary of less than $200 a year, and all that sort of thing? My answer to that is that other countries have done it and other countries are doing it effectively to-day. You will find throughout the world nations applying the principle which I am asking to be applied in this case to the very class of positions which this government saw fit to exempt under special orders in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was not the government that exempted them, but the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Ah well, the commission for some reason or other which we had better examine possibly before a committee of this house did, it is true, make some suggestions to the government with respect to that, but I say definitely to the government that if the ministers of the crown of that day had adhered to the principles which they themselves enunciated at an earlier date they would never have consented to the request of the commission, which was in my opinion an evasion of their proper responsibility and duty, and which had behind it unquestionably pressure from those who wanted to get back to the patronage system again. I do not think you can escape that implication.

As a result of the abuses arising from patronage, including inefficiency, extravagance and abuses, the Union government some years ago placed under a special law, which I have under my hand, all civil service positions at that time; in other words, they provided that all positions in the service must be filled on the basis of open competition and of demonstrated ability to perform the work required. Those are almost the words of the act itself. As I have said, thousands of positions, some 13,000 odd, have since that time been exempted. The principal objection to retaining these positions under the Civil Service Commission was the impracticability of carrying on the proper examinations. When this question is discussed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps by one or two to my right, they will say that you cannot have an effective examination for these positions, and why should you have an examination at all for a labourer, for a man who works with a pick and shovel? My answer to that in the first place is that you can have an effective examination, and in the second place that the sustaining of the merit principle is so all-important that no excuse on the ground of a temporary difficulty should be recognized as a binding reason why all these positions should be exempted. We had a discussion in this house not long ago, a very heated and rather partisan one, with respect to the appointment of men to work on the retaining wall of the Rideau canal, and if the discussion that took place at that time is any criterion of the attitude of the public as a whole on this question, then what I have said stands well buttressed by the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). At that time, if I remember aright, he intimated that so far as he was concerned he thought it would be better for all concerned, better for the members for Ottawa, better for himself and the government, and better for the men, that the commission should have the handling of these appointments. I refer you to his words in Hansard of a few days ago.

Now the question arises, if you place these positions on the merit principle and make them subject to a civil service examination, no matter how perfunctory or casual it may be, some day or other you are going to be faced with the difficulty of making appointments, say, to the Public Works department in the city of Vancouver, and how are you going to ask that branch in Vancouver or any other branch in a city far distant to wait until the Civil Service Commission in Ottawa has retermined whether it has men on the eligible list for that class of position? That is a difficulty that I have anticipated. I expect that will be one of the arguments that will be hurled against this bill, but my answer to that is that it is provided for in the act itself, in section 39, sub-sections 2 and 3, where it is provided:

> When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa a responsible agent or officer of the department requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employee and the said agent or officer in each case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed.

And again:

> No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission; but where the place of employment is outside the Dominion of Canada, the term of such employment may extend to ninety days.

Again:

> Such employees may be paid the prevailing rate of pay at which persons qualified to perform such emergency work may be secured in the place or locality where the work is required to be done.

So that whole situation is carefully and studiously met by the provisions of the act itself. There is no difficulty, therefore, with respect to the making of temporary or emergency appointments in any part of the Dominion even if the Civil Service Commission is not at the moment in a position to make these appointments, because it is allowed thirty days, and an extension of time, if necessary, upon application from the deputy head of the department or the head of the works concerned.

I have in my hand evidence regarding the objections of council to the merit principle being applied in these exempted positions. A moment ago I intimated that the cabinet was responsible for the abandonment of the merit principle in this connection. When the commission reported to the government, the governor in council considered the situation, and then referred the matter back to the commission. On page 4 of the regulations you will find noted these words: "Considered too cumbersome and unnecessary, and the last step would be worse than the first." These words being interpreted to mean that the council did not agree to the merit regulation, and Dr. Roche says:

> That was brought to our notice. When it came up in the formal board meeting, my colleagues—I give them credit for their own honest opinions—differed with me. I felt that we had put that in all previous regulations, and I did not see why we should suddenly find out by a sudden conversion that this is not workable, and therefore I refused to sign a memo. without that being in, and I did it because of this fact.

That is the reason why I have included in my bill a provision that no position shall hereafter be excluded from the operation of the Civil Service Act of 1918 excepting upon the unanimous report of all the commissioners. There are only three of them, and the unanimous report of the three commissioners should be given. I find by examination of the reports of different committees and commissions examining into the civil service that in almost every case since the commission was established there has been a feeling that at least two of the commissioners have been to some extent influenced by those who would return to patronage, but there is one man to whom great credit is due who has at all times consistently refused to be swayed from the path of duty as laid down for him by the act itself, and that man is Dr. Roche. The greatest credit is due to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the other two commissioners were swayed from the path of duty?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, not at all, but I feel that for reasons which they may very sincerely hold, they have listened perhaps at least with greater effect—we will put it that way—to the pressure from those who would return to patronage than Dr. Roche has. That is the way perhaps to put it. That is why I think, if the government is sincere in its desire to maintain the merit principle, it will at least insert this clause in the act, that no positions hereafter shall be excluded from the operation of the act excepting upon the unanimous report of the three commissioners. That is not asking too much; it is a fair provision. At the present time there is a strong suspicion which it would be well for the government to remove from the public mind and from the minds of hon. members of this house—it is no more than a suspicion, I grant you, but it is there and I have heard it in this house since I came here—that the last two appointees of this government to the Civil Service Commission are being motivated by the desire of the members of the party surrounding the Prime Minister in their actions with respect to these things.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is going a little wide of the mark when he attacks in this way commissioners who are not here to defend themselves. If he has any direct charge against any commissioner I wish he would make it; then it could be investigated. I submit that no hon. gentleman should reflect on a member of the public service either directly or indirectly unless he is prepared to go further and make a definite charge.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the position taken by the Prime Minister is very fair, and I will be equally fair by withdrawing any implication there may be in my remarks. But I do say to him that I have simply expressed in my statement the point of view that has been expressed to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that there is hardly a man in the public service who is not criticized in a similar manner by some opponent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All that may be very true; but it would be to the interest of the government, and the commission itself that any suspicion of that kind should not be allowed to continue. My proposal to the Prime Minister would be that in all cases of this kind where any such question arises, where there is any doubt in his mind as to either the commission itself or the recommendations that come from it, the matter should be referred to a committee of this house; and I will in a moment quote the right hon. Prime Minister's own words in that regard. I stated a little earlier that other countries had found it quite practicable to place under the operation of the merit system and to make subject to examination appointments of men, such as ordinary day labourers, much less higher positions. Let me quote a memorandum which I have in my hand respecting some of the regulations covering the appointment of unclassified labourers in the federal service of the United States. This is an extract from regulations of the United States Civil Service Commission, published in the report of the commission for the year ending June 30, 1922, Regulation No. 1 provides:

1. The Civil Service Commission is authorized to apply these regulations to such cities or parts of the executive civil service as it may deem expedient.

2. It shall be the duty of all officers in the executive civil service to aid the commission in all proper ways in carrying these regulations into effect.

I will pass over the qualifications of applicants and come to the particular subject under discussion, the point of eligibility:

1. The names of eligibles, with the kinds of labour in which proficient, rated at 85 or more, shall be registered by sex in the order of their ratings on physical condition,— on physical condition.

—except that honourably discharged soldiers, sailors and marines, their widows and the wives of soldiers, sailors and marines disqualified by injuries received in service and line of duty, shall have priority.

2. Eligibility shall be for one year, but the period may be extended by the commission for all those on any register if it is deemed inexpedient to hold a new examination.

I turn then to the report of William C. Deming, who explained the details and advantages of the merit system. At that time he was head of the federal Civil Service Commission of the United States. Take unskilled labourers, for example:

Those who seek employment as unskilled labourers are given a physical examination only. It would be useless to test a pick-and-shovel man or a charwoman in arithmetic or geography.

I quite agree with him. But when opponents of the merit system state that it is not practical to make an eligible list for unskilled labourers, I say the evidence of what has been done in other countries must disabuse their minds of that point of view.

For the mechanical trades,—

And, by the way, an enormous number of skilled artisans have been excluded by order in council passed by this government.

—a physical examination is required which constitutes 40 per cent of the total rating. The other 60 per cent is given to a rating on training and experience in the particular trade upon which application is made.

I could go on and quote what they do in all other cases, such as the technical professions, book-keepers, stenographers, file clerks, general clerks, and so on, through the whole rota of possible positions.

We also find, Mr. Speaker, that parliamentary reports from beginning to end since 1877 have consistently denounced patronage in the government service. Let me refer very briefly to these reports. A committee under the chairmanship of Mr. George Casey, M.P., reported in April, 1877, and this is an extract from the report:

Political patronage is responsible for other evils, and we do not hesitate to express the conviction that many unnecessary civil offices have been retained, and that new places have been created, for no better purpose than to provide for the followers of influential politicians.

Again,

Generally speaking, political influence has been found to interfere more or less in the working of all branches of the service, and always with bad effect.

"And always with bad effect." Here is another extract from the first report of a commission to investigate the civil service, of which Mr. Donald McInnes, of Hamilton, was chairman, and Mr. Martin J. Griffin, secretary. This was on March 5, 1881. The report says:

It—

The patronage system.

—embarrasses ministers in providing an efficient public service, and it causes great and often irresistible pressure to be brought on members of parliament to force their consent to the nomination and appointment of unfit persons.

That last statement, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat.

—and it causes great and often irresistible pressure to be brought on members of parliament to force their consent to the nomination and appointment of unfit persons.

Now the question has been put to me: Am I not in a better position to nominate a postmaster for a little village in my riding than the Civil Service Commission? My answer is twofold. First, I do not know—although I probably could learn—the qualifications required to fill the position. That, however, could be overcome, and possibly I should be as well able as the commission to determine from a stated form the eligibility of any individual who might apply or whom I might have in mind for nomination. But the statement of this commission has the strongest force in matters of the kind, that the member himself does not always feel free—although he may be independent enough to act freely—in making the appointments if he has it in his power to do so. The pressure of political partyism is too strong upon him, the need for getting his friends into office is frequently too apparent to him, and there is the inclination on his part that is almost inescapable to appoint, other things not even being equal, those who are his political friends. I ask any hon. member opposite to place himself in a position where two men are applying for a postmastership; one of them is a frank and avowed Conservative, a man who does not agree with the hon. gentleman politically at all; the other is a good friend of his own political persuasion. Now, this good friend of his own political persuasion may not be quite as efficient as the other applicant, but it is very easy to argue—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He may not be in this particular case. It is very easy for the hon. gentleman who has the appointment in his hands to say to himself: Oh, well, the other chap is a good friend of mine; I am sure he will be all right anyhow; I will let the thing go through; I don't want to have a Tory in that job anyhow. That is how we are tempted to act; it is human nature. But in the administration of our public service such temptations should be eliminated as far as possible. Let me quote an extract from a report of a commission composed of Messrs. J. M. Courtney, chairman, Thomas Fyshe and P. J. Bazin, on March 17, 1908:

> That entrance to and promotions in the service should not be a matter of political patronage, but that the whole outside service should be placed under the Civil Service Commission; that promotion therein should be by merit, and that the higher positions should be filled from the service itself.

A commission composed of G. N. Ducharme and R. S. Lake reported to much the same effect on November 9, 1912. In the report of Commissioners Slack, Lewis and Eugene Tarte in 1918 we find much the same language; in fact, the language of this report was even more trenchant. The statement appears:

> General conditions in the printing bureau may be briefly described as shocking. They are, however, the perfectly natural consequence of the "system" which created them. Under any but government ownership the sheriff would long ago have closed the doors of the plant.

Much the same language is used in the report submitted in 1921 by the parliamentary committee of which Mr. Spinney was chairman, and in the final report of the special parliamentary committee brought down in June 1923 under the chairmanship of Mr. James Malcolm we find:

> Your committee is of the opinion that the two fundamental principles of the Civil Service Act are the merit system and the system of appointment by competitive examination, and that both these principles must be preserved.

They did not say "in part"; they did not say that the principle must be preserved with respect to the service generally but not as regards 13,000 positions. The statement is explicit that, in the opinion of the committee, the merit system should be faithfully adhered to. Let me now give an extract from a report of a special committee of the Senate, session 1924, under the chairmanship of the Hon. F. L. Beique:

> Your committee is convinced that the method of appointment and promotion by competition (usually known as the merit system), is preferable, in every way, to advancement by favour or influence. In support of this principle may be cited the findings of a number of committees, extracts from which will be found in the appendix to this report.

I have already quoted from some of these findings. My time is going and although there is much that I should like to say I must curtail my remarks. The ideal condition in government would be one in which the administrative function, in so far as it is generally applicable, would be separated from the political function. The political function in the business of government is the function responsible for policy and authority. I am speaking in broad terms. I admit there may be modifications of that rule from time to time, and in certain instances but broadly speaking the political function is one of policy and authority. The administrative function, the civil service, has for its duty the carrying out in a business like manner of the policy determined by the political. To do this properly the administrative should not be hampered by the political nor vice versa.

I hesitate at this stage to bring to the attention of the house the record of the Liberal party in this connection. It is not one of which I am proud personally, because I adhere to the merit principle and believe in it, and because the Liberal party, through its greatest leaders, has from time to time expressed itself in determined tones on this question, and now to find them in office under pressure from their friends, from the commission, or from some other source going back upon their own stated principles and repudiating their own convictions is to me repugnant. I am not going to weary the house with a recitation of all the orders in council. Let it suffice to say that the positions which are to-day exempt from the Civil Service Act number between thirteen and fourteen thousand, roughly, and this in spite of the words of the Prime Minister himself. The right hon. gentleman, speaking in Ottawa on September 11, 1926, is reported to have said:

> May I say further, ladies and gentlemen, that I stand strongly, and have always stood, for the merit system and promotion on the basis of merit and will do my utmost to see that that is maintained. I might say much more, but being in the middle of an election and on the eve of the day of polling, I naturally have to be somewhat reserved and careful in the statements that I make.

Now that the election is over may I cordially invite the Prime Minister to abandon that reserve and carefulness and regale the house with exactly what he would like to have told that meeting in Ottawa. He continued:

> I do not wish to say anything here that is other than in accord with what were our policies prior to the time that I went out of office. All that I have said to you to-night is simply by way of stating that I am prepared to implement what we were ready to do.

The last sentence is a qualification which is not easily understood. I do not know what they were prepared to do but they were prepared to do it anyway. Now, I find the Minister of Justice, speaking on March 11, 1921, is reported in Hansard at page 839 as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve—

Who at that time, Mr. Speaker, was yourself.

—and I am opposed to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Victoria.

Then Sir Sam Hughes.

I do not believe in political patronage. It has been tried in many countries of the world and it has been found wanting everywhere. I think that positions should go to merit and never to influence, on the part either of the candidates themselves or of their families, and I am opposed to nepotism in the distribution of public offices. There is one matter I wish to deal with for a moment or two, and that is the fact that this government is not giving proper support to the Civil Service Commission.

He was referring to the Union government, and now I apply his own words to himself: I say that this government is not giving proper support to the Civil Service Commission. I must now pass on. There are many other quotations that might be given from men of prominence in the Liberal party who have since left the house. The Hon. Charles Murphy was one of the most brilliant exponents of the merit principle and he exploited it on every occasion to condemn patronage.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have only forty minutes. The hon. gentleman will make a speech himself, I have no doubt. So far as this question is concerned, I must say that in my seven years in this house I have found no more honest, convincing and consistent supporter of the merit principle than the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen on my right to follow the leadership of that man in this matter. I feel that their present leader will follow in his footsteps; I hope he will adhere to the merit principle as the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen did. Let me quote Mr. Meighen's statement:

We put the civil service on the rock basis of merit, although this was done in the face of the bitterest of party opposition, but the task was achieved. I want to say that under any government of which I shall be the head the civil service will continue to stand on the rock basis of the merit system.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

A burst of applause followed that pronouncement of policy. Mr. Meighen went on to say that the civil service was in danger and he mentioned certain matters of a partisan character to which I need not refer. He also referred to a statement made by the Minister of National Defence, "now sometimes called minister of self defence," the Hon. E. M. Macdonald of Pictou, to the following effect:

Of all the facts of which Mr. Meighen is guilty, the one unforgivable sin I can never forget is the passing of the Civil Service Act . . . . There lies the greatest danger that surrounds the civil service, and keep this in mind, in so far as you vote.

I ask you too to keep that in mind when voting now. We find also that His Honour the Speaker, before his elevation to that office, is reported as follows—Hansard, May 2, 1921:

In Canada, my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster), who is the senior member of this house, knows how the lives of ministers of the crown have been made unhappy through this infernal patronage system. . . . . Is there a member of this parliament with any self-respect who of his own free will would return to the days when lobbies were filled with office seekers who made parliamentary life almost unbearable by their importunate demands?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just before my hon. friend resumes his seat I would like to ask him a question, as I am sure he would not wish to mislead the house in regard to any orders in council which have been passed exempting civil servants or classes of civil servants from the control of the Civil Service Commission. He made reference to a large number who had been exempted, but I did not catch whether he said a large number of orders in council or a large number of individuals who had been exempted under orders in council. Would he tell me that first?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A number of orders in council have been passed by this government exempting various positions, a list of which I have under my hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many orders in council?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the Prime Minister will give me about five minutes I will add them up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend used the figure of 48,000 or something like that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, between 13,000 and 14,000 positions have been exempted since this government came into office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not understand how my hon. friend secures that number; does he mean that number of classes or that number of individual employees?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In answer to the Prime Minister, I now request the permission of the house to place on Hansard a complete list of all the orders in council passed by this government, giving the names of the positions and the numbers of the positions exempted since this government came into office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want the house to hear the orders in council. I have no objection to my hon. friend reading them if the house will give him permission, but I would ask him whether he has not reference to the orders in council passed under the following clause of the Civil Service Act:

> In any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable nor in the public interest to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, exclude such position or positions in whole or in part from the operations of the act, and make such regulations as are deemed advisable prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

That is the clause in the act under which the orders in council referred to by my hon. friend were passed. One of the classes exempted under that provision is all positions where the salary does not exceed $200 per annum. I have no doubt that if my hon. friend includes in his figures all those persons whose salaries have been under $200 per annum he may be quite correct in the numbers he gives, but it is very misleading to represent that the government have taken from under the control of the Civil Service Commission by order in council thousands of positions, when these orders in council have been passed as being in the public interest, and in fact at the instance of the Civil Service Commission itself.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I have made my position so clear upon a number of similar occasions that I need not take very much of the time of the house to-day. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has stated that since this government came into power they have released 14,000 positions from the control of the Civil Service Commission. The facts do not warrant that statement. If we consult the journals of the house for 1923 we find that Dr. Roche, in giving evidence before the parliamentary committee, stated that there were orders in council passed by the previous administration, particularly that order in council passed in September, 1921, which exempted over 11,000 positions and by the word "positions" I mean categories under which people had been employed. On June 29, 1922, when this government were in power, order in council No. 1053 was passed, which recited all the orders in council which had been passed by the previous administration having to do with these exemptions. Dr. Roche stated that up to that time about 13,000 positions had been released, and that the order in council of June 29, 1922, released only 3,000, so my hon. friend was quite in error when he stated that this administration had exempted 14,000 positions.

Then the hon. gentleman quoted a sentence from the Malcolm report, which stated that the merit system must be preserved at all costs. That is nothing new to me; I was one of those who wrote that sentence in the report, and ever since then, in my every utterance and in every way I have bound myself to support the merit system. But there are two kinds of merit systems. It is far from my thoughts that we should destroy the Civil Service Commission altogether; there must be some kind of a commission. There was such a commission in 1908; it was improved from time to time, and we might as well be frank about it. The Civil Service Commission is not a sort of old King Tut's grave, upon which we must not place an unholy hand; we must be able to speak about that commission without being charged with the desire to destroy it. Surely the Civil Service Act is not above reproach, like Caesar's wife, and surely one can say something about it in an honest effort to improve it without being charged with having a nefarious or murderous intent. If we had a little more co-operation; if the hon. gentlemen who speak in such glowing terms about the merit system would only view these problems as we have to view them, we might get somewhere. In 1918 the Civil Service Act was amended for the purpose of allowing the Griffenhagen classification to be adopted into the service. That was one of the most unnatural classifications ever made, and the service feels its effect even to-day. It will be years and years before the noxious seeds of that classification are completely eradicated from the civil service, and those who suffer most are the civil servants themselves. The Civil Service Commission did wonderful work in trying to solve the difficulty, but this classification was introduced at that time and the Civil Service Commission was reorganized. That law was framed in haste, and it was drawn up for a purpose which had nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission.

Surely it will be admitted that that law, as is the case with every law, was not perfect in the beginning; surely certain features may be improved from time to time.

When I mention co-operation between the government and the civil servants I come immediately to what has been advocated for some years, a closer bond between these different elements which will probably come about through the medium of civil service councils. I quite agree that the merit system must be preserved and that all entrants into the civil service should pass a competitive examination. We are told now that the civil service law of Canada is designed exactly along the lines of the laws prevailing in other countries, but we have not been told as yet the names of those countries. If my hon. friend refers to the English civil service law he refers to something which does not exist, because there is no civil service law in England. In that country there is only a series of orders in council, which give the greatest latitude to the heads of the different departments. I hold in my hand photostat copies of those orders in councils, if anyone would care to see them. Then my hon. friend said there was a civil service law in the United States; he referred particularly to the state of New Jersey, and stated that everyone was admitted to the civil service of that state through the merit system and a competitive examination. Then I find at page 30 that in the state of New Jersey there is a noncompetitive class and this is what is said with respect to it:

> Positions in the non-competitive class shall be those of a minor character, the filling of which is impracticable either through competitive examination or through registration under the provisions of rule XI.

There is another provision about the non-competitive class in the state of New York. At page 10 we find the following:

> In the state service, all unskilled labourers and such skilled labourers as are not included in the competitive class or the non-competitive class; and in addition thereto there may be included in the exempt class all other subordinate offices for the filling of which competitive or non-competitive examination may be found to be not practicable. But no office or position shall be deemed to be in the exempt class unless it is specifically named in such class in the rules, and the reasons for each such exemption shall be stated separately in the annual reports of the commission. Not more than one appointment shall be made to or under the title of any such office or position, unless a different number is specifically mentioned in such rules. Appointments to positions in the exempt class may be made without examination.

The same words that are used in the Canadian law.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Now as to the differences between the Canadian Civil Service Act and the British Civil Service Act, let me say this: I have quoted this memorandum time and again, and it no doubt appears in Hansard. I have often quoted it on public platforms. This is what it says:

> The head of a Canadian department who is responsible for the carrying out of the work of that department is told by the commission what clerical assistance he will require and is then furnished with that assistance, and he is further told by the commission what professional and technical assistance he will require and is furnished with such persons to do that technical and professional work as the commission decide have the qualifications. If the head of the department wants more help, he notifies the commission who decide whether he does or not and what kind of help is needed.
> The British commission is subject to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and is not independent of parliament as is the Canadian. It makes all appointments (after examination, approved by the treasury) unless the position is wholly or partially professional or has requirements otherwise peculiar and not ordinarily to be acquired in the civil service in which cases the head of the department nominates the appointee. Also in cases where the head of the department and the treasury consider it to be in the public interest, they may dispense with all or part of the qualifications—

And so on. I am not blaming the Civil Service Commission for administering the law as they find it. I have pointed out the defects of that law but I cannot blame them for administering the law as they find it. I should like to see the responsibility placed where it should lie, namely, with certain provisions and certain qualifications, upon the deputy head or the minister himself.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a great privilege indeed to have such a fine protective staff as we have in connection with this House of Commons, the finest body of men I believe that ever occupied positions in this building. Now if parliament had not the privilege of choosing these men or having the final say, do you think we should have such a fine and well disciplined body of men as we have now? The responsibility for looking after this body of men is placed upon the Sergeant-at-Arms who acts under the direction of Mr. Speaker. I for one am satisfied that if the Civil Service Commission had to choose the members of this staff it would not be as fine a body of men as it is to day nor would the discipline be as good. It stands to reason that that could not be otherwise.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does not the responsibility for the appointment of these men rest upon parliament itself, or one who represents parliament, namely, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Indirectly the staff are under the control of parliament but Mr. Speaker and his officers are immediately in control. There is a directing hand. Somebody assumes responsibility for the appointments and the personal element and the personal touch are noticeable. It could not be done in any other way. The argument advanced is that the Civil Service Commission is supreme or ought to be supreme, but it is within the power of this parliament to tell the commission what it ought to do. The Civil Service Commission having exempted these positions for reasons known to itself, it ill becomes parliament to say to the commission that it must take those positions back. Now section 20 of the act says:

Except where otherwise expressly provided, all appointments to the civil service shall be upon competitive examination—

Then section 26 provides that the form of examination may be written or oral, or in the form of a demonstration of skill. So long as the Civil Service Commission will administer every bit of the law as it is enacted I shall have no quarrel with it. It is discharging a duty which has been imposed upon it and it is honestly discharging that duty. Now a moment ago I referred to order in council No. 1053. Let us see under what conditions that order in council was passed. It says:

The civil service commissioners are of opinion that the following classes of positions should be exempt from the operation of the Civil Service Act under the above section—

And section 4 of the act says:

The duties of the commission shall be:
(a) to test and pass upon the qualifications of candidates;
(b) of its own motion to investigate and report upon the operation of this act.

Let me quote the following from the order in council:

The Civil Service Commission is of opinion that it is not practicable to prescribe a system of competitive examinations or tests as required by the Civil Service Act, 1918, for making appointments to positions of this nature. The commission is further of opinion that there is good ground for believing that the above classes were among those which parliament had in mind for exemption in amending the Civil Service Act during the session of 1921, and the Civil Service Commission therefore, has the honour to report that it is not practicable to apply the Civil Service Act to the classes mentioned above and to recommend that they be excluded from the operation of the act—

I do not want these positions, but the Civil Service Commission has said that it is impracticable and not in the public interest to carry out the letter of the law. Therefore in its wisdom it recommends that these appointments be taken out of its hands. What are these appointments? I am not going to read them all. but there are the following among others: painter, painter and paperhanger, pattern-maker, plasterer, plumber and pipe-fitter, process welder. So it goes on all down the list. There are altogether 14,000 positions which means rather 14,000 persons, not categories that were affected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman regard the present method of employing these people as satisfactory?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I do, because there is no other way to deal with them.

Mr. IRVINE: Why argue if there is no other way?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That shows the wisdom of my hon. friend and I leave him with his question. The Civil Service Commission has decided to exempt these positions from the operation of the law, and I have the greatest faith in and respect for the three commissioners. The hon. member for Bow River says in one breath that there should be no exemptions and in the next that there may be exemptions when the three commissioners get together and so decide. The Malcolm report of 1923 contained a stipulation—and the Civil Service Commission agreed to the recommendations contained in that report—that in all matters, whenever two commissioners sign, their decision was to be final except, that the dissenting commissioner should put down his reasons in writing for submission to the governor in council with the recommendation for exemption. If the law is continued in that way and if the Civil Service Commission desire to exempt further positions or to bring positions back under the act, I have nothing more to say. I am satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the commission.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset, when I hear the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) saying that he is satisfied with the present system of appointment in connection with exempted positions, his remarks are entirely at variance with those of many members of his party when they sat on this side of the house, as I will proceed to show? I feel that the house and the country owe a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) for pressing the issue which is the subject matter of the bill we are now discussing. As evidence in support of this bill and as proof that the public service is impaired through the patronage system, I desire to place upon record some of the operations of that system in my constituency.

I will take first the question of the dismissal of the postmaster at Fort Pelly. This post office was moved seven miles from its original position. The newly appointed postmaster did not even reside in the district; he was not even a patron of the previous post office. It is rather amusing to read the correspondence and to find that the officials of the department, when they were instructed by the Postmaster General to appoint the present postmaster to that position, could not even find him, because apparently letters addressed to the post office of which he was to take charge did not reach him, because he was not a patron of that post office. In the file which I have before me no particular reasons are given for the change in that post office, but in answer to a question I put on the order paper the statement is made:

Representations made by residents through Mr. George McPhee, M.P.

That does not mean anything. We do not know what those representations were, and against that we have a petition signed by almost every patron of that post office requesting that no change be made in the office and that the then incumbent be left there. It was pointed out in the petition that the previous postmaster lived in the centre of the district and that the removal of the office six or seven miles away would seriously inconvenience the people. The request, however, of these people was ignored and in answer to a question as to the reasons for the dismissal of the postmaster we are told by the Postmaster General:

For better accommodation.

I wonder who should be the judge as to the better accommodation of the office. Surely it should be the people who are patrons of that office rather than others who live outside of the district altogether. I will venture the assertion that the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) has never been in that district, knows nothing about it and has acted on letters received from some patronage hunters in the district. The removal of this office necessitated a change in the mail service costing the department considerably more money. Previously this service, which was a weekly service, was performed for $104 per annum whereas at the present time it costs $164.20.

Let me take the case of the postmaster at St. Front. The previous postmaster was a storekeeper and as such was in a much better position ordinarily to serve the people than a farmer would be. The position was taken from him without any reason being given in the file, but in answer to my inquiry on the order paper the Postmaster General gives this as his reason:

The postmaster was dismissed for having taken part in the federal election of 1926 as deputy returning officer and enumerator.

Surely it will not be seriously contended that a man who is called upon to act in the public service as enumerator and deputy returning officer is taking part in politics. If so, that is something new entirely. I am quite sure that, as in most of these cases, it cannot be proved that this man took any part whatever in politics. This is a French-speaking district and this man is one of the few residents in that district who could talk and read and write both languages. That being the case, it is possible that he was appointed, I do not know on whose recommendation, to the position of deputy returning officer, but the reason for his appointment was very likely that he was a master of both languages, reading and writing both of them fluently.

Let us consider the position of the postmaster at Poplar Bluff. This post office was moved five miles away and the roads between the old district and the new district, because the post office has been moved into a new district, are very bad, sometimes almost impassable. This leaves the people in the actual district of Poplar Bluff without a post office at all. The district into which it is moved is served by the post office of Arran. I think previously the people of that district secured their mail at the village of Arran and therefore the service is not of much use to them. May I read two of the letters which appear on sessional paper 150 showing how the change was made and how the new postmaster was appointed? This is a letter from Pelly under date of March 5, 1927, addressed to Mr. G. W. McPhee, M.P., Ottawa. It reads:

DEAR SIR:

At a meeting of the Pelly Liberal Association held on February 26, 1927, the following resolution was passed:

That W. O. Stasuik, postmaster of Poplar Bluff, a Meighen appointee on the recommendation of M. N. Campbell—

I may say that is absolutely false. This man was appointed by the present government.

—be dismissed for political partizanship, and we recommend Paul D. Dykun of S.W. 22-34-31 W. 1st. for the appointment of postmaster there.

Pelly Liberal Association,
C. P. DUNDAS,
President,
Mrs. L. M. BRIDGMEN,
Secretary.

We have the remarkable picture of people living in a village not even adjacent to this district, because this is a different district altogether, recommendng the appointment of a postmaster there and the Postmaster General acting on their recommendation without consulting a single person in the district. That is not representative government and if that is a sample of how the patronage system operates, the house and the country owe a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Bow River for bringing this question before the house.

Let me just give what would be an interesting analogy. Let us say that the people of Toronto want a public work of some kind or a person appointed to a public office and the Liberal association or the Conservative association of Winnipeg pass a resolution upon which the powers that be act in the city of Toronto. That is exactly the principle that has been followed with respect to this particular post office, and I say again that it is a vicious principle indeed.

There is the case of the post office at Nut Mountain, Saskatchewan. I find that a petition signed by all but three of the patrons of that post office was forwarded to the Postmaster General asking that there be no change made in that post office. The recommendation for the change was made by Mr. J. A. MacMillan, my Liberal opponent, in a letter which he wrote to the Post Office Department on December 27, 1926, in which in part he says:

> I am informed that a petition was circulated in the Nut Mountain locality requesting that the post office be left where it is. but from the reports I have from reliable sources in that locality I would recommend the change, and feel that it should be made.

The point I want to make is this: Here you have a petition signed by all but three of the residents of the district, and yet a gentleman who does not live in that district, and who I am sure is personally acquainted with not very many patrons of the post office, recommends that the change be made, and on his recommendation that change is made. In addition to that, in the file in the office of the Postmaster General, there are no less than seventeen private letters from residents in that district, patrons of that post office, who protest in the most vigorous terms against the change of office and show how the service will be impaired in many respects if a change is made.

Then we have the removal of the post office at Maloneck, Saskatchewan. This is moved about seven and a half miles from the previous location. It is moved that much further into what is really another district entirely, and as a matter of fact it leaves a district almost entirely unserved by a post office. Of course, the Postmaster General gives as a reason—I am not blaming him entirely, because he is acting on the recommendations made to him—that he is placing this post office where it was previously situated. That is true, but since the post office was located at this other place, many homesteads have been taken up in that particular district and an entirely new district has been opened up That new district was given a post office some years ago, I am not sure when, but I think since this government came into power. Now we have the people in that new district left entirely unserved by a post office. Here again I may say that the change was made on the recommendation of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee).

Then we have the case of a post office at Rockford, Saskatchewan. In this case the original post office was temporarily transferred to the man who lived on the same farm and in the same house, and a good many of the residents recommended that he be given the post office. However, a petition was signed by forty-five of the residents recommending a certain party for the position. This other man, I might say, lived quite close to the original location of the post office. The recommendation from the hon. member for Yorkton again in this case was that the post office be moved to the residence of Mr. W. Weightman, who lives seven miles away at the extreme edge of the district. This change necessitated some people travelling a distance of twelve miles for their mail, and anyone who has lived in that northern bush country, where there are very poor roads and swamps and sloughs and so on, knows something of the hardships that would be involved in the settlers having to travel a distance of twelve miles for their mail. May I read a letter from the district superintendent at Moose Jaw, dated March 17, and addressed to the Postmaster General, in which he says in part:

> It will be noted that in my memorandum of the 2nd, instant, it is stated that an inspector who recently visited the Ketchen post office, the railway town, was informed that Mr. Weightman's location would be suitable. This information was obtained from a Mr. Downs, an old timer in the district, who represented Mr. Weightman's as a central place in the community. It was also pointed out by Mr. Downs that the present location at Mr. Galbraith's is sometimes not accessible in the spring when the creeks in the locality are overflowing.

There is something rather remarkable about this, Mr. Speaker. This post office inspector was apparently instructed to go to the village of Ketchen, the nearest village to this post office, and there we find him interviewing a gentleman who does not reside in that village at all, who does not reside even in that district. The recommendation for the change in this office was made by the hon. member for Yorkton, and he states that representations were made to him from the village of Preeceville which is another village further east. This Mr. Downs, from whom the information was received, is a resident of that village, so I think it is a remarkable coincidence that this gentleman happened to be at Ketchen and met the post office inspector, and was kind enough to give him the information on the strength of which the post office was changed. Now what are the facts? I should like to quote from one or two letters in that connection, first, from a letter from the secretary of the school district, dated March 15, and addressed to the Postmaster General, in which he says:

As a patron of the Rockford post office I protest against the removal of the post office to Mr. William Weightman, who lives in one corner of the district and is from six to ten miles from a majority of the patrons. Also he is only six miles from the Strand post office and about the same distance from Ypres post office. It will be a gross injustice to about 75 per cent of the patrons. As secretary-treasurer of the school district here I have considerable correspondence, and I strongly object to travelling sixteen miles every week for my mail, eight miles each way. I beg that you will reconsider your decision re transfer of the office to Mr. Weightman, and leave it at its present location, Mr. G. N. Galbraith's.

I will now read just one or two of the clauses of the petition which was signed by almost all the residents in that district. The first clause gives the reason for asking that there be no change, and says:

(1) Mr. Weightman lives on the extreme east side of the Rockford district, and the change will benefit no person but himself.

The petition goes on to say:

(2) The road to Mr. Weightman's homestead in the summer time is next to impassable.

(3) The bulk of the settlers in the Rockford district live on the west side thereof.

(4) That the proposed change would place Rockford post office approximately six miles from the Strand post office and about the same distance from the Ypres post office, leaving the settlers on the west side of the Rockford district, some ten miles from any post office.

There you have three post offices clustered together, while an enormous district on the other side is not served at all. The last clause of the petition reads:

(8) That in the event of a transfer having already been arranged for, it be held in abeyance until such time as the post office inspector can visit the district and investigate the situation.

[Mr. Campbell.]

I just want to appeal to this house and ask hon. members if anything could be fairer than the request contained in this petition that at least any change contemplated be held in abeyance until a post office inspector can go to the district? But in spite of that request, no inspector was sent. It seems to me that the Postmaster General or somebody else was almost afraid to send a post office inspector to the district for fear that he would get a report adverse to those who wanted to satisfy the patronage demands. Certainly, if a post office inspector had gone to that district, he would have been convinced and could not have reported otherwise than in compliance with the wishes of the residents. Here is another letter, from a private individual again, demanding that a post office inspector be sent to that district, and pointing out what a gross injustice was being done. Here you have a petition signed by practically all the residents of that district deliberately and callously ignored, and action taken on the recommendation apparently of a gentleman who lived in another district entirely many, many miles away.

Take the case of the post office at Drobot. I may say in explanation that Drobot is not in my constituency, but in the constituency of the hon. member for Yorkton, but many of the residents of my district secured their mail at that post office, and it is a matter of considerable interest to my constituents. Strong representations were made to me on behalf of the people of that district. This postmaster also was dismissed on the recommendation of the member for Yorkton, but no reasons whatever are given for the dismissal. The post office is moved three and one-half miles away from its original location, and I might add that it is that much nearer to another post office, and that much further into another district and further from the district it was supposed to serve. A petition was forwarded to the Postmaster General signed by 220 persons protesting against this change, but as usual it was ignored. May I say that the gentleman who sent in this petition, and who lives in my constituency in the village of Buchanan, is an active Liberal and pointed out to the Postmaster General the injustice of this dismissal, but apparently that did not prevail against the recommendation of the member for Yorkton. May I read a paragraph from the letter of the gentleman to whom I refer, Mr. B. Foster, dated May 11, 1927, to the Postmaster General:

I personally am of the opinion that the post office at Stinka's place—

That is the name of the previous postmaster.

—is more central for the Drobot district than it would be at Surkan's place, and the fact that the post office has been there for almost twenty years is in itself sufficient to satisfy you that the people in the district found it convenient.

In this case again the change involved a considerable increase in the cost of delivering mail from the village.

I have also had some representations made to me with reference to the change at Kamsack. This place is not in my district, and I have no direct personal interest in it, but I notice in the file that the previous postmaster, who was in the office for sixteen years, is charged by the member for Yorkton with political activity. I understand that several residents of the district wrote to the Postmaster General demanding that there be a public investigation of the charge of political activity. I am assured that in no way can this charge be proved. That is equally true of the other instances that I have cited.

Take the case of Sheho. This place again is not in my district, but the post office serves some of my constituents. Here again the change was made on the recommendation of the member for Yorkton, who charged the former postmaster with political partisanship. There is no proof of this on the file, and there was no investigation. The former postmaster wrote me and this is a paragraph from his letter dated December 27, 1927:

There was no investigation whatever, although I had given every satisfaction to the department. I attached a petition to my application from all the tradesmen in Sheho asking for my re-appointment, but it did not have any effect.

Then take the case of the former postmaster at Annette. This is another post office in my district. The case is covered by sessional paper 182. The man was dismissed on the instructions of the Postmaster General. No reasons for the dismissal were given, but I was shown in the Postmaster General's office some letters which had passed between him and the hon. member for Yorkton dealing with the matter. I was told they were private letters and were not in the sessional papers, and that copies could not be given. If a member of parliament or any other individual can recommend changes in the public service, and then the Postmaster General puts the member's letters on a private file, and refuses to produce them on an order of the house, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is an interference with the rights and privileges of parliament. This is a case of aggravated injustice. The department had very great difficulty in making the transfer owing to the fact that they could not secure anyone to carry the mail between the new post office and the village, which involved an increase in cost of about $126. The office was moved four miles north, and is that much nearer another post office, leaving a large part of the district unprovided with postal facilities. May I read an extract from a letter addressed by the district superintendent at Moose Jaw to the Postmaster General under date of April 8, 1927.

The removal of the Annette post office to Mr. Haras's place will increase the distance of the Preeceville and Ypres via Astwood and Annette mail service seven miles each way according to information received from the contractor. The contractor claims that to serve the Annette post office at the proposed site he would be obliged to travel four miles north from the present location of Annette and then return three miles south to obtain a crossing over the creek on the continuation of his trip to Ypres.

And so on.

A pro rata increase for seven miles additional travel amounts to $126 per annum.

In this case also there is a petition, signed by 57 residents, representing 90 per cent of the patrons of the post office. As far as I can understand there is not a single complaint against the administration of any of these post offices. If so, there is nothing on the file to indicate it. I presume the Postmaster General would give, as a reason for the dismissals, political partisanship. I accept the Postmaster General's word, but will change his reason a little bit. This is the real reason for the change in all these cases: There must be a change in order to reward some one for political partisanship. The newly appointed postmasters had to be rewarded for their services to the Liberal party during the last election. This is the actual reason for the action by the Postmaster General; there was no complaint against these men, who had given good service for many years. In fact a good many of them were appointed by the present government, and apparently were quite satisfactory until some one had to be rewarded for valuable services rendered.

In reply to a question asked in the house some time ago I find that 421 postmasters have been dismissed from the service since October 1, 1926.

Mr. VENIOT: How many of the 421 are reported in the return submitted to this house as having been dismissed for theft and irregularity? The hon. gentleman has the information; it is not fair on his part not to state it to the house.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I did not say that all these men were dismissed for political partisanship. It seems a remarkable thing that within two years so many of these men committed theft while very few did so in the ten years before.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the hon. gentleman wish me to keep in office a postmaster who was guilty of theft?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly not; but I would like to know how many were guilty of theft.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman has in his hand the return to the house containing information of those who were dismissed for theft, irregularity, drunkenness and incompetence, all based on reports of our inspectors.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have no return. I have the answer in Hansard. Incompetence is a very wide term and could be charged against anyone. But it cannot fairly apply to any man who has been in the public service for several years. One of these men was postmaster for sixteen years. Referring to the appointment of the postmaster for St. Boniface, the Winnipeg Tribune has this editorial comment:

> Has political patronage entered into the appointment of the postmaster for St. Boniface? The circumstances under which the appointment has been made call for more explanation than the government has so far offered. All that the public really knows about the matter is that Dr. J. P. Howden, the Liberal member for St. Boniface in the Dominion parliament is highly pleased with the selection.
> Less than two weeks ago the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa had a candidate selected for the position. The candidate was officially notified by the commission of his appointment. Suddenly the Post Office Department at Ottawa finds that the Civil Service Commission's appointee is not the best man for the job. The commission is ignored and another man is put in to fill the position.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is the hon. member aware that the man who was appointed to the position at St. Boniface had been assistant postmaster for fourteen years, and that his appointment was demanded by the whole city?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I may tell the hon. member that I know nothing about it. I am quoting from an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune, and I presume the editor knew what he was talking about. Let me read the following clause from a resolution passed by the Manitoba Postmasters' Association in August, 1927:

> That whereas it is the custom for postmasters to be summarily dismissed for alleged political partisanship, and whereas the dismissed postmasters are not given an opportunity to defend the charges preferred against them, but action is taken solely on representation of federal members of parliament or defeated candidates, therefore be it resolved that no postmaster shall be dismissed for alleged partisanship, without the fullest investigation by post office officials of the district in which the post office in question is situated.

I subscribe to that principle. If any of the postmasters in my district have been guilty of partisanship the least that could be done would be to make an investigation and give them a hearing, and I am sure they would be ready to bring proof to establish their innocence.

Mr. VENIOT: Does my hon. friend find fault with the dismissal of a certain postmaster in his county who acted as his special agent on polling day?

Mr. CAMPBELL: There was no postmaster in my district who acted as my special agent.

Mr. VENIOT: I have the record that shows it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Postmaster General's information is wrong. If proof can be established against any postmaster in my district I have no objection to offer, but the proof has not been established. I wonder what the Postmaster General would do if I could prove partisanship against postmasters who opposed me.

Mr. VENIOT: There are so few Liberal appointees left that it would be difficult for me to dismiss any of them if the hon. gentleman recommended it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is a remarkable answer to come from the Postmaster General after the changes I have recited. Now may I read a resolution passed by the Kamsack presbytery of the United Church of Canada, held at Wadena, August 30 and 31, 1927:

> That the presbytery of Kamsack deeply deplores the re-introduction into the public life of Canada of the custom of making the appointments of many public servants subject to political patronage.
> The presbytery is convinced that such appointments should be made by the Civil Service Commission, or some other non-partisan body, and that such appointments should be on the fitness of the appointees rather than of their political or other affiliations.
> The presbytery considers that by whatever party it is carried out the patronage system in political life, particularly in regard to the dismissal of men without a hearing, is not only contrary to the highest ideals of Christian citizenship, but is also an outrage on everything that is fair and everything that is British.

Apparently the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), took strong objection to that resolution— I do not know why, unless the cap fitted him—and he addressed a letter to the secretary of the presbytery. I have not a copy of that letter but I have the reply which was submitted to the press. It is from the secretary of the presbytery at Wadena, Saskatchewan, and reads as printed by the Kamsack Times:

The resolution re political patronage passed by the presbytery at Wadena on August 31, 1927, dealt with the general question of making appointments to, and dismissals from, government positions subject to political patronage and made no reference to any specific situation. But seeing you have raised the question of certain appointments in the Kamsack district, we would put before you the following facts:

1st. On July 12, 1927, the then postmaster of Kamsack, Alexander Wilson, was dismissed without notice and without any charge having been preferred. Mr. Wilson had held the position sixteen years and to the best of our knowledge and belief had been an upright and capable public servant.

2nd. On April 20, 1927, C. A. McConnell was summarily dismissed from his position as Indian agent on the Pelly agency, the alleged reason being "offensive political partizanship". Also, some time after this, H. E. Jones was dismissed from the position of clerk at the same agency, the reason alleged being "political partizanship". No attempts were made to prove the charges stated, nor was either of these men granted a hearing in their own defence. We understand that both men communicated with the deputy minister but received no reply.

3rd. Members of this presbytery wrote ministers of the crown, asking either that these public servants be not dismissed, or, in the case of Messrs. McConnell and Jones, that an enquiry be made into the truth of the charges. In some cases no replies were received and in others merely a formal acknowledgment.

It is rather remarkable to see the somewhat callous attitude towards this principle adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite when we compare their present views with what they said while in opposition. I have a good deal of material from which I could quote but I will not weary the house with it seeing that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has already made use of it. Incidentally I would quote the opinion of former President William H. Taft of the United States:

If we selected employees according to the length of their noses, it would be better than the political spoils system of appointment.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to quote words uttered by yourself when you sat on the opposition benches. On March 11, 1921, you are reported in Hansard as having said:

I sympathize, Mr. Speaker, with some hon. gentlemen who would like to restore patronage in the civil service in order to get a little more kudos with some of their electors. But after twenty-five years' experience in public life, I am still in favour of that great reform which was brought about by the Liberal government through the establishment of the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa. I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission for the appointment of officers to the inside service, and I think that we should have . . . . in all the large cities where there is a branch of the civil service, competitive examination . . . . in order that these centres may be given the best possible service.

Later on, sir, you referred to the "infernal" patronage system; your remarks in this regard have already been quoted. On May 2, of the same year, you said:

Is there a member of this parliament with any self respect who of his own free will would return to the days when lobbies were filled with office seekers who made parliamentary life almost unbearable by their importunate demands? I say there is not one member of this house who would return to that system.

Further on you say:

The right to dismiss and appoint according to the fancy or the temper of the minister is not a right which should be exercised by a politician.

On June 3 you said:

There are things which this parliament must do and will do, but there are other things that it can well refrain from doing, and that above all should be the distribution of political patronage. . . Well, I am opposed to political patronage. If ever chance wills it that members of this side of the house—

The Liberal party was then in opposition.

—shall pass over to the other side, I want the Liberal party, just as I want the Conservative party, to look after the real business of the country and leave to an independent body the management of the civil service.

That change, sir, has taken place and the Liberal party is now in power. But we see the same system carried on. I feel somewhat diffident, sir, about criticizing your own administration when you are not in a position to reply, but I cannot refrain from referring to the situation in the House of Commons to-day. According to the Auditor General's report, 1924, I find that in the House of Commons under Your Honour's jurisdiction there are forty-one sessional and extra clerks, ninety-seven stenographers and typists twenty debates amanuenses, seventy-five messengers, twenty-six pages, besides charwomen and so forth, involving a total expenditure of $230,000—all under the patronage system. There are policemen and others but I have not time to give the whole list.

Now I would appeal to the Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who I am sorry is not in his place. I have always felt that he was a man of high ideals. Judging by his speeches in the country, by the idealism he preaches there, I really believe his heart is in the right place but he finds it impossible to resist the importunities of those around him. Perhaps I am wrong but I appeal to him at this time to support the principle we are now advocating. The time will come by the turn of the wheel of fortune when the position in the house will be reversed and when the present official opposition will be the government. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite in all sincerity, do they want that sort of thing carried on then? Do they want these continual dismissals of the public servants under what Your Honour has referred to as "the infernal patronage system"?

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), whose lamentations remind me of the saying of the prophet that "All men are bad, and only I am good." I am very sorry for my hon. friend, because he made a very bad mistake; in philosophy there is a principle that we should not conclude from the particular to the general. My hon. friend quoted a few facts, sad perhaps as they affect his friends but not the country at large, and we cannot conclude from those very few facts that we should support the bill presented by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), which I think should bear the title "sour grapes."

I think it is always interesting to hear the stories of people who have been dismissed for good reasons. Personally I do not know what happened in Saskatchewan, but I know very well what happened in Temiscouata county, which I have the honour to represent in this house. I wrote to the Postmaster General requesting the dismissal of a certain postmaster because his young daughter had been found with about fifty stolen letters in her coat pocket. I think that was sufficient reason to request the dismissal of the postmaster, and I am sure if the hon. member for Mackenzie had been postmaster general in a group government he would have granted my request and dismissed that postmaster. Upon one occasion I had a man appointed as postmaster of a $60 a year post office. He considered that a great honour, but one day I had to ask for his dismissal because I received evidence that during the previous election he held a general treating party in the post office. Does not my hon. friend from Mackenzie think I had reason to ask for the dismissal of that man? There were not very many dismissals in my constituency, but those few were made for good reasons. Another postmaster kept a letter addressed to his brother-in-law, who lived in front of his house, for over a month. That letter contained a cheque for $125; the postmaster knew it belonged to his brother-in-law, but because of some family trouble the letter was not delivered for one month. The postmaster offered the letter to people of the same name when he knew it was intended for his brother-in-law, and in addition to that the postmaster was very well known as a drunkard. I think in this case my hon. friend from Mackenzie would have done as I did. I have quoted only three cases in my constituency; we have 245 constituencies in this country, and if we multiply that number by three we have twice the number of dismissals made by the Postmaster General, so I think I am very reasonable in that calculation.

I believe this matter should be considered in a broad way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad to see I am beginning to convince my hon. friend from Mackenzie. The hon. member for Bow River is one of the cleverest members of this house, and I am sorry he is not in his seat at present. I wanted to ask him a question during his speech, but he refused to let me ask it. I would be more generous, and would give him ample time now to answer the question. As matters stand at present, are all important appointments with the exception of those mentioned in this bill made by the Civil Service Commission? We all know that that is not so. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that every deputy minister is appointed by the governor in council, and that judges, whose dignity is above suspicion, are also appointed by the governor in council. You know very well that senators, those dignified old gentlemen, to which body I am glad to see some younger men have been appointed, are named by the governor in council, and you also know that ambassadors, charges d'affaires and ministers are appointed in the same way. When we come to some of the most important appointments in the civil service of this country, we do not go to the Civil Service Commission. We do not ask applicants for the position of Auditor General to pass an examination; the Auditor General is appointed by a vote of this house, and that also applies to the Chief Electoral Officer. Those are two of the most important positions in Canada. I am acquainted with most of the deputy ministers, whom I admire very much for their experience, their sense of duty and their responsibilities as public officials. There is only one exception, whom I will not name to-day, a gentleman who has occupied his position for quite a long time and who is known to hold a private correspondence with a former minister. That deputy suffers now from neurasthenia, and perhaps some time later I will bring his case before this house. As an example, however, let us consider Mr. Hunter, the Deputy Minister of Public Works. He has a huge responsibility, as assistant to the head of one of the most important departments of governments, and he is a most capable man. Take the chief engineer, Mr. Cameron. He has just been elected president of the graduates of McGill university. He is well known in this country, is a very capable man, and his staff is composed of highly qualified officials. I wish to say something also about the divisional engineers whom I know, and who are very competent men, for instance, Mr. Sabourin, of Quebec, Mr. Bertrand, and Mr. Amyot, of Rimouski. I know these gentlemen well. They are very good men, and I do not think one of them was appointed by the Civil Service Commission as constituted to-day. They were appointed before the commission had such powers as were given to it by the late lamented leader of the opposition, personally a most charming man. He was then I think Solicitor General or Minister of the Interior.

I have just been speaking of the Public Works department. Now let us take the department of the Postmaster General, whom I see here. The minister is a very competent man. Mr. Gaboury is a most excellent deputy minister; everyone will admit that. Mr. Coolican, assistant deputy minister, is a first-class officer. Mr. Anderson, superintendent of the mail service, is a friend of every man in this house. Mr. Gagnon is a young officer but very well qualified; and so on. Most of these officials were appointed outside of the Civil Service Commission. Take the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). He too has reason to be proud of his staff. The deputy minister, Dr. Grisdale, comes from Quebec, and is known as a very competent man. Dr. Charron, his assistant, is a chemist and possesses bilingual qualifications. His name is well known and respected in Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Throughout Canada too.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, throughout Canada too. I mentioned Quebec because Dr. Charron has lived in that province for a long time. Take Mr. Archibald, director of experimental farms; he is a gentleman of worldwide renown, and all the heads of branches in that department are very competent men. Most of them were appointed before the Civil Service Commission commenced to make appointments.

Take the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning). He has a very good deputy minister. We do not get much from that department because the railways are now in the Canadian National system. But I wish to praise the officers of the Department of Railways and Canals also. The chief engineer, Colonel Dubuc, is a gentleman distinguished in his profession. I think he was appointed at the request of the minister and the Civil Service Commission had very little to do with the appointment.

In the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment there are some very capable men, especially since the recent changes have been carried out. I am sure that the minister will not discontinue the good work but will persist in the determination to secure the highest efficiency in the department. May I take this opportunity to say that I hope the Board of Pension Commissioners, whose term expires this year, will be allowed to return home. We have had enough of those people. I am here to say what I think about them, and I am very sorry that no investigation was made into the board. After what I heard the other day in the committee room, I do not believe that Mr. Thompson is qualified to act for another term. I hope the next time the minister makes an appointment he will appoint a French Canadian on the board, because the French Canadians have good records as soldiers. If the minister does not choose a French Canadian he should at least appoint one member who has bilingual qualifications, and who will recognize that when the appeal board gives a judgment it should be respected.

I see the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) here. He is always in good humour, he never experiences any trouble, and he has a very important department. Everyone likes the minister. He has a very good deputy minister in the person of Mr. W. J. Egan, amongst whose accomplishments is a knowledge of the French language. I am sure that within a few years the people of this country will recognize the benefits of the new policy that that department is going to carry out in the best interests of the country. At this stage I wish to ask the Minister of Immigration and Colonization not to forget the very eloquent speech made the other day by my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) on the opportunities to be given—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I remind the hon. gentleman that he is discussing matters not relevant to this debate?

Mr. POULIOT: I have said what I wanted to say and the Minister of Immigration and Colonization has heard my recommendations. I am sure he will take note of them.

Take the Department of Justice, which is one of the most important departments in this country. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is the first lawyer in Canada. He is a very able man and is greatly respected in this house. He also has good assistants. His former deputy minister is now sitting on the bench of the highest tribunal in Canada. I refer to Mr. Justice Newcombe. Mr. Edwards, his successor, is a very able jurist. His assistant is Mr. Renaud who was a Conservative. He is a very able man and has a command of both the English and French languages. He was appointed when the Conservatives were in power and had they always made such appointments, they would not have been blamed by anybody on the Liberal side. But that was not the case.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are you willing to introduce a resolution to do away with the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. POULIOT: If that is what my hon. friend advocates, I think he is right in a certain sense and I will explain that later on. I do not say he is altogether right. We have the department of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) whom I see here with his broad smile. Everything goes smoothly in his department, but he has many things to do. He is the head of a department which looks after incorporations of companies and naturalization, and may I say that all requests are not granted and that every request is thoroughly investigated before any action is taken. The Secretary of State has a very able assistant in the person of his deputy minister, Mr. Mulvey, who is a well-known author on company law and whose book is very often quoted before the courts. He also has as his chief legal adviser, Mr. O'Meara, who is one of the best lawyers in Canada.

I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his seat and I wish to pay a special compliment to him because, in a very popular ministry, I think he is the most popular, especially amongst business men. He is working very hard for the people of this country, but he has some very capable assistants who help him in reducing taxes, in reducing the national debt and in rendering service to the people. I am not going to speak of all the departments, but if we consider the amount of work that is done by every civil servant in Canada we are bound to give them our greatest admiration.

The Department of the Interior at Ottawa is an immense department. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has a very good deputy minister, but he has also in his department quite a number of specialists, men who are very capable and who would perhaps command from three to five times as much in the way of salary if they were working for private concerns instead of being public servants. May I mention three gentlemen whom I know very well, namely, Mr. F. C. C. Lynch, director of natural resources intelligence service, and his assistants, Mr. Sherrin and Mr. Chalifour, men whose high capabilities are most valuable to the service in which they are engaged.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not see the relevancy of his remarks to the subject under discussion. I do not know if he intends to apply his remarks to the objects of the bill now before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I have been speaking for a few minutes but I will explain why I make these remarks. The object of this bill is to bring the appointment of all public servants under the Civil Service Commission and I have been instancing some civil servants whose rank is very important, whose capacities are great, but whose appointments have nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission. I trust that explanation will suffice to allow me to continue with what I have to say.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member should complete the record of the departments. He has covered them all except the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the Solicitor-General and the Secretary of State.

Mr. RINFRET: I was included and I was honoured by being so included.

Mr. POULIOT: I am keeping the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the last, but I wish to say something about my genial friend, the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon).

Mr. POWER: Say it with lilies.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, I will say it with lilies, and I will bring them to the Solicitor General whose capacity is great and whose heart is open to understand the misfortunes of life. He is always ready to give full consideration to every case that is brought to his attention. He is helped in that connection by a very clever lawyer, Mr. Gallagher, chief of the remission branch, who was appointed by the Conservatives, who was the legal partner of Mr. Patenaude in Montreal, but might I say that he was the sun while Mr. Patenaude was the moon? Mr. Gallagher is a very clever lawyer; his sense of duty is great, and when a case is submitted to him he takes care to read the whole file and to act conscientiously. I do not believe he was appointed by the Civil Service Commission. He was not appointed by our party but his selection was a very good move on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. This is another instance, and if they had always made such appointments, no one would blame them for their appointments.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member has named quite a number of good ones they made.

Mr. POULIOT: I named a couple of good ones and I may name some more. To complete what I have to say about the Solicitor General may I add that he is acknowledged by all as the best lawyer of his generation, not only in Quebec but in Canada at large?

Mr. POWER: In the world.

Mr. POULIOT: Not in the world. That would be over-stating the case. When the Solicitor General is ten years older we shall say he is the greatest lawyer in the world. I will say that he is the best lawyer of his generation in this country.

Turning to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, we have as minister the most eloquent French Canadian, indeed the most eloquent speaker that I have ever heard in my life.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to speak to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I am through with what I had to say, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin). I come now to his deputy minister, of whom I spoke at the beginning of my remarks. I think it is a shame for any civil servant to be disloyal to his minister, and the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries has been disloyal to his minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not permissible to attack in that way a permanent official who is not in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I will take up this case when the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries come up, and I will remember his letter about the port of Montreal. In that department there are very capable men, such as Mr. Rodd, who is the head of the fish culture branch, and another gentleman, Mr. Cowie, a specialist, who I think was not appointed by the Civil Service Commission. He is a remarkable man.

Now may I continue my argument? There are other brilliant men whose names I could not enumerate in the short time at my disposal, who deserve the consideration of this country because of their high qualifications, their great experience and profound knowledge, and their good service to the state. Some of them have been appointed by the Conservative party, others have been appointed by the Liberal party, but when a man does his duty we do not need to ask by whom he was appointed. All we ask is that he fulfil his duty according to his conscience, and according to what is expected of him. That is the way I look at it, Mr. Speaker. When I approach a civil servant for any information, I do not inquire whether he was appointed by the Conservatives or the Liberals. I inquire, first of all, whether he is a conscientious man who does his duty .

Mr. POWER: Then he must be a Liberal; he cannot be anything else.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps he is not a Liberal in politics, but he should have a liberal mind. When a man is appointed to the public service, whether by the Civil Service Commission or by the governor in council, he should the moment he is appointed forget the party to which he belonged and become independent. Instead of wasting his time in small matters of politics, he should attend to the duties of his office, and devote himself to the service of his country. That is the way I look at it, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that no member of this house will disagree with that point of view. If a former minister whose name is not forgotten in this house has been betrayed by people in his department who did not have that sense of duty, he was betrayed by people who were appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

I listened with attention to what my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) had to say regarding his bill, and I heard him make a philosophical mistake. His phraseology was rather strange. He made an affirmation; he said that this government was not giving proper support to the Civil Service Commission. I rose for the purpose of asking what he meant by those words, but I did not have the opportunity to put my question. I would ask him now if he thinks the government is not giving proper support to the Civil Service Commission because of the fact that there are still some positions which are not under the control of the commission. The philosophical mistake that my hon. friend made was this. He took as a fact that the Civil Service Commission is an infallible body, that it cannot make mistakes. I have nothing to say against the Civil Service Commissioners; I respect them; I think they are good men; but they can make mistakes. Here in this house we have 245 members, a member from every corner of this country, and no one is supposed to know the people of his county better than their representative in this house. Moreover, each member is interested in making reliable recommendations to any member of the government. If I recommend a man in my county who is not qualified for a particular position, I shall be the first one to suffer, because people will blame me for my recommendation. But if a member takes the responsibility of recommending for any government position the best man available, he has the satisfaction of having done his duty.

Mr. SPEAKER: Time.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time of the house naturally, after the very excellent and eloquent address of the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Pouliot), there is not very much more to be said on the subject. I am sorry for this, not on my own account, but because I know my hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and one or two other hon. gentlemen did intend to take part in this debate.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very sorry.

Mr. MANION: I notice the regret evinced by the hon. gentleman. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support in a general way the measure of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I do so with some qualifications, because since coming into this house eleven years ago I must admit that it is not always possible to live up to the ideals of our earlier years; we find that the real and the ideal do not always jibe. It is true that public opinion is largely in favour of the so-called merit system; that is, the system under which the Civil Service Commission makes all the appointments to the government service. Since public opinion should rule in a democratic country, that system should prevail, particularly as we have a Civil Service Commission which is supposed to make all such appointments. This being so, I do agree with the hon. member for Bow River that it would be better either to give the Civil Service Commission power to make all these appointments, or throw the commission aside altogether and get back to the old patronage system. Let us have at least straightforwardness and honesty in this matter. If we are to go back to the old system, let us do so frankly and openly instead of following the insidious practice of the government.

The reason that I am giving the bill a more or less qualified support is that over a period of years before I became a member of this house I saw many appointments made under the old patronage system by both parties, just as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has said, and most of them were excellent appointments. I say that quite frankly. I have also seen appointments made since by both parties, and those too for the most part have been excellent appointments. In fact a large proportion of the appointments made by both parties in the past have been of an excellent character because, generally speaking, they were made on the responsibility of the member concerned, who, of course, had to answer to his constituents for what he had done.

Now, sir, in regard to the so-called savings that may be made under a civil service commission as opposed to the cost under the old patronage system, I submit that under neither system can we be expected to live up to the economic standards of private corporations. There is a public charity which must be taken into account to a certain extent, and I think it would be regrettable if under either the merit or the patronage system we hewed absolutely to the line, sternly refusing on all occasions to give a position to anybody unless he fully deserved it and was fitted for it, because there are times when for the good of the country it is far better to give a man a position than to throw him out on the rather cold charity of the world.

The Union Government of which I was a supporter did, in 1918, put under the Civil Service Commission of that day practically all appointments both in the inside and the outside service. Since then thousands of positions have been taken out of the hands of the commission. And I am a little surprised at my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) supporting the system whereby he and his confrere have to make so many recommendations on behalf of applicants for certain positions. On many occasions I have talked the matter over with other hon. members who then represented the Ottawa district, men just as upright as the hon. gentleman himself, but invariably they told me they were happier to see all the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission, because under the old conditions they were practically pestered to death by applicants for patronage. I know my hon. friend from Ottawa who spoke this afternoon is in exactly the same position to-day. Pass along the hall where his room is situated and at any time of the day you will find people chasing him for positions on the Rideau canal.

In spite of some criticisms to the contrary at times, I believe the Civil Service Commission, as constituted, has done excellent work. I have had many dealings with it in a more or less formal way, as all members have, and while I do not know that I ever received a favour from it, I believe its decisions for the most part have been just, fair and reasonable. Because of that, Mr. Speaker, I think the government ought to accept this bill and make it an absolute rule to go back to the system of appointment to the civil service by the commission. Undoubtedly the merit system is supported by public opinion. I have given reasons why I am not so enthusiastic about it as are some other members. I have been longer in the house than my hon. friend from Bow River, I know he is absolutely sincere in his attitude in regard to this matter, as are many others, particularly the newer members, but I do not think they have had as wide an experience as I have had; and I repeat, to my mind it would be entirely safe to go back to the old system provided it was not abused. It was not the old spoils or patronage system which was wrong, it was the abuse of the system. But, as I have said before, having the merit system in vogue to-day, we should support it to the fullest extent.

Mr. ROBB: If I may ask my hon. friend a question. The staff of the Soldier Settlement Board and the Income Tax Board were appointed under the administration of which he was a supporter. Does he say now that those appointments were in any way inferior to the apointments made by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MANION: No. If my hon. friend had been listening to me he would have observed that I have taken the attitude that most of the appointments made by both parties in the past have been reasonably good appointments. In the pamphlet which the Minster of Finance sent across here a few minutes ago, it is said there are experts in the different departments whom it would be better to have chosen by the officers of those departments. That may be true. Still I adhere to the position that it is the desire largely of the people that the Civil Service Commission should have jursdiction. That is the desire also in England, apparently, and it is becoming largely the desire in the United States. In view of this I believe that we should continue our system of appointment under the Civil Service Commission.

Before six o'clock is called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word to the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). When the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) was speaking, the Postmaster General pointed out that many of the 421 dismissals made by his department, and claimed by the hon. member as political patronage dismissals, were made because of theft, drunkenness, incompetence and other crimes or irregularities. I have no intention of arguing the matter with the Postmaster General, but I submit to him in all sincerity that he owes it in justice to the other postmasters in various parts of the country, who were dismissed on grounds of political patronage, to give, at the earliest opportunity, a list of those who were dismissed for that particular reason, together with a list of those who were dismissed on any other account.

Mr. VENIOT: The returns have been on the table for the last two weeks.

Mr. MANION: But they are not accessible to the people. When the minister made the statement, inadvertently I think, that a large proportion had been dismissed because of drunkenness, stealing, incompetence and other offences of that kind, he did not tell us how many there were. He did not say what the proportion was.

Mr. DUNNING: It is in the return.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but the return is not accessible to the people, and unless the Postmaster General makes it perfectly clear who were dismissed on these charges it is a reflection on the whole 421 who were dismissed. It is unjust to them.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not intend to be unjust, and when my estimates are under consideration I will dissect all dismissals and give full information to the house.

Mr. MANION: That is what I was suggesting. I am quite sure the minister does not wish to reflect on the whole 421. I venture to say that a very small percentage will be found to have been dismissed for any such cause as has been stated. Mr. Speaker, may I ask that you call it six o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood that this evening we should go on with the regular business of the house. With the permission of the house, so that there may be no misunderstanding, I move that the house revert to government orders.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Customs tariff—549. Wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not further prepared than combed: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this a reduction?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend will observe that under this item it is all free, while under the previous item 554 it was free in all cases; under item 555 it carried a duty of 2 cents per pound, 2½ cents per pound and 3 cents per pound, and under old item 556 a duty of 10 per cent, 12½ per cent and 15 per cent. I think I explained the other day that the importation under these other items was very small.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is another case where we do not seem to be doing anything, because nothing at all came in under old item 555 during 1926, and in fact nothing has come in under that item since 1923. The importations were all under old item 554. Under old item 556, the importation in 1926 amounted to 20 dollars, as far as I can discover from the records; so while there appears to be a reduction, in actual fact, there is no change.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Does all the wool come in under those three old items, 554, 555 and 556?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would ask the minister if he knows whether or not any ruling was made by a customs board or any other body which enabled wool which had previously come in under item 555 to come in free under item 554?

Mr. ROBB: I think that has been the practice for a good many years.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the reason for that? It looks like sharp practice on someone's part to make a separate item under which sheep's wool is dutiable, and then to allow it in free under another item. This is the kind of thing which makes me think there will be grave difficulty in the future in connection with the different classes of rags which come in free and the others which come in under a duty.

Mr. ROBB: I think from the time this item was first placed in the tariff many years ago a ruling was made that it was of a class not produced in Canada.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why the duty is lowered on wool and kept at its former level on the finshed article? Is it possible that the manufacturers of wool were not able to pay dividends, or have not secured the profits they wished to secure, or did the tariff advisory board give any advice at all in this connection?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I explained that to my hon. friend a few days ago. In this reclassification we are getting rid of two items which are practically obsolete. My hon. friend from Peace River just pointed out that there were practically no imports under those items.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to make just one final appeal to the minister. My personal opinion of the Minister of Finance is so high that I find it very difficult to criticize his estimates, but I do feel that he is doing an injury to the people whom I have the honour to represent and to the people of the country generally when he takes away the little protection at present enjoyed by the farmers of Canada. We know the destructive effect this Australian treaty has had upon the dairying industry, and I would like to make a last appeal to the minister to leave the farmer what little protection he has on his wool. I know the minister is a protectionist, as I think the great majority of the people of this country are protectionists, and for the life of me I cannot see why that principle should not be carried all around the circle. If we are going to give protection to the manufacturers, as we do and as I think it is proper to do, then it is reasonable to give protection to the farmers of this country as well. It seems to me we are discriminating unfairly against a class of people who are doing an enormous amount of work in building up this country, and who get very little consideration. I am quite willing to confess that even when my own party was in power I advocated raising the duty on dairy products and other articles, and I advocate that today. As a protectionist country—and I think that is the established policy of all parties in Canada—we should be fair and carry this protection to all classes. Give it to the manufacturer where it is required; give it to the labouring man by protecting his job, and give it to the farmer as well. I must say that I have a great deal of sympathy with the Finance minister who is buttressed on one side by the tariff board—and if he will take my advice he will scrap that board—and on the other side by our free trade friends from the west who sit immediately to his right. But after all he has a duty to perform to the people of this country, and I should like to make one final appeal to him not to abolish the little protection the farmers of Canada have.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will admit that this wool has been on the free list for many years. In the case of the two items we are changing, the total importations under 555 amounted to $93, in 1927, and under 556 to $5,099.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will not all wool come in free from now on?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: And we take away a certain amount of protection which they had.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should like to join with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in making an appeal on behalf of the sheep farmers of Canada. It is a very striking feature that while our flocks have not been protected as far as the important wool crop is concerned for very many years in this country, our sheep population has increased only about 100,000 head in 57 years. Certainly we cannot boast about our progress in the sheep line. Our sheep population in Canada is only about 3,000,000 head as compared with something over 90,000,000 in Australia, 27,000,000 in little New Zealand, 23,000,000 in Great Britain, and 44,500,000 in the United States. Another striking feature has been that the United States, where the wool has been protected since 1816, has made steady progress in her sheep development. Perhaps anticipating the war they removed the duty from wool in 1913. The country became filled up with wool, and at the termination of the war the sheep business was in a very depressed condition. So they applied the tariff again. In the United States they have increased their sheep population by about 6.5 per cent within the last twelve months, and in recent months they have had more sheep available for slaughter than they have had since 1914. Comparing the two countries, we have the country upon the one hand where the sheep business has been stabilized by the protection of wool, and on the other hand a situation in Canada where we have been absolutely without protection as far back as I can remember, in the case of wool. On the one hand there has been rapid and substantial progress, and on the other hand very little progress, if indeed any at all. The United States is not considered a great mutton and lamb consuming country. They consume there about 5.4 pounds of mutton and lamb per capita, while in Canada we consume just about 9 pounds, and Great Britain consumes from 50 to 60 pounds. It is a well known fact—it is apparent to every man who is interested in agriculture—that we have huge areas of land well adapted for the production of sheep and we have only a sheep population of about 3,000,000 head scattered over this vast domain. Our opportunities for the growing of sheep here are immense. They do very well on our ranges; they do as well here as they do anywhere on the continent. Our average clip on the ranges under ordinary conditions would be from 7 to 8 pounds of wool; and in British Columbia in some special flocks, particularly where there is a good Scotchman in charge of the flock, it runs as high as 10 pounds per head. The lamb crop is an excellent one too. I know of one man in British Columbia who sold 3,000 lambs in September weighing round 80 pounds per head, bringing in a revenue of $30,000, averaging around $10 per head.

I feel that some effort should be made—I am not talking in any critical way because I think, perhaps, the Conservative government has erred just as much as the Liberal government is continuing to err by failing to give some protection to the wool producers—to improve the existing conditions. As far as the production of finer wools is concerned there is no reason why our wool here could not be very much improved, and I am very glad indeed to note that the research council is now taking this matter up. It is well known that we have a long dry belt extending through the length of British Columbia clear down the continent, including such states as Wyoming, Idaho, eastern Washington, and some others, and in those states they are producing fine wools of very excellent quality. As an indication of how good these fine wool sheep are, let me say that at the Salt Lake ram sale, which is held annually, they sold sheep at as high a figure as two and three thousand dollars a head, and within the last few years representatives of the Russian government have come over and purchased very heavily. They had the whole world to select from and they gave the preference to the Salt Lake sale and to other western states, indicating the very marked progress that is being made in the breeding of these fine wool sheep. If these sheep can be bred and produced on the American side there is no reason why the same thing cannot be done on the Canadian side where the conditions are very similar.

There has been some complaint about black hair found among the wool of some of our range sheep in the west. I think that is simply a matter of breeding, and by good care that can be overcome. That black hair in the wool is probably due to the fact that without protection for our wool the breeder of sheep aims to rely on his lamb crop rather than on his wool crop, and to produce sheep that will yield both wool and lamb. We might place a reasonable tariff on wool. Perhaps that is not the remedy but I certainly think the situation is serious enough to have a thorough investigation made, and a careful survey of our opportunities, a careful survey of the whole sheep and wool situation. Then I think we would soon come to some reasonable conclusion whereby we would place the sheep industry in Canada on a good, sound, sane basis. Our opportunities for development are simply immense along these lines. I call the attention of the government to this particular question hoping they will give it careful consideration and try to develop in this direction.

Mr. ROBB: There is no member of this house better qualified to speak on agricultural subjects, and particularly animal husbandry, than my hon. friend the former Minister of Agriculture. He has just told us that in fifty years there has been an increase in round figures of about 100,000 sheep in Canada, and also that in British Columbia last year one farmer made a profit of about $30,000 on the sale of his lambs.

Mr. TOLMIE: Income.

Mr. ROBB: An income of $30,000. My hon. friend from Victoria has not gone just as far as my hon. friend from Muskoka in advocating protection. The hon. member for Victoria has apparently given some study to this, because, while he has quoted some figures from the United States, he has been careful to take the high spots and the low spots where they would suit his figures. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario sincerely, I am satisfied, believes that greater protection would increase the interest in sheep-raising in Canada and add to our flocks. We have right alongside of us a great nation. They have tried that out and Canada might very well profit from their example. I find, for instance, that in 1886 the total production of wool in the United States was 302,000,000 pounds. In 1925, the quantity in round figures was 300,000,000 pounds, but in 1924 it was only 286,000,000 pounds, so that hon. gentlemen will observe that during that long period there has been a decrease in the production of wool in the United States.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is the rate of duty on wool in the United States? I know it is very high.

Mr. ROBB: I do not have it with me.

Mr. TOLMIE: Fifteen to forty-five cents.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. ROBB: I was going to say it was pretty high. In 1900, under the farm census of the United States they had 61,504,000 sheep and in 1925 they had 35,251,000 sheep. That is a considerable drop under the tariff policy of the United States. It is true, as the hon. member for Victoria says, that from 1925 to 1926 there was some increase, because I observe that in 1926 the number was 40,748,000, but away back in 1910 they had over 61,000,000, and in 1903, 63,000,000. The numbers began to diminish yearly from that time on.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Minister of Finance will admit that the numbers have been going up since more protection has been given.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend pointed out that there had been an increase of 150,000 in Canada in fifty years.

Mr. KAISER: The element of protection has very little to do with the diminution in the number of sheep in the United States of America. With them the question is not one of tariff. We are all taught that the United States is a cotton country and the effort of the cotton growers there to displace wool in the clothing of their people produced a fierce conflict which has continued for a great number of years. This point has been brought to our attention in quite a remarkable way in the construction, for instance, of automobiles. In this country the linings of automobiles cost more than in the United States because the latter is a cotton country and they use a great deal of cotton in the upholstery of automobiles, whereas in Canada we use wool entirely.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend's argument, but he may be able to explain this. Raw cotton, like wool, comes into Canada free of duty.

Mr. KAISER: Just so, but the point we wish to emphasize is simply this. From our geographical situation we have scarcely any other choice of producing the clothing of our people than from our flocks of sheep, and in any country where they are driven to provide their people with clothing from wool you will find the figures very much the reverse of those pointed out by the minister. Such countries have increased the numbers of their flocks and their efforts to produce wool in order to make clothing for their people. Canada is a wool country in general and the United States is to-day a cotton country. That explains those figures much more pointedly and sanely than they can be explained from the point of view of tariff alone.

Our wool problem is not only a matter of tariff. We have for years observed many forces playing upon our people and our farmers in the direction of reducing the flocks of our country. Strange to say, a question that has often come up is that of fencing. Our fencing problem is the same as they have in any other country, and in any country where they claim their flocks are important and where they endeavour in a national way to make their flocks profitable for their people, they overcome the fencing problem. A year or two ago I heard the Minister of Finance raise in this house the question of the dog. It is strange that dogs do not kill sheep in England, nor in New Zealand, although the dogs and the sheep are of the same type as in this country. Why is that not the case in Canada? In recent years it has been discovered beyond all question that the dog which will undertake to kill sheep has something wrong in his head; he is a crazy dog.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. KAISER: All right. In Kentucky they hold trials of dogs. A dog is brought before a magistrate and if it is demonstrated beyond all shadow of doubt that he is the dog that chased or killed a sheep, there is only one penalty and that is death to the dog. In every country where they have eliminated the sheep-killing dog they soon begin to breed dogs that will not kill sheep, and if they have done that in other countries they can do it in Canada.

As the ex-Minister of Agriculture has stated, it is fundamental that the people of this country should inquire into and get at the reasons why our flocks have been reduced. We should regard our flocks as they do in other countries, as one of the finest assets we have and endeavour to increase the numbers. Let us not get it into our heads that the tariff is the only factor. Other factors enter into the question and they should all be considered, an endeavour being made to eliminate all the reasons why our flocks should not be raised up to the numbers or even the percentages they were at the time of confederation. At confederation Canada had more than one sheep per head of poulation and it takes just about one sheep per head of population to supply sufficient wool to clothe the people of a country. Until we get at least one sheep for each head of population we are behind our times and behind our privileges. To me it is amazing to read that in Nova Scotia we have more than a million acres of land suitable for grazing and yet so few sheep are raised there, although with the wool they could raise they could provide the whole of Canada with the clothing required and be more than ten thousand miles nearer the best market for lamb and mutton than any other sheep-raising country. Yet we see countries away on the other side of the equator coming across the line and capturing a market that is ten or twelve thousand miles away. We can look at this question from a hundred different angles, but they all lead to this point, that we have not lived up to the opportunities that should present themselves to a people such as ours and a country such as this.

Mr. BENNETT: I confess that I, a mere professional man, am greatly interested in this wool industry. I have been frequently associated with one of the large business enterprises in western Canada, and it has been my good fortune to have expressed to me from time to time the opinion of one of the pioneer stock men of that country, Mr. P. Burns, regarding the development of our cattle and sheep industry. He has frequently told me that British Columbia, in some parts of it, is better adapted in his opinion to the production of large flocks of sheep than any other part of the country he knows. There are sections of Alberta about which the same might be said. Flocks and herds were the foundations of national wealth in the early days of history, and even until to-day a nation's wealth is measured to some considerable extent by its flocks and herds. This country at the present time has less than three million sheep; it should have not less than nine million if we are to maintain the minimum production of flocks; and having regard to the conditions that obtain here, twenty millions would not be an extravagant number of sheep to be maintained in Canada. But we have only three million, and I think it is fair that we should ask ourselves why we have so small a number. The sheep is a peculiarly profitable animal, because not only is its coat of wool valuable, but the production of mutton and lamb for food purposes may be said to be equally valuable. Under those circumstances this country has made little or no progress with respect to the development of the wool industry, and yet there is no country in the world where woollen clothing is in greater demand or is more of a staple necessity of the people. The people of the west require wool, and with the development of its population we must have large supplies of woollen garments, for without them the people really suffer in the winter. That is so practically all over Canada. We have made, it seems to me, vain efforts to develop the woollen industry and, if you will, the mutton and lamb industry in this country. I asked the other day, for purposes of information only, what the condition of the woollen cloth mills in Canada was, and I find that there are twenty-two mills, and that this is the position:

That shows a total of 996 looms, of which 526 are operating and 470 are idle. That is the position for the week ending January 21, 1928. There are some eight or ten other mills from which no report could be received by the gentleman whom I asked to get this information. They have only 83 looms, however, and the information that I have given was as full as could be obtained up to that point.

Let it be borne in mind that the first twenty-two mills that I mentioned had all the machinery for preparing, scouring, dyeing, carding, spinning, weaving and finishing wool, and one-half of their capital is invested in plant for manufacturing processes up to yarn. That is an important matter to consider.

I have given this house a list of the woollen mills in Canada. I have shown the condition of the industry on the 21st day of January last, the number of looms idle and the number operating, and in addition, as I said, there are eighty-three looms from which no report was received. Of the number of mills I gave, one-half, practically the first twenty-two mills mentioned, are employed in making use of all processes that convert wool into cloth. They have all the spinning and other machinery that goes with such an industry.

Now what does this tariff propose to do? This tariff, first of all, proposes that machinery shall come in free. I observe that in their submission to the tariff board the French industry strongly urge that French machinery should come in free, and I observe the same with respect to the British industry. That machinery is now to come in free to compete with men who have hundreds of millions of dollars invested in machinery in their industry. It will be a direct incentive to induce people to come in and destroy existing capital in this country. Whatever else may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, however, strong may be their views with respect to matters of this kind, no less an authority than Adam Smith has pointed out that where you have vested industry established under those circumstances, care should be taken not to destroy the industry. But free machinery is to come in under these tariff proposals.

Then you have free yarns. Who are benefitting by this? It means, first of all, that the machinery now engaged in the production of yarns will become idle. You ask, why should that be so? Cannot Canadian industrial enterprise produce yarns quite as cheaply and quite as readily as can the Bradford and other English mills? With respect to that I can only point out that the evidence given to the tariff board, to which I alluded the other day, and from which I should like to read were it not needlessly taking up the time of the committee, abundantly establishes that under the conditions there obtaining, unless we pay our people a wage on which they cannot live and lower their standard of living to a point that is unendurable, it is impossible for us to compete with them. Who that read the report the other day of the socal service board with respect to child mortality in this country would desire to lower the standard of living in Canada to a level lower than now obtains? I do not think any hon. gentleman would desire to do that. Yet unless we are prepared to do it we must face the fact that placing this yarn upon the free list means that these looms will become idle, and that the capital therein invested will become unproductive and therefore, will be destroyed. I have in my hand the issue of February 22, 1928, of the Textile Argus, published in Bradford. This paper, of course, points out the singular fact to which I alluded the other day.

The changes announced last week by the Canadian Finance minister in tariffs affecting the imports of yarns and fully manufactured goods into Canada would be read with peculiar interest in Bradford. It will be recalled that last year the Canadian manufacturers applied to the tariff board for a revision of import duties which would give them greater protection, and the matter was considered to be of such importance to the trade of Bradford and the West Riding that the West Riding chambers of commerce sent out Mr. J. H. C. Hodgson and the West Riding Manufacturers' Federation, Mr. George H. Wood to place before the tariff board carefully considered reasons why the duties should not be increased. Those who are familiar with the evidence submitted by these two witnesses will realize that they have made an impression on the powers that be in the Dominion, and that their mission to Ottawa last June has been fully justified. There are to be no increased duties on yarns or finished goods. The assistance which the Canadian government is giving to the Canadian manufacturers is to be secured in another and a more acceptable way. A very substantial proportion of the yarns used in Canada has to be imported, and the existing duty on British yarns is to be abolished. Owing to the dry atmosphere in Canada it is impossible to spin yarns there at all comparable with West Riding yarns, and the fact that the latter are to be free will no doubt increase yarn exports from this country to the Dominion.

With respect to that one observation, may I venture further to point out that the memoranda submitted to the tariff board by the British and French textile manufacturers are, one would say, not intended perhaps to influence public opinion, and yet they in terms state that in their view no case has been made out. For instance, with regard to one of these matters that is dealt with in the tariff, that is the duties on cut pile fabrics of mohair, wool, and so on, being raised from 17½ to 27½ per cent, I read again in the issue of February 29, 1928, of the Textile Argus the following:

As this is rather at variance with the general principle of the revisions, it has caused some surprise, and protesting cables have been sent to Ottawa by private firms and also a joint protest from the Bradford and Huddersfield chambers of commerce. One private cable reads: Astonished to hear British cut pile fabrics of wool, mohair and alpaca are included under general wool tariff, thus raising duties by 10 per cent. This applies to mantle cloths and dress goods as well as furnishing fabrics. We submit that cut pile fabrics for dress goods wear are not manufactured in Canada. New change results in penalizing British manufacturers by reducing preference.

I doubt not that the minister may read to us to-night some of the cables he has received with reference to that matter. I believe this house represents the commonsense of the people of Canada, and that if possible, they desire to develop a woollen industry in the Dominion. I take it there is no gentleman, whether he is a protectionist, a free-trader, or anything else, that does not desire to have established in Canada by some means or other a strong, vigorous woollen textile industry. We need it. We should not be dependent upon other people for our supplies of wool or wool yarns; we should be in a position, if circumstances over which we have no control arise to interfere with our marine communications, where we have sheep sufficient to produce wool to meet the demands upon our manufacturers by our people to supply them with clothing as well as with food.

Now, some of my friends think the woollen manufacturer desires an abnormal profit. I was very much struck by some of the observations I heard in the house, and I wrote to one of our leading textile manufacturers with reference to this matter. Let me quote his words:

I am satisfied with one cent a pair profit on footwear. Suppose I sell for 37½ cents a pair, why should the same retail at 75 cents? We do not get it. It is the spread between us and the consumer.

Then he proceeds,

If I make a dollar a suit profit for the best cloth which can be bought for $15 to $16, say $20 trimmings included, and which when made up will sell for sixty or seventy dollars, I am satisfied.

Now, under those circumstances most of us, I think, had a strong hope that a tariff board, set up and properly equipped, would ascertain the facts and make a report to the Minister of Finance for submission to this house, that would enable every hon. member to conclude what would be necessary to be done to secure this industry to the Dominion. My observation has been, even when talking privately to some of my friends opposite, that they share with me a desire to establish a strong Canadian woollen industry. But they say: This protection, Mr. Bennett, is absurd. When I ask them why, they say: Well, it is too much to expect that an industry should be protected to such an extent, and it will mean that the country will be exploited by the manufacturers. That is the stock answer given. Against that there is the statement of the manufacturer to me, that he will be satisfied with a profit of a cent a pair on woollen socks. Would any man deny that as a reasonable profit? Says this manufacturer: Give me only a dollar profit on any suit I produce, and I am satisfied. That cannot under any circumstances, be said to be exploitation.

Then what should the minister have given to us? He has revised this schedule; he has put yarn upon the free list. That is done at the instance of people who do not live in Canada, and it gratifies them because it means their looms will work while ours are idle. I do not yield to any man in my regard for the mother country and for the people who live there, but my first concern as a legislator must always be this country—Canada. I am untrue to my position if my first concern is not Canada. And if I find looms working in Bradford and idle in Almonte, and the reason is in the action taken by this parliament, to which action I am a party, I have been untrue to this country. That is my submission to my friends opposite.

Now, is it a fact that our looms are idle? I have mentioned that more than half of the looms we have in this country are idle, and that there is increased activity in the looms of other countries by reason of the legislation the minister is putting on the statute books. If this be so, we have failed lamentably to discharge our duties as Canadians. I say it without offence, and I ask my friends opposite if it is not true. If we can protect our people against exploitation, and at the same time develop the woollen industry of Canada, if we can increase our flocks—which have been the foundation of national wealth since the days of Abraham—then let us do it. We cannot lower the standard of wages nor the type of living of our people, and we live in a cold country where woollen clothing is necessary. Is it beyond the reach of Canadian statesmen to attain this end? Is it beyond their capacity to accomplish this object? Let us for a moment forget these shibboleths of the past, let us forget the terms, free trade, protection, low tariff, high tariff, with which, as the Minister of Finance said in Winnipeg, we play at election times; let us forget them and recall to our minds that we are concerned with the fate of a great Canadian industry that is threatened with absolute destruction. Not in its entirety—they will all tell you that—because those of our mills that have always been importing yarns will be able to do better than they ever did but the mill that has a million dollars invested in machinery to spin woollen yarns will find that machinery idle, while its owner will have the melancholy satisfaction of seeing a corresponding activity, three thousand miles away, in the spinning machinery of another country. That is the duty of Canadian statesmen that is the duty of any Canadian government—to conserve Canadian industry.

This tariff seems to have been moulded by the woollen manufacturers of Bradford and Huddersfield and the textile manufacturers of France rather than by Canadians for Canadians. I concede the right of every man who may be affected to present his views to a tariff board whether in this or any other country. I recall that when the cattle embargo was in force against us during the war it was discussed by Canadians in England, certain representations having been made at the time which we contended should be carried into effect. As I say, I concede the right of interested parties to express their opinions as they see fit. But it is the duty of any man occupying the position I hold, without power to change or modify in any respect the schedules now under consideration, to indicate the danger to which the country is exposed. I know it is futile to appeal to the minister to change his schedules, and in any event, if he does determine upon any change, he does so in compliance with the views of his supporters behind him; and then seeks to blame us on this side for the simple reason that such a procedure makes better reading for the manufacturers. But does the Minister of Finance really believe that anyone is deceived by that sort of thing? Let me assure him, Mr. Chairman, that picayune, peanut politics of this description is precisely the thing that discredits the action of any minister in charge of tariff revision. The idea of saying to a free parliament, after striking out an item the other evening because some of his supporters told him he had to do so, "the opposition must shoulder the responsibility!" Having acted on the request of his own supporters, he turns to us and says, "You are to blame; go and tell your friends the manufacturers what you have done". Is not that sort of thing calculated to make parliament a byword among the people? Everyone saw the play and understood it. Who was deceived? No one, and least of all the people most vitally affected.

I presume it is too late to endeavour to induce the minister to alter or change his plans, but at least we can point out the facts and place the responsibility where it belongs. We can place the responsibility on the government of the day—a government which is not at all concerned about the development of this great industry but which, apparently, is bent upon pleasing people who reside far distant from here, yielding to the importunities and demands made upon it, as indicated in the Textile Argus and elsewhere. It is much easier for the government to do this than courageously to say, as they said in the United States, "We intend to impose high tariffs for the moment in order to encourage the industry and put it on its feet. We intend to control the situation and as circumstances change we shall be able to modify our tariff to suit those changing conditions". At any rate, we on this side shall have to content ourselves with pointing out the facts and leaving the responsibility with those who have incurred it for the state of affairs to which I have made reference and which is reflected in the census taken during the first three weeks of January of this year, in anticipation of the very action that has been taken.

It is not a pleasant thing for one to have to speak in this way with respect to these items under consideration; it is not pleasant to contemplate the injustice which will result from legislation thus enacted. It is all very well to say that free yarns will mean cheaper goods. But I would remind my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that utter dependence upon others operating great distances away has been the undoing of every state of importance; at any rate it has been the ruin of all the states of which I have read in history. Copper is an illustration: what is happening to-day in regard to that industry? What was the state of affairs during the war in relation to copper and zinc? Before the United States went into the war they were able to say to the nations of the world, "There is our price; you pay it or die". Is it worth while to have this country independent? Is it worth while to raise it to the level of sheer independence and make its people economically free? We did this during the war. We entered into a contract with the late Lord Rhondda by which it was agreed that a higher price by a half cent per pound should be paid us for copper for war purposes if we would develop our copper industry. The United States then raised the price of zinc to 44 cents a pound; that was their answer, before they came into the war, to the assertion of economic independence on the part of the empire and its allies. And in the woollen industry—upon which our life depends in winter—shall we be dependent or independent? Shall we raise vast flocks of sheep, nine, ten, twenty millions, or shall we continue to import mutton from New Zealand? That is the question. With the greatest markets open to us, shall we extend our foreign trade or not? You say it does not require a tariff? I say it requires the use of every tool or implement that parliament has at hand to safeguard the industry. To me it is perfectly indifferent whether it be a tariff, a bonus, a bounty, a drawback or an export duty; I insist that we use the instruments we have for one purpose and one purpose only, namely, to make this country economically independent. Failure to do this is failure to grasp the opportunities that Providence has given us. Is it not a disgrace that a country such as this should be content to raise three million sheep? Those with whom I have discussed the matter understand quite well that in the great reaches of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, in the far west, in the prairie provinces and in British Columbia, a very considerable industry could be developed if we had the courage. And this country has the courage. I say to the Minister of Finance that if only he would take his courage in his hands those who sit behind him would rally to his support, because although, by profession, they are free traders in the west, in practice they are ready to utilize every instrument or tool that can be pressed into service to make this country great and strong. I am sure that if hon. gentlemen opposite thoroughly appreciated the situation, if the facts were properly put before them by the tariff board and by the minister, so that they could draw their inferences as well as he, they would understand the importance of the industry and be prepared to support it. I can only content myself with protesting against these measures which threaten the economic independence of the country and spell ruin to millions of capital invested in the manufacture of yarns in Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not propose to deal with this matter at great length, but I must congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) on the eloquent plea he has just made. I have heard him on many occasions but rarely has he been in such excellent form and apparently so logical. Let me say, however, that in my opinion he destroyed the force of his speech by the last statement or two he made. The opinion he expressed is one he sincerely holds and believes in, but the idea that it is possible to make any nation economically independent is madness; it is a fallacy of the crassest kind. We can no more make Canada economically independent than the United States has been able to make the United States economically independent. It is a dream, the phantasy of a mind warped by convictions sincerely held in the wrong direction.

The leader of the opposition spoke about the destruction of this industry and he used several other trenchant phrases to emphasize the disaster which was rapidly overtaking it. Now there may be depression in the woollen industry; I sincerely believe there has been some depression in the last two years. But may I point out something that has been so far overlooked. So far as I have been able to ascertain—and in this regard I am rather slightly better able to know what I am talking about—women to-day do not wear wool, or they wear as little as possible. I happened to be travelling in eastern Canada last November and I visited some splendid woollen mills in the maritime provinces. In the Moncton mill I found that the manufacturers were more and more turning their attention to the manufacture of rayon mixtures. It is the introduction of rayon and artificial silks and material of that kind which attracts the ladies—I do not blame them—that has operated against the past profits of the woollen industry. That is one point that has not yet been noted. I do not think it can be stressed too heavily and it is one factor that has rather tended to lower the profits of these companies. But I would say this to the leader of the opposition and to those on his side who are so deeply concerned in this matter. I can produce proof to this house to-night that the woollen industry in Canada is not in bad shape, that it is not suffering seriously and that it is not likely to be destroyed. The best proof I can find is the action which has just been taken by one of the British woollen manufacturers, who has declared his intention to tear down his entire plant in Bradford, to which city my hon. friend referred, and bring the plant to Canada to manufacture wool here. What is his reason? The reason is that the woollen industry in this country is in good condition, and is making money. In to-night's Ottawa Citizen I find a Canadian press cable from Bradford, England, under date of March 22, as follows:

John Moore, woollen manufacturer, has decided to dismantle his mills here and transfer his woollen industry to Victoria, B.C.

I congratulate my friend the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie).

In this connection the Yorkshire Post, the chief organ of the Yorkshire woollen industry, says:

"There were dismal pictures of the Canadian woollen industry presented to the tariff board at Ottawa—

We have had more of those pictures to-night.

—when the manufacturers asked for further protection. One need only to refer to the balance sheets of several Canadian manufacturers to see their exceedingly healthy condition. The new woollen business for Victoria is being treated in an exceedingly generous spirit by that municipality.

Among the common advantages to British manufacturers starting in Canada are: Ridiculously low taxation compared with the taxation in Great Britain; electricity a comparatively cheap form of industrial power, and Canada's enjoyment of an enviable freedom from industrial disputes."

I think that one despatch alone should be sufficient answer to hon. gentlemen to my right. The future of the woollen industry is assured so far as the future of any industry can be assured, but that industry cannot continue to live if something better takes its place; it will go if something better comes along. If the people want to buy more silk, rayon or real silk, no protection we can possibly give and no system of bonusing we could possibly introduce could maintain any industry on such an artificial basis.

Mr. LAPIERRE: In the course of his remarks the leader of the opposition gave us a list of woollen mills which had gone out of business, or which had ceased manufacturing cloth. Anyone connected with the woollen business knows that under the conditions obtaining in this country our woollen manufacturers cannot produce cloth in competition with that manufactured in England and Scotland. Serges made of Canadian wool have not been used to any great extent by the people of this country. As a matter of fact, among those mills which have been mentioned by the leader of the opposition are some that went into the business during the war, when prices were at their peak; when prices became normal these mills found that they could no longer continue.

Another reason why our Canadian cloth mills cannot compete with English mills is the rapid change of prices. Our small mills could only manufacture staples; when they went into fancy goods they could not compete with the English mills because of their small production. Our styles are changing more and more every day, and the same thing applies to our hosiery business, as the hon. member for Bow River has stated. There has been a complete transformation of the woollen business; rayon has become the substitute for wool, and rayon combined with cotton is replacing wool all over the world. Hon. gentlemen must have read a despatch which appeared in the papers a few days ago stating that certain rayon manufacturers in England distributed $60,000,000 in dividends among their shareholders, and that business has only been in existence for the last four or five years. It is also a fact that Courtauld's have established a rayon factory in Canada and that their business is continually expanding. It must also be remembered that the production of wool in the United States is continually diminishing.

There is still a further reason why the woollen industry is suffering. With improved machinery, cotton to-day is being combed to resemble wool, and is replacing woollen blankets and many other articles. Even our household furnishings are now largely composed of rayon and cotton, so when hon. gentlemen opposite attribute the depression in the woollen business to changes in the tariff they are far from the mark. I believe the minister has taken the right stand; he is going to allow those woollen manufacturers who now have obsolete machinery to bring in modern machinery which will combine the rayon with wool and cotton, which are the articles sold in the trade to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): What factories have obsolete machinery in the woollen business?

Mr. LAPIERRE: A great deal of the machinery used on strictly woollen goods is behind the times to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): No. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, I believe the leader of the opposition has not quite expressed our position with regard to this woollen business. We do not begrudge the woollen manufacturer his cent profit on a pair of socks, nor do we begrudge him a profit of one dollar on the cloth going into a suit. As I understand it, hon. gentlemen opposite advocate a duty on raw wool, which would increase the price of the raw material used by the woollen manufacturer. If we increase the price of his raw material he must of necessity increase the price of his finished article. My hon. friend from Bow River and the hon. member for Nipissing have pointed out that to-day the tendency is more in the direction of substitutes for wool such as cotton, rayon or silk, and every increase in the price of wool will accelerate that movement. So if you put a duty on wool, or increase the duty, you might help the cotton industry, the rayon industry or the silk industry, but you will strangle the woollen industry.

Mr. McGIBBON: In answer to the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Nipissing, I might say that their arguments are rather peculiar. The hon. member for Bow River reads a newspaper article as an authority against the absolute fact that mills are shut down and have been shut down all over the country for years. A newspaper article, I presume, is a much better authority than the actual fact. As far as the hon. member for Nipissing is concerned, it is quite evident that he has not given much study to this question. In the first place he states that a large number of these industries which have failed were started during the war, while as a matter of fact a number of industries which have been put out of business were previously in existence for over half a century.

Mr. LAPIERRE: They increased their output during the war.

Mr. McGIBBON: But now they are out of business altogether because of the tariff reductions by this government.

Mr. LAPIERRE: If they were making these goods before the war they were using antiquated machinery.

Mr. McGIBBON: They did not have antiquated machinery, and they do not need to take any lessons in their business from the hon. member for Nispissing.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I had not intended to say anything on this question, Mr. Chairman, but we have heard so much about sheep and the woollen industry that I think it might be well to make a few observations at this time. We have been told that there should be 25,000,000 sheep in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I said 10,000,000, one for each person.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, whether it be 10,000,000, 30,000,000 or 50,000,000, a few million between friends is neither here nor there.

Mr. MANION: In Australia there are 97,000,000 sheep.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I will come to Australia in a moment; that country is a long way from Canada. It is true that Canada consumes a great deal of wool, and it is also true that Australia is better located for the production of fine grades of wool than are we in Canada. Australia has a very moderate climate for the growing of sheep and can produce small-bodied, thin-fleshed sheep, with a high grade of wool. Canada being a cold country with heavy brush lands, the conditions require sheep of sturdier frame and heavier flesh to enable them to stand the conditions, and these sheep produce a coarser wool than the sheep of Australia. It is not a question of duty at all. If it were, what would the 27,000,000 of sheep in Great Britain do? There they thrive without protection and without tariffs. They are able to do so because of climatic conditions, and the fact that the soil is of a character adapted to the profitable raising of sheep.

Mr. BENNETT: And there is a market for mutton.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Quite so. There is a market for mutton in Great Britain, and that country takes a good deal of mutton as well as wool from Australia. It is better, however, when the mutton market is close at hand. But the principal reason why they are able to produce so many sheep in Great Britain is that the climate and the soil suit the industry. On the other hand, the farmer in Canada has to feed his sheep during the long cold winter. It is an exceptional thing indeed for sheep to be fed in Great Britain. It is true that the lambs are brought down from the hills on to the arable lands in the low country for the winter; and some of the old breeding stock has to be taken from the highlands down on to the lowlands, and fed during that time. Without artificial feeding and under the conditions I have mentioned one can easily see how cheap it is to produce sheep. In this country our wide open spaces have been pre-empted. I do not suppose there is to-day a vacant sheep range in the province of Alberta, or in any other province probably outside of British Columbia. I admit there are some spots in British Columbia where it is likely that sheep could be ranged in large numbers yet.

Mr. BENNETT: Without winter feeding?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Possibly without winter feeding, but climatic conditions are severe on the uplands even in British Columbia. As I say, there are places in British Columbia where sheep could be ranged in approximately large numbers but nothing like ten, twenty or thirty millions and yet make the enterprise profitable for those engaged in it. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) told us the other night about trying to induce certain wealthy men to engage in the business, and he stated that he had failed in the endeavour. I do not wonder at it. Sheep growers will not make a lot of money under present conditions in ranging great bunches of sheep on the still vacant lands in Canada.

Just a word about economic independence. I suppose that if the people of Canada were willing to tax themselves sufficiently in order to grow cotton, they might make themselves independent of cotton—either cotton cloth, guncotton, or the other fabrics of which cotton is the basis. The same with the production of citrus and tropical fruits. We have the soil and the fuel. Why do not we produce citrus fruits?

Mr. KAISER: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that I was endeavouring to get wealthy men to put their money into sheep-raising?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I understood the hon. member to say that he had endeavoured to get wealthy men to put their money into the raising of angora goats.

Mr. KAISER: There was no talk about sheep-raising at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Goat-getting.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I believe that there have been men who have invested their money in goat-getting but there are some portions of the country where it does not work well. It is impossible as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) pointed out, to have economic independence, and I think Adam Smith would be the first one to admit it if he were living to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I was speaking for the moment, of economic independence in the woollen industry for the purpose of illustrating my other points.

Mr. EVANS: Looking at these schedules, and comparing this item with items 553 and 554, it shows an utter lack of policy on the part of the government. They have neither a tariff for revenue policy nor a consistent policy of protection. Items 553 and 554 are carrying the highest rate of duty in the tariff schedule, 35 per cent. But here we have relieved the manufacturer in the matter of raw materials. Again we have lowered our revenue without any corresponding benefit for the consumer. That is inconsistent. It shows that the government has not followed either policy consistently. It has, however, shown consistent obedience to the group that controls that side of the house to-day. It has shown itself to be a class government. We have plenty of evidence in the treatment of the two items alluded to, and there is no other conclusion to draw than the one which I have drawn. The manufacturer is relieved altogether of paying any revenue under the customs tariff, and the government has seen fit to place the whole burden of protection to-day on the class that has borne it hitherto, the class that has to sell its products in the open markets of the world. I say that the whole policy of protection to-day is laid on the sweated labour of the homesteader, and that of his wife and children. It is inconsistent, and it shows a callous disregard of the rights of other classes. The farmer needs no protection to raise sheep, and protection has been an utter failure for the mills of this country That has been shown by the leader of the opposition. Neither farmer nor manufacturer can prosper under protection. If Canada is going to be economically prosperous the whole thing will depend upon the cost of production, because much as they may try to argue otherwise the prosperity of every industry to-day in Canada depends on the basic industry of the country. And in what condition is that basic industry placed? It has to produce under a protective policy and sell in the open markets of the world. I ask if any man to-day can say that is reasonable, or that this tariff has shown itself to be in any form a scientific tariff. I wonder if the Minister of Finance can spell that word? I wonder if the free traders from Saskatchewan, or the country west of the great lakes, know the meaning of a scientific tariff? What does the Consumers League say to this?

An hon. MEMBER: Who are they?

Mr. EVANS: I see them represented on the other side of the house. Have they considered this situation? There is an utter disregard here on the part of the government of those who are to-day providing the biggest part of the income of this country. The policy which the leader of the opposition has propounded to-night is useless. It is an economic failure, The farmer needs no protection; the mills have failed under it. The cost of living has to do with production in this country. The leader of the opposition touched another point to-night in the tremendous spread which exists between the costs to the manufacturer, or the price which he receives, and what the consumer has to pay. Not only has there been hitherto, as there is to-day, too wide a difference, between the producer and the consumer, but the schedules of the tariff which we are now considering are favourable not only to manufacturers but to distributors and there are certain other measures which distinctly make that difference wider. This is not as it should be. The minister should consider this item further; he should let it stand in order to see if he cannot bring the raw material and the finished product closer on the tariff list. Surely any reasonable man, any man that has in him anything of British fair play, will see the unreasonableness of the attitude of the government towards those who are to-day making the biggest part of the income of the nation, who, I repeat, are still the homesteader and his family.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The discussion on the wool item has taken rather a wide range and we are discussing under item number 549 practically all the wool items. Perhaps this may have the effect of shortening the discussion in the end. There is only one aspect of the wool business with which I am particularly concerned and that is in respect to the removal of the duty from woollen yarns, number forty and finer, which are manufactured to a large extent by an important firm in the riding which I have the honour to represent.

Until the present budget introduced by the Minister of Finance, worsted yarns were entitled to a protection of 12½ per cent from Great Britain, 17½ per cent on the intermediate tariff, and 22½ per cent on the general tariff; but as all worsted yarns which are imported come from Great Britain, we are not concerned very much with either the intermediate or the general tariff. The protection against worsted yarns coming from Great Britain has now been removed, and they have been placed upon the free list. The result as regards the industry which I have in mind will be, I think, practically to close it up. It is an industry engaged altogether in the spinning of worsted yarns. There is, in connection with the woollen schedules in the customs tariff, a bit of history which perhaps it would be well to remember. The first tariff by a Liberal government—I do not mean away back in the days of Alexander Mackenzie, but in the Laurier-Fielding regime—was introduced into this house in 1897. I think no change was made in the then existing duties on woollens, but there was in that tariff a provision which had a great effect upon the trade. For the first time Mr. Fielding introduced the British preference, granting for the first year, I think a discount of 12½ per cent; for the second year 25 per cent, and in the year 1900 the preference was increased to 33⅓ per cent. I well remember in the year 1902 going with a deputation of woollen men who came to Ottawa to interview Mr. Fielding, who was at that time Minister of Finance. They objected that the reduction of one-third of the tariff in favour of Great Britain brought about a situation under which they could not compete. Mr. Fielding took a reasonable and business-like view of the situation. He said that he would have an inquiry made at once into the whole question, and within the next two years an inquiry was held and a report made to Mr. Fielding. As a result of that inquiry and report there will be found in the Tariff Act of 1904 a clause that manufactured woollen goods—I am not now talking of yarns—should enjoy a net protection of thirty per cent, notwithstanding any preferences, and the woollen trade enjoyed a protection of 30 per cent net from that day until the year 1923. Under a protection of 30 per cent the woollen trade prospered in Canada.

Prior to that time all worsted yarns came in free; but it was felt not only among the trade but among the good people of Canada in general that if we were able in this country to produce a very creditable cloth, a splendid woven cloth, it was strange that we did not complete the fabrication; that we did not go back to the basis and make the yarns. If they could do it in England or in other countries, we could do it in Canada, so a deputation again called on Mr. Fielding and I again accompanied them. We met Mr. Fielding, the late Mr. Paterson and the late Sir Richard Cartwright, and my recollection is that His Honour, the present Speaker, was one of the ministers who received us. They laid their case before Mr. Fielding for the manufacture of worsted yarns in Canada. He heard them patiently; he considered the whole situation, and I think he again ordered an inquiry. My recollection is that he sent someone over to Bradford to make a full inquiry into conditions which prevailed there with the idea of ascertaining why, if they could successfully make yarns in Bradford, we could not do the same thing in Canada. At all events in the session of 1907, when the main Fielding tariff was introduced into this parliament, Mr. Fielding granted the worsted yarn manufacturers a tariff of 12½ per cent British preference, 17½ per cent intermediate and 20 per cent general. Why did he do this? He did it in order to start the yarn industry in Canada. A number of mills which were in the habit of weaving cloths, immediately installed machinery to spin worsted yarn.

Worsted yarn, as a matter of fact, cannot or has not been made solely of Canadian wool. Canadian wool is not considered fine enough to make the finer qualities of worsted yarn. A percentage of it is used for that purpose. Some mill men tell me they use 15 per cent; others have told me they use as high as 20 per cent; but I think 15 per cent would probably be a fair average, and the rest of the raw yarn is imported, mixed with the Canadian yarn and spun in the Canadian mills. Almost all the woven cloth manufacturers have established spinning plants in their own works. One or two have not done so, but in my riding a very extensive plant exists which does not make cloth, which exists only upon the spinning of worsted yarns which it sells to manufacturers of cloth, ladies' garments, carpets, automobile interiors, plushes and the like. It is absolutely dependent upon that trade. It employs over 200 hands. It uses, say, 15 per cent of Canadian wool and 85 per cent of imported wool. All the preliminary processes are gone through in the Canadian mill—the scouring, the picking, the carding, the gilling, the spinning and the twisting—and while it is not altogether male labour that is employed in that work, the largest proportion of the employees are heads of families. This mill has been in operation since about the year 1907 or 1908, and it has gradually worked up a satisfactory and extensive business in Canada. It was started when the Liberal tariff of 1907 was passed by this house, giving a 12½ per cent protection as against the importation of yarns from Great Britain. Why cannot this industry exist without that protection, may be asked, and what does the protection amount to? It cannot exist without protection because of the difference between the wages paid in Bradford, England, and the wages paid in Guelph, Canada, where this mill is situated. I notice that there is a difference between the statements made in regard to wages by the representatives of the Bradford and Huddersfield mills and the representatives of the Canadian mills. If you will read the statements that were made before the tariff board, you will note that the Canadian mill men say that the difference is as between sixty cents and one dollar; that is, that when sixty cents is paid in Bradford for wages, one dollar is paid in Canada. Some of them put it at fifty-nine cents, others at sixty cents. But the representatives from Yorkshire, who desire to gain the Canadian market for their own goods, say that the difference is as between $1 and $1.37. But whoever may be correct, the duty is only 12½ per cent—not very much protection is it, Mr. Minister?

Now what does that duty amount to in regard to the cloth manufactured from worsted yarns? To-day one pound of worsted yarn sells in Bradford at $1.25 and a 12½ per cent duty on that would make a duty of about sixteen cents a pound. One pound of that yarn goes to a yard of cloth. One manufacturer said you can average it at one and one-eighth pounds to the yard, but for my purposes one pound is easier to figure. Taking three and one-half yards of woven cloth to one suit of clothes, the protection amounts to about 56 cents on the yarn that goes into a suit of clothes. That suit will retail at forty or fifty or sixty dollars, and 56 cents is the amount of protection on the yarn in that suit. Yet that protection keeps hundreds and hundreds of men, and women too, working in the Dominion of Canada. The amount of duty involved is so small, so negligible, that it has no effect whatever upon the ultimate price which is charged for that suit of clothes. In the letter read by my hon. leader to-night a manufacturer states that if he could get a profit of one dollar a suit he would be satisfied. I know manufacturers in the county of Waterloo who say that if they could get fifty cents a suit they would be satisfied. Ten or twelve cents a yard they count as their profit on many lines of materials. Now is the duty of 56 cents on a forty or fifty or sixty dollar suit of clothes a burden on the people? I will tell the minister that it is not nearly as great a burden as is the sales tax. He has kept the three per cent sales tax on the sixty dollar suit. That is about three times as much as the customs duty, if the duty is to be considered a tax. This is the proposal of the Finance minister who succeeded Mr. Fielding, who established the worsted spinning industry in Canada by his tariff. These men were encouraged to invest their money in this industry in Canada, and they have invested tremendous amounts. I do not know whether there are other mills exclusively engaged in manufacturing worsted yarns as is the mill in Guelph, but I know that it has received a blow from which it is doubtful if it can recover. Already orders are being cancelled, and where are they being placed? They are being placed in Bradford. One-third of the output of the Guelph factory goes where? To the Oriental Company in Oshawa, for plush for automobiles. They will not buy Canadian worsted yarn in the future. They are going to buy it in Bradford now that it has been placed on the free list. I grant that the Oriental Company are going to be directly benefited to some extent by this proposal of the minister, but on the other hand it is a tremendous injury to the worsted spinning industry, which was established under the Liberal tariff of 1907.

I am not as hopeless of changing the minister's opinion on this matter as is my hon. leader. He seemed to think there was no chance of doing so, but I think that when the facts are fairly placed before the minister he will appreciate the difficulty and provide a remedy.

There are only one or two cloth mills in this country that are going to be benfited. I am told there is only one cloth mill that does not make worsted yarns. It has no machinery for making worsted yarns, and no doubt it will be directly benefited. They are also going to get a benefit in another respect under this tariff, because they have machinery there for making dry spun yarns or French yarns, and French yarns are to have a duty of 10 per cent to which I offer no objection whereas the worsted yarns are to be put on the free list. The manufacturers of worsted yarns are being most unfairly treated in this matter. The minister by his proposal is penalizing some fifty or sixty factories in Canada which have been built up under a 12½ per cent protection. With one stroke of the pen he has wiped out their only protection.

Mr. Chairman, I for one resent what I call the direct interference of the Yorkshire woollen mill men in this tariff application. I have no objection to their filing a brief, nor even to their appearing and making representations, particularly if they are asked to do so by the board, but when we have practically the whole woollen trade of the north of England coming here and demanding a hearing, filing their briefs, making their statements and examining witnesses, I think it is time to make a change in the procedure. In addition to that, as recently as to-day or yesterday, we find these same Yorkshire yarn manufacturers cabling the Finance department objecting to this tariff item or approving of the other item, and I see in part of the despatch which my hon. leader read to this committee to-night these significant words which he omitted to read:

> Dress goods manufacturers are very pleased indeed with the reduction made in the scale applicable to piece goods.

Then follows the sentence to which I particularly wish to draw attention:

> Spinners are none the less satisfied that woollen and worsted yarns excepting for carpets are now free of duty.

I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance whether his present proposal is made in the interests of the Yorkshire mill owners or of the Canadian industry. For my part I adopt the language of my hon. leader in this regard. When it comes to a question as between Canadian workmen and Yorkshire workmen, I am for the Canadian workmen every time. But the direct interference by the Yorkshire mill owners in the Canadian customs tariff, their continued interference in this respect, their cabling of their approval or disapproval of this, that, or the other item, leads one to believe that they have had too much to say in fixing the woollen tariff schedules for the Dominion of Canada. I believe that the case of our worsted spinners is so strong that the government will remedy it. It will cause no hardship to the people of Canada, no burden will have to be borne. I remember the words which the minister used in introducing his budget, that one of the considerations which weighed on his mind was that in this country the people must have warm clothing. Give them warm clothing, plenty of it; give them the relief I am asking him to give, the $1.50 off a suit of clothes in the sales tax, but allow those good work people in this country —who for ten, fifteen or twenty years have been brought up to this trade and know no other—to continue in this employment as heretofore.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I want to join in a word of protest against the rather loose statements of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He declared very strongly against the use in this house of slogans and shibboleths, but I fancy no one is guilty of their use more frequently than he himself. That phrase, economic independence for Canada, may sound very well with regard to this woollen manufacture. The picture was drawn of our producing all our own sheep, manufacturing the wool, finding a home market for the mutton, then wearing the woollen cloth, and so on. But I ask: Is that principle capable of being generally applied? What about the cotton industry—does the leader of the opposition intend to grow cotton in Canada? Surely his arguments for economic independence mean that we would have to develop a cotton-growing industry. Does he mean to establish rubber plantations in Canada? We have a very considerable rubber manufacture in this country. No, no; I would suggest to my hon. friends that they do a little clear thinking. I cannot use words more apt than those employed by the leader of the opposition, directing them to himself and his followers: Do not let us get carried away by these things. What about financial independence? We are begging to get financial assistance from outside,—and yet we are told that we ought to try to secure economic independence. We are trying our very best to establish American factories or turn over our existing factories to international trusts. Again I ask, what about economic independence? I suggest that in considering affairs of this kind we keep a little bit nearer to the realities, and not talk quite so much for the gallery—as some are inclined to do.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am not going to sit down. I should just like to repeat some words that are very freely used by certain hon. gentlemen who undertake to censure all the other members of the house, and adopt a very superior attitude in doing so. I could not but think, for example, of the curious situation of the one Conservative member in the three prairie provinces undertaking to interpret the spirit of the west! If one of us did anything of that kind you can imagine the ridicule that would be poured upon us; but the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition presumes to be in a class by himself.

He says dramatically, "is it a fact?" And so on. He has read us a letter—an anonymous letter, although I have no doubt of the good faith of the writer—in which we are told that he, the writer, would be satisfied with only one cent profit for a pair of socks, and with one dollar profit for a suit. Now, I would ask: Is it a fact that the manufacturers of this country have received a profit of only one cent a pair for socks? Is it a fact that they have received a profit of only one dollar for a suit? If that is so, where have the big profits come from in the last five or ten years?

Mr. BENNETT: I can answer my hon. friend. The manufacturer whom I quoted received a profit of less than a cent for a pair of socks and a profit of less than one dollar for a suit of clothes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is an individual case, and surely the leader of the opposition with his long training in the law would not put forth an individual instance of that kind as evidence concerning the whole manufacturing industry. I hope not. However, I rose to my feet to call attention to an altogether different aspect of this question—one that has not yet been touched upon. Every once in a while we hear one of these phrases "protecting the Canadian working man", and the idea has been assiduously propagated across Canada that protection to the manufacturer means "protection" to the man who is employed in his factory.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It does.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All right, I am glad I do not have to argue the point; those gentlemen admit that is their position. I look at the wages and the hours of labour of those engaged in the textile industry in Canada, and I find that in this very industry we are considering fifty-five hours a week is a very common working period. I turn to other industries that are not protected, to the building trade for example, and I find that the hours run around forty-eight, or even forty-four a week. I wonder whether the workman is "protected" in his working conditions. That is something that is not very often considered, except when in a general sort of way we are told that "protection" means help for the working man.

An hon. MEMBER: The unions protect the working men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I tell the hon. gentleman that in a great many of these factories there are no unions whatever, none are permitted, and there is no legislation that will help us in the matter.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is there not a union in the building trade?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and that is the reason there are better conditions in that trade.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Is there a union in the moulding trade?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Then why talk of protection not protecting the working man?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The moulding trade is not nearly so highly protected as the textile trade. My thesis is this that protection to the manufacturer does not necessarily mean protection to the workmen engaged in the factory.

An hon. MEMBER: It should.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It should, but it does not. That is what I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance before I get through.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the workmen in the United States?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The workmen in the textile industries are amongst the poorest paid in the great American republic, and that is the most highly protected industry over there. I am glad that was mentioned, because it simply emphasizes the condition here in Canada, and it corroborates the position which I am trying to take, that protection to the industry does not necessarily involve protection to the working man.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't they grow cotton in the United States?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but I do not know what that has to do with the matter. I find these are some of the wages paid. I am reading from the last report on wages and hours in Canada, published by the Labour department here. I notice that a common weekly wage in this woollen manufacture is around $20 a week for mule spinners. There are a number here—$21.50, $11, $19.50, $22 and $25. I take one example of female workers in the woollen factories, warpers: the weekly wages are $18, $9, $12.65, $20. Now I turn from these to other types of work in Canada and I find the wages considerably higher—laundry workers in the cities or girls engaged in book binding. These would afford a fair comparison, and I find that the wages in these other industries, which are not protected, are higher than those in the textile industries. These are matters of fact, and basing my question on these facts, I would ask whether it is not possible for the Minister of Finance so to arrange that if protection is given to any industry that industry should be forced to pay a fair wage, a decent living wage.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): We will agree with you on that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no doubt that the hon. member for Hamilton will agree with that, and if the workers across the country were definitely assured that the protection which is extended to industry meant protection for them in respect of their wages and working conditions generally, a great many more would be inclined to favour that protection.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: At the present time, however, they are not definitely assured of that; they are not guaranteed it. The figures I have read show that in practice they have not received that protection. I appeal, therefore, to the Minister of Finance, if he continues the policy of protection, to make sure that the workers will receive some share of that protection. No doubt there are certain peculiar conditions that might make some protection necessary for a time in special industries, but the minister should first lay down the condition, in granting favours along this line, that a fair wage for all employees of these concerns shall be guaranteed.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I am surprised at the narrow vision of hon. members to my left with regard to the future of this country. I cannot conceive how anyone can think it impossible for Canada to become economically independent. If there is any country in the world—any young country especially—that ought to become economically independent that country is Canada. We have everything to enable us to attain that independence. We have a large extent of territory, great natural resources of all kinds, a climate that produces the best type of people, and a people who can make the best use of the resources at their command. There is no reason, therefore, why this Dominion should not become one of the greatest nations of the world. I do not say that we can be independent on every score; there are certain things which we must necessarily obtain from outside, just as every other country must depend upon foreign sources for some of its requirements. The United States is economically independent, but the United States draws some of its supplies from without. If my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) had his way he would grow nothing but wheat in Canada, selling it in the markets of the world and getting his manufactured products from abroad. The result would be that he would turn Canada into nothing but an agricultural country. But we know that no country which was purely agricultural ever became great. Industry and agriculture must go hand in hand and develop together.

I have only a few remarks to make in regard to the woollen industry. I have previously stated that in my opinion the Minister of Finance was pointing his tariff revisions at industry in Ontario, and in support of this statement I have a few figures to submit. In the woollen industry in Canada in the year 1925 there were 119 plants as against 127 in 1924. Of these 119 plants producing in 1925, eighty-six were located in Ontario and they produced 80 per cent of the goods manufactured by the industry in the whole country. In 1923 the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding increased the British preference by 10 per cent. In 1922 we imported $196,000 worth of blankets and in 1926, as a result of that 10 per cent increase in the British preference, those blanket imports had risen to $601,000. In knitted goods we imported in 1922, $403,000, and in 1926, $769,000, the increase being attributable to the increase in the British preference. In socks and stockings, we imported in 1922, $1,371,000 and in 1926, $2,555,000—a considerable increase in that period. Taking our total wool products, our imports both dutiable and free amounted in 1922 to $35,000,000 and in 1926 to $46,000,000. This increase was due to the increase of 10 per cent in the British preference, which is a comparatively slight addition.

Now I turn to different sections of the woollen industry and I find similar conditions existing in Canada. Let us take the woollen cloth mills. In 1924 there were sixty of these mills in Canada, of which forty-five operated in Ontario. In 1925 there were fifty-seven. The capital invested in Canada in 1924 amounted to $22,551,000 and in 1925, $21,342,000. The wages in 1925 amounted to $3,913,000. Of the fifty-seven mills operating in Canada in 1925, forty-two were located in Ontario, and the capital in Ontario was $18,128,132 out of a total for the whole country of $21,342,000. The number of employees in Ontario in that year was 3,582 out of a total in all Canada of 4,426; and the wages paid in Ontario amounted to $3,331,000 out of a total I have already mentioned of $3,913,000. This shows the extent to which the woollen industry operates in Ontario in comparison with the rest of the country. Yet these are the industries which are being hit by the Minister of Finance in his budget.

Next I take woollen yarn mills in Canada. I am particularly interested in the woollen yarn business inasmuch as the industry operates in my county. In 1923 we had nineteen mills and in 1925 sixteen. The capital invested in 1923 was $9,279,416, and in 1925, $9,041,892. The greater part of these mills are in the province of Ontario, the capital invested in that province being $8,117,891. The number of employees in woollen yarn mills in all Canada in 1925 was 1,434, and of this number 1,100 employees were engaged in the mills of Ontario; while out of a total wage bill for the same year of $1,171,000 Ontario paid $899,946. Ontario furnished 80 per cent of the employees and 82 per cent of the production of woollen yarn mills in 1925. But this particular industry is being severely attacked by the minister, and in one particular instance a mill in my own town will be practically put out of business. It is in the same position as the mill in the constituency of South Wellington. The effect of this budget will be severely felt, and the mill has already suffered a considerable loss in orders for the present year by reason of this tariff. They failed to meet the competition from the old country, and the manager is of the opinion that they will be unable to carry on. In a letter to me he states:

> The entire problem is based purely on labour costs. We are led to understand that manufacturers in England can obtain experienced spinners for equivalent to $5 per week, whereas in this town under the minimum wage schedule, we are compelled to pay at least $10 per week.
> If I recollect correctly, when the textile industry placed their case before the tariff board last year, the difference in labour costs between the industry in Canada and in England was around 70 per cent. It is a strange fact that with such a tremendous difference in producing costs, the price quoted by the English spinners to the Canadian knitter is only around 10 per cent below our price, which leads one to believe that the consumer in Canada is not reaping any benefit, equal in any way to the difference in the cost of production.

Although these mills will be almost put out of business because yarn is placed on the free list, the English spinners make a difference of only 10 per cent in their prices to the Canadian people, and if our mills cease production altogether the English spinners will control the market here and charge any price they wish. So we can reap no benefit from a reduction in these duties.

In connection with carpets, mats and rugs, in 1923 we had twenty-three factories producing these articles while in 1925 there were only sixteen, a reduction of seven mills through the 10 per cent reduction in the British preference. Of this industry 99 per cent is in Ontario; the total production in 1925 for all Canada was $2,905,251, of which the Ontario mills produced $2,874,967, leaving something over $26,000 produced in the rest of Canada. The capital invested in this industry throughout Canada amounts to $4,080,925, of which $4,059,837 is in Ontario, leaving $21,058 for the rest of Canada. These are the industries which are being injured under the present budget.

In 1925 we had thirty woollen cloth mills in Canada as against thirty-one in 1924; the capital decreased in 1925 as against 1924 by $127,942, while the number of employees decreased from 1,024 to 983. The province of Ontario supplied 64 per cent of the employees and paid 67 per cent of the wages, yet the Minister of Finance in presenting his budget fails entirely to grasp these conditions as far as this Dominion is concerned.

I wish to make a plea to the Minister of Finance that he reconsider his decision to place these yarns on the free list, and that he take into consideration the necessity that the spinning mills in this country receive the protection they need. I cannot see where these reductions will lower the cost of the goods in Canada. If our industries can be kept working at high pressure, employing all their machinery, they will be able to have a larger production with a consequent reduction in price. Again I ask the minister to reconsider this decision with regard to placing yarns on the free list.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think we all agree that in Canada we want to maintain a reasonable standard of living for everyone. We do not want this to be a cheap country; we want good wages paid which will enable the worker to maintain his family in a proper manner. With that end in view we put legislation into effect many years ago for the purpose of keeping out certain cheap workers who could live very much cheaper than our own working people could live, and in so doing we felt that we were protecting our Canadian workmen. We adopted that many years ago and I quite agree with it, but if it is reasonable to do that is it not reasonable to protect our people against the products of cheap labour, manufactured in other countries? If it is reasonable to protect our own working people from the inroads of certain classes from across the Pacific, who work and live more cheaply than we do, what right have we to ask the producers of wool in this country to compete on a free trade basis with wool from South America, Mexico and other countries where labour is very much cheaper and living conditions are not to be compared with those in Canada?

I was very much interested in the comparison drawn by an hon. gentleman opposite between the conditions affecting sheep production in Australia and those which obtain in Canada. The hon. gentleman also referred to the area available in this country for the production of sheep and wool. It is true that in Australia, taken as a whole, they have a better climate for the production of sheep so far as cold is concerned, but on the other hand they have terrible droughts during which sheep die by the million. That condition prevailed during the past year in Queensland, so one condition is easily balanced by the other, and I think in the long run, taken over a period of years, we would probably have a slight advantage.

Mr. ROBB: Does that apply to dairy cattle?

Mr. TOLMIE: I think dairy cattle are usually kept on smaller farms. I am talking now about range sheep.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It does not effect butter.

[Mr. R. K. Anderson.]

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with the question of wintering sheep in this country I might say that in those sections where it is necessary to feed sheep in winter, which is generally necessary because you must keep your breeding stock in good condition, it takes from two to three pounds of hay per day per head. That is when your range is covered with snow, but when you have plenty of winter range, that feeding is not necessary.

Then something was said about predatory animals. I have never heard that an English or Scotch dog would not chase a sheep. One hon. member made that statement, but although I have been identified with the stock business in this country for over half a century I never heard of that before. I have heard stories about them killing sheep in the old country, but of course I have no proof of that. I do know, however, that Canadian dogs will chase sheep whenever they feel like it. This gentleman also referred to a case where a sheep dog was taken before a magistrate in the state of Kentucky, I believe, but we always shoot our dogs first in British Columbia. We find that if we do not shoot them we take the risk that they will return some time in the early morning or during the night and destroy many sheep. Then we also have the coyote, and I must say that the coyote suffers no disadvantage on the Canadian side as compared with the United States. He knows nothing about tariffs or boundary lines; he crosses wherever sheep are to be secured.

Then I believe it was the hon. member for Bow River who said we were beginning to use rayon instead of wool. Coming from the banana belt as I do, from Victoria, British Columbia, I am not wearing rayon, and I am of the opinion that a man would have to be a trained Highlander for some length of time if he wanted to dress in rayon in this country, especially if he had to walk up parliament hill against a cold breeze in the winter time. The hon. member also said that the ladies were giving up wool and wearing rayon. I would advise him to put on his glasses on a cold day; I do not know whether they wear rayon or not, but they certainly wear wool on the outside.

I would like to refer again for a moment to the question of the limited area for the raising of sheep in Canada. I think that is a mistake. I can tell you exactly about British Columbia, where we have 160,000,000 acres of range land, 100,000,000 acres of what is known as timber range and 60,000,000 acres of open range. Of that area we are using only 6 per cent, and we buy 75 per cent of our meat outside the province. Compare that situation with the four states to our south, Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana, and we find that while their total area is only a little larger than that of British Columbia they use 69.7 per cent of their range and supply themselves with their own meat, shipping their surplus to other places. What I should like to say is that some method should be adopted; at least a thorough investigation should be made as to the possibility of utilizing these hundreds of millions of acres of grass that are going to waste every year.

My good friend the Minister of Finance has stated, or hinted in a sort of shrewd Scotch way, that I had selected the figures that I presented to the house a little while ago. Let me point this out so as to get it on Hansard: The tariff was taken off wool in the United States in 1913. Whether they anticipated the war or not I do not know. At any rate wool was shipped in there in huge quantities. There was so much of it there that on May 27, 1921 they applied the tariff again, and then they applied the Fordney tariff on September 21, 1922. Now the sheep population of the United States on the 1st of January, 1922, was 36,186,000 head. On January 1, 1927, the number was 41,909,000. The wool clip in 1922 amounted to 263,713,000 pounds, shorn and pulled. The production in 1927 is estimated at 328,137,000 pounds. The duty on wool entering the United States is 31 cents per pound, clean content, the clean content being bone dry scoured weight plus 12 per cent for moisture regained. Scoured wool is subject to the same duty but without allowance for vegetable matter which may be contained. Such allowance is made when wool is imported in the grease or washed. The duty on dressed mutton is 2½ cents per pound. On dressed lamb the duty is 4 cents per pound. On live sheep and lambs there is a duty of $2 per head. This information, under date of March 1, 1928, is signed by John F. Bethune, secretary of the United States Tariff Commission. I may say that later figures indicate that in 1928 the sheep population increased to 44,455,000. I just wanted to bring these points to the attention of the house and to place these figures on Hansard for the use of the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to say a word with regard to the last speaker's remarks. Like a good many other members I know very little about the wool tariff and I do not want to know. But the other night my hon. friend was speaking and he spoke of the neglected possibilities of sheep raising in British Columbia. Now he says: there are 160,000,000 acres in British Columbia adapted to sheep raising. I would not question the hon. gentleman's figures, but I think they have been prepared by an optimist; they must have taken in a great deal of the lower parts of the mountains. We have roughly three geographical divisions there. First there is a large portion of what you might call mountain. It is rocks, it may be valuable; in a lot of it there are probably minerals, but it certainly is of no use at all for grazing purposes. Then on the lower slopes which extend along the coast we have timber, but we could not graze sheep there and even if that were possible the wet climate would prevent it. So that the available land is confined to the more or less limited area in what is called the ranges. I think the hon. gentleman would agree that a great part of the land around and behind Kamloops is an illustration of the land of which I am speaking. The hon. gentleman complained the other night that measures are not adopted by which this range country in British Columbia could be utilized for sheep, and he complained bitterly of the amount of wool we are importing. I should like to mention a curious fact. It is quite true that we do import a lot of wool, but it is equally true that we export a large portion of the wool we do grow, for the reason that it is not suitable for the manufacture of cloth in this country. We do not raise the kind of wool that is required, and a great deal of the wool that is imported ostensibly from the United States really comes from Australia and is of a quality we do not grow here. Australia and New Zealand are sheep-growing countries and New Zealand is not subject to drought. Both countries have facilities for sheep growing, partly from long practice and partly from the manner in which they go about it. They run sheep cheaply, and their facilities for dipping and making them clean in every way are much better. When a man has 115,000 sheep on one farm, as I have seen there, it is reasonable to suppose that he has every modern appliance—scientific machinery, motive power for sheep shearing, conveniences for dipping, and things of that kind.

But I was talking about the range country around Kamloops. Now this is a fact within my own knowledge. A number of years ago the grazing land was thrown open, and of course the applicants were men who wanted to run both cattle and sheep, and we all know the bitter enmity there is between sheep men and cattle men. They used to murder each other down in the states because sheep kill a cattle range. They eat the grass closely, and men who are trying to run cattle do not want sheep on a cattle range. At the time these reservations were made, apparently the political pull of the cattle men was dominant. It would not do to say that nothing but cattle should run on these ranges in British Columbia, that would not look well. So they said: You can run cattle and you can run sheep; but they put a little provision in that if anybody wanted to run sheep they would have to fence in the whole area with wire netting. That country is not rich in luxurious grass. It only carries very few sheep to the acre. I would rather say a number of acres to the sheep; and the idea of having the whole range fenced in with wire netting with a 35 per cent tariff on it meant that you could not run sheep at all. The cattle men did not say so, of course it would not have been politic, but matters were so arranged that the sheep man was not in the picture at all. He was confronted with a condition that he could not possibly economically comply with. So the cattle man had it all his own way. That is why we were not running sheep on the ranges round Kamloops. Time went on, and men saw the advantages and opportunities of running sheep, and they made application again and again to the government of Canada to have this regulation altered. They made application when the Union government was in power and they were refused. It has only been since this government came into power that these regulations have been changed. Since then sheep have been run in the neighbourhood of Kamloops and the number has increased enormously. It has increased in consequence of that little joker of which I have spoken being taken out of the regulations. These are the reasons which perhaps explain why we do not grow more sheep in British Columbia. It is not a question of the tariff.

While I am on my feet I might mention—because it is something that came within my own knowledge—the question of competing with English wool, and that if we had a tariff we would be able to do so. In some classes of this cloth we would not be able to compete, no matter what tariff there was. I was talking with a tailor last year and he gave me the name of a man who made up his mind to go into the manufacture of clothing in Canada—I think in Ontario, within a reasonable distance of Ottawa. He brought the machinery over from England and hired two dozen weavers to work in his mill so there would be no slip-up at all. He turned out excellent suits of clothes and distributed them amongst the tailors of this city; they could be sold at a better profit and for $10 less than other suits. But the man who told me this said there were no repeat orders and he wondered why, and he made it his business to inquire. He found that the manufacturer had the same trouble—no repeat orders. The suit did not wear like the English cloth. The manufacturer had enough money invested that he had to find out what the trouble was, so he went to England and after considerable research he found that it was due to the kind of water that was used in connection with bleaching the cloth. I am not technically expert enough to explain why that was the case. There were some particular springs they had had for a few hundred years and they bleached the cloth after this water had been used with it. It was that that made the difference. No amount of tariff would have put the Canadian stock into the same class of goods with the English made article. The man who wanted to buy the superior article would have bought it, and the fact that he would have to pay more for it would not have given any advantage to the Canadian cloth manufacturer.

Mr. TOLMIE: With regard to the mountains in British Columbia, one of the advantages we have is that we can sell the scenery and still retain the mountains. The usual plan followed in the mountainous country is that of grazing sheep on the foothills where possible. I am not speaking of sheep confined in fences; I am speaking about one to three thousand sheep in charge of one or two men and two or three dogs. The sheep follow up immediately behind the snow on the mountain during the summer, using the succulent grasses for food, and in addition to that the sheep are fond of browsing. They eat many leaves when they can procure them. These mountains will carry many sheep.

With regard to the figures I gave a little earlier in the evening, those sheep I referred to were grown on a ranch within forty miles of Kamloops, the very country the hon. gentleman spoke about. They were raised on the Bill Roper Cherry Creek ranch and it was on that ranch the gentleman informed me that the sheep clipped ten pounds per head and the lambs in the fall weighed eighty pounds apiece. Anybody who knows anything about sheep will know that is a pretty good record under those conditions. We do not need any fences. While the cattlemen and sheepmen had a good deal of trouble in days gone by in British Columbia and south of the line, that is pretty well regulated now by grazing laws. Those figures which I have given, while they may appear optimistic, are Liberal figures, given out by the Liberal government in British Columbia, and while Liberal optimists may be rather scarce, those are their figures and I am sure they are reasonably correct. I would not want to make any statement that I could not back up with figures. They will give the hon. gentleman what he wants to know.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What is the breed of sheep to which the hon. gentleman referred?

Mr. TOLMIE: Rambouillet crossed with Hampshire.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am a little at a loss to know what the point is in some of the debate that has been going on because, on examining the wool schedules, I find that as regards raw material our manufacturers are not any worse off, though possibly not any better off than they were before, except that there seems to be a discrimination against the manufacturers of yarn and in favour of the users of yarn. I notice in item 555, woollen cloth and wearing apparel, there seems to be a distinct increase. The three duties were previously:

British preferential tariff	Intermediate tarif	General tariff
27½ per cent	35 per cent	35 per cent
20 per cent	27 per cent	30 per cent
22½ per cent	30 per cent	35 per cent
Becoming:

So that it appears we are not raising the cost of the raw material but rather decreasing it, if anything, though the decrease is very small, and we are increasing the protection on the finished product so far as the whole industry is concerned.

A good deal has been said in the last few weeks by hon. gentlemen to my right with regard to the possibility of protecting our manufacturers without on the other hand letting them take advantage of it, that is, protecting them as regards the Canadian market, but not allowing them to increase the cost to the Canadian consumer. In view of the fact that notwithstanding all the debates in the House of Commons and the promises in the country, there has not been apparently any possibility of getting away from this policy of protection, I should like very much to see this matter explored. I think the most radical suggestion ever made by the farmers in the west was that people asking for protection should come before a committee of parliament and demonstrate to it their need for protection. I am quite sure that if the manufacturers of yarn have a case against this revision of the tariff because they are losing some of the protection they had, we cannot expect the people of western Canada, who are competing in the sale of their product in the markets of the world with cheap labour from all over the world, are readily going to waive their objections to the protective principle that they at least think has brought about dearer machinery, dearer clothing and higher costs of operations for them while not giving them any advantage as regards the sale of their finished product. But I believe they will be reasonable enough, if there is any possibility of protecting them against exploitation in the quality of the goods they must buy and the price they must pay, so that there is a basis there for doing what has so often been suggested should be done, namely, taking the tariff out of politics, taking away the disputes and the eternal arguments regarding it. But if that is done, it will have to be done in a thorough fashion and made so plain to the so-called free traders of the country that he who runs may read. I do not believe it should be beyond the capacity of our Canadian people and statesmen to ascertain whether it is possible to do that or not. A good many people have said something about a deal that I suggested between the people of the west and the Conservatives. I hope when hon. gentlemen refer to that, they will quote my speech on it, because I will stand back of it anywhere.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That was the most radical suggestion made by the farmers of the west.

Mr. KENNEDY: I will stand by that speech in Saskatoon or any other place in Saskatchewan or Alberta—but it will have to be on a basis where we can provide protection for the farmers—and I cannot see so far how this can be done—and where the protected industries, in selling their goods, cannot take advantage of the farmers in price and in quality. But if there is a basis there, hon. gentlemen to my right and hon. gentlemen over there, who are supporting a protective tariff in the woollen schedules that is higher as far as my analysis goes than anything we have had before, ought to be anxious to explore that basis and to see if it is not possible to work out some scheme.

Mr. ROBB: Earlier in the debate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) inquired what were the duties on wool in the United States. I might put that on the record so that hon. members will have it. Paragraph 1102 of the Tariff Act of 1922 of the United States reads:

Wools, not specially provided for, and hair of the Angora goat, Cashmere goat, alpaca, and other like animals, imported in the grease or washed, 31 cents per pound of clean content; imported in the scoured state, 31 cents per pound; imported on the skin, 30 cents per pound of clean content.

That is on wool. Paragraph 1109 of the United States tariff deals with woven fabrics, and reads:

Woven fabrics, weighing more than four ounces per square yard, wholly or in chief value of wool, valued at not more than 60 cents per pound, 24 cents per pound and 40 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than 60 cents but not more than 80 cents per pound, 37 cents per pound and 50 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than 80 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound, 45 cents per pound upon the wool content thereof and 50 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 45 cents per pound upon the wool content thereof, and 50 per centum ad valorem.

That is the tariff of the United States, and I take it that hon. gentlemen directly opposite, of the official opposition, are arguing that Canada should approach that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not at all. Nobody suggested that.

Mr. ROBB: Well, that we should have a higher tariff.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nobody suggested any approach to the United States tariff.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad to have that statement from my hon. friend, who I admit is as well posted as any hon. gentleman opposite on this question. It has been argued here that we would improve the condition of the woollen industry in Canada by putting a duty on wool. The figures show that in round numbers there are about 3,000,000 sheep in Canada with a population of about 10,000,000 people, while in the United States the figures I have for 1926 show 40,000,000 sheep to a population of about 120,000,000 people. My hon. friend from Victoria gave figures for 1928 which indicated a greater number of sheep, but hon. gentlemen will observe that relative to population there is just about the same number of sheep in each country, notwithstanding a duty of 31 cents a pound in the United States.

The woollen industry in the United States is not in such a flourishing condition, for I observe that last year 58 woollen mills closed in the United States; nor is the woollen industry prosperous in Australia, where they grow the very best wool in the world. If any hon. gentleman feels that this is a good venture to go into in Australia, I might mention that the Australia Woollen Company's mills at Geelong have been advertised for sale for some years and according to the latest advices I have they have not yet found a buyer. They were started by the government of Australia. It is true that in Australia they make excellent rugs and very good knitted wear, but they import tweeds just the same as we do in Canada. I will admit at once in regard to the piece goods branch of the woollen industry in Canada that it does seem to me that it should have a little more of the business. I observe in regard to piece goods that Canadian mills have just about 34 per cent of the business, but in knitted goods the Canadian mills have practically the whole business. If I had time before adjournment—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister give us the figures of the knitted goods importations?

Mr. ROBB: I shall be glad to give that as we come to it. We have had a very interesting debate this evening, and if it has established one outstanding fact more than another it is the difficulty of making a tariff in this country that will suit everybody. If we had only to make a tariff to suit my hon. friend from Rosetown, that would be very easy, or if we had only to make a tariff in regard to knitted goods, in which my hon. friend from South Wellington is interested, that, too, would be very easy.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am interested in woven goods.

Mr. ROBB: There is in the constituency of my hon. friend from South Wellington the only mill in Canada, I believe, that does exclusively custom work for yarn, and I will admit that the changes in the tariff may not be as helpful as they might be to that industry. But I want to put on record the statements that were made by the men in the industry in their application before the tariff board. They were asking for an upward revision of the tariff on behalf of the woollen industry, and I quote from a summary of their brief as presented regarding the decline of the industry:

The brief of the applicants as presented to the minister of February 1, 1927, stressed the prosperous condition of the industry and cited certain statistics compiled by the Department of Trade and Commerce, together with certain tariff changes made by parliament, with the expressed object of showing that less protection led to more depression. Inasmuch as the inquiry largely focussed upon the relation of the tariff to the apparent reduction in plants, the following paragraph from the brief is cited:

Then what follows is from the brief presented by the manufacturers:

Between 1899 and 1907, 88 woollen and worsted mills, many of considerable size, closed their doors, the equipment including 129 cards and 559 looms. In 1907 the Canadian customs tariff was divided into three classes, the British preferential tariff, which gave the lowest duty rates, the intermediate tariff, which gave lower duty rates than before to countries making trade treaties with Canada, and the general tariff rates. Under this schedule by 1910 there were only 78 woollen and worsted mills in operation in Canada, operating 224 cards and 1,154 looms. This was 223 cards and 996 looms less than in 1899, or in other words, the industry had been practically cut in half in eleven years. This decline in the industry can only be attributed to the direct effect of reducing the duties.

Mr. KENNEDY: What date is that?

Mr. ROBB: I am quoting from the brief presented by the manufacturers, February 1, 1927. Now I continue with the argument in answer to their brief:

Comparison of changes within the woollen and worsted industries of the United States, where tariff legislation has not run at all parallel to that of Canada, at once suggest itself as pertinent. For years the United States has followed what may perhaps be described not unfairly as a policy of high protection for its woollen manufacturers, although the benefits have been offset to a certain extent by the duties on wool.

And yet the course of the wollen and worsted industries in the United States has not been that of uninterrupted prosperity. The census of 1870 reported 2,891 woollen mills (as distinct from worsted mills) in operation, producing over $155,000,000 worth of fabrics. From that time until 1914, the census figures show a decrease each decade in the number of mills, and since 1879 a decrease in the value of products, except for the year 1904, when fashion temporarily gave a new impetus to woollen manufacture.

The census of 1914 reported 501 woollen mills with a product value of $103,815,905. The census of 1919 reported, according to the United States tariff commission, the first increase in the number of woollen mills in fifty years, 560 mills reporting a total output valued at $364,896,590. The census of 1921, however, again showed a decline in the number of plants and the value of products. After reviewing these figures, the United States tariff board comes to the following conclusions:

A review of the quantity of woven goods produced in the wollen mills in the last few decades is not encouraging to woollen manufacture. It is an industry that is on the decline if the per capita consumption is considered. When the production figures are studied it will be found that the number of establishments were reduced by more than one-half from 1900 to 1923. With the possible exception of overcoatings and certain types of cloakings, practically all other standard woollens have become somewhat less popular than formerly.

That is the statement of the tariff board in the United States where they do enjoy high protection. They continue:

Prior to 1925 the greatest volume of production was actually attained in 1909, and the successive censuses of 1914, 1919 and 1921 showed a trend downward. In 1923 there was a recovery of part of the ground lost. Omitting figures for partially manufactured articles, and for by-products and wastes, the production of woven goods by the worsted industry has been recorded by the bureau of the census as follows:

1909, 355,070,392 square yards.
1925, 275,105,188 square yards.

My hon. friend from Bow River must have been reading the report of the tariff commission of the United States, because they give practically the same reason that he advanced a few moments ago, that there is less woollen worn. I will come to that in a moment.

The per capita production, which is not materially different from the per capita consumption of domestic worsteds, was 3.92 square yards in 1909 and 2.38 in 1935, or a decrease of 39 per cent

That is the reason for some of the mills closing down. I am not going into the figures, as presented before the board, of the difference in costs. It was established that wages in Canada are higher than in the United Kingdom, and that they vary even in Canada in the different provinces. The relation of wages in Canada to those in the United Kingdom are as 160 to 100, the higher figure applying to Canada. In France and Italy the wages are as 40 to 50 of those in the United Kingdom. That is all I have to say in that regard.

During this debate we have had some criticism of the tariff board and of the representatives of the English mills appearing before the board.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Before the minister leaves that subject, was there at that time presented to the tariff board a comparison of the increase or decrease of the cotton business during the time that the wool business was decreasing?

Mr. ROBB: I will look up that information and supply it to my hon. friend to-morrow. We have had some criticism of the tariff board, and also of the representatives of the English manufacturers coming before the board. I inquired carefully as to whether the trade agents of the British government had taken any active part before the tariff board, and I am told they had not. I made this inquiry because the instructions to our trade agents in different parts of the world, from this government and from the preceding government, is that they must be very careful not in any way to interfere with the making of tariffs in the countries where they are located. But that does not prevent individual Canadians, interested in manufacturing or selling, from time to time making representations to other governments.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do they ever do it?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I have a case in mind where representatives of certain Canadian manufacturing industries made representations to the British government through the Canadian board of trade in London, England. I recall certain Canadian manufacturers making representations to the government of South Africa, the government of Australia and the government of New Zealand, in an effort to secure certain privileges for Canadian goods which they thought they should enjoy in that market. At this very moment there are representatives of the agricultural industry in Washington. They recently appeared before the tariff board there. I do not find any fault with them. So we in Canada are not in a very good position to criticize the representatives of other countries for coming before our tariff board.

Mr. KENNEDY: Are representatives of Canadian agriculture before the tariff board at Washington examining witnesses and in other ways taking an active part, or are they just watching the proceedings?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say as to that. I know they are there looking after their interests in the hope that Canadian milk and cream will not be discriminated against in the United States market.

Mr. KENNEDY: I do not think they are taking an active part.

Mr. ROBB: Now, may I place on record these comments by the press of the country after the textile application had been heard by the tariff board? First, I quote from the Montreal Daily Star of January 6, 1928:

> The respect for the tariff advisory board shown by the manufacturers and producers during the active life of that body within the past two years is an attitude which parliament and the government should emulate. The deliberate consideration of the merits of cases brought before the board has been in commendable contrast with the former hearings under pressure before the Minister of Finance or parliamentary committees. It is true the board is advisory and that adoption of policy still remains with the government of the day.

Now I quote from the Grain Growers' Guide of November 1, 1927:

> The Canadian Maufacturers' Association maintains experts generally in support of tariff increases, and the Canadian Council of Agriculture and the Consumers' League generally represent the low tariff sentiment of the country. By thorough study of the problems before the board the representatives of these bodies are able to bring out all phases of the situation. The meetings are all public and open to the press and stenographic reports are taken of all evidence and cross-examination.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Next I read from the Toronto Financial Post of January 20, 1928:

> It is undoubtedly a considerable improvement upon the former system, under which the Finance minister wasted most of his time listening to isolated and prejudiced pleas for tariff changes, and succeeded only in getting a superficial view of the problems before him.

Then the Winnipeg Free Press of January 10, 1928:

> The value of this work canot easily be overestimated. In each case the position of the industry is examined in minute detail. Facts in regard to past financing, costs of production, efficiency of equipment, domestic and export prices, are revealed. Invariably the applications have been opposed, and opposition has aided in laying bare prevailing conditions in each industry.

The Toronto Globe of January 14, 1928, has this comment, on the tariff advisory board:

> It has held nearly one hundred hearings, has heard 41 pleas for upward revision of the tariff, others for lower tariff and sales tax adjustment; and those who have appeared before it testify to the thoroughness of its inquiries. It is not satisfied with less than a full presentation of both sides of every question, reinforced in many cases by independent investigations. Its disposition to be fair to all interested parties is conspicuous.

Then I have some comments upon the conduct of the woollen inquiry by some of those who appeared before the board. Mr. J. A. Burns, former president of the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Association, Toronto, said:

> On behalf of the woollen manufacturers I would like to express our deep appreciation of the fair manner in which this investigation has been conducted.

From Mr. J. H. Shaw, manufacturers' agent in Montreal—and Mr. Shaw, by the way, not only represents the Canadian industry but is an importer—there comes the following:

> Might I associate myself and my confreres with the expression of appreciation just given by Mr. Burns?

Then we have Mr. Hodgson of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, Bradford, England:

> May I be permitted to thank you and the board on behalf of Mr. Wood and myself for the very kind way in which you have received us and for your courteous consideration to us throughout a most intricate hearing.

I put this on record in justice to the board to show that there has been a full and fair enquiry. I am not sure that we can make much progress to-night but we have had a pretty full debate. I should like to meet my hon. friend from South Wellington, whose position I can appreciate. I fancy that if I had a woollen industry in my county which was the only one in Canada I should feel pretty much as he does. Unfortunately, however, parliament must look to the country as a whole and consider every phase of industry, and while the Guelph Worsted Spinning Mill may not be helped it is believed, after a full inquiry, that the industry generally will benefit. It is true, as my hon. friend has said, that the company is selling most of its products to Oriental Textiles—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not most; about a third.

Mr. ROBB: Well, they sell a good deal to Oriental Textiles, and if there is a mill in Canada that might complain of Britishers coming before our tariff board it is not the Guelph mill, because I am advised that the owner of that mill is a gentleman who resides in England, coming here occasionally to look after the concern.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He is part owner.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I have great sympathy with my hon. friend's argument, but this gentleman lives in England all the time and he is not in a position to attack others who appear before the board.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): That is not the only mill.

Mr. ROBB: There may be other mills.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): The mills altogether are affected to the extent of 40 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Many of the other mills are equipped with spinning machinery for their own mills; they will not be in a worse position.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): They not only spin for their own mills but they sell to other concerns such as the York mills.

Mr. ROBB: The importations have been considerable—

Mr. CANTLEY: Does not the minister think that it would be better to have one hundred English gentlemen rather than one invest here?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and that is what we are trying to do. The press this morning states that a mill will be established in Victoria, British Columbia, not only because of the change in the tariff but because of reduction of taxation in Canada.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will that gentleman live in the old country?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know, but his own statement is that he is moving out. As regards the statement that the spinning departments of Canadian mills will be closed down, it is possible that they may get a slight assistance in buying yarns that they do not make.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): I would point out that the dyeing department will also be affected, as many of these yarns are two strand, of different colours.

Mr. ROBB: As regards the worsted cloth mills, there are nine without spinning plants, including plush and haircloth. These plants are: Oriental Textiles, La France Textiles, Canada Haircloth, Dominion Haircloth, Demetre Sault Ciriez, Dupont Textiles, Lockwoods Limited, Roxborough Textiles, Sykes & Taylor. I am told that these mills are unanimously in favour of the change. Those mills equipped with spinning plants are Paton, Canada Woollens, Rosamond and Forbes. Those who have gone carefully into the matter inform me that for every dollar in loss—if there is any loss—and every man put out of employment, there will be two dollars in profit and two men employed. The argument has been advanced to-night that the woollen industry has not been over prosperous. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Anderson) quoted figures to show that in recent years there has been an increase in imports of woollen manufactured fabrics; but when you compare that statement with the statement I put on Hansard a few days ago, showing a considerable increase in the imports of wool, it seems to me that there is not very good ground for the allegation that Canada is not growing. If the country is not growing then the people living here are wearing more and better clothes, because there are more imports coming in both in wool and in finished products.

The tariff board, in considering how they could best help the industry—and everyone desires to help it—had two ways open to them: they could either put up the duty on the finished product or give a concession on the raw material required for the industry. They took the latter course and I believe it is sound. The people of Canada will be more inclined to endorse a policy of reducing the cost of production, making the goods for our people cheaper and better, than to adopt the policy of the United States of raising the tariff as high as Haman's gallows. We have the experience of the United States before us. Within recent years, since their high tariff has been put up, fifty-eight mills have closed down there, and we know of one of the largest and best woollen mills in that country which has not paid dividends for the last two years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is one phase of the matter that has not been discussed. The mills will now obtain free machinery?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister considered the question of compensation to those mills that have paid large sums in duty into the treasury? I ask this question having regard to the elaborate statement of the Prime Minister, in speaking on the budget, with reference to the sales tax; he could not remove it because it would be unfair to those who had paid. Will the same principle apply to these mills in respect of their machinery on which they have paid duty?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has been a long time in parliament and he knows that duties that have been paid have never been refunded. This government is not yet through trying to settle the claim made by the automobile dealers in connection with the reduction of taxes made by a government of which my hon. friend was a supporter. That, I think, should satisfy him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You should have had that cleaned up long ago.

Progress reported.

Friday, March 23, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Marcil.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, 16th April next, and all subsequent Mondays and Wednesdays until the end of the session government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except questions and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRANTS FROM SOUTHEAST EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Immigration to press reports which state that between four and five hundred new immigrants from southeast Europe are being sent into the prairie provinces, and I shall be glad to receive an assurance from him that there will be no flooding of the labour market in western cities such as occurred last year.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Every effort has been made to prevent such a thing taking place. If, despite our efforts it does happen I shall be glad to have the matter brought to my attention.

ADDITIONS TO NATIONAL PARKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to inquire of the Minister of the Interior what credence is to be attached to reports in the newspapers this morning that portions of the rest of the public domain in British Columbia are being attached to the parks department of Canada for administrative and other purposes.

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): There are two sections of British Columbia we are anxious to obtain if we can by agreement with the government of that province, namely, Mount Robson and Mount Assiniboia. In the cases of Mount Assiniboia the area is 20 square miles and in the case of Mount Robson, 840 square miles. The deputy minister of the department is in British Columbia at the moment seeing if it is possible to make the necessary arrangement. As these two areas are notable for their scenic beauty and lie adjacent to our present parks, Banff and Jasper, we are anxious to obtain them.

REVALUATION OF SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I have a communication from a returned soldiers organization and with respect to it I wish to ask a question of the minister who has to deal with soldier settlement. If a returned soldier, after applying for revaluation, has been turned down by the provincial commission, can he appeal his case, and, if so, to whom?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The appeal must be made to the exchequer court.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The hon. member for St.

Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) made inquiry yesterday with reference to the return containing copies of documents relating to the diversion of water at Chicago. I am informed upon inquiry that it will not be possible to bring down the papers until the middle of next week.

THE McCONACHIE CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): May I ask the Minister of Immigration if any effort is being made to admit to this country the wife and child of a domiciled Canadian citizen? The Minister of Immigration knows to whom I am referring; it is McConachie.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know of any Canadian citizen that is in trouble in that connection.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose we were discussing the following:

Customs tariff—549. Wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not further prepared than combed: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Last night the committee had this matter under consideration. As a matter of fact the discussion in connection with the woollen industry, as in the case of the previous schedule dealing with cottons, was of a rather general character. This is made necessary by the fact that amendments to one item necessarily affect other items. The minister, however, during the closing moments of yesterday's sitting gave utterance to certain views which I think merit attention and, indeed, demand some consideration from us. I wish to deal with some of the things which the minister said last night, and to invite his attention once more to the damage to the woollen industry of Canada which undoubtedly will result in consequence of his action under this budget.

Now, one of the points emphasized by the minister last night was that our woollen industry was not necessarily suffering very much, and indeed if it was suffering, he attempted to offset the seriousness of its condition by suggesting that the woollen industry in the United States was also suffering; therefore we should not complain. I must say that I have no sympathy whatever with that sort of argument. It is pretty hard, Mr. Chairman, to discuss this subject if the whole house is going to carry on conversations.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: The point at issue between the Minister of Finance and ourselves is whether or not the measures immediately before the committee are going adversely to affect Canadian industry, particularly at this moment the woollen industry. I noticed that in one of his observations when answering an interjection by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the minister said:

I am glad to have that statement from my hon. friend.

That is, that we were not asking that the woollen schedule should be raised, as high as the United States tariff.

It has been argued here that we would improve the condition of the woollen industry in Canada by putting a duty on wool.

This is one of the minister's characteristic statements. When he finds himself confronted with an argument that is not answerable, he seeks to evade the issue by suggesting that we are asking for something that is unreasonable and neither in the interests of the people of Canada nor of the country's industrial development. Our point is this, Mr. Chairman, and we are not going to allow the minister to becloud the issue in the public mind. We submit that the woollen industry is a basic industry, that it must be recognized as an industry indigenous to Canada, and must receive such consideration as will place it upon a healthy and prosperous basis.

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to this distinction between the woollen industry and the cotton industry. Let it be understood that I am not attacking the cotton industry in making this distinction. The cotton industry must necessarily depend entirely upon imported raw materials; we grow no cotton. But Canada by reason of its climate and the physical nature of the country is peculiarly suited to the development of the woollen industry. With the exception perhaps of some of the finer wools furnished by Spain and Australia, we can produce wool of excellent quality suitable for almost every branch—I want that to be noted—suitable for almost every branch of the woollen trade. But what is of far more importance, Canada must continue to be a heavy consumer of wool. It does not matter what artificial silks or other new products may be introduced, they will compete far more with cotton than with wool; but by reason of our climatic conditions we must be a wool-using people, and the larger our population grows and the more our country develops, the greater will be the demand for woollen goods. Furthermore—it is so obvious that it scarcely needs to be mentioned—during the past years furs have played a very large part in the winter clothing of our people in the colder sections of the Dominion; but furs are getting more expensive and scarcer year by year, and consequently we are depending more upon woollens than ever before to protect us during the winter season. I emphasize that. There is no parallel between the cotton and woollen industries; the latter is an industry indigenous to this country.

My second point is that the cotton industry is very largely controlled by a few large concerns. This is peculiar to the industry—and quite proper; I have no fault to find with it. But the woollen industry in Canada has been established for over a hundred years, it is scattered throughout the Dominion, and is based on the principle of individual factories rather than large concerns as in the cotton industry. In other words, it is an individual rather than a trust or combination business. It might be wise, Mr. Chairman, to bring about an amalgamation of some of our woollen concerns and place them on a larger producing basis, but that is an economic question that does not enter into a consideration of this tariff. The point is that during the last century we have established a large number of individual woollen factories, built up by Canadian enterprise, and these individual industries are being jeopardized by the tariff revision immediately before us.

I think I might summarize very briefly the attitude of the minister or of the government towards the cotton industry and the woollen industry. In respect of the cotton industry it is a policy of deceit; in respect of the woollen industry, a policy of destruction. Referring again to the artificial silk industry, this does not enter into competition with the woollen industry to anything like the degree that it does with the cotton industry; and where artificial silk does affect woollen goods it is only those finer and higher classes upon which a duty might very properly be imposed, and which might be classified almost as luxuries. But the ordinary woollen goods worn by the ordinary citizen year in and year out are of a character not brought into competition with artificial silk at all.

My hon. friend the minister made reference to the United States. He quoted the duties imposed in the United States, which are very high, and in order to impress them on the minds of the committee I might indicate what they are; they are well worth considering. The duties imposed in the United States are exceptionally high as compared with our own. They are as follows:

> Woven fabrics, weighing more than four ounces per square yard, wholly or in chief value of wool, valued at not more than 60 cents per pound, 24 cents per pound and 40 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than 60 cents but not more than 80 cents per pound, 37 cents per pound and 50 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than 80 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound, 45 cents per pound upon the wool content thereof and 50 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 45 cents per pound upon the wool content thereof, and 50 per centum ad valorem.

I wonder if the committee realizes the extent of these duties imposed by the United States. Then take blankets and similar articles. The duties are as follows:

> Blankets and similar articles, including carriage and automobile robes and steamer rugs, made of blanketing, wholly or in chief value of wool, not exceeding three yards in length, valued at not more than 50 cents per pound, 18 cents per pound and 30 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than 50 cents but not more than $1 per pound, 27 cents per pound, and 32½ per centum ad valorem; valued at more than $1 but not more than $1.50 per pound, 30 cents per pound and 35 per centum ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per pound, 37 cents per pound and 40 per centum ad valorem.

That is the duty on woollen blankets, that is, blankets made of wool, or partly of wool. It will be observed that the duty in the United States is altogether beyond anything that we have ever suggested should be imposed in Canada. I have not checked the figures, but I venture the statement that they are perhaps two, three or four times as much as the corresponding items in our tariff. The minister said last night: I suppose my hon. friends opposite want us to put on a tariff as high as that of the United States. We have made no such suggestion, Mr. Chairman. What we are asking for, as I have already indicated, is an adjustment of the tariff that will permit the Canadian industry to be maintained in a condition of real prosperity in Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: To enable them to live.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it has indeed come to that, that some of them are asking merely for the privilege of continuing their existence in Canada. I continue this brief examination of the United States condition, and in checking up the United States government returns, at pages 624 and 625, I find that they had a production of raw wool, in 1926, of 269,000,000 pounds, and imports of 299,000,000 pounds; that is, they imported approximately the same amount as they produced. But their imports of manufactured wool were 37,000 long tons, or about 82,000,000 pounds valued at $70,000,000. I ask the committee to consider this point for a moment. The United States imported woollen manufactured goods at the rate of 60 cents per capita—$70,000,000 worth as against 120,000,000 people, while in Canada, which is more a wool using country, we imported $40,000,000 of manufactured woollen goods, or at the rate of $3.50 per capita, or about six times as much per capita as the United States. It may be said that there is no argument in that, but the point I want to make is this: The minister suggested that the woollen industry in the United States was not flourishing because it had a high tariff. That was his implication, but I do not think it is his opinion. It was just that kind of general statement used frequently by those who argue for free trade to prejudice the public mind against the principle of protection. That is all it was, and that is all it was intended to do. But the facts belie his statement.

The United States, as I have already indicated, use in the production of woollen goods some 568,000,000 pounds of wool; that is their total consumption of wool used in manufacturing. They export only 14,000,000 pounds out of 568,000,000 pounds that they use in manufacturing; so practically all the wool they import and almost all the wool they grow they use in their own factories. Their importations are only 82,000,000 pounds, or about 12 per cent of the total amount of their production. So it will readily be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the United States is virtually self-contained so far as the woollen industry is concerned. They have built up a strong, virile industry there which is being maintained, and which is serving the needs of the people.

Now I wish to turn to another point in the minister's speech. He referred in a very casual way to the question of wages as if that were a subject of no importance. I am not going to go over the arguments that have already been presented as to what a very small factor, after all, is the duty so far as the internal production of woollen goods is concerned. For instance, I think my hon. friend from South Wellington demonstrated that most excellently last night when he showed that the amount of the duty on a suit of clothes costing from fifty to sixty dollars was between fifty and sixty cents. That would be the effect of the duty, so it does not influence the consumer, but what is its effect upon the worker? My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre yesterday made a statement which impressed me very much. He said that if the workers of Canada could be persuaded that they were receiving any benefit from the imposition of a duty upon the manufactured article, they would support the imposition of such a duty, or words to that effect. The minister gave us some figures last night which were very interesting, and which I think ought to be considered very carefully by this house. Comparing wages, and taking Great Britain at the figure of 100, he said that the wages in France would represent 50, Italy 40, and Canada 160, as compared with 100 in Great Britain.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the hon. gentleman's interpretation of those figures?

Mr. STEVENS: I am using the minister's figures, although last year I gave an exact comparison of the actual wages paid in Great Britain, France, Germany and Canada. But I am using the minister's own figures, and an interpretation of those figures I think would show this, that in Canada we have to pay four times as much in wages per diem as they do in Italy, over three times as much as they do in France, and over 160 per cent of the wages paid in England. Now I ask my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre to give this thought consideraton. Before the manufacturer gets one atom of protection, you must give him a protection that will bridge the difference between those wages, that is, in so far as the wage content of cloth is concerned. Now the wage content of manufactured cloth, I am informed, is 55 per cent of the value of the cloth.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it not true that figures were presented to the tariff board showing that protection was granted equivalent to the entire wage bill?

Mr. STEVENS: We are unfortunately at a disadvantage in not having the evidence indexed and before us in proper form, but I recall the time when the presentation was made. I believe it was made by Mr. Deachman.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have the figures here.

Mr. STEVENS: I have on two separate occasions carefully analyzed these wage figures based upon the data and statistics supplied me by the Labour department of Canada. Speaking from memory I may say that the result of my deductions indicated that the difference was almost double so far as Great Britain is concerned, about three times so far as France and Italy are concerned, and with a similar difference as regards Germany.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: By reason of the lower cost of living in those countries, is not the nominal wage really higher than it seems?

Mr. STEVENS: That does not enter into this point. I know what my hon. friend has in mind and in some respects his argument is sound, but it does not apply here. The figures I compared were the actual wages paid in Great Britain, Germany, France and Italy and the actual wages paid in Canada for the same work. I gave the figures last year and they are all on Hansard. And they were taken from the Labour department's own statistics. I am now taking the statement presented yesterday by the Minister of Finance, and now I submit to the minister that it is his obvious duty, if he is to do the right thing by Canadian workmen, to impose a tariff under the woollen schedules, equal to the difference between the wage scale in Canada and the wage scale in Great Britain, France, Italy and Germany, before he gives the manufacturer any protection at all. The position is inescapable. Let us for the moment leave aside what that difference is. I do insist, however, that it is the minister's duty, if he is to protect Canadian workmen—leaving the manufacturer out of it altogether for the time being—to impose a duty equal to the difference between the wage scale in Canada and those in other countries.

Mr. HEAPS: Does my hon. friend not think that he ought to take into consideration all the various factors that enter into the cost of production in Great Britain and which are higher than in Canada? Take the item of taxation, for instance, and various forms of insurance which have not to be paid over here.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not objecting to that. Let me point out, however, that the cost of building in Canada as well as the cost of heating is very much higher than it is in England.

Mr. HEAPS: What about the income tax?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the income tax is fairly onerous here too, although it is not so severe as it is in England. But I am not disputing the point; I simply suggest that we stick to the question under discussion for the moment. So far as wages are concerned, we have a right to do justice to our Canadian workmen and to impose a protection on the manufactured articles equal to the difference between Canadian wages and wages paid in other countries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Wages constitute only one of the factors in the cost of production, and if other costs in Great Britain are higher than they are here surely the hon. gentleman cannot ignore them in his computation.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not disregarding them, and my hon. friend's position is sound. But I do not admit that the costs in other directions are generally higher in Great Britain than they are here. My own impression is that the costs there are lower, although their income tax exceeds ours. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I question whether their corporation income tax is higher than ours.

Mr. HEAPS: What about local taxation in Great Britain?

Mr. STEVENS: Local rates in Great Britain are not, in my opinion, a bit higher than ordinary municipal rates in Canada. As a matter of fact, you can follow the general ratio of costs in Great Britain as compared with Canada and you will find that capital in Great Britain is cheaper than it is in this country. No one will dispute that. And that is a big factor. Then take taxes and insurance. There is no appreciable difference between the two countries; if anything, the insurance rates would be higher in Canada because of the general use of wooden buildings as compared with stone and brick construction in the old country. In Canada, again, we have a dual taxation imposed in many of the provinces both by the provinces and by the federal authorities, and it is higher than the corporation income tax in Great Britain. Personal income tax is a different matter; it does not enter into consideration until you have earned profit and paid it to the individual. So that personal income tax is not a factor; it must be eliminated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member, I take it, would apply that principle fairly to all industry?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no objection to the application of it generally.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then the next question is, would he apply it to the farming industry and allow the farmers the total cost of labour in the form of a bonus?

Mr. STEVENS: I am prepared to discuss that question on its merits and in its proper place. I have certain views which I might be induced to express on the subject some day. The committee, however, has before it a practical issue. We are not discussing any general theory of economics; what we are considering is whether we shall do so and so with a given industry. I was discussing the question of building costs. The cost of heating factories in Canada, the cost of building a structure capable of being heated, is certainly much higher than it is in Great Britain. Parenthetically I may observe this: One reason why industry is developing on the Pacific coast of Canada and the United States —and there is a new development there—is the fact that climatic conditions are such that the overhead in relation to heating and the cost of structures is less than it is in the central portions of Canada and the United States where the climate is cold. So that on a fair analysis of cost figures it will be found that the British, French and Italian woollen mills have a distinct advantage over Canada. Now I return to the question of wages.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon gentleman consider the question of over-capitalization that prevails in this country watered stock, and so forth?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is introducing a question which is certainly a fair subject of debate. But in fixing the rates of duty the tariff board could very well ignore any question of over-capitalization; indeed, they would have to do so if they did their duty. I am not here advocating the practice of watering stock, but I may say that companies that have been established, as many of our Canadian woollen industries have been established, for a hundred years, and which have constantly turned back their profits into the business, are entitled to stock issue for these returns to the business. As an hon. member reminds me, we are now dealing with the question of costs of production and not with that of watered stock. I agree with my hon. friend that if there is undue inflation of capital, that fact ought to be ignored in the fixation of the duty. Let me, however, finish my rather disjointed argument on the question of wages. The minister cited it himself and I say to him and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that before the manufacturer receives one atom of protection, you must impose a duty equal to the difference between wages here and wages in other countries that are competing with us.

Mr. WARD: What percentage of woollen goods consumed in Canada is imported from Italy?

Mr. STEVENS: I have the figures with me but I do not think my hon. friend desires me to check them up.

Mr. WARD: I think it is very important. The hon. member has endeavoured to impress upon the house the necessity for a balancing as between duties imposed and wages paid between the two different countries. If he is going to give Italy as an example he should give to the house the benefit of the imports.

Mr. STEVENS: If this is any comfort to my hon. friend, I am willing to eliminate all other countries than Great Britain which is the country from which we import the major portion of our woollen goods. We can thus eliminate Italy, France and Germany. All these countries do supply us with some woollen goods, the exact amount of which I have not in mind, but the preponderance of imports comes from Great Britain, and we can stick to Great Britain for all the practical purposes of this issue. I want to carry this wage question one step further. According to a well-established principle in the manufacture of woollen goods, fifty-five per cent is claimed to be represented in wages. That, I think, is a fair proportion. In that case, if we take the difference between wages in Canada and wages in Great Britain, it would be a simple matter to determine what amount of duty should be imposed in order first of all to protect the Canadian workman without giving any protection whatever to the manufacturers. That rate would be something in the neighbourhood of 22 per cent or 23 per cent.

I turn to one of these items. The minister under item 551b eliminates a duty of 12½ per cent on yarns and warps and he puts them on the free list. The committee ought clearly to understand what we are doing in this regard. We are giving a distinct advantage to one factory, a factory which is in the riding of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser); but it is rather significant—and I make this merely as a statement of fact without conveying any impression other than the fact itself conveys—that this factory is located in the riding contested by the chairman of the tariff advisory board, a riding which he purposes contesting again. The house ought to know this fact and they can put on it whatever construction they like. The point is this, that one factory is benefited and since this revision has been made, I am informed that they have already cancelled their orders for these yarns to other factories from whom they have been buying these yarns during recent years. These are worsted yarns which are used in the manufacture of plush. I presume the plush is used in upholstering automobiles and so on, these yarns being used as the foundation upon which these plush goods are built up. The question which this house must decide is whether it is doing its duty by the woollen industry of Canada in removing a duty of 12½ per cent on British imports of yarns and warps used in this way, putting them on the free list to the distinct advantage of one concern and to the ruination of a part of the business of many other concerns.

I turn to another part of the minister's speech. Last night he read to the house extracts from the press and also from statements made by certain gentlemen who appeared before the board. His whole object was to convey the impression that the press of Canada were prefectly satisfied with the tariff advisory board. He complained rather bitterly that some of us on this side, my honoured leader, myself and some others, had attacked the actions and reports of the tariff advisory board. He said himself that he was not considering the advisory board but he was using, as he said, his own common sense in the formation of this tariff. I am not going to give all the quotations which will be found on page 1628 of Hansard, but I wish to refer to them. Then I shall refer to the report itself and the committee can judge as to what bearing these quotations have upon the issue before us. The Montreal Daily Star says:

> The deliberate consideration of the merits of cases brought before the board has been in commendable contrast with the former hearings—

And so on. Then he quoted the Grain Growers' Guide, and among other things they said this:

> By thorough study of the problems before the board the representatives of these bodies are able to bring out all phases of the situation.

I ask hon. members now: Have they had facts brought before them of all phases of the situation based upon a thorough study by the board? Have they had placed before them the result of the deliberate consideration of the merits of these cases? I ask the minister to lay on the table of the house a single fact found by this board. He has not done it; he cannot do it, and yet he reads this to the house. Let us see what the next statement is. This is the Toronto Financial Post, an influential trade paper, quoted by the minister to show that he and the advisory board stood well in the eyes of the business people; that they had done their duty, and that we are captious in our criticism of the advisory board. The Toronto Financial Post of January 20, says:

> It is undoubtedly a considerable improvement upon the former system, under which the Finance minister wasted most of his time listening to isolated and prejudiced pleas for tariff changes, and succeeded only in getting a superficial view of the problems before him.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Is there a single indication that the minister has done anything other than listen to isolated pleas? Can he show the committee a single finding, a single utterance by the advisory board which has in any sense departed from the old system? He cannot do it. He may have one but he tells us he has not. He has not laid it on the table and yet he reads us this statement. The Winnipeg Free Press, one of the most influential journals in western Canada and, indeed, one of the most outstanding papers in Canada, says on January 10:

> In each case the position of the industry is examined in minute detail. Facts in regard to past financing, costs of production, efficiency of equipment, domestic and export prices, are revealed.

And so on. Where are these facts? Are they before the house? Not a single one. It may be that the facts were laid before the board and that they examined them. It may be that they understood them. They may have examined into the industry in regard to finances, as my hon. friend to my left said a moment ago; they may have examined into the cost of production and into the question of efficiency, domestic and expert, as suggested by my hon. friend, and so on. The Winnipeg Free Press says all these things have been examined into by the board, but my hon. friend directed a very intelligent question to me a moment ago, and I was unable to answer it. Why? I could not answer because these facts are not vouchsafed to the attention of the house; because the minister has not brought them down, nor has he given to the house any of the facts found by this board. Then the Toronto Globe was quoted by the minister:

> It is not satisfied with less than a full presentation of both sides of every question, reinforced in many cases by independent investigation. Its disposition to be fair to all interested parties is conspicuous.

Very good; perhaps the board were inclined to be fair; it is possible that they made independent investigations, and it may be that the evidence was reinforced by other information. It may be that a full presentation was made, but not a single fact or finding has been presented to the house, and we are twitted and taunted by the minister because we criticize his budget, without these facts or findings and in fact without even a summary of the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. My hon. friend has exhausted his forty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well. I will speak again in a few minutes, probably for another forty minutes, although I would have been through in about five minutes more.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I was extremely interested in the figures presented by my hon. friend; one of the things which struck me was his statement that with regard to woollens the wage costs were 55 per cent of the cost of production. I have here a statement made by the gentleman who represented the woollen industry before the tariff advisory board, and I may say this is one of the benefits my hon. friends might derive from the members of the Consumers' League which they derided so much the other day. Mr. Barrett stated that the total wage cost amounts to 25 per cent of the selling value of the finished article.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Was that for knitted or woven goods?

Mr. ADSHEAD: I could not say; it is for woollen goods. My hon. friend gave the cost as 55 per cent, and even if there were a difference between the two classes of goods surely it would not be so great as that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): There is that difference.

Mr. ADSHEAD: This gentleman represented the woollen industry before the tariff advisory board, and in his testimony stated that the figure of 25 per cent represented the wages plus the salaries of his company.

Mr. CHAPLIN: My hon. friend has just stated that that 25 per cent refers to the selling cost, which is very different from 25 per cent of the production cost.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But then my hon. friends ask for a tariff which would provide for the difference between the wage cost of England and the wage cost of Canada, and surely a tariff of 35 per cent represents more than that difference.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): That is the production cost in the mill, but by no means the selling cost.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In England the cost of labour represents only 15 per cent, so this tariff means that the protection afforded the industry in Canada is double the wage cost of production in England. Then, with regard to the imports of woollens, my hon. friend has stated that these amounted to $40,000,000 in 1927.

Mr. STEVENS: No, in 1926.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is quite correct, but you must take that in proportion to the total volume of trade. In 1878 we find that the imports of wollens amounted to 10 per cent of the general trade of Canada. That figure dropped in 1897 to 8 per cent and in 1927 to 5 per cent, so in 1927 our imports of woollens in relation to the total trade of Canada were less by a half than in 1878, when we introduced the national policy of protection.

Then reference was made to the difficulties in which the manufacturers find themselves. They were asked by the tariff advisory board to produce their books to show how much they were losing, but with one exception they absolutely refused to do so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): No, my hon friend is wrong there.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have the statement here.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Although I will not do so, I could name at least two mills in which they put in their own men to investigate the books.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The statement was also made before the tariff advisory board that the trouble with the woollen industry is that in many cases plants were built during the war when costs were high and production was heavy; in many cases these mills were equipped for the operation of two shifts. Now they have found themselves unable to operate and make the profits they made during the war, and they ask that the rest of Canada be especially taxed to assist them.

Mr. STEVENS: I am delighted that the new rules permit one to take a little rest in the middle of a speech. My hon. friend, as to whose honesty of purpose there can be no question, has been a little misled by the terminology of the report which he has been reading. It is obvious that when you are considering the relation of the wages paid to the cost of production you cannot do so by taking the retail selling price or the wholesale selling price of the goods. I quoted official figures which were supplied by the Department of Labour, and these I offered not on my own authority but on the authority of the statisticians of the government. I think my hon. friend was quoting from a special pleading—

Mr. ADSHEAD: I was quoting the evidence of Mr. Barrett, who represented the woollen manufacturers before the tariff advisory board.

Mr. STEVENS: The point my hon. friend made was based upon the selling price of the goods. I think he will agree after reflection that such a comparison is neither fair nor proper, so there is no use pursuing that argument further. Then, with regard to the last statement of my hon. friend that the companies would not allow investigation of their books, there is a statement contained in this report which I have not immediately under my hand, in which they declared that they were given every possible assistance by those who appeared before them, and were allowed to examine books and so on. They not only made no complaint but they refer especially to it, in the following words:

In conclusion, may we express appreciation of the effective co-operation received from those who have appeared before the board.

I think my hon. friend, in justice to those who appeared, will not be inclined to press the suggestion that they withheld information, which I think would be unfair.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The report said they would not make their books available.

Mr. STEVENS: The report does not say that, and I am sure we desire to be fair in this matter.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think it is fair to the mills to say that I have had no report from the tariff board that the mills were unwilling to give any information asked for. Indeed, I think the fact is quite to the contrary.

Mr. STEVENS: I believe it is so stated somewhere in this report. I cannot place my finger on it for the moment but I believe I quoted it the other day.

I should like to return to what I was discussing a moment ago and that is the observations of the minister last night, or the purpose that he may have had in quoting certain statements from the press. Now I shall proceed first to refer to his quotations from the statements of gentlemen who appeared before the board. The minister said:

Then I have some comments upon the conduct of the woollen inquiry by some of those who appeared before the board. Mr. J. A. Burns, former president of the Canadian Woollen & Knit Goods Association, Toronto, said:

"On behalf of the woollen manufacturers I would like to express our deep appreciation of the fair manner in which this investigation has been conducted."

Next the minister quoted a statement by Mr. Shaw who had this to say:

Might I associate myself and my confreres with the expression of appreciation just given by Mr. Burns?

Then the minister quoted Mr. Hodgson as follows:

May I be permitted to thank you and the board on behalf of Mr. Wood and myself for the very kind way in which you have received us?

These are simply expressions of courtesy. Surely the minister does not wish us to conclude that because these gentlemen courteously thanked the board for a fair hearing, therefore this schedule—based upon the minister's own common sense without one shred of evidence, without one shred of a finding or a fact from the advisory board—is wholly approved by them? The minister read this into Hansard for the purpose of giving out to the public the impression that the woollen industry, and these gentlemen in particular, were entirely satisfied with the schedule of duties before us.

Mr. ROBB: Not at all. They were entirely satisfied with the hearing, and that is all I said.

Mr. STEVENS: That is what I have been trying to point out to the minister, not only to-day but the other day as well. The results of this hearing are somewhere, heaven knows where, perhaps in the mind of Mr. Moore—

Mr. ROBB: They are before the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: There is not one fact or result before the committee, not a single finding not a single comment—not one. That is what we are complaining of. To my mind this house ought to go on record as censuring the board for dereliction of duty in presenting this report. Here is what the board say and the report speaks for itself:

Moreover, the transcripts contain the arguments of the applicants and their opponents, which, in our opinion, cannot be satisfactorily summarized, and after mature deliberation we have concluded that to attempt a summary would be not only unfair to those who have argued before the board, but as well would render to you and to parliament an incomplete service. The obvious intent of argument—

I wish the committee particularly to note this:

The obvious intent of argument is to influence those who have authority over the matter under discussion.

Thus it is that we have deemed it our duty to pass on to you the transcripts containing the records of our public proceedings, with only explanatory comment.

I have been unable to find any explanatory comments. They may be scattered through a mass of evidence unassimilated, undigested and unindexed, without comment, not brought into juxtaposition one with the other, but scattered—part of a hearing to-day and the balance of the hearing two weeks hence—and then we are asked to go through all that evidence, bring one part and correlate it to another, and make up our minds as to what was presented. The board has been organized for two years, and Mr Moore has been sitting for more than a year, day in and day out, hearing witnesses, able to judge of their veracity and their capacity, and yet he does not vouchsafe one atom of advice or comment to this parliament. That is what I complain of, and I complain of the action of the minister in putting on Hansard, extracts from the press and the comments of certain gentlemen, and now trying to say to this house if we would permit him: This is the evidence that these people have had a fair hearing, and that they are perfectly satisfied with the findings. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that this house ought to censure the board, or as an alternative, censure the government, for they are responsible for the board's action, for presenting to the house a report as barren of information as this report is. I am not going to say any more on that at present.

I conclude with the observation, that as far as the woollen schedules of the present tariff are concerned, they bear every evidence of ruin for a number of factories, if not for the whole industry. Here is a factory which, we will say, has one half of its capital wrapped up in the spinning of yarn and the other half devoted to the purchase of machines for the utilization of these yarns. The effect of this clause to which I have referred will be to put out of business that part of the factory which is spinning yarns and allow the other half to continue operating. Does anyone presume to suggest that this, for a time at least, will not spell ruin to that industry? It means that the industry must convert its capital, its investment and its machinery into some other use and sustain the loss of such conversion, whatever it may be. I therefore impress upon the minister the seriousness of his action, and even yet hope that he may see his way clear to remedy this injustice which is being done to this industry. After all, the matter is one involving the welfare not of one or two concerns but of the whole industry of the Dominion.

Mr. ROBB: Each year since 1924 I have been accused by hon. gentlemen of destroying industry, so that my hon. friend's speech is not at all new to me. To-day we are discussing, not automobiles nor agricultural implements but woollens, and as I listened to my hon. friend I tried to make up my mind just what was the object of his remarks. Was his speech intended as an attack on the board or on the chairman of the board? Was it intended as an attack on the minister or on the policy of the government?

Mr. STEVENS: It was intended as an attack on the government.

Mr. ROBB: On the government?

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely, because the government is responsible for this action.

Mr. ROBB: I was going to give my hon. friend another guess. I was wondering whether his speech was an attempt to prevent the woollen manufacturer, who yesterday announced that he intended establishing in Victoria, from coming over and locating.

Mr. STEVENS: It just happens that I met that gentleman when in the old country recently.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must have persuaded him to come.

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I was glad to hear that he was coming. It may be interesting to point out that before coming he received a guarantee from the city of Victoria of the bonds of the company to the extent of $125,000, and in the second place a concession of free water—which is a very important factor in the cost of manufacturing woollen goods—to the extent of 200,000 gallons per month. With these inducements he has come and I am exceedingsly glad that he has done so. In addition to this he will receive twenty-seven acres of land free of taxation.

Mr. ROBB: That does not enter into it.

Mr. STEVENS: I would consider it a fair factor.

Mr. ROBB: Everyone knows that towns and cities throughout Canada vie with each other in offering inducements to industries to establish in their midst. My hon. friend has at least made it clear that he is advocating some higher tariff for the woollen industry. He does not say how high, but I am not doing him an injustice when I say he is advocating a higher tariff for the industry.

Mr. STEVENS: I will never run away from that.

Mr. ROBB: The inference is made that this government is responsible for having so reduced tariffs as to injure the woollen industry. I have before me the brief which the woollen industry themselves presented to the tariff board. This is their own brief, their own statement. They claim that:

> Wool manufacturing has been declining steadily in Canada since 1897, with the exception of two or three war years when importations of manufactured goods from abroad were largely shut off and when orders for woollen goods were sold to other countries——and when they had the great business they had at home.

I am not going to go through their arguments for higher tariffs; but when they come to the question of what governments have done to injure them, they make this statement which will be found on page 12 of their brief presented to the tariff board on the 1st February, 1927:

In 1919 there was a reduction of five per cent in the duties on goods imported from Great Britain—

This government was not in office in 1919. We are not responsible for reducing that tariff by five per cent.

—and in May, 1920, a reduction of 7½ per cent on goods imported from foreign countries.

Mr. STEVENS: That was the war tax which was taken off. There was a war tax, a horizontal tax, imposed on everything and at the conclusion of the war it was taken off everything.

Mr. ROBB: The point I am making is that at that time the people of Canada were united. The government was not a Conservative government. I am not blaming, nor am I giving them credit for this. We had in office at that time a Union government and it was the policy of the country that we should reduce duties on woollens.

Mr. HEAPS: The only excuse I have for rising now and detaining the committee for a moment or two is that last night and this afternoon we have heard two new principles enunciated by the Conservative party. Last night we had the idea of the economic independence of Canada and to-day we have had enunciated by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the principle that protection is for the purpose of conserving the standard of living for the workers in this Dominion.

Mr. STEVENS: As a matter of fact we have always contended that as one of the main principles and reasons of protection.

Mr. HEAPS: The only regret I have to make is that it has not worked out in practice.

Mr. STEVENS: It has not had much of an opportunity.

Mr. HEAPS: I will come down to facts if the hon. gentleman wants them. A year ago last October I was in the city of Vancouver, right in the constituency of my hon. friend and I happened to meet some manufacturers of woollen goods who came to me and said that they wanted more protection for their industry. I asked them where their main competition came from and against whom they would like to be protected. The answer was: Eastern Canada. I should like to know how you can protect those manufacturers of knitted and woollen goods in British Columbia against what they term cheap importations from the eastern part of the Dominion. They complain about the low wages paid in the east. I have heard manufacturers in the city of Winnipeg complaining about competition from Montreal on account of the low wages paid to the women engaged in industry in that particular city. Protection has given no benefit to those large manufacturing centres in eastern Canada, because if protection did protect the worker, why is it necessary to have in those provinces minimum wage acts? Why is it necessary at the present time in Quebec for a commission to inquire into the question of minimum wages for girls working in the textile industry and various other industries in that province?

The hon. member also enunciated the theory that because wages are lower in Great Britain than they are in Canada, we should have some protection given to the manufacturer here against the lower wages of Great Britain and, I believe, Italy as well. What is the hon. member going to ask us to do when the competition comes from a country where wages are higher than in Canada? What about importations from the United States? I have been in this house for just three sessions, but during that time I have heard members of the Conservative party say: Look at the United States; look at the high wages they are paying there. If the United States are paying higher wages than Canada, then according to all logical reasoning we ought to cut off the tariff entirely against goods coming from the United States. I do not however suppose the hon. gentlemen will for a moment suggest doing anything of that kind because the main competition is not so much on goods from Great Britain as from the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: Not on the woollen tariff schedule.

Mr. HEAPS: I was going to make that reservation. There again I was rather surprised to see the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as well as the leader of the opposition make the observations they did on this question. Hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party are the ones who talk most about patriotism, about imperial unity, about the greatness of the empire. This is their stock-in-trade especially at election time. If that is the case, why this outcry against the British manufacturer? Why did they almost tell us last night that they did not want him here at all? They are willing to allow his capital to enter but not his goods. I want to go a little further than that. The British people are the best customers that Canada has, and if you are going to refuse to buy anything from Great Britain, Great Britain on the other hand might say to Canada: We refuse to buy anything from you. In that case Canada would suffer a great deal more than Great Britain, because Canada finds her best customer in Great Britain, that nation being by far the largest importer of our farm products. International trade is international barter and you cannot sell goods to a country without taking other goods from it in return. If you close the markets of Canada to Great Britain, the next thing that will happen will be that Great Britain will be bound in self defence to trade with those people who are willing to buy the goods that she herself manufactures. You cannot escape the logic of that particular economic argument. That may not be in line with the idea of economic independence. But I want to go a little further. No country to-day can be economically independent—

Mr. KENNEDY: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. HEAPS: That is that we should buy nothing from another country but sell everything to it. That cannot be done. I believe the greatest punishment a nation can impose unon another is to establish a blockade against it. In the past few years we have had examples of this. When a nation has been unfriendly to another nation it has endeavoured to compel that nation to become economically independent by blockading its ports. That is punishment one nation has inflicted on another for doing something of an unfriendly character. I do not think the Conservative party are doing themselves credit, or doing any good to the cause of closer imperial relations by taking the attitude they have on this particular question. I should like to see Canadian goods consumed in Canada as much as possible. I want to give protection to the workers in this country. Where there are lower standards of living in other countries than there are in Canada, the manufacturers are entitled to protection against imposing a lower standard of wages on the workers. The statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is one to which I entirely subscribe. It is unfortunately true that the protection that has been given in the Dominion of Canada has not in the least degree given any protection to the worker; the protection has been entirely a benefit to the manufacturer. When the workers get a certain amount of protection, you will find that they will take the attitude that the workmen do in Australia, where they are for protection, but the first protection given in Australia is not for the manufacturer, but for the work people engaged in industry. I have made these few observations on account of these two new ideas enunciated by the Conservative party last night and to-day. This idea of economic independence to me is one which it is impossible to carry out, and if it were attempted to be carried out, it would mean economic stagnation in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to say a few words on this matter, and my remarks will very largely take the form of questions addressed to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I do not admit the right of any government to place a tariff on any goods whatsoever to be consumed at home, but if there is an industry essential to the welfare of this country which is seeking protection, then I think that that industry should be willing to lay its books on the table and let us see its profits, and whether or not it is over-capitalized. If it seeks protection, we should know the reason why.

But suppose, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre states, that the actual wages paid here are much higher than the wages paid in European countries. That is a handicap to the manufacturer, I admit, but who does the hon. gentleman suggest should shoulder that difference? What industry is there in Canada to-day that is so prosperous that it can shoulder the difference? The hon. gentleman has overlooked the facts as they are. Perhaps he will answer that question yet. He says that it is the duty of the government to grant as much protection as will cover that difference. Upon whom will the burden fall? I have said before in this house, and I repeat it now, that those who advocate protection in Canada will never know what protection means until the farmer is placed in such a position that he can charge a price for his product sold in the home market that will give him a profit over the whole of his production whether sold at home or abroad, and when he is in a position to do that, he will be doing exactly the thing which the protected manufacturer is now doing. In what way does my hon. friend think the primary producer can overcome that same difficulty regarding wages? How does he think that we who have to compete against the cheap labour of the world, of Europe, Asia and other countries, can overcome that same difficulty in wages? Is the agricultural industry so prosperous that it can shoulder the difference? I say that it is not, and because of the protective system in Canada to-day we are losing farmers continually from the land. We are in less numbers in Saskatchewan to-day than we were five years ago, despite all the immigration that has come in there. The handicap of wages is due to the very system that my hon. friend himself is advocating, which handicaps even the class that is to shoulder the burden which he would thus increase. But not only has the farmer borne the burden of protection for all the other industries to manufacture in Canada for the Canadian market, but the protected manufacturer has used the trade penalties to charge the home consumer a price that gives him a profit over the whole of his output whether sold at home or abroad. I can name industries that have done that, the steel industry, in particular, and I can mention other industries to prove the case. I wonder, when a revision of the tariff is taking place now to an extent that we have not seen for some years, why hon. gentlemen will not face the facts as they are. Does the hon. member for Vancouver Centre believe that the agricultural industry can shoulder this extra burden now? Does he know anything about agriculture?

Mr. STEVENS: I surely do. I spent my boyhood in it.

Mr. EVANS: Is the hon. gentleman engaged in that industry? On what other industry would he place this extra burden, if not on agriculture? The prices that the agriculturist has to pay to-day are far in excess of those paid in any other country with which we have to compete, and they are raised out of line with other countries of the world through the protective system increasing the cost of living. I would draw the minister's attention to this one fact, that the twine industry to-day is doing very well. It gets its raw material free, and there is no duty on its finished product. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the wages paid in the twine industry in Canada are the same wages that are paid in Belfast? No. The twine industry is doing very well, even after having to shoulder the burden of increased wages in a protected country. Why cannot the woollen industry do the same? It should be a maxim to be followed in this country that when raw material is placed on the free list for the manufacturer, his finished product should also be on the free list.

[Mr. Evans.]

Since this discussion began, no proof has been given that the woollen manufacturers are in a bad way. No auditor's name has been quoted. The books of none of these companies have been laid on the table, nor even before the tariff board.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): The hon. member stated that the books have not been opened to audit. That is quite untrue. The books have been audited in many cases by the auditor, but it is quite obvious that a manufacturer will not make public his business for the benefit of his competitor. But the tariff board has that information; the Minister of Finance has said so.

Mr. EVANS: I have not seen their books, and the tariff board has not seen them.

Mr. ROBB: The accountants representing the tariff board have seen them, and the books have never been refused in any case where they were asked for.

Mr. EVANS: Before this house should be asked to give them protection, we should know exactly how they stand.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is not the fact that so many firms have gone out of business after having been in business for forty or fifty years sufficient evidence for my hon. friend? What more evidence does he want?

Mr. EVANS: I do not know why they are out of business, but I would think it was because of incompetency in their methods and lack of up-to-date machinery.

Mr. McGIBBON: They ought to engage the hon. gentleman as general manager.

Mr. EVANS: Whenever the farmer complains, we are told in this house that he is behind the times and that he should adopt modern methods. I say the same with respect to other industries. Most of the finished articles in the woollen schedules carry a duty of 35 per cent. That is an import penalty, and yet the protectionist advocates would blindly increase the burden on the class to which they are looking for the home market. Is it reasonable? But I have never yet heard from any hon. gentleman in this house a logical argument for protection. Protection kills itself in the end; it works against industry, no matter how high the tariff. Strange to say, to-day the British manufacturer can get over the tariff wall of any country just as easy as he can get into a free trade country. But where the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) falls flat is in the fact that he has begged for protection against countries paying a lower wage than obtains in Canada. Yet he himself has been an advocate in this house for protection against the United States because of the higher wages there. How can he reconcile those two statements? How inconsistent the argument for protection has always been.

If the woollen industry of the Dominion is suffering from a lack of protection, I ask again, how is it that our woollen manufacturers can compete in countries, against which hon. gentlemen say they must be protected. Our woollen manufacturers have done very well in the export market in years gone by. Either they can compete without any protection, or else they are fleecing the home consumer by charging him a price to give them a profit on the whole output, whether sold at home or abroad. As I said last night to the minister, I take it as being only fair and reasonable, that these woollen schedules should be withdrawn for a time and be reconsidered. It is unreasonable to allow the revenue of the country to be impaired by complete free trade in raw materials when the home consumer is charged over one-third as a penalty on what he has to buy. It is unfair, it is class legislation in the worst form, and brands the government as serving only one group, comprising the capitalists and manufacturers of this country. I still wish him to explain, if he can, why this is being done at the present time. Not only in the tariff, but in the income tax also the capitalist is being relieved and a proportionately greater burden is being shifted to the working classes. Is there any British fair play in such a policy? it is unreasonable. This means placing the burden on those who are working double the hours that obtain in urban industries. Even our women and children on the farms are being discriminated against. I can take hon. gentlemen into districts where our children do not even know how to play. You are placing this burden on the sweated labour of the families now homesteading on the farms of Canada. I say again, it is unfair.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Mr. Chairman, my attention has been drawn to an error on my part. I said that the companies had refused to have their books investigated. What I intended to say was that they had refused to make their statements public, with the exception of one company. The Penman Manufacturing Company made their statement public.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, as anyone will at once admit who has given any study to economics, to frame a tariff schedule which will be fair all around, for so many things dovetail into other things that when you attempt to frame a tariff in regard to one article, you find yourself confronted with the fact that by so doing you are adversely affecting some other article closely related to it.

In regard to the woollen industry, it has always appeared to me that one of the first questions we should ask ourselves is, whether or not in a country like Canada it is advisable to encourage the sheep industry for the production of wool to be used in turn for the manufacture of woollens in the Dominion. In asking myself that question I have never been able to come to any other than one conclusion: that Canada is specially adapted, climatically and otherwise, for the raising of sheep. Therefore, it is a country where the sheep industry should be encouraged in every possible way, a country where every encouragement should be given to our farmers along that line. We should produce vast quantities of wool, and we should manufacture that wool into the finished article. I do not think it is possible for us to raise sheep as cheaply as they can be raised in Australia and New Zealand; consequently those countries can produce wool more cheaply than we can. But because of that fact are we to decide that we will go out of the sheep industry and let Australia and New Zealand supply our requirements? Hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) take that position. It is the favourite attitude of the free-trader: let that country which is best adapted to the production of any particular article supply it to other countries not so well favoured, and let the latter devote themselves to some other line that they are best adapted to produce. I do not think that is a sound position to take, nor a position which any one of us in this Dominion dare take.

It has always appeared to me that the persons to be first considered in fixing a tariff schedule with respect to the woollen industry are our farmers who keep sheep and produce wool; and that to give them the encouragement which they deserve there should be a duty on wool to place them in a fair position in relation to their competitors in other countries enjoying certain climatic and other advantages. That in my judgment is where we should start in fixing a tariff on wool and wool products, our first object in view being the welfare of our farmers, the producers of wool; our second object should be the welfare of our manufacturers of woollen products, they being in a secondary position to the primary producers, the farmers.

My hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Evans) said that he has never heard a sound argument for protection. Of course, I cannot agree with him. I am not referring now to any arguments that I have attempted to advance in favour of protection; rather I have in mind tariff conditions in the various countries of the world. When I see their statesmen advocating protection, it seems to me that they at least are of average intelligence and capable of advancing sound arguments in favour of the protective principle. But let us take the country from which my hon. friend came; what about the Key Industries Act of the old country? What about the success which has followed the efforts of the British government in placing a comparatively high duty on the importation of automobiles? Even free-traders in England have come to the conclusion that certain industries are entitled to protection, and they are giving those industries protection. Under protection those industries are succeeding, with advantage to the working people of the old country, and with distinct advantage to the domestic consumers of the articles produced, because they are being produced under protection at a less cost than when those industries were operating under free trade. That is a situation which, I contend, strongly confirms the soundness of the protective principle.

But let me give another instance which comes right down to the question of tariff in relation to the woollen industry, the cotton industry, and so on. We have certain factories in the province of Ontario. Is it not a fact that we have in this province of Ontario a minimum wage law, under which the owners of factories are obliged to pay a minimum rate of wages to their employees? They cannot go below a certain rate paid, for instance, to girls working in their factories. The law of the land compels the manufacturer to observe a certain standard, and the wages paid under this standard are found to be double the wages paid in some industries in England to girls employed in the same kind of work there. I venture to say that there is not a member of this house, not a member of the government, who would suggest for a moment that the minimum wage law should be abolished. That being so, we are at one on the necessity for a minimum standard of wages for our workmen. As I say, the minimum wage paid to the girls in these factories in Ontario is double the wage paid for similar work done by presumably just as efficient girls in England. Now, having subscribed to that law, of compelling the manufacturers to pay a certain wage, is it not logical to afford the manufacturers here some protection against foreign manufacturers producing the same kind of goods at a very much lower cost? The question may be argued from any point of view, but I argue from the standpoint of fair play. It is not because of what one government is doing; it is because the law of the land with respect to minimum wages places a certain responsibility upon the manufacturer in this country and leaves him at a decided disadvantage in competing with the manufacturers of similar goods in the old country where wages are lower.

Mr. HEAPS: The minimum wage law applies in Ontario; does not the manufacturer in Ontario, according to my hon. friend's argument, deserve protection against low paid labour in Quebec?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The law is enforced in British Columbia too, I may say. My hon. friend's position as indicated by his question is not tenable. Within the bounds of a family there must be give and take; there is no getting away from that. You might as well say that the state of New York should impose no restrictions not acceptable to Pennsylvania, say. The fact is that the farmers of the northern states, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan are operating at a decided disadvantage in competition with the farmers in the southern states whose products are cheaper. But the northern farmers have no redress; there is no possible way of the difference being overcome. In the northern states there is a severe winter to cope with, whereas climatic conditions in the south are advantageous. But it is a very different thing when you come to put on the statute books a law intended to protect the country from unfair competition from abroad, where the people do not help to pay our taxes. Obviously we cannot pass a law in Canada prohibiting the goods manufactured in Quebec, say, from entering Ontario, or the products of some other province being shipped to any other. Nevertheless the minimum wage law exists, and I submit that in all fairness, and logically, a country such as ours, with a minimum wage law enforced in certain provinces, should give some consideration to the manufacturers who are compelled to operate under that law. The minimum wage law places them in a position of disadvantage as compared with manufacturers producing similar goods in other countries where there is no such restriction.

Mr. EVANS: What has made the minimum wage law necessary?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend must know as well as I do that the object of the law is to ensure to the workers in industrial concerns in those provinces which have adopted it, a scale of wages which will make for a decent standard of living, a standard such as we think ought to obtain in Canada. We cannot dictate to England what its standard should be; it is for England to take action in that regard. But we can say, and we do say in Canada, in certain provinces at any rate, that girls working in our factories shall receive at least such a wage as will afford them a fair chance in life; and we ought to say to England and to other countries as well, "We do not propose to let you send free into this country, to flood our markets, the products of cheap labour where the standard of living is below ours." My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) spoke about England being a great customer of Canada and suggested that we should not impose restrictions upon her goods coming into this country, seeing that she freely admits most of our products.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that. What I did say was that if we did not take in return goods shipped from Great Britain, economic factors would compel her to go into the markets of the world where British goods are bought in return.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Great Britain will buy her wheat from the Argentine, the United States, India or from any other country if she can get it cheaper there than in Canada. British statesmen are not fools; they are not throwing away money; they will not pay $5 a bushel for Canadian wheat if they can get it at $4 a bushel from other countries.

Miss MACPHAIL: Would it not be perfectly logical for us to buy our woollen goods where we could get them cheapest?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It would, perhaps, from my hon. friend's standpoint, if I can come to any conclusion as to what her politics amounts to. But we are laying down a policy for Canada and not for Great Britain, although it does seem to me that the government has been more concerned in fixing a fiscal policy in favour of the United States and other countries rather than for the benefit of the people of Canada. We are here to legislate for Canada, and I do not subscribe to the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg that because we are a part of the British Empire and because Great Britain buys freely from us, we should let down our tariff walls entirely, let our industries go to pot, and allow the goods of that country unrestricted access to our markets. The statesmen of Great Britain have laid down a policy which in their judgment is best—for whom? For Canada? Not at all; they have laid down a policy which they believe best for the people of Great Britain, and if we exercise the same common sense we will lay down a policy with as little regard for what they think as they have for what we think. We should define a policy in the best interests of the people of this country, and no statesman in the British Isles will whine about our tariff being too high for their manufactured goods; they are too good sportsmen for that. Britishers will say that Canada is exercising its rights to do what is best for the people of this country, just as they in Great Britain exercise their right in the same way. It is not a question of sentiment at all, although as a matter of fair play I would rather buy goods from Great Britain than from any other country in the world, because they are our best customers. If I had two customers, one of whom bought from me very extensively and who allowed me to sell my goods to him freely, while the other customer bought as little as possible and sold as much as he could, I think in all fairness I would give much more consideration to the man who was treating me more generously. I think that is what we should do as a nation. The United States tariff is against us on everything; it is as high as they can possibly make it, and on some things which affect our farmers very acutely it is almost prohibitive.

What attitude is taken by my hon. friends to my left in that regard? I ask them if they can advance any sound reason why we should permit butter, cheese and eggs to come into this country from the United States when that country desires to send them here in order to stabilize their markets, at a tariff of three or four cents per pound on butter, while we must pay twelve cents a pound if we desire to do the same thing? Yet that is the very thing which my friends advocate all the time. They have carried their free trade ideas beyond the point of sound reasoning to a ridiculous extreme. As far as our farmers are concerned, I say that if the United States place a duty of twelve cents a pound on our butter, I would never allow a pound of butter to enter Canada from that country under a duty of less than twelve cents a pound, and I would treat them in the same way with regard to eggs and hay. As long as they maintain a duty of $4 a ton against our hay I would not allow a ton of hay to come into Canada from the United States for less than $4 a ton.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Would you do the same thing with boots and shoes?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would consider how it would affect Canadian industry, because I do not believe any industry in Canada should be permitted to exploit the people. That is not reasonable or fair. My hon. friend thinks he is very smart in asking that question. If the United States has no duty on a particular article, would I remove the duty on that article also? That is the effect of his question, and it does not amount to anything; it does not show any vast amount of intelligence. I have stated certain items on which I would raise the tariff, and I have given my reasons for so doing. Now, if my hon. friend has any ideas worth giving, let him get up and say why he favours a duty of four cents a pound on American butter while they are charging us twelve cents.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Probably we want the butter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then my hon. friend's answer is only a probable answer after all, although I thought I might get something definite from him. I will put it to him again: If we had a surplus of 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 pounds of butter, in which case there would be no possibility of our starving for butter from the United States, what would he say?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Their butter would not be coming into Canada, and the price would be determined by the world market.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Now my hon. friend goes back to the old crutch upon which hon. members from the west lean when they have nothing better, but that crutch is cracked and broken and bent and twisted.

Mr. BROWN: My hon. friend mentioned hay. Who would benefit and who would suffer if the duty on hay entering Canada from the United States were increased to $4 per ton?

Mr. PRESTON: The farmers.

Mr. BROWN: In order to prove that you would have to show some hay was being imported, but according to the figures there is none.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Therefore the principle of the thing does not count at all, I suppose? I wonder if my hon. friend from Lisgar is now showing concern about the horses, as to whether they are going to get enough hay to eat? The principle is there. If in any part of Canada we have a surplus of hay which we desire to ship into the United States in order to relieve the market situation, we must pay a duty of $4 per ton. If you turn it the other way around, however, and have a surplus in the United States which they desire to ship into Canada to relieve their market, they are allowed to bring it into this country at $2 a ton.

Mr. BROWN: That is a theoretical argument which has nothing to do with the facts of the case.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think it has, although I have not the figures under my hand.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give my hon. friend the figures. In 1925 we imported something over 10,000 tons, and in 1926 something over 8,000 tons.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): As usual, the hon. member for Lisgar did not have the facts.

Mr. BROWN: I put the figures on record for last year.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is the line of argument usually adopted by the hon. member for Lisgar. He will search the records until he finds something he considers favourable; he will pick out a particular year or month and place those figures on record, then pat himself on the back and consider that he has produced an argument which will turn fiscal questions upside down. In regard to hay I was arguing on the principle of the thing, but we are told that 10,000 tons of hay were imported from the United States. Did that have any effect on our farmers in Canada? If that hay had not come in from the United States the price of Canadian hay certainly would not have gone down; the market would have been a litttle better and the price a little higher. Surely there can be no question of that. What has happened time after time? Consider the question of eggs.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I do not object to hon. gentlemen talking from now until the first of July about woollens, but I do submit to you that eggs are not involved in this item.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will admit that there is a good deal in the objection of the minister. I was making a general application of the argument, and I am quite sure the minister understood my point. I will not carry that further, because I do not want to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily, although I believe if I wanted to argue the point of order I would have fairly good grounds upon which to do so. I got up to stress this point in regard to wool: That inasmuch as we have in this country a minimum wage law which has been endorsed by the members of this house —at least there has been no attempt made to get rid of it; I do not think any hon. member would advocate anything of the sort —that since we as a people, or as a government, or as a party, or as members of parliament have subscribed to that minimum wage law and thereby arbitrarily placed the manufacturers of woollens in this country at a disadvantage in competing with other countries that have not got a minimum wage law, in all fairness it is up to us to take that into consideration and give those manufacturers a reasonable amount of protection against cheaper production costs and unfair competition which has been forced on them. That is the position I take, and I was drawn into a discussion on other points. I do not wish to take up the minister's time unnecessarily but I was applying the argument in the case of woollens to the case of eggs, hay and other commodities, as the minister understood very well. However, I appreciate his desire to get along with business and I do not want to interfere unnecessarily or unfairly with that desire.

I will just say in conclusion that in the fixing of the schedules on woollens the position which I have always taken, no matter on which side of the house I sat, was that I believed that any government in this country approaching the matter from the right angle or the right viewpoint would consider it from the standpoint of the farmer, of the man who keeps the sheep and the man who produces the wool, and recognize that the manufacturer should be secondary to the producer.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change here.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—549b. Hair, curled or dyed, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:

Customs tariff—549c. Haircloth, composed of horse hair in combination with any vegetable fibre: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a new item. We ought to have some explanation from the minister because we do not have that item before us.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe it is a small item. The total imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, under this item, were $74,970.

Mr. STEVENS: It is very difficult for us to grasp just the significance of an item of such a technical character which is read and does not happen to be before us. What is the reason for this item? I should think it would deserve some explanation. It is described as:

Haircloth, composed of horse hair in combination with any vegetable fibre.

We have already passed and dealt with vegetable fibre items.

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that identically the same item was in the old tariff, and in preparing the new schedules this item was inadvertently left out.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the number of the item in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: It was 645.

Mr. STEVENS: I will not ask the minister to give notice of any new items, but I think he should formally move them in every case. May I point out that this item is not the same as item 645 in the old tariff. The latter reads, "Haircloth of all kinds." The present item deals with haircloth in combination with vegetable fibre.

Mr. ROBB: The item reads:

Haircloth, composed of horse hair in combination with any vegetable fibre.

There has been a change in the definition.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is not vegetable fibre in a class by itself somewhere else?

Mr. ROBB: The vegetable fibres are contained in different items.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is vegetable fibre dutiable, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. ROBB: If it is cotton it is dutiable, and if it is linen, it is dutiable. It is a mixture that comes in under this item.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I feel very much as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre feels. The minister is not only bringing in a new item but he is adding something to the old item. Why does he now include vegetable fibre as well as the haircloth itself?

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that the old item covered haircloth of all kinds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The customs officials advise that this is a better definition for administrative purposes.

Mr. STEVENS: That is where I differ. I simply put my layman's opinion against the opinion of the experts. We have already dealt with a number of items, for instance here is one, item 542a, "Woven or braided fabrics . . . . wholly or in part of vegetable fibres." This would cover the very fabric the minister mentioned.

Mr. ROBB: It might or might not.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will recall that in our discussions of last week this question arose on two or three occasions. It appeared that some manufactures were importing under one item, and some entering under another item, which occasioned a difference in duty. I do not know whether the same situation exists in the present case. My point is that in several of the preceding items we have dealt with vegetable fibres in combination with other material. Now we are putting into the tariff another item which seemingly would permit one importer who knew the tariff to enter his goods under this, whereas another importer would enter his goods under another item. It is very desirable that we should avoid that likelihood. I should like the minister to note my objection.

Mr. ROBB: I will look into it.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB moved:

That the following item, enumeration and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:

549d. Manufactures of hair, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: What was that in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: It is part of item 646.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any change here?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in taxation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like the minister some time or other to consider the change made here. This is a very high duty but the item may not be a very important one.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—550. Rags and waste, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, unfit for use without further manufacture, not to include used garments nor waste portions of unused fabric: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In reference to this item I wish to refer to an answer made by the minister the other day. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) had asked him this question:

Mr. Kennedy: I would ask the minister if he knows whether or not any ruling was made by a customs board or any other body which enabled wool which had previously come in under item 555 to come in free under item 554?

Mr. Robb: I think that has been the practice for a good many years.

Mr. Kennedy: What is the reason for that? It looks like sharp practice on someone's part to make a separate item under which sheep's wool is dutiable, and then to allow it in free under another item. This is the kind of thing which makes us think there will be grave difficulty in the future in connection with the different classes of rags which come in free and the others which come in under a duty.

The relevancy to this particular item is now made clear. I want to ask the minister first of all whether wool produced in Canada is of as fine a quality as wool produced elsewhere.

Mr. ROBB: I suppose that is a matter of opinion depending upon the man who owns the particular flock of sheep. Every man's sheep are better than those of another. Before my hon. friend proceeds, I will explain the question raised the other day by the hon. member for Peace River. I have this memorandum from the Dominion appraiser:

Under items 554 and 555, since the inception of the tariff in 1897, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Southdown and similar combings have been held dutiable under tariff item 555, while merino and crossbred combing wools have been admitted free of duty under tariff item 554.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is just the point. The merino and other wool is a very fine class of wool. It is true that it is not even grown in this country; we do not grow that particular quality, and so it is put off the dutiable list. In the cotton schedule the minister will find the anomaly that occurs in the whole structure of this tariff and that is rather in keeping with the confusion which is apparent in our minds and in the appraiser's action. I am quoting from page 652 of the evidence in the cotton case. This was written to the chairman and members of the Advisory Board on Tariff and Taxation, and it is a presentation of their case by the Canadian Spool Cotton Company of Montreal protesting against the Wabasso cotton application. The charge made by these Montreal people is as follows:

During the past six years we have on different occasions tried samples of Wabasso Company's yarns, but these did not come up to the standard deemed necessary for our trade.

The minister under this new tariff places a duty on fine cottons, number forty and finer, although the company manufacturing them in Canada are, according to their own friends' evidence, not manufacturing them of a standard deemed necessary for their trade. He is imposing a duty on the fine cottons from England and then he takes the fine wools and allows them to come in free. I cannot understand the minds that have been at work on a tariff of this kind. The fine cottons are dutiable but the fine wools are free. When hon. members to the right talk about improving the wool industry and the type of sheep in this country and all that sort of thing, they might, instead of raving about the industry itself, ask the minister why he allows free into this country—and I am not objecting to this by any means—fine wool, but imposes a duty on fine cotton?

Mr. ROBB: Raw cotton is free. My hon. friend is speaking about manufactured cotton.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Spool cottons, number forty and finer, are dutiable.

Mr. ROBB: I changed the item. My hon. friend will remember that I changed the item, making it free under the British preference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, under the British preference only. But they are dutiable under the intermediate and the general.

Mr. ROBB: They are.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is the inconsistency.

Item agreed to.

Item 550a agreed to.

Customs tariff—550b. Garnetted material, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use; waste portions of unused fabrics, rags and waste, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, sold by weight, not to include remnants nor mill ends, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 550b:

Customs tariff—550b. Garnetted material, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, obtained by disintegrating yarns or fabrics, prepared for use, n.o.p; waste portions of unused fabrics, machine-cleaned waste, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, n.o.p., not to include remnants or mill ends: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ROBB: It is to make the wording conform with that of the similar clause under the cotton schedule.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister had in the original item the words "sold by weight."

Mr. ROBB: That is struck out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why?

Mr. ROBB: For administrative purposes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think he was very wise there.

Mr. STEVENS: I am a little suspicious of the words "machine cleaned," injected into this item. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the methods to know whether there is any substantial difference between machine cleaned and cleaned in some other way. What is the significance of these words?

Mr. ROBB: We are advised by the customs officials that machine cleaning is one of the modern methods of handling this product and they have asked that these words be inserted.

Mr. STEVENS: Under what item does the other class "not machine cleaned" come?

Mr. ROBB: It comes in under some of the previous items.

Mr. STEVENS: That which is not machine cleaned comes in under the free item. That which is machine cleaned pays a duty of 7½ per cent, 10 per cent and 12 per cent. Is that right?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item 550c agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move to insert the following new item in schedule A:

Customs tariff—550d. Batts, batting and sheet wadding, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What was the number of the old item?

Mr. ROBB: Number 520.

Mr. STEVENS: Item 520 covers a multitude of sins.

Mr. ROBB: The old rates were 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: In this item we are again faced with the old difficulty. It is utterly impossible to know just what the reason is for this. I confess frankly that I am unable to offer any criticism, but here are the facts as I see them. Under the old item 520, the duties were 15, 22½ and 25 per cent, and the item included batts, batting and sheet wadding of wool and cotton. We have here a new item 521, covering batts of cotton and so forth, carrying duties of 5, 10 and 12½ per cent. Then we have batts of wool, which the minister proposes shall carry duties of 20, 22½ and 25 per cent. It would be most interesting to learn just why the change from the old rate was made, and why cotton batts should be 5, 10 and 12½ per cent, and wool batts 20, 22½ and 25 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution reads 12½, 22½ and 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I was mistaken.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not know why the change has taken place, and why this is separated, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is entitled to an answer to his question.

Mr. ROBB: In the old item there was only the word "batts", and it was not easy to administer because in some cases wool and cotton were coming in mixed. The customs authorities have asked for a separate classification for administration purposes. There is very little change involved.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the imports?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification, but the imports are very small.

Mr. STEVENS: The imports were not very large. The total imports last year were only 400,000 pounds, about $61,000. That included batts, batting and sheet wadding, which comes under the old item 520. I do not suppose it is of any great significance.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551. Yarns composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the change here?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in the British preferential. The intermediate tariff is reduced from 27½ to 22½ per cent, and the general from 30 to 25 per cent. The total imports last year were $240,386. The estimated reduction in taxation is $628.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What were the imports under the British preference?

Mr. ROBB: They amounted to $229,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is the greater part of the imports. There is no change?

Mr. ROBB: Very little change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551a. Yarns and warps composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. FRASER: What were the importations?

Mr. ROBB: The imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, under item 558, were $3,614,888. There is no change in taxation.

Mr. STEVENS: The imports were all practically from Great Britain?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551b. Yarns and warps composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, in the weaving of woollen or worsted fabrics (but not including carpets nor floor rugs): British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the number of the old item?

Mr. ROBB: The old item numbers were 558, 559 and 560, and the duties respectively were 12½, 17½ and 20 per cent; free, free, free; free; free; free. The total imports of yarn for the year ending March 31, 1927, under 558, were $3,614,888.

Mr. FRASER: That is the same figure the minister gave a moment ago.

Mr. ROBB: I suppose they have divided it up. It is estimated that of this total, yarn valued at $1,000,000 is used by manufacturers of worsted fabrics, and the saving in taxation on that score alone will be $125,000. This concession will help mainly the worsted manufacturers, as the manufacturers of woollens usually find it necessary to spin their own yarns in order to secure the pattern and type of cloth required. In regard to items 559 and 560, importations for weaving purposes will under the new item enter free under the British preference, as formerly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is another item that looks to me very much like an increase, in spite of what the minister has said. He gave the importations under item 558, which was formerly dutiable, but he did not say anything about the imports under item 559, which was free. Has the minister the total value of the imports under item 559? This was free before; it is now dutiable. There is another item, 560, not included under this, which also was free. I think on the whole this is an increase in the duty, and if you study the trade returns I think you will find that the increase will damage the hat and cap industry seriously, as it will increase the cost of manufacturing braids and things of that kind used in hat and cap manufacturing.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend is right, then my hon. friends opposite have been wrong in delaying this item.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister should not waste his time and mine worrying about who is right and who is wrong. It is his business to tell the committee what is the matter with the item under consideration.

Mr. ROBB: I submit that there is nothing the matter with it. This is a concession to the trade, and as a result we shall have cheaper cloth.

Mr. PECK: This item affects an industry in my own city, and I shall therefore endeavour to point out what is the matter with it. We discussed this question pretty fully last evening, particularly the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), whose city is also affected by this change in the tariff. The change, as I understand it, is this, that worsted yarn, which previously had a reasonable protection of 12½ per cent against the British manufacturer, is now put on the free list. That leaves the manufacturer of worsted yarn without any protection at all against his English competitor. Under the protection that has been accorded this industry for several years, a good many of the factories engaged in woollen production have built up a business, and they manufacture the yarn for their own industry. It is not the raw material, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance the other day; it is the material which is partly manufactured and represents about one-third of the labour in producing the finished commodity. In my city we have two industries engaged in woolen production, both under one management They have been manufacturing their own yarn. The persons employed in the manufacture of a portion of the production number 189, and the annual payroll is $141,704.

Now, I understand that the manufacturers have waited upon the Minister of Finance and presented their views. It is my purpose now to say a word or two on behalf of the men employed in the industry, for if these tariff changes become operative they are likely to lose their occupation, which to them would be a very serious matter. As we all know, the woollen industry has not been on a very good footing for some years, and many of the men engaged in these factories have had to be content with part time employment. The proposed changes will enable British manufacturers, employing labour at a much lower scale of wages than obtains in Canada, to compete with our own manufacturers, and it is extremely likely that that portion of the mill in Peterborough in which the yarn is produced will be forced to close down, thus throwing the men out of work. This condition will not be confined to Peterborough, it will exist in industries located in other towns which will be similarly affected, as was so ably pointed out last night by the hon. member for South Wellington. This being so, between seven and eight hundred men employed in the manufacture of Canadian yarn are very likely to lose their employment. I would ask the minister to lay this matter over for another year, so that in the meantime the facts may be presented to him in a clearer fashion than is possible at the present time. What is gained by passing this item? What will be the resultant benefit to the consumer? Very few people are much interested in whether they pay a few cents more or less for an article; but it is a very serious matter to those Canadian workmen who will have to face the prospect of unemployment. Again I ask the minister to let this subject stand for a year at any rate, in order that he may give it more careful consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Mr. Chairman, I feel I cannot allow this item to pass without another word of protest. I should very much like to find myself sharing the opinion of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that this is an increase. But fine yarns—40's and finer—came in under the old tariff at 12½ per cent, and that is the only portion I am interested in. Practically all those yarns came from Great Britain. If there was any quid pro quo, so to speak, for the consuming public there might be some justification for this change in the tariff. The case has been so well presented by my hon. leader (Mr. Bennett), by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and by my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Peck) that I do not feel it necessary again to go over the ground that they have so ably covered. Let me take as an example of what would happen under this item to the selling price of an ordinary suit of clothes, valued at about $40. The actual cloth from the mill entering into that suit would be 3½ yards at about $2.25 per yard, or somewhere in the neighbourhood of $8. In other words, only 20 per cent of the cost of the suit is in the cloth. To manufacture that cloth—known as 14, 15 or 16 fine worsted, meaning 14 ounces, 15 ounces or 16 ounces to the yard—approximately a pound and an eighth or a pound and a quarter of yarn yer yard is used. This shrinkage from a pound and a quarter of yarn to a pound per yard of cloth is due to the fact that the natural oil of the wool and the lubricating oil that becomes impregnated in the yarn during the process of spinning are taken out in the scouring. If that 4½ pounds of fine worsted yarn were purchased in the old country at to-day's price and at the current rate of exchange it would cost $1.28 per pound. The previous duty on worsted yarn was 12½ per cent. According to my figuring, this would amount to 72 cents; the hon. member for South Wellington placed the duty at 60 cents. What would be the saving to the consumer, the man who buys the suit of clothes? If you could say to him "You will save anywhere from two to five dollars on a suit of clothes," then there would be some justification for this change in the tariff. But there is a saving of only 72 cents, and to effect this saving you are taking from the mills that spin their yarn to manufacture their woollen and worsted cloths practically 40 per cent of their business and putting it on a free trade basis. Up to the point where the wool is changed into fine yarn the work is done by the heads of families, the cleaning, scouring, carding and spinning involving heavy coarse labour. After the yarn has gone through those processes it is put into the looms and handled by female help. So the damage that is being done to 40 per cent of the workers in these mills affects the heads of families, and consequently presents a very serious situation. To bring its gravity home to the minister I need only cite two cases In one town of 3,500 people we have a mill employing a thousand hands, and in another town of about 5,000 people, a mill employing 228 hands. Those mills are typical of the industry. We have several of them in the constituency of South Waterloo. This part of the tariff schedule dealing with fine worsted yarns should be reconsidered, for the proposed change will give nobody any particular benefit, and it is fraught with serious consequences to many of our Canadian working people.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The light has failed.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): My hon. friends to my left are always talking about the manufacturer being benefited by these tariff changes. Let me say that no manufacturer of yarn is being benefited by this item; and there is no doubt that the 72 cents or the 60 cents, as the case may be, that is being saved under the tariff will not be passed on to the consumer. It will slightly reduce the cost of yarn, but it will put out of business a large part of the manufacturers' equipment. In the large mill I spoke of—it is located in Hespeler—the housing and spinning equipment represent an investment of practically one million dollars. In the other mill—located in Preston—the investment is between $400,000 and $500,000. I am not going to say that the employees in that mill will be thrown out of work entirely—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the electric light having failed the reporter may have difficulty in following his notes, and I would suggest that we call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair, and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1927, AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Customs tariff—551b. Yarns and warps composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories, in the weaving of woollen or worsted fabrics (but not including carpets nor floor rugs): British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): At six o'clock I was discussing the serious damage which will undoubtedly be done to the workers in textile mills through this change in the tariff. I was about to say that I was not sure that they would be thrown out of employment entirely, but I believe that these mills will try to change their equipment so as to spin coarser yarns. This will result in throwing on the market the coarser yarns which are now used in the knitted goods trade, to the general disturbance of the whole textile business. I have nothing to add on this subject. I felt that I should protest once more against this change, but the ground having been so well covered and the case so clearly put by the hon. member for South Wellington, I may well leave it where it stands. I want to second what the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Peck) has said; I think it would be wise to leave this item in abeyance until some further investigation is made by the department.

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid I cannot accede to that request; I think we had better put the legislation through as it is. I would remind my hon. friend that parliament will meet again in another year, and there is no desire to do injustice to any industry. I am advised that this will work out to the general advantage of the industry in Canada.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister has given the imports under item 558. What imports have there been under 559 and 560, the items which were formerly free and which are now dutiable under the intermediate and the general tariffs? I want to see whether there is an increase or a reduction.

Mr. ROBB: I have repeatedly stated that there is a considerable reduction. The total imports of yarns were $3,614,888 and it is estimated that, of this total, yarns valued at about $1,000,000 are used by the manufacturers of worsted fabrics. The saving on this score alone will be $125,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is dutiable. What about items 559 and 560 which formerly were free?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change so far as weaving is concerned; they are all free for weaving.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—551c. Yarns composed wholly or in chief value of merino wool, not more advanced than singles, dry spun on the French or Belgian systems, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, imported by manufacturers of knitted goods for use exclusively in the manufacture of such goods in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is this a reduction or an increase?

Mr. ROBB: A reduction.

Mr. KENNEDY: There are some free items here which become dutiable at 10 per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent. There is a 2½ per cent reduction in the British preference on one item, but an increase in the other cases, so that I do not see how the reduction works out.

Mr. BENNETT: Where does this come from?

Mr. ROBB: Practically all under the British preference.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any merino wool produced in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine there is a small quantity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where?

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell you. I say I imagine there is because I know a few farmers who have merino sheep, but the production is very limited.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does this item make merino wool free?

Mr. ROBB: This is a yarn item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—552. Felt, pressed, of all kinds, in the web, not consisting of or in combination with any woven, knitted or other fabric or material: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: What was the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—553. Household blankets, n.o.p., not to include horse blankets, automobile rugs, steamer rugs nor similar articles: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: What was the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: This is the same; there is no change in taxation. A material reduction was made in the duty on cotton blankets. The total imports under this item amounted to $631,154.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, since this is an article very much used by the common people, and since he has seen fit to make reductions in the duty on raw materials entering into the manufacture of these articles, whether it would not be fair to the people to give them the same consideration in regard to the manufactured article. Not long ago I understood the minister to say in connection with the reductions on such items as formaldehyde and bluestone, when there was only one industry manufacturing the article, that he made the reductions because he considered that the number of people using those articles to be a good deal larger than the number of people manufacturing them. There are 10,000,000 people who use blankets, and I do not see why that principle should not be applied to this item as well.

Mr. ROBB: Of course that argument would apply to all the items in the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I understood the minister to lay down that principle the other day.

Mr. STEVENS: Principles change with this government.

Mr. KENNEDY: In view of the fact that the minister has made a reduction in the duty on the raw material, while he has maintained the duty on the finished article, does he not think that the Conservative party have a real complaint against him for stealing their policy?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does not the minister think the item might be worded a little differently? It reads at present, "Household blankets, other than horse blankets," and I would suggest that it read "Blankets, other than horse blankets."

Mr. ROBB: Later I am going to make a change in the schedule on horse blankets, so I think this might remain as it is.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—554. Woven fabrics, composed wholly or in chief part by weight, of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not exceeding in weight six ounces to the square yard, when imported in the grey or unfinished condition, for the purpose of being dyed or finished in Canada: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Hon. gentlemen will notice that I have amended the proposed item and that there is a reduction from 22½ per cent to 17½ per cent under the intermediate tariff.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—554a. Woven fabrics, consisting of cotton warps with wefts of lustre wool, mohair or alpaca, generally known as lustres or Italian linings, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister might tell us just what the imports were under the old items?

Mr. ROBB: This is an amendment to the proposed item. For the year ending March 31, 1927, the imports under item 566 amounted to $1,005,499 and under item 561 to $182. The estimated reduction in revenue under item 566 is $100,549, while the estimated increase under item 561 is $45, making a net estimated reduction in revenue of $100,494.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—554b. Woven or knitted fabrics composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpac, goat or other like animal, not exceeding in weight five ounces to the square yard, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: This looks like an increase.

Mr. ROBB: No, it does not show up that way. A very small proportion of the imports came in under these items which have a tariff. The imports for the year ending March 31, 1927, are estimated at one-sixth of the total cloth imports under item 567, chiefly under the British preferential rate. These would amount to $3,795,000. The estimated reduction in taxation on the basis of the estimated imports is $190,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: But what about the other three items?

Mr. ROBB: The estimate includes those.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

Customs tariff—554c. Woven or knitted fabrics, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpac, goat or other like animal, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This is an amendment to item 554c as proposed.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—554d. Woven or braided fabrics not exceeding twelve inches in width, whether with cut pile or not, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Might I ask the Minister of Finance why this tariff item maintains the British preference at 27½ per cent? That seems very high to give any preference.

Mr. ROBB: These are narrow fabrics. The British preferential rate is lower than the intermediate and the general rates.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It is higher than any of the others that we have had up to date.

Mr. ROBB: That may be, but as I said before, they are narrow fabrics.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Does the item include tape and braid?

Mr. ROBB: No, the braids are in another place.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:

Customs tariff—554e. Woven fabrics, with cut pile, wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, n.o.p: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven or knitted fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.; fabrics coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 555:

555. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: I wonder if the minister will pretend that this is a reduction in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: No, it is not a reduction.

Mr. KENNEDY: How does this square with the past policy of the Liberal party? We started in the woollen schedules with putting raw materials on the free list, notwithstanding the declarations by the Liberal party in favour of a substantial reduction of the duties on the necessities of life, and so on. We have an increase here and it is a fairly large increase too. The rates at first proposed were 20, 27½ and 30. Under the resolution which the minister proposes the rates will be 27½, 35 and 35. How does the minister justify that increase in view of the declared policy of his party? The amendments that have already been put through in the case of wool have practically placed the raw materials of the woollen industry on the free list.

Mr. ROBB: I gave my hon. friend a few days ago, the figures of the importations with regard to materials that are affected here. They are comparatively very small.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, but the minister has not given us any reason for this increase. I should like him to explain the reason for this increase in item 555.

Mr. ROBB: I do not admit that there is an increase in regard to the whole item. The importations are very small.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is no possibility of claiming there is a decrease in this item. If the minister did make such a claim it would simply prejudice all the claims he has made throughout the whole schedule.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. KENNEDY: No, Mr. Chairman, we are waiting for an explanation. I want to know why the increase was made. There must be a reason for it, and the minister should be able to give it to us.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will have the reason.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason is it is there; that is the whole reason.

Mr. ROBB: There have been a number of these items—cotton, flax, silk, and so on—where the importations are very small. I gave the figures with respect to them a few days ago and they are on Hansard. My hon. friend will recall that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. gentleman wants to know the reason for the increase.

Mr. ROBB: Reclassification.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): The importations under these schedules would be small because the duties are prohibitive. This item covers knitted fabrics. A good deal has been said about the woollen industry and the condition it is in, but nothing has been said in regard to knitted goods. We all know, however, that the knitted goods industry is in a very prosperous condition. In a cold climate like ours knitted fabrics are needed for six months in the year, especially in the west, and yet the highest tariff in the whole schedule appears to be imposed on clothing and various other items. In view of the declarations by the Liberal party at the last election, and especially of the western members, some explanation should be given as to why such duties are imposed on what are really necessities of life.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No, Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Finance should give some explanation in answer to the hon. members who have spoken. He has said that the importations are not large but I do not suppose he will advance that as a reason for increasing the rate of duty. I am very much interested in getting an explanation from the minister as to the reason for the increase in this item, or for that matter in any other item. He must have some reason for the action he is taking.

Mr. ROBB: I submit again to my hon. friend that according to the memorandum I have received from the officers of the department, who have gone carefully into the matter, there will be very little change in taxation. It is really a matter of reclassification. Certain items that were formerly in cottons and linens, and other classifications, now come in here, but the main importations are under item 567.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is undoubtedly an increase in the tariff and I should like to ask the minister again if he will just state the reason for it. Whether small, or not, there is evidently an increase, and I think we are entitled to know the reason for it. If the tariff board has recommended the increase, surely they must have supported it with some argument. If they did not do so the increase must have been recommended by someone else, and I should like to know why it is done.

Mr. ROBB: I will give my hon. friend the imports. The total imports under item 567 amounted to $2,599,634. But I am not able to give the portion coming under this item that we have increased, because there is no separate classification.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister cannot say to what extent they are affected.

Mr. ROBB: There is a total of $1,247,000, but some of it comes under another item, clothing of linen, and as I explained to my hon. friend, the woollen fabrics are not affected in this. There is no increase in the woollen fabrics.

Mr. KENNEDY: But there is an increase in the other two items and I want to know the reason why.

Mr. ROBB: It is comparatively small and it comes under other classifications that we have passed.

Mr. KENNEDY: That does not answer the question why the increase is made. That is the point we want to get.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the real fact not that there is a thread of silk in it and they no longer classify it as woollen, so that the duty is higher in order to protect the woollen industry in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: No; it is not.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not wish to harass the minister, but not long ago I heard the minister express—and I think he was sincere—extreme sympathy regarding employees of certain factories, saying that he did not wish to see the industry ruined because a reduction in the tariff in that particular item might affect the employees in that industry. Surely I may appeal to the minister to consider further this item, which is perhaps the most important one in the whole schedule of clothing and knitted fabrics, on behalf of the thousands of little boys and girls and workingmen who need these articles in their common everyday life. They are entitled to some reduction in the tariff on the necessaries of life which they use every day, especially after the statements made by the minister in regard to reducing the duties on the raw materials of manufacturers.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. ROBB: If the goods cost less to produce, competition will take care of that and there will be a decrease.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I cannot help saying a word or two in connection with this item, because it recalls to my mind that during the last election there were inserted in all the local papers in my constituency glaring advertisements to the effect that all people were divided into two classes: they were either Conservatives or Liberals. That conclusion was arrived at on the basis of their tariff policy. I have before me part of the old 1919 chart that has been referred to so often in this chamber. It is an old maxim that you have to keep repeating, repeating and repeating and after a while perhaps it will soak in. In this chart we have these words as to the doctrine of the Liberal party:

> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear.

We have in the item before us a substantial change in the duties upwards. If it is Liberal doctrine to revise the duties downwards, then Conservative doctrine must be to revise the duties upwards, and if the party in power is revising the duties upwards we can conclude only that it must be following Conservative doctrine.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Not as sincerely.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: My hon. friend says: "Not as sincerely." An hon. member in this corner has persistently asked for a reason for this upward revision on this important item of wearing apparel, but the minister is unable to give the reason. I think the real reason is that this old shibboleth of the difference in tariff doctrine is merely a matter of words carried into action at election time and forgotten in between elections.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): I am rather surprised that this item, which includes woollen clothing, should not have been reduced. It seems to me that the schedules are ridiculously high. Practically every two years since this government came into power we have had tariff revisions. The first one we had of any account was during the session of 1924 when the duties in the agricultural schedules were reduced to a considerable extent. Those were reductions that you could see with the naked eye and that you could feel when you went to buy an agricultural implement. Those reductions were effected under the old method, there being no tariff board in existence at that time. In 1926, two years later, we had good substantial reductions in the duties on automobiles and electrical generating plants for supplying electricity to farm homes, public buildings, and the like. The reduction in the duty on automobiles varied from 35 to 20 per cent on the minimum priced car to not quite so much on the higher priced car. Since 1926, a tariff advisory board has been created and we now have the result of their first endeavours in a revision of the textile schedules. As was pointed out before, the Liberal platform contained a pledge stating that the duties on wearing apparel should be substantially reduced. Yet after they have given this promise; after they have made the preparation of having a tariff board appointed; after that board has spent a year on this tariff schedule, and after we have spent all this time in the house, we have practically no reductions at all. I wonder if we have made any progress by having a tariff board appointed. It seems to me that the old system would have been better because substantial reductions were effected under it in 1924 and 1926.

These textile schedules are being revised this year and it is not likely that we shall deal with them again for a number of years. I know there is a low tariff sentiment in this house. I know there are a number of members from Ontario who were elected because of the budget on low tariff principles of 1926. I know the vote they received was because of those reductions. Yet in the face of the preparation that has been made through a tariff board to effect reductions in these schedules, what have we accomplished? What is the public going to think? These schedules are all entirely out of line with the schedules that were revised in the other two previous budgets and I want to put a few of them on record to show how very high some of them are. I will quote a few of these clothing schedules with the rates proposed.

—	British Preferential tariff	Intermediate tariff	General tariff
Cotton fabrics, unbleached	12½ p.c.	20 p.c.	22½ p.c.
Cotton fabrics, bleached	15 "	22½ "	25 "
Cotton fabrics, n.o.p.	20 "	25 "	27½ "
Cotton sheets, traycloths, quilts, napkins, etc., hemstiched only	15 "	25 "	27½ "
Cotton blankets	15 "	22½ "	27½ "
Cotton socks and stockings	20 "	27½ "	30 "
Cotton clothing	22½ "	25 "	30 "
Shirts, not knitted, collars and cuffs, all of cotton	20 "	30 "	32½ "
Fabrics of flax, unbleached	15 "	25 "	27½ "
Fabrics of flax, bleached or coloured	20 "	30 "	32½ "
Woven or knitted fabrics of vegetable fibres, n.o.p., and linen velveteen	20 "	27½ "	30 "
Handkerchiefs of linen, plain	20 "	30 "	32½ "
Handkerchiefs of linen, fancy	22½ "	32½ "	35 "
Clothing and manufactures of linen	22½ "	30 "	35 "
Collars and cuffs of linen	20 "	30 "	35 "
Wool blankets, household, n.o.p.	22½ "	30 "	35 "
Woollen fabrics, not over 5 ounces to square yard	22½ "	30 "	35 "
Woollen fabrics, heavy	27½ "	35 "	35 "
Socks and stockings of wool, expensive	27½ "	32½ "	35 "

And so on. Hon. gentlemen will observe that the rates in these new schedules are in very few cases below 20 per cent, and most of them in the intermediate and general tariffs are over 25 per cent. In other words, assistance is being given to the extent of one-quarter of the price of the article protected, and that in spite of the fact that we had a pledge in the Liberal platform of 1919 that the duties on wearing apparel would be reduced. That pledge was not only given at that time, but this government has since proclaimed itself as a low tariff government, a government in favour of tariff reduction. Even last session the Minister of Finance was proud to say that this government was a low tariff government. But I would ask, do the rates I have quoted indicate that?

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Are not the duties lower than they were?

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): On the whole there is only a slight loss in revenue from this revision, according to the figures given by the Minister of Finance. The Liberal party pledged itself in its platform to provide relief by way of tariff reduction along these lines, and yet the first time these clothing schedules are touched at all, they are left at these ridiculously high levels and in a few instances the duties are increased. I maintain that this is not a reduction that one can see with the naked eye at all. It is not a reduction that will be felt when one goes out to purchase any of these articles.

Now what is going to be done about it? To my mind there is in this country a strong feeling and a demand that these schedules should be reduced, and if the electors in this country come to realize that they cannot accomplish a reduction along these lines through the Liberal party, which pledged itself to provide these reductions, the low tariff element in this country is going to find expression in some other way. It has done that before. In spite of the assistance that has been given to the government through the increase of low tariff sentiment on the government side of the house since the last election, by the acquisition of a larger number of low tariff men from the province of Ontario and from the western provinces, it seems to me that the government is proceeding in the opposite direction to lower tariffs, and that it is not reducing the tariff after all the preparations that have been made to effect a reduction. The tariff board has given a year's study to this subject, and the low tariff men are in larger numbers than ever before on the government benches, and yet we are asked to put through these schedules with the rates as high as I have mentioned.

The plea of the government used to be that they could accomplish something if they had stable government. But what is being accomplished in these schedules? The agricultural implement schedules were not nearly as high as these, and yet a substantial reduction was effected in them. The automobile duties and other tariffs corresponded with these now before us in rates of duty, and yet a substantial reduction was effected in them, but we have no reduction in these clothing schedules, in spite of the fact that we now have stable government, with the Liberals in a big majority in the house. The Minister of Finance last night, in giving his reasons why all these reductions were being made in the way of placing raw wool and cottons on the free list, said:

> The tariff board in considering how they could best help the industry—

He is speaking of the woollen industry:

> —had two ways open to them; they could either put up the duty on the finished product, or give a concession on the raw material required for the industry. They took the latter course, and I believe it is sound.

But what about the consumer, Mr. Chairman? There was a pledge given to the consumer in the Liberal platform of 1919, that these tariffs would be reduced, but the consumer is not mentioned or even thought of in these schedules. Consideration is shown only for the industry. The industry has had its raw material placed on the free list, while the duties on the finished article remain where they were. This budget provides no relief for the consumer. Is this all we are going to get from the tariff board? We asked for relief for the consumer, we asked for tariff reductions, and that is what we expected to get through our organization, the Consumers' League, but all we get is free raw materials for the manufacturers, and no corresponding reduction for the consumer. I feel that I should not let these tariff schedules pass without bringing them to the attention of the house to show the ridiculously high level at which they are being maintained. Let us remember that once these schedules are passed it is not at all likely that they will be referred to again for a number of years. Consequently we are committing ourselves to these schedules indefinitely. Are we making much progress along the lines of the Liberal platform and in the direction that the electorate expected when they voted at the last election for the Robb budget on the promise that there would be further reductions?

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, several hon. members in this corner of the house have asked the minister the reason for the increase in this item 555. I for one should be glad to hear some explanation.

Mr. ROBB: At the risk of tiring the house, let me repeat that there is no increase of the tariff on woollen clothing. I admit that on a very small portion of the item "coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal," there is a slight increase. But these goods are not wearing apparel; they come under a former classification, and are imported for the class of industry that the last speaker (Mr. Fansher) has just been discussing. They are used largely by the manufacturers of automobiles. Some of it is what is known as imitation leather.

Mr. KENNEDY: The minister says there is no increase?

Mr. ROBB: No increase in woollen clothing.

Mr. KENNEDY: What about the proposal in connection with the British preference that the minister hinted at in his budget speech; will that be an increase?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is referring to the British labour content?

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: I am bound to say my hon. friends have convinced me to-night that they have not paid attention to what I have said in the past.

Mr. KENNEDY: I admit it is somewhat difficult to hear the minister in this corner when so much conversation is going on throughout the chamber.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I sometimes have difficulty in hearing my hon. friend because—

Mr. KENNEDY: Because of the continual chatter.

Mr. ROBB: —because of the busy atmosphere around me. I have told the house at least three times that in the budget we were serving notice on the world that in October we intended changing the percentage of British workmanship to qualify imports under the British preference. Australia had represented to us that 75 per cent would be fair; I think New Zealand suggested 75 per cent also; I do not recall whether South Africa favoured 50 or 75 per cent. We always took the position that 50 per cent would be about fair. Indeed, looking at our own exports to other countries, we were not very much interested in having the percentage higher than 50. This will be done, as it has been done before, by regulations issued by the governor in council. But we are not going to disqualify our own importers in any way by making the percentage of British labour content so high that the goods cannot come in. We want them. But we do not want the middleman on the docks at Liverpool to bring in goods from continental countries and then ship them here under the British preference, thus preventing British workmen from getting any part of the advantage of this change. We are not going beyond what the British manufacturers themselves have imposed upon our industries. I repeat, under the regulations we make there will be certain reservations, and there may be items that will not come in under that 50 per cent. For instance, I am told that certain cotton yarns possibly could not qualify, those yarns will be exempted. I say to my hon. friend now that we will exempt such articles so it will be quite possible for them to come in under the British preference.

Mr. SPENCER: Is that left entirely to the discretion of the minister?

Mr. ROBB: I think it is done through the governor in council.

Item agreed to.

56103—106½

Customs tariff—556. Socks and stockings, wholly or in part of wool, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, valued at more than $1.50 per pound: British preferential tariff, 27½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is an increase.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe there are three classifications for that material. Under 556, which is the high rate, there will be an increase of $20,732; there is no change under 556a; under 556b there will be a net decrease of $43,305. So that on all three items there is a decrease of $22,573.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the minister explain the reason for dividing the item in this way? It seems to me there will be a lot of difficulty in connection with appraisals, and that it is an attempt to encourage our people to wear cheap goods. We do not want too much of such goods in Canada; our climate calls for the best kind of socks and stockings, especially for people working out of doors. For the life of me I cannot see why there should be this discrimination in the tariff. You would have to buy a pair of these cheap socks every week—perhaps every time you changed your shoes. It looks to me to be an utterly foolish rearrangement.

Mr. ROBB: The items have been prepared after consultation with the tariff board and the officers of the Customs department. We are told by the appraisers, those who are conversant with the trade, that the highest grade takes in largely what are known as sports goods—fancy lines of hose. If my hon. friend is a golfer he may hit back at me, because I am told golf hose and golf jackets come in under the higher classification.

Mr. KENNEDY: No, I am not a golf enthusiast, but I know what it is to sit on a load of wheat at 50 below zero,—

Mr. ROBB: We are in the same class.

Mr. KENNEDY: —and I certainly object to paying an extra tax when doing that kind of work for the Dominion. I think the minister would be well advised to go back to the old items and treat them all alike.

Mr. ROBB: If I did that, my hon. friend would be losing this reduction of $22,573.

Mr. KENNEDY: That is an estimated reduction. I notice how readily the minister refers to these reduction claims, but when we ask him to explain an increase he seems to find it impossible to segregate the imports under items that were previously free but are now dutiable. I would not take that too seriously. I fancy the reduction in taxation will be more than offset by the increased expense in appraising and watching the different classes of socks coming in.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the increase or decrease based on the estimates of a year ago?

Mr. ROBB: It is based on the business of 1927.

Item agreed to.

Item 556a agreed to.

Customs tariff—556b. Socks and stockings, wholly or in part of wool, but not containing silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: We have been told about some of the higher quality socks. Who are the victims condemned to wear socks under item 556b?

Mr. ROBB: I am in the class that will wear the lower priced socks.

Item agreed to.

Items 557 and 557a agreed to.

Customs tariff—557b. Garnetted material wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, produced by chemical processes, obtained by disintegrating cocoons, yarns or fabrics, prepared for use; filaments or loose fibres wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes, not more advanced than in the form of sliver; waste portions of unused fabrics, rags and waste, wholly of silk, artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres, not to include remnants nor mill ends, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the duty under the old item?

Mr. ROBB: Under the old item the rates were 7½, 10 and 12½; they are all down now to 5, 7½ and 10. It does not make much difference in the cost.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—558. Yarns and warps wholly of thrown silk, in the gum: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): What were the importations of thrown silk?

Mr. ROBB: $12,140.

Item agreed to.

Items 558a, 558b, 558c and 558d agreed to.

Customs tariff—558e. Yarns and warps, wholly of thrown silk in the gum, rovings, yarns and warps, wholly of spun silk, not coloured, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories for knitting underwear, for weaving or for the manufacture of silk thread: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is the minister going to let this pass without claiming a reduction? It looks to me like an increase but it may be a reduction.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right; I do estimate a slight increase but the business does not amount to anything.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why increase it?

Mr. ROBB: We have increased it under the intermediate and the general but it remains free under the British preference.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—559. Black mourning crapes: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: This seems to me to be the masterpiece of the tariff revision. There is a reduction of 2½ per cent under the British preference on mourning crapes. Evidently the minister anticipates the general result of the introduction of his budget.

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend mean by that? Does he want us to think that he was serious in his speech the other day when he referred to a possible alliance between the two groups opposite?

Item agreed to.

Items 560, 560a, and 560b agreed to.

Customs tariff—560c. Woven fabrics composed in part of silk, n.o.p., knitted fabrics wholly or in part of silk, not to contain wool: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. FANSHER (East Lambton): There seems to be an increase; will the minister explain it?

Mr. ROBB: There is an increase in the intermediate and the general but a reduction in the British preference. The bulk of the imports comes under the preference.

Item agreed to.

Items 560d, 560e and 561 agreed to.

Customs tariff—561a. Woven fabrics composed in part of artificial silk, or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes, n.o.p., knitted fabrics wholly or in part of such artificial silk, not to contain silk nor wool. British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: I think 35 per cent is too high. This class of goods is bought pretty generally by all classes of our people, and I think if there is to be any reduction it should be in this item. I would ask the minister to give his reasons for retaining this duty at 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend mean that the intermediate rate should be 30 per cent instead of 32½ per cent?

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to see the whole thing reduced.

Mr. ROBB: I would not like to reduce the whole schedule, because we have had practically no inquiry into the silk question, so we are not making many changes. However, I think there might be some reason for lowering the intermediate tariff to 30 per cent, because formerly there were two classifications at 30 per cent and only one at 32½ per cent. With the permission of the house I will move that the intermediate rate be 30 per cent instead of 32½ per cent.

Mr. FRASER: What is the rate under the British preferential?

Mr. ROBB: It will be 20 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: It is 22½ per cent in the resolution before the committee.

Mr. ROBB: I intend amending that and making it 20 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: The item before me reads 20 per cent, and I read that in the first place.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not make any difference; the resolution before the committee reads 22½ per cent, and can only be changed by motion of the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister of Finance moves that the preferential rate be made 20 per cent and the intermediate rate 30 per cent.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Did I understand the minister to say that the tariff board have not passed upon the silk schedules?

Mr. ROBB: Not completely. They sat in with me on this re-classification, but they have made no inquiry.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): It seems to me we can secure greater reductions when the tariff board have not made an investigation.

Mr. QUINN: The item is not changed?

Mr. ROBB: It is a re-classification.

Item as amended agreed to.

Items 562, 562a and 563 agreed to.

Customs tariff—564. Woven fabrics wholly, or in chief part by weight, of silk or artificial silk, or both, imported in the web in lengths of not less than ten yards each by manufacturers of neckties for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: Brtish preferential tariff, 17½ per cent: intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister of Finance moves in amendment that the word "ten" in the third line be deleted, and the word "five" substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—565. Embroideries, lace, braids, cords, chenille, gimp, fringes and tassels, whether containing tinsel or not, n.o.p.; bobinet, manufactures of lace, handkerchiefs, pillow shams and curtains, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister moves in amendment that the words "nets, nettings," be included before the word "bobinet," and that the words "nets, nettings and embroideries" be included after the words "manufactures of lace." The item will then read:

Embroideries, lace, braids, cords, chenille, gimp, fringes and tassels, whether containing tinsel or not, n.o.p.; nets, nettings, bobinet, manufactures of lace, nets, nettings and embroideries; handkerchiefs, pillow shams and curtains, n.o.p.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—566. Socks and stockings wholly or in part of silk: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the minister might show his generosity and make a reduction in this item and in item 566a as well. This is one of the highest tariffs in the whole schedule, and I think a duty of 35 per cent on socks and stockings, which are used by everyone in Canada, is much too high.

Mr. ROBB: I am sorry I cannot meet my hon. friend on that. These are regarded at least as a semi-luxury.

Mr. KELLNER: I would like to ask the minister if stockings composed of part silk and part wool would come under this item or under the woollen item? The rate is a little higher under this item, and if they were admitted under the other item the rate would be 2½ per cent less.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot tell my hon. friend. It would be a matter of interpretation by the National Revenue department.

Mr. KELLNER: It seems rather strange that the stocking with a silk content should come in at a lower rate of duty than the stocking with a woollen content.

Mr. STEVENS: There are more of them worn.

Mr. HEAPS: During the discussion yesterday it was mentioned that one of the reasons for the decline in the woollen industry was the increasing use of artificial silk. An increasing number of women are now wearing stockings made of this fabric, and that fact should be borne in mind in fixing the rate of duty. The interest of the masses should be considered and the duty made as low as possible.

Mr. ROBB: I think the next item takes care of artificial silk.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—566a. Socks and stockings wholly or in part of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes, but not containing silk: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: There is a difference in the classification here.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister going to provide for some reduction in the duty?

Mr. ROBB: I said a moment ago that there had been no inquiry in the case of silk. I prefer not to make any changes in regard to these fabrics until there has been an inquiry.

Mr. HEAPS: And will the minister make a reduction in the duty after the inquiry has been held?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is making his suggestion at a very early period.

Mr. LUCAS: What were the importations under this item?

Mr. ROBB: They amounted to $127,106.

Mr. HEAPS: That shows the need of a reduction in the tariff.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Kellner.]

Customs tariff—567. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven or knitted fabrics and all textile manufactures, n.o.p., wholly or partially manufactured; fabrics, coated or impregnated, n.o.p.; all composed wholly or in part of silk: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 37½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 567:

567. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manuactured, n.o.p., of which silk is the component of chief value; fabrics, coated or impregnated, n.o.p., composed wholly or in part of silk: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 37½ per cent.

The importations under item 583 of the old tariff, were $3,598,402. There is no change in the rate.

Mr. FRASER: What about the other one?

Mr. ROBB: Part of the other one goes into this item as I explained a few moments ago.

Mr. FRASER: You will have an increase of revenue there?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Will the minister explain what change has been made in comparison with the items in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: I explained that before in the case both of the cotton and linen items, and also that respecting wool.

Mr. KENNEDY: I do not think the minister has explained why the increase in the duty was made. I think he did explain that certain materials were placed in this class, but he did not explain to anybody in this house the reason for the increase in the duty.

Mr. ROBB: I do not know that I can offer any further explanation than I have already given. The material affected is a highly finished fabric and we could not place a lower duty on it than on the raw material from which it is manufactured.

Mr. KELLNER: Does the minister feel safe in raising the duty before there is an investigation rather than reducing it?

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—567a. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven or knitted fabrics and all textile manufactures, n.o.p., wholly or partially manufactured; fabrics, coated or impregnated, n.o.p.; all composed wholly or in part of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes but not containing silk: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 37½ per cent.

I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 567a:

567a. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, n.o.p., of which the component of chief value is artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes; fabrics, coated or impregnated, n.o.p., composed wholly or in part of artificial silk, or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes, but not containing silk: British preferential tariff, 30 per cent; intermediate tariff, 35 per cent; general tariff, 37½ per cent.

Mr. QUINN: A general revision downward.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—567b. Church vestments of any material: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Does not the minister think there should be a reduction here? It seems to be quite a high tariff.

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend suggest

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): Salvation is free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—568. Knitted garments, n.o.p., knitted goods, n.o.p., knitted underwear, n.o.p., all to be valued at more than 90 cents per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 568:

568. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at more than ninety cents per pound: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this another of the items that is going to be investigated by the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: There has been no inquiry yet.

Mr. HEAPS: Will there be a reduction in duty after the hearing?

Mr. ROBB: I could not make any announcement in advance of the hearing before the board.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—568a. Knitted garments, n.o.p., knitted goods, n.o.p., knitted underwear, n.o.p., all to be valued at 90 cents per pound or less: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for item 568a:

568a. Knitted garments, knitted underwear and knitted goods, n.o.p., all valued at ninety cents per pound, or less: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. QUINN: Who asked for the reduction there?

Mr. ROBB: Now we are coming into the schedule dealing with knitted goods. This has been partly before the board at least.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—569. Hats, caps, hoods and bonnets, n.o.p.; hat and bonnet crowns and hat, cap and bonnet shapes: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why the increase?

Mr. ROBB: There is no increase.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—569a. Unfinished hoods, composed of leghorn, manila, palm leaf, grass, willow or chip, not bleached nor blocked: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the reason for this increase—protection?

Mr. ROBB: It was free under all columns before. It is free now under the British preference.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is an increase?

Mr. ROBB: There is an increase amounting to $90.

Mr. KENNEDY: Increased protection.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—569b. Hat sweats, cap peaks, hatters' tips and sides when cut to shape, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of hats and caps in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is any change proposed by the minister in regard to this item?

Mr. ROBB: These were free under all columns previously. This item is a part of items 638a and 538. Item 638a was free under all classes. Under item 538 the duties were 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. These are all free now under the British preference, but it is proposed that under the treaty rates the duty will be 5 per cent, and under the general tariff, 7½ per cent. The manufacturers have been asking us to make this item free under all classes, but we thought it would be better to have it in this way. I should be glad to hear my hon. friend's views on the subject.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not any very definite views more than this. These bands and trimmings, that are known as sweat bands, are not and never have been manufactured in Canada. The bulk of the importation of them has always been from the United States, because the trade in Canada demands the United States sweat band. I realize the very laudable effort of the minister to drive this trade into British channels, but British sweat bands and trimmings are not suitable to the Canadian trade. I do not know who has asked for this change, and I do not think the matter was investigated by the tariff board. I think this is done just by the whim and fancy of the minister or his assistants. The whole schedule is got up without any principle; it is purely hapahazard, guess-work. Any communication that has come to me on the subject from manufacturers—and I have quite a large hat factory in my riding—has been merely to leave these matters as they were, free, free, free, from all countries.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to support the hon. member for South Wellington in his remarks in connection with this item. From the information which I have, the demands of the Canadian trade with respect to these articles are such that all imports must come from the United States. In England they do not make the varieties and styles that the Canadian people want and that correspond with the United States styles. If the minister could tell us just how much of the imports comes under the British preference and how much comes from other sources, we might be able to arrive at some conclusion. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggests that $178,000 worth come from United States and only $36,000 worth from Great Britain, bearing out the argument I am making. There is in Canada no factory making these goods; the volume of trade in this country will not warrant the establishment of a factory, and it appears impossible to switch any considerable amount of this trade to Great Britain because of the facts that I have stated, namely, our proximity to the United States, the similarity of styles and the many styles of bands that they have over there and that we insist on having here. Therefore it seems to me that we are simply increasing the cost of the hat without any advantage whatever to any Canadian industry. I suggest that this item be taken under further consideration and be made free under all tariffs as it was before.

[Mr Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend and the hon. member for South Wellington have placed me in a position where I am compelled to accede to their wishes. Representatives of two of these different industries called upon me and made representations. They said that they could telegraph and get these goods sometimes over night and that Canadians preferred styles similar to those they observed on the hats of tourists coming into Canada from the United States. I was very frank with them; I said to them: If you can get your member to stand up and make a speech favouring free trade with the United States, I will listen to it. I move therefore that this item be amended so that it will read: "Free, free, free", in all columns.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I must thank the minister for his consideration in regard to this item. If he will do the same thing in regard to worsted yarns, I will not have very much to complain of.

Mr. ROBB: We have passed that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish also to thank the minister, but to explain to him that our reason for doing this is that no industry in Canada is being injured. That is the great distinction in these matters. I would not stand here and ask for this reduction if the effect were to be the deprivation of any Canadian workman of a job, forcing him to go to the United States to seek employment. We are doing this simply because no Canadian industry is being injured, but because on the contrary Canadian industry is being promoted.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very much interested in this matter. Has the minister taken this action without consulting the tariff board?

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: With the unanimous consent of the committee, I move that we reconsider item 569a. If we are going to do this, we might as well make a job of it and put them all on the same basis.

Motion agreed to.

Customs tariff—569a. Unfinished hoods, composed of leghorn, manila, palm leaf, grass, willow or chip, not bleached nor blocked: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I move that this item be amended so that it will read: "Free, free, free," in all columns.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—569c. Braids or plaits, of chip, palm leaf, manila, willow, osier, rattan, straw, tuscan or grass; braids or plaits of artificial silk or similar synthetic fibre produced by chemical processes; braids or plaits of glazed cotton thread; all to be imported for use exclusively in the manufacture of hat bodies or shapes, but not for ornamentation or trimming of such bodies or shapes: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I move that this item be amended so that it will read: "Free, free, free" in all columns.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—569d. Woven fabrics, not exceeding three inches in width, in lengths of not less than eighteen yards, of a class or kind not made in Canada, generally known as "single, double or four shot corded ribbon", imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories in making the bands on hats or in binding the edge of the hat brim: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I move that this item be amended so that it will read: "Free, free, free" in all columns.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Items 570, 571 and 572 agreed to.

Customs tariff—573. Enamelled carriage, floor, shelf and table oilcloth, linoleum, and cork matting or carpets: British preferential tariff, 25 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: This seems a very high tariff on a product that is used by the very poorest of people. I would like the Finance minister to give us a reason why the tariff should be so high.

Mr. ROBB: This is one of the items upon which there has been no inquiry as yet by the board.

Mr. SPENCER: All the more reason why we should reduce it.

Item agreed to.

Items 574 and 574a agreed to.

Customs tariff—574b. Webbing, with strands of rubber interwoven or braided therein, exceeding one inch but not exceeding twelve inches in width, imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Why this increase? I notice there was an increase in the previous item too.

Mr. ROBB: There is no increase in the British preferential.

Mr. KENNEDY: But there is in the other two tariffs. What is the reason?

Mr. ROBB: It has been represented to me that this industry which is a small one could not get along under any lower rates, and would be closed down.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did the tariff board make a recommendation on this item?

Mr. ROBB: I had consultations with the board but the industry did not appear before the board.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): This item applies to more than manufacturing industries. There has been a great deal of immigration into Saskatchewan during the last five years, but we find that we have 1,600 fewer farmers to-day than we had five years ago, and it is because of such schedules as this. Are we to receive no consideration at all? I was pleased when two gentlemen to my right, evidently converts of the hon. member for Rosetown, stood up and asked for free materials from the United States for the manufacturer, but they protest vigorously against us when we ask for similar consideration in regard to what is the raw material in our production. I would urge the minister to give us the same considera-

Mr. KENNEDY: I can hardly look at these items without thinking of some of the speeches I used to hear Liberal orators making in the province of Saskatchewan when I lived there some years ago. I never heard a Liberal speech in Saskatchewan in those days without hearing that if the Tories came back into power, the tariff would be raised as high as Haman's gallows. I cannot look at these increases without thinking of those claims, and wondering why it is that hon. gentlemen across the way think it should be so easy for us to co-operate with them, and so difficult for us to co-operate with the Tories. If anybody can tell me what is the difference between the Liberal policy and the Tory policy, not on the basis of the speeches made, but on the basis of the actual tariff reductions effected or increases made, I shall be glad to be enlightened. The speeches of the high tariff Tories I do not think should be taken any more seriously than the speeches of the low tariff Liberals, and I would like to know where the actual difference is as expressed in the tariff schedules.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If the hon. gentleman will read the table printed at the end of the Prime Minister's speech the other day he will find some differences there.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, on the basis of speeches, but I am speaking of the schedules.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I was speaking of the actual record.

Mr. KENNEDY: But what about these items? Here are increases of 10 per cent in the British preference, and 5 and 7 per cent in the intermediate and general rates. What difference is there in this instance?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would point out to the hon. gentleman that in item 574a there is a reduction from 25 to 20 per cent in the British preference. In item 574b there is an increase of 5 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing comes from Great Britain under that item. The imports all come in from the United States.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will give you the imports from Great Britain and the United States under item 574b, in 1926: United States, $144,801; United Kingdom, $47,649. There is actually a decrease in this item from 25 to 20 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know what my hon. friend is quoting from, but I have the record here. I will admit that it is compiled by this government, and it may be faulty, but I cannot be charged with that. For the year 1926 I find that "webbing, elastic, over one inch in width," was imported from the United Kingdom to the amount of $15,900, and from the United States, $389,000; other countries, $267.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. gentleman is referring to 574b?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not described as 574a or 574b in the trade returns. It is described as "webbing, elastic, over one inch in width," and in the item before us it is described as "webbing with strands of rubber," which is elastic, "interwoven or braided therein, exceeding one inch but not exceeding twelve inches in width."

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. BOIVIN: The items are changed. I admit that the imports were $389,199 from the United States, and $15,992 from England. This item is changed to 574b, but the other item, 574a, refers to narrow goods, and under that item there was imported from the United States goods to the amount of $144,800, and from the United Kingdom, $47,649.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—575. Cordage exceeding one inch in circumference, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 22½ per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. QUINN: Has any consideration been given by the Finance minister or by the tariff board to the representations made by the delegations from the city of Halifax and the town of Dartmouth regarding the cordage duties?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in this item my hon. friend will observe.

Mr. QUINN: So I notice. But were not very strong representations made to the minister and to the tariff board, on behalf of an industry in the town of Dartmouth, for increased duties on cordage?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. A delegation waited on me and represented that unless an increased tariff on rope were granted the industry would not continue in Dartmouth. They wanted manila rope to be given a higher classification, and supported their request with petitions. I had officers of the department check up the petitions, and they found that two, one asking for cheap rope for fishermen, and the other asking for this higher classification, were signed by several of the same petitioners. Under the circumstances I thought it better to leave the item as it is.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—576. Window shades mounted on rollers, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: We had window shade items before.

Mr. ROBB: Those were window shade cloth; these are mounted.

Item agreed to.

Items 577 and 578 agreed to.

Customs tariff—590c. Engines and complete parts thereof, when imported for use only in the equipment of aircraft: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent. On and after 1st July, 1930: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: "On and after 1st July, 1930." That is quite contrary to the usual practice, is it not? Will the minister explain why it is inserted?

Mr. ROBB: I am told it was in before, but expired this year. We are extending the period for two years.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—610. Belting for machinery, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. FRASER: What does the addition "for machinery" mean in this item?

Mr. ROBB: It is asked for by the National Revenue department to make it plain that belting for machinery is covered, not other kinds—for instance, body belts.

Mr. FRASER: There are conveyer belts.

Mr. ROBB: They would be classified as machinery.

Mr. KENNEDY: I suppose this includes threshing machine belts?

Mr. ROBB: No, they would come in under a lower rate. That is why, "n.o.p." appears there.

Mr. EVANS: Is this the rate that will be paid by manufacturers for belting in their own factories?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. EVANS: Is this also the rate that will be paid for repairs for agricultural machinery?

Mr. ROBB: No, I should think it would be whatever the agricultural machinery rate is.

Mr. EVANS: I know that when a threshing machine is sold the drive belt is priced separately; it does not go with the machine. Is this the rate that will be paid for repairs for agricultural machinery?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it will come in under whatever the classification for the machinery may be. Threshing machines come under 447b: Wind-stackers, and threshing machine separators, including baggers, weighers, and self-feeders therefor, and complete parts thereof, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, 10 per cent. That would be the classification.

Mr. EVANS: Does the connecting or drive belt go at the same rate as the rest of the machine?

Mr. ROBB: That is my understanding.

Mr. FRASER: Then how do you distinguish between a belt imported for a threshing machine and another for a sawmill?

Mr. ROBB: That is a matter for the customs administration; I could not explain it.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister is not quite clear, because we have leather belting in item 605, 10 per cent, 12½ per cent and 15 per cent. Then there are several other items of belting. There is belting of leather: 15, 20 and 22½; belting n.o.p.: 20, 25 and 27. Then there is this item now proposed, belting for machinery, n.o.p.: 20, 25 and 27½. It is quite clear that belting that would be purchased for agricultural or saw mill machinery or any other class of machinery would come under one of these heads according to the make.

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that it would come as a complete part of the machine, but I am inclined to agree that if a hardware merchant in a country village handled material of this kind bought in rolls it would come under one of these classifications; it would not be a complete part.

Mr. FANSHER (Lambton): How is it that this belting comes under the same classification as silk and artificial silk?

Mr. ROBB: These are some nondescript items at the end but they are not under that classification.

Mr. EVANS: Does this item include what is under the old schedule, 411, malleable sprocket chain and link belting chain of steel—

Mr. ROBB: That is a steel product.

Mr. EVANS: Does any other item cover that?

Mr. ROBB: This item is a rewording of 610.

Mr. EVANS: What about 411 in the old tariff?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will have to enquire at the department; I have not the information here.

Item agreed to.

Items 620, 621, 622 (now 626) and 627 agreed to.

Customs tariff—627a. Mitts or mittens of all kinds: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Mr. SPENCER: How many mitts came in under the British preference last year?

Mr. ROBB: There is no separate classification of mitts; they are shown with gloves. It is estimated that the reduction will be $5,000. The imports last year of mitts and gloves amounted to $1,401,375. I cannot state what proportion comprised mitts and mittens.

Item agreed to.

Items 630, 681 and 682a agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not going on with the drawbacks to-night?

Mr. ROBB: It is only ten o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: The leader of the opposition is not here.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps we could take up something else.

Mr. STEVENS: Read the item and we can enter it. This is a new resolution.

DRAWBACKS

Resolved, that schedule B to the customs tariff, being chapter 44 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1011, 1012, 1024, 1029, the enumeration of goods, and the rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each of the said items, and the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties be inserted in the said schedule B.

Customs tariff—1011. Botany yarn, single, numbers thirty and finer, on mule cops, tubes or cones, or in hanks, dry spun on the French or Belgian systems, in white only, not doubled or twisted, subject to drawback when used prior to the first day of October, 1928, in the manufacture of socks and stockings and jersey cloth—payable as drawback 99 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any change?

Mr. ROBB: The only change is that this drawback expires on September 30, 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no date before. Why is the drawback entirely removed?

Mr. ROBB: The drawback was given to establish this industry, under the French and Belgian systems. It is well established now and it is considered reasonable that they should pay their share. It comes under a 10 per cent item.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words, they are going to be protected under the tariff and the drawback is taken away?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1012. Woven fabrics in the web, subject to drawback when used in the manufacture of linings for hats and caps, or in the manufacture of hat shapes, and bonnet shapes, made from buckram—payable as drawback 99 per cent.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. BENNETT: Buckram was covered by a special item in the tariff and was free for purposes of bookbinding.

Mr. ROBB: This is for hats.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a drawback of 99 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): According to my information, under the old tariff a drawback of 99 per cent was allowed on a completed lining. That item has been withdrawn, and it now reads; "Woven fabrics in the web when used in the manufacture of lining for hats and caps" as amended. There is no objection to the item as it stands, as is pointed out in a letter which I have received. The writer says:

Paragraph 1012 under the old tariff allowed a drawback of 99 per cent on completed linings. This item has been withdrawn and it now reads, "Woven fabrics in the web when used in the manufacture of linings for hats and caps." While this will be satisfactory providing we will be permitted to engage the help from the United States necessary to print and make up the linings, we call your attention to the fact that we have now at least 1,800 dozens of linings in stock on which we paid a duty of 37½ per cent expecting a drawback of 99 per cent on same after we put these into hats and shipped them to consumers. We sold these linings practically at cost and depended on the drawback to avoid a loss. For instance, a lining for which we charged $3 per dozen cost us $2.93 per dozen after being put in the hat. You can see by this that we had to figure on the drawback to avoid a loss.

If this item cannot or will not be changed then we would like to be permitted either to receive the drawback until June 1, when our spring season ends and our fall season commences, or not have these tariff items enforced until then.

Mr. ROBB: I am disposed to meet my hon. friend on that, but I do not see just how that can be done.

Mr. BENNETT: As it stands now there is a drawback of 99 per cent in perpetuity, or until amended. Is that not so?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then there is no question of the drawback whether the material is used to-day, to-morrow or any time.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is a different wording in the present drawback.

Mr. ROBB: Let me see if I understand my hon. friend correctly. The industry in his constituency has imported the linings and manufactured them. That is now changed.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be imported in the web, and that was not the case formerly.

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid I will be unable to help my hon. friend. I think he had better take his chances, together with everyone else.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If these imports were made before this change took place, would it not be a matter of justice that these drawbacks should be allowed?

Mr. ROBB: All these changes became effective on February 17. My hon. friend's industry is in no worse position than any other industry in Canada. I have given him a considerable concession to-night, and I hope he will not press this point because it would be establishing a precedent which might become very expensive.

Mr. STEVENS: Would not the minister consider that any importation made prior to the passing of the budget would be entitled to the drawback when claimed, although it might not be claimed before the passing of the budget? I think that might be done in the administration of these items.

Mr. ROBB: That is a matter for consideration by the Department of National Revenue, and it might be passed upon by the treasury board, although I am not sure of that.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will observe, item 1011 fixes the date of October 1, 1929, within which certain named articles are to be used; item 1024 is in almost similar terms, but item 1012 places no limitation upon the time within which the rebate or drawback is to operate. As I understand the contention submitted to the committee it is that you should apply the same principle with respect to the intermediate item as to the other two. I think this is only precautionary, because I fancy the officers of the department will say, "Where the goods have been actually imported and the duty paid, the rate of rebate would apply as it then was", but apparently the government thought it advisable in the other two items to which I have referred to fix a date, namely October 1, 1929. Is it quite right that you should do that in those cases while leaving the intermediate item in such a condition that it will create a hardship amounting to financial loss with regard to the parties interested?

Mr. ROBB: These parties waited on me, and I do not think this will amount to very much. Of course this gentleman wants every dollar he can get, for which I do not blame him, but we made concessions to him to-night on four different items. I think he had better take his chances in connection with this item along with the other people.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to call the attention of the minister to section 10 of the Customs Tariff Act regarding drawbacks, which is as follows:

On the materials set forth in schedule B to this act, when used for consumption in Canada, for the purpose specified in that schedule, there may be paid, out of the consolidated revenue fund, the several rates of drawback of customs duties set opposite to each item respectively in that schedule, under regulations by the governor in council.

So the governor in council has it within his power to pay that drawback under that section.

Mr. ROBB: I will make no commitment to-night, but if my colleague should recommend that and next year it is found that we have consented to it, I hope my hon. friend will not deal too harshly with us.

Mr. STEVENS: We will hold him immune for anything of this kind.

Item agreed to.

Section 1024 agreed to.

Customs tariff—1029. Materials. When imported by manufacturers of hat sweats, cap peaks and hatters' tips and sides when used in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: We have added the words "cap peaks" this year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1060. Newsprint paper covered by tariff item 197 and other paper covered by tariff items 197a and 198a. When used exclusively in the production of publications devoted primarily to agriculture, magazines or periodicals, published and issued at regular intervals and ejoying second class postal privileges, containing critical, informative and descriptive articles on various subjects, current topics, political and other news or reviews, criticisms or other informative matter, or fiction, being bound, wire stitched or otherwise fastened together: Provided that no drawback shall be paid under this item on trade journals, supplements of newspapers, publications devoted to the private interest of the publisher, or association publications, or publications devoted to the enterprise of the publisher, but not to exclude publications devoted primarily to agriculture—payable as drawback, 80 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This is the amended item, which I move.

Mr. BENNETT: There was some talk of having this amendment printed.

Mr. ROBB: This amendment is to take the place of the present item 1060.

Mr. BENNETT: In reading the amendment the chairman said "197a and 198a." In the original motion the word "or" was used instead of "and."

Mr. ROBB: I am prepared to accept the legal opinion of my hon. friend in a matter of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I think probably "or" would be correct. Perhaps the minister will give us an explanation of what the report of the tariff board was on this item.

Mr. ROBB: The tariff board thought that a 60 per cent drawback might meet the wishes of those who were asking for this change.

Mr. FRASER: What did they ask for?

Mr. BENNETT: They asked to have it made free.

Mr. ROBB: They wanted it free. Then I had some representations that 80 per cent would be fair, and I took the responsibility of making the drawback 80 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was a distinction between the original application made by Mr. Chipman, and the subsequent development of the application, according to the records we have here. I fancy the minister recalls what I refer to. He will recollect the application was made by Mr. Chipman.

Mr. ROBB: The inquiry into the application of Mr. Chipman and some others is not completed. It was thought fair to give them this concession and in the meantime the inquiry will go on.

Mr. BENNETT: The amended protection is vastly different from what was originally proposed.

Mr. CAHILL: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman does not want to be unduly hasty.

Mr. CAHILL: I thought the hon. gentleman had concluded his remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: I am on my feet at the present time and it would be well for the hon. gentleman to observe that fact. Only one of us can speak at a time, and if the hon. gentleman desires to speak I will sit down. This item is not as simple as it seems. The application in this matter was made by agricultural journals, and it was supported by certain trade journals. It is now limited entirely to the agricultural journals, and the item is altogether different from the terms in which it was introduced into this house. We should like to know just what the reasons are for that.

Mr. ROBB: I had representations made to me by the paper manufacturers. They stated that the resolution as introduced would be pretty wide. For instance it was represented to me that it would enable large mail order houses sending out their advertising matter to get paper under the regulations as they were originally presented and receive the drawback. Accordingly the item has been tightened up in order to limit the purpose to that originally intended. That was done after consultation with the officers of the department.

Mr. FRASER: To what journals does the item apply now?

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell my hon. friend that; I have not a list of journals throughout the country.

Mr. BENNETT: About how much money will be involved?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot tell my hon. friend that.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—1061. Woven fabric manufactured for covering the outside of books, of a class or kind not made in Canada. When imported by bookbinders for use exclusively in binding books in their own factories—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for drawback item 1061:

1061. Woven fabric manuactured for covering the outside of books, of a class or kind not made in Canada. When used by bookbinders in binding books in their own factories—99 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: This item certainly is somewhat in conflict with the buckram item to which reference was made the other evening. Buckram is the word which was used in the linen schedule. This is a woven fabric, and certainly buckram is a woven fabric manufactured for covering the outside of books. Buckram not made in Canada came in under certain conditions. The article dealt with under this item is woven fabric manufactured for covering the outside of books, and provision is made for a drawback of 99 per cent. In the case of the other item, there is a duty but I forget the exact amount. There must be some explanation as to why these two items should appear in that way.

Mr. ROBB: There is an item with respect to bookbinders' cloth.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am turning back to.

Mr. ROBB: Item 638 in the tariff relates to buckram adapted for the manufacture of hat and bonnet shapes. I may tell my hon. friend that buckram is never used for bookbinding.

Mr. BENNETT: I may be mistaken but I was under the impression there was an item dealing with buckram for bookbinding.

Mr. ROBB: Item 531 in the tariff reads as follows:

Cloth such as is used for covering the outside of books when imported for use exclusively in binding books, under regulations by the Minister of Customs: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

In this case we changed the tariff item into a drawback item because we learned the tariff item was being abused.

Mr. STEVENS: I am, perhaps, a little dense, but item 531, which is still in the tariff, deals with cloth used for covering the outside of books. That is free. The item we are dealing with here is woven fabric manufactured for covering the outside of books and is subject to a drawback of 99 per cent. How can you get a drawback of 99 per cent on an article that is free of duty?

Mr. ROBB: The free item has been repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister said a moment ago it is still in the tariff.

Mr. ROBB: It may come in under the item of coloured linens or cottons, but the drawback of 99 per cent is paid when the fabric is used for covering books.

Mr. STEVENS: Can the minister give us the new item which takes the place of 531?

Mr. ROBB: Whatever classification it comes into now the bookbinders will get back 99 per cent of the duty if the material is used for bookbinding purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a new item in the tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Formerly it was free. Now there is a drawback of 99 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: And there is a duty on it.

Mr. STEVENS: Somewhere, but we do not know where it is.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friends will surely admit that there may be a difference in classification.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am trying to find out is where it is. We have repealed the old item, we cannot find the new item, and we are providing for a drawback of 99 per cent. That is the position we are in.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will understand that any fabric, no matter what it is, imported for covering the outside of books will get a 99 per cent drawback.

Mr. FRASER: It will be found under item 540 in the new tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: I am interested now only in the preparation of the tariff itself and not in the question of duty or no duty. Tariff item 569b reads:

Hat sweats, cap peaks, hatters' tips—

And so on. This is now free under all tariffs. I turn to the drawback item and I find these words:

When imported by manufacturers of hat sweats, hat peaks and hatters' tips—

And so on. These are the same words exactly and there is a drawback of 99 per cent. How can there be a drawback of 99 per cent on a free item?

Mr. ROBB: It might not be the same item.

Mr. BENNETT: The words in the tariff item are exactly the same as in the drawback item. Under the tariff item the rates are free, free, free, and now there is going to be 99 per cent drawback.

Mr. ROBB: They are going into another classification.

Mr. BENNETT: There cannot be another classification when the words are the same. Is there a nigger in the woodpile? If there is, let us smoke him out.

Mr. ROBB: No, there is not.

Mr. BENNETT: When the tariff was originally prepared item 569b was dutiable at 5 per cent on the intermediate and 7½ per cent on the general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: That is the finished item. The drawback is on the materials.

Mr. BENNETT: This item, when it came before parliament, was free under the British preference and dutiable at 5 per cent, intermediate and 7½ per cent, general tariff. In committee the minister has taken out the 5 per cent and the 7½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Where we are at cross purposes is the fact that the drawback item is for materials for manufacturing these hat sweats.

Mr. BENNETT: When the tariff came into the house the other day item 569b was not free under all tariffs, but now it is free under all tariffs, the 5 per cent and the 7½ per cent having been struck out.

Mr. ROBB: But they still require the drawback on the materials.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I point out to the minister in regard to item 1061, that under the old tariff cloth imported for bookbinding was free under item 531. The minister indicates that that will come under item 541a.

Mr. ROBB: It may come under various items.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a tariff now on the item instead of its being free?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: But the minister has given a drawback only on such classes of fabrics as are not made in Canada, so instead of being free as it was under item 531, it is now dutiable except where similar goods are not made in Canada. We might as well understand the matter clearly. There is therefore a marked difference between the old rate and the new.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend want me to strike out those words?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I am simply pointing out the facts.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item 1062 agreed to.

Customs tariff—1063. Materials, including all parts when used in the manufacture of engines for use only in the equipment of aircraft: Provided that on and after July 1, 1930, no drawback shall be paid under this item unless at least forty per cent of the cost of producing the finished engine has been incurred in Canada—payable as drawback, 50 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will observe the words "including all parts" after the word "materials." That would mean, of course, that manufactured articles which might be imported under any part of the tariff would carry a 50 per cent drawback, and they would have half the duty in competition with those that were made at home. I am directing attention only to the words "including all parts." One can understand the use of the word "materials."

Mr. ROBB: Some of them might be finished.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1064. Seamless iron or steel tubing over four inches in diameter, when used in the transmission of natural gas under high pressure from the gas wells to point of distribution—payable as drawback, 50 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give us a brief explanation of this item?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: The purpose of this item is to provide the same rate of drawback as is provided in item 1017 on lap-welded tubing of iron or steel not less than four inches in diameter. Lap-welded tubing is made in Canada while the seamless tubing is not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: They are put on the same basis?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1065. Bituminous coal, when used in melting or evaporating salt produced in Canada: Provided that no drawback under this item shall be payable on coal used in producing salt or brine when such salt or brine is further manufactured than salt enumerated in tariff items 40, 41, 42 and 42a—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for drawback item 1065:

Customs tariff—1065. Bituminous coal, when used in melting, evaporating and preparing salt produced in Canada: Provided that no drawback under this item shall be payable on coal used in producing salt or brine when such salt or brine is further manufactured than salt enumerated in tariff items 40, 41, 42, and 42a—payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister tell us approximately what sums are paid by way of drawback at the present time?

Mr. ROBB: I could not but I will get an estimate of that for my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole sum of money paid?

Mr. ROBB: I will try to get that for my hon. friend on Monday.

Mr. BENNETT: Our drawbacks are increasing very steadily. According to the last annual report we paid some $15,000,000 odd in drawbacks.

Mr. ROBB: That possibly would include goods that had been exported to other countries. Does my hon. friend want that separated?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is asking the very question to which I desired to direct the attention of the committee. Originally drawbacks were a form of legislation used for the purpose of encouraging export trade. Whenever we imported raw materials of any kind and manufactured in Canada a product from them, on the goods that went out of the country we gave a drawback to the manufacturer. This of course was a great encouragement to the manufacturing business of the country. It stimulated foreign trade and provided a ready means by which we kept our factories engaged in export business. That principle has been departed from. This principle proposes to grant a drawback for domestic manufactures for use in our own country. This means that you subsidize each individual man who comes within it to the extent to which he may use the particular material that is subject to the drawback. In this instance it happens to be coal. There are, we will say for the sake of argument, 100,000 tons of coal used by a particular person. There is, we will say for the sake of argument, a duty of ten cents a ton involved in it; that is $10,000. He gets a present of $10,000 because he happens to be engaged in a particular industry or a particular business. His neighbour, engaged in another line of business, in which he is consuming the same material, gets no such assistance from the treasury. Now I put it to the minister that the principle involved is wrong. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has explained why he has done it. He has an industry in his community that was affected by it. It has cost $60,000 to dredge the river to enable the ships to get up and bring the coal in, because one ship got stuck there. That is what happened; you will find it in the estimates. It has cost this country $60,000 or more to get the wharf and facilities to unload the coal that is to go to this particular industry. After the coal has been used in that industry, although there may be an industry across the street using the same kind of material for steam, there will be no drawback. At the end of the season one gets $10,000 in cash from the government because he sells his product in Canada, and the other gets nothing. That is discrimination of the worst character. That is not a proper performance, I submit, of the duties of government. I should like to know, if possible, just what we are paying out in drawbacks now.

Mr. ROBB: I will try and get the figures for my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In considering drawbacks, has the minister considered the advisability of allowing a similar drawback in respect of coal used in the production of rolled iron and steel, pulverized?

Mr. ROBB: I have a resolution to present as soon as this item is carried. I am not sure that it covers the product to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Was this item considered by the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BENNETT: What was considered by the tariff board was an application by the salt manufacturers of Canada. They made an application, which was considered by the board, and with respect to which some evidence was given. The salt producers did not ask for this sort of protection at all. They pointed out certain conditions that existed, and they desired that legislation should be introduced that would place them on an equality with other producers of salt. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that this is the way he has selected to do it. In other words, he has selected to give a present to particular people engaged in a particular business, as against their neighbours, rather than to make it of general application in which all might share. The principle is wrong. In this case it is barefaced favouritism, that is all, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has himself admitted it.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that the following drawback item, enumerations and rates of drawbacks of duty be inserted in schedule B to the customs tariff:

Customs tariff—1066. Bituminous coal when pulverized by proprietors of rolling mills for heating iron or steel for use only in the production of rolled iron or steel at their rolling mills—payable as drawback 99 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move to substitute the following for tariff item 219a:

Customs tariff—219a. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.; materials, n.o.p., for use only in producing or manufacturing preparations specified in this item, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff free; general tariff, free.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: With respect to 219b, I beg to move that the following item, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:

Customs tariff—219b. Formaldehyde, containing not more than 15 per centum of alcohol: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

It has been represented to me that this is used largely for treating grain to prevent smut and I am now moving that formaldehyde be made free under all tariffs.

Mr. BENNETT: To be consistent, the government must place this item on the free list, but the effect of it upon one of the industries of this country the only one, as the minister is aware, is going to be disastrous. Assuming two bushels of seed wheat to the acre, the protection afforded by this item is fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel. It simply means the existence or the non-existence of the industry in Canada. Is it desirable that we should have to import this very necessary material for the prevention of smut on wheat, or that we should be willing to pay fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel protection? That is the question.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Whom does the hon. gentleman mean by "we"?

Mr. BENNETT: I mean parliament.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It is the farmer who will pay it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. He will pay fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel, and I ask, is it desirable that he should find himself in the position where none of this material will be manufactured in Canada, or that he should possibly have to pay fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel and have his source of supply in Canada? Representations were made to me, and I assume to other hon. members, and the books were open to the minister, and the facts submitted to him. I have no interest in the matter beyond that of a citizen to whom these papers were sent, as they were no doubt to large numbers of the members of this house. I am certain that the minister is satisfied that it involves only fifty--nine thousandths of a cent per bushel.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does not the hon. gentleman admit that putting on that amount of duty would increase the price of the article to the consumer?

Mr. BENNETT: Assuming that it does, it means only fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel, and I ask, is it desirable that the Canadian farmer should be dependent upon an imported supply of this very necessary material, or that he should possibly pay fifty-nine thousandths of a cent per bushel to have this supply in Canada?

Mr. CAHILL: It is a small matter to argue about.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it means the life or death of an industry in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: A representative of that industry complained to me that it would put him out of business, and eventually the farmers of Canada would pay more for the article. My answer to him was that the farmers wanted this, and I supposed they knew their business. That is why I brought in the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it quite fair?

An hon. MEMBER: A step in the right direction.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it a step in the right direction to render it impossible for this industry to function here?—an industry that has reduced its capital stock from $6,000,000 to $2,000,000, whose books have been open to the minister and the officers of the department, whose officials I never saw until the day they interviewed the minister, and who left with the member for Rosetown the same document they left with me. I ask hon. members representing rural sections whether or not it is desirable to place the production of this very necessary article wholly in the hands of people outside of Canada who may be able to make the price anything they desire, and who will do so. We have had experience of it. There is no reason why we should not mention the industry. It is the Standard Chemical Company, owned in Great Britain. As I say, they had to reduce their capital from six to two million, because of their unsuccessful endeavour to establish a great industry in Canada. And any hon. gentleman who represents a rural riding knows how very powerful this particular disinfectant is. The hon. member for Saskatoon perhaps will be able to correct my description. It is a most powerful germicide, and, I understand, is used very largely in the fumigation of ships and buildings wherein people have been subject to infectious diseases. A very weak solution is used to prevent, so far as possible, a smut in wheat. Formaldehyde is composed of oxygen, nitrogen and carbon, so combined chemically as to form a very powerful germicide.

Now, if the possible effect of the tariff upon the price to the farmer is the very insignificant sum I have mentioned, are we wise in departing from that very limited protection, and thus placing our market entirely in the hands of mass-producing competitors? The important thing to remember is that this substance is produced in very large quantities in other countries where there is a great demand for it, whereas in Canada, owing to a limited market, it is produced in very small quantities. I can only reiterate that when the other day my attention was directed to this matter for the first time, I checked up the figures with some degree of care, and I said then I believe—and I still believe—that if the representatives of the rural constituencies were satisfied that only the insignificant amount mentioned was involved, they would not desire to destroy the industry in this country and place our farm population at the mercy of the chemical trust to the south of us. That is the problem for hon. members to consider, and I am quite content with their judgment upon it.

My business for the moment in the position I occupy is to direct the attention of the committee to the fact and ask the minister if my statement of those facts is not correct, because, I submit, it is not sound for any minister of finance merely to say that it has been represented to him by the farm population that they wanted a certain thing, when, as he must now admit, they were not given the facts on which to base a correct conclusion. In my experience extending over thirty-six years I have observed no unfairness in the attitude of my fellow-Canadians when they have been fully seized of the facts. The minister told the people interested that they had made out a case, that the protection was insignificant and in his judgment very reasonable. Now, because pressure has been brought to bear by others without the facts being placed before them, he says: I will remove the item from the tariff and put it on the same basis as the others, regardless of the effect of my action on the industry. I submit that that is not fair to the representatives of the rural constituencies who have not had an opportunity to be advised of the facts. I think it is the duty of the minister to place the facts before the house, not simply to say: Because somebody said they wanted me to do thus and so, I have done it. That is the position we must take in a matter of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose that this item shall pass to-night. We may as well make up our minds to it now.

Mr. ROBB: It is eleven o'clock. All I have to observe is that when I first brought these resolutions to the attention of the house, my hon. friend rather censured me because I was putting a tariff on formaldehyde

Mr. BENNETT: I did not do that.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 26, 1928

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 46, respecting the Nipissing Central Railway Company.—Mr. Lang.

56103—107½

Bill No. 66, respecting a certain patent of Douglas J. Martin.—Mr. Clark.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. A. N. SMITH (Stormont) moved the second reading of Bill No. 71, to incorporate the St. Lawrence River Bridge Company.

Mr. STEVENS: Explain.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): The object of this bill is to incorporate a company to build a bridge a little above Brockville across to Morristown, New York. Last year there was before the house a bill similar to Bill No. 70, to incorporate a company to build a bridge at Gananoque. That bill has been brought up again this year. The Department of Railways and Canals objected last year to that bridge and I do not know what their present attitude is. As I say, the bill I am promoting is for a bridge between Brockville and Morristown. There is no vehicular bridge across the St. Lawrence river between Montreal and Niagara Falls, a distance of over four hundred miles.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): In the last two years we have had a veritable epidemic of proposed bridges across international waters. I am not opposing this bill. I should like to make it perfectly clear that the fact that, in regard to a bill of this character, one takes the stand that there are involved conditions affecting the public interest, is no reason for anyone to say that we are opposing the bill as a private bill. But I think, in view of the large number of structures of this kind that are being proposed, there should be some declaration of public policy on the part of the government regarding matters of this nature. These bridges are proposed to be built across international waterways, yet last year and this we are giving seven or eight private companies very wide powers in regard to these matters and we are creating more bridges and establishing conditions which it will be very difficult for parliament to deal with later on.

Another point is this. These bills in my judgment have been in error sent to the private bills committee. Again I am drawing attention to this as a matter of procedure and not as a matter of criticism of the private bills committee. This bill and similar ones ought to go to the railway committee. They have to do with transportation and traffic; they have to do with the Railway Act; the Railway Act is invoked in some of them. I do not know whether it is invoked in this particular bill. Expropriation procedure under the Railway Act has been invoked and to my mind these bills should go to the railway committee. Furthermore the government should be prepared to declare before the committee and parliament what its policy is in regard to bridges across international waterways.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I should like to inquire from the promoter of this bill whether a similar bill for the United States portion of this bridge has been before the New York state legislature. That legislature, I understand, has now risen, and if that bill has not been passed there, what object is there in pressing this bill? What disposition has been made of the bill before the New York state legislature?

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): This is for a bridge across navigable waters and is dealt with by the United States congress, rather than the state authorities. A similar bill is before the United States congress at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

NIAGARA FALLS MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed, from March 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 14, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company—Mr. Pettit—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the committee last considered this bill, all the clauses had been adopted, and the question is now on the preamble.

On the preamble.

Mr. ARTHURS: Before the committee adopts the preamble, as no doubt it will, I would suggest to the government that all of these bills that are international in character should be sent to the committee on international and industrial relations, instead of to the private bills committee.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I gave notice on the 21st of March, Mr. Chairman, to amend this bill by striking out in clause 7 all the words after the word "approaches" in the twentieth line up to and inclusive of the word "approaches" in the twenty-third line, and substituting therefor the following:

From a point between the Upper Steel Arch bridge and the Lower Steel Arch bridge to be determined and approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: I have a copy here of the three amendments that have been proposed, but as the committee have adopted all the clauses of the bill, these amendments cannot be considered at this time, but may be moved on the third reading. The question is now on the preamble.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the preamble carries, I wish again to emphasize what I said a moment ago in regard to another bill. There seems to be a good deal of misunderstanding on both sides of the house regarding the objections that have been raised to this and other similar bills. I want to make clear that it is not a question of objecting to this as a private bill, or objecting to those who are asking incorporation as a private company. That is not the point at all. The point at issue is that the work suggested in this bill is a very important work over international waters. Up until last year or very recently there have been comparatively few of these bridges built, and it is not sufficient to say, because years ago we allowed private companies to build bridges, that therefore we as representatives of the public should pay no more attention to it and let any company that desires to build a bridge do so. The very presence of this and a number of other similar bills indicates to us, if we are at all thoughtful, that the time has come when the whole question of spanning these international waters should occupy the attention of parliament, and some definite policy should be determined upon and adopted by parliament. The responsibility for doing that rests at the moment with the government. I am not saying this in criticism of the government; I am merely pointing out a condition which has arisen, and indicating what to my mind and to the minds of a great many others is the duty of parliament, and incidentally at the moment the duty of the government as the leaders of the house, namely, to make some investigation and some determination of what the public policy of Canada is to be on the question of bridges crossing international waters. For instance, some of these waters are navigable. In this particular case I do not think the waters at this point are navigable, and the bridge probably will be so high that it will be clear of all navigation. But there are other waters that are navigable, and underneath the bridges over these waters will have to pass all the lakes traffic. This is a stupendous responsibility that we are taking at the present time in allowing bridges to be built across international waters on which passes the whole traffic of the great lakes, and we are doing it, as we also did it last year—I say this with all respect—rather lightly and rather frivolously. I know that my utterances the other day were misunderstood. It was thought perhaps that I had some prejudice against this bill or against the member introducing it. But there is no such thing. I have nothing but the kindliest feelings towards the sponsor of this bill, as I have towards the sponsors of other bills that are introduced into this house. My point is that we are dealing here, through the medium of private bills and private companies, with something that should be a subject of public policy.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask why this bridge is to be called the memorial bridge?

Mr. PETTIT: I explained that the other evening and also before the committee. It is called "memorial" because of the hundred years of peace between the United States and Canada, and also in view of the jubilee year of confederation which has just passed.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I just want to put myself in the same category with reference to this bill as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, who has just spoken. It appears to me that the government of this country should take some stand regarding matters of this kind. Before I sit down I intend to show what the attitude of the state of New York is on similar proposals. When this bill was before the committee on the last occasion, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Pettit) told us that so far as he was advised, the counterpart of this bill in the United States had not been defeated. I can tell him now that that bill has gone where lots of good coloured people go; it has gone to limbo. We are proposing to pass in this house a bill that is opposed by the state of New York, is opposed by the province of Ontario, is opposed by the parks commission on the Canadian side, and opposed by the state reservation commission on the other side. I do not think we will get anywhere with this bill. I just want to put before the house and before the committee a statement from the governor of the state of New York in reference to bridges, not only at Niagara, but also on the St. Lawrence. The committee will see that the state of New York has a policy on this question. I shall not read the whole of it, but just a couple of sentences.

Mr. CAHILL: Read it all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh no, there will be enough time taken up without my reading it all, and if I read it all it would not be good reading for those people who are always calling out "Carried!" That is for my hon friend. On March 31, 1927, Governor Smith of New York state declared:

> I think the time is past when the state should incorporate companies of this kind Such bridges should be built either from public funds or through an agency such as the port authority of New York, authorized to issue bonds at a low rate of interest and limited in tolls to the amount necessary to retire and pay interest on the bonds. Experience with private bridges is that they result in large profits to stockholders and other private parties and the maintenance of high tolls.

He also said:

> Private bridges of this kind bring with them approach and traffic problems which in the end fall on the state and the municipalities, and what looks at first like a purely private business proposition becomes a public problem of traffic and planning affecting all the surrounding territory. Obviously, these related problems which go with such a structure can only be properly solved by a public authority.
> I have just signed a measure setting up a public non-profit-making bi-state authority, similar to the port authorities of New York and Albany, to build the Champlain bridge, and also a measure providing for a study of a Niagara port and frontier authority, which, if it is established, will have the power to plan just such bridges as this without private profit and solely in the public interest. I think this project and similar bridges, such as the Grand Island bridges, can wait until a public authority is established for the purpose. I see no more reason for a franchise to a private corporation to build a bridge over the St. Lawrence than I do for a franchise or a license to a private corporation to develop the state's water-power on that stream.
